With the advance of age the disposition of the dreaded father became gradually more taciturn and unsocial; he never went out but once a year, and that was at Easter, to attend mass at the parish church of Combourg. He made the solitude around him still more solitary; his family and servants he dispersed in the four turrets of the chateau. In the autumn evenings, wrapt in a dressing-gown of white tateen, with a large night-cap, of the same colour, on his head, he strode across the immense salon; if his wife, with her two children, the chevalier and his sister, all three seated motionless by the fire-side, ventured to exchange a few words, a severe que dit-on? uttered in passing, instantly silenced the rash attempt, and not another word was heard until the stroke of ten suddenly arrested his march, and sent him to his place of repose. His retirement was a signal for an immediate explosion of words and hilarity.—Cochrane's Foreign Quarterly Review.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE sonnet addressed to Mr Heraud on his 'Descent into Hell,' shall appear in a week or two.

We were much pleased at receiving the book and letter from Greenock, as the writer will see.

The fault-finding of our Correspondent who sent us the Poem by Fanshawe, is as good as praises from most men. It shall have our due attention. So shall the pamphlet sent us from Newcastle.

The 'Good Man's Prayer' next week. Also Z.Z.

Extracts from the articles of Mr Lamb are again unavoidably delayed.

LASCARIS in our next, and the epigrams from Ptolemy the week after. We extend our gold as much as possible, to secure successive value to our numbers.

The rest of our correspondents will have the goodness to excuse us till next week.

In the sonnet of the week before last, addressed to F. M. W.,—for "either" in the third line, read "rather," and instead of "For" in the ninth line, read "Nor."

CRITICISM ON FEMALE BEAUTY.

[As it is part of the Editor's plan to have no reserves with the Reader, he has to inform him that the following were among a set of papers contributed by him, some years ago, to the 'New Monthly Magazine,' the proprietor of which has kindly given him liberty to republish them. They are written in the first person, from having been contributed under an assumed character.]

Carricism, for the most part, is so partial, splenetic, and pedantic, and has such little right to speak of what it undertakes to censure, that the words "criticism on beauty" sound almost as ill, as if a man were to announce something unpleasant upon something pleasant.

And, certainly, as criticism, according to its general practice, consists in an endeavour to set the art above its betters, and to render genius amenable to want of genius, (particularly in those matters which, by constituting the very essence of it, are the least felt by the men of line and rule,) so critics are bound by their trade to object to the very pleasantest things. Delight, not being their business, puts them out of conceit. The first reviewer was Momus, who found fault with the Goddess of Beauty.

I have sometimes fancied a review set up by this anti-divinity, in Heaven. It would appear, by late discoveries in the history of the globe, that, as one species of production has become extinct, so new ones may have come into being. Now, imagine the gods occasionally putting forth some new work, which is criticised in the 'Olympian Review.' Chloris, the goddess of flowers, for instance, makes a sweet-briar:—

"The Sweet-Briar, a new bush, by Chloris, Goddess of Flowers. Rain and Sun, 4104.

"This is another hasty production of a lady, whom we are anxious to meet with a more satisfied face. Really, we must say, that she tires us. The other day we had the pink. It is not more than a year ago, that she flamed upon us with the heart's-ease (pretty names these); then we were all to be sunk into a bed of luxury and red leaves by the rose; and now, ecce iterum Rosina, comes a new edition of the same effeminate production, altered but not amended, and made careless, confused, and full of harsh points; which the fair author, we suppose, takes for a dashing variety! Why does she not consult her friends? Why must we be forced to think that she mistakes her talents, and that she had better confine herself to the production of daisies and dandelions? Even the rose, which has been so much cried up in certain quarters, was not original. It was clearly suggested by that useful production of an orthodox friend of ours,—the cabbage; which has occasioned it to be pretty generally called the cabbage-rose. The sweet-briar, therefore, is imitation upon imitation, crامة (literally) bis cocta; a thing not to be endured. To say the truth, which we wish to do with great tenderness, considering the author's sex, this sweet-briar bush is but a refinement of the rose-bush. The only difference is that everything is done on a pettier scale, the flowers hastily turned out, and a superabundance of those startling points added, which so annoyed us in the rose ye left the moss; for there is no end to these pretty creatures the roses. Let us see.

There is the cabbage-rose, the moss-rose, the musk-rose, the damask-rose, the hundred-leaved-rose, the yellow-rose, and earth only knows how many more. Surely these were enough, in all conscience. Most of them rank little above extempore effusions, and were hardly worth the gathering; but after so much trifling, to go and alter the style of a common-place in a spirit of mere undoing and embrouillement, and then palm it upon us for something free, forsooth, and original, is a desperate evidence of falling off! We cannot consent to take mere wildness for invention; a hasty and tangled piece of business, for a regular work of art. What is called nature will never do. Nature is unnatural. The best production by far of the fair author, was the auricula, one of those beautiful and regular pieces of composition, the right proportions of which are ascertained, and reducible to measurement. But tempora mutantur. Our fair florist has perhaps got into bad company. We have heard some talk about zephyrs, bees, wild birds, and such worshipful society. Cannot this ingenious person be content with the hot-house invented by Vulcan and Co. without gadding abroad in this disreputable manner? We have heard that she speaks with disrespect of ourselves: but we need not assure the reader, that this can have no weight with an honest critic. By the by, why this briar is called sweet, we must unaffectedly and most sincerely say, is beyond our perceptions."

I was about to give a specimen of another article, by the same reviewer, on the subject of our present paper:—"WOMAN, being a companion to MAN," &c. But the tone of it would be intolerable. I shall therefore proceed with a more becoming and grateful criticism, such as the contemplation of my subject naturally produces. Oh Pygmalion, who can wonder (no artist surely) that thou didst fall in love with the work of thine own hands! Oh Titian! Oh Raphael! Oh Apelles! I could almost fancy this sheet of paper to be one of your tablets, my desk an easel, my pen a painting-brush; so impossible does it seem that the beauty I am about to paint should not inspire me with a gusto equal to your own!

"Come then, the colours and the ground prepare."

This ink-stand is my palette. I handle my pen, as if there were the richest bit of colour in the world at the end of it. The reds and whites look as if I could eat them. Look at that pearly tip at the end of the ear. The very shade of it has a glow. What a light on the forehead! What a moisture on the lip! What a soul, twenty fathom deep, in the eyes! Look at me, Madam, if you please. The eye right on mine. The forehead a little more inclined. Good. What an expression! Raphael, it is clear to me that you had not the feeling I have: for you could paint such a portrait, and I cannot. I cannot paint after the life. Titian, how could you contrive it? Apelles, may I trouble you to explain yourself? It is lucky for the poets that their mistresses are not obliged to sit to them. They would never write a line. Even a prose-writer is baffled. How Raphael managed in the Palazzo Chigi,—how Sacchini contrived, when he wrote his 'Rinaldo and Armida,' with Armida by his side,—is beyond my comprehension. I can call to mind, but I cannot copy. Fair presence, avant! I conjure you out of my study, as one of my brother writers, in an agony of article, might hand away his bride, the printer having sent to him for copy. Come forth, my tablets. Stand me in stead of more distracting suggestions, my memorandums.

It has been justly observed, that heroines are best painted in general terms, as in 'Paradise Lost,'

"Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye," &c. or by some striking instance of the effects of their beauty, as in Homer, where old age itself is astonished at the sight of Helen, and does not wonder that Paris has brought a war on his country for her sake. Particular description divides the opinion of the readers, and may offend some of them. The most elaborate portrait of the heroine of Italian romance could say nothing for her, compared with the distractions that she caused to so many champions, and the millions that besieged her in Albracca.

"Such forces met not, nor so wide a camp,
When Agrican with all his northern powers
Besieged Albracca, as romances tell,
The city of Gallaphrone, from whence to win
The fairest of her sex, Angelica."

Even Apuleius, a very "particular fellow," who is an hour in describing a chambermaid, enters into no details respecting Psyche. It was enough that the people worshipped her.

The case is different when a writer describes a real person, or chooses to acquaint us with his particular taste. In the 'Dream of Chaucer' is an admirable portrait of a woman, supposed to be that of Blanche, Duchess of John of Gaunt. Anacreon gives us a whole length of his mistress, in colours as fresh as if they were painted yesterday. The blue eye is moist in its sparkling; the cheek, which he compares to milk with roses in it, is young for ever. Oh Titian, even thy colours are dry compared with those of poetry!

It happens luckily for me on the present occasion, that I can reconcile particulars with generals. The truth is, I have no particular taste. I only demand that a woman should be womanly; which is not being exclusive. I think also that anybody who wishes to look amiable, should be so. The detail, I used to think I never could tolerate flaxen hair; yet meeting one day with a lovely face that had flaxen locks about it, I thought for a good while after that flaxen was your only wear. Harriet O— made me take to black; and yet, if it had not been for a combination of dark browns, I should the other night have been converted to the superiority of light brown by Harriet D. Upon the whole, the dark browns, chestnuts, &c. have it with me; but this is because the greatest number of kind eyes that I have met with, have looked from under locks of that colour. I find beauty itself a very poor thing unless beautified by sentiment. The reader may take the confession as he pleases, either as an instance of abundance of sentiment on my part, or as an evidence of want of proper ardour and impartiality; but I cannot (and that is the plain truth) think the most beautiful creature beautiful, or be at all affected by her, or long to sit next her, or go to a theatre with her, or listen to a concert with her, or dance with her, or sing with her (if I could), or walk in a field or a forest with her, or call her by her Christian name, or ask her if she likes poetry, or tie (with any satisfaction) her gown for her, or be asked whether I admire her shoe, or take her arm even into a dining-room, or kiss her at Christmas, or on April-fool day, or on May-day, or on any other day, or dream of her, or wake thinking of her, or feel a want in the room when she has gone, or a pleasure the more when she appears,—unless she has a heart as well as a face, and is a proper good-tempered, natural, sincere, honest girl, who has a love for other people and other things, apart from self-reference and the wish to be admired. Her face would pall upon me in the course of a week, or even become disagreeable. I should prefer an enamelled tea-cup; for I should expect nothing from it. I remember the impression made on me by a female plaster-cast hand, sold in the shops as a model. It is beautifully turned, though I thought it somewhat too plump and well-fed. The fingers, however, are delicately tapered: the outline flowing and graceful. I fancied it to have belonged to some jovial beauty, a little too fat and festive, but laughing withal, and as full of good nature. I was told it was the hand of Madame Brinvilliers, the famous poisoner. The word was no sooner spoken than I shrunk from it as if it had been a toad. It was now literally hideous; the fat seemed sweltering and full of poison. The beauty added to the deformity. You resented the grace: you shrunk from the look of smoothness, as from a snake. This woman went to the scaffold with as much indifference as she distributed her poisons. The character of her mind was insensibility. The strongest of excitements was to her what a cup of tea is to other people. And such is the character, more or less, of all mere beauty. Nature, if one may so speak, does not seem to intend it to be beautiful. It looks as if it were created in order to show, what a nothing the formal part of beauty is, without the spirit of it. I have been so used to consider it with reference to considerations of this kind, that I have met with women generally pronounced beautiful, and spoken of with transport, who took a sort of ghastly and witch-like aspect in my eyes, as if they had been things walking the earth without a soul, or with some evil intention. The woman who supped with the Goole in the 'Arabian Nights,' must have been a beauty of this species.

But to come to my portrait. Artists, I believe, like to begin with the eyes. I will begin, like Anacreon, with the hair.

HAIR should be abundant, soft, flexible, growing in long locks, of a colour suitable to the skin, thick in the mass, delicate and distinct in the particular. The mode of wearing it should differ. Those who have it growing low in the nape of the neck, should prefer wearing it in locks hanging down, rather than turned up with a comb. The gathering it however in that manner is delicate and feminine, and suits many. In general the mode of wearing the hair is to be regulated according to the shape of the head. Ringlets hanging about the forehead suit almost everybody. On the other hand, the fashion of parting the hair smoothly, and drawing it tight back on either side, is becoming to few. It has a look of vanity, instead of simplicity. The face must do everything for it, which is asking too much, especially as hair, in its freer state, is the ornament intended for it by nature. Hair is to the human aspect, what foliage is to the landscape. Its look of fertility is so striking, that it has been compared to flowers, and even to fruit. The Greek and other poets talk of hyacinthine locks, of clustering locks (an image taken from grapes), of locks like tendrils. The favorite epithet for a Greek beauty was "well-haired;" and the same epithet was applied to woods. Apuleius says, that Venus herself, if she were bald, would not be Venus. So intirely do I agree with him, and so much do I think that the sentiment of anything beautiful, even where the real beauty is wanting, is the best part of it, that I prefer the help of artificial hair to an ungraceful want of it. I do not wish to be deceived. I would know that the hair was artificial, and would have the wearer inform me so. This would show her worthy of being allowed it. I remember, when I was at Florence, a lady of quality, an Englishwoman, whose beauty was admired by everybody; but never did it appear so admirable to me, as when she said me one day, that the ringlets that hung from under her cap, were not her own. Here, thought I, it is not artifice that assists beauty; it is truth. Here is a woman who knows that there is a beauty in hair, beyond the material of it, or the pride of being thought to possess it. Oh, wiss of Queen Anne's day, see what it is to live in an age of sentiment, instead of your mere periwigs, and reds and whites!—The first step in taste is to dislike all artifice; the next is to demand nature in her perfection; but the best of all is to find out the hidden beauty, which is the soul of beauty itself, to wit, the sentiment of it. The loveliest hair is nothing, if the wearer is incapable of a grace. The finest eyes are not fine, if they say nothing. What is the finest harp to me, strung with gold, and adorned with a figure of Venus, if it answer with a discordant note, and hath no chords in it fit to be awakened? Long live, therefore, say I, lovely natural locks at five-and-twenty, and lovely artificial locks, if they must be resorted to, at five-and-thirty or forty. Let the harp be new strung, if the frame warrant it, and the sounding-board hath a delicate utterance. A woman of taste should no more scruple to resort to such helps at one age, than she would consent to resort to them at an age when no such locks exist in nature. Till then, let her not cease to help herself to a plentiful supply. The spirit in which it is worn, gives the right to wear it. Affectation and pretension spoil everything: sentiment and simplicity warrant it. Above all things, cleanliness. This should be the motto of personal beauty. Let a woman keep what hair she has, clean, and she may adorn or increase it, as she pleases. Oil, for example, is two different things, on clean hair and unclean. On the one, it is but an aggravation of the dirt: to the other, if not moist enough by nature, it may add a reasonable grace. The best, however, is undoubtedly that which can most dispense with it. A lover is a little startled, when he finds the paper, in which a lock of hair has been enclosed, stained and spotted as if it had wrapped a cheesecake. Ladies, when about to give away locks, may as well omit oil that time, and be content with the washing. If they argue that it will not look so glossy in those eyes in which they desire it to shine most, let them own as much to the favoured person, and he will never look at it but their candour shall give it a double lustre.

"Love adds a precious seeing to the eye;"

and how much does not sincerity add to love! One of the excuses for oil is the perfume mixed with it. The taste for this was carried so far among the ancients, that Anacreon does not scruple to wish that the painter of his mistress's portrait could convey the odour breathing from her delicate oiled tresses. Even this taste seems to have a foundation in nature. Mary Honeycomb, a little black-eyed relation of mine, (oftener called Molly from a certain dairy-maid turn of hers, and our regard for old English customs,) has hair with a natural scent of spice.

The poets of antiquity, and the modern ones after them, talk much of yellow and golden tresses, tresses like the morn, &c. Much curiosity has been evinced respecting the nature of this famous poetical hair; and as much anxiety shown in hoping that it was not red. May I venture to say, in behalf of red hair, that I am one of those in whose eyes it is not so very shocking? Perhaps, as "pity melts the soul to love," there may be something of such a feeling in my tenderness for that Parish of a colour. Perhaps there are many reasons, all very good-natured: but so it is, I find myself the ready champion of all persons who are at a disadvantage with the world, especially women, and amiable ones. Hair of this extreme complexion appears never to have been in request; and yet, to say nothing of the general liking of the ancients for all the other shades of yellow and gold, a good red-headed commentator might render it a hard matter to pronounce, that Theocritus has not given two of his beautiful swains hair amounting to a positive fiery. Fire-red is the epithet, however it may be understood.

"Both fiery-tressed heads, both in their bloom."*

I do not believe the golden hair to have been red; but this I believe, that it was nearer to it than most colours, and that it went a good deal beyond what it is sometimes supposed to have been, auburn. The word yellow, a convertible term for it, will not do for auburn. Auburn is a rare and glorious colour, and I suspect will always be more admired by us of the north, where the fair complexions that recommended golden hair, are as easy to be met with, as they are difficult in the south. Ovid and Anacreon, the two greatest masters of the ancient world in painting external beauty, both seem to have preferred it to golden, notwithstanding the popular cry in the other's honour: unless indeed, the hair they speak of is too dark in its ground for auburn. The Latin poet, in his fourteenth love-elegy, book the first, speaking of tresses which he says Apollo would have envied, and which he prefers to those of Venus, as Apelles painted her, tells us, that they were neither black nor golden, but mixed, as it were, of both. And he compares them to cedar on the declivities of Ida, with the bark stripped. This implies a dash of tawny. I have seen pine-trees, in a southern evening sun, take a lustrous burnished aspect, between dark and golden, a good deal like what I conceive to be the colour he alludes to. Anacreon describes hair of a similar beauty. His touch, as usual, is brief and exquisite:—

"Deepening inwardly, a dun;
Sparkling golden, next the sun."†

Which Ben Johnson has rendered in a line,

"Gold upon a ground of black."

Perhaps, the true auburn is something more lustrous throughout, and more metallic than this. The cedar with the bark stripped looks more like it. At all events, that it is not the golden hair of the ancients has been proved to me beyond a doubt by a memorandum in my possession, worth a thousand treatises of the learned. This is a solitary hair of the famous Lucretia Borgia, whom Ariosto has so praised for her virtues, and whom the rest of the world is so contented to call a wretch.‡ It was given me by a wild acquaintance, who stole it from a lock of her hair preserved in the Ambrosian library at Milan. On the envelope he put a happy motto:—

"And Beauty draws us with a single hair."

If ever hair was golden, it is this. It is not red, it is not yellow, it is not auburn: it is golden, and nothing else; and though natural-looking too, must have had a surprising appearance in the mass. Lucretia, beautiful in every respect, must have looked like a vision in a picture, an angel from the sun. Everybody who sees it, cries out, and pronounces it the real thing. I must confess, after all, I prefer the auburn, as we construe it. It forms, I think, a finer shade for the skin; a richer warmth; a darker lustre. But Lucretia's hair must have been still divine. Wat Sylvan,§ a man of genius whom I became acquainted with over it, as other acquaintances commence over a bottle, was inspired on the occasion with the following verses:—

"Borgia, thou once wert almost too august,
And high for adoration;—now thou'rt dust!
All that remains of thee these plaits infold—
Calm hair, meand'ring with pellucid gold!"

The sentiment implied in the last line will be echoed by every bosom that has worn a lock of hair next it, or

* Λμφω τῶν πτην πυρροτριχῶν, ἀμφω ἀναβλ.

† Τα μὲν ἐνδοθὺν, μελαίνωνται,
Τὰ δ' εἰς αἴθρον, ὀκτανόματα.

‡ Mr Roscoe must be excepted, who has come into the field to run a tilt for her. I wish his lance may turn out to be the Golden Lance of the poet, and overthrow all his opponents. The greatest scandal in the world, is the readiness of the world to believe scandal.

§ Mr Lander.

longed to do so. Hair is at once the most delicate and lasting of our materials; and survives us, like love. It is so light, so gentle, so escaping from the idea of death, that with a lock of hair belonging to a child or a friend, we may almost look up to heaven, and compare notes with the angelic nature; may almost say, "I have a piece of thee here, not unworthy of thy being now."

FOREHEAD. There are fashions in beauty as well as dress. In some parts of Africa, no lady can be charming under twenty stone.

* King Chihu put nine queens to death;
Convict on Statute, Ivory Teeth."

In Shakspeare's time, it was the fashion to have high foreheads, probably out of compliment to Queen Elizabeth. They were thought to be equally beautiful and indicative of wisdom: and if the portraits of the great men of that day are to be trusted, wisdom and high foreheads were certainly often found together. Of late years, physiognomists have declared for the wisdom of strait and compact foreheads, rather than high ones. I must own I have seen very silly persons with both. It must be allowed, at the same time, that a very retreating forehead is apt to be an accompaniment of wit. With regard to high ones, they are often confounded with foreheads merely bald; and baldness, whether natural or otherwise, is never handsome; though in men it sometimes takes a character of simplicity and firmness. According to the Greeks, who are reckoned to have been the greatest judges of beauty, the high forehead never bore the palm. A certain conciseness carried it. "A forehead," says Junius, in his Treatise on Ancient Art, "should be smooth and even, white, delicate, short, and of an open and cheerful character." The Latin is briefer. Ariosto has expressed it in two words, perhaps in one.

"Di terzo avorio era la fonte lieta."

"Terse ivory was her forehead glad."

A large bare forehead gives a woman a masculine and defying look. The word effrontery comes from it. The hair should be brought over such a forehead, as vines are trailed over a naked wall.

And now in respect to "Eyes,"—but as upon this subject I may be too copious for the space allotted me at present, I must begin another paper with my criticism upon them.

* "Præter debet esse plana, candida, tenuis, brevis, pura."—Junius De Pictura Veterum, Lib. iii, cap. 9. The whole chapter is very curious and abundant on the subject of ancient beauty. Yet it might be rendered a good deal more so. A treatise on Hair alone might be collected out of Ovid.

CAUTION TO SELF-LOVE.

Let us ask ourselves in the closet, whether, after we have humbled ourselves before God in our prayers, we never rise beyond the due standard in the pulpit; whether our zeal for the truth be never over-heated by internal fires less holy; whether we never grow stiffly or sternly pertinacious, at the very time when we are reproving the obstinacy of others; and whether we have not frequently so acted, as if we believed that opposition were to be relaxed and borne away by self-sufficiency and intolerance. Believe me, the wisest of us have our catechism to learn; and these, my dear friends, are not the only questions contained in it. No Christian can hate; no Christian can malign; nevertheless, do we not often both hate and malign those unhappy men who are insensible to God's mercies? And I fear this unchristian spirit dwells darkly, with all its venom, in the marble of our hearts, not because our brother is insensible to these mercies, but because he is insensible to our faculty of persuasion, turning a deaf ear unto our claims upon his obedience, or a blind or sleepy eye upon the fountain of light, whereof we deem ourselves the sacred reservoirs.—Lander's Examination of William Shakspeare.

TO HIS CHILDREN,

DURING ABSENCE.

(From 'Gebir,' 'Count Julian' and other poems, by Walter Savage Landor, Esq.)

Ye little household gods, that make
My heart leap lighter with your play,
And never let it sink or ache,
Unless you are too far away;

Eight years have flown, and never yet
One day has risen up between
The kisses of my earlier pet,
And now the hours he was not seen.

How can I call to you from Rome?
Will Mamma teach what Babbo said?
Have ye not heard him talk at home
About the city of the dead?

Marcellous takes will Babbo tell
If you don't chafe his throat too tight,—
Tales which you, Arnold, will love well,
Tho' Julia's cheek turns pale with fright.

How swimming o'er the Tiber Clélia
Headed the rescued virgin train;
And, loftier virtue! how Cornelia
Lived when her two brave sons were slain.

This is my birth-day: may ye waltz
Till mamma cracks her best guitar!
Yours are true pleasures; those are false
We wise ones follow from afar.

What shall I bring you? would you like
Urn, image, glass—red, yellow, blue,
Stricken by Time—who soon must strike
As deep the heart that beats for you.

* Mamma (as in English) but with the accent on the first syllable, is the Italian word of endearment for "Mother." Babbo is "Papa."—Ed.

A LEGEND OF THE BLACK ART.

(From 'Arthur Coningsby,' a new novel, full of thought and elegance.)

IN one of our great English abbeys, long before the reformation, there was a young novice, whose rapid progress in learning, and skill as a musician, made him an especial favourite with the monks, his instructors. It was predicted by them that he would rise to the highest reputation in the church, and perhaps become a Bishop, or even a Cardinal. This praiseworthy youth was particularly delighted with the study of knotty and abstruse questions, and he sometimes proposed difficulties to the fathers, which it gave them no little trouble to answer. In these cases, Father Timothy, to whom he chiefly addressed himself, was accustomed to advise, that Nicholas should cease to think of the subjects which perplexed him, and read his breviary with redoubled diligence. But the young man was so unfortunate as to find great difficulty in turning away his mind from points which he did not understand, and Father Timothy could only lament that his pupil was harassed by the wiles of the Devil.

It happened that on a high festival of the church, Father Timothy preached a sermon to which the mind of his pupil gave the most earnest attention. But his eyes unhappily wandered to one of the windows, in which were painted, as says the historian, the very figures we have just seen (certain mysterious emblems).

The novice could not help meditating during the pauses of the discourse on these remarkable emblems. But he could form no conception of their meaning. He thought of them in the cloisters and in his bed, but still he was completely at a loss. He next applied to his instructor, but the only answer he could gain was a severe rebuke for attempting to be wise above that which is written.

At last he spoke to an old lay brother, who informed him of a tradition which he had heard in his youth, with regard to what is called Abbot Ingulph's window. It was said that the stained glass was made by the hands of the Abbot whose name it bore. He had been much addicted to the occult sciences, and people seldom spoke of him but in a whisper, and with a look of fear. When he was dying, he desired that at his burial the head of his coffin might be laid exactly under the spot to which the bright image of the rose in the window should be thrown by the moonlight, at twelve o'clock, on the night of the full moon next ensuing.

The temporary successor of the deceased Abbot was a man of the most rigid piety, and instead of complying with this request, he directed that the body should be laid in the ante-chapel, beside that of the last buried Superior. The coffin was disposed accordingly. But the morning after the funeral, it was found on the spot which had been so singularly pointed out, and the grave designed for it had been filled up. It was again committed to the earth, and again it was found upon the floor of the chapel, in the same place as after the first attempt. The baffled father was resolved to persevere; but at the third burial, at the moment when the coffin was lowered into the dust, he took the precaution of touching it with the consecrated wafer. Everyone observed the ceremony, trembling and in silence, and the assemblage heard a groan, which sounded as if it had been called forth from the corpse by the immediate agency of the blessed host. The coffin was hastily drawn up again, and the lid forced open, when it was found to contain nothing but a handful of ashes, and a small gold plate, marked with the device of a rose and star. The lay-brother also informed Nicholas, that various manuscripts of Abbot Ingulph were said still to exist in the library.

This account wrought, says the legend, in the brain of Nicholas, like the potent ingredients of an adept's crucible.

He spent day after day in the library, and found at last an ancient chest, the corners of which were secured by brazen clasps, exhibiting respectively the figures of the toad, the crow, the dragon, and the panther. It was not locked, but sealed, and the wax bore the impression of a man standing on a snake. The young man did not hesitate to break it open, and examined the writings which it contained. They were all works of Abbot Ingulph, except one small thin volume, in which the characters seem to have been originally so strange, and were now so defaced by time, that Nicholas could not decipher a single syllable. Acting, however, on a hint given in a commentary of the Abbot's, he secured this mysterious book, and watched it daily with a longing and almost sickening anxiety, till the night of the full moon. He then stole the keys of the church, and at midnight held the open volume in the crimson radiance which streamed through the rose. The writing instantly became legible; and Nicholas learned the secret for which he had hungered.

For the rest of the night he had in his cell, as the companion of his studies, a youth, dark-eyed, pale, slow of speech, but master of all the sciences in the world, and of all the languages ever spoken by the bricklayers of Babel, as well as of that rarer tongue, the origin of them all, which is now understood only by the chiefs of the Freemasons.

The next morning Nicholas presented his new friend to the fathers, and proposed that he should become an Acolyte. Balthazar, for so he chose to be called, was examined by Father Timothy as to his proficiency in learning, and in the course of his answers, quoted, as one of Christ's replies to the Devil during his temptation, a verse not recorded by St Luke. The monk referred to the passage, and Balthazar quietly remarked, that the Evangelist's account of that occurrence was very inaccurate. This heretical reply decided the holy father to refuse the candidate admittance.

He immediately quitted the monastery. That evening at vespers Nicholas did not present himself; he could not be found in his cell, nor in the neighbourhood of the abbey. About a year after his disappearance, two young Englishmen attracted great attention as disputants in the schools at Paris, and journeyed thence to the monastery of St Rufus, in Provence, where they were soon admitted to full orders. For some years they travelled from country to country, and became celebrated for their learning and talents. They were both of them powerful in discourse on all subjects, but it was observed that

Nicholas disliked to debate questions on demonology, which his companion particularly delighted and excelled in, and of which he spoke in a tone of the utmost familiarity.

Their last place of residence was Rome, and here Nicholas speedily rose to high dignities, while his friend refused to accept any other office than that of his secretary. In this humble situation Balthazar was still sufficiently conspicuous; a thousand dark intrigues for the more extravagant objects were seen to succeed, nobody could tell how, but it was said they had been directed by Balthazar. Innumerable scandals among the enemies of the Cardinal of Alba, for such was now the rank of Nicholas, were detected, while he himself maintained a splendid reputation; and still men whispered and pointed at Balthazar, whenever, that is, they were secure of not being observed by him.

At length the supreme See was vacant. And now discoveries multiplied every hour, so as to implicate the characters of all the leading Cardinals. The mistress of one of them became devout, and confessed her own and her lover's immorality; and she was said to be a penitent of Balthazar's. A heretic was burned;—when at the stake he cried aloud that one of the Monsignori had first seduced him from the true faith; and it was reported that Balthazar, on the eve of the execution, had gained admittance to the cell of the criminal. A third dignitary of great influence in the college suddenly deserted his former faction; and deprived them of several votes. He was known to have received fifty thousand crowns; and Balthazar was rumoured to have been seen carrying weighty bags under his gown in the direction of the prelate's palace. And, lastly, amid the utmost excitement of the election, the French Ambassador died, and left the interests of his party in irretrievable confusion. His physician had purchased drugs at a shop, the owner of which was said to have been in the service of Balthazar.

The Cardinal of Alba became Pope, under the name of Adrian IV. His secretary was his chief councillor. The defeat and death of Arnold of Brescia were brought about by his wisdom; and it was he who drew up the bull, which authorized Henry II to conquer Ireland. But those who were nearest the Pontiff, perceived that he feared Balthazar as much as trusted him. A window, exhibiting among other emblems the hieroglyphic rose, had been put up in one of the apartments of the Pope. In this room he perceived Frederick King of the Romans, who, though he entered Italy at the head of a large army, had consented, on first meeting the sovereign priest, to hold his stirrup while he mounted on horseback. Important negotiations were carried on in the presence of the Pope and the Monarch, and on one occasion Adrian seemed inclined to concede a point of considerable weight, which Balthazar had before maintained with the most resolute firmness against the councillors of the King. Frederick thought he observed the secretary point slightly to the painting in the window. At all events the Pontiff groaned, turned pale, and trembled; and after a few moments declared his determination to yield nothing.

When Adrian was dying, Balthazar desired that he might speak to his master in private. The patient hesitated, and faltered some words, which could not be understood. But the secretary entered the chamber, and the universal Bishop shuddered under his look, and feebly motioned to the attendants to retire. In half an hour Balthazar re-entered the ante-chamber, and a slight smile might be observed to hover on his lip. He turned, however, gravely to the domestics, physicians, and cardinals, and pointed to the door through which he had just come. They found the Pope dead, with an expression of extreme agony on his lifeless features. A cabinet of steel, inlaid with gold, which stood near the bed, and had before been shut, was now open, and a small parchment volume lay under the hand of the deceased Pontiff.

The book was seized by the eldest Cardinal present, who attempted to discover its contents. But they were completely illegible, save that near the foot of the last page was found inscribed, in bold and youthful characters, the name of 'NICHOLAS;' and lower down, and as if traced by trembling fingers, the regal signature of 'ADRIAN.' The aged Prelate secretly committed the volume to the fire, and was horror-stricken by the groans and sobs which accompanied its destruction, and by the likeness of a demoniac face, which seemed to scowl at him through the cloud of sulphury smoke. Balthazar appeared no more; and it was whispered in Rome, that the body of the Pope was flung into the Tiber; while, to avoid any open scandal, a coffin filled with rubbish was decorated with the blazonry of ecclesiastical empire, and buried beside Eugenius III, in the church of St Peter."

"I fear that even fantastic and idle tales like this," said Agatha, who had joined them five minutes before, "though they cannot be seriously reported by any educated persons, yet have their effect in turning popular opinion against the Catholic church. The most absurd notions of the vulgar, as to the superstitions of the monks, and the vices of prelates, are repeated in these wild legends by romance writers, who probably do not wish their fictions to be believed, whose professed business is exaggeration, but who unconsciously spread abroad many an error, so gross that they would be ashamed of having any trust in it imputed to them."

"Well," replied Isabel, "Arthur's story, though abundantly extravagant, does not seem to me at all likely to do any harm. I am sure, my dear Mademoiselle de Clainville, it never occurred to me that it conveyed an imputation against the Roman Catholic church. I do not like horses less for being amused by the history in the Arabian Nights of the Black Steed, that struck out the Calender's eye with a blow of its tail. The history of Pope Adrian, which we have just heard, is, I think, nothing more than a way of telling us, by marvellous incidents, how wrong it is to seek for any knowledge inconsistent with the observance of moral principles."

LINES

WRITTEN ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE LONDON JOURNAL, APRIL 2 1833.

I.

'Tis morn! how blithe a morn those vapours hide!
They break—and young day looketh out in pride,
And with a freshening vigour in his glance
That warms old pulses, and makes "young ones dance."

The flowers look up like beauty at love's voice,
And feel his fervid kisses, and rejoice.

II.

Now let us forth, nor fear the dewy grass—
The lane we leave, the "one-railed bridge" we pass;

By little darling nooks we pause not now,
Nor rest till we recline upon the brow
Of one dear hill. Fond gazing from its height,
How glad a scene, how various, how bright,
Fills the rapt eye! The undulating flow
Of natural beauty we may trace below.

Woods are about us, glittering streams beneath;
And peasant girls, fresh as the air they breathe,
Are seen at intervals in thought to stand,
Or slowly wind with milking-pail in hand.
See, whilst I speak, down in that sloping vale,
A girl delaying there by the white rail,
Who would be thought observant of the brook,
But sees not that on which she seems to look.
Now she is joined—brief meeting long deferred—
'Tis but an instant—has he said one word?
He has,—and in her inmost heart 'twas heard.

III.

Mark, on the right—meet scene for morning eyes—
Those tree-crowned hills that so augustly rise;
See, on the left, a sister hill disclose
The ancient mansion, in serene repose,
Looking o'er ample meadows whereon cows
Feed quietly, or ruminate at ease;
Whose sheep, their bleating young beside them,
browse;
Where, on sweet journeys bound, we hear the bees,
And where rooks chatter in the many-peopled trees.

IV.

Here,—'tis perhaps a "trivial fond record,"
But it stands out from memory's treasured board—
When, sauntering near this spot one clear March morn,
Unheard the cry of hound—the blast of horn—
Gathering wild flowers that did the banks adorn;
Suddenly tow'rs us came the hunted deer,
A patient anguish in his speaking eyes;
He paused, as who should say, those I meet here
Have not the look or garb of enemies:
Then vaulted o'er the hedge, and soon from us
Sunk 'midst the "bosomy hills." Fast, furious,
The brave pursuers came.

V.

'Tis holy ground!
Harefield! a glorious spell thy fields have found.
Here, in immortal dreams of Arcady,
The youthful muse of Milton wandered free;
And still the genius of the wood, 'neath roof—
"Neath shady roof of branching elm star-proof, Touches the warbled string." The lofty lay,
Shames into silence mine, as well it may.

VI.

Sure May and June have come a visiting,
And to young April their ripe glories bring;
She, like a blushing bride, with virgin grace
Receives her matron friends, and gives them place.
With how matured a richness this day's sun
Clothes the minutest thing its rays fall on!
With what a buoyant spirit upward springs
Th' untiring lark, and whilst he soareth, sings, Hymning his heav'nward voyaging, yet not Denying songs to his more lowly lot;
True he has "sung at heaven's gate," but he Brings to his earthly nest sweet minstrelsy;
Like kindly hearts that take, where'er they roam,
A blessing, but reserve the holiest for home.

VII.

'Tis but one year—a strange eventful year—
Since I strolled rhyming, hoping, loving, here;
Hailing the page so prized—the first young leaf
Of what is now become a goodly tree,
Whose fruit enlargeth hope, enlighteneth grief,
Gladdeneth the deep heart of humanity,
And shows what may be wrought for struggling men,
When a true spirit wields the world-compelling pen.

VIII.

'Tis but one year—a strangely-varied year,
Since I roamed out with salient fancies here;
Music on either side, and overhead
Almost as bright a sun. One year has fled,
And with it—but what boots the retrospection?
Alas! there is no lingerer like affection.

IX.

* Yet what is changed? Are not the fields as green?
The streams as bright in their perpetual flow?
As fair and frequent is the primrose seen,
And daffodil, that maketh flaunting show
Where lie the crowding odorous violets low.
All are as they were then. The plover's shrill
And querulous cry—the stock-dove's murmur deep—
The rook's grave voice, of home discoursing still;
The blackbird startled from her seeming sleep,
And dipping by the hedge with snatch of song;
The thrush and bullfinch, that still pour along
Their full heart-stream of thrilling melody.

And now, loved Harefield! from thy hill I see,
Shorn of its veil of mist, the distant wood,
Whence gentle meadows slope to the canal.
There winds in quiet joy that silver flood,
So loved for memories which I oft recall
Of those who on its banks have roamed with me,
There are the scattered cots, the towering mill,
That seems, when working hardest, idle still;
There are the streams which give it life and light,
For ever busy, and for ever bright,
And busiest when all else is peace and night.

XI.

Then why with death or change should my thoughts be?

Dull egotist! there is nor death nor change
To hearts that not from love and nature range!
We feel that truth and beauty are immortal;
Why mourn the loved who pass death's shadowy portal,

And quit the prison of this life, to be
We trust—the happy—and we know—the free?

XII.

Back to our quiet lane—our orchard bower;
Let's change the thoughtful for the festal hour.
Pile the proud treasures high! 'midst fruits and flowers,

And wine and song—what banquet equals ours?
Here are frank smiles, fair forms, red lips, bright eyes,

Here are the loving, and therefore the wise.
What though we miss some two or three to-day,
Whose looks have thrown a sunshine in our way,
And would have warmed us now with genial ray?
Their absence will not cloud our mirth; we know
Their hearts and ours with the same feelings glow,
And they are with us now, though far away.

XIII.

Now to our pleasant task! the health of Him
Whose genius aids the weak—illumes the dim—Assists the inquiring—to the struggling sends Counsel that animates him and befriends;
Of Him who, armed a holy fight to win,
Shows "zeal whose circling charities begin
With the few loved ones heav'n has placed it near,
Nor cease till all mankind are in its sphere."

Health to the JOURNAL! strength and length of days!

And to the NAME that crowns it, love, and praise!

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXVIL.—REVENGE AND ASSASSINATION IN A CHURCH.
—THE NEW NOVEL, 'HECTOR FIERAMOSCA.'

THIS appalling and most dramatic story is taken from a deeply interesting work of fiction just published, 'Hector Fieramosca;' but as we recollect reading it in some veritable history, (perhaps Roscoe's 'Life of Lorenzo de Medici'), and as it is told in a way so brief as not to convert the narrative of a fact into a narrative merely founded on fact, we give it as we find it set down. At the close of it we almost feel the knife at our own hearts, hugged silently into the bosom of that sacrilegious and venomous impostor. He was very ill-used; but even the baseness of the younger brother fades into nothing before this everlasting spirit of revenge. A closer and quieter piece of intensity is perhaps not to be met with. Chaucer has a line that would make an excellent motto for it—

"The smiler, with the knife under the cloak."

DON MICHAEL had a youthful and lovely wife; and a younger brother, a bachelor, lived in his house. The beauty of his sister-in-law had such an effect on this youth, that, abandoning all regard to morality or the consequences, he used every means to seduce her, and succeeded. But he did not succeed so well as to prevent the plot being discovered by a servant-maid, who informed the husband. The latter having placed himself in ambush, surprised them. Drawing his poniard he attempted to murder them both at the same time; but it chanced that they escaped out of his hands with some slight wounds. So exasperated was he at the wrong received, that he endeavoured to trace his brother, (who, with the lady, fled to some place of security,) and determined to kill him at all costs. But the brother having heard of the deadly oath of the injured husband, managed to defend himself in different ways, so as to set at nought all the other's designs; and the offended man, intirely despairing of being able to inflict his vengeance, was, by the excess of passion, carried almost to the grave.

In the meantime the jubilee of the year 1500 occurred; and in the town where Don Michael resided, there were abundance of processions, and penitences, and public preachings, by means of which several party disputes were made up, and families and individuals pacified; and amongst the rest Don Michael also seemed resolved to lay aside all rancorous feelings, and devote himself to holy things. But the brother would not suffer himself to be persuaded to an interview, spite of the numerous kindly and sacred protestations that came from the other side. At the end of a holy year, employed by Don Michael in continual penances and religious pursuits, he determined to abandon the world intirely; and going to a monastery of Scalzi,* entered into his noviciate; and that being completed, pronounced the solemn vows. Sent by his superiors into various parts of Spain, and even as far as Rome, in order to study theology, he became very learned; and on his return to his country with the reputation of being a particularly holy man, the rank of priesthood was conferred on him. He went through the first mass with the usual pomp, amidst a crowd of relations and friends, and other people. After its conclusion, returning into the sacristy, he seated himself (such is the custom), with his priest's cope still on his back, upon a stool which his friends and relations approached one after another, in order to kiss his hand, and give him the congratulatory embraces. He had been repeatedly heard to deplore the hatred he had so many years nourished against his brother, and frequently to say that the only desire in the world which he now had, was not only to obtain oblivion and forgiveness, for the past, but likewise, as a servant of God, to be the first and the humblest in offering it. Upon this solemn occasion, moved by the entreaties of all his relations, the brother at last resolved to go with the others. As he advanced, he began a humble address, whilst the priest, extending his arms, pressed him to his bosom; but instead of the brother again raising his head, his knees were seen to fall, and he sunk on the ground with a dreadful groan; and the priest brandishing a small dagger which in that embrace he had plunged into his brother's heart, kissed the still reeking blade, spurned the corpse with his foot, and then exclaimed, "I have caught thee at last!" The wretch escaped; and such was the confusion and amazement of the bystanders, that no efforts were made to detain him. For this crime he was banished under pain of death, if found. He fled from country to country, until he took refuge in Rome, where he was protected by the Duke of Valentinois. The latter took but little trouble to find out his virtues, but soon found him of use in the most important affairs; and the villanous priest became the life of all his undertakings.

The new novel from which this story is taken is translated from the Italian of the Marquis d'Azeglio, the son-in-law of the author of the 'Betrothed' (I Promessi Sposi), and his successor in the larger species of Italian novel-writing. The novel itself, which is written with great care, and a remarkable condensation of incident, (it is only in one volume,) is founded on a most interesting fact in the history of Italy, the combat of thirteen Italians against thirteen French, in vindication of the national repute for courage, which one of the latter had insulted; and throughout it we are made conversant with a variety of real historical personages, particularly the portentous Caesar Borgia, who in the hard-heartedness of his prodigious egotism, took upon himself to play the part of a dispassionate Providence, and became accordingly a monster of passion and crime. But what was not to be expected of one, who was the son of a man without conscience, brought up in the midst of the worst corruptions of the church, and himself a Pope, able to absolve his offspring from the responsibility of their common villainies? Such, at least, are the characters of these two men—in history, perhaps exaggerated, though their enormities seem too well established. Ariosto, however, who knew the Pope's daughter, the famous Lucretia Borgia, describes her, in contradiction to all other report, as a paragon of goodness as well as beauty; and for the honour and comfort of human nature (which however is not to be shaken by exceptions) we think as much credit as possible ought to be given to the testimony of a man, who was both charitable and sincere. Besides, Lucretia may have been misled, when young, by the example and authority of a father so situated; and yet, by some extreme fineness of nature (believed in by the poet, and existing in himself as well as others) have subsequently recovered herself, and become what he describes.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

THOMSON.

(From the Edition of his Works by Pickering.)

Thomson's character was in every respect consistent with what his writings lead us to expect. He was high-minded, amiable, generous, and humane. Equable in his temper, and affable in his deportment, he was rarely ruffled but by the knowledge of some act of cruelty or injustice; and as he magnanimously forgave the petty assaults which envy or malignity levelled at him, and stood aloof from the poetical warfare which raged with great heat during some part of his career, he was soon, as if by common consent, respected by all the belligerents. His society was select and distinguished. Pope, Hill, Dr Armstrong, the Bishop of Derry, Mr (afterwards Sir) Andrew Mitchell, Mendez, Dr De la Cour, Mallet, Hammond, (whom he eulogizes in 'The Seasons,') Quin, and, above all, Mr Lyttleton, were his most intimate friends. With Pope he lived on terms of great friendship; and, according to Dr Johnson, he displayed his regard in a poetical epistle addressed to Thomson, whilst he was in Italy in 1731, but of which Pope "abated the value by transplanting some of the lines into his epistle to Arbuthnot." Mr Robertson stated in reply to Mr Park's question,* whether Pope did not often visit Thomson, "Yes, frequently. Pope has sometimes said, 'Thomson, I'll walk to the end of your garden; and then set off to the bottom of Kew Foot lane, and back.' Pope courted Thomson, and Thomson was always admitted to Pope, whether he had company or not."

Next to poetry he was fond of civil and natural history, voyages and travels, and in his leisure hours he found amusement in gardening. Of the fine arts, music was his chief delight; but he was an admirer of painting and sculpture, and formed a valuable collection of prints and drawings from the antique.

The besetting sin of Thomson's character was indolence, and of this he was himself fully aware, as he alludes to the failing in himself and some of his friends, in the 'Castle of Indolence.' He seldom rose before noon, and his time for composition was generally about midnight. His manners are sometimes represented as having been coarse; but his zealous defender, Lord Buchan, asserts, on the contrary, that Lord Chatham, Lord Temple, Lord Lyttleton, Sir Andrew Mitchell, Dr Armstrong, and Dr Murdock, agreed in declaring that he was "a gentleman at all points." His intimate friend, Mr Robertson, told Mr Park, that "Thomson was neither a petit maitre nor a boor; he had simplicity without rudeness, and a cultivated manner without being courtly;" and this may, perhaps, be considered the most accurate description of his deportment.

Much light is often thrown on a man's character by authenticated anecdotes. Of Thomson, however; very few are remembered, and the following are introduced because his previous biographers have thought them worthy of notice, rather than from any particular claims to which they possess to attention.

* In October 1791, Thomas Park, Esq., the poet, called on Mr Robertson, who was surgeon to the Royal Household at Kew, the intimate friend of Thomson, with a view of gaining information about him. He committed to paper all he gleaned, and it has since been printed.

It is said that he was so careless about money, that once, when paying a brewer, he gave him two bank notes rolled together instead of one, and, when told of his mistake, he appeared perfectly indifferent, saying, "he had enough to go on without it." On one occasion he was robbed of his watch, between London and Richmond, and when Mr Robertson expressed regret for his loss, he replied, "Pshaw, I am glad they took it from me, it was never good for anything." Having invited some friends to dinner, one of them informed him that there was a general stipulation there should be no hard drinking; Thomson acquiesced, only requiring that each man should drink his bottle. The terms were accepted unconditionally, and, when the cloth was removed, a three-quart bottle was set before each of his guests.

In person, Thomson was rather stout and above the middle size; his countenance was not remarkable for expression, though, in his youth, he was considered handsome, but in conversation his face became animated and his eye fiery and intellectual. Silent in mixed company, his wit and vivacity seemed reserved for his friends, and in their society he was communicative, playful, and entertaining. Few men possessed in a greater degree, the art of creating firm and affectionate friendships. Those with whom he became acquainted at the commencement of his career, loved him till its close, and the individuals who had given to his life its sweetest enjoyments, watched over his death-bed and became the guardians of his fame, by superintending the only monuments of which genius ought to be ambitious, a complete edition of his works, and a tablet in Westminster Abbey.

THE THAMES AT MIDNIGHT.

How beautiful and placid does "Father Thames" appear at night. He has three different appearances on different kinds of nights: on a very dark one all we can see is, that it is a river, by the reflection of the lights on the bridges, and at intervals on its banks; on a comparatively light night we can see rows of barges lying nearly mid-stream, and now and then perceive one stealing up or down the river, according as the tide is; the reflection of the lights is very plain on such a night, shooting perpendicularly into the water; those on shore "show a light" on a small circle round them, and throw into deeper shade and sombreness the dark masses of buildings, timber, and vessels, which skirt the shore at a greater distance; but when seen—

"By thy sweet silver light, bonny moon," it has the most pleasing appearance; the surface of the muddy mass of water, when silvered by the beams of this luminary, looks indeed, far different than it does when you peer into it, whilst floating on its surface at noonday; at which time you are very apt to meet with the decaying carcass of a dog, cat, or other animal, or some corrupting vegetable matter. "On such a night as this" a great number of barges proceed with the tide, and it is very pleasant to observe them stealing along like shadows on the silvered water, and to hear the splash of the oars as they descend, and form sparkling circles, in the brilliant water: the antiquated, rotten-looking buildings which line the shore, and the various vessels which lie in the river or on its banks, surrounded by timber rafts, are subjects worthy of observation on such a night. Here the moon throws its beams on a goodly new-built mansion; there, on a shed or outhouse which seems as if ready to fall; here the timber is covered with a silver coat, there hid by the shadow of a building; here a dark long shadow is thrown upon the water by a row of barges; there a solitary one, with a meet and solemn "farled," is reflected in a very perfect manner on the watery mirror. Numberless are the pleasing objects; and there is music for them too. When the observer is looking from a bridge, he will hear the ripple of the water as it passes through the arches—a delightful sound!

On a dark night, when the black waters can just be perceived rolling onwards, but no vessel carried along its broad stream, quite deserted by human beings (at least none, or few, are engaged in active duty, though there are many sleeping on its tranquil waters), reflections must force themselves on the mind, of the difference of its appearance at midnight and noon-day. This mighty river, now so still, so deserted, will, ere twelve hours pass away, be teeming with activity—vessels on its surface carrying to and fro various productions—steam-vessels carrying their hundreds to take a "mouthful of fresh air"—boats conveying persons "on business," and on pleasure—and, indeed, crafts of all shapes and dimensions; even at the present moment, every luxury, scarcity, and necessity, from the nearest and farthest points of the earth, are reposing on its bosom, which, on the rising of the morrow's sun, will be disgorged from the vessels which contain them, and will quickly be sucked up and distributed by the thousand channels of trade and commerce with which London abounds.

On a moonlight night we receive ocular demonstration of the immense trade in, and consumption of, one article in the metropolis—coal; long strings of vessels carrying this useful substance proceeding with the tide, and enlivening the scene.

Altogether, I think we may set down the Thames at midnight as a very pleasing sight; all the noise and bustle of the day is banished, and the mighty Thames is as quiet as a purling brook.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM MAZLITT.

NO. XX.—KING LEAR.

We wish that we could pass this play over, and say nothing about it. All that we can say must fall far short of the subject; or even of what we ourselves conceive of it. To attempt to give a description of the play itself or of its effect upon the mind, is mere impertinence: yet we must say something.—It is then the best of all Shakspeare's plays, for it is the one in which he was the most in earnest. He was here fairly caught in the web of his own imagination. The passion which he has taken as his subject is that which strikes its root deepest into the human heart; of which the bond is the hardest to be unloosed; and the cancelling and tearing to pieces of which gives the greatest revulsion to the frame. This depth of nature, this force of passion, this tug and war of the elements of our being, this firm faith in fatal plety, and the giddy anarchy and whirling tumult of the thoughts at finding this prop failing is, the contrast between the fixed, immovable basis of natural affection, and the rapid, irregular starts of imagination, suddenly wrenched from all its accustomed holds and resting-places in the soul, this is what Shakspeare has given, and what nobody else but he could give. So we believe.—The mind of Lear, staggering between the weight of attachment and the hurried movements of passion, is like a tall ship driven about by the winds, buffeted by the furious waves, but that still rides above the storm, having its anchor fixed in the bottom of the sea; or it is like the sharp rock circled by the eddying whirlpool that foams and beats against it, or like the solid promontory pushed from its basis by the force of an earthquake.

The character of Lear itself is very finely conceived for the purpose. It is the only ground on which such a story could be built with the greatest truth and effect. It is his rash haste, his violent impetuosity, his blindness to everything but the dictates of his passions or affections, that produces all his misfortunes, that aggravates his impatience of them, that enforces our pity for him. The part which Cordelia bears in the scene is extremely beautiful: the story is almost told in the first words she utters. We see at once the precipice on which the poor old king stands from his own extravagant and credulous importunity, the indiscreet simplicity of her love (which, to be sure, has a little of her father's obstinacy in it), and the hollowness of her sister's pretensions. Almost the first burst of that noble tide of passion, which runs through the play, is in the remonstrance of Kent to his royal master on the injustice of his sentence against his youngest daughter—"Be Kent unmannerly, when Lear is mad!" This manly plainness which draws down on him the displeasure of the unadvised king is worthy of the fidelity with which he adheres to his fallen fortunes. The true character of the two oldest daughters, Regan and Gonerill (they are so thoroughly hateful that we do not even like to repeat their names) breaks out in their answer to Cordelia, who desires them to treat their father well—"Prescribe not us our duties"—their hatred of advice being in proportion to their determination to do wrong, and to their hypocritical pretensions to do right. Their deliberate hypocrisy adds the last finishing to the odiousness of their characters. It is the absence of this detestable quality that is the only relief in the character of Edmund the Bastard, and that at times reconciles us to him. We are not tempted to exaggerate the guilt of his conduct, when he himself gives it up as a bad business, and writes himself down "plain villain." Nothing more can be said about it. His religious honesty in this respect is admirable. One speech of his is worth a million. His father, Gloucester, whom he has just deluded with a forged story of his brother Edgar's designs against his life, accounts for his unnatural behaviour and the strange depravity of the times from the late eclipses in the sun and moon. Edmund, who is in the secret, says when he is gone—"This is the excellent foppery of the world, that when we are sick in fortune (often the surfeits of our own behaviour) we make guilty of our disasters the sun, the moon, and stars: as if we were villains on necessity; fools by heavenly compulsion; knaves, thieves, and treacherous by spherical predominance; drunkards, liars, and adulterers by an enforced obedience of planetary influence; and all that we are evil in, by a divine thrusting on: An admirable evasion of whoremaster man, to lay his goatish disposition on the charge of a star! My father compounded with my mother under the Dragon's tail, and my nativity was under Ursa Major: so that it follows, I am rough and lecherous. I should have been what I am, had the maidenliest star in the firmament twinkled on my bastardising."—The whole character, its careless, light-hearted villainy, contrasted with the sullen, rancorous malignity of Regan and Gonerill, its connexion with the conduct of the under-plot, in which Gloucester's persecution of one of his sons and the ingratitude of another, form a counterpart to the mistakes and misfortunes of Lear,—his double amour with the two sisters, and the share which he has in bringing about the fatal catastrophe, are all managed with an uncommon degree of skill and power.

It has been said, and we think justly, that the third act of 'Othello' and the three first acts of 'Lear,' are Shakspeare's great master-pieces in the logic of passion: that they contain the highest examples not only of the force of individual passion, but of its dramatic vicissitudes and striking effects arising from the different circumstances and characters of the persons speaking. We see the ebb and flow of the feeling, its pauses and feverish starts, its impatience of opposition, its accumulating force when it has time to recollect itself, the manner in which it avails itself of every passing word or gesture, its haste to repel insinuation, the alternate contraction and dilatation of the soul, and all "the dazzling fence of controversy" in this mortal combat with poisoned weapons, aimed at the heart, where each wound is fatal. We have seen in 'Othello,' how the unsuspecting frankness and impetuous passions of the Moor are played upon and exasperated by the artful dexterity of Iago. In the present play, that which aggravates the sense of sympathy in the reader, and of uncontrollable anguish in the swollen heart of Lear, is the petrifying indifference, the cold, calculating, obdurate selfishness of his daughters. His keen passions seem whetted on their stony hearts. The contrast would be too painful, the shock too great, but for the intervention of the Fool, whose well-timed levity comes in to break the continuity of feeling when it can no longer be borne, and to bring late play again the fibres of the heart just as they are growing rigid from over-strained excitement. The imagination is glad to take refuge in the half-comic, half-serious comments of the Fool, just as the mind under the extreme anguish of a surgical operation vents itself in sallies of wit. The character was also a grotesque comment of the barbarous times, in which alone the tragic ground-work of the story could be laid. In another point of view it is indispensable, inasmuch as while it is a diversion to the too great intensity of our disgust, it carries the pathos to the highest pitch of which it is capable, by showing the pitiable weakness of the old king's conduct and its irretrievable consequences in the most familiar point of view. Lear may well "beat at the gate which let his folly in," after, as the Fool says, "he has made his daughters his mothers." The character is dropped in the third act to make room for the entrance of Edgar as Mad Tom, which well accords with the increasing bustle and wildness of the incidents; and nothing can be more complete than the distinction between Lear's real and Edgar's assumed madness, while the resemblance in the cause of their distresses, from the severing of the nearest ties of natural affection, keeps up a unity of interest. Shakspeare's mastery over his subject, if it was not art, was owing to a knowledge of the connecting links of the passions, and their effect upon the mind, still more wonderful than any systematic adherence to rules, and that anticipated and outdid all the efforts of the most refined art, not inspired and rendered instinctive by genius.

To be continued next week.

A COUNTRY CLUB.

(From a knowing and sprightly novel, just published, called 'The Exile of Erin, or the Adventures of a Bashful Irishman'.)

Tux Red Lion, where the club to which I have just alluded were in the habit of assembling, was one of those seug, old fashioned inns, now so rarely to be met with, except in the east of England. It had a deep, wide brick porch, from whose roof hung a magpie in a wicker cage. This porch opened into a tolerably sized hall, wherein stood an oblong oaken table, grievously notched, albeit hooped with iron and a few high backed arm-chairs of the same material. Opposite the window was the fire-place, within whose ample range four men might sit with ease; and on the walls, hung on one side, a book-shelf, containing a few odd volumes of Swedenborg's works; and on the other, a glass case, in which was a salmon reclining full length on some bits of artificial grass.

Among these who were oftenest to be met with in this cozy, outlandish hall, was, first and foremost, the Auctioneer, a person, who in an isolated Welsh district, usually enjoys great consideration. He was a duck-legged, pompous little being, fond of making allusions to a professional visit which he paid to London in the year 1814, when he had the rare luck to see the Allied Sovereigns, and squeeze the horny fist of Blucher. This was the one leading incident in his life, from which he always dated.

Next came a Half-pay Officer, a grim-looking dog, snappish—disputatious—egotistical—with a dried liver, and cheeks sallow and fawsted, which went in like the two sides of a fiddle, and spread out again at the chin and forehead. This warrior—or the "Captain," as he was commonly styled—held it as the chief article of his creed that, whatever is, is wrong, and was never so happy as when setting people by the ears together. His favourite hobby was India, about which, like General Harbottle, he was fond of telling marvellous stories. In person he was remarkably prim; wore a blue frock coat, a little white at the edges in front, and buttoned close up to the throat; stiff black stock; and boots pieced, but polished—for he prided himself on a small foot—with singular attention to effect. On warm, sunny days he might be seen seated on the parapet of the Towy bridge, rocking his legs listlessly to and fro, humming a fragment of some old mess tune, or taking brisk turns up and down the bridge, and jerking out an impudent "hem!" whenever a petticoat approached him. When heated with argument, he had a trick of giving sharp, irritable tugs at his shirt collar.

Third in station was the Attorney, who exacted respect by virtue of his profession, and who was withal so cautious of, what he called, committing himself before Court, that in alluding to any particular individual, he never mentioned more than his or her initials. This fellow, like his prototype Rondibilis, had the keen scent of a stag-hound for a lawsuit, whence it came to pass that he was more revered than loved by his neighbours, many of whom he had contrived to render singularly poetical about the pockets.

The fourth was my landlord, the Apothecary, a good-natured, silly creature, blessed with a widowed sister, who superintended his establishment, and of whom I shall presently have occasion to speak. His chief occupation consisted in sauntering about the neighbourhood, with his hands in his breeches pockets, and talking to anyone who would talk with him. He had projecting eyes, like a lobster, with a vague, unmeaning stare, and usually kept his mouth ajar—I supposed from a habit he had acquired of swallowing every extraordinary story he heard or read.

FANCY PORTRAIT OF

CHRISTINA, QUEEN OF SWEDEN.

(From Miss Landon's 'Francesca Carrara'.)

Her meditation was interrupted by an unusual bustle in the ante-chamber, when, before the pages could announce her, the Queen of Sweden walked, or rather ran, into the room. Advancing straight to the Queen, she exclaimed—"A thousand congratulations,—I have just heard of the taking of Valence, and could not rest till I had rejoiced with you on the success of your arms."

Victory is an agreeable subject, and the visitor and her compliments were equally well received.

"You may give me credit for sincerity," continued she, "as there is some selfishness in it. It hurts one's vanity to be mistaken, and you know I prophesied the success of the fleur-de-lis."

"Valence," observed M. de Nogent, one of the party at the card-table, "was besieged a hundred years since by the French army, but unsuccessfully; the fort has never before been taken, and—"

"And you should have been there," interrupted Christina, abruptly; "with your long stories of a hundred years since: I would rather hear them a hundred years hence." Then turning, with a singular change of countenance, from harshness to extreme sweetness, to Madame de Mercœur,— "I give you joy that your husband should be the first conqueror of this redoubtable Valence."

"I deserve," replied the Duchess, "some compensation for the anxiety I have endured."

"Anxiety! nonsense!" exclaimed the Swede, "a man is never in his proper element but when fighting. I am persuaded that war was always meant to be the one great luxury of the human race. War calls out all our good qualities; courage teaches a man to respect himself; and self-respect is at once the beginning and the guarantee of excellence. Besides a campaign teaches patience, generosity, and exertion. So much for the morale; and as to the enjoyment, pardieu! I can imagine nothing beyond the excitement of leading a charge of cavalry."

"Alas, Madam," said the King, smiling, "why cannot I offer you the baton of a Marshal."

"You cannot lament," returned she, "the possibility more than I do. What could God mean by sending me into the world a woman? But let us change this mournful subject—it really affects my feelings."

"I am rejoiced," returned Louis, "that you have recovered from the enui of Messieurs les Jesuites' tragedy."

"I protest," was the reply, "equally against confession and tragedy from them; their rules are too lax in both."

"You do not seem," said the Queen, evidently wishing to change the subject just started, "to have been much pleased with our dramatic representations; but we have not been fortunate; our actors are generally more amusing."

"I suppose so," replied Christina; "as you keep them still. But I see I have interrupted your game; go on, and do not mind me. I should like to have another victory to congratulate you upon."

Crossing the room, she seated herself on one chair, while drawing another towards her, she placed her feet upon it, and thus stretched out negligently began talking, in a low tone, to the King and Mademoiselle Marcein.

Francesca had now an opportunity of observing her more closely, and found that her appearance, if equally singular, was more picturesque than she had heard described. Her dress was odd enough; half masculine, half feminine, but it became her. She wore a sort of jacket of bright red samit, richly braided with gold and silver lace; a fringe of which also hung from her grey petticoat, which was short enough to show her feet and ankles, whose small size was rendered more remarkable by the peculiar shaped boot. A crimson scarf, hung over one shoulder, adroitly hid the defect in her figure; and round her throat was a neckcloth, edged with point lace, and fastened with crimson riband. She was delicately fair, with an aquiline nose, and a mouth, the size of which was forgotten in its white teeth and pleasant smile. She wore a peruke of very fair golden hairs; and herein was shown the lurking spirit of female vanity; her own tresses had been very beautiful; in some whims she had had them shaven off, but the colour of the peruke had been most assiduously assorted to them. Her eyes, large, blue, bright, and restless, were her most remarkable feature, perhaps from constant employ; they seemed perpetually on the watch, and she also had a custom of fixing them with singular intentness on the person to whom she spoke. It was said this habit had somewhat startled the Bishop of Amiens, whom she selected for her confessor; instead of the downcast eyes to which he had been accustomed, the royal penitent, who then knelt at his feet, fixed her clear piercing orbs full in his face, till the good father was all but stared out of countenance. She was small and slight, and the impression she gave as she lounged on her two seats, swinging to and fro her black hat and feathers, was of a fair and pretty boy, clever, and somewhat spoiled by indulgence.

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the Society of British Artists.

(Concluded from last week.)

MR. THAYER has many pictures that please us much; perhaps 'The Cornfield' (244), is the best of them, with Flamboy Castle in the background, melodiously embosomed in trees; nor are the figures unworthy of the rest of the picture. In his particular live,—in what may be termed architectural landscapes and in the representation of physical vastness,—John Martin stands without a rival; why, then, does he, being first in his own territory, wander into that of others, where his rank is at least equivoque? His 'Judith sitting' (268), will do his fame no good; nor his other picture, 'David spareth Saul at Hebron' (195), much better. In no part of the world can flesh be found to match Judith's in the femur; or clouds and rocks to look so like Japan as those in the latter. 'Sunset' (263), Barnett, is very beautiful; but the sun appears to us a failure; it is like a white wafer peering through the colours on the canvas. When Claude, the prince of landscape-painters, paints a sun, he sets it in a mist, and shows it stronger, for being half hidden; he knew he could not paint the naked sun, which his eyes could not look at. But now-a-days a sun is not worth a penny of flake white; any water-colour painter can make you one with blank paper in the twinkling of a bed-post. For our parts, we know that our irreverend eyes stared Mr Barrett's sun full in the face, but were not punished with seeing green and purple spots at every turn; what is better, our eyes stared also at Mr Barrett's sheep and the peaceful valley where they are reposing, and derived infinite satisfaction from so doing; truly, they are very charmingly done. 'Deliberation' (265), an illustration of the old subject of a letter received by a young girl, which we are to suppose contains a proposal, by F. Clater, is a clever picture; the girl is prettily painted; and the old pensioner giving her his fatherly advice, is capital. Creswick's 'Westminster Bridge, from Vauxhall-stairs,' (286) of its class, is the best painted picture in the room. The brilliant colour, the real effect, the liveliness of the scene, make it equally valuable as a piece of painting, and a local portrait. Childe has many pleasant pictures; the 'Entrance to Chiselhurst' is our favourite; it is one of those sweet places one comes upon in the country roads of England, with a horsepond by the way-side overhung by trees, with thirsty cows cooling their knees in it, and looking, meek and motionless, with a faint curiosity at the passenger. For such scenes, Childe has a real feeling, and his paintings are therefore in earnest, and make the spectator so too. 'Good News' (295), by Mrs F. Corbeaux, is painted with much power. The two females are very beautiful; but a little too much drawn after the ultra refined system of the faces in the fashionable magazines. 'The Village Belle' (324), J. L. Williams, is an excellent piece of colour, and the girl is of nature's own flesh and blood. "A little coquetry, a little vanity, a little boldness, but real beauty and freshness, and a taste for shewy dress, are all proper attributes of the 'Village Belle,' who is a more artificial and sophisticated person than the village beauty. The colouring is pure, harmonious, and powerful. Another little sketch, by the same artist, is in the Water-colour Room, inferior, but not unworthy of the 'Village Belle,' (473) a 'Cottage Maid,' described by Rogers. Her "kerchief blue" should have been a more conspicuous feature; but it is a very pretty and unaffected girl, with none of the sophisticated nature of our friend the 'Belle.' There is good intentions and much power in 'The Angel announcing to the Shepherds the Birth of the Saviour' (341), by R. A. Clack. The angel, perhaps, seems too small and insignificant a part of the picture; he is too close to the shepherds, and too far from the great light; but the landscape is very striking—its tone is calm, yet deep, fitted for the dawning of a portentous but a good-giving wonder; the solemn blue of the heavens, the dark land, the rising light, the bright stars, are painted with high poetic sentiment, and with no lack of painter's skill; the elements of the picture are broad and vast, but not over strained; on the contrary, they are in thorough keeping with each other, with the sentiment of the picture, and with nature. The picture is hung very high, therefore its execution in the detail is less easily seen; by this circumstance it may gain; but, to judge by what we can see, it is more probable that it loses. The bright star in the middle of the picture, is one of the most surprising bits of luminous imitation we remember to have seen. 'Scene in Axminster, Devon,' (348) F. W. Watts, is a charming picture; it is a bit of broken ground, clothed in the most luxuriant leafiness, with a glowing sun and wandering cattle half hidden among the leaves and knolls. It is Watts's best this time. Bass has a few of his ludicrous designs. The one called 'Independent of a Vote' (354) is not bad; it is an old picture, and the comparison does Mr Bass's later works no good. 'The wounded Fallow-deer' (375), by Hancock, is clever. Hancock would be a gainer if he relinquished his obvious imitation of Landseer, which he carries into the handling, and even into the specific design; but with very unequal success. He should avoid a comparison with one so much his superior, which does but dim the talent he undoubtedly possesses. 'The Opening of the Royal Exchange, in the presence of Queen Elizabeth' (416), by Pickering, is a shewy and an interesting picture, but feeble in the execution. Among the portraits, Mrs W. Carpenter bears the bell. Her 'Portrait of Mrs Harding' (213), is very clearly and skilfully painted; we object alone to the hair, which is rather dead in the colouring. Hurlstone's portraits we cannot admire. They are mostly affected, and blackish in the colouring; but the 'Portrait of Lieut.-Col. Yorke' (112), and 'Miss Gronow' (210), are clever. For the sake of their subjects, our readers should look at 'Beatrice Cenci' (579), a copy from a picture by Guido (the heroine of Mr Shelley's noble tragedy); and 'Petrarch's House at Arqua' (615). 'Study of a Trappist Monk,' who died by voluntary starvation (675), by Ripplingille, is a clever study of a very fine head. It is, we presume, the original sketch for 465 in the British Institution, a very admirable picture. Among the Sculpture, we were most struck with some designs and Restorations by J. Henning, jun. 'The Vintage' (782), is excellent. He seems to have caught the spirit of the old sculptors; his works are like theirs in style, but have not the tameness of imitations in general.

EPITAPH ON HIMSELF, BY JOHN LASCARIS.

[Or this famous Grecian—a Greek by birth, and of noble extraction—and one of the principal revivers of Grecian literature in Italy, Morhofius ('Polyhistor,' p. 777.) says:—"Sprung from the celebrated Imperial Lascarine family, he enriched the library of de Medicis with a wealth of Greek books, having visited and examined all the libraries of Greece for that purpose, when sent by Lawrence de Medicis on an embassy to Constantinople. It was under the direction of this same Lascaris, that Pope Leo X may be said to have almost transported Greece into Italy, as to a new colony."*]

TABLE TALK.

PLEASANT SCHOOLING, AND AN AFFECTING STORY.

Wilhelm had a room in Stilling's house; in it there stood a bed, in which he slept with his son, and at the window was a table with the appurtenances of his trade, for as soon as he came from school he laboured at his needle. In the morning early, Heinrich took his satchel, in which, besides the necessary school-books, there was a sandwich for dinner, as also the 'History of the Four Children of Haymon,' or some other such book, together with a shepherd's flute. As soon as he had breakfasted, he set off, and when he was outside the village, he took out his book and read whilst walking, or else quavered some old ballad or other tune upon his flute. Learning Latin was not at all difficult to him, and he had still time enough to read old tales. In the summer he went home every evening; but in the winter he came only on Saturday evening, and went away again on the Monday morning; this continued four years, but the last summer he stayed much at home, and assisted his father at his trade, or made buttons.—Even the road to Florenburg and the school afforded him many a pleasant hour. The schoolmaster was a gentle and sensible man, and knew how both to give and to take. After dinner Stilling assembled a number of children about him, went out into the fields, or to the edge of a brook, and there related to them some fine sentimental tales; and, after his store was exhausted, others were obliged to do the same. As some of them were once together in a meadow, a boy came to them, who began as follows:—"Hear me, children! I will tell you something. Near us lives old Frühlings; you know how he totters about with his stick; he has no longer any teeth, and he cannot see nor hear much. Now, when he sits at the dinner table and trembles in such a manner, he always scatters much, and sometimes something falls out of his mouth again. This disgusted his son and his daughter-in-law, and therefore the old grandfather was at length obliged to eat in the corner behind the stove; they gave him something to eat in an earthen dish, and that often not enough to satisfy him. I have seen him eating, and he looked so sad after dinner, and his eyes were wet with tears. Well, the day before yesterday, he broke his earthen dish. The young woman scolded him severely, and he said nothing, and only sighed. Then they bought him a wooden dish for a couple of farthings, and he was obliged to eat out of it yesterday for the first time. Whilst they were sitting thus at dinner, their little boy, who is three years and a half old, began to rattle little boards together on the floor. Young Frühlings said to him 'What art thou doing there, Peter?' 'O,' said the child, 'I am making a little trough, out of which my father and mother shall eat when I am grown up.' Young Frühlings and his wife looked at each other awhile: at length they began to weep, and immediately fetched the old grandfather to the table, and let him eat with them."—Autobiography of Heinrich Stilling.

AWKWARD EXPERIMENT.

I remember to have heard of a certain gentleman that would needs make trial what men did feel that were hanged. So he fastened the cord about his neck, raising himself upon a stool and then letting himself fall, thinking it would be in his power to regain the stool at his pleasure; which he failed in, but was helped by a friend then present. He was asked afterwards what he felt? he said he felt no pain, but first he thought he saw before his eyes a great fire and burning; then he thought he saw all black and dark; lastly it turned to a pale blue or sea-water green; which colour is often seen by them which fall into swoonings. I have heard also of a physician yet living, who recovered a man to life, which had hanged himself, and had hanged half an hour, by frictions and hot baths; and the same physician did profess that he made no doubt to recover any man that had hanged so long, if his neck were not broken with the first swing.—Bacon on Life and Death.

TRUE LOVE.

"Hast thou not observed, Doris, that thy future husband has lame feet?" "Yes, papa," said she, "I have seen it; but then he speaks to me so kindly and piously, that I seldom pay attention to his feet." "Well, Doris, but young women generally look at a man's figure." "I, too, papa," was her answer; "but Wilhelm pleases me just as he is. If he had straight feet, he would not be Wilhelm Stilling, and how could I love him then?" [This is very beautiful.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CIRCUMSTANCES again compel us to postpone the extracts from Mr Lamb, and also to beg the indulgence of numerous correspondents till next week.

Will our fair friend of L'ULTIMA CAMBRIA have the goodness to inform us at what bookseller's, or other house in London, a small parcel containing a book may be addressed to her?

CRITICISM ON FEMALE BEAUTY.

No. II.

EYES.—The finest eyes are those that unite sense and sweetness. They should be able to say much, and all charmingly. The look of sense is proportioned to the depth from which the thought seems to issue; the look of sweetness to an habitual readiness of sympathy, an unaffected willingness to please and be pleased. We need not be jealous of—

"Eyes affectionate and glad,
That seem to love whate'er they look upon."

Gertrude of Wyoming.

They have always a good stock in reserve for their favourites; especially if, like those mentioned by the poet, they are conversant with books and nature. Voluptuaries know not what they talk about, when they profess not to care for sense in a woman. Pedantry is one thing: sense, taste, and apprehensiveness, are another. Give me an eye that draws equally from head above and heart beneath; that is equally full of ideas and feelings, of intuition and sensation. If either must predominate, let it be the heart. Mere beauty is nothing at any time but a doll, and should be packed up and sent to Brobdignag. The colour of the eye is a very secondary matter. Black eyes are thought the brightest, blue the most feminine, grey the keenest. It depends entirely on the spirit within. I have seen all these colours change characters; though I must own, that when a blue eye looks ungentle, it seems more out of character than the extremest diversity expressed by others. The ancients appear to have associated the idea of gladness with blue eyes; which is the colour given to his heroine's by the author just alluded to. Anacreon attributes a blue or a grey eye to his mistress, it is difficult to say which: but he adds, that it is tempered with a moist delicacy of the eye of Venus. The other look was Minerva's, and required softening. It is not easy to distinguish the shades of the various colours anciently given to eyes; the blues and greys, sky-blues, sea-blues, sea-greys, and even cat-greys.* But it is clear that the expression is everything. The poet demanded this or that colour, according as he thought it favourable to the expression of acuteness, majesty, tenderness or a mixture of all. Black eyes were most lauded; doubtless, because in a southern country the greatest number of beloved eyes must be of that colour. But on the same account of the predominance of black, the abstract taste was in favour of lighter eyes and fair complexions. Hair being of a great variety of tint, the poet had great licence in wishing or feigning on that point. Many a head of hair was exalted into gold, that gave slight colour for the pretension; nor is it to be doubted, that auburn, and red, and yellow, and sand-coloured, and brown with the least surface of gold, all took the same illustrious epithet on occasion. With regard to eyes, the ancients insisted much on one point, which gave rise to many happy expressions. This was a certain mixture of pungency with the look of sweetness. Sometimes they call it severity, sometimes sternness, and even acridity, and terror. The usual word was gorgon-looking. Something of a frown was implied, mixed with a radiant earnestness. This was commonly spoken of men's eyes. Anacreon, giving directions for the portrait of a youth, says—

"Μελαν ομμα γοργον ιστω, Κικιρασμινον γαληνη."

"Dark and gorgon be his eye, Tempered with hilarity."

A taste of it, however, was sometimes desired in the eyes of the ladies. Theagenes, in Heliodorus's 'Ethiopics,' describing his mistress Chariclea, tells us, that even when a child, something great, and with a divinity in it shone out of her eyes, and encountered his, as he examined them with a mixture of the gorgon and the alluring.* Perhaps the best word in general for translating gorgon would be ferent; something earnest, fiery, and pressing onward. Anacreon, with his usual exquisite taste, allays the fierceness of the term with the word hekerasmenon, tempered. The nice point is, to see that the terror itself be not terrible, but only a poignancy brought in to assist the sweetness. It is the salt in the tart; the subtle sting of the essence. It is the eye intellectual, what the apple of the eye is to the eye itself,—the dark part of it, the core, the innermost look;—the concentration and burning-bloss of the rays of love. I think, however, that Anacreon did better than Heliodorus, when he avoided attributing this look to his mistress, and confined it to the other sex. He tells us, that she had a look of Minerva as well as Venus; but it is Minerva without the gorgon. There is sense and apprehensiveness, but nothing to alarm. No drawback upon beauty ought to be more guarded against, than a character of violence about the eyes. I have seen it become very touching, when the violence had been conquered by suffering and reflection, and a generous turn of mind; nor, perhaps, does a richer soil for the production of all good things take place anywhere than over these spent volcanoes. But the experiment is dangerous, and the event rare.

Large eyes were admired in Greece, where they still prevail. They are the finest of all, when they have the internal look; which is not common.† The stag or antelope eye of the orientals is beautiful and lamping, but is accused of looking skittish and indiffering. "The epithet of stag-eyed," says Lady Wortley Montague, speaking of a Turkish love song, "pleases me extremely; and I think it a very lively image of the fire and indifference in his mistress's eyes." We lose in depth of expression, when we go to inferior animals for comparisons with human beauty. Homer calls Juno ox-eyed; and the epithet suits well with the eyes of that goddess, because she may be supposed, with all her beauty, to want a certain humanity. Her large eye looks at you with a royal indifference. Shakespeare has kissed them, and made them human. Speaking of violets, he describes them as being—

"Sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes."

This is shutting up their pride, and subjecting them to the lips of love. Large eyes may become more touching under this circumstance than any others; because of the field they give for the veins to wander in, and the trembling amplitude of the ball beneath. Little eyes must be good tempered, or they are ruined. They have no other resource. But this will beautify them enough. They are made for laughing and should do their duty. In Charles the Second's time, it was the fashion to have sleepy, half-shut eyes, sly and meretricious. They took an expression, beautiful and warrantable on occasion, and made a commonplace of it, and a vice. So little do "men of pleasure" understand the business from which they take their title. A good warm-hearted poet shall shed more light upon real voluptuousness and beauty, in one verse from his pen, than a thousand rakes shall arrive at, swimming in claret, and bound on as many voyages of discovery.

In attending to the hair and eyes, I have forgotten the eyebrows, and the shape of the head. They shall be despatched before we come to the lips; as the table is cleared before the dessert. This is an irreverent simile, nor do I like it; though the pleasure even of eating and drinking, to those who enjoy it with temperance, may be traced beyond the palate. The utmost refinements on that point are, I allow, wide of the mark on this. The idea of beauty, however, is lawfully associated with that of cherries and peaches; as Eve set forth the dessert in Paradise.

EYEBROWS.—Eyebrows used to obtain more applause than they do. Shakspeare seems to jest upon this eminence, when he speaks of a lover

"Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad
Made to his mistress' eyebrow."

Marot mentions a poem on an eyebrow, which was the talk of the court of Francis the First.* The taste of the Greeks on this point was remarkable. They admired eyebrows that almost met. It depends upon the character of the rest of the face. Meeting eyebrows may give a sense and animation to looks that might otherwise be over-feminine. They have certainly not a foolish look. Anacreon's mistress has them:—

"Taking care her eyebrows be
Not apart, nor mingled neither,
But as hers are, stol'n together.
Met by stealth, yet leaving too
O'er the eyes their darkest hue."

In the Idyl of Theocritus before mentioned, one of the speakers values himself upon the effect his beauty has had on a girl with joined eyebrows.

"Κημ' εκ τω ανθρω συνοφρυς κορα ιχθεις ιδοισα δαμαλας παριλαντα, καλον καλον ημης ιφασκιν"

Ου μιν ουδε λογον εκριθην απο τον πικρον αυτα,
Αλλα κατω βλεψας ταν αμικτεραν ιδον ιριπον."

"Passing a bower last evening with my cows,
A girl look'd out,—a girl with meeting brows.
'Beautiful! beautiful!' cried she. I heard,
But went on, looking down, and gave her not a word."

This taste in female beauty appears to have been confined to the ancients. Boccaccio, in his 'Ameto,' the precursor of the 'Decameron,' where he gives several pictures of beautiful women, speaks more than once of disjoined eyebrows.* Chaucer, in the 'Court of Love,' is equally express in favour of "a due distance." An arched eyebrow was always in request; but I think it is doubtful whether we are to understand that the eyebrows were always desired to form separate arches, or to give an arched character to the brow considered in unison. In either case the curve should be very delicate. A straight eyebrow is better than a very arching one, which has a look of wonder and silliness. To have it immediately over the eye, is preferable, for the same reason, to its being too high and lifted. The Greeks liked eyes leaning upwards towards each other; which indeed is a rare beauty, and the reverse of the animal character. If the brows over these took a similar direction, they would form an arch together. Perhaps a sort of double curve was required, the particular one over the eye, and the general one in the look altogether.† But these are unnecessary refinements. Where great difference of taste is allowed, the point in question can be of little consequence. I cannot think, however, with Ariosto, that fair locks with black eyebrows are desirable. I see, by an article in an Italian catalogue, that the taste provoked a dissertation.‡ It is to be found, however, in 'Achilles Tatius,' and in the poem beginning

"Lydia, bella puella, candida," attributed to Gallus. A moderate distinction is desirable, especially where the hair is very light. Hear Burns, in a passage full of life and sweetness,

"Sae flaxen were her ringlets,
Her eyebrows of a darker hue,
Bewitchingly o'er-arching
Twa laughing een o' bonny blue."

It is agreed on all hands, that a female eyebrow ought to be delicate, and nicely pencilled. Dante says of his mistress's, that it looked as if it was painted.

"Il ciglio

Pulito, e brun, talchè dipinto pare."

Eye-lids have been mentioned before. The lashes are best when they are dark, long, and abundant without tangling.—But I shall never get on at this rate.

SHAPE OF HEAD AND FACE, EARS, CHEEKS, &c.—The shape of the head, including the face, is handsome in proportion as it inclines from round into oval. This should particularly appear, when the face is looking down. The skull should be like a noble cover to a beautiful goblet. The principal breadth is at the temples, and over the ears. The ears ought to be small, delicate, and compact. I have fancied that musical people have fine ears, in that sense, as well as the other. But the internal conformation must be the main thing with them. The same epithets of small, delicate, and compact, apply to the jaw; which loses in beauty, in proportion as it is large and angular. The cheek is the seat of great beauty and sentiment. It is the region of passive and habitual softness. Gentle acquiescence is there; modesty is there; the lights and colours of passion play tenderly in and out its surface, like the Aurora of the northern sky. It has been seen how Anacreon has painted a cheek. Sir Philip Sidney has touched it with no less delicacy, and more sentiment:—"Her cheeks blushing, and withal, when she was spoken to, a little smiling, were like roses when their leaves are with a little breath stirred."—"Arcadia," Book I. Beautiful-cheeked is a favourite epithet with Homer. There is an exquisite delicacy, rarely noticed, in the transition from the cheek to the neck, just under the ear. Akenside has observed it; but hurts his real feeling, as usual, with common-place epithets:

"Hither turn

Thy graceful footsteps; hither, gentle maid,
Incline thy polish'd forehead; let thy eyes
Effuse the mildness of their azure dawn;
And may the fanning breezes waft aside
Thy radiant locks, disclosing, as it bends
With airy softness from the marble neck,
The cheek fair blooming."

Pleasures of Imagination.

The "marble neck" is too violent a contrast; but the picture is delicate.

"Effuse the mildness of their azure dawn"

is an elegant and happy verse.

I will here observe, that rakes and men of sentiment appear to have agreed in objecting to ornaments for the ears. Ovid, Sir Philip Sidney, and, I think, Beaumont and Fletcher, have passages against ear-rings; but I cannot refer to the last.

"Vos quoque non caris aures onerate lapillis, Quos legit in viridi decolor Indus aqua."

Artis Amat. Lib. III.

"Load not your ears with costly jewelry,
Which the swart Indian culls from his green sea."

This, to be sure, might be construed into a warning against the abuse, rather than the use, of such ornaments; but the context is in favour of the latter supposition. The poet is recommending simplicity, and extolling the age he lives in, for its being sensible enough to dispense with show and finery. The passage in Sidney is express, and is a pretty conceit. Drawing a portrait of his heroine, and coming to the ear, he tells us, that

"The tip no jewel needs to wear;
The tip is jewel to the ear."

I confess when I see a handsome ear without an ornament, I am glad it is not there; but if it has an ornament, and one in good taste, I know not how to wish it away. There is an elegance in the dangling of a gem suitable to the complexion. I believe the ear is better without it. Akenside's picture, for instance, would be spoiled by a ring. Furthermore, it is in the way of a kiss.

Nose.—The nose in general has the least character of any of the features. When we meet with a very small one, we only wish it larger; when with a large one, we would fain request it to be smaller. In itself it is rarely anything. The poets have been puzzled to know what to do with it. They are generally contented with describing it as straight, and in good proportion. The straight nose, quoth Dante,—"Il dritto naso." "Her nose directed straight," saith Chaucer. "Her nose is neither too long nor too short," say the 'Arabian Nights.' Ovid makes no mention of a nose. Ariosto says of Alcina's (not knowing what else to say), that envy could not find fault with it. Anacreon contrives to make it go shares with the cheek. Boccaccio, in one of his early works, the 'Ameto' above-mentioned, where he has an epithet for almost every noun, is so puzzled what to say of a nose, that he calls it odorante, the smelling nose. Fielding, in his contempt for so unsentimental a part of the visage, does not scruple to beat Amelia's nose to pieces, by an accident; in order to show how contented her lover can be, when the surgeon has put it decently to rights. This has been reckoned a hazardous experiment; not that a lover, if he is worth anything, would not remain a lover after such an accident, but that we do not choose to have a member injured, which has so little character to support its adversity. The commentators have a curious difficulty with a line in Catullus. They are not sure whether he wrote

"Salve, nec nimio puella naso—

Hail, damsel, with by no means too much nose;—

or,

"Salve, nec minimo puella naso—

Hail, damsel, with by no means nose too little."

It is a feature to be described by negatives. It is of importance, however, to the rest of the face. If a good nose will do little for a countenance otherwise poor, a bad one is a great injury to the best. An indifferent one is so common, that it is easily tolerated. It appears, from the epithets bestowed upon that part of the face by the poets and romance-writers, that there is no defect more universal than a nose-twisted or out of proportion. The reverse is desirable accordingly. A nose should be firmly yet lightly cut, delicate, spirited, harmonious in its parts, and proportionate with the rest of the features. A nose merely well-drawn and proportioned, can be very insipid. Some little freedom and delicacy is required to give it character. Perhaps the highest character it can arrive at is a look of taste and apprehensiveness. And a perfectly elegant face has a nose of this sort. Dignity, as regards this feature, depends upon the expression of the rest of the face. Thus a large aquiline nose increases the look of strength in a strong face, and of weakness in a weak one. The contrast,—the want of balance,—is too great. Junius adduces the authority of the sophist Philostratus for tetragonal or quadrangular noses,—noses like those of statues; that is to say, broad and level in the bridge, with distinct angles to the parallelogram. These are better for men than women. The genders of noses are more distinct than those of eyes and lips. The neuter are the commonest. A nose a little aquiline has been admired in some women. Cyrus's Aspasia had one, according to Ælian. "She had very large eyes," quoth he, "and was a little upon the griffin;" ολιγοὶ δὲ καὶ επιγρυπνοί.* The less the better. It trenches upon the other sex, and requires all the graces of Aspasia to carry it off. Those indeed will carry off anything. There are many handsome and agreeable women with aquiline noses; but they are agreeable in spite of them, not by their assistance. Painters do not give them to their ideal beauties. We do not imagine angels with aquiline noses. Dignified men have them. Plato calls them royal. Marie Antoinette was not the worse for an aquiline nose; at least in her triumphant days, when she swam through an antichamber like a vision, and swept away the understanding of Mr Burke. But if a royal nose has anything to do with a royal will, she would have been the better for one of a less dominant description, at last. A Roman nose may establish a tyranny:—according to Marmontel, a little turn-up nose overthrew one. At all events, it is more feminine; and La Fontaine was of Marmontel's opinion. Writing to the Duchess of Bouillon, who had expressed a fear that he would grow tired of Château Thierry, he says,

"Peut-on s'ennuyer en des lieux

Honorés par les pas, éclairés par les yeux

D'une aimable et vive Princesse,

A pied blanc et mignon, à brune et longue tresse?

Nez tressé, c'est un charme encor selon mon sens,

C'en est même un des plus puissants.

Pour moi, le temps d'aimer est passé, je l'avoue;

Et je mérite qu'on me loue

De ce libre et sincère aveu,

Dont pourtant le public se souciera très peu.

Que j'aime ou n'aime pas, c'est pour lui même chose.

Mais s'il arrive que mon cœur

Retourne à l'avenir dans sa première erreur,

Nes aquilins et longs n'en seront pas la cause."

"How can one tire in solitudes and nooks,
Graced by the steps, enlighten'd by the looks,
Of the most piquant of Princesses,
With little darling foot, and long dark tresses?
A turn-up nose too, between you and me,
Has something that attracts me mightily."

My loving days, I must confess, are over,
A fact it does me honour to discover;
Though, I suppose, whether I love or not,
That brute, the public, will not care a jot.
The dev'l a bit will their hard hearts look to it.
But should it happen, some fine day,
That anything should lead me round that way,
A long and beaky nose will certainly not do it."

MIGHTY Magician! of whose spell divine
My willing soul rejoices in the thrall,
With whom I tread the empyreal hall
Of preterhuman Nature, and the shrine
Uncover of that holiest mystery,
Wherein consists the wondrous oracle
Of ultimate Fate (how wisely and how well
By God ordained!) with things that present be—
Thou only Seer, to whom the central Earth
That prison hath unclosed, of which the tomb
Is but the portal.—Prophet-bard of doom!
How shall thy soul rejoice her in the Birth,
When the old world from Nature's sluggish womb
Re-issues in primeval beauty forth!

versation in a quaint aphorism or a poor quibble, than in set and edifying speeches; has consequently been libelled as a person always aiming at wit, which, as he told a dull fellow that charged him with it, is at least as good as aiming at dullness. A small eater but not drinker; confesses a partiality for the production of the juniper berry; was a fierce smoker of tobacco, but may be resembled to a volcano burnt out, emitting only now and then a casual puff. Has been guilty of obtruding upon the public a tale in prose, called 'Rosamund Gray'; a dramatic sketch, named 'John Woodvil'; a 'Farewell Ode to Tobacco'; with sundry other poems, and light prose matter, collected in two slight crown octavos, and pompously christened his works, though in fact they were his recreations, and his true works may be found on the shelves of Leadenhall street, filling some hundred folios. He is also the true 'Eliu', whose essays are extant in a little volume, published a year or two since, and rather better known from that name without a meaning, than from anything he has done, or can hope to do, in his own. He also was the first to draw the public attention to the old English Dramatists, in a work called 'Specimens of English Dramatic Writers,' who lived about the time of Shakespeare, published about fifteen years since. In short, all his merits and demerits to set forth, would take to the end of Mr Upcott's book, and then not be told truly.

CHARLES LAMB.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

[FURNISHED by Mr Upcott to the writer in the 'New Monthly,' who has given the public several fervent and eloquent articles on this first of the critics and essayists of his time. We have promised some extracts on the same subject from another magazine, but have been somewhat perplexed in knowing what portions of them to give or to withhold; for they trench upon matters which it is almost equally difficult to touch upon without explanation or with it; and Mr Lamb, out of the very excess of his sympathies with humanity, however harmless to everyone but himself, left a puzzle in this respect to those who chuse to discuss it. The matter seems very plain; but in truth the metaphysics of it, to be thoroughly done justice to, are laid in the very depths of the nature of us; and after all, he might be grievously misrepresented by those who have seen him in weaker hours than others have, and who therefore naturally enough draw conclusions respecting the habit, very foreign, we believe, to its real amount. We knew him, for instance, ourselves very intimately, and have seen him in all his phases; and yet, with respect to the point in question, our personal experience would lead us to say that it was certainly not the habit which it has been taken for, nor by any means to have been looked for as a matter of course or probability, except under certain circumstances, or at very peculiar and touching periods of his life. We almost feel the tears come into our eyes to think we should have the necessity forced upon us to allude to it, so excellent a man was he, and full of the most exalted and affecting virtues.]

CHARLES LAMB, born in the Inner Temple, 10th February 1775, educated in Christ's Hospital; afterwards a clerk in the Accountants' Office, East India House; pensioned off from that service, 1825, after thirty-three years' service; is now a gentleman at large;—can remember few specialties in his life worth noting, except that he once caught a swallow flying (teste sua manu); below the middle stature; cast of face slightly Jewish, with no Judaic tinge in his complexional religion; stammers abominably, and is therefore more apt to discharge his occasional con-

A VALUABLE EXAMPLE.

[We cannot better forward the views of the Correspondent who sends us the account of this new institution, than by publishing his own intelligent and ingenuous letter.]

SIR,—I have been obliged to you a while back for the insertion of some insignificant verses. My Muse has lately forsaken me; and I am not sure whether your variously-worded, and numerous gentle repulses of such attempts, as conveyed in your notices to Correspondents, may not have had a hand in her withdrawal of favour. A subject, however, more worthy of your attention, as being of general and not selfish interest, emboldens me to ask a few moments of your attention; and I will endeavour to compress the matter into small compass, for fear of being wearisome.

A few weeks ago I enjoyed an opportunity of witnessing the establishment of a reading-room for persons of slender finances. It is in the neighbourhood of Brunswick square, and instituted at the expense of an individual, and is designed for the benefit of both sexes. A spacious apartment has been provided—lights and firing abundantly supplied, with every other requisite for comfortable accommodation. Globes stand in the room, and its walls are hung with some maps; a few dozen of books have been presented, with a probability of augmentation, and superintendence arranged for.

The poorer classes and their improvement have been the objects contemplated by the public-spirited founder; and it was consequently presumed that the hours of evening were the only ones afforded by their avocations for prosecuting the desired end. The evening, therefore, has been made the period of admittance, viz. from five until ten o'clock. Any one of the subscribers (there are already seventy) may introduce a new member, upon presenting a certain notice of such desire, and vouching for general respectability and honesty. It was requisite, for the sake of shedding some dignity upon the establishment, as removing it from the ignominy of being merely a charitable one, that something should be paid; and thus sixpence per month is required from each member, for the privilege of entering upon all the advantages of the place; and to prevent the supicious entrance upon, and abandonment of the right, the condition is annexed of a month's notice on quitting.

One or two of the members are willing also to afford instruction in drawing of figures, which several of the most ignorant among them were anxious to avail themselves of; and here again, some clog upon vacillation was necessary, and the additional charge of threepence per month determined on, with the same requisition of a month's notice upon discontinuance of the study. Paper, pens, subjects for copying are abundantly and gratuitously provided; additions being frequently made to the permanent collection, and occasional loans beside.

Upon the opening of the room, Dr Bhoot, a gentleman well known for literary talent, and philanthropic views, read an address to the assembled subscribers. I have one, somewhat soiled, and will endeavour to find and enclose it; but should you kindly express the least wish for more copies, they shall be furnished.

Nothing has occurred to damp the prospects with which the undertaking was commenced. Men and women, under fixed regulations, meet, and pursue each their own studies, uninterruptedly; unnecessary conversation being discouraged. A book, upon request, with a memorandum deposited, being allowed to be taken for domestic perusal.

The founder had long lamented the want of these sort of facilities for mental cultivation which the poorer classes of men and women laboured under, and the present is an experiment that promises sufficiently well to authorize a hope, that (upon inspection) others, equally anxious to disseminate the blessings of education, may deem it worthy their notice and imitation; and if they improve upon the plan, so much the better.

Such kind of institutions are among the good fruits of 'Captain Pen's' ultimate harvest of the world:—at once products and seeds of ever improving developments. The benefit of partial attempts must of course be partial results; results too, not easily appreciable among the complexity of current movements,—at least, results which cannot be pointed to with unquestionable confidence, until the actuating impulse, viz. a very extensive augmentation of means and applications, swell out the tide of effects to a body of sufficiently broad expanse and steady flow, to leave no doubt as to what ocean it is tending.

Every mind, however, that has yielded in a certain degree its rude energies to the noble ambition of improvement, has been so far providing within itself the materials for a final conquest of its inferior propensities. Though again it must be acknowledged, that the complicated relations of moving life, and the fusion of all sorts of ingredients which unite to produce the varied aspects of society, leave it hard to be demonstrated how far the new principle is influential; and affords only to the reasoning portion of observers, those evidences which hereafter the whole world will recognise. And, perhaps, it may have been ordained here, as in other cases, that the goodness of the principle shall only be universally acknowledged after its triumph; and, like the virtuous efforts of individual faith, the happy shore to which it conducts shall only be manifested to the nations, after they have gone through the soundless depths of experience.

I scarcely feel any alarm lest you should regard this letter as an impertinent intrusion on your time. Your "sympathies with all," as displayed in all your sentiments, forbid me to fear. A slight notice from your lively pen, of such an establishment having worked well for three or four months (and your own inspection may easily be satisfied on the point) would most effectually make it known; and may induce some of your Readers, who are blessed with wealth to spare, to spread abroad in like manner the gifts of knowledge.

I am, Sir,

Yours respectfully,

Z. Z.

LONGEVITY.

(From Dr Southwood Smith's 'Philosophy of Health'.)

By a certain amount and intensity of misery life may be suddenly destroyed; by a smaller amount and intensity, it may be slowly worn out and exhausted. The state of the mind affects the physical condition; but the continuance of life is wholly dependent on the physical condition: it follows that in the degree in which the state of the mind is capable of affecting the physical condition, it is capable of influencing the duration of life.

— Were the physical condition always perfect, and the mental state always that of enjoyment, the duration of life would always be extended to the utmost limit compatible with that of the organization of the body. But as this fortunate concurrence seldom or never happens, human life seldom or never measures the full number of its days. Uniform experience shows, however, that, provided no accident occur to interrupt the usual course, in proportion as body and mind approximate to this state, life is long; and as they recede from it, it is short. Improvement of the physical condition affords a foundation for the improvement of the mental state; improvement of the mental state improves up to a certain point the physical condition; and in the ratio in which this twofold improvement is affected, the duration of life increases.

Longevity then is good, in the first place, because it is a sign and a consequence of a certain amount of enjoyment; and, in the second place, because this being the case, of course in proportion as the term of life is extended, the sum of enjoyment must be augmented. And this view of longevity assigns the cause, and shows the reasonableness of that desire for long life, which is so universal and constant as to be commonly considered instinctive. Longevity and happiness, if not invariably, are generally, coincident.

If there may be happiness without longevity, the converse is not possible: there cannot be longevity without happiness. Unless the state of the body be that of tolerable health, and the state of the mind that of tolerable enjoyment, long life is unattainable; these physical and mental conditions no longer existing, or capable of existing, the desire of life and the power of retaining it cease together.

An advanced term of life and decrepitude are commonly conceived to be synonymous: the extension of life is vulgarly supposed to be the protraction of the period of infirmity and suffering, that period which is characterized by a progressive diminution of the power of sensation, and a consequent and proportionate loss of the power of enjoyment, the "sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything." But this is so far from being true, that it is not within the compass of human power to protract, in any sensible degree, the period of old age, properly so called, that is, the stage of decrepitude. In this stage of existence, the physical changes that successively take place clog, day by day, the vital machinery, until it can no longer play. In a space of time fixed within narrow limits, the flame of life must then inevitably expire, for the processes that feed it fail. But though, when fully come, the term of old age cannot be extended, the coming of the term may be postponed. To the preceding stage, an indefinite number of years may be added. And this is a fact of the deepest interest to human nature.

The division of human life into periods or epochs is not an arbitrary distinction, but is founded on constitutional differences in the system, dependent on different physiological conditions. The periods of infancy, childhood, boyhood, adolescence, manhood, and old age, are distinguished from each other by external characters, which are but the outward signs of internal states. In physiological condition, the infant differs from the child, the boy from the man, and the adult from the old man, as much in physical strength as in mental power. There is an appointed order in which these several states succeed each other; there is a fixed time at which one passes into another. That order cannot be inverted; no considerable anticipation or postponement of that fixed time can be effected. In all places and under all circumstances, at a given time, though not precisely at the same time in all climates and under all modes of life, infancy passes into childhood, childhood into boyhood, boyhood into adolescence, and adolescence into manhood. In the space of two years from its birth, every infant has ceased to be an infant, and has become a child; in the space of six years from this period, every child will have become a boy; add eight years to this time, and every boy will have become a young man; in eight years more, every young man will have become an adult man; and in the subsequent ten years, every adult man will have acquired his highest state of physical perfection. But at what period will this state of physical perfection decline? What is the maximum time during which it can retain its full vigour? Is that maximum fixed? Is there a certain number of years in which, by an inevitable law, every adult man necessarily becomes an old man? Is precisely the same number of years appointed for this transition to every human being? Can no care add to that number? Can no imprudence take from it? Does the physiological condition or the constitutional age of any two individuals ever advance to precisely the same point in precisely the same number of years? Physically and mentally, are not some persons older at fifty than others are at seventy? And do not instances occasionally occur in which an old man, who reached even his hundredth year, retains as great a degree of juvenility as the majority of those who attain to eighty. If this be so, what follows? One of the most interesting consequences that can be presented to the human mind. The deviation of the periods of infancy, childhood, boyhood, and adolescence, is fixed by a determinate number of years. Nothing can stay, nothing retard, the succession of each. Alike incapable of any material protraction is the period of old age. It follows that every year by which the term of human existence is extended is really added to the period of mature age; the period when the organs of the body have attained their full growth and put forth their full strength; when the physical organization has acquired its utmost perfection; when the senses, the feelings, the emotions, the passions, the affections, are in the highest degree acute, intense, and varied; when the intellectual faculties, completely unfolded and developed, carry on their operations with the greatest vigour, soundness, and continuity; in a word, when the individual is capable of receiving and of communicating the largest amount of the highest kind of enjoyment.

A consideration more full of encouragement, more animating, there cannot be. The extension of human life, in whatever mode and degree it may be possible to extend it, is the protraction of that portion of it, and only of that portion of it, in which the human being is capable of RECEIVING AND OF COMMUNICATING THE LARGEST MEASURE OF THE NOBLEST KIND OF ENJOYMENT.

Relation between the physical condition and happiness, and between happiness and longevity depends on the action of the organic organs. The action of the organic organs depends on certain physical agents. As each organic organ is duly supplied with the physical agent by which it carries on its respective process, and as it duly appropriates what it receives, the perfection of the physical condition is attained; and according to the perfection or imperfection of the physical condition, supposing no accident interrupt its regular course, is the length or the brevity of life.

It is conceivable that the physical condition might be brought to a high degree of perfection, the mind remaining in a state but little fitted for enjoyment; because it is necessary to enjoyment that there be a certain development, occupation, and direction of the mental powers and affections: and the mental state may be neglected, while attention is paid to the physical processes. But the converse is not possible.

The mental energies cannot be fully called forth while the physical condition is neglected. Happiness presupposes a certain degree of excellence in the physical condition; and unless the physical condition be brought to a high degree of excellence, there can be no such development, occupation, and direction of the mental powers and affections as is requisite to a high degree of enjoyment.

That state of the system in which the physical condition is sound, is in itself conducive to enjoyment, while a permanent state of enjoyment is in its turn conducive to the soundness of the physical condition. It is impossible to maintain the physical processes in a natural and vigorous condition if the mind be in a state of suffering. The bills of mortality contain no column exhibiting the number of persons who perish annually from bodily disease produced by mental suffering; but everyone must occasionally have seen appalling examples of the fact. Everyone must have observed the altered appearance of persons who have sustained calamity. A misfortune that struck to the heart happened to a person a year ago; observe him some time afterwards; he is wasted, worn, the miserable shadow of himself; inquire about him at the distance of a few months, he is no more.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

THE ABEE DE LILLE.

(Author of 'Les Jardins,' and translations of Virgil and Milton. Died in 1813.)

His works have neither the character nor the features of his conversation. Reading them you would suppose him to be devoted to the most serious contemplations; see him in company, and you would suppose he never meditated at all. He takes no interest in the common occurrences of society. He is careless about everyone, and even about himself. Sometimes, without having listened to or seen anything that has past, he comes in with the most pertinent remark; then, perhaps, he is all simplicity; but in every humour he is very agreeable. His ideas flow with rapidity, and he communicates them without reserve; he is neither wordy nor affected. His conversation is a happy mixture of beauties and of negligences, and amiable disorder, which is always charming, and sometimes astonishing.

For his figure—a little girl once said, that it was all zig-zag: but the sex in general see only the expression, and not the form. His mouth is large, it is true; but the words and the verses that flow from it are delightful. His eyes are small and hollow; but, aided by the changes of his countenance, they express all the variety of his character. He does not give his features time to look ugly. He is not inattentive to his person; but he seldom adapts its ornaments to the occasion. He will go in deshabille to a duchess, and ride a-hunting in full dress.

His body is 74, his soul is only 15. Sensible to excess, he is assailable on all sides; but it is all to no purpose; his thoughtlessness and gaiety come to his aid, and leave him the happiest of beings. Public amusements are nothing to him: he is always occupied by some one object, and happy in being so engaged. He will give you his company for hours, and is happy with you: but so he is with the house-keeper: or his horse, which he will sometimes caress for two hours, and then forget that he has one. Yet, if he cannot be praised for uniformity of life, he has none of the vices of irregularity. However careless his conduct may be, it is always innocent. If he has no great features of character, he has all those engaging qualities of grace, liveliness, and simplicity, so natural, and yet so full of ingenuity, that he is courted like a reigning beauty, and beloved like a favourite child.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXVIII — MARRIAGE AFTER BURIAL.

[If ever the letter of the marriage institution might be set aside in favour of its spirit, it would surely be in a case like the present. The story appeared originally in the famous French publication, the Causse Célèbres. It reminds us of one strikingly like it in an Italian publication, called the 'Florentine Observer,' upon which Mr Shelley has left the fragment of a noble poem. See, in his 'Miscellaneous Poems,' the piece intitled 'Genevra.']

Two Parisian merchants, strongly united in friendship, had each one child of different sexes, who early contracted a strong inclination for each other, which was cherished by the parents, and they were flattered with the expectations of being joined together for life. Unfortunately, at the time they thought themselves on the point of completing this long wished-for union, a man, far advanced in years, and possessed of an immense fortune, cast his eyes on the young lady, and made honourable proposals; her parents could not resist the temptation of a son-in-law in such affluent circumstances, and forced her to comply. As soon as the knot was tied, she strictly enjoined her former lover never to see her, and patiently submitted to her fate; but the anxiety of her mind preyed upon her body, which threw her into a lingering disorder, that apparently carried her off, and she was consigned to her grave. As soon as this melancholy event reached the lover, his affliction was doubled, being deprived of all hopes of her widowhood; but, recollecting that in her youth she had been for some time in a lethargy, his hopes revived, and hurried him to the place of her burial, where a good bribe procured the sexton's permission to dig her up, which he performed, and removed her to a place of safety, where, by proper methods, he revived the almost extinguished spark of life. Great was her surprise at finding the state she had been in; and probably as great was her pleasure, at the means by which she had been recalled from the grave. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered, the lover laid his claim; and his reasons, supported by a powerful inclination on her side, were too strong for her to resist; but as France was no longer a place of safety for them, they agreed to remove to England, where they continued ten years, when a strong inclination of revisiting their native country seized them, which they thought they might safely gratify, and accordingly performed their voyage.

The lady was so unfortunate as to be known by her old husband, whom she met in a public walk, and all her endeavours to disguise herself were ineffectual. He laid his claim to her, before a court of justice, and the lover defended his right, alleging, that the husband, by burying her, had forfeited his title, and that he had acquired a just one, by freeing her from the grave, and delivering her from the jaws of death. These reasons, whatever weight they might have in a court where love presided, seemed to have little effect on the grave sages of the law; and the lady, with her lover, not thinking it safe to wait the determination of the court, prudently retired out of the kingdom.

RELIGIOUS OPINION IN RAJASTHAN.

The period of sectarian intolerance is now past; and as far as my observation goes, the ministers of Vishnu, Sirha and Budha, view each other without malignity, which feeling never appears to have influenced the laity of either sect, who are indiscriminately respectful to the ministers of all religions, whatever be their tenets. It is sufficient that their office is one of sanctity, and that they are ministers of the Divinity, who, they say, excludes the homage of none, in whatever tongue or whatever manner he is sought; and with this spirit of intire toleration, the devout missionary, or Moollah, would in no country meet more security or hospitable courtesy than among the Rajpoots. They must, however, adopt the toleration they would find practised towards themselves.—Tod's Antiquities of Rajasthan.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XVI.—KING LEAR.

ONE of the most perfect displays of dramatic power is the first interview between Lear and his daughter, after the designed affronts upon him, which till one of his knights reminds him of them, his sanguine temperament had led him to overlook. He returns with his train from hunting, and his usual impatience breaks out in his first words, "Let me not stay a jot for dinner; go, get it ready." He then encounters the faithful Kent in disguise, and retains him in his service; and the first trial of his honest duty is to trip up the heels of the officious Steward who makes so prominent and despicable a figure through the piece. On the entrance of Gonerill the following dialogue takes place:—

"LEAR. How now, daughter? what makes that frontlet on?"

Methinks, you are too much of late i' the frown.

FOOL. Thou wast a pretty fellow, when thou had'st no need to care for her frowning; now thou art an O without a figure: I am better than thou art now; I am a fool, thou art nothing.—Yes, forsooth, I will hold my tongue; [To Gonerill] so your face bids me, though you say nothing. Mum, mum.

He that keeps nor crust nor crum,
Weary of all, shall want some.—

That's a sheal'd peascod! [Pointing to Lear.

GONERILL. Not only, sir, this your all-licens'd fool,

But other of your insolent retinue
Do hourly carp and quarrel; breaking forth
In rank and not-to-be-endured riots.

I had thought, by making this well known to you,
To have found a safe redress; but now grow fearful,
By what yourself too late have spoke and done,
That you protect this course, and put it on
By your allowance; which if you should, the fault
Would not 'scape censure, nor the redresses sleep,
Which in the tender of a wholesome weal,
Might in their working do you that offence,
(Which else were shame) that then necessity
Would call discreet proceeding.

FOOL. For you trow, nuncle,

The hedge sparrow fed the cuckoo so long,
That it had its head bit off by its young.

So out went the candle, and we were left darkling.

LEAR. Are you our daughter?

GONERILL. Come, sir,

I would you would make use of that good wisdom
Whereof I know you are fraught, and put away
These dispositions which of late transform you
From what you rightly are.

FOOL. May not an ass know when the cart draws the horse?—Whoop, Jug, I love thee.

LEAR. Does any here know me?—Why, this is not Lear:

Does Lear walk thus? speak thus?—Where are his eyes?

Either his notion weakens, or his discernings
Are lethargy'd—Ha! waking?—'Tis not so.—
Who is it that can tell me who I am?—Lear's shadow?

I would learn that: for by the marks
Of sovereignty, of knowledge, and of reason,
I should be false persuaded I had daughters.—
Your name, fair gentlewoman?

GONERILL. Come, sir:

This admiration is much o' the favour
Of other your new pranks. I do beseech you
To understand my purposes aright:
As you are old and reverend, you should be wise:
Here do you keep a hundred knights and squires;
Men so disorder'd, so debauch'd, and bold,
That this our court, infected with their manners,
Shows like a riotous inn: epicurism and lust
Make it more like a tavern, or a brothel,
Than a grac'd palace. The shame itself doth speak

For instant remedy: be then desir'd
By her, that else will take the thing she begs,
A little to disquantity your train;
And the remainder, that shall still depend,
To be such men as may besort your age,
And know themselves and you.

LEAR. Darkness and devils!

Saddle my horses; call my train together.—
Degenerate bastard! I'll not trouble thee;
Yet have I left a daughter.

GONERILL. You strike my people; and your disorder'd rabble
Make servants of their betters.

Enter ALBANY.

LEAR. Woe, that too late repents—Oh, sir, are you come?

Is it your will? speak, sir.—Prepare my horses.—
[To Albany.

Ingratitude! thou marble-hearted fiend,
More hideous, when thou show'st thee in a child;
Than the sea-monster!

ALBANY. Pray, sir, be patient.

LEAR. Detested kite! thou liest. [To Gonerill.
My train are men of choice and rarest parts,
That all particulars of duty know;
And in the most exact regard support
The worships of their name—O most small fault,
How ugly didst thou in Cordelia show!
Which, like an engine, wrench'd my frame of nature
From the first place; drew from my heart all love,
And added to the gall. Oh Lear, Lear, Lear!
Beat at the gate that let thy folly in,

[Striking his head.

And thy dear judgment out!—Go, go, my people!
ALBANY. My lord, I am guiltless, as I am ignorant
Of what hath mov'd you.]

LEAR. It may be so, my lord—
Hear, Nature, hear! dear goddess, hear!
Suspend thy purpose, if thou didst intend
To make this creature fruitful!
Into her womb convey sterility;
Dry up in her the organs of increase;
And from her derogate body never spring
A babe to honour her! If she must teem,
Create her child of spleen: that it may live,
To be a thwart disnatur'd torment to her!
Let it stamp wrinkles in her brow of youth;
With cadent tears fret channels in her cheeks;
Turn all her mother's pains and benefits,
To laughter and contempt; that she may feel How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is
To have a thankless child!—Away, away! [Exit.

ALBANY. Now, gods that we adore, whereof comes this? [cause;

GONERILL. Never afflict yourself to know the
But let his disposition have that scope
That dotage gives it.

Re-enter LEAR.

LEAR. What, fifty of my followers at a clap!
Within a fortnight!

ALBANY. What's the matter, sir?

LEAR. I'll tell thee; life and death! I am asham'd
That thou hast power to shake my manhood thus:
[To Gonerill.

That these hot tears, which break from me perforce, Should make thee worth them.—Blasts and fogs upon thee!

The untented woundings of a father's curse
Pierce every sense about thee!—Old fond eyes
Bewep this cause again, I'll pluck you out;
And cast you, with the waters that you lose,
To temper clay.—Ha! is it come to this?
Let it be so.—Yet have I left a daughter,
Who, I am sure, is kind and comfortable;
When she shall hear this of thee, with her nails
She'll flea thy wolfish visage. Thou shalt find,
That I'll resume the shape, which thou dost think
I have cast off for ever.

[Exit Lear, Kent, and Attendants.]

This is certainly fine: no wonder that Lear says after it, "Oh let me not be mad, not mad, sweet heavens," feeling its effects by anticipation: but fine as is this burst of rage and indignation at the first blow aimed at his hopes and expectations, it is nothing near so fine as what follows from his double disappointment, and his lingering efforts to see which of them he shall lean upon for support and find comfort in, when both his daughters turn against his age and weakness. It is with some difficulty that Lear gets to speak with his daughter Regan, and her husband, at Gloster's castle. In concert with Gonerill they have left their own home on purpose to avoid him. His apprehensions are first alarmed by this circumstance, and when Gloster, whose guests they are, urges the fiery temper of the Duke of Cornwall as an excuse for not importuning him a second time, Lear breaks out,—

"Vengeance! Plague! Death! Confusion!
Fiery? What fiery quality? Why, Gloster,
I'd speak with the Duke of Cornwall and his wife."

Afterwards, feeling perhaps not well himself, he is inclined to admit their excuse from illness, but then recollecting that they have set his messenger (Kent) in the stocks, all his suspicions are roused again, and he insists on seeing them.

"Enter CORNWALL, REGAN, GLOSTER, and Servants."

LEAR. Good-morrow to you both.

CORNWALL. Hail to your grace!

[Kent is set at liberty.]

REGAN. I am glad to see your highness.

LEAR. Regan, I think you are; I know what reason

I have to think so; if thou shouldst not be glad,
I would divorce me from thy mother's tomb,
Sepulch'ring an adulteress.—Oh, are you free?

[To Kent.]

Some other time for that.—Beloved Regan,
Thy sister's naught: Oh Regan, she hath tied Sharp-tooth'd unkindness, like a vulture, here—

[Points to his heart.]

I can scarce speak to thee; thou'lt not believe,
Of how deprav'd a quality—Oh Regan!

REGAN. I pray you, sir, take patience; I have hope

You less know how to value her desert,
Than she to scant her duty.

LEAR. Say, how is that?

REGAN. I cannot think my sister in the least
Would fail her obligation; if, sir, perchance,
She have restrain'd the riots of your followers,
'Tis on such ground, and to such wholesome end,
As clears her from all blame.

LEAR. My curses on her!

REGAN. Oh, sir, you are old;
Nature in you stands on the very verge
Of her confine: you should be rul'd, and led
By some discretion, that discerns your state
Better than you yourself; therefore, I pray you,
That to our sister you do make return;
Say, you have wrong'd her, sir.

LEAR. Ask her forgiveness?

Do you but mark how this becomes the use?

Dear daughter, I confess that I am old;

Age is unnecessary; on my knees I beg,

That you'll vouchsafe me raiment, bed, and food.

REGAN. Good sir, no more; these are unsightly tricks:

Return you to my sister.

LEAR. Never, Regan:

She hath abated me of half my train;

Look'd blank upon me; struck me with her tongue,

Most serpent-like, upon the very heart:—

All the stor'd vengeance of heaven fall

On her ungrateful top! Strike her young bones,

You taking airs, with lameness!

CORNWALL. Fie, sir, fie!

LEAR. You nimble lightnings, dart your blinding flames

Into her scornful eyes! Infect her beauty,

You fen-suck'd fogs, drawn by the powerful sun,

To fall, and blast her pride!

REGAN. Oh the blest gods!

So will you wish on me, when the rash mood is on.

LEAR. No, Regan, thou shalt never have my curse;

Thy tender-hefted nature shall not give Thee o'er to harshness; her eyes are fierce, but thine

Do comfort, and not burn: 'Tis not in thee
To grudge my pleasures, to cut off my train,
To bandy hasty words, to sear my sense,
And, in conclusion, to oppose the bolt
Against my coming in; thou better know'st
The offices of nature, bond of childhood,
Effects of courtesy, dues of gratitude;
Thy half o' the kingdom thou hast not forgot,
Wherein I thee endow'd.

REGAN. Good sir, to the purpose.

[Trumpets within.]

LEAR. Who put my man i' the stocks?

CORNWALL. What trumpet's that?

Enter Steward.

REGAN. I know't, my sister's; this approves her letter,

That she would soon be here.—Is your lady come?

LEAR. This is a slave, whose easy borrow'd pride
Dwells in the sickle grace of her he follows:—
Out, varlet, from my sight!

CORNWALL. What means your grace?

LEAR. Who stock'd my servant? Regan, I have good hope

Thou didst not know on't.—Who comes here?
Oh heavens,

Enter GONERILL.

If you do love old men, if your sweet away
Allow obedience, if yourselves are old,
Make it your cause; send down, and take my part!

Art not asham'd to look upon this beard?

[To Gonerill.]

Oh, Regan, wilt thou take her by the hand?

GONERILL. Why not by the hand, sir? How have I offended?

All's not offence, that indiscretion finds,
And dotage terms so.

LEAR. Oh, sides, you are too tough!

Will you yet hold?—How came my man i' the stocks?

CORNWALL. I set him there, sir: but his own disorders

Deserv'd much less advancement.

LEAR. You! did you?

REGAN. I pray you, father, being weak, seem so.
If, till the expiration of your month,
You will return and sojourn with my sister,
Dismissing half your train, come then to me;
I am now from home, and out of that provision
Which shall be needful for your entertainment.

LEAR. Return to her, and fifty men dismiss'd?

No, rather I abjure all roofs, and choose

To be a comrade with the wolf and owl—

To wage against the enmity o' the air

Necessity's sharp pinch!—Return with her!

Why, the hot-blooded France, that dowerless took

Our youngest born, I could as well be brought To knee his throne, and squire-like pension beg

To keep base life afoot.—Return with her!

Persuade me rather to be slave and sumpter

To this detested groom. [Looking on the Steward.]

GONERILL. At your choice, sir.

LEAR. Now, I prythee, daughter, do not make me mad;

I will not trouble thee, my child; farewell:

We'll no more meet, no more see one another:—

But yet thou art my flesh, my blood, my daughter;

Or, rather, a disease that's in my flesh,

Which I must needs call mine: thou art a bile,

A plague-sore, an embossed carbuncle,

In my corrupted blood. But I'll not chide thee;

Let shame come when it will, I do not call it:

I did not bid the thunder-bearer shoot,

Nor tell tales of thee to high-judging Jove:

Mend, when thou canst; be better, at thy leisure:

I can be patient; I can stay with Regan,

I, and my hundred knights.

REGAN. Not altogether so, sir;

I look'd not for you yet, nor am provided

For your fit welcome: Give ear, sir, to my sister;

For those that mingle reason with your passion;
Must be content to think you old, and so—
But she knows what she does.

LEAR. Is this well spoken now?

REGAN. I dare avouch it, sir: What fifty followers?

Is it not well? What should you need of more?
Yea, or so many? Such that both charge and danger
Speak 'gainst so great a number? How, in one house,

Should many people, under two commands,
Hold amity? 'Tis hard; almost impossible.

GONERILL. Why might not you, my lord, receive attendance

From those that she calls servants, or from mine?

REGAN. Why not, my lord? If then they chanc'd to slack you,

We would controul them: if you will come to me
(For now I spy a danger) I entreat you
To bring but five-and-twenty; to no more
Will I give place, or notice.

LEAR. I gave you all—

REGAN. And in good time you gave it.

LEAR. Made you my guardians, my depositaries;
But kept a reservation to be follow'd
With such a number: what, must I come to you
With five-and-twenty, Regan! said you so?

REGAN. And speak it again, my lord; no more with me.

LEAR. Those wicked creatures yet do look well-favour'd,

When others are more wicked; not being the worst,
Stands in some rank of praise:—I'll go with thee;

[To Gonerill.]

Thy fifty yet doth double five-and-twenty,
And thou art twice her love.

GONERILL. Hear me, my lord;

What need you five-and-twenty, ten, or five,
To follow in a house, where twice so many
Have a command to tend you?

REGAN. What need one?

LEAR. Oh, reason not the need: our basest beggars

Are in the poorest thing superfluous:

Allow not nature more than nature needs,

Man's life is cheap as beast's: thou art a lady;

If only to go warm were gorgeous;

Why, nature needs not what thou gorgeous wear'st;

Which scarcely keeps thee warm.—But, for true need—

You heavens, give me that patience which I need!

You see me here, you gods; a poor old man,

As full of grief as age; wretched in both!

If it be you that stir these daughters' hearts

Against their father, fool me not so much

To bear it tamely; touch me with noble anger!

Oh, let no woman's weapons, water-drops,

Stain my man's cheeks!—No, you unnatural hags,

I will have such revenges on you both,

That all the world shall—I will do such things—

What they are, yet I know not; but they shall be

The terrors of the earth. You think, I'll weep:

No, I'll not weep:—

I have full cause of weeping; but this heart

Shall break into a hundred thousand flaws,

Or e'er I'll weep:—Oh, fool, I shall go mad!

[Exit Lear, Gloster, Kent, and Fool.]

If there is any thing in any author like this yearning of the heart, these throes of tenderness, this profound expression of all that can be thought and felt in the most heart-rending situations, we are glad of it; but it is in some author that we have not read. To be concluded next week.

—You remember the fairy who was so good-natured that any weapon aimed at her changed its quality; stones became balls of silk, and arrows became flowers. The moral of the fable is evident. Be but liked, and you will not be censured for your failings (should you have any), nor envied for your good fortune.—Sharp's Essays.

EPISTLE TO A FRIEND.*

I ask no fields with plenty crowned,
I ask no wealth, as Gyges owned,
Dear Sr; all I seek
Is what the wants of life require,
Beef, porter, bread, a sea-coal fire,
My Paper once a week.

I ask no stores of dirty pelf
To make me quite forget myself;
Each ill does wealth afford;
To me a harter has no charms,
To me the stocks cause no alarms,
I envy not a hoard.

The master-minds of other days,
The bards whom wond'ring nations praise
To me their treasures bring.
Homer and Virgil me inspire,
For me Anacreon strikes his lyre,
For me does Horace sing.

And they, the chiefs of elder time,
The denizens of every clime,
The patriot men of yore,—
For me they live, for me they bleed,
For me they do the heroic deed;—
What can I wish for more?

With wealth like this, with friends like these,
I live in no inglorious ease;
Ner ever blame the fates,
Because they have denied to me
The complement of L. S. D.
They've lavished upon Thwaytes.†

G. H.

* The first stanza is an imitation of an epigram of Alpheus of Mitylene.

† Thwaytes—of course a generic name,—a noun of multitude, like Smith or Tomkins,—and not implicating any individual of the numerous and worthy tribe of the Thwayteses.

CONTRAST BETWEEN

THE REAL AND FASHIONABLE GRACES OF WORSHIP.

(From the new Novel, 'Chances and Changes'.)

"WHAT a contrast," said Catherine to Edward Longcroft, "is this little church among the mountains, to the fashionable churches in London. When I saw the benches of hewn stone, without any distinction of pews, the simple pulpit, the unadorned altar, the rough walls, backed by the solid rock, I bethought me of your uncle's pew in Mary-le-bone, carpeted like a drawing-room, lined with crimson cloth, padded like a carriage, for the more luxurious ease of the shoulders that rested against it; the chandelier, the fire-place, with its polished cut-steel fender and fire-irons, and Mr Longcroft rattling them and regularly stirring the fire, as soon as the text was given out."

"Why, Catherine, you are satirical, my child," said Mr Neville. "How is that? Do not you know, that if these poor mountaineers were proud of the poverty of their church, its simplicity would be fully as offensive in the sight of the Almighty as all the pomp of Mary-le-bone, or any other edifice of the same character."

"No, my dear father, I am not in any mood to satirise," said Catherine, "but I always used to feel uncomfortable in that church, the distinctions were so very aristocratic; it made me seem as if the object to which it was consecrated was merely a form of polite society; the fault may be in myself, but I must own I never could feel half the devotion sitting by the fire-side, with a velvet cushion at my back, and my feet on an ottoman, in Mr Longcroft's pew, that I did at our own dear Nethercross, and at this little church in the desert here."

"Catherine is right!" said Edward, "there ought to be no distinction of persons in places of worship; there is none in a Catholic church; the good sense of the people teaches them all to take their places with a decent regard to their respective conditions, and that is enough—open pews and open doors are what we might borrow, with great advantage, from our continental neighbours."

"Yes," said Mr Neville, "and as our friend Arnaud is not here to start at my acknowledgment, I must say, I should be very glad of their pictured walls, and ornamented altars, now that we could combine them with a purer form of worship: I do love a religion of types, when not made to stand in place of the things typified,—I suppose I may say so without fear of being condemned as not orthodox. The remark that the real splendour and perfection of a state, is when the utmost pomp and magnificence in public matters is combined with simplicity in private life and individual habits, will apply as well to the ornamenting of churches as any other national treasures,—so it was in ancient Greece and early Rome; but we shall not see those days in England, I fear, nor anywhere else, where steam-coaches and rail-roads, and flying ships and aquatic balloons, are perpetually at work to minister to restless whims, and absorb the money which might, if people staid at home, and lived within their means, be devoted to public benefits." And so, with many a sage description on the comparative advantages of poverty and luxury, and many a pause to contemplate the magnificence of nature, which surrounded them, they finally regained the Presbytery.

SHAKESPEARE AT THE CLUB.

(From 'Confessions of Shakspeare'.)

WE have some notion of the footing on which he stood. A personal welcome to begin with, his wit to answer all the rest, and not a word from either side to intimate the divinity of his genius. No one "stands still with awful eye." It is hail fellow, well met. In the theatre alone men bowed before the agonies of Othello's passion, the sublime terrors of Macbeth's imagination—there alone they dreamt with the philosophic Hamlet over the riddle of life, to find in death the sole solution of its mystery!—Is he who now enters the Mermaid with that light and buoyant step the author of these wonderful creations? Is that the demi-god of genius, the master of spirits and of men? See how he enters, unconscious of any superiority, and open and unassuming as a child. It is only as the wine stirs, and the potent Jonson gets rather dictatorial, that these quiet flashes of wit glance forth against him. We may suppose, in addition, the quiet undercurrent of satire, half pleasant, half scornful, which must have run through the mind of Shakspeare as he saw the younger poets turn to Jonson, as the great arbiter of their fate; waiting for his nod, as the sign of doom; and leaping for very joy in their hearts, as, out of that oracular chair of his—the town chair of poetry, wisdom, and scholarship—he pronounced them, [with affectionate conceit, his "sons," and proceeded to "seal them of the tribe of Ben." But this ran, we dare be sworn, an undercurrent merely. It never ventured itself to the surface in the shape of severity or scorn. The more learned assumptions of Jonson were those we are to suppose he twitted him about, making "all merry meanwhile, and adding to the sociality by his jests. It is by no means to be concluded from this that Shakspeare disrelished learning, or did not himself admit it in a gallant and airy spirit, and as a social grace. It was only the Jonsonian shape of it he thought a fair subject for quizzing. Hear him speaking for himself at the Mitre in a happy vein of festive wit,—

"Give me a cup of rich Canary wine,
Which was the Mitre's once, and now is mine;
Of which had Horace and Anacreon tasted,
Their lives as well as lines till now had lasted."

And the worthy Richard Jackson, whose manuscript hands this down to us, inserts a dramatic direction in the second line at the end of the fourth word,—thus, "[drinks]." And so the life of Shakspeare passed,—according to the chance records of the time. He wrote the mightiest works that have been given to man, and sought no personal association with them. He received none. As each of these works appeared, they merged, as it were, into the general and universal spirit to which they indeed of right belonged—the spirit of humanity. They became a portion of the great heart of the world. Hix, meanwhile, from whom they first proceeded, continued to walk through life's common way; laying on his heart the lowliest duties; assisting his fellow-actors to pass life merrily as they might; and,—secure of the everlasting existence of those shapes of beauty he had sent into the world to be to it "joys for ever,"—for himself, in the estimation of posterity, he betrayed no care. Mr Lamb has said there is a magnanimity even in authorship. Is it not here? if the term of authorship can indeed be applied to Shakspeare. Posterity has certainly, in his case, taken care that nothing was lost by such noble modesty. Shakspeare is now only less than worshipped;—it is esteemed an honour to speak the tongue he spake.

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the New Water Colour Society, Exeter Hall.

THIS little Society have left their dark and cramped abode in Boad-street, and have much more commodiously hung out their colours in the small room at Exeter Hall; not on a ground floor, down a step, but nearer the sky and sun, up a fine stone staircase. We hope their prospects are rising accordingly. At all events, a better policy has been pursued; and we do not observe those miserable daubs that disfigured the walls of their former place, as bad as any of the unsuccessful candidates for the amateur prizes at the Society of Arts. Though the pictures are much more select, they do not strike us as being fewer in number. The majority are landscapes,—little snatches of homely scenery,—very agreeable matter for an hour's amusement. The pictures are mostly very small, and very, very few are elaborate in the colouring enough to deserve the name of paintings. The effect of the whole is somewhat as though the contents of a well-filled album had been dislodged from their native home, and framed and glazed, and hung round the room, with here and there a large drawing from the portfolio, to give a dignity to the little squadron. Altogether, there is a general want of finish, and even of ambition, among the drawings; they are mostly executed in the mannered style of roughness, with a camera obscura effect, common among old-fashioned water-colourists, or [with a glaring blankness, a sort of ostentatious neatness, in which, keeping the paper clean is made to pass for delicacy of finish; the real use of colour, the blending of tints, the delicacy of high finish, bold contrast, the bolder dispensing with contrast, are scarcely to be met with. A few are aspiring in the attempt at colour, but such are apt to want harmony, leaving the material to overpower the effect it should produce. Downing's drawings are of the ultra neat order, where a large space of clean and feebly-tinted distance is made to show off the deeper-toned spot which constitutes the principal object; and yet his drawings do not want for a real feeling of nature. 'Northgate, Chester' (18), is at once a prime instance of this defect, and a very good specimen of his power. It is vigorous, and yet soft and pleasing; but that unnatural shadow in the middle of the picture is so much too heavy for the rest, that though richly coloured, and not opaque, it tells like a large blot in the middle of a very neat, but very feeble drawing. Cahusac is clever; but he would do well to study nature more, and Hunt less: his drawings are clever, but mannered. His best is a 'Sporting Highlander' (45). Shepherd is tasteful, but his colours are too positive and unblended. 141 and 149, however, are very clever, and for force of effect may perhaps take the second place among their fellows. Campion, Lindsay, Duncan, Rochard, are among those whose pictures we have noted with a mark of approbation. 'Shipping on the Thames' (315) by the first, is a very clever drawing. But the glory of the place is a couple of fruit-pieces by Lance;—rich, glowing, luxurious as oils: how gorgeous that glittering cup; how luscious the fruit; how soft the napkin; how light and airy the feather! We hardly know which of the two we prefer; if 136 be more striking and magnificent, 148 is the more faultless and deeper toned. The strawberries in the former are, we think, of very doubtful texture; they look too dry.—There are some studies of heads, &c., by the same hand: he manages flesh better in water than in oils; but we would advise him to stick to his fruit.]

The British Atlas, comprising separate Maps of every County in England, and the Three Ridings of Yorkshire. Wales will be contained in four sheets, and will be so arranged that they can be joined together, and form an entire Map of that Principality. To be completed in twenty-three numbers; each containing two Maps, which will appear regularly on the first of every month. By J. and C. Walker. Longman and Co.]

VERY copious, clear, and carefully got up: as fair a specimen of Map engraving as we remember to have seen.

Arboretum Britannicum. By J. C. Loudon, F.L.S. &c. No. IV. Longman and Co.

SUSTAINS its excellence as a gallery of arborescent portraits. Is not the horse chestnut, however, taken from a tree which is rather an exception, than an average specimen in the general appearance of its species? [It appears to us more oval shaped than common.]

History of British Fishes. By W. Yarrell, F.L.S. Part II. John Van Voorst.

THE cuts are not quite so well printed as those in Part I.—they are a little blacker; but they show the same skill and delicacy in the engraving; the casualities of the press obscure but do not destroy the beauty of the execution.

Plates of the Penny Magazine. Charles Knight.

THE cuts are separated from the text, and bound up in a handsome volume. It is quite surprising how they can survive the wear-and-tear they must endure in working off the enormous impression of the periodical they have served for, and then appear after all in this fresh, vigorous, and drawing-room condition. They look very well on the better paper, and form quite a gallery of natural history, distant scenery, and curiosities of all sorts. An excellent work to lie on the drawing-room table, furnishing amusement or a whole afternoon.

TABLE TALK.

HINT TO VOYAGERS.

"I cannot refrain from making some remarks on the cruelty of those who pass a leisure hour on board, by firing at the oceanic birds as they fly about the ship. These little "indefatigables," as some are pleased to term them, are too often doomed to become the subject of this murderous sport. Often and often with broken wings they are left to linger on the wide expanse of waters, unable to procure any food but that which may accidentally pass them; buffeted about by the waves, and helpless in themselves, they linger out a miserable existence, until death puts a period to their misery. It is revolting to the feelings to see these beautiful and perfectly innocent birds destroyed, solely to gratify the inclination to destroy.—Bennet's 'Wanderings in New South Wales,' &c.

MR HENRY PHILLIPS.

H. Phillips has been fortunate in coming before the public and making a stand at a time when there was none to oppose him. His natural powers are limited, but he has increased them by careful and persevering practice. Like all self-taught men, he has his defects; he has a trick of jerking out his notes in an unpleasant manner—he is apt to sing in his throat—and in extending the compass of his voice he has rendered it uneven, requiring all his tact to conceal this defect; he has likewise a tendency to sing out of tune—the effect of forcing his voice beyond its powers. To look on the other side of the picture, his conception is good—his expression full of feeling—his style of singing is chaste and free from vulgar embellishment—he throws out his tone well—and his execution is smooth and polished. His acting too is more easy, animated, and expressive than that of any other English singer. He is successful both in serious and comic characters, but his forte is comedy; the picturesqueness of his diablerie, indeed, arises from a vein of comic humour. He is always gentlemanly, whether he personates the fiend himself, or the mortal with whom the fiend has taken up his lodging. There is a mannerism too—not an unpleasant one, partaking as it does of a sort of bom-hommie—in all he does, whether he sings 'Lord, have mercy' at a festival, or 'The best of all good company' at Drury Lane. We know no singer more easily imitated, or so inimitable in his way (if the paradox may be allowed) as Henry Phillips.—New Monthly Magazine.

EXTRAORDINARY STORY.

A gentleman who had been robbed by his servant, forgave him, on condition that he would promise to abandon his bad habits; this promise he so far kept, and conducted himself so steadily, as to accumulate enough of money to enable him to marry, and to keep an inn, on a much frequented road. About twenty years after, the gentleman, travelling that way, came to lodge with his old servant, whom he did not recollect until the man came forward, made himself known, and expressed how gratified and happy he was in again waiting upon him. He gave him the handsomest room and the best fare, but the night had no sooner set in, than this perfidious wretch, after so much show of attachment, stabbed his old master with a dagger, threw his body into a cart, and carried it to a river at the back of his house. In order to avoid discovery, and to prevent the corpse from rising to the surface of the water, he pierced the body through with a long stake sharpened at the end, which he pushed so far into the mud, that only a very small portion of the end of the stake was visible. A few days afterwards some ravens arrived from all directions, and crowded to the spot. Their increasing croaking, altogether unusual at the place, led the inhabitants to fancy a thousand foolish stories. The pertinacity of the birds was such also, that it was useless to attempt driving them away. This increased the excited curiosity so much, that the stake was at length, with difficulty, drawn out, which was no sooner done, than the body rose to the surface of the water. Inquiries were accordingly made to discover the murderer, and the wheel marks of the cart having been traced to the back of the inn, the master was taken up on suspicion, and confessed his crime.—Faculties of Birds.

PREMATURE INTERMENT.

There have been many example of men in show dead; either laid out upon the cold floare, or carried forth to burial. Nay, of some buried in the earth; which, notwithstanding, have lived again; which hath been found (in those that were buried, the earth being afterwards opened) by the bruising and wounding of their head, through the struggling of the body within the coffin: whereof the most recent and memorable example was that of James Scotus, called the subtle, and a schoolman; who, being digged up again, was found in that state; and the like happened in our dayes, in the person of a player, buried at Cambridge.—Bacon on Life and Death. [Many idle stories are related to this effect, but it is to be feared also, many true ones. Yet there are people who think it easy for the world to have too much imagination! A weak imagination is not to be cultivated, neither should we think the worst or gloomiest of anything, when it is over and cannot be better seen into. But security in the present instance is easy, and a little imagination would come in aid of natural tenderness, to render it a matter of course. It is the duty of every family (a painful one it is, but better than worse pains of doubt afterwards) to keep a deceased member above ground, till the commencement of decomposition is obvious and undeniable.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We agree with H. G., but are afraid of re-opening so very wide a question.

We take a SINCERE WELL-WISHER in the very best part. We certainly have our own views on the subject; but they are such, as, we flatter ourselves, he would agree with, if we could argue the point with him; just as he thinks he could convince us;—a feeling common to all honest controversialists. But controversy is not within the province of our Paper.

Thanks to J. T. HOLMAN; but is not his view of Mr Webbe's argument materially to be qualified by the fact, that the inventor of the Cherokee language was acquainted with Europeans? and was the invention, in fact, one of language, and not rather of characters only?

We should like to find room for the letter of LARIS, and hope to do so. The index he inquires about, will be such as he wishes. With respect to the other matter, we cannot be equally certain.

We never heard of the contemplated measure alluded to by our comfortable friend, F. WILLIAM F., till his own mention of it. No such measure has certainly ever been contemplated by ourselves.

G. W. may surely read his "youthful productions" to his friends, without any misgiving, especially as he interrupts no duty in the cultivation of his taste. The Reader will agree with us, when he sees the following verses, which argue a feeling for genuine nature. We recommend the writer to try his hand on a longer, narrative ballad, such as 'Edwin and Emma,' and others of that sort:—

I.

THE false one met me with a smile,
And held her hand to me,
I pressed it fondly, for no guile;
I thought in her could be.

II.

A ring of gold my finger prest!
I started—and she wept;
I asked her, with an aching breast
If thus her faith she kept!

III.

She answered not, but turned her face
To weep, unseen by me:
I heaved a sigh, and left the place;
And her—eternally.

There are things we like much in the verses of SELIM, but they are accompanied with matter which hardly belongs to them. Will he sit down and write a few, in which he shall resolve to sacrifice nothing whatever to the rhyme?

RUTH writes so delightful a letter, that it will be hard if we do not find something to please us in her book.

With sincere regret do we learn, from Miss Anna Maria Sargeant, the death of her sister, Mrs Hartwell, who graced our pages with some of her cordial and truly feminine effusions. The letter with which Miss Sargeant has favoured us, will be further noticed next week.

The wishes of Mr G. H. L. shall be attended to.

The letter of our fair Correspondent, E. S., is duly appreciated.

The 'Gipsy King's' arrival was attended with silence, out of no dishonour to him. We have been only taking time to pay him the proper attention. It has long been our intention to give Specimens of English Poetry, with remarks, after the fashion of the article on Thomson's 'Castle of Indolence,' in Number IX, and agreeably to the recommendation of the Correspondent who refers to it. And we shall certainly pursue this plan in the course of a few weeks.

CRITICISM ON FEMALE BEAUTY.

No. III.

MOUTH AND CHIN.—The mouth, like the eyes, gives occasion to so many tender thoughts, and is so apt to lose and supersede itself in the affectionate softness of its effect upon us, that the first impulse, in speaking of it, is to describe it by a sentiment and a transport. Mr Sheridan has hit this very happily—see his Rivals:—

"Then, Jack, such eyes! Such lips! Eyes so," &c. &c.

I never met with a passage in all the poets that gave me a livelier and softer idea of this charming feature, than a stanza in a homely old writer of our own country. He is relating the cruelty of Queen Eleanor to the Fair Rosamond:

"With that she dash'd her on the lips,
So dyed double red:
Hard was the heart that gave the blow,
Soft were those lips that bled."

Warner's Albion's England, Book viii, chap. 41.

Sir John Suckling, in his taste of an under lip, is not easily to be surpassed:

"Her lips were red, and one was thin
Compared with that was next her chin,
Some bee had stung it newly."

The upper lip, observe, was only comparatively thin. Thin lips become none but shrews or niggards. A rosiness beyond that of the cheeks, and a good-tempered sufficiency and plumpness, are the indispensable requisites of a good mouth. Chaucer, a great judge, is very peremptory in this matter:

"With pregnant lips, and thick to kiss percase]
For lippes thin, not fat, but ever lean,
They serve of naught; they be not worth a bean;
For if the vase be full, there is delight."
The Court of Love.

For the consolation of those who have thin lips, and are not shrews or niggards, I must give it here as my firm opinion, founded on what I have observed, that lips become more or less contracted, in the course of years, in proportion as they are accustomed to express good-humour and generosity, or peevishness and a contracted mind. Remark the effect which a moment of ill-temper or grudgingness has upon the lips, and judge what may be expected from an habitual series of such moments. Remark the reverse, and make a similar judgment. The mouth is the frankest part of the face. It can the least conceal its sensations. We can hide neither ill-temper with it nor good. We may affect what we please; but affectionation will not help us. In a wrong cause, it will only make our observers resent the endeavour to impose upon them. The mouth is the seat of one class of emotions, as the eyes are of another: or rather, it expresses the same emotions but in greater detail, and with a more irrepressible tendency to be in motion. It is the region of smiles and dimples, and of a trembling tenderness; of sharp sorrow, of a full and breathing joy, of candour, of reserve, of a carking care, of a liberal sympathy. The mouth, out of its many sensibilities, may be fancied throwing up one great expression into the eyes; as many lights in a city reflect a broad lustre into the heavens. On the other hand, the eyes may be supposed the chief movers, influencing the smaller details of their companion, as heaven influences earth. The first cause in both is internal and deep-seated.

The more we consider beauty, the more we recognise its dependence on sentiment. The handsomest mouth without expression is no better than a mouth in a drawing-book. An ordinary one, on the other hand, with a great deal of expression, shall become charming. One of the handsomest smiles I ever saw in a man, was that of a celebrated statesman who is reckoned plain. How handsome Mrs Jordan was when she laughed; who, nevertheless, was not a beauty. If we only imagine a laugh full of kindness and enjoyment, or a "little giddy laugh," as Marot calls it,—un petit ris folâtre,—we imagine the mouth handsome as a matter of course: at any rate, for the time. The material obeys the spiritual. Anacreon beautifully describes a lip as "a lip like Persuasion's," and says it calls upon us to kiss it. "Her lips," says Sir Philip Sidney, "though they were kept close with modest silence, yet with a pretty kind of natural swelling, they seemed to invite the guests that looked on them."—Arcadia, Book I. Let me quote another passage from that noble romance, which was written to fill a woman's mind with all beautiful thoughts, and which I never met with a woman that did not like, notwithstanding its faults, and in spite of the critics. "Her tears came dropping down like rain in sunshine; and she not taking heed to wipe the tears, they hung upon her cheeks and lips, as upon cherries, which the dropping tree bedeweth."—Book the Third. Nothing can be more fresh and elegant than this picture.

A mouth should be of good natural dimensions, as well as plump in the lips. When the ancients, among their beauties, make mention of small mouths and lips, they mean small only, as opposed to an excess the other way; a fault very common in the south. The sayings in favour of small mouths, which have been the ruin of so many pretty looks, are very absurd. If there must be an excess either way, it had better be the liberal one. A petty, pursed-up mouth, is fit for nothing but to be left to its self-complacency. Large mouths are oftener found in union with generous dispositions, than very small ones. Beauty should have neither; but a reasonable look of openness and delicacy. It is an elegance in lips, when, instead of making sharp angles at the corner of the mouth, they retain a certain breadth to the very verge, and show the red. The corner then looks painted with a free and liberal pencil.

Beautiful teeth are of a moderate size, even, and white, not a dead white like fish bones, which has something ghastly in it, but ivory or pearly white with an enamel. Bad teeth in a handsome mouth present a contradiction, which is sometimes extremely to be pitied; for a weak or feverish state of body may occasion them. Teeth, not kept as clean as possible, are unpardonable. Ariosto has a celebrated stanza upon a mouth:—

"Sotto quel sta, quasi fra due vallette,
La bocca, sparsa di natio cinabro:
Quivi due filze son di perle elette,
Che chiude ed apre un bello e dolce labro;
Quindi escon le cortesi parolette
Da render molle ogni cor rosso e scabro;

Quivi si forma quel soave riso,
Ch'apre a sua posta in terra il paradiso."

Orlan. Fur. Canto 7.

"Next, as between two little vales appears
The mouth, where spices and vermilion keep:
There lurk the pearls, richer than sultan wears,
Now casketed, now shown, by a sweet lip:
Thence issue the soft words and courteous prayers,
Enough to make a churl for sweetness weep:
And there the smile taketh its rosy rise,
That opens upon earth a paradise."

To the mouth belong not only its own dimples, but those of the face:—

"Le pozzette
Che forma un dolce riso in bella guancia."

Tasso.

"The delicate wells
Which a sweet smile forms in a lovely cheek."

The chin, to be perfect, should be round and delicate, neither advancing nor retreating too much. If it exceed either way, the latter defect is on the side of gentleness. The former anticipates old age. A rounded and gentle prominence is both spirited and beautiful; and is eminently Grecian. It is an elegant countenance (affectation of course apart), where the forehead and eyes have an inclined and over-looking aspect, while the mouth is delicately full and dimpled, and the chin supports it like a cushion, leaning a little upward. A dimple in the chin is almost invariably demanded by the poets, and has a character of grace and tenderness.

NECK AND SHOULDERS. The shoulders in a female ought to be delicately plump, even, and falling without suddenness. Broad shoulders are admired by many. It is difficult not to like them, when handsomely turned. It seems as if "the more of a good, thing the better." At all events, an excess that way may divide opinion, while of the deformity of pinched and mean-looking shoulders there can be no doubt. A good-tempered woman, of the order yclept buxom, not only warrants a pair of expansive shoulders, but bespeaks our approbation of them. Nevertheless, they are undoubtedly a beauty rather on the masculine than feminine side. They belong to manly strength. Achilles had them. Milton gives them to Adam. His

"Hyacinthine locks
Round from his parted forelock manly hung Clustering; but not beneath his shoulders broad."

Fielding takes care to give all his heroes huge calves and Herculean shoulders,—graces, by the way, in which he was himself eminent. Female shoulders ought rather to convey a sentiment of the gentle and acquiescent. They should lean under those of the other sex, as under a protecting shade. Looking at the male and female figure with the eye of a sculptor, our first impression with regard to the one should be, that it is the figure of a noble creature, prompt for action, and with shoulders full of power;—with regard to the other, that it is that of a gentle creature, made to be beloved, and neither active nor powerful, but fruitful:—the mould of humanity. Her greatest breadth ought not to appear to be at the shoulders. The figure should resemble the pear on the tree,—

"Winding gently to the waist."

Of these matters, and of the bosom, it is difficult to speak: but Honi soit qui mal y pense. This article is written neither for the prudish nor the mercenary; but for those who have a genuine love of the beautiful, and can afford to hear of it. It is not the poets and other indulgers in a lively sense of the beautiful, that are deficient in a respect for it; but they who suppose that every lively expression must of necessity contain a feeling of the gross and impertinent. I do not regard these graces, as they pass in succession before me, with the coarse and cunning eye of a rake at a tavern-door. I will venture to say that I am too affectionate and even voluptuous for such a taste; and that the real homage I pay the sex deserves the very best construction of the most amiable women, and will have it:—

"Fathers and husbands, I do claim a right
In all that is called lovely. Take my sight Sooner than my affection from the fair.
No face, no hand, proportion, line, or air
Of Beauty, but the muse hath interest in."

Ben Jonson.

A bosom is most beautiful when it presents none of the extremes which different tastes have demanded for it. Its only excess should be that of health. This is not too likely to occur in a polite state of society. Modern customs and manners too often leave to the imagination the task of furnishing out the proper quantity of beauty, where it might have existed in perfection. And a tender imagination will do so. The only final ruin of a bosom in an affectionate eye, is the want of a good heart. Nor shall the poor beauty which the mother has retained by dint of being no mother, be lovely as the ruin. O Sentiment! Beauty is but the outward and visible sign of thee; and not always there, where thou art most. Thou canst supply her place when she is gone. Thou canst remain, and still make an eye sweet to look into; a bosom beautiful to rest the heart on.

A favourite epithet with the Greek poets, lyrical, epic, and dramatic, is deep-bosomed. Mr Moore, in one of his notes on Anacreon, says, that it literally means full-bosomed. But surely it literally means what it literally says. Full-bosomed might imply a luxuriance every way. Deep-bosomed is spoken in one of those poetical feelings of contrast, which imply rather a dislike of the reverse quality, than an extravagant demand of the one which is praised. If it is to be understood more literally, still the taste is to be vindicated. A Greek meant to say, that he admired a chest truly feminine. It is to be concluded, that he also demanded one left to its natural state, as it appeared among the healthiest and loveliest of his countrywomen; neither compressed, as it was by the fine ladies; nor divided and divorced in that excessive manner, which some have accounted beautiful.* It was certainly nothing contradictory to grace and activity which he demanded.

"Crown me then, I'll play the lyre,
Bacchus, underneath thy shade:
Heap me, heap me, higher and higher; }
And I'll lead a dance of fire,
With a dark, deep-bosom'd maid."

Anacreon, Ode v.

The ladies ought to understand the spirit of epithets like these: for the tight-lacing and other extravagances, of which they are too justly accused, originated in a desire, not to make the waist so preposterously small as they do make it, but to convey to their admirers a general sense of the beauty of smallness in that particular, and their own consciousness of the grace of it.

Rosy-bosom'd is another epithet in the Greek taste. Milton speaks in 'Comus' of "The Graces and the rosy-bosom'd Hours." —

Virgil says of Venus,

— "She said,
And turn'd, refulgent with a rosy neck."†

* See an epigram in the Greek Anthology, beginning
"Ἐκραινε χεῖλη μὴ ῥοδερύα, ποικιλομύθη."

† "Dixit; et avertens, rosea cervicis refulsit."

"O'er her warm neck and rising bosom move
The bloom of young Desire, and purple light of Love;" — Gray.

which is a couplet made up of this passage in Virgil and another. Virgil follows the Greeks, and the Greeks followed Nature. All this bloom and rosy refulgence, which are phrases of the poets, mean nothing more than that healthy colour which ought to appear in the finest skin. See the next section of this paper, upon Hands and Arms.

A writer in the Anthology makes use of the pretty epithet, "vernal-bosom'd." The most delicate painting of a vernal bosom is in Spenser:

"And in her hand a sharp boar-spear she held,
And at her back a bow and quiver gay
Stuft with steel-headed darts, wherewith she quell'd
The salvage beasts in her victorious play,
Knit with a golden bauldrick, which forelay
Athwart her snowy breast, and did divide
Her dainty paps; which, like young fruit in May,
Now little gan to swell; and being tied,
Through their thin weeds their places only signified."

Dryden copies after Spenser, but not with such refinement. His passage, however, is so beautiful, and has a gentleness and movement so much to the purpose, that I cannot resist the pleasure of quoting it. He is describing Boccaccio's heroine in the story of 'Cymon and Iphigenia':—

"By chance conducted, or by thirst constrain'd,
The deep recesses of the grove he gain'd;
Where, in a plain defended by the wood,
Crept through the matted grass a crystal flood,
By which an alabaster fountain stood:
And on the margin of the fount was laid
Attended by her slaves, a sleeping maid;
Like Dian and her nymphs, when, tired with sport,
To rest by cool Eurotas they resort.
The dame herself the goddess well express'd,
Not more distinguish'd by her purple vest,
Than by the charming features of her face,
And e'en in slumber a superior grace.
Her comely limbs compos'd with decent care,
Her body shaded with a slight cymar,
Her bosom to the view was only bare;
Where two beginning paps were scarcely spied,
For yet their places were but signified.
The fanning wind upon her bosom blows;
To meet the fanning wind the bosom rose;
The fanning wind, and purling streams, continue her repose."

This beautiful conclusion, with its repetitions, its play to and fro, and the long continuous line with which it terminates, is delightfully soft and characteristic. The beauty of the sleeper and of the landscape mingle with one another. The wind and the bosom are gentle challengers.

"Each softer seems than each, and each than each seems smoother."

Spenser's Britain's Ida.

Even the turn of the last triplet is imitated from Spenser.—See the divine passage of the concert in the 'Bower of Bliss, Faery Queen,' book ii, canto 12, stanza 71. "The sage and serious Spenser," as Milton called him, is a great master of the beautiful in all its branches. He also knew, as well as any poet, how to help himself to beauty out of others. The former passage imitated by Dryden was, perhaps, suggested by one in Boccaccio.† The simile of "young fruit in May" is undoubtedly from Ariosto.

"Bianca neve è il bel collo, e 'l petto latte;
Il collo tondo, il petto colmo e largo:
Due pome acerbe, e pur d'avorio fatte,
Vengono e van, come onda al primo margo,
Quando piacevole aura il mar combatte."

Oriani. Fur. Canto 7.

"Her bosom is like milk, her neck like snow;
A rounded neck; a bosom, where you see
Two crisp young ivory apples come and go,
Like waves that on the shore beat tenderly,
When a sweet air is ruffling to and fro."

* Ἐπαρομοίωσις.

† 'L'Ariosto,' as above, p. 81, 33.

But Ariosto has been also to Boccaccio, and he to Theocritus; in whom, I believe, this fruitful metaphor is first to be met with. It is very suitable to his shepherds, living among the bowers of Sicily.—See 'Idyl' xxvii, v. 49. Sir Philip Sidney has repeated it in the 'Arcadia.' But poets in all ages have drawn similar metaphors from the gardens. 'Solomon's Song' abounds in them. There is a hidden analogy, more than poetical, among all the beauties of Nature.

I quit this tender ground, prepared to think very ill of any person who thinks I have said too much of it. Its beauty would not allow me to say less; but not the less do I "with reverence deem" of those resting-places for the head of love and sorrow—

"Those dainties made to still an infant's cries."

LODORÉ.

THE NEW NOVEL BY MRS SHELLEY.

We congratulate Mrs Shelley on the appearance of this her latest and most agreeable work. It has not the inventive genius of 'Frankenstein.' That is a thing to happen only once in many years. But then it is not mixed up, like that work, with matter of doubtful attraction; neither has it the uneasiness of her subsequent novels, either in story or style. Her spirits appear not to have been well settled when she wrote those novels, and, from not being perhaps quite in earnest, her style was overwrought. Nothing can be more agreeable, yet forcible, than the language of the production before us. Mrs Shelley has a decided ear for the musical in writing. Even the name of her work, we suspect, was selected merely from its noble and harmonious sound; for it has nothing to do with its namesake the lake, though the "falls" of Lodoré are something analogous to her hero's grand and impetuous spirit, and his proneness to mingle with his mother earth. There is a good deal of pain and sorrow in the book, as will be guessed by this allusion to the principal character; but then it is relieved, as life is, by charming contrasts of pleasure, and patience, and contentment; the most painful of the characters, not being fools, grow better and kinder as they grow older; and above all, though everybody does not end happily, yet the book itself does; and the salutary impression is left upon the reader, that effort is not in vain, nor life a thing ignoble and cheerless. Furthermore, the work has more unexpected yet natural turns of incident than any we have seen for a long time; we read it, without intermission, and with gratified curiosity, at what might be called one sitting, making allowance for a night's rest, and awoke next morning, like the Sultan, anxious to hear how the lady "continued." It is interesting to see Mrs Shelley quote her husband so often at the top of her chapters; and though her characters are laid in high life, and she makes the best of the conventionalities, yet she sympathises with the truly great world throughout, not merely the little great world of St James's. She has even ventured, in the spirit of the novelists of the last century, to put her favourite hero and heroine, a married couple, into a lock-up house, which, with the beautiful self-sufficiency of youth and love, and in spite of frightful cares, they convert into a pro tempore bower of bliss. We only think she has done Lady Mary Wortley a little too much honour in quoting her on the occasion; for though "champagne and a chicken" are very good things, and "lips though rosy (as the poet says) must still be fed," yet Mrs Shelley's lovers, true to nature as they are, are truer also to sentiment than any which Lady Mary ever fancied or could comprehend; and would hardly have enumerated such things as part of the climax of a happy meeting. It is curious, by the way, how capitally well the two cousins jumped together in that particular,—Lady Mary and Fielding;—for he was her kinsman, and is mightily fond of making his lovers eat and drink. We are not sure whether the verses in which she speaks of meeting were not addressed to him. Or was it to Congreve? another gentleman, not overburdened with the sentimental?

“— With champagne and a chicken at last”

Next week we shall give our extracts.

PAPAL AUTHORIZATION OF A PROTESTANT CHAPEL AT ROME.

[THE Reader is aware that nothing controversial is admitted into the pages of the LONDON JOURNAL; but the principle of excluding discord is the one above all others which should throw open our columns to any remarkable instance of the advancement of knowledge and charity; and we accordingly extract from a late publication the following account of the rise and establishment of the Protestant English Church at Rome. It constitutes the Preface to a learned and interesting volume, intitled ‘Lectures on the Insufficiency of Unrevealed Religion, &c., by the Rev. Richard Burgess, the chaplain to the English Protestants in that city;’ and presents, in the very best and most fitting spirit on the part of the benevolent author, the novel, delightful, and most promising spectacle of a Protestant church permitted, nay, directly authorized, by the Papal sovereign, and distributing its charities alike to Protestant, Papist, and Jew. If this is not a truly Christian spectacle, we know not what is. It is a gentle and unpretending, but on that very account a striking set-off to the unhappy attempts which some persons are making to excite a new life in the embers of old hostilities; and we have a very special pleasure in forwarding the publicity of it for that reason:—]

THE existence (says Mr Burgess) of a Protestant chapel at Rome, where the service of the Church of England is regularly performed during six months of the year, is of itself a circumstance worthy of attention; for, whether it be viewed as a striking instance of religious toleration, coming in an unexpected direction, or as the means of softening those prejudices which the comprehensive term of heretic conveys to the vulgar, it cannot fail to be an object of interest to everyone who espouses the cause of civil and religious liberty. The institution is already known to a considerable number of British subjects, who will know how to appreciate the concession which prepared for them the privilege of joining in the public worship of the Church of England at Rome; but it is far from being generally understood that such an act of liberality has proceeded from the council of the Vatican. The author thinks, that every example of religious toleration, come from what quarter it may, is an accession to the cause of truth; and, if there be any merit in those who have overcome prejudice, or who have even made their policy conformable to means which may enable others so to do, it is due to them to acknowledge and commend such liberality in the face of civilized society; for religious toleration, not otherwise than mercy, “is twice blessed:” it blesses those that give, and those that take. If it be necessary to declare a motive for the publication of the following Lectures, which were not originally intended for the press, the author had rather such motive were discovered in the sentiments he has just expressed, than in any opinion he might be supposed to have of the merits of his composition; for the only thing remarkable he has to offer in his Lectures is, that they were delivered in a Protestant assembly at Rome. It might have been thought too gratuitous in the author to have put forth any statement of the following nature without some additional inducement, but as an introduction to these Lectures, it will hardly appear superfluous—perhaps it is necessary.

The English chapel may now be considered as having the sanction of the Papal government, although no official grant has yet been made which would ever acknowledge its existence.

As early as the winter of 1816-7, English families began to reside in Rome, in sufficient numbers to require “an house” for public worship: considerable difficulty was then experienced in procuring an apartment to be dedicated to such a purpose: the object was new, alarming, and contrary to the existing laws; but at length, through the influence of Signor Luigi Chiaveri, to whom the English have often been indebted for his kind offices in this respect, a private room was obtained, near the column of Trajan: and thus began the service of the reformed Church of England in the “Holy City!” The duties were discharged by any clergyman who, happening to be present, had the zeal to offer his gratuitous services: the necessary expenses were defrayed by the voluntary contributions of the congregation, and the slender funds administered by the kindness of Lieutenant-General Ramsey.

As no permission had been obtained from the authorities (for such a demand must necessarily have been met by a refusal), the new “conventicle” owed its existence intirely to the forbearance of the government. But it was not clear whether such mildness might not soon have to yield to the more austere interpreters of the law, and it is said, that the attention of a high dignitary, attracted by the concourse of vehicles during divine service, had nearly proved fatal. There can indeed be no doubt that some representation was formally made of the illegality and danger of permitting such an unheard-of assembly, and a word from the Vatican at that moment might have dissolved the elements of it without doing much violence to the opinion of any one. The enlightened and liberal Gonsalvi, however, perceiving that the English were at Rome in the nineteenth century, and Catholic Ireland still laboured under civil disabilities, would know nothing of an illegal assembly in the Forum of Trajan, and that assembly duly appreciated his liberality.

It is not to be supposed there was any intention, on the part of the civil authorities, to introduce the principle of religious toleration into the city of Rome: such a supposition would be little less than an impeachment of the minister: nor did the appearance of a new kind of worship work wonders in the sentiments of the listless multitude; but it had the effect of making some of them suspect that heresy, according to the definition they had heard of it, might not be altogether synonymous with infidelity, and the very circumstance of choosing a “festival” (Sunday) for the day of worship, showed at least some traces of church authority. It was soon discovered by the most intelligent of the lower orders, to which, of course, these remarks apply, that the English had a sort of mass of their own, and the solemnity observable in their manner of attending to it was archly compared with the careless genuflections of the Roman Signori. In this manner the forbearance of the government was transfused into the minds of such of the populace as thought at all on the subject: it was not provided that it should be so; it was a natural consequence. During the first two or three seasons, such may be considered to have been the secret moral influence of the English congregation; and the most zealous guardians of pontifical authority had nothing to fear, and, it is to be hoped never will have, from any overt acts of proselytism on the part of the officiating ministers. The protection afforded to the new congregation, although but a negative one, had been hitherto sufficient for all practical purposes; but it was still equivocal, and when the old apartment could no longer be procured, it was not possible to induce a private individual to incur the responsibility of becoming the new landlord; the displeasure of the authorities might be incurred. There was something, which still required explanation, a public assembly of this nature, in the house of a Roman citizen, might cause him to be placed at the bar of the Inquisition; at the same time a semi-official intimidation was given, that great caution and privacy should be observed by the English in the exercise of their privilege; it would, however, have required a very vigorous execution of the law to prevent a foreigner, who had already his “own hired house,” from inviting his countrymen to a private assembly: and under this form (it must be confessed a pretext) divine service was celebrated in a commodious room in the Vicolo degli Avignonesi, situated near the site of the ancient circus of Flora! Thus did the Protestant congregation migrate from Trajan’s Forum to the opposite declivity of the Quirinal Hill. The privacy suggested by the secretary of state was, perhaps, the best method of co-operating with his benevolent intentions; a motive less dignified may not be imputed to the virtuous mind of Pope Pius VII. At that period it would not have been difficult to outrage the feelings of many devout plebeians by an over-ready sanction of the nonconformity. Evident marks of pious indignation had been more than once observed in the populace at the sight of the Protestant bier; and although the more enlightened portion of the community were far from joining in this display of superstition, it shows that, if a less liberal policy with regard to the English worship had been adopted by the Government, it would not have been at variance with the then popular feeling: that it was not adopted, does honour to the memory of Pius VII and his minister. But ten years have been sufficient to change that feeling as much in favour of the institution, as ever it could be against the precarious assembly: and it is now perhaps regarded by that same populace as the surest pledge of those advantages which they expect to reap from the presence of the English.

In the Autumn of the year 1822, the author first took a share in endeavouring to promote the welfare of the establishment. It was his good fortune to meet on that occasion with a reverend person, now, alas, no more! but whose name is intitled to hold the chief place in this narration. Whatever benefit may finally result from the Institution in question (and it is only intended to speak here of that benefit which consists in a mutual removal of religious strife and prejudice, in which Rome will surely be the gainer), the name of the Rev. Joseph Cooke, is continually to be kept in remembrance. By his zeal, tempered with discretion and judgment, and by his exertions (in which the author of the following Lectures took but a small part), two essential steps were taken and secured: first, an apartment was hired, avowedly for the celebration of Divine Service; and, secondly, the connivance of the authorities was made equivalent to a sanction. The English worship then first assumed the nature of an establishment: it was held in the Corea Palace, situated in the Via Pontifce, close to the Mausoleum of Augustus. The number of winter residents had now greatly augmented, the congregation consisting of not less than 200 persons, and the assemblage of equipages could not fail to attract the attention of the public.

* This word must not be allowed to convey to the reader any false notions. The inquisition at Rome (although contrary in principle to all our ideas of religious liberty) is, at this time, a mild tribunal in its administration; some cases of injustice there must necessarily be, but it is of no use to deal in misrepresentation.

† Mr Cooke (late fellow of Christ’s College, Cambridge,) was a man of great literary accomplishments, mingled with solid piety, and devotion to his profession. His ardent pursuit of knowledge led him to undertake a journey into the East, in 1825, and he appears to have sunk under the fatigue of it; he died suddenly whilst sitting upon his dromedary, in a mountain-pass, called Ras Wady Hebran, about half-way between the Convent of St Catherine and Tor, five miles north of Mount Serbal. He was interred by a Greek Pasha, in consecrated ground, near the Twelve Wells of Elim and the Palm Grove. May this tribute of respect for the memory of a good man survive the fleeting pages which contain it!

It was not long before a cry of alarm was raised amidst these proceedings, and the infant institution again trembled for its existence. The officiating ministers were accused of intemperate zeal, a conference was held with an influential personage, and a positive interference of the executive power was now apprehended. This led to the formation of a committee, to be called upon in case of necessity, to act in the name and in behalf of the English residents; there being no diplomatic minister at the court of Rome. But the policy and good sense of Cardinal Gonsalvi were proof against all weak remonstrances, and it was at length intimated to the officiating ministers, that no obstacle would be offered to their temperate proceedings. Encouraged by this protection, Mr Cooke, by means of a public subscription, procured the necessary appendages for a place of worship: the church books could only be obtained through the kindness of Mr Hamilton, British minister at Naples; a beadle was also appointed, with authority to collect the subscriptions, and thus the winter of 1822-3 may be regarded as the commencement of the institution.

The attention of the Protestants resident at Rome had already been directed to the waste-ground allotted for burying their dead. Beyond the Aventine Mount, and under the walls of the city within, stood a few scattered tomb-stones exposed to the trampling of cattle grazing in the Preta del Popolo, and to the still greater injury of human footsteps. Decency seemed to require that the graves which had just grown green should be secured from further encroachment, and that the few monuments should not be allowed to fall into ruins. A subscription to a considerable amount was collected, for the purpose of carrying the design into effect; but, upon application to the competent authorities, it was alleged, that a wall would obstruct the view of the pyramid of Caius Cestius; and that the trees, which the friends of the deceased loved to plant round the tombs, had already begun the mischief. This answer being received, and no further hopes of success held out, the money subscribed was returned to the original donors, and the circumstance made an unfavourable impression abroad, of the toleration of the Papal Government. In a discussion of the Catholic claims, in the House of Lords, a noble lord, an opposer of those claims, was not slow to cite this as a remarkable instance of Roman Catholic intolerance. It is not clear that it was so; but the act of toleration in permitting the English service, which was evident, ought not to have been passed over in silence: it, perhaps, might not have been known. The discussion in the British Senate was not, however, unheeded in the Vatican council; for, during that very summer, and intirely at the expense of the "Apostolic Chamber," a sunk fence was dug round the old burial-place; another eligible spot of ground beyond the Pyramid was surrounded by a solid wall, and henceforth assigned for the Protestants cemetery. It only remained to secure and build up the sunk fence, for which work permission was now readily obtained, and the year following, the English, in conjunction with the German Protestants, not only secured the old burial-ground, but also raised a fund of a thousand dollars, which yields annually a sum sufficient to keep the whole in repair, and procure the services of a sexton. "The Senate and the Roman people" have a prescriptive right over all that ground about the Monte Testaccio, called the Prata del Popolo; a fee of about two pounds is, therefore, demanded for every interment which takes place. No one will be inclined to consider this extravagant; but the fine (amounting to an equal sum) which is paid into the criminal court of the Cardinal Vicar, awakens a different feeling, and will, no doubt, be abolished, whenever the government of Rome shall have leisure to attend to minor abuses. In the meantime, the cemetery is placed under the protection of the Prussian minister; and those who have to lament the loss of friends interred under the walls of Rome, may at least have this poor consolation, that their bones repose in a becoming security, and their monuments excite a sympathetic sigh in the breast of many a northern pilgrim!

In the year following the grant of the new burial-ground, the author had the great satisfaction of again co-operating with Mr Cooke, in the service of the chapel: it was found impracticable to secure the same apartments for a second season, the apprehension of giving offence to the ecclesiastical authorities having not yet been done away. The excellent Pius VII was now no more, and Leo XII had only appeared as a disciplinarian. After the two first Sundays of the season, the term in the Corea Palace expired, and the congregation of 1823-4, seemed to be dispossessed of all its former privileges. But the precedent having been established, should another situation be to be found in any part of Rome, it could not be thought a more rash experiment than the former had been, were it put in the same requisition. After some difficulty, two commodious rooms were procured in the Via Rasella, a street which lies nearly under the garden-wall of the Quirinal Palace, the occasional residence of the Pope. The adopting of this situation will appear nothing extraordinary to those who are acquainted with Rome: and if the new government had been capable of taking offence at a meeting of heretics, because it had approached so near the precincts of the Papal gardens, it would equally have discovered the blemish upon the "holy city" in a more remote "rione;" but Leo XII, whose wisdom as a sovereign has been too little appreciated, and his piety too much disparaged, reasoned like a statesman. "It is much better," said the Holy Father, "to permit the continuance of this assembly; for, if it be prohibited, the English cannot be prevented from meeting in small numbers at their own private abodes, and thus, instead of one such congregation, we shall have twenty." It had not, probably, escaped the notice of Leo XII, that the English chapel had not yet shared in those wholesome regulations which were introduced by him, for preserving the internal order of the city. The weekly assemblage of carriages at a stated time and place, could not fail to attract the curiosity of the Roman people, which the presence of a police-officer might easily restrain. Without any application on the part of the officiating clergyman, and without any previous intimation from any quarter, Mr Cooke and the author were not more surprised than rejoiced to find, upon arriving to perform the morning service, two sentinels stationed at the chapel door. The carriages had all disappeared from their usual rendezvous, in consequence of a general order of the police: a more than common silence pervading the neighbourhood of the Via Rasella, it was now evident the authorities had at length interfered; but they interfered for the protection of the English congregation. To Pope Leo XII then they are indebted for this great privilege, which may be said to have thus received his sanction in January 1824. Thus encouraged, and being assured from a private communication, that it was the intention of the government to allow the English the free exercise of their worship, the officiating ministers now performed Divine service in their canonical robes. The propriety of making some suitable return for this privilege was next suggested, and hence the origin of the charitable fund, which will be mentioned in the sequel.

The spiritual duties of the chapel were gratuitously discharged, and all clergymen of the Established Church, who happened to be Rome, were invited to contribute their services: the rent of the apartment and incidental expenses were supplied by voluntary subscription, the administration of which fund gradually became the business of the committee, which had been originally formed for the purposes before-mentioned. The author cannot let pass this opportunity of acknowledging the important and continued exertions of the Marquis of Northampton, and the laudable services of Dr James Clarke, (author of the 'Influence of Climate,' &c.) during his long residence in Rome.

The number of British travellers in Italy increased so greatly, that the rooms in the Via Rasella were far from being sufficiently large for the Protestant Anglo-Roman congregation, nor was their site one of the most convenient. Accordingly, in the year 1824-5, the committee exerted itself to find a place at once more appropriate and more permanent: it was desirable to fix the wandering congregation, which had now almost made the circuit of the Campus Martius. During the first few weeks of the season, the anxiety of former years was renewed; but at length, after diligent inquiry, the capacity of a chapel was discovered in a large granary near the Porta del Popolo: it became expedient to have a lease of a building which must needs be fitted up at a considerable expense, before it could answer the purpose. The income, however, necessary for defraying the yearly rent, depending on the contingency of future congregations, there were no funds to answer any engagement beyond the year. The committee was relieved from this embarrassment by the generous and patriotic offer of a distinguished statesman, who guaranteed the payment of the rent for three years in case of the English ceasing, from any unforeseen cause, during that period, to resort to Rome. The institution was not less indebted on that occasion to the professional services of the Rev. J. Hugh Rose.

It has been supposed by many, that the chapel was removed without the walls of the city at the instance of the civil authorities, which is an erroneous notion, and ought in justice to be corrected. The government approved of the situation, but the committee were not controlled in choice of it. Indeed, it would have been hardly possible to have procured, within the city walls, a room sufficiently commodious, and in every other respect so convenient for the large congregation, which is now to be seen in the English chapel, upon which, at different periods, not less than a sum of 250*l.* has been expended in bringing it to its present form. The author has witnessed as many as five hundred and fifty persons within its walls; and those who have seen it since the year 1829, will agree that there is nothing wanting in it for all the purposes of a Church of England congregation.

During the two succeeding winters the duties of the chapel were discharged, as before, by the gratuitous services of clergymen casually resident at Rome; but, in the year 1827, the committee decided to ensure the performance of the regular duty by erecting it into a chaplaincy, their finances enabling them to offer a salary of 100*l.* per annum.

In considering the happy influence gradually effected in the minds of the common people by the growth of this institution, the charitable fund already alluded to is an important feature. It consisted at first of the alms collected at the holy communion, which, in the former seasons, amounted to a comparatively small sum. In Mr Cooke's first year, the sum total was about 150 dollars; it increased every succeeding season, together with the number of communicants, until it reached, in the year 1826 and 1827, the sum of 100*l.* Cases of distressed British subjects being very rare at Rome, the whole of this fund was applied to the relief of the Italian paupers; in 1827 and 1828 it grew into still greater importance.

The number of applicants, as may be easily imagined, was by far too heavy for the funds: about 200 names were already inscribed in the list, which reduced the monthly relief to a very small pittance, so that, without either diminishing the number of pensioners, or increasing the funds for a more generous relief of the whole, the charity was in danger of promoting mendicancy, rather than adapted to the effectual succour of the deserving indigent, and the encouragement of honest industry. It was only necessary to make the circumstances known to decide upon the alternative. The chaplain had recourse to the means of a charity sermon,* which was preached on the 30th of March 1828, and was the cause of nearly 120*l.* being added to the stock. The alms collected at the altar were proportionally increased, so that in the course of this season about 1200 dollars (270*l.*) were distributed in monthly relief: and this, independently of private donations, in some special cases, which did not appear upon the charity books. The rumour of English munificence now ran through the habitations of misery, the Parish priests were assailed for their official signatures to the numerous petitions, which set forth, in all the varied eloquence of the Italian language, the miseries of poverty and disease. The successful candidates extolled too highly the "almsgiving nation," and gave the less fortunate false notions of its eleemosynary deeds. The rule to be observed by the administrators of the funds was simple. It was to calculate how many families might be effectually relieved during the winter months, and then make the selection from such recommendations and knowledge of the cases, as made out the best title to their consideration, the names already on the list having of course the first claim to investigation; but since written recommendations were sometimes too easily procured, the chaplain, whose business it had now become to dispense the charity of his congregation, could hardly discharge the duty conscientiously without a personal verification of the varied pretensions; to accomplish which task it was necessary to visit one hundred and fifty abodes of poverty. In this manner the charity books were made conformable to the increased resources, and, by a careful distribution, the whole was adequate to the relief of about two hundred and thirty families. This may suffice, without entering into "the annals of the poor," or the affecting narratives of decayed nobility, to give the reader an idea of the nature and extent of British charity at Rome. Let him not say that it "begins at home;" for this will not add one gift more to the domestic "treasury," and it might take one from the "poveri vergognosi:" let him lament (if it seems reasonable) the temporary absence of his fellow-citizens; but if the Samaritan does "journey in the wilderness," it is better not to imitate the priest and the Levite: and if it be expedient for a strange community, enjoying the advantages of a foreign country, and receiving the hospitable protection of its government, to make any return, there can be none more suitable than when partaking of the local privileges, to share proportionally the burden of alleviating the local distresses.

In the year 1828-9, the sum-total of the charity-fund fell a little short of the preceding year, and since that period it has, from unavoidable circumstances, decreased, nor can it ever be expected to exceed the year of the first charity sermon, if even it ever reaches an equal amount. But it has already procured the only recompense which was at all desirable for a Protestant congregation—a number of grateful souls have come to the conclusion, that the English must really be Christians; nor is it one of the least remarkable things, that the Jews should be admitted to a share of this charity. A learned rabbi, encouraged by the impartial benevolence of the English congregation, represented to the author the misery and poverty of the Ghetto, and wondered whether the despised Jews could ever find a drop of pity in the breast of a Christian. Upon being told, that in the dispensing of the English charity there was no distinction of persons, and that the superior claim only came from the greater weight of misery, the Israelite rejoiced, and considered the sum of five pounds given during the week of the Passover as an ample confirmation of "the good report:" this was repeated in subsequent years, and the English bounty was dispensed, in unleavened bread, through the squalid habitations of this unprivileged people.

If the incidents here related appear trifling, the result is at least extraordinary—a Protestant cemetery, a Church of England service, and a charitable fund, dispensed at a reformed altar, to the devoted subjects of the "Sovereign Pontiff."

Those who are curious about the signs of the times, will easily admit these into the number; but the philosophical reader, who has contemplated the spirit of a Hildebrand, or even the precocious tolerance of a Ganganelli, will rather see in it this maxim, that neither kings nor priests have power against the general opinion of mankind: concession to that opinion may be mere expediency, whilst the principle of opposition to it remains the same; but such expediency is, in matters of state-policy, wisdom; and, in religion, becomes—toleration. The object of this memoir is to acknowledge the latter in four successive Pontiffs of Rome. Under these impressions, the author will not run the risk of offending either Rome or her "partisans." He will only express a hope, that the emulation which has been excited in the vicinity of the English congregation may never go beyond the only legitimate means of opposition, viz. argument and persuasion: nor will it, on the other hand, ever be expected to restrain the weaker portion of a community from gratifying an innocent curiosity.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXIX.—THE BATTLE FOR THE BRIDES.

[This is the story upon which Mr Rogers has founded one of the elegant narratives in his volume of 'Italy.' War never looked more amiable. It is Mars with a bunch of lilies in his hand. We take it from two agreeable, and, let us add, most pleasantly portable volumes (no mean comfort to one who reads much), intitled 'Sketches from Venetian History,' published by Murray, and containing, among other illustrations, an interesting bird's-eye view of the most extraordinary of cities.]

Under Candiano II (Doge of Venice in the tenth century), occurred one of those events which vividly depict the manners of the age to which they belong; and which, though affecting individuals rather than a nation, excite, nevertheless, very powerful interest, and almost connect History with Romance. According to an ancient usage, the marriages among the chief families of Venice were celebrated publicly. The same day and the same hour witnessed the union of numerous betrothed; and the eve of the Feast of the Purification, on the return of which the Republic gave portions to twelve young maidens, was the reason of this joyous anniversary. It was to Olivolo, the residence of the Patriarch, on the extreme verge of the city, that the ornamented gondolas repaired on this happy morning. There, hailed by music and the gratulations of their assembled kindred, the lovers disembarked; and the festive pomp—swelled by a long train of friends, richly clad, and bearing with them, in proud display, the jewels and nuptial presents of the brides—proceeded to the cathedral. The pirates of Istria had long marked this peaceful show, as affording a rich promise of booty; for, at the time of which we are writing, the Arsenal and its surrounding mansions were not yet in existence. Olivolo was untenanted, except by priests; and its neighbourhood was intirely without inhabitants. In these deserted spots, the corsairs laid their ambush the night before the ceremony; and while the unarmed and unsuspecting citizens were yet engaged in the marriage rites before the altar, a rude and ferocious troop burst the gates of the cathedral. Not content with seizing the costly ornaments which became their prize, they tore away also the weeping and heart-broken brides, and hurried them to their vessels. The Doge had honoured the festival with his presence, and, deeply touched by the rage and despair of the disappointed bridegrooms, he summoned the citizens to arms. Hastily assembling such galleys as were in the harbour, they profited by a favourable wind, and overtook the ravishers before they were extricated from the Laquore of Caorlo. Candiano led the attack, and such was its fury, that not a single Istriote escaped the death which he merited. The maidens were brought back in triumph; and, on the evening of the same day, the interrupted rites were solemnized with joy, no doubt much heightened by a remembrance of the peril which had so well nigh prevented their completion. The memory of this singular event was kept alive by an annual procession of Venetian women on the Eve of the Purification, and by a solemn visit paid by the Doge to the church of Santa Maria Formosa. The trunk-makers (carsellari) of the island on which the above-named church stands, composed the greater part of the crew hastily collected on this occasion; and Candiano, as a reward for their bravery, asked them to demand some privilege. They requested this annual visit to their island.

"What," said the Prince, "if the day should prove rainy?"

"We will send you hats to cover your heads; and if you are thirsty, we will give you drink."

To commemorate this question and reply, the Priest of Santa Maria was used to offer to the Doge, on landing, two flasks of malmsey, two oranges, and two hats, adorned with his own armorial bearings, those of the Pope, and those of the Doge. The Marian Games (La Festa delle Marie), of which this andata formed part, and which lasted for six days, continued to be celebrated until they were interrupted by the public distress during the war of Chiocchia. They were renewed, two hundred years afterwards, with yet greater pomp; but of the time at which they fell into total disuse we are unable to speak.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

FILIPPO MARIA VISCONTI, DUKE OF MILAN.

[FROM the same source as our 'Romance' of the present week. Perhaps we ought to apologize for putting such a being among our 'Eminent Men;' but eminent he was, in the literal sense of the word, and counted wise, too, as far as a bad-blooded and unhappy man could be so; and the account of him is very curious.]

THE personal habits of this last Duke of the house of Visconti (who died in 1447) have been drawn with singular minuteness, by one accurately qualified for the task, Pietro Candido Decembrio, a son of the private Secretary of Giovanni Galeazzo, and who himself filled more than one high office in the court of Filippo Maria. The character which he has described, presents an odious mixture of cunning, superstition, and cowardice; paralleled, in many instances, by one whose biography has been almost as closely recorded, the detestable Louis XI of France.

The person of Filippo Maria was most forbidding, and extreme meagreness in youth was succeeded, as life advanced, by a more than proportionate obesity. His eyes were large, fiery and piercing, ever wandering with a restless glare, as if unable or unwilling to continue long fixed in repose on a single object. From weakness in his legs, he always employed a stick, and, during his whole reign, no one ever saw him walking without the support of an attendant. Although choice in the richness and fashion of his clothes, he was negligent, even to uncleanness, in the processes of shaving and combing. In other persons he abhorred any splendour of attire, and forbade those who used it from approaching his presence: insomuch, that when, on one occasion, Amadeus, a Piedmontese Prince, connected with him by marriage, presented himself at an audience, in a fantastic mode borrowed from the French, and at that time very prevalent among personages of distinction, the Duke of Milan ordered his Forester to bring up some hounds strapped in those doublets which were worn for protection in the wild boar chase, and pointed in derision to the leathern-girt dogs as fitting mates for his tightly apparelled visitor. In his diet he was most whimsical: turnips and quails were among his chief luxuries; yet, such was his detestation of fat, that every morsel of it was carefully pared away from the latter before they were dressed. But the livers of all animals formed his choicest dainty, and his cook was frequently summoned in the dead of night to kill a calf and prepare that favourite repast. The fowls destined for his table were generally plucked in his presence. His chief amusements were field-sports, and so retentive was his memory on subjects connected with the kennel and the stable, that he could tell the breed of a puppy but once seen, and knew accurately the number of bridles which he ought to find in his harness room. Many of his dogs were imported from Britain; yet, however passionately fond he might be of them and of his horses, to each he was a capricious and, sometimes, a cruel master: thus, if a hound committed a fault, he would dismount and flog him savagely with his own hand; if a horse neighed unseasonably, he would mutilate his tongue; and if the poor animal champed the bit, he would pull out his teeth. Within doors he occasionally employed himself in reading, for all the Visconti cultivated literature; and he had the good taste to prefer Livy, Dante, and Petrarch to most other writers. Yet not a few of his leisure hours were devoted to the inspection, perhaps to the actual management, of a puppet-show, upon which toy he had expended the great sum of 1,500 pieces of gold.

For the most part, however, he lived in close seclusion; and even his pages underwent a long discipline of tuition to qualify them for the moroseness and asceticism of their future master. They were separated from their families during two years, and exercised in silence and solitude under fitting governors, till they became accustomed to the melancholy court which they were about to enter. Clinging strongly to life, and contemplating its termination with alarm, Filippo Maria daily recounted to his physicians, with the minutest particularity, all circumstances affecting his health, listened with trembling anxiety to their reports in answer, and yielded implicit obedience even to their most frivolous prescriptions. All conversation which might bring death to mind was carefully avoided in his presence; and if the discourse at any time happened to involve any allusion to mortality, he shrank from it with manifest uneasiness. Even when bodily infirmity increased upon him, and when in his latter years he was afflicted with almost total blindness, so unwilling was he to expose that defect to observation, that his attendants were instructed to warn him secretly of all objects or persons near at hand, so that he might not inadvertently betray his want of sight. If he walked abroad, he appeared absorbed in incessant devotion, repeating prayers in a low voice, and counting them on his fingers; insomuch, that religion seemed with him not an acknowledgment of God's goodness, but a laborious propitiation of the divine wrath; and whenever his daily sum of prayer was in any part forgotten or curtailed, he endeavoured to compound for the omission by a proportionate excess of almsgiving, prompted not by charity, but by terror. His sleep was so uncertain and disturbed, that he frequently changed his couch thrice in the course of a single night, lying not in the ordinary manner lengthwise, but across it; or he rose and paced his chamber for many hours successively, with some of the attendants, who always watched in an ante-room. If his dreams had been evil, he prayed in tones scarcely audible, turning, at intervals, to each of the four cardinal points; and in order that the silence which he dreaded in his dark hours of sleeplessness might be broken, many night-birds were confined in the palace courts, whose screams were more grateful to his ears than uninterrupted stillness. A belief in judicial astrology was prevalent in his times, and he may be forgiven for addiction to a folly by which even the wise have been enslaved. It but little, therefore, surprises us to hear that he was a rigid Fatalist; that during conjunction, opposition, sextile, square and trine, he shut himself up in his cabinet, and denied audience even to his ministers; that he struck a golden medal, impressed with planetary chaacters, as a talisman against lightning; that he raised a double wall in his bed-chamber to protect himself against thunder; and that, during storms, he fell prostrate in a remote corner before an image of Santa Barbara. In those points he but shared superstitions common to his age; but we regard with equal astonishment, contempt, and pity, a Prince who thought it unlucky if he fastened his right shoe on his left foot; who on Friday dreaded the encounter of persons who were unshorn, and forbore on the same day from handling any bird, especially a quail; who would not mount a horse on the Feast of John the Baptist, nor wear any suit but green on the 1st of May; and who refused to eat on one occasion, till the dishes had been removed and replaced, because the sewer, while decking the table, had unwittingly approached it with the wrong foot foremost. Such, however, were a few of the anilities recorded of one who has been esteemed the most politic sovereign of his time; and who, if the wisdom of kings is to be graduated by no other scale than that of the mastery which they attain of simulation and dissimulation, abundantly merited the unenviable distinction which he coveted and enjoyed.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XVI.—KING LEAR.

THE scene in the storm, where Lear is exposed to all the fury of the elements, though grand and terrible, is not so fine, but the moralising scenes with Mad Tom, Kent, and Gloucester, are upon a par with the former. His exclamation in the supposed trial-scene of his daughters, "See the little dogs and all, Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart, see they bark at me," his issuing his orders, "Let them anatomize Regan, see what breeds about her heart," and his reflection when he sees the misery of Edgar, "Nothing but his unkind daughters could have brought him to this," are in a style of pathos, where the extremest resources of the imagination are called in to lay open the deepest movements of the heart, which was peculiar to Shakespeare. In the same style and spirit is his interrupting the Fool who asks, "whether a madman be a gentleman or a yeoman," by answering "A king, a king!"

The indirect part that Gloucester takes in these scenes where his generosity leads him to relieve Lear and resent the cruelty of his daughters, at the very time that he is himself instigated to seek the life of his son, and suffering under the sting of his supposed ingratitude, is a striking accompaniment to the situation of Lear. Indeed, the manner in which the threads of the story are woven together is almost as wonderful in the way of art as the carrying on the tide of passion, still varying and unimpaired, is on the score of nature. Among the remarkable instances of this kind are Edgar's meeting with his old blind father; the deception he practises upon him when he pretends to lead him to the top of Dover cliff—"Come on, sir, here's the place," to prevent his ending his life and miseries together; his encounter with the perfidious Steward whom he kills, and his finding the letter from Gonerill to his brother upon him which leads to the final catastrophe, and brings the wheel of Justice "full circle home" to the guilty parties. The bustle and rapid succession of events in the last scenes is surprising. But the meeting between Lear and Cordelia is by far the most affecting part of them. It has all the wildness of poetry, and all the heartfelt truth of nature. The previous account of her reception of the news of his unkind treatment, her involuntary reproaches to her sisters, "Shame! ladies, shame!" Lear's backwardness to see his daughter; the picture of the desolate state to which he is reduced, "Alack, 'tis he; why he was met even now, as mad as the vex'd sea, singing aloud," only prepare the way for and heighten our expectation of what follows, and assuredly this expectation is not disappointed when through the tender care of Cordelia he revives and recollects her.

"CORDELIA. How does my royal lord? How fares your majesty!

LEAR. You do me wrong, to take me out o' the grave:

Thou art a soul in bliss; but I am bound Upon a wheel of fire, that mine own tears Do scald like molten lead.

CORDELIA. Sir, do you know me?

LEAR. You are a spirit I know: when did you die?

CORDELIA. Still, still far wide!

PHYSICIAN. He's scarce awake; let him alone awhile.

LEAR. Where have I been? Where am I?— Fair daylight?—

I am mightily abused.—I should even die with pity, To see another thus.—I know not what to say.— I will not swear these are my hands:—let's see; I feel this pin prick. Would I were assur'd Of my condition.

CORDELIA. Oh, look upon me, sir, And hold your hands in benediction o'er me:— No, sir, you must not kneel.

LEAR. Pray, do not mock me: I am a very foolish fond old man, Fourscore and upward; Not an hour more, nor less: and, to deal plainly, I fear I am not in my perfect mind. Methinks I should know you, and know this man;] Yet I am doubtful: for I am mainly ignorant What place this is; and all the skill I have Remembers not these garments; nor I know not Where I did lodge last night: do not laugh at me; For, as I am a man, I think this lady To be my child Cordelia.

CORDELIA. And so I am, I am!"

Almost equal to this in awful beauty is their consolation of each other when, after the triumph of their enemies, they are led to prison.

"CORDELIA. We are not the first, Who, with best meaning, have incurr'd the worst. For thee, oppressed king, am I cast down; Myself could else out-frown false fortune's frown.— Shall we not see these daughters, and these sisters?

LEAR. No, no, no, no! Come, let's away to prison:

We two alone will sing like birds i' the cage: When thou dost ask me blessing, I'll kneel down And ask of thee forgiveness: so we'll live, And pray, and sing, and tell old tales, and laugh At gilded butterflies, and hear poor rogues Talk of court news; and we'll talk with them too— Who loses, and who wins; who's in, who's out;— And take upon us the mystery of things, As if we were God's spies: and we'll wear out, In a wall'd prison, packs and sects of great ones, That ebb and flow by the moon.

EDMUND. Take them away.

LEAR. Upon such sacrifices, my Cordelia, The gods themselves throw incense."

The concluding events are sad, painfully sad; but their pathos is extreme. The oppression of the feelings is relieved by the very interest we take in the misfortunes of others, and by the reflections to which they give birth. Cordelia is hanged in prison by the orders of the bastard Edmund, which are known too late to be countermanded, and Lear dies broken-hearted, lamenting over her.

"LEAR. And my poor fool is hang'd! No, no, no life:

Why should a dog, a horse, a rat, have life, And thou no breath at all? Oh, thou wilt come no more,

Never, never, never, never!— Pray you, undo this button: thank you, sir."

He dies, and indeed we feel the truth of what Kent says on the occasion—

"Vex not his ghost: Oh, let him pass! he hates him

That would upon the rack of this rough world Stretch him out longer."

Yet a happy ending has been contrived for this play, which is approved of by Dr Johnson and condemned by Schlegel. A better authority than either, on any subject in which poetry and feeling are concerned, has given it in favour of Shakspeare, in some remarks on the acting of Lear, with which we shall conclude this account.

"The Lear of Shakspeare cannot be acted. The contemptible machinery with which they mimic the storm which he goes out in, is not more inadequate to represent the horrors of the real elements than any actor can be to represent Lear. The greatness of Lear is not in corporal dimension, but in intellectual; the explosions of his passions are terrible as a volcano: they are storms turning up and disclosing to the bottom that rich sea, his mind, with all its vast riches. It is his mind which is laid bare. This case of flesh and blood seems too insignificant to be thought on; even as he himself neglects it. On the stage we see nothing but corporal infirmities and weakness, the impotence of rage; while we read it, we see not Lear, but we are Lear;—we are in his mind, we are sustained by a grandeur which baffles the malice of daughters and storms; in the aberrations of his reason we discover a mighty irregular power of reasoning, immethodised from the ordinary purposes of life, but exerting its powers, as the wind blows where it listeth, at will on the corruptions and abuses of mankind. What have looks or tones to do with that sublime identification of his age with that of the heavens themselves, when, in his reproaches to them for conniving at the injustice of his children, he reminds them that "they themselves are old!" What gesture shall we appropriate to this? What has the voice or the eye to do with such things? But the play is beyond all art, as the tamperings with it show: it is too hard and stony: it must have love-scenes, and a happy ending. It is not enough that Cordelia is a daughter, she must shine as a lover too. Tate has put his hook in the nostrils of this Leviathan, for Garrick and his followers, the show-man of the scene, to draw it about more easily. A happy ending!—as if the living martyrdom that Lear had gone through,—the flaying of his feelings alive, did not make a fair dismissal from the stage of life the only decorous thing for him. If he is to live and be happy after, if he could sustain this world's burden after, why all this pudder and preparation—why torment us with all this unnecessary sympathy? As if the childish pleasure of getting his gilt robes and sceptre again could tempt him to act over again his misused station,—as if, at his years and with his experience, anything was left but to die."*

Four things have struck us in reading Lear:—

1. That poetry is an interesting study, for this reason, that it relates to whatever is most interesting in human life. Whoever therefore has a contempt for poetry, has a contempt for himself and humanity.
2. That the language of poetry is superior to the language of painting; because the strongest of our recollections relate to feelings, not to faces.
3. That the greatest strength of genius is shown in describing the strongest passions: for the power of the imagination, in works of invention, must be in proportion to the force of the natural impressions, which are the subject of them.
4. That the circumstance which balances the pleasure against the pain in tragedy is, that in proportion to the greatness of the evil, is our sense and desire of the opposite good excited: and that our sympathy with actual suffering is lost in the strong impulse given to our natural affections, and carried away with the swelling tide of passion, that gushes from and relieves the heart.

EPIGRAM, BY PTOLEMY.

Οἶδ' ὅτι θανάτος ἐγὼ καὶ Ἰφάμερος· ἀλλ' ὅταν ἄρξω
Μαρίνου πυκινὰς ἀμφιδρόμους ἱλίκας,
Οὐκ ἔτ' ἐπιψαύω ποσὶ γαίης, ἀλλὰ παρ' αὐτῷ
Ζανὶ διοτρεφίῳ πίμπλημαι ἀμβροσίης·

I know that I am mortal, and belong
To the vile sod I tread; yet when I raise
My thoughts to heaven, and mingle in the throng
Of worlds that labour in close-ravelled maze,—
No longer then with the base earth I link,
But am with Jove indeed amid his ways,— Share the same skies—from the same fountain drink.

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water Colours, Pall Mall East.

If water colours have not the force, the vigour, and the richness of oils; if they are incapable of the same size, and depth, an exhibition of pictures in the former material has the advantage of being more easily made compact, and lying well for the eye; and of being without the oppressive scent of the latter. It is like park scenery, compared to the varying and larger grandeur of untamed Nature: if not so impressive, it is more easily attainable; if never so fine, it is more constantly pleasing, and more conveniently to be enjoyed. For these reasons, in one little room, with no very large pictures in it, is contained one of the best and most satisfactory of the London exhibitions.

* Of all in London, the Water Colour Exhibition is the daintiest; small, select, conveniently hung, well arranged, with a running accompaniment of bench with a spacious back, well lighted,—it is the pleasantest of places in which to spend a couple of quiet, cheerful hours; ay, and to return to more than once. It is the temple of the most refined luxury—here are the beauties of England, France, Germany, and of happy Italy, brought into one little room. Here, with half an eye, may the town-bound man of business cast his weary eyes over the scenes of distant lands, and, in one smiling, cheering morn, obtain for his smoke-dimmed sight, the essence of a tour on the continent. The lawyer, engaged all day, with half-troubled indifference in stranger quarrels,—the dry-working banker, the heated politician, the anxious capitalist,—may all come here to cool their dried-up brains among Nature, and original beauty;—here is fitting ware for the gold of the man of taste;—here, may the bothered blockhead spend his ineffectual wealth, and not be told to repent it. Therefore, dear blockheads, and respected men of taste, hasten to Pall Mall East, and see, if among the pictures as yet unboasting of that wished-for token that marks them as "sold," there is not something, that seeing, you admire, admiring desire to keep, a constant solace for your "precious eyesight," as those who have lost always designate it. Go, all ye who struggle, and gain and lose money, and feeling, and happiness in this vast black city,—and as you go into that little room, see if you do not extend the contracted mouth, and draw a breath of satisfaction anticipatory of the pleasure to come. And, departing, mark if you do not carry with you, laid up in the deep recesses of your mind, a world of things to think of, to talk of,—to send others to see,—to see again; and though you are ever parted from the beloved shilling, do you not triumph in the consciousness that you have had its full worth in return? nay, if you are a man of business, you are, perchance, a thousand per cent gainer. That refreshing shower of Cox's has moistened your brain; bathing in the vigorous sea of Fielding, you have braced your nerves; basking in Barrett's sun, has warmed your wits; laughing at Hunt's humour has enlarged your philosophy, and given you an insight into character; altogether, you are put in fine condition, and your next bargain flourishes accordingly; and thus, many are the shillings which that one offered up to Apollo has sent you.

The collection this year is exceedingly good; the number of beautiful pictures that follow each other in close succession is truly surprising. The wonder of the set is Copley Fielding's picture of 'Bow Hill, Sussex' (151). With a pleasant painstaking, Mr Fielding has inserted the following full account of the place in the Catalogue:—"At Stoke, near Chichester, is a deep hollow in the Downs, immediately under Bow Hill, in the centre of which stands an ancient grove of venerable yews, so old, that many of them are supposed to have been growing long before the Conquest. Near this place a battle was fought between the Saxons and Norwegian ravagers, led by the Vikingr; and on the brow of the Downs are seen some large barrows, called the Tombs of the Sea Kings, who were slain in the conflict, remembrance of the event being perpetuated in the name of 'Kingly Bottom,' by which this little valley is known." This vast and kingly tomb is represented in full in Mr Fielding's picture, and a most beautiful picture it is. The dark and solemn grove of yews is relieved by the bright and soft hill; a gentle calmness is spread over the scene; the effect is broad and simple; but, from the truth and beauty of the colouring, the feeling, the sentiment of the treatment, and the force of the effect, it is one of the sweetest and finest pictures of the sweetest of water-colour painters. A pair of sea-pieces of his (64 and 74) are wonderful for the representation of the stir and mighty ferment of the elements. Hunt has some of his extraordinary and humorous fac-similes (79), an aspiring young artist, who has been drawing the figure of a man on his slate, when he should have been studying figures far different, and (86) the same boy, more exemplarily engaged in his proper work, are delightful for the truth, the fun and gusto, of the subject, merry and jolly, and of the unsurpassable artist. 'A Sailor Boy' (11), is a serious portrait, and full of very nice feeling, and skilful execution. 'Apple-blossoms' (307) and 'Grapes' (321), by the same, are very beautiful. There is a boy with a shrimp-net too;—by the by, is this arithmetical, laughing philosopher, our old friend, the vanquisher of that fair, and stout-walled pie, of last year, with a twelvemonth's growth added to his stature? we fancied we recognized his face 'Morning—Reaping—Plain of Stirling' (43). and 'Evening,—Harvest-home,—Plain of Stirling' (105); the landscapes by Barrett, the figures by Tayler, are charming. The rich and glowing sun, the peaceful and cheerful scene of the landscape painter, are well seconded by the brightly coloured and spirited figures of Tayler. A host of sunny pictures from Barrett's pencil enrich the walls. Excepting that we must, as usual, enter our protest against repeated and unsuccessful attempts to paint the naked and unendurable sun in the middle of a picture, they struck us as very clever and beautiful. Tayler's 'Crossing the Mountain Brook' (247), and 'Girl and Highland Stot—Scotch Rebellion' (268), are his best;—the former is very fresh and lusty, and freely drawn; the latter all life and frolic; both, like most of this artist's figure-pieces, are pleasantly coloured; though he is apt occasionally to fall into mannerisms.

To be continued next week.

TRANSLATION OF MR WEBER'S

EPIGRAM, 'DE CRISPO.'

THAT Harry's sire was ill, the news had come;
(A rich old grocer, worth at least a plum;)
And death seemed likely, when the news was sent;
Poor Harry grew most anxious for the event.
When long he'd waited, and no letter came,
"Why writes not Father," said he 'gan inquire,
"Unless by Death prevented, he's to blame,
But may I ne'er be forced to blame a sire."

ONE OF THE JENKINES.

REMARKS ON THE MODE OF HARNESSING HORSES ON THE CONTINENT.

(By the Author of 'Bubbles from the Brunnens of Nassau.')

MANY years have now elapsed since I first observed that, somehow or other, horses on the continent manage to pull a heavy carriage up a steep hill, or along a dead level, with greater ease to themselves than our English horses. Let any unprejudiced person attentively observe with how little apparent fatigue three small ill-conditioned animals will draw, not only his own carriage, but very often that overgrown vehicle, the French diligence, or the German eil-wagen, and I think he must admit, that somewhere or other, there exists a mystery. But the whole equipment is so unsightly, the rope-harness so rude, the horses without blinkers look so wild, that far from paying any compliment to the turn-out, one is apt to condemn the whole thing, and, not caring a straw whether such horses be fatigued or not, to remark that in England they would have travelled at twice the rate with one tenth of the noise. But neither the rate nor the noise is the question I wish to consider. The thing I want, if possible to account for, is, how such small weak horses do manage to draw one's carriage up hill, with so much unaccountable ease to themselves.

Now in English, French, and German harness, there exist, as it were, three degrees of comparison in the manner in which the head of the horse is treated; for, in England, it is elevated by the bearing rein; in France, it is left as nature placed it (there being, in common French harness, no bearing rein), while, in Germany, the head is tied down to the lower extremity of the collar, or else the collar is so made, that the animal is by it deprived of the power of raising its head. Now, passing for a moment the French method, which is the state of nature, let us consider which is best, to bear a horse's head up, as in England, or to pull it downwards, as in Germany. In my humble opinion, both are wrong; yet there is some science in the German error, while ours goes directly against all mechanical calculation.

In a state of nature, the wild horse has two gaits, or attitudes. If man or beast come suddenly on him, up goes his head, and as he first stalks and then trots gently away, with ears erect, snuffing the air, the feelings of doubt, astonishment, and hesitation seem to rein him, like a troop-horse, on his haunches; but attempt to pursue him, and how completely does he alter his attitude! Down goes his head, and from his ears to the tip of his tail, there is in his vertebrae an undulating action which seems to propel him along, and the privation of which would manifestly diminish his speed. Now, in harness the horse has naturally the same two gaits or attitudes, and it is quite true that he can start away with a carriage, either in the one or the other, but the physical powers which he calls into action are essentially different, for in the one attitude he works by his muscles, in the other by his weight. In France, and particularly in Germany, horses do draw by the weight, and 'tis to encourage them to raise their backs, and lean downwards with their heads, that the Germans, with a degree of rude science, tie down the horse's nose to the bottom of his collar; and that the postilion, at starting, speaking gently to him, allows him to get himself into a proper attitude for his draught. The horse, thus treated, leans against the resistance he meets with, and the balance of draught against weight being in his favour, the carriage follows him without much more strain or effort on his part, than if he were idly leaning his chest against his manger. It is true the flesh of his shoulder may become sore, from severe pressure, but his sinews and muscles are comparatively at rest. Now, anyone who observes a pair of English post-horses dragging a heavy weight up a hill, will see at once that the poor creatures are working by their muscles, and that 'tis by main strength the resistance is overcome: but how can it be otherwise for their heads are considerably higher than nature intended them to be, even when walking, unincumbered, and at liberty. The balance of their bodies is, therefore, absolutely turned against, instead of leaning in favour of their draught, and thus cruelly deprived of the mechanical advantage of weight which everywhere else in the universe is appreciated, the noble spirit of our high-fed horses induces them to strain and drag the carriage forward by their muscles; and, if the reader will but pass his hands down the back sinews of any of our stage-coach or post-chaise horses, he will soon feel (though not so keenly as they do) what is the fatal consequence. It is true that in ascending a very steep hill, any English postilion will occasionally unhook the bearing reins of his horses, but the poor jaded creatures, accustomed for years to work in a false attitude, cannot in one moment get themselves into the scientific position which the German horses are habitually encouraged to adopt; besides this, we are so shirty with our horses—we keep them so constantly on the qui vive, or, as we term it, in hand,—that we are always driving them from the use of their weight to the application of their sinews. That the figure and attitude of a horse working by his sinews are infinitely prouder than when he is working by his weight, I most readily admit, and, therefore, for carriages of luxury, where the weight bears little proportion to the powers of the two noble animals, I acknowledge that the sinews are more than sufficient for the slight labour required; but to bear up the head of a poor horse at plough, or at any slow heavy work, is, I humbly conceive, a barbarous error, which ought not to be persisted in; for laughing, as we all do, at the German and French harness, sneering, as we do, at their ropes, and wondering out loud, as we always do, why they do not copy us, it is rather mortifying to find out, that, in spite of our fine harness, for slow heavy draught, it is better to tie a horse's nose downwards, like the German, than upwards, like the English, and that the French way of leaving them at liberty is better than either.

TABLE TALK.

REMOVAL OF STAINS FROM BOOKS.

Nearly all the acids remove spots of ink from paper, but it is important to use such as attack its texture the least. Spirits of salts, diluted into five times or six times the quantity of water, may be applied with success upon the spot, and after a minute or two washing it off with clear water. A solution of oxalic acid, citric acid, or tartaric acid is attended with the least risk, and may be applied upon the paper and plates without fear of damage. These acids taking out writing-ink, and not touching the printing, can be used for restoring books where the margins have been written upon, without attacking the text—When the paper is disfigured with stains of iron, it may be perfectly restored by applying a solution of sulphuret of potash, and afterwards one of oxalic acid. The sulphuret extracts from the iron part of its oxygen, and renders it soluble in diluted acids. The most simple, but at the same time very effectual method of raising spots of grease, wax, oil, or any other fat substance, is by washing the part with ether, and placing it between white blotting paper. Then with a hot iron press above the part stained, and the defect will be speedily removed. In many cases, where the stains are not bad, rectified spirits of wine will be found to answer the purpose.—[From 'Bibliopægia, or the Art of Book-binding,' by J. A. Arnett (R. Groombridge); a very complete little work, worth the attention of the lover of books, as well as the bookbinder.]

CURIOUS RECORD IN THE CHURCH BOOKS AT BARKSTON, LEICESTERSHIRE.

"1680, Ellen, the daughter of Bryan and Ellen Dun, was baptized April 23."

"Lord pardon me if I am guilty of any error in registering Ellen Dun's name."

This singular appeal was written by Mr Huddleston, the vicar, who perhaps had neglected to make the entry for a long time after the baptism, and not until his memory failed him as to the precise time; he had registered Ellen Dun in the year 1680, and finding it wrong, had copied it out, and put it in 1690.—History of Parish Registers.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We must devote an "article" to the Shakspeare dinner at Stratford. It cannot be dispatched in a "paragraph."

The book of musical criticism mentioned by our friend R. A. (from whom we were glad to hear) has not yet reached us.

We are sorry we cannot inform Σ where a copy of the version of Redit is to be found; though perhaps we ought to be glad; for owing to the translator's absence in another country at the time, it was one of the most incorrectly printed books that ever issued from the press. The house that published it, is no longer in business. The story our Correspondent speaks of, is in the 'Deameron.'

Miss S., with whom we sincerely condole, is informed that it is our full intention to publish the paper referred to, written by her late lamented sister, when the season comes round. We shall have double pleasure in doing so, since we learn that such was her particular wish.

M. S. R. is not so good this time. She rightly reverences the olden style; but she must not let its antiquity stand her instead of her own living feelings.

We doubt not there is some mistake in the line mentioned by W. S. and others; and we will look at the manuscript, which at present does not happen to be by us, and correct it. Next Wednesday, if W. S. will be good enough to send for it to the Publisher's, we shall be ready with our answer respecting his manuscript.

"Hints for Table Talk, No. IX." in our next.

Next week, more answer to "Hans Sachs of Dover," whose letter unfortunately reached us a day too late for the answer which he wished.

We are gratified at being reminded by INCOGNITA of the passage in the 'Bubbles,' for we had marked it for extracting, at the time of our first perusal of the book. But what of 'Auld Lang Syne?' They are magical words, and we should be glad to hear more about them.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER is informed, that the first part of the 'Autobiography of Heinrich Stilling' has been translated into English, and published by Hamilton and Adams.

'On the Faded Beauty of a Beloved One' is a beautiful title; and happy is J. C. to feel it to be such, and to write as he does upon it. But a thousand productions of a like merit would start up to complain of us for non-insertion, if we gave them insertion.

The books mentioned by J. F. can be obtained at any large Circulating Library. There is a 'History of the Female Sex,' by Alexander; another translated from the German of Meiners; and Miss Hays has written an interesting 'Female Biography,' in six volumes. See also the eloquent writings of Mrs Jameson, lately published.

We should be glad to insert the remarks of Δ ; but the subject, we fear, would excite controversy.

Also the lines intitled 'Goethe and Scott,' but, for the last line. Why put such a "fear" in the heads of those who never felt it?

Part, if not all, of the remarks on the 'Thames' shall be inserted. We recommend the author to dash a little more boldly at his subject, and not care how "familiar" the points are, provided they are not familiar to the reading public.

BEGGARS' LODGING-HOUSES. SIR THOMAS DYOT, &c.

WE make no apology to our Readers for whisking them, like the Devil on Two Sticks, from the fairest to the squalidest scenes,—from spring-flowers and the beauties of woman-kind, to miserable allies and the wretchedest of their sex. "The blue sky bends over all." The object of the LONDON JOURNAL is to encourage a boundless consideration,—to find out whatever is lovely in things loveable, and to suggest a charitable and ameliorating thoughtfulness in behalf of things that appear hateful. Its Readers are not the people to quarrel with their fellow-creatures, because they have been less educated or fortunate than themselves.

A small book, called 'The Dens of London Exposed,' has just appeared, written by a shrewd but uneducated man, and certainly not fulfilling the expectations raised by its title; for instead of showing us a variety of these dens, it confines itself to the description of a single one, a lodging-house for beggars in St Giles's. This, however, is well done, and in the present times is to be considered a novelty; for our living writers (with rare and qualified exceptions) do not deal with these regions, as their predecessors did in the last century. Our moralists are all theorising, or else take care to confine themselves to such "respectable walks" of description, as shall in nowise put their shoe-leather in danger from the contact of a little common earth, and render them objects of stare and astonishment to drawing-rooms that are "well to do;" and our novelists are so prodigiously "genteel," and at the same time appear to think their gentility so fragile, that unlike those strange men of birth, Fielding and Smollett, they "can't come for to go for to think" of the very existence of any street or house except in Belgrave or Grosvenor squares,—always excepting the admirable 'Paul Clifford' of Mr Bulwer, and occasional evidences of a like universality in the writings of Mr James, who is a gentleman in the right sense of the word, and in spite of a somewhat intolerant breeding in certain respects, has address enough (for that is half the secret) to sympathize with some of the nicest perplexities of the social condition, the most delicate not excepted.*

The author of the book before us professes (and we doubt not, with truth,) to draw his description of the Beggars' House from life. Indeed there are strong evidences, in his style, of his being acquainted with what he describes,—somewhat too strong, perhaps, for giving his book the circulation he hopes for among delicate people; for it is one thing to show a knowledge of a subject, and another to seem to take a superfluous pleasure in the knowledge; and he might have told us a great deal more, with less apparent relish. However, to be over-scrupulous, whether in writer or reader, would show an extreme of a worse kind; and accordingly with the occasional omission of a few sentences, we proceed to give one or two of his most striking extracts. The first is a sketch of this kind of establishment in general, and of the kind of board as well as lodging to be met with in it:—

doubt understands, is a house of accommodation for all classes—no matter what may be their appearance or character—only provided that they can procure, when required, the necessary quantity of coins. In every considerable village in the kingdom there is a lodging-place called the 'Beggars' House;' and in every town, more or less, according to its size or population. In London there are hundreds and thousands of houses of this description, from the poor tenant of a room or cellar, with its two or three shake-down beds upon the floor, to the more substantial landlord with his ten and twenty houses, and two or three hundred beds. Among these the houseless wanderer may find shelter, from a penny to three-halfpence, two-pence, threepence, fourpence, and sixpence a night, on beds of iron, wood, and straw, or on that more lofty couch a hammock; and some (that is, the penny-a-night lodger) have often no softer resting-place than the hard floor. This common lodging-house business is a thriving trade; only small capital is required; for an old house will do, no matter how the rain beats in, or the wind whistles through, in a back street or filthy lane, for the more wretched the neighbourhood, the better; old bedsteads and beds, clothes of the coarsest description, with a few forms, and a table or so, for the kitchen, are all that is necessary for the concern. The front room, or what is usually termed the parlour, is generally fitted up into a shop, or, when this is not the case, there is always some accommodating neighbour, who has the following articles for sale:—viz. bacon, butter, cheese, bread, tea, coffee, sugar, tobacco, potatoes, red and salt herrings, smuggled liquors, and table-beer. Some add the savoury profession of the cook to that of the huckster, and dish up a little roast and boiled beef, mutton, pork, vegetables, &c. The whole of these, the reader may be assured, are of very moderate quality; they are retailed to the lodgers at very profitable prices, and in the smallest quantities, such as a halfpenny worth of butter, bacon, cheese, tea, coffee, sugar, tobacco, &c.; and, for the trifling sum of one penny, the poor epicure may gratify his palate with a taste of beef, mutton, and so on. Very little credit is given in these creditable places, and that only to those who are well known; they who have not that advantage, often are compelled to take the handkerchief off their necks, the coat, and even the very shirts off their backs, to give to the cautious housekeeper, before they can procure a night's lodging, or a morsel of food."

So much for the Beggars' House in general. Now follows a particular description of one, No. 13 — street, St Giles's. He does not mention the name of the street, perhaps Dyot, or as it is now called, (in defiance, we believe, of a legal proviso to the contrary,) George street: for it is understood that Sir Thomas Dyot, an admirable good fellow in the reign of the Stuarts, left his property in this street, for ever, expressly for the use and resort of the houseless poor, who "had not where to lay their heads," and upon the condition of its retaining his name; and how the parish authorities came to have a right to alter the name, we know not, and should like to know. It is a singular instance, we grant, of the effect of circumstance in human affairs, that a name so excellent, and worthy to be had in honouring remembrance, should become of infamous sound in connexion with this street; and perhaps the authorities might vindicate themselves on that score, and ask whether Sir Thomas could have calculated upon such a vicissitude? But we say he could, and very likely did; for he knew of what sort of people the houseless were likely to be composed, and he was prepared, like a thorough-hearted friend, to take all chances with them, and trust to more reflecting times to do justice to him and them. Or if he did not think of all this, his instinct did; or did not care for anything but playing the kind and manly part, and letting a wise Providence do the rest. He was a right hearty good fellow, whoever he was, for we know nothing else of him,—a little wild, perhaps, in his youth, otherwise he might not have become acquainted with the wants of such people; but ever, be sure, honest to the backbone, and a right gentleman,—fit companion for the Dorsets and Drydens in their old age, not for the Charles the Seconds. Here's a libation to him in this dip of ink,—in default of a bumper of Burgundy.

But to our extract:—

"As this is the first attempt," says our author, "that has been made to describe a Cadging House, we perhaps may be excused in being somewhat particular. The outside of this dwelling was more cleanly and decent than we had been led to expect. The window of the low front room, which was large, and rather bowed, but still retained the remains of its former shop-like appearance, was modestly screened in the inside by a green curtain; and the step of the door was nicely scoured and sanded.

"On entering, we were struck with the establishment-like appearance of the room. Rows of common tin tea-pots were ranged along the dresser. As for the shelves, they literally lined the walls, well filled with plates, dishes, and tea-ware. The landlady came forward to meet us, a tall, genteel woman, with the manners of one apparently used to better society. After putting down our groat, and giving into her hand a certain garment wrapped in a handkerchief, in case of accidents, we were told that the men's kitchen was in the next house, the first door on the right hand side, in the entry. By this, we found that the threshold on which we then stood, was no less than the high quarters set apart for the barrack-master himself. Accordingly, we sallied out for No. 12; but, before going in, we took the liberty to make a survey of this 'Vagabond's Home;' and, in troth, it did well deserve that name.

"The low front room or parlour, whose fate it was now to be the Cadger's Kitchen, had certainly the same shop-like appearance as that of No. 13—but there the likeness ended. The door which led into the street, instead of having the clean, welcome, and open look of its neighbour, was fast nailed up. . . . The door-light—the window above the door—had been taken out, or, what is more likely, knocked out, and its place supplied with a wooden shutter, which was raised up during the day, to let in the light and air; and, as for the window itself, with the exception of a few panes of glass in the centre, here and there patched with brown paper, it was almost wholly made up with squares of wood—giving ocular proof that glass was of a very brittle nature in St Giles's.

"After satisfying ourselves thus far, we proceeded to explore the interior. A narrow passage ran between the houses, and led into a tolerably large court, which, with those two, contained the number of houses already stated. At the foot of this entry stood two or three husseys. * * * Farther up the yard were some half-dozen fellows, in parti-coloured dresses (and not over particular about shoes and stockings), smoking their pipes and gambling at pitch-penny.

"We next proceeded to the kitchen—and a den-like retreat it was—dark and gloomy; from the partial light let in by the few remnants of glass, it seemed well calculated to harbour felon thoughts. The room itself seemed moderate enough in size—a good fire, and an excellent grate, containing a copper of boiling water, always kept full by a pipe conveyed to it from a cask raised on one side of the fire-place, was all that we could see that approached to anything like luxury or comfort. Beneath this cask lay a heap of coke and coal, and a coal-heaver's shovel leaned against the wall, at the service of anyone who loved a cheerful hearth. The floor and walls did not differ much in colour, the former being of a dusky hue, that knew no other purifier save the birchen broom; and the latter, a dirty red—a daub long since and clumsily made. A cuckoo-clock ticked on one side of an old cupboard, and before the window was spread a large deal table, at which sat the landlord playing at cards with a couple of ruffian-like fellows. A small table (whose old-fashioned, crooked, mahogany legs, showed that it had once been in a more honoured place; but the rough deal covering with which it had been repaired, denoted that it was now only fit for a cadger's plate) stood at the other end of the room behind the door. A man, in a decent but faded suit of clothes, sat on one side—his arms were stretched over the table, and his head half buried within them—he was, apparently, asleep. The white apron that was wrapped round his waist, clearly proclaimed to what class he belonged—the 'Begging Tradesmen.' A few things tied in a blue handkerchief rested on one side of his head; and a parcel of ballads, his whole stock-in-trade, lay on the other. Before the fire, warming his back, stood a short, thick-set man, humming the air of a vulgar ditty; his hands were thrust into the pockets of a velvet shooting-jacket, ornamented with large ivory buttons, such as are commonly worn by cabmen and other tap-room blackguards. His countenance was by far too dark and sinister-looking to be honest, and, as he occasionally favoured us with a few oblique and professional glances from beneath a white castor, half-pulled over his brow, it, instinctively as it were, reminded us of—"my lord, the prisoner at the bar."

"On a form against the wall sat a tall and aged man, with a beard like a hermit, all fluttering in rags—the very emblem of wretchedness. He was relieving his uneasiness by giving his back, every now and then, a comfortable rub against the wall. A little on one side of this forlorn being, at the head of the table where the landlord sat, was a character that could hardly escape the notice of the most obtuse observer, a stout, active young man in the very perfect costume of a cadger. The upper part of his person was decorated with a piece of a garment that had once been a coat, and of which there yet remained a sleeve and a half; the rest was suspended over his shoulders in shreds. A few tatters were arranged around his nether parts, but could scarcely be said to cover his nakedness; and as for shoes, stockings, and shirt, they doubtless had been neglected, as being of no professional use. A kind of a hat (which, from a piece of the flap still remaining, showed that it had once possessed a brim) ornamented as villainous a looking head as ever sat upon a pair of shoulders—carrotty hair, that had as much piliancy as a stubble field—a low receding forehead—light grey eyes, rolling about with as much roguery in them as if each contained a thief—a broad, snubby nose—a projecting chin, with a beard of at least a month's growth—the whole forming no bad resemblance to a rough, red, wiry-haired, vicious terrier-dog, whose face had been half bitten off by hard fighting. He was the very type of a hedge ruffian, and a most proper person to meet any one 'by mopn-right alone.'

—'He look'd as if his blood
Had crept thro' scoundrels ever since the flood.'

"The very sight of this model of his tribe brought vagrancy with all her train before our eyes, muggers' carts, tinkers' wives, bull-dogs, donkeys, creels, knail-pots and all the trumpery of a gipsy's camp. This elegant individual, we found afterwards, answered to the very proper appellation of 'Cadger Jack.' He was leaning over the table, resting his arms on a bundle of matches, and grumbling heavily about the times. 'Cadging,' he said, 'was gone to the devil! He had been out ever since the morning, and had not yet broke his fast; but, if he lived till Monday, he would go to the lord mayor.' Here he used some emphatic language, and swore he would not stir until he got relief.

"You will get three months at the tread-mill observed a woman sitting opposite (the only one in the room, and a happy compound between the slut and the sot.)

"He d—d the tread-mill, declared he had played at up and down before now—and would go—they were compelled to give him something—the law did not suffer any man to starve, and so on.

"He was rattling on in this way, without any one paying the least attention to what he said, when a lad about fourteen, decently dressed, came in, carrying a box. He placed himself beside the window, and began to display the contents of his trunk, offering for sale several respectable articles of clothing for mere trifles.

"Go home, boy (said a man who had just come in, with his arms loaded with good things). What brought you here? do you want to be ruined? you have run away, you young rascal, and stole them things."

"The younker, who was the very image of a spoiled child and natural vagabond, replied with all the pertness and insolence of one that had been over-indulged, 'that the things were his—he had paid for his lodgings, and nobody had anything to do with him.'

"When did he come here?" inquired the man (the landlord by this time had gone out).

"On Thursday," he was answered.

"It is a shame," he said, 'to take in so young a boy; he should have had a stick laid across his back, and sent home again.'

"In defence of the landlord, it was argued, that if he did not take him in, others would; and that his things were safe here, which might not be the case elsewhere. This was admitted by our moralizer to be very true.

"Howsomever," observed he, 'all I know is this—that if the young dog is not already a thief, I know that he has come to the right place to become one.'

"Ay, that he has," drawled out a half naked lusty young fellow, raising himself slowly up from the form where he had been stretched his full length, lying upon his face, the sluggard's favourite position. Hogarth, or Joe Lisle, or any other character hunter, might have taken this youth for the very Son of Idleness. There might alternately be traced in his heavy features sluggard, loon, fool, and rascal. 'Ay, that's very true,' he observed, 'it was coming to St Giles's that was the ruin of me. * * * I robbed my father, but I got clear of that; then I robbed my mother, I got turned away for that; my sisters took me in, I robbed them, and was forced to cut; at last, my aunt pitied and took care of me, I robbed her too. But I got three months for that, and—'

"Hold your tongue, you ass," exclaimed half-a-dozen voices, 'the booby's mad, and should be sent to St Luke's.'

This rebuke, coming from such persons in such a place, is affecting,—and not the less, but the more so, from its language. The stupid impudence of the boy (who, even after the rebuke, proceeded to pique himself on his shamelessness!) awoke perhaps in these half-a-dozen people, half-a-dozen despairs. They may have begun in the same manner, and knew the madness of the feelings to which he would arrive,—perhaps thought themselves really mad,—a frightful suspicion which must often break in upon the wretchedness of crime, and which may sometimes afford the only consolation (what a consolation!) to the terrified and astonished hearts of friends and relations. How they must sometimes wish that a superhuman voice would condescend to burst out of the air, and, arresting the hand of the youthful and apparently incorrigible thief, exclaim "Stop now!—Stop now,—and begin from this moment to be a reasonable and respectable being." We know of nothing more affecting than the cases one sees in the police reports, of parents sometimes obliged to bring their own children before the magistrate, for fear of worse events by and by,—they, all knowledge and horror of the misery of the thing,—the boy or girl, all ignorance or unfeelingness;—they, all tears and sore terror,—the child, dry-eyed and smooth-faced, perhaps casting about a light eye for a sensation, or putting on a dogged face of denial, and resenting the love that would save it. Where that last feeling does not exist, there is hope; though the hope is then too apt to be deferred and drowned in the partly real, partly hypocritical tears which the same child can muster up, out of pity for itself, and its claim on the pity of others,—and the pleasure that it takes in them accordingly;—such tears, in fact, being little more than another luxury of selfishness, arising out of that fatal tendency to live in the existing moment, and not an atom beyond it, which is the main secret of these phenomena, whether the proximate cause be want of education, or bad example, or a temperament that sets all cause and speculation, and good example itself, at defiance.

We must have another paper on this subject.

CRITICISM ON FEMALE BEAUTY.

No. IV.

HAND AND ARM.—A beautiful arm is of a round and flowing outline, and gently tapering; the hand long, delicate, and well turned, with taper fingers, and a certain buoyancy and turn upwards in their very curvature and repose. I fear this is not well expressed. I mean, that when the hand is at rest, and displayed, the wrist a little bent, and the other part of it, with the fingers, stretching and dipping forwards with the various undulations of the joints, it ought, however plump and in good condition, to retain a look of promptitude and lightness. The spirit of the guitar ought to be in it; of the harp and the piano-forte, of the performance of all elegant works, even to the dairy of Eve, who "tempered dulcet creams."—See a picture in Spencer, not to be surpassed, as usual, by any Italian pencil:

"In her left hand a cup of gold she held,
And with her right the riper fruit did reach,
Whose sappy liquor, that with fulness swell'd
Into her cup she scrud with dainty breach
Of her fine fingers, without foul impeach,
That so fair wine-press made the wine more sweet." Book ii, canto 12.

It is sometimes thought that hands and arms cannot be too white. A genuine white is very beautiful, and is requisite to give them perfection; but shape and spirit are the first things in all beauty. Complexion follows. A hand and arm may be beautiful, without being excessively fair: they may also be very fair and not at all beautiful. Above all, a sickly white is not to be admired, whatever may be thought of it by the sallow Italian, who praises a white hand for being morbidi. I believe, however, he means nothing more than a contradiction to his yellow. He would have his mistress's complexion unspeakably by oil and macaroni at any rate. These excessive terms, as I have before noticed, are not to be taken to the letter. A sick hand has its own merits, if it be an honest one; and may excite a feeling beyond beauty. But sickness is not beauty. In the whitest skin there ought to be a look of health.* The nails of the fingers ought to be tinged with a healthy red. When the Greeks spoke of the rosy-fingered Morn, it was not a mere metaphor, alluding to the ruddiness of the time of day. They referred also to the human image: the metaphor was founded in Nature, whether the goddess's office or person was to be considered. My friend George Bustle used to lament, that, in consequence of the advancement of knowledge and politeness, there was no longer any distinguishing mark of gentility but a white hand. Poor George! He had better have thought otherwise. He attempted one day to show off among us, by letting the blood be drawn out of his finger's ends; which acting upon an ill constitution, was the death of him. People who have nothing but a white hand to show for their breeding, are in a bad way. I would as soon trust the long nails of a Chinese dandy, who thinks it vulgar to be without talons. He supposes that nobody can be polite, whose hands retain a look of utility. Unreflecting Hi-Fong! not to know, that beauty, grace, and utility are fellow-workers. A sculptor might as well shut up his tools.

* "Candidis tamen manibus rosei ruboris aliquid suffundatur." Juntus, Cap. ix, sect. 20.

"The instrument of instruments, the hand," is not a thing to be stuck in a 'scutecheon, like a baronet's device. The most delicate need not be afraid of turning it to account, even on the score of delicacy. If it is worth anything at all, it is worth preserving; and a reasonable exercise of the various joints, muscles, and other useful pieces of machinery which Nature, whatever some may think, has really bestowed on that graceful member, serves to keep it in health and perfectness. Look at the delicate withered claw of some foolish old lady, West Indian for instance, who has never been suffered to lift a comb to her head, or carry a bundle of music across a threshold; and compare it with many accomplished hands, that have been used to fifty good offices, and that remain soft and young-looking to the last. Wherever a genuine and lasting beauty is desired, the blood must be circulated.

FIGURE, CARRIAGE, &c.—The beauty of the female figure consists in being gently serpentine. Modesty and luxuriance, fulness and buoyancy, a rising, as if to meet; a falling, as if to retire; spirit, softness, apprehensiveness, self-possession, a claim on protection, a superiority to insult, a sparkling something enshrined in gentle proportions and harmonious movement, should all be found in that charming mixture of the spiritual and material. Mind and body are not to be separated, where real beauty exists. Should there be no great intellect, there will be a sort of intellectual instinct, a grace, an address, a naturally wise amiableness. Should intellect unite with these, there is nothing upon earth so powerful, except the spirit whom it shall call master.

Beauty too often sacrifices to fashion. The spirit of fashion is not the beautiful, but the wilful; not the graceful but the fantastic; not the superior in the abstract, but the superior in the worst of all concretes, the vulgar. It is the vulgarity that can afford to shift and vary itself, opposed to the vulgarity that longs to do so, but cannot. The high point of taste and elegance is to be sought for, not in the most fashionable circles, but in the best-bred, and such as can dispense with the eternal necessity of never being the same thing. Beauty there, both moral and personal, will do all it can to resist the envy of those who would deface, in order to supercede it. The highest dressers, the highest painters, are not the loveliest women, but such as have lost their loveliness, or never had any. The others know the value of their natural appearance too well. It is these that inspire the mantua-maker or milliner with some good thought. The fantasies of fashion take it up, and spoilit. Sixty or seventy years ago it was the fashion for ladies to have long waists like a funnel. Who would suppose that this originated in a natural and even rustic taste? And yet the stomachers of that time were only caricatures of the bodice of a country beauty. Some handsome women brought the original to town; fashion proceeded to render it ugly and extravagant; and posterity laughs with derision at the ridiculous portraits of its grandmothers. The poet might have addressed a beauty forced into this fashion, as he did his devoted heroine in those celebrated lines:

"No longer shall the bodice, aptly laced,
From thy full bosom to thy slender waist,
That air and harmony of shape express,
Fine by degrees, and beautifully less."
Prior's Henry and Emma.

No: it was

"Gaunt all at once, and hideously little."

It was like a pottle of strawberries, with two oranges at the top of it. Now-a-days it is the fashion to look like an hour-glass, or a huge insect, or anything else cut in two, and bolstered out at head and feet. A fashion that gracefully shows the figure is one thing: a fashion that totally conceals it, may have its merits; but voluntarily to accept puffed shoulders in lieu of good ones, and a pinch in the ribs for a body like that of Venus de Medici, is what no woman of taste should put up with who can avoid it. They are taking her in. The levelling rogues know what they are about, and are for rendering their crook backs and unsatisfactory waists indistinguishable. If the levelling stopped here, it might be pardonable. Fair play is a jewel that one wishes to see everybody enriched by. But as fashion is naturally at variance with beauty, it is also at variance with health. The more a woman sacrifices of the one, the more she loses of the other. Thick legs are the least result of these little waists. Bad lungs, bad livers, bad complexions, deaths, melancholie, and worse than all, rickety and melancholy children, are too often the undeniable consequences of the tricks that fashion plays with the human body. By a 'perverse spirit of justice, the children are revenged on the parents; and help, when they grow up, to pervert those who have the advantage of them.

It is a truism to say that a waist should be neither pinched in nor shapeless, neither too sudden nor too shelving, &c., but a natural unsophisticated waist, properly bending when at rest, properly falling in when the person is in motion. But truisms are sometimes as necessary to repeat in writing, as to abide by in painting or sculpture. The worst of it is, they are not always allowed to be spoken of. For instance, there is a truism called a hip. It is surely a very modest and respectable joint, and of great use to the rising generation; a sculptor could no more omit it in a perfect figure, than he could omit a leg or an arm: and yet by some very delicate train of reasoning, known only to be double-refined, 'not merely the word, but the thing, was suppressed about twenty years back. The word vanished: the joint was put under the most painful restrictions: it seemed as if there was a Society for the Suppression of Hips. The fashion did not last, or there is no knowing what would have become of us. We should have been the most melancholy, hipped, unhipped generation, that ever walked without our proper dimensions. Moore's Almanac would have contained new wenders for us. Finally, we should have gone out, wasted, faded, old maided-and-bachelored ourselves away, grown till a Dutch jury (the only survivors) brought in the verdict of the polite world,—Died for want of care in the mother. At present a writer may speak of hips, and live. Nay, the fancies of the men seem to have been so wrought upon by the recollection of those threatening times, that they have amplified into hips themselves, and even grown pigeon-breasted. Such are the melancholy consequences of violating the laws of Nature.

A true female figure, then, is falling and not too broad in the shoulders; moderate, yet inclining to fulness rather than deficiency, in the bosom; gently tapering, and without violence of any sort, in the waist; naturally curving again in those never-to-be-without-apology-alluded-to hips; and, finally, her buoyant lightness should be supported upon natural legs, not at all like a man's; and upon feet, which, though little, ought to be able to support all the rest. Ariosto has described a foot,—

"Il breve, assaiuto, e ritondetto piede."

"The short, and neat, and little rounded foot."

The shortness, however, is not to be made by dint of shoes. It must be natural. It must also be not too short. It should be short and delicate, compared with that of the other sex; but sufficient for all purposes of walking, and running, and dancing, and dispensing with tight shoes; otherwise it is neither handsome in itself, nor will give rise to graceful movements. It is better to have the sentiment of grace in a foot, than a forced or unnatural smallness. The Chinese have three ideas in their heads:—tea, the necessity of keeping off ambassadors, and the beauty of small feet. The way in which they caricature this beauty, is a warning to all dull understandings. We make our feet bad enough already by dint of squeezing. Nations with shoes have no proper feet, like those who wear sandals. But the Chinese out-pinch an Inquisitor. I have seen a model of a lady's foot of that country, in which the toes were fairly turned underneath. They looked as if they were almost jammed into and made part of the sole. In the British Museum, if I remember, there is a pair of shoes that belonged to such a foot as this, which are shown in company with another pair, the property of Queen Elizabeth. Her Majesty stood upon no ceremony in that matter, and must have stamped to some purpose.

But what are beautiful feet, if they support not, and carry about with them, other graces? What are the most harmonious proportions, if the soul of music is not within? Graceful movement, an unaffected elegance of demeanour, is to the figure what sense and sweetness are to the eyes. It is the soul looking out. It is what a poet has called the "thought of the body." The ancients, as the moderns do still in the south, admired a stately carriage in a woman: though the taste seems to have been more general in Rome than Greece. It is to be observed, that neither in Greece nor Rome had the women at any time received that truly feminine polish, which renders their manners a direct though not an unsuitable contrast to those of the other sex. It was reserved for the Goths and their chivalry to reward them with this refinement; and their northern descendants have best preserved it. The walk which the Latin poets attribute to their beauties, is still to be seen in all its stateliness at Rome. "Shall I be treated in this manner?" says Juno, complaining of her injured dignity;—"I, who walk the queen of the gods, the sister and the wife of Jove?"—Venus, meeting Æneas, allows herself to be recognized in departing:—

—"Pedes vestis defluxit ad imos, Et vera incessu patuit Dea."

"In length of train descends her sweeping gown,
And by her graceful walk the queen of love is known."—Dryden.

A stately verse;—but known is not strong enough for patuit, and Virgil does not say "the queen of love," but simply the goddess—the divinity. The walk included every kind of superiority. It is the step of Homer's ladies,—

"Of Troy's proud dames whose garments sweep the ground."—Pope.

The painting has more of Rubens than Raphael and I could not help thinking, when I was in Italy, that the walk of the females had more spirit than feminine grace. They know nothing of the swimming voluptuousness with which our ladies at court used to float into the drawing-room with their hoops; or the sweet and modest sway hither and thither, a little bending, with which a young girl shall turn and wind about a garden by herself, half serious, half playful. Their demeanour is sharper and more vehement. The grace is less reserved. There is, perhaps, less consciousness of the sex in it, but it is not the most modest or touching on that account. The women in Italy sit and sprawl about the door—ways in the attitudes of men. Without being viragoes, they swing their arms as they walk. There is infinite self-possession, but no subjection of it to a sentiment. The most graceful and modest have a certain want of retirement. Their movements do not play inwards, but outwards: do not wind and retreat upon themselves, but are developed as a matter of course. If thought of, they are equally suffered to go on, with an unaffected and crowning satisfaction, conquering and to conquer. This is evidently the walk that Dante admired:—

• "Ego, quæ divum incedo regina," &c.

"Soave a guisa va di un bel pavone; Diritta sopra se, come una gru."

"Sweetly she goes, like the bright peacock; straight Above herself, like to the lady crane."

This is not the way we conceive Imogen or Desdemona to have walked. The head is too stiffly held up; admiration is too much courted: there is a perking consciousness in it, as if the lady, like the peacock, could spread out her shawl the next minute, and stand for us to gaze at it.

The carriage of Laura, Petrarch's mistress, was gentle; but she was a Provençal, not an Italian. He counts it among the four principal charms which rendered him so enamoured. They were all identified with a sentiment. There was her carriage or walk; her sweet looks; her dulcet words; and her kind, modest, and self-possessed demeanour.

"E con l'andar, e col soave sguardo,
S'accordan le dolcissime parole,
E l'atto mansueto, umile, e tardo.
Di tai quattro faville, e non già sole,
Nasce 'l gran foco di ch'io vivo ed ardo:
Che son fatto un angel notturno al sole."

Sonnet 131.

"From these four sparks it was, nor those alone,
Sprung the great fire, that makes me what I am,
A bird nocturnal, warbling to the sun."

In this sonnet is the origin of a word of Milton's, not noticed by the commentators.

"With store of ladies, whose bright eyes Rain influence.—L'Allegro."

"Da begli occhi un piacer sì caldo piove."

"So warm a pleasure rains from her sweet eyes."

And in another beautiful sonnet, where he describes her sparkling with more than her wonted lustre, he says,

"Non era l'andar suo cosa mortale,
Ma d'angelica forma."—Sonnet 68.]

"Her going was no mortal thing; but shaped Like to an angel's."

Now this is the difference between the walk of the ancient and modern heroine; of the beauty classical and Provençal, Italian and English. The one was like a goddess's, stately and at the top of earth; the other is like an angel's, humbler but nearer heaven.

It is the same with the voice. The southern voice is loud and uncontrolled; the women startle you, bawling and gabbling in the summer air. In the north, the female seems to bethink her of a thousand delicate restraints; her words issue forth with a sort of cordial hesitation. They have a breath and apprehensiveness in them, as if she spoke with every part of her being.

"Her voice was ever soft, gentle, and low,
An excellent thing in woman."—Shakespeare.

As the best things, however, are the worst when spoiled, it is not easy to describe how much better the unsophisticated bawling of the Italian is, than the affectation of a low and gentle voice in a body full of furious passions. The Italian nature is a good one, though run to excess. You can pare it down. A good system of education would as surely make it a fine thing morally, as good training renders Italian singing the finest in the world. But a furious English woman affecting sweet utterance—
"Let us take any man's horses," as Falstaff says.

It is an old remark, that the most beautiful women are not always the most fascinating. It may be added, I fear, that they are seldom so. The reason is obvious. They are apt to rely too much on their beauty; or to give themselves too many airs. Mere beauty ever was, and ever will be, but a secondary thing, except with fools. And they admire it for as little time as anybody else; perhaps not so long. They have no fancies to adorn it with. If this secondary thing fall into disagreeable ways, it becomes but a fifth or sixth-rate thing, or nothing at all, or worse than nothing. We resent the unnatural mixture. We shrink from it, as we should from a serpent with a beauty's head. The most fascinating women, generally speaking, are those that possess the finest powers of entertainment. In a particular and attaching sense, they are those that can partake our pleasures and our pains in the liveliest and most devoted manner. Beauty is little without this. With it, she is indeed triumphant, unless affection for a congenial object has forestalled her. In that case, fascination fixed carries the day hollow against fascination able to fix. I speak only of hearts capable of being fixed as well as fascinated; nor are they so few, as it is the interest of too many to make out. A good heart, indeed, requires little to fix it, if the little be good, and devoted, and makes it the planet round which it turns.

I reckon myself a widower, though I was never wedded; and yet with all my love for a departed object, a sympathising nature would inevitably have led me to love again, had not travelling and one or two other circumstances thrown me out of the way of that particular class of my countrywomen, among whom I found the one, and always hoped to meet with the other. When I do, she may, or may not, as it happens, be beautiful; but the following charms, I undertake to say, she will and must have; and as they are haveable by others, who are not in possession of beauty, I recommend them as an admirable supply. They are far superior to the shallower perfections enumerated in this paper, and their only preservative where they exist.

Imprimis, an eye whether blue, black, or grey, that has given me the kindest looks in the world, and is in the habit of looking kindly on others.

Item, a mouth—I do not choose to say much about the mouth, but it must be able to say a good deal to me, and all sincerely. Its teeth, kept as clean as possible, must be an argument of cleanliness in general; and, finally, it must be very good-natured to servants, and to friends who come in unexpectedly to dinner.

Item, a figure, which shall preserve itself, not by neglecting any of its duties, but by good taste and exercise, and the dislike of gross living. I would have her fond of all the pleasures under the sun, except those of tattling, and the table, and ostentation.

Fourthly, a power to like a character in a book, though it is not an echo of her own.

Fifthly, a great regard for the country.

Item, a hip.

ON RECEIVING A POT OF LILIES OF THE VALLEY.

April 3, 1835.

BEAUTIFUL present!—brought by lovely hands.

Whose native dower is grace and gentleness,

And on whose foreheads fair the proud impress—

The hereditary mark of Genius, stands,—

Beautiful cluster of white trembling bells

Reposing amidst ample leaves of green,

How many a tale your modest beauty tells

Of gentle things, the pure and the serene.

How exquisite a heap of natural beauty!

What charms of shape! what ecstasy of scent!

These are the boons that make enjoyment duty—

The untold—for blessings which bring rich content.

Oh, Nature, kindest mother! who can see

Thy prodigal care, and turn, untaught, from thee?

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LXX.—THE APOLOGIST BELIEVED AGAINST HIS WILL.

[THIS, perhaps, should rather be called a Novel than a Romance; but the turn of the adventure is at all events rare and unexpected; and the entertainment is increased by the maliciously comic figure cut by the great melancholy Cromwell, whose propensity to the refreshment of a little occasional fun is here gratified in a manner that must have been as delightful to himself, as distracting to the poor divine. It is a regular scene in a play, transferred to the stage of life. We take it from that shrewd, amusing, and valuable book, 'Granger's Biographical History of England.']

JEREMIAH WHITE received a liberal education, and was brought up at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which house he became a Fellow. In the troublesome times of the war, Mr White's politics led him to join the prevailing powers, and in time procured him to be made preacher to the council of state, and domestic chaplain to his highness, Oliver, Lord Protector. He was a very sprightly and facetious man, despised the cant and hypocrisy of the Puritanical party of his time, and was considered one of the chief wits of the Protector's court. Possessing all the advantages of youth, and a fine person, he had the ambition to aspire to the hand of Cromwell's youngest daughter, the Lady Frances. The young lady appears by no means to have discouraged his addresses but, in so religious a court, this gallantry could not be carried on without being taken notice of. The Protector was informed of it; and, having no inclination for such an alliance, was so much concerned, that he ordered the person who told him to keep a strict look out, promising, if he would give him any substantial proofs, he should be well rewarded, and White severely punished. The spy followed his business so close, that in a little time he dogged Jerry White (as he was generally called) to the lady's chamber, and ran immediately to the Protector to acquaint him that they were together. Oliver, in a rage, hastened to the chamber, and going hastily in, found Jerry on his knees, either kissing his daughter's hand, or having just kissed it. Cromwell, in a fury, asked what was the meaning of that posture before his daughter Frances? White, with a great deal of presence of mind, said, "May it please your highness, I have a long time courted that young gentleman there, my lady's woman, and cannot prevail; I was, therefore, humbly praying her ladyship to intercede for me." Oliver, turning to the young woman, cried, "What's the meaning of this, hussey? Why do you refuse the honour Mr White would do you? He is my friend, and I expect you would treat him as such." My lady's woman, who desired nothing better, with a very low curtesy replied, "If Mr White intends me that honour, I shall not be against him." "Sayest thou so, my lass," cried Cromwell, "call Goodwyn,—this business shall be done presently, before I go out of the room." Mr White had gone too far to recede from this proposal; his brother parson came, and Jerry and my lady's woman were married in the presence of the Protector, who gave the bride 500*l.* to her portion, to the secret disappointment and indignation of the enraged dupe of his own making, but intire gratification and satisfaction of the fair Abigail, the moment they were made one flesh, who by this unexpected good fortune, obtained a husband much above her most sanguine hope or expectation.

The Restoration deprived White of all hope of preferment, if he refused to take the oaths, and offered him but faint prospects if he did; he therefore prudently chose to remain quiescent, for he was too pleasant a man to take up his abode in a prison, for preaching in a conventicle. His wit and cheerfulness gained him many friends, but he would have found himself more at home in the palace of Charles II, than in that of Oliver. He survived not only the restoration and revolution, but the union, and died in 1707, aged seventy-eight.

When the story of his marriage was mentioned before Mrs White (who survived her husband), she always simpered her assent to its truth.]

THE GIPSY BOY,

BROUGHT UP IN CIVILIZED LIFE, BURSTS HIS TRAMMELS, AND WILL LIVE LIKE HIS FATHERS.

[FROM the 'Gipsy King,'—a manuscript with a sight of which we have been favoured by Mr Richard Howitt,—containing genuine pictures from nature, animate and inanimate.]

"Bz mine my father's life, he cried,
Although I suffer pains severe,—
There is a something in my breast
That wars with this inglorious rest,—
I cannot linger here.

"And who can tell what I may be?"—
That feeling was ambition's spring:
In fancy forward far he ran,
He was a youth, he was a man,—
He was the Gipsy King.

He fled: and wandered through the land;
And worked or starved as chance befell:
He saw the various lives of men,
And often in the beggars' den
It was his lot to dwell.

His was an undirected mind—
He ever undetermined stood;
Unskilled the *fittin*g to discern:
Too quick to rest, submit, or learn:
And ready was at any turn
For evil, or for good.

But want and travel sharpen wit;
And by degrees he grew in knowledge;
And as he was a lad of parts,
He soon the master was of arts
Taught in the wide world's college.

He camped with gipsies in the wolds;
And gazed in tall young gipsies' eyes:
And with much guile and little truth,
He had the ready tricks of youth
To stir their tears and sighs.

Early a father he became—
And left his children in the land:
He soon forsakes who soon deceives—
He left them as the ostrich leaves
Her eggs among the desert sand.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

THE EMPEROR CHARLES V, HIS SON PHILIP II, AND HIS GRANDSON DON CARLOS.

[FROM a curious work, a translation of which has been just published by Murray,—Von Raumer's 'History of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries.' Illustrated by Original Documents.] It is full of portraits of this kind, and of the manners of existing courts. The three likenesses here given to the reader are from the pen of Badoer, a Venetian envoy. In poor Don Carlos, who was unquestionably mad, and who afterwards underwent a tragical fate, the circumstances of which are still a matter of dispute, we see the natural result of the bad and pampered blood of despotism. There is a sort of ineffectual madness in the excessive self-will and incontinence of his father and grandfather.]

CHARLES V.

THE Emperor Charles is of the middle size, well grown, and of dignified appearance. A broad forehead, blue eyes, expressing much intellect, aquiline nose, fair skin, the under jaw long and broad, on account of which the teeth do not shut well, and the last words of his discourses are least intelligible. His front teeth are few and jagged; his beard short and grey. His temperament is phlegmatic, with melancholy at the bottom. The gout has often severely attacked him in the hands, feet, and shoulders; but more severely ten years since than at the time when he determined to retire to the cloister of St Justus.

In all his discourses and dealings the Emperor showed the greatest veneration for the Catholic belief. He heard mass every day; was regular at prayers and preachings; caused the Bible to be read to him, communicated four times in the year, gave great alms to the poor, and was wont, before he started on his journeys to Spain, often to hold a crucifix in his hand. In the perilous time of the Smalcaldic league, he was seen praying on his knees at midnight before a crucifix;—and another time he suggested to the Nuncio, not to release the persons of his court, without very satisfactory reasons, from the obligations imposed by the church—for instance, in the matter of fasts.

The Emperor has been always a strong man, and one who required variety and high seasoning in his food; he never kept himself within restraint, when he fell in with women, whether of the higher or lower classes.

PHILIP II.

King Philip is now thirty years old, of small stature and fine limbed. The forehead high and fair, azure eyes, tolerably large; strong eyebrows, not much parted; well-shaped nose, great mouth, with a heavy, somewhat disfiguring under lip, white and fair beard; in exterior a Fleming, but in haughty deportment a Spaniard. His temperament is melancholy and phlegmatic; he suffers from stomach pains, and side stitches, on account of which, by advice of his physicians, he goes much to the chase, as affording the best means of strengthening the body and ridding the spirit of melancholy thoughts. He hears mass regularly, and on Sundays, sermons and vespers. He gives alms regularly, or on special occasions. So, for example, last year, in Brussels, when the poor were dying in the streets of cold and hunger, he caused bread, beer, straw, and firewood to be given out to 800 persons. They say at court, he asked his confessor whether his having done this could oppress his conscience; it is certain, at least, that in such cases he had many consultations with his council.

As nature has made this king of weak body, so has she also constituted him of timorous mind. He eats sometimes too much pastry, and likes variety in his food; with women he is intemperate, and likes to go about at night in disguise. His expenses in dress, furniture, livery, &c., are not great. Out of doors he wears a mantle and cap; often, also, suits cut in the French fashion, or with large buttons, and feathers in his cap.

He shows himself rather composed than passionate, and tolerates persons and pretensions of an unusual and not very befitting description. He speaks sometimes with sharpness and wit, and loves jesting and nonsense. Yet he shows this disposition less at table where buffoons are present, than when in the privacy of his apartment he lets himself loose and is merry. He possesses a good capacity, and one equal to great affairs, but is not active enough to rule over dominions so extensive as his; yet he may be said to do quite as much as his weak body can endure. Petitions and reports, as they come in, he reads himself, receives them often into his own hand, and listens with great attention to everything that is said to him. While doing so, he commonly avoids looking the speaker in the face, but casts his eyes to the ground, or turns them towards some other quarter. He answers quickly and shortly, point by point, but, nevertheless, does not decide for himself.

DON CARLOS.

The Prince is of twelve years of age and of a weak complexion. He has a head of disproportioned bigness, black hair, and a fierce disposition. It is said of him that when, in the chase, hares or other animals are brought to him, he takes delight in seeing them roasted alive. Once when a long-tailed lizard was presented to him, he bit him in the finger, he bit off the animal's head, and for this once only, showed courage by so doing. It is also believed that he is immoderately inclined to the female sex. If he finds himself without money, he gives away (without the knowledge of the Princess his aunt,) chairs, medals, and even his clothes, though otherwise fond of show. When he was told, after the marriage of Philip with Mary of England, that their son, if they should have one, would inherit the Netherlands, he said, this he would never consent to, but would oppose to the last; he also begged a suit of armour of the Emperor, then resident in Brussels, with which the Emperor was much pleased. He shows uncommon pride, in that he will never remain long standing in his father's presence, or take off his cap, and that he calls the Emperor father, and his father only brother. He is as passionately addicted to his own opinions, and as prone to anger as a young man can be. He amuses himself with uttering on every occasion, so many predictions (cose augure) that his tutor collected them in a volume, and presented them to the Emperor.

THE RIVAL UNIVERSITIES.

A BALLAD.

["WRITTEN," says a Correspondent, "by the Rev. W. Cooper, who, in 1780, was usher at the school of Houghton-le-Spring."]

ONE evening, when Bacchus prevailed o'er Apollo,
And wrangling and jangling of course were to follow,

Arose a dispute which the muse may now blab,
'Tween Jack the Oxonian, and Will the Camtab.
Derry down, &c.

Quoth Will, after filling a bumper of wine,
"Come Jack, here's a toast! 'tis a favourite of mine:
Alma Mater, say I, prithee Jack fill thy glass;
Who flinches this toast, I pronounce him an ass."

Quoth Jack, "Methinks, Will, 'tis a rough declaration;
Besides, 'tis a rule in all argumentation,

A term amphibolical first to define,
Then say is it my Alma Mater or thine?"

"Tis mine, without doubt," in a heat, answered Will:
"Dost thou think that to thine such a bumper I'd fill?"

"If so then," quoth Jack, "thou must surely agree That thine hath no right to a bumper from me."

Quoth Will, "Thy vile logic is now out of season,
And, at best, is a paltry employment of reason:
But paltry as 'tis, it is all thou well know'st,
Which Oxford, thy poor Alma Mater, can boast."

Jack's face turn'd as white as his mistress's smock;
Quoth he, "Hast thou ne'er heard the name of John Locke?"

John Locke was of Oxford, and one of our College,
And to us at his death he bequeath'd all his knowledge."

"A mighty bequest (answers Will) all ideal!—
But our great Isaac Newton left us something real:
No verbal distinctions and tergiversations,
But sound mathematics and clear demonstrations.

"Leave Oxford, I say, with her logical fools:
Go to Cambridge and step into one of her schools;
Ask any young Soph, and he'll answer you soon,
How many calves' tails reach from thence to the moon."

"Care we for calves' tails or the moon?" answer'd Jack, Jack,

"The road to the moon is quite out of our track;
But ours is the road to a Mitre and Lawn—
Besides, you must own, we excel you in Brawns."

Cried Will, "On this issue we'll put the whole matter, Here's Dick knows both sorts, and be he arbitrator."

Dick, like a true judge, left the cause still at random, Pronouncing, De gustibus non disputandum.

FINIS.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE LATE CHARLES LAMB.

[THESE are the extracts, of which we have latterly spoken. They are from the 'Court Magazine,' and contain the most full and particular account of Mr Lamb yet given to the public. We have now made up our minds to give the whole of it in the LONDON JOURNAL, with the exception of a brief passage or two, valued by ourselves, but not of consequence to the subject. We think we owe this, both to the writer, who is no common observer, and who says everything (we are sure) in perfect good faith, and to that solidity of heart, genius, and reputation on the part of Mr Lamb, which could stand the investigations even of an enemy, if a sincere and wise one, much more those of an attached friend, however speculative, and however we may here and there differ with his conclusions. Upon one or two points we shall perhaps touch in a note;—certainly upon the very erroneous conclusions he has drawn respecting the non-appearance of some of Mr Hazlitt's friends at his funeral, and their alleged silence about him since.]

Yet I had never reason to feel satisfied that his habits and mode of life, and the tone and temper of mind which they mutually engendered and sprang from, were improved by the change. The truth I believe to be, that a frequent communion with intellects of the lowest class of cultivation and development was indispensable to the due exercise and the healthful tone of Lamb's mind; and that in the country he could not, or at least did not, obtain this communion, and was the worse for the want of it. "Kings (the proverb says) are fond of low company." Lamb was a king in the realms of intellect; and certain it is that the meanest peasant or vassal of those realms, and even the merest outcast, was deemed by Lamb to come as fairly under the category of "good company" as the most courtly of lords, the most accomplished of ladies, or the most cultivated of literati.* Who, in fact, of all our English writers, has sympathised like Lamb with the sorrows and deprivations of the poor! Who but he has described them with other than a reluctant, deprecating hand, and a patronising 'pen!' His little paper on 'The Children of the Poor,' is the most pathetic piece of writing in our language; and it is so only because it is written in the purest spirit of human sympathy, and the most perfect simplicity and good faith.

One of the most noble and beautiful self-sacrifices that ever was made at the shrine of human affection, was that made by Lamb when, for the greater security of his sister's health, he quitted his beloved London, and went to reside in the country—which he did not love. For why should the truth be concealed on this point? London seemed to Lamb what the country is to many people: when he was away from it his spirit seemed to shrink and retire inwards, and his body to fade and wither like a plant in an uncongenial soil; and when he returned to it he seemed to grow regenerate and become filled with a new life and being. In London the whole of what he felt to be the truly vital years of his existence had been passed; almost every pleasant association connected with the growth, development, and exercise of his intellectual being, belonged to some metropolitan locality; every agreeable recollection of his social intercourse with his most valued friends, arose out of some London [A few words are wanting here in the copy with which we have been favoured.—ED.]

The reader may be assured that there is no exaggeration or artifice of style in this statement. It is the simple and literal fact. Before I was fully aware of this feeling of Lamb as to London, and of the associations he was accustomed to connect with it, I once or twice, on visiting and walking about with him among the pleasant scenery of Enfield and its vicinity, referred to the improvement he must find from the change, both as to health and mental condition. But I soon found my mistake, and that the subject was a sore one; and I remember it being recurred to once afterwards, when he declared, with unusual vehemence of expression, and almost with tears in his eyes, that the most squalid garret in the most confined and noisome purlieu of London would be a paradise to him, compared with the fairest of dwellings placed in the loveliest scenery of "the country." "I hate the country," he said; and I shall never forget the tone of voice and expression of countenance with which he said it, as if the feeling came from the bottom of his soul, and was working ungentle and ungenial results there, that he was himself almost alarmed at.

Yet while Lamb lived in the country he used to spend the whole of the fore part of the day in taking long walks, of eight or ten miles; but merely for the sake of walking; not in search of any specific scene of curiosity, or any external excitement. The act of walking was, in fact, congenial to the somewhat torpid and sluggish character of his temperament. It gave a healthful movement to his thoughts, which otherwise brooded, and, as it were, hovered in a sort of uneasy and restless slumberousness, over dangerous and interdicted questions, on which he knew there was no satisfaction to be gained, yet he could not escape from them.

What may have been his condition of mind when walking about in the open air alone, one can only judge of by the difference observable between him when walking with a friend and when sitting with the same friend by his own fire-side; and I have always remarked that the activity of his mind (and with his mind activity was indispensable to its health) was always greater under the former circumstances. And he evidently felt this himself, without perhaps knowing it; for he would never let you go away from his house, whatever might be the weather or the hour, without walking several miles with you on your road. And his talk was always more free and flowing on these occasions.

There was, however, another reason for these

* Many;—in spirit at least, if not in letter. Fielding, Johnson, the old Puritan divines, Hazlitt, Elliott,—nay, the writer of this Journal. But to do the poor good Jack is sometimes necessary to accommodate the tale to the audience.—ED.

walks. In whatever direction they lay, Lamb always saw at the end of them the pleasant vision of a foaming pot of porter,—which he liked the better when quaffed

"In the worst inn's worst room."

One could not part company (perhaps with the chance of meeting again for weeks or months) without sitting down together for five minutes; and for this purpose Lamb always chose the "parlour" of some wayside public-house. And latterly his regale was always limited to a draft of ale or porter.

Will the reader pardon me if I dwell on this point longer than its seeming insignificance may appear to warrant? But in the habitual actions and feelings of a man like Charles Lamb, there is nothing insignificant, nothing that does not result from, and may not be traced to, some profound or some curious and interesting movement of his mind or heart; and the habit to which I have alluded above was traceable to a deep and beautiful moral feeling. When Lamb was quitting home with you to accompany you part of the way on your journey, you could always see that his sister had rather he stayed at home; and not seldom her last salutation to him on his leaving the room was—"Now you're not going to drink any ale, Charles?"

"No! no!" was his half impatient reply. The truth was, that his sister, in her almost over-anxious care of his bodily health, had latterly endeavoured to keep him, perhaps even too much, from the use—for to the abuse he had never been addicted—of those artificial stimuli which were to a certain extent necessary to the healthy tone of his mental condition. I have sometimes thought—though, certainly, without sufficient grounds on which to form a decided opinion either way—that in order to keep him from the chance of being ill, she kept him from the certainty of being well. I have had a pretty extensive experience (passively, at least,) in the way of intellectual Table Talk. There are a few of the most distinguished literary men and conversers of the day with whom I have not partaken in that best of all intellectual enjoyments, when duly understood and rightly conducted. And I have no recollection of any which has left such delightful impressions on my mind as that which has taken place between the first and the last glass of humble gin-and-water, after a rump-steak or a pork-chop supper, in the simple little domicile of Charles Lamb and his sister, at Enfield Chase. Nor must it be supposed that the afore-named gin-and-water played a mere mechanical or corporeal part in those delightful repasts. True, it created nothing. But it was the liquid talisman which not only opened the poor casket in which Lamb's rich thoughts were shut up, but set in motion the machinery in the absence of which they might have lain like gems in the mountain, or gold in the mine.

No really good converser, who duly appreciates the use and the virtue of that noble faculty, ever talks for the pleasure of talking, or in the absence of some external stimulus to the act. He talks well only because he thinks and feels well; and he is always fonder of listening than of talking. He talks only that he may listen,—never listens merely that he may talk. Now, Charles Lamb, who, when present, was always the centre from which flowed, and to which tended, the stream of the talk which took place, was literally tongue-tied, till some slight artificial stimulus let loose the sluggish and obstinate member; and even his profound and subtle spirit seemed to wear chains of its own forging, till the same external agency set it at liberty. Compared with what it really contained, his mind remained a sealed book even to the last, as regards the world in general. I mean, that his books, beautiful as they are, are mere spillings, as it were, or forced overflows, from the curious and exquisite treasures of his mind and heart. It was a task of almost insuperable difficulty and trouble to him to write; for he had no desire for literary distinction; no affected anxiety to make his fellow-creatures wiser or better than he found them; and no pecuniary necessities pressing him on to the labour. Nor do I believe that he would ever have written at all, but for a sort of pressure from within himself, which, like the divine afflatus of the seers of old, would have vent, and ease its inward agony by speech. His thoughts were like the inspirations of the true poet, which must either be expressed by visible symbols, or they drive their recipient to madness. What was "the reading public" to Charles Lamb? He did not care a pinch out of his dear sister's snuff-box whether they were supplied to repletion with the (to him) garbage on which they are accustomed to feed, or were left to starve themselves into mental health for the want of it. He knew well enough that what he had to offer would be caviare to them. But it was not so with regard to the little world of friends and intimates that his social and intellectual qualities had gathered about him. Not, indeed, that he cared much even about them, so far as related to any pressing desire for their admiration of his intellectual parts and acquirements. In fact, a spirit of indifference pervaded the whole of his moral being, especially during the last ten years of his life. And such a spirit, when suffered to attain a certain weight and power, is, perhaps, one of the most fatal misfortunes that can befall a highly-gifted and cultivated intellect,—especially if it be a self-cultivated one, as Lamb's the most part was. During the buoyancy of youth, and the strength and prime of manhood, this spirit seldom gains any very mischievous ascendancy. But after a certain time of life, if present at all, it steals and grows over us like frost over still water, binding the faculties and the heart in chains, that are strong as life itself, or weak as ropes of sand, according as we possess and use the means and appliances which are everywhere about us for resisting or counteracting the spell.

Now this spell was one of which Lamb had at all times the good sense to perceive the presence, and to admit the power which it acquired by a submissive yielding to its actions. But, on the other hand, he knew that to oppose is to destroy it;—that to gaze upon its growth in motionless silence, is to aggrandise it into a monster of moral mischief and misery; whereas,

"Lift but a finger, and the giant dies."

And till his retirement from London he had the wisdom to act on this knowledge, and the means always at hand of doing so with safety and success.

But in the country it was widely different; for Lamb was not among those fortunate spirits who profess to "Find tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in everything;"

On the contrary, he saw about him an infinite deal of bad; and in what was bad he saw no good, and no means of turning it to good. And the good that there is, he saw perpetually overlooked, or turned to bad, by those who should apply and administer it. In a word, Lamb was anything but an optimist, except in respect of human character. In that he could always see the good, and could overlook the bad in favour of it.

I am afraid it will be thought that I am going more deeply into this question than the desultory nature of these recollections warrants, and especially in connexion with the topic out of which it has incidentally arisen—a pot of porter! For I must not shelter myself under Lamb's example in this respect. He might be sublime over a roast pig, or pathetic over a chimney-sweeper, where others could scarcely hope to escape being false, or ridiculous, or unintelligible.

To fulfil my object in alluding to the habit I have spoken of, I must return for a moment to the point from which I have so widely digressed. I have said that Lamb's beloved sister and friend always seemed to me to be uneasy whenever he left home with any visitor, to accompany them on their way; fearing, as she did, that he might make the presence of a friend an excuse, or a pretence (to himself, I mean, for to others he never sought or made one in his life—he was the very soul of sincerity and good faith) for indulging in that mild and genial stimulus which his mental temperament so indispensably required, but which the extreme delicacy of his bodily system rendered a dangerous remedy, unless most carefully and abstemiously applied. And that very sluggishness and indifference, which made the application necessary, made the patient himself the last person in the world to judge, or even to care, as to the distant consequences of the application. But, as I have said, or was about to say, Lamb's whole life was a willing sacrifice of love to the personal comfort and health of his sister; and if the sacrifice was not always submitted to with the best grace in the world, and the willing victim would sometimes seek to escape for a moment from the bonds of affection which held him, what did this prove, but that the affection was deep and pure in proportion to the struggles it overcame? What are the "sacrifices" that nine-tenths of the world ask and receive credit for making, but a forced submission to restraints in which, after a brief period, there is no restraint felt? Whereas, in Lamb's case, half the feelings and resolves of the latter part of his life were so many struggles between the demands of his brotherly love and duty, and that disposition to self-indulgence, and even selfishness in a refined and liberal sense, which were the leading tendencies of his character. And the former always conquered—at least, when the temptations of social intercourse did not come too strongly in aid of their opponents. But there were times and occasions when Lamb could not, or would not, resist the syren charms of that one extra cup which "is unblest, and its ingredient a devil." But, as before, what did this prove but the almost superhuman self-denial which was the habit of his life?—for, as regarded himself, personally, he was careless of the consequences that might attend any imprudence of the kind referred to. He was not a person who expected to eat his cake and have it too. The present was his hour; it was worth to him (humanly speaking) a world of the past and an eternity of the future.

Is it expected that I apologise for dwelling so long and so minutely on a point of these Recollections which may seem to the self-important wisdom of some, and the superfine delicacy of others, not of a nature to have been introduced at all? If so, my apology can be addressed to those only who have no claim to it; since they must not pretend to feel sufficient interest in the character of the individual I am referring to, to make these Recollections worth their perusal. But because they are so sensible and prudent and resolute and self-denying that they can feel no interest in the "fears of the brave and follies of the wise"—because they are so "virtuous" that "cakes and ale" are to be expunged from the accredited list of human enjoyments—it does not follow that the rest of the world may not like to see a true picture of a man of genius rather than a false one. And as to the personal friends of Charles Lamb being more fastidious about his personal reputation now he is dead than they were when he was alive, it is what I for one of them cannot understand.

And to what, after all, does the sum of my disclosure on this point amount? Why, to this; that Lamb's exquisitely constituted frame and temperament—that bodily conformation on which the tone of his genius depended—could not repair the wear and tear of its movements and operations, and maintain itself in a healthful condition, without the occasional use of those remedial means (for such they are) which were at hand for the purpose; and yet, that ninety-nine times out of a hundred, he forewent those means rather than risk the comfort of another!—That that other will be aggrieved or angry at my thus alluding to the subject, I have no fear. And for the false and overstrained delicacy of others, I have no respect. I have told, and will tell, nothing of Charles Lamb that I would have feared for himself to read:—and with that limitation only (which virtually extends to her who was his other self) I shall proceed in my task of putting down what I knew, and felt, and thought of him.

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water Colours, Pall Mall East.

There is a freshness and truth in De Wint's paintings, that places them among the finest specimens of the art; of the number he has in the present collection, we especially admire 'Crowland Abbey' (90), a fine leafy scene;—'View of Scaw Fell' (44), a most grand rocky amphitheatre, clasping in its span a grove of trees and a few happy-looking dwelling-places, very boldly and feelingly painted. 'Water-mill at Bampton' (66), a shut-in sequestered glimpse of a little torrent, and a right primitive pathway of loose blocks of stones, winding out of sight among noble trees. 'A Village, Westmoreland' (80), a little nest of cottages, hedged in with trees; homely, rustic, and snug. Mrs Seyffarth is a very clever painter in the miniature style; which, however, she carries rather too much into her designs. The scene from 'Lalla Rookh' is pretty and cleverly painted; but there is a want of keeping in the details, and so the whole effect is confused, and, though there is ample space, the objects look crowded. The girl in (241), is very beautiful; the mother looks too young. Prout has given us many of his vivid portraits of buildings, mostly drawn from the classical and beautiful land of Italy. 'Grand Canal, Venice' (27), an old friend, whom we cannot see too often; the present picture is lively and real; but, to a degree, the parts want bringing together; the general effect is a little disjointed. 'Part of the Zaring Palace, Dresden' (77), a magnificent spacious old doorway;—'At Verona' (116), a beautiful painting, of a very singular but graceful tomb. 'At Orleans' (212), a fine old gate. Gustineau's pictures this year are not his happiest; but they are always pleasing and clever; 'Part of Warwick Castle' (15), is eminently so. R. Hills has contributed several of his excellent cattle-pieces. 'Winter' (82) is a very ingenious representation of a fall of snow, with some admirable cows shedded in the foreground. 'Cattle with a distant view of Dorchester Church' (29), and 'Cattle in Salt Marshes of Lodmoor' (69), are the best among Thales Fielding's contributions; they are both very genially coloured; and he hits better than any man going the placid mildness of those ruminating individuals, looking so comfortable and contented among the hoof-stamped slopes and muddy waters of their favourite ponds. 'Sir Halbert Glendinning, the Lady of Avenel, and Roland Græme' (41), by Joseph Nash, is a clever design, and the costume and accessories are well studied; but there also lies the defect, for the study is too apparent; the lady is handsome, but years and trouble seem to have induced a peevishness in her gentle nature, if we may judge by the expression the artist has given her. We recollect no warrant for it in the text. 'South Porch of the Church at Louviers, Normandy' (138), is a very nice drawing of a fine old bit of masonry. 'Olivia and Malvolio' (172) is clever, but too vulgar. Malvolio was not a gentleman, nor a man of refinement; but lunatic vanity, such as his, is seldom the accompaniment of so very burly and lusty a condition, while its very fantasticalness and aspirations after gentility make it fastidious and finikin. Mr Nash's Malvolio is a downright, bullying, burly swaggerer, a man without ambition or apprehension enough to dream of love triumphs and gallant conceits. His 'Don Quixote, quarrelling with the Ecclesiastic before the Duke and Duchess' (181), in like manner is deficient in refinement; there is the madness, the anger, the ridiculous part of the knight's nature, but where is his noble feeling, his pure and disinterested dignity, his intellect, the courtesy that ever inspires him at his most enthusiastic moments? which makes him never, through all his scrapes and disasters, lose our love and respect for his untainted honour and his kindly heart? 'View on the Dort' (202), by C. Bentley, though not quite natural in the colouring, is clever and very pleasing; the effect is rich, and that dark bird flying to the shore is an accident very happily introduced, giving life and reality to the scene. D. Cox has many clever drawings; 'Showery Day, Bolton, Yorkshire' (167), is the one that struck us most, for its very admirable effect of a sudden and violent shower; the rain is just come on, a heavy, hissing, splashing storm, dashing upon everything so suddenly, that with the peculiar light it looks white and powdery, like a torrent of spray. J. D. Harding's view in the 'Grand Canal, Venice,' is clever, but hard. 'A Music Party'—"the coreates of Signor Corelli were all the fashion," Spectator—(92), by J. Stephanoff, is excellent. Stephanoff should stick to these light, comic subjects, for his forte is that way; he has, in this, caught the very spirit of the sneer, and of the time in which it was written. J. F. Lewis gives us several scenes from Spain in his smart and lively style; but why does he for ever drag in that demure young lady with a black veil over her head? 'A Spanish Posada' (131) is capital; the girls looking out of window are very good. 'Spanish Capuchin Monks Preaching for the Benefit of their Convent, Seville' (292), is highly interesting: the energetic preacher, his idling companions to the right, the pious girls and careless men, are all very spiritedly painted and very amusing. Cattermole's 'Abbot' (132), is a highly-finished and effective picture of a pampered old ecclesiastic, in all the indulgence of conventual luxury. 'A Study of Armour' (52), is a very singular, grim, fantastic assemblage of contending but tenantless suits of battle harness. F. Bartholomew's 'Flowers' (318), are as good as Nature's—as fresh and intensely coloured: so are the 'Rock Melon and Grapes' (60), and 'Convolvulus' (96). 'The Loiterer' (66), is Christall's best; it is very pretty; the hands are very well painted. We mentioned some of Hunt's last week, but there are still others we have marked for notice. 'Peasant Girls' (315), amazingly real and natural: the mild and unaffected expression of the girl, and the moving eyes, and lips, and cheeks of her laughing little sister, are not to be surpassed. The old wrinkled 'Monk' (323), is a fine union of elaborate detail and breadth of effect. Of Copley Fielding's, too, we must mention a few more. (14) 'View of the Weald, Sussex; a down scene, with passing clouds and gleams of sun, most delicately and powerfully painted. (26) 'Subject from the 137th Psalm; a melancholy, silent river, flowing under still dark trees, reflected in its smooth waters.—(45) 'Inventory and Loch Fyne; very sweet, but is not the body of blue in the centre almost too strong?—(49) 'Arundel Castle.'—(161) 'On the Sands at Park Gate, Cheshire; a glowing scene, the masts of the ships melting into the mist, the golden mist itself, the brown tint in the waters (which we often see in the Thames of an afternoon and think of Fielding), are most beautifully mingled in harmony. How much better and mightier is the sun in this picture for being more veiled!—(283) 'Entrance of Dover Harbour; a small painting, delicate and beautiful as any in the room.—Again, let us say how much we have been delighted with the collection this year: we think we may venture to say, that of things which we should call positively bad there are scarcely half a dozen; of very clever paintings, almost the whole set consists; and a very large proportion are extremely beautiful. We cannot imagine a closer imitation of nature than we find in Fielding's, De Wint's, and Hunt's works; more power, nor more beauty and feeling; and there are many others right worthy to be associated with them.

History of British Fishes. By Wm. Yarrel, F.L.S. Illustrated by Woodcuts, &c. John Van Voorst. Part III.

AN interesting number; the cuts as good as ever, witness the Four Toothed Sparas, and our old friend the Mackarel, of whom there is a long and amusing account. The little vignettes at pages 139 and 142 are good specimens of minute wood-cutting—delicate and careful, but apirited.

Gallery of Portraits. No. XXXVI. Charles Knight. THE present number makes us acquainted with Blake's handsome and good-humoured face, frank and bold, befitting a sailor; engraved by Mollison very nicely, though in parts a little misty. The face of L'Hôpital, the great French jurist, has a prevailing expression of benign regret, such as one might fancy in one who had studied the restrainable, erring, and contentious part of our nature, but was not unconscious of the good. At the end of his life there is a vignette, representing the Conciergerie, from which he liberated some Huguenot prisoners. It is well engraved. An excellent engraving, by Holl, of the upper part of the figure of Mrs Siddons, from Sir Joshua's whole length, as the Tragic Muse, completes the set.

Arboretum Britannicum, &c. By J. C. Loudon. No. V. Longman and Co.

THIS work preserves its high character; it continues to be copious,—stuffed with much information, chronological, physical, and economical,—and the engravings are still careful, and full of ocular demonstrations of the details and general effect of the plants, such as it were impossible to convey by mere written description. The work most perfectly answers its intention, as a manual for planters; amateurs in particular should not fail to be possessed of it.

SELECT ENGRAVINGS OF THE PENNY MAGAZINE.

April 30, 1835.

SIR,—In the last number of your JOURNAL you speak of the illustrations to the 'Penny Magazine,' which have been lately published in a separate form; and appear to be surprised that the cuts should yield such good impressions after so much wear and tear as you suppose they have undergone. But perhaps you are not aware of the fact, that the prints, which embellish the Magazine, are worked, not from the wooden blocks themselves, but from metal casts: both letter-press and engravings being stereotyped. Hence you will observe, that new casts (being exact fac-similes of the unworn blocks) can be readily obtained, whenever a fresh edition or reprint may be required.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,
XYLOGRAPHICUS.

ANOTHER VERSION OF MR WEBBE'S EPIGRAM 'DE CRISPO.'

WHEN Crispus, pious heir to half a plum,
Heard that his father to death's door was come,
His earnest looks a filial care exprest,
And anxiously he seemed to wait the rest.
He waited long, but still no tidings came:—
"Surely my dearest father is to blame!
What not one little word?" he cried, "Oh! whence
This cruel silence and this sad suspense?
At such a moment, what but death—hist! hist!
I pray no ground of censure may exist."

TABLE TALK.

A SCEPTICAL UNDERSTANDING AND GOOD-NATURED TEMPERAMENT, TAKING REFUGE IN TRIFLES.

AMONGST the individuals with whom I was acquainted at Leipsic, one of those who have left the most distinct trace in my memory was the governor of the young Count Lindenau. His name was Behrisch. He might be classed amongst the most singular originals. At a very early hour in the morning he was always to be seen with his hair dressed and powdered, a sword by his side, and his hat under his arm. He might have passed for a Frenchman of the old school; particularly as he spoke and wrote French with great facility. He was perfectly acquainted with modern language and literature. To a great share of learning, and astonishing apathy, he added a decided talent and taste for buffooneries, which he executed practically or verbally with the greatest seriousness. He excelled as a mimic; he would imitate passengers and give an opinion of their characters from their air, appearance, gait, and deportment. He wrote a very fine hand, and was fond of copying manuscripts, which he did with extraordinary neatness, adorning them with pretty vignettes, of which he often invented the subjects. In this manner he did me the honour to copy some of my poetical effusions. He never neglected an opportunity of expressing a comic antipathy to the art of printing.—Life of Goethe.

GILPIN, THE AUTHOR OF FOREST SCENERY, AND MASON THE POET.

Went with Mr H. of Sydney, to his rooms, and saw for the first time, what I have long wished to see, some of Gilpin's original sketches in Indian ink;—very masterly, and asserting a claim to the highest species of merit, by producing great effects with little effort.—H. speaks con amore of Gilpin, as a friend, a companion, a pastor, and in every special relation, afflicted with an incurable complaint, but perfectly resigned to his fate; and complacent and even cheerful under it. It is delightful to find our admiration of the writer confirmed, on a nearer view, by qualities which must secure our esteem for the man. H. showed me a copy of a letter from Mason to Gilpin (with Gilpin's comments) written on the same day that Mason was struck speechless, and within two days of his death; very easy, gay, and spirited:—he had no presentiment of his danger.—Diary of a Lover of Literature.

TRUE WOMANHOOD.

The graces which characterise a really feminine woman never decay, they only change places by degrees, as they advance in life. This beauty of form which enchants us; these lines so delicate; these tints so soft and lovely; in a word, all the female graces are transposed from the body to the mind. When young, it is by the eyes—when elderly, by the ears that they captivate us,—and we only cease to look at them with pleasure to listen to them with interest, with respect.—Preface to 'Sigismund Augustus.' [There is a great deal of truth in this, and it is delicately said. But women who have been truly lovely, that is to say, amiable as well as handsome, never quite lose their loveliness, even in appearance. There is a look in the eye—a grace and sweetness about the mouth,—retained of necessity by the graces of the mind.]

CONSOLING POSSIBILITY.

When I see an afflicted and unhappy man, I say to myself,—There is, perhaps, a man whom the world would envy if they knew the value of his sorrows, which are possibly intended only to soften his heart, and to turn his affections towards their proper centre.—Cowper. Letter 88.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IN answer to the question of W. S., we have to say, that we respect the talent of his friend, Mr M., but fear the Readers would think we gave them too many verses on the same subject. The other lines he speaks of, are to be found in one of the volumes of the 'Examiner;' but we cannot say which, nor, at present, refer to the series to find out. An answer in our next to the remaining points in our friend's letter.

All errors which our Readers are good enough to notice in our SUPPLEMENTS, will be carefully corrected at the close of the subject at present handled in them.

The flowery and four times welcome communication from Croydon, will find, in the course of a week or two, that we are duly sensible of its kindness.

We have written to Mr J. D. of Wellington, So merset, according to the direction sent us; but his agent has left the place. It will be sufficient to mention here perhaps, that the answer respecting his manuscript was what he did us the honour of wishing it to be.

We are compelled to postpone several other notices till next week.

WORDSWORTH'S SONNETS.

"It is allowed on all hands, now, that there are no sonnets in any language comparable with Wordsworth's. Even Milton must yield the palm. He has written but about a dozen or so, Wordsworth some hundreds—and though nothing can surpass 'the inspired grandeur of that on the Piedmontese Massacre, the tenderness of those on his Blindness and on his Deceased Wife, the grave dignity of that to a Young Lady, or the cheerful and attic grace of those to Lawrence and Cyriac Skinner,' as is finely said by the writer of an article in the 'Edinburgh Review' on Glassford's 'Lyrical Translations,' yet many of Wordsworth's equal even these—and the long and splendid array of his sonnets—deploying before us in series after series—astonishes us by the proof it affords of the inexhaustible riches of his imaginative genius and his moral wisdom. One series on the river Duddon—two series dedicated to Liberty—three series on our Ecclesiastical History—miscellaneous sonnets in multitudes—and those last poured forth as clear, and bright, and strong, as the first that issued from the sacred spring!"—Blackwood's Magazine.

Most true is this. Wordsworth's untired exuberance is indeed astonishing; though it becomes a little less so, when we consider that his genius has been fortunate in a long life of leisure, his opinions not having rendered it necessary to him to fight with difficulties, and daily cares, and hostile ascendancies, as Milton's did,

"Expos'd to daily fraud, contempt, and wrong,

With darkness and with dangers compass'd round."

In that condition sat the great blind epic poet; and after having performed an active as well as contemplative part for his earthly sojourn, still combined action with contemplation in a mighty narrative, and built the adamantine gates of another world. In no invidious regard for one great poet against another do we say it; but in justice to fame itself, and in the sincerest reverence of admiration for both. With the exception of Shakespeare (who included everybody), Wordsworth has proved himself the greatest contemplative poet this country has produced. His facility is wonderful. He never wants the fittest words for the finest thoughts. He can express, at will, those innumerable shades of feeling which most other writers, not unworthy too, in their degree, of the name of poets, either dismiss at once as inexpressible, or find so difficult of embodiment, as to be content with shaping them forth but seldom, and reposing from their labours. And rhyme, instead of a hindrance, appears to be a positive help. It serves to concentrate his thoughts, and make them closer and more precious. Milton did not pour forth sonnets in this manner,—poems in hundreds of little channels,—all solid and fluent gold. No; but he was venting himself, instead, in 'Paradise Lost.' 'Paradise Lost,' if the two poets are to be compared, is the set-off against Wordsworth's achievement in sonnet-writing. There is the 'Excursion,' to be sure; but the 'Excursion' is made up of the same purely contemplative matter. It is a long-drawn song of the nightingale; as the sonnets are its briefer warbles. There is no eagle-flight in the 'Excursion'; no sustenance of a mighty action; no enormous hero, bearing on his wings the weight of a lost eternity, and holding on, nevertheless, undismayed,—firm-visaged through faltering chace,—the combatant of all chance and all power,—a vision that, if he could be seen now, would be seen in the sky like a comet, remaining, though speeding,—visible for long nights, though rapidly voyaging,—a sight for a universe,—an actor on the stage of infinity. There is no such robust and majestic work as this in Wordsworth. Compared with Milton he is but as a dreamer on the grass, though a divine one, and worthy to be compared as a younger, a more fluent-speeched, but less potent brother, whose business it is to talk and think, and gather together his flocks of sonnets like sheep, (beauteous as clouds in heaven) while the other is abroad, more actively moving the world, with contemplations that take the shape of events. There are many points of resemblance between Wordsworth and Milton. They are both serious men; both in earnest; both maintainers of the dignity of poetry in life and doctrine; and both are liable to some objections on the score of sectarianism, and narrow theological views. But Milton widened these as he grew old; and Wordsworth, assisted by the advancing light of the times (for the greatest minds are seldom as great as the whole instinctive mind of society), cannot help conceding or qualifying certain views of his own, though timidly, and with fear of a certain few, such as Milton never feared. Milton, however, was never weak in his creed, whatever it was; he forced it into width enough to embrace all place and time, future as well as present. Wordsworth would fain dwindle down the possibilities of heaven and earth within the views of a Church-of-England establishment. And he is almost intirely a retrospective poet. The vast future frightens him, and he would fain believe that it is to exist only in a past shape, and that shape something very like one of the smallest of the present, with a vestry for the golden church of the New Jerusalem, and beadles for the "limitary cherubs." Now, we hope and believe, that the very best of the past will merge into the future,—how long before it be superseded by a still better, we cannot say. And we own that we can conceive of nothing better than some things which already exist, in venerable as well as lovely shapes. But how shall we pretend to limit the vast flood of coming events, or have such little faith in nature, providence, and the enlightened co-operation of humanity, as to suppose that it will not adjust itself in the noblest and best manner? In this respect, and in some others, Mr Wordsworth's poetry wants universality. He calls upon us to sympathise with his churches and his country flowers, and his blisses of solitude; and he calls well; but he wants one of the best parts of persuasion; he is not reciprocal; he does not sufficiently sympathise with our towns, and our blisses of society, and our reformations of churches (the consequences, after all, of his own. "What would he not have said, by the by, in behalf of Popery, had he lived before a Reformation!") And it may be said of him, as Johnson said of Milton's 'Allegro' and 'Penseroso,' that "no mirth indeed can be found in his melancholy," but it is to be feared there is always "some melancholy in his mirth." His muse invites us to the treasures of his retirement in beautiful, noble, and inexhaustible language; but she does it, after all, rather like a teacher than a persuader, and fails in impressing upon us the last and best argument, that she herself is happy. Happy she must be, it is true, in many senses; for she is happy in the sense of power, happy in the sense of a good intention, happy in fame, in words, in the consciousness of immortal poetry; yet there she is, after all, not quite persuasive,—more rich in the means than the ends,—with something of a puritan austerity upon her,—more stately than satisfactory,—wanting in animal spirits, in perfect and hearty sympathy with our pleasures, and her own. A vaporous melancholy hangs over his most beautiful landscapes. He seems always girding himself up for his pilgrimage of joy, rather than enjoying it; and his announcements are in a tone too exemplary and didactic; we admire him; we venerate him; we would fain agree with him; but we feel something wanting on his own part towards the largeness and healthiness of our own united experiences; and we resent, for his sake as well as ours, that he should insist upon squaring all which is to come, in the interminable future, with the visions that bound a college-cap. We feel that it will hurt the effect of his genius with posterity, and make the most admiring of his readers in the third and fourth generation, lament over his narrowness. In short, his poetry is the sunset to the English church,—beautiful as the real sunset "with evening beam," gorgeous, melancholy, retrospective, giving a new and divine light to the lowliest flowers, and setting the pinnacles of the churches golden in the heavens. Yet nothing but a sunset and a retrospection it is. A new and great day is coming,—diviner still, we believe,—larger, more universal, more equable, showing (manifestly) the heavens more just, and making mankind more truly religious, because more cheerful and grateful.

The Editor of 'Blackwood' justly prides himself on having appreciated this noble poet from the first; but it is a pity, we think, that he looks back in anger upon those whose literary educations were less fortunate;—who had been brought up in schools of a different taste; and who showed, after all, a natural strength of taste singularly honourable to them, in being able to appreciate real poetry at last, even in quarters to which the editor himself, we believe, has never yet done justice, though no man could do it better. For Wilson's prose (and we could not express our admiration of it more highly) might stretch forth its thick and rich territory by the side of Keats's poetry, like a land of congenial exuberance,—a forest tempest-tost indeed, compared with those still vallies and enchanted gardens, but set in the same identical region of the remote, the luxuriant, the mythological,—governed by a more wilful and scornful spirit, but such as bates only from an inverted principle of the loving, impatient of want of sympathy, and incapable, in the last resort, of denying the beautiful where-soever existing, because thereby it would deny the divine part of itself. Why should Christopher North revert to the errors of his critical brethren in past times, seeing that they are all now agreed, and that every one of them perhaps has something to forgive himself in his old judgments (ourselves assuredly not excepted,—if we may be allowed to name ourselves among them)? Men got angry from political differences, and were not in a temper to give dispassionate poetical judgments. And yet Wordsworth had some of his greatest praises from his severest political opponents (Hazlitt, for instance); and out of the former Scotch school of criticism, which was a French one, or that of Pope and Boileau, came the first hearty acknowledgment of the merits of Keats, for whom we were delighted the other day to find that an enthusiastic admiration is retained by the chief of that school (Jeffrey), whose natural taste has long had the same honour of triumphing over his educational one, and who ought, we think, now that he is a Lord of Session, to follow, at his leisure moments, the example set him by the most accomplished of all national benches of judicature, and give us a book that should beat, nevertheless, all the Kameses and Woodhouseles before him; as it assuredly would.

RABELAIS.

"The chronicler of Gargantua possessed, doubtless, a very extensive, though perplexed and ill-assorted, stock of learning, and this unworthy member of the Franciscan order was endowed with a keen perception of the vices and follies of his age; but he appears not to respect himself, and his reader can have no sort of personal esteem for an author of his description. So much profane and ribbald merriment, which would be scandalous in a layman, becomes insufferable in an ecclesiastic; and though occasionally some amusement may be found amid the effusions of his exuberant imagination, and the audacious oddity of his conceits, disgust and loathing quickly supervene at the constant obtrusion of cynicism and indecency."—From an article, intitled 'The Days of Erasmus,' in 'Fraser's Magazine.'

We remember, when first we took up Rabelais, (in the admirable translation of Urquhart and others) we thought, on reading the exordium, that we had found a man to be delighted with and laugh with, for ever. We had no sooner read a little way,—no further than the second chapter, we think,—when horrible disgust seized us, and we felt inclined to throw the book a mile off. Divers philosophical cogitations on times and manners, &c. enabled us to resume the volume; and now and then, amidst a heap of unintelligible stuff (doubtless, however, with a meaning in it for his contemporaries, if only as a blind [of buffoonery]), our transport at his wit and satire was renewed. His court of law, with the intentional jargon on all sides, cannot be surpassed. Panurge, Gargantua, &c. are immortal names for some of the weaknesses of men and their customs. His eating and drinking are prodigious,—as good as if Hunger and Thirst personified sate down to a feast of revelry, with Wit for their host. And his lists! his very vocabularies! He goes on, giving item after item, till the very continuity of the joke makes us believe there must be something wonderful in it, and the laughter runs over with the full measure. But we spoke of him in this place, chiefly to express our pleasure at the above criticism upon him in 'Fraser,' and to take the opportunity of thanking the Editor of that Magazine for the very kind mention he has made of us, in a note to the article from which it is taken. We have not forgotten a former kindness (when a book of ours was noticed some years ago); and had we seen it at the time, should have been impelled to make a like acknowledgment. But circumstances led us to fancy, that the editor and his fellow-writers, who pour forth such a profusion of quips and cranks and merry scholarship, like some jovial brotherhood on the banks of the Rhine, really had no serious regard for anything, nor were at all disposed to criticise such men as Rabelais in the style of the above paragraph. We beg pardon for our error, and are proud to have moved a grave corner in the hearts of men of so much wit and learning. That they should have thought of ourselves, or of anything we have written, in conjunction with the remembrance of such a man as Erasmus, does not betel in us any presumptuous self-confidence, or lessen our sense of distance from that venerable name. We know how a kind feeling is apt to overflow in its words, and certainly do not value it the less on that account, nor ourselves the more, except as inciters to that kindness (for which we will take full credit). We differ extremely with 'Fraser' in some of its judgments of our contemporaries; but those are part of a political warfare, in which, in our time, we have had our full share both of the "give and take;" and far be it from us, therefore, on every account, to quarrel with anybody during a struggle, for heats and prejudices, as long as they entertain a serious regard for anything, or for anybody else. This is our only stipulation with anyone, for the sake of being able to keep up the common feelings of humanity with him: and we should not stipulate even this, if we thought that he or society could be happy without it, or fair play exist between the pains and pleasures of all. Is it vanity in the shape of modesty that induces us to say this? or a poor wretched ostentation of any sort? Oh no, no. It is suffering and its experiences;—it is that which has made us think at all, and which has left us our power to enjoy whatsoever happiness is within our reach, purely, and for no other reason upon earth but because we have good intentions and wish everybody well. If adversity could benefit everybody else, in this respect, as it has benefited us, we could wish that all mankind were sorrowful half their lives, that they might be happy for the other half. But the mystery of trouble is not to be settled in this manner; and many have all their sorrows heaviest as they grow old. Thank God, evil is not to be compared in general amount with good; nor does it seem that so much of it need be necessary, as the world grows wiser. The means of good are infinite. Good heavens! what heaps lie about us, of which we take little or no heed; and yet we cannot think that they are everlastingly to be wasted.—But we shall be travelling out of the record. Many thanks to "Oliver Yorke," and to all such as have any faith in anything good, particularly to the lovers of books and their humanities; and may the wine of their good-will make them as happy, as their attic salt makes them pleasant and famous.

BIRDS AND CAGES.

"Cage Birds; their Natural History, Management, Habits, Food, Diseases, Treatment, Breeding, and the Methods of catching them. By J. Bechstein, M. D.

"Dr Bechstein loves birds as a Turk loves women; and shows his affection by the accommodations of his seraglio. He is very severe upon amateurs who allow their birds to become diseased from the dirtiness of their cages. 'We love birds they say.' 'No,' I reply; 'you love yourselves, not them, if you neglect to keep them clean.' O! Doctor, Doctor! de te fabula narratur. If you do not love yourself much better than the birds, why all this catching and caging? Why that precious remark that, although all birds are less at ease in a cage than in a room, yet that some 'never sing unless confined within narrow limits, being obliged, as it would appear, to solace themselves for the want of liberty with their song.' We could find in our hearts to cage the Doctor, that he might solace himself for his want of liberty by writing books for our amusement. 'Those that are confined, that we may the better enjoy the beauty of their song, should have a cage proportioned to their natural vivacity: a lark, for example, requires a larger cage than a chaffinch.' We should think so. What sized cage would be proportioned to the author's natural vivacity? 'In the account of each bird I shall point out what shaped cage I have found most suitable.' So he does, but it does not accord with our experience. For most kinds, the best shaped cage is one open at the sides, except a few tree tops, a flat or undulating green bottom, a blue curved roof, or darker coloured with bright spangles for nightingales, which may be changed for a large spirit lamp for larks. The same cage does for both species, or any others. There is nothing like it, and it may be had, gratis, of the maker. Although unable to get over the primary abomination of bird-fancying, we cannot but be interested in the many curious details of this book; and while we would have no more catching, we must say that great advantage would accrue to all which are already caught, from Dr Bechstein's directions about food and general treatment."—Monthly Repository.

This is a capital bit of review, and "turning of the tables." In nothing is the effect of education, for good or evil, more remarkably shown, than in the power which it gives to minds otherwise benevolent and reflecting, to stop short of conclusions obvious to other people. The most startling thing we ever heard said in defence of keeping a bird in a cage, was by an acquaintance of ours in a morbid state of suffering,—a very good, and kind, and thinking man, but exasperated by diseased blood. "God keeps me in a cage," said he; "why shouldn't I keep a bird?" The answer, however, was clear enough. God knows well what he does; he is sure of the end, and therefore justifies the means. But he has not furnished men with a like certainty. If we took upon ourselves to act on that principle, what would be the end of it? and what our evils meanwhile? Our only sure refuge would be want of feeling; and then, at best, what becomes of our pleasures? The only real puzzle in these questions between man and the inferior creation is, how far will they add to, or only vary, the stock of pain, by thinking too much of it, and transferring the suffering from physical to moral? But then comes Duty to cut the knot; and Duty says,—If there is to be pain at all, let me endure it and ennoble it: I must entertain the question; Knowledge and I must become cognizant of it;—if it must end in pain somehow, let the pain have the pleasure of exaltation, and kindness, and majestic necessity. Furthermore, let us take care of health, and all pains may be well borne.

CHURCH-YARDS AND THEIR STORIES.

[FROM 'Legends and Scenes of the North of Scotland and Traditional History of Cremarty, by Hugh Miller;—a highly amusing and interesting book, written by a remarkable man, who will infallibly be well known. We have selected our first extract of it, not only on account of the merits of the passage, and the sample it affords of the style, variety, and entertainment of the work, but because it furnishes us with some account of the author. He is 'Old Mortality' come to life again in a younger and nobler shape; but his own pages will rescue the designation from its applicability. Mr Miller, it seems, is, or has been, a common stone-mason, and itinerant architect of tombs; and 'from cogitation in those shades' he has issued forth a writer, of pretensions that would have been little expected from such a beginning, though (singularly enough—unless it is an Irishism to say so) not without its special precedent in this remarkable age; for Mr Allan Cunningham was of the same trade. But Mr Miller, besides a poetical imagination, though not yet exhibited in verse, has great depth of reflection; and his style is so choice, pregnant, and exceedingly like an educated one, that if itself betrays it in any respect to be otherwise, it is by that very excess; as Theophrastus was known not to have been born in Attica, by his too Attic nicety. We differ with one or two of the author's moral and theological conclusions, but with great respect for his right of judgment and his general liberality. We have read the volume through with the greatest pleasure, as the Reader will see by various extracts that we propose to make from it, and we earnestly exhort Mr Miller to set about making the second volume, of which he gives us hopes; for we are sure the public will call for it.]

WELL I to see a person determined on becoming a hermit, through a disgust of that tame aspect of manners and low tone of feeling which seem the characteristics of what is termed civilized society, I would advise him, instead of retiring into a desert, to take up his place of residence in a country church-yard. Mere solitude cannot surely separate one's thoughts from one's experience; on the contrary, it will only lead one to think the more of it; for the less a man has to engage him in the present, the more will he live in the past. And, besides, from the very constitution of our nature, what we have seen and felt on any occasion, will be remembered all the more vividly if the sight was hateful or unpleasant to us, and the feeling one of pain. What has annoyed and disgusted us in the city will haunt us in the desert. But though it be thus impossible for us to shut our eyes on the society of men, it is quite in our power, by changing our place of observation, to view the denizens of this society in a different phasis; and I am of opinion that their aspect appears nowhere more interesting than when viewed from a country church-yard. The field of graves is a place quite beyond the precincts of the monotonous every-day world; its more interesting visitors do not seem the people of common every-day life. Grief, like love, is a credulous passion; its thoughts and language are the thoughts and language of poetry; its saddest realities glow with the hues of romance; it lives in a world of its own, peopled with hopes and fears which have become spiritual existences; and, while it imparts the splendours of Elysium to the scenes of the past, and the gloom of Tartarus to those of the future, it thinks, amid its tears, of a far different future, which has become the present to those whom it mourns, and in which the enjoyments of the past are more than doubled. What wonder then that the more interesting visitors of the church-yard should seem a different class of beings from the people of common life. Instead of hearing them inquire in the manner of the modern Sadducee, whether there be angel or spirit, we see, that not only do they believe in the separate existence of the soul, but also, in many instances, in what is told of its occasional visits from the world of the departed to the world of men. Instead of being compelled to hate them for their apathy and indifference, we find that they are susceptible of grief, and have been softened by bereavement into tenderness and sympathy;—by the sadness of the countenance, says Solomon, the heart is made better. Instead of having to deplore their low scorn of religion, we perceive that their only hope and solace is in accordance to its sanction. What is still better, we find a reciprocity of feeling awakened in ourselves. Without having recourse to the phantasies of poetry, we are transported to the regions of romance; without imagining anything higher of our brethren of mankind than is really to be found among them, our better sympathies are awakened in their behalf; without abstracting ourselves from the influence of example we are incited to the practice of virtue.

There is no personage of real life who can be more properly regarded as a hermit of the church-yard than the itinerant sculptor, who wanders from one country burying-ground to another, recording on his tablets of stone the tears of the living, and the worth of the dead. If possessed of a common portion of feeling and imagination, he cannot fail of deeming his profession a school of benevolence and poetry. For my own part, I have seldom thrown aside the hammer and trowel of the stone mason, for the chisel of the itinerant sculptor, without receiving some fresh confirmation of the opinion. How often have I suffered my mallet to rest on the unfinished epitaph, when listening to some friend of the buried expatiating with all the eloquence of grief on the mysterious warning, and the sad death-bed, on the worth that had departed, and the sorrow that remained behind! How often, forgetting that I was merely an auditor, have I so identified myself with the mourner, as to feel my heart swell, and my eyes becoming moist! Even the very aspect of a solitary church-yard seems conducive to habits of thought and feeling. I have risen from my employment to mark the shadow of tombstone and burial mound creeping over the sward at my feet, and have been rendered serious by the reflection, that as those gnomons of the dead marked out no line of hours, though the hours passed as the shadows moved, so, in that eternity in which even the dead exist, there is a nameless tide of continuity, but no division of time. I have become sad, when looking on the green mounds around me, I have regarded them as waves of triumph which time and death had rolled over the wreck of man; and the feeling has been deepened, when looking down with the eye of imagination through this motionless sea of graves, I have marked the sad remains of both the long departed, and the recent dead, thickly strewn over the bottom.—I have grieved above the half-soiled shroud of her for whom the tears of bereavement had not yet been dried up, and sighed over the mouldering bones of him whose very name had long since perished from the earth.

Not long ago I wrought for about a week in the burying ground of Kirk Michael, a ruinous chapel in the eastern extremity of the parish of Resolia, and distant about six miles from the town of Cromarty. It is a pleasant solitary spot, lying on the sweep of a gentle declivity. The sea flows to within a few yards of the lower wall, but the beach is so level, and so little exposed to the winds, that even in the time of tempest there is heard within its precincts only a faint rippling murmur, scarcely loud enough to awaken the echoes of the ruin. Ocean seems to muffle his waves in approaching this field of the dead. A row of elms springs out of the fence, and half encircles the building in the centre. Standing beside the mouldering walls of the latter, the foreground of the scene appears thickly sprinkled over with graves and tablets; and we see the green moss creeping round the rude sculptures of a primitive age, imparting lightness and beauty to that on which the chisel had bestowed quite an opposite character. The flake-like leaves and gnarled trunks of the elms fill up what a painter would term the midground of the picture; and seen from between the boughs, the bay of Cromarty, shut in by the Sutors, so as to present the appearance of a huge lake, and the town beyond half enveloped in blue smoke,—the windows sparkling through the cloud like spangles on a belt of azure, occupy the distance.

The western gable of the ruin is still intire, though the very foundations of part of the walls can no longer be traced on the sward, and it is topped by a belfrey of hewn stone, in which the dead bell is still suspended. From the spires and balls with which the cornice is surmounted, the moss and lichens which bristle over the mouldings, and the stalks of ragweed which shoot out here and there from between the joints, the belfrey, though designed in a barbarous style of architecture, is rich in the true picturesque. It furnished me, when the wind blew from the east, with an agreeable music, not, indeed, either gay or very varied, but of a character which suited well with that of the place. I wrought directly under it, and frequently paused in my labours to hearken to the blast moaning amid its spires, and whistling through its apertures; and have occasionally been startled by the mingling death-like tones produced by the hammer, when forced by the wind against the sides of the bell. I was one day listening to this music, when, by one of those freaks which fling the light of recollection upon the dark recesses of the past, much in the manner that I have seen a child throwing the gleam of a mirror from the sunshine into the shade, there were brought before me the circumstances of a dream, deemed prophetic of the death of him whose epitaph I was then inscribing. It was one of those auguries of contingency which, according to Bacon, men mark when they hit, and never mark when they miss.

In the latter part of 1822, a young lad, a mason's apprentice, was employed with his master in working within the policies of Pointzfield,—a gentleman's seat about a mile from the burying-ground. He wished much to visit the tombs and chapel, but could find no opportunity, for the day had so shortened that his employments engaged him from the first peep of light in the morning, until half an hour after sunset. And perhaps the wish was the occasion of the dream. He had no sooner fallen asleep, after the fatigues of the day, than he found himself approaching the chapel, as he thought, in one of the finest of midsummer evenings. The whole western heavens were suffused with the blush of sunset,—the hills, the woods, the fields, the sea, all the limbs and members of the great frame of nature seemed enveloped in a mantle of beauty. He reached the buryingground, and deemed it the loveliest spot he had ever seen. The tombs were finished after the most exquisite designs, chastely Grecian, or rich Gothic; and myriads of flowering shrubs winded around the urns, and shaded the tablets in every disposition of beauty. There was a profusion of roses, mingled with large spreading flowers of a vivid blue. The building seemed intire, but it was so encrusted with moss and lichens as to present an appearance of extreme antiquity; on the western gable there was fixed a huge gnomon of bronze. Suddenly a low breeze began to moan through the shrubs and bushes, the heavens became overcast, and the dreamer, turning towards the building, with a sensation of fear, beheld the gnomon revolving slowly as on an axis, until the point rested on the sward. He fled the place, and when floundering on in darkness and terror, as he thought, through a morass that stretches beyond the southern wall of the chapel, he awoke. Only five weeks elapsed from the evening of his dream, until he followed to this burying-ground the corpse of a relative, and saw that the open grave occupied the identical spot on which the point of the gnomon had rested.

During the course of the week which I spent in the burying-ground, I became acquainted with several interesting traditions connected with its inhabitants. There are some of these which show how very unlike the beliefs entertained in the ages which have departed; are to those deemed rational in the present; others which render it evident that though men at different eras think and believe differently, human nature always remains the same. The following partakes in part of the character of both.

There lived, about a century ago, in the upper part of the parish of Cromarty, an elderly female of that disposition of mind which Bacon describes as one of the very errors of human nature. Her faculties of enjoyment and suffering seemed connected by some invisible tie to the fortunes of her neighbours; but this tie, unlike that of sympathy, which binds pleasure to pleasure, and sorrow to sorrow, by a strange perversity united to each other the opposite feelings. She was happy when the people around her were unfortunate, and miserable when they prospered. So decided a misanthropy was met by a kindred feeling in those acquainted with her; nor was she regarded with only that abhorrence which attaches to the evil wish, and the malignant intention, but also with the contempt due to that impotency of malice which can only wish and intend.

Her sphere of mischief, however, though limited by her circumstances, was occupied to its utmost boundary; and she frequently made up for her want of power by an ingenuity, derived from what seemed in her an almost instinctive knowledge of the weaknesses of human nature. It was difficult to tell how she effected her schemes, but certain it was that in her neighbourhood lovers became estranged, and families divided. Late in the autumn of her last year, she formed one of a band of reapers employed in cutting down the crops of a Cromarty farmer. Her partner on the ridge was a poor widow, who had recently lost her husband, and who, though wasted by grief and sickness, was now toiling for her three helpless orphans. Every person on the field pitied her but one; and the malice of even that one, perverted as her dispositions were, would, probably, have been disarmed by the helplessness of its object, had it not chanced, that, about five years before, when the poor woman and her deceased husband were on the eve of their marriage, she had attempted to break off the match, by casting some foul aspersions on her character. Those whom the wicked injure, says the adage, they never forgive; and with a demoniac abuse of her knowledge of the dispositions of the people with whom she wrought, she strained beyond her strength to get a-head of them, knowing that a competition would necessarily take place, in which, she trusted, the widow would either have to relinquish her employment, as above her strength, or so exhaust herself in the contest as to relapse into sickness. The expected struggle ensued, but, to the surprise of everyone, the widow kept up her place in the foremost rank until evening, when she appeared less fatigued than almost any of the party. The wretch who had occasioned it, and who had fallen behind all the others, seemed dreadfully agitated for the last two last hours it continued; and she was heard by the persons who bound up the sheaves, muttering, the whole time, words, apparently, of fearful meaning, which, however, were drowned amid the rustling of the corn, and the hurry and confusion of the competition. Next morning she alone of all the reapers was absent; and she was found by the widow, who seemed the only one solicitous to know what had become of her, and who first entered her hovel to inquire after her, tossing in the delirium of a fever. The poor woman, though shocked and terrified by her ravings, and her agony, tended her till within half an hour of midnight, when she expired.

At that late hour a solitary traveller was passing the road which winds along the southern shore of the bay. The moon, in her last quarter, had just risen over the hill on her right, and, half veiled by three strips of cloud, rather resembled a heap of ignited charcoal seen through the bars of a grate, than the orb which only a few nights before had enabled the reaper to prosecute his employments until near morning. The blocks of granite scattered over the neighbouring beach, and bleached and polished by the waves, were relieved by the moonshine, and resembled flocks of sheep ruminating on a meadow; but not a single ray rested on the sea beyond, or the path or fields before;—the beam slid ineffectually along the level;—it was light looking at darkness. On a sudden, the traveller became conscious of that strange mysterious emotion which, according to the creed of the demonologist, indicates the presence or near approach of an evil spirit. He felt his whole frame as if creeping together and his hair bristling on his head, and, filled with a strange horror, he heard, through the dead stillness of the night, a faint, uncertain noise, like that of a sudden breeze rustling through a wood at the close of autumn. He blessed himself, and stood still. A tall figure, indistinct in the darkness, came gliding along the road from the east, and inquired of him, as it floated past, in a voice hollow and agitated, whether it could not reach Kirk-Michael before midnight? "No living person could," answered the traveller; and the appearance, groaning in reply, was out of sight in a moment. The sounds still continued as if a multitude of leaves were falling from the boughs of a forest, and striking with a pattering sound on the heaps congregated beneath, when another figure came up, taller, but even less distinct than the former. It bore the appearance of a man on horseback.—"Shall I reach Kirk-Michael before midnight?" was the query again put to the terrified traveller; but before he could reply to it the appearance had vanished in the distance; and a shriek of torment and despair, which seemed re-echoed by the very firmament, roused him into a more intense feeling of horror. The moon shone out with supernatural brightness; the noise, which had ceased for a moment, returned, but the sounds were different, for they now seemed to be those of faint laughter, and low indistinct mutterings, in the tone of ridicule, and the gigantic rider of a pale horse, with the appearance of a female bent double before him, and accompanied by two dogs, one of which tugged at the head, and the other at the feet of the appearance, was seen approaching from the west. As this terrible apparition passed the traveller, the moon shone full on the face of the figure on the horse, and he distinctly perceived, though the features seemed convulsed with agony, that they were those of the female who, unknown to him, had expired a few minutes before.

A REAL FAVOURITE.

Such was the estimation in which Paesello's opera, 'La Frascatana,' was held in Italy, that I have been told it was always brought forward on the failure of any new one, as sure to appease a dissatisfied audience.—Lord Mount-Edgcumbe's Musical Reminiscences.

LODORÉ.

THE NEW NOVEL BY MRS SHELLEY.

[We extract two portraits from Mrs Shelley's work, one of a passive, plump, smiling old maid (capitally well drawn), who cannot be unhappy or unforgiving if she would, so well has the happy mediocrity of her character profited by a long country life,—the other of an active young female philosopher, the creature of thought, adversity, and good-heartedness, and firm without being masculine.]

Whoso had heard the good lady talk of endless tears and mournings for the loss of Lodoré, of life not worth having when he was gone, of the sad desolation of their position, and looked at her face beaming with satisfaction, with only so much sensibility painted there as to render it expressive of all that is kind and compassionate, good humour in her frequent smiles, and sleek content in her plump person, might have laughed at the contrast, and yet have pondered on the strange riddle we human beings present, and how contradictions accord in our singular machinery. This good aunt was incapable of affectation, and all was true and real that she said. She lived upon the idea of her brother; he was all in all to her; but they had been divided so long, that his death scarcely increased the separation; and she could talk of meeting him in heaven, with as firm and as cheerful a faith, as a few months before she had anticipated his return to England.

"I lost (said Fanny) my guide, preserver, my guardian angel, when my father died. Nothing remains but the philosophy which he taught me—the disdain of low-thoughted care which he sedulously cultivated: this, joined to my cherished independence, which my disposition renders necessary to me."

"And thus you foster sorrow, and waste your life in vain regret?"

"Pardon me! I do not waste my life," replied Fanny, with her sunny smile; "nor am I unhappy: far otherwise. An ardent thirst for knowledge is as the air I breathe, and the acquisition of it is pure and unalloyed happiness. I aspire to be useful to my fellow-creatures; but that is a consideration for the future, when fortune shall smile on me. Now I have but one passion: it swallows up every other, it dwells with my darling books, and is fed by the treasures of beauty and wisdom which they contain."

Ethel could not understand. Fanny continued: "I aspire to be useful; sometimes I think I am—once I know I was. I was my father's almoner."

"We lived in a district where there was a great deal of distress, and a great deal of oppression. We had no money to give, but I soon found that determination and earnestness will do much. It was my father's lesson, that I should never fear anything but myself. He taught me to penetrate, to anatomize, to purify my motives; but, once assured of my own integrity, to be afraid of nothing. Words have more power than anyone can guess; it is by words that the world's great fight, now in the civilized times, is carried on; I never hesitated to use them when I fought any battle for the miserable and oppressed. People are so afraid to speak, it would seem as if half our fellow-creatures were born with deficient organs; like parrots they can repeat a lesson, but their voice fails them when that alone is wanting to make the tyrant quail."

As Fanny spoke her blue eyes brightened, and a smile irradiated her face. These were all the tokens of enthusiasm she displayed; yet her words moved Ethel strangely, and she looked on her with wonder as a superior being. Her youth gave grace to her sentiments, and were an assurance of their sincerity. She continued:—

"I am becoming flighty, as my mother calls it; but, as I spoke, many scenes of cottage distress passed through my memory when, holding my father's hand, I witnessed his endeavours to relieve the poor. That is all over now—he is gone; but I have one consolation—that of endeavouring to render myself worthy to rejoin him in a better world. It is this hope that impells me continually, and without any flagging of spirit, to cultivate my understanding and to refine it. Oh, what has this life to give, as worldlings describe it, worth one of those glorious emotions which raise me from this petty sphere into the sun-bright regions of mind which my father inhabits! I am rewarded, even here, by the elevated feelings which the authors whom I love so passionately inspire; while I converse each day with Plato, and Cicero, and Epictetus, the world, as it is, passes from before me like a vain shadow."

These enthusiastic words were spoken with so calm a manner, and in so equable a voice, that there seemed nothing strange nor exaggerated in them. It is vanity and affectation that shock, or any manifestation of feeling not in accordance with the real character. But while we follow our natural bent, and only speak that which our minds spontaneously inspire, there is a harmony which, however novel, is never grating.

[This is admirable, and so is the pervading spirit of the work. Its object is to soften the heart by self-reflection, and render it fit soil for those beautiful flowers of patience and cultivated feeling, always as ready to spring up under certain views of nature and the universe, as new plants are to make their appearance in a ground freshly turned up to the sun.]

TIGHT LACING.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

SIR,—Your late observations on 'Female Beauty' convince me, that in you the fair sex have an able champion and discerning admirer. This emboldens me to hope that you will not refuse to give publicity, by means of your much-read Journal, to a few remarks on the odious and dangerous custom, so long and so extensively adopted in this country, of encasing the fair and noble forms of our females in tightly-laced stays—a practice to which their appearance, and (what is of so much more importance) their health, is but too often sacrificed. I am aware that this subject is considered by many to be so purely professional, as not to come within the province of a journal like yours to discuss; but so anxious am I that a few of the most glaring evils of the system should be widely and extensively exposed, that I have trespassed on your time by stating them. Our medical periodicals circulate so exclusively amongst medical men, that it would be in vain to appeal to the public through those channels. If these remarks should be the means of inciting other and more able pens than mine to the work of reformation, my object will be attained. We have been so long accustomed to see females of all but the most tender age wearing stays, that we are apt to consider them indispensable and things of course; and I am well aware that the proposal to abolish them altogether will be considered by many as absolutely preposterous. I was talking, a few days ago, to a lady on this subject, and observed that stays were both hurtful and unnecessary; "But, my dear sir," said she, "I should be no figure at all without them." Now this is the very point on which so much delusion prevails. A small waist is considered by, I will say, the majority of persons as the only essential to a good figure. Graceful carriage, a finely-turned bust, symmetry and harmony of proportion, are either not understood or are overlooked. Hence all that screwing, and twisting, and torturing, to which the pliant form of many a fair young creature is condemned; and hence the pale look, the narrow chest, and tottering walk, which all observe, but so few attribute to the true cause.

The cavity of the chest is destined to receive the most important vital parts—the heart, the lungs, &c. If, then, this cavity be compressed, as it is by stays, it of course follows that impediment to their due action is the inevitable result. We are accustomed to hear the Chinese ridiculed for the manner in which they confine and distort the feet of their women. I have seen just as much deformity of the chest result from tight-lacing, in this country, as could possibly be produced on the feet by pressure such as I have mentioned. The ancients, who had so acute a perception of the beautiful, and the remains of whose sculpture are still referred to as models of excellence, may be quoted on this point. Compare the form of the Venus de Medici with that of a modern belle. Where do we find in the former the wasp-like distortion of waist, the stiff, constrained attitude, and narrow chest of the latter? No, all is free, graceful, and flowing; and such perfection may be still seen among savage nations, but may in vain be looked for among those who call themselves civilized. The last and fairest of the Almighty's creations is doomed to be marred by the hands of the mantua-maker. How long is this state of things to exist?—how much longer are we to boast of our refinement, and yet remain inferior to the most savage tribes in attention to health and elegance? Most probably, until some leader of fashion shall set the example; when it will be followed by the rest of the world, who will then look back with astonishment at the folly of their previous system, and wonder that people could ever be found so insane as to sacrifice everything to a false standard of beauty. It is too much to expect that a person, who has all her life been accustomed to the support of stays can at once leave them off altogether. Use is second nature; and that which was at first painful pressure has become, by long custom, a necessary support. But it is in behalf of the rising generation that I would plead. Strengthen their young bodies by nutritious food and plentiful exercise in the open air, and nature, thus assisted, not thwarted, will bring them to a vigorous maturity.—I am, Sir,

THEORY OF DREAMING.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

DEAR SIR,—I dare say you are well aware that few things are more wondered at than dreams; and, perhaps, few things are less understood. This, perhaps, arises from the fact, that, when the state of sleep is considered at all, it is considered in its extreme opposition to our state when awake. It is not considered, that there are as many intermediate states as there are hues in the rainbow, and that these states imperceptibly dissolve into each other in somewhat the same manner. There is fatigue, languor, drowsiness, the dosing state, and a thousand other intermediate states between each of these, of which it would be as difficult to give a catalogue as it would be to delineate every arc in a circle. There is no great difference between fatigue and languor: excessive languor is a species of drowsiness, excessive drowsiness is scarcely distinguishable from the dosing state, and the extreme state of dosing may almost be sleep. If it were questioned of one or any of these intermediate states, no one would be disposed to ascribe anything remarkable to them. Why, then, should we impute anything strange or uncommon to one state which we decidedly refused to impute to another—which, if it possesses any difference at all, it is a difference which is hardly perceptible, and which could not be distinguished by the nicest investigator?

Those who make a point of wondering at sleep, maintain that there is not a continued state of thought during sleep—or, in fact, that there is no thought at all; but that, as soon as we lie down and sleep commences, thought at that instant ceases; and that our sleep is varied only by occasional inspirations, which they call dreams. Others maintain that dreams are merely an excited and exuberant imagination, but deny that we are continually imagining while asleep. "We do not believe," say they, "that we are continually thinking while asleep, because we do not remember our thoughts." So I must conclude, that because, at the end of six or seven hours, I do not remember my thoughts during that time, that, therefore, I have not thought at all. How many days pass away, and we, upon the revival of them, do not remember a single thought which has occupied our minds during that time! Surely then, if, upon the revival of days, we cannot remember a single thought, it is not very wonderful that we should not be able to recall to memory every idea that has passed in our minds during six or seven hours. If, then, from the non-remembrance of our thoughts during sleep, we conclude that we do not think at all, we must follow up the conclusion by affirming that only those thoughts have really existed (both when asleep and awake) which we can recall to memory. The nature of our thoughts during sleep is characterized by their peculiar vividness and intensity. The vigour of the intellectual faculties, in this instance, may be accounted for by the repose of the sensational faculties; since it is an established principle of the mind, that, when one or more faculties cease their exertion, the remaining faculties assume additional strength. The man who exerts his arms, body, and feet at the same time, must employ less strength in each of those limbs than he would do were all the others at rest. What is true, in this instance, in our physical nature, is true also in our mental. When you wish to recall the countenance of a friend, you involuntarily close your eyes. If then, upon the cessation of one of the sensational faculties, the imagination is increased, how much more must it be increased upon the repose of all those faculties! If, upon the cessation of sight, our fancy is more vivid, how much more vivid must it be when not only sight, but the sensations of touch, taste, smelling, and hearing cease their operations! The mind is somewhat like a masquerade. When the room is full of company, the separate characters are unable to exhibit themselves to advantage; but remove half of those characters, and the remainder will be able to sport about with grace and dexterity. This vividness of the imagination during sleep is modified by the individual propensities—the miser dreams of his gold, the mother of her darling; by circumstantial casualties, by the passions which influence us—such as hope, fear, remorse. Sometimes we regard the past, sometimes the future, sometimes neither; but our mind is engaged in what is termed castle-building, in which we suppose ourselves placed in circumstances in which we should hope or fear to be placed.

There is yet one thing in the phenomenon of sleep worthy of notice, and that is, the confusion of our thoughts. For instance, I dream that I visit my friend; but, at the same time, fancy myself surrounded by my own children, my own chattels, and my own pleasure-grounds. Or I fancy that I am attacked by a robber; and yet, at the same time, fancy he is a well-known friend. The confusion, in this instance, I consider may be accounted for, by supposing that the idea of the robber first arises in my mind; and the idea of my friend, to whom I should always fly in distress, so rapidly succeeds, that the idea of the robber has not time to die away before the idea of my friend succeeds, and consequently the two are blended together. The same remark may be applied to the first instance, and, I consider, to all other instances of the kind. If a wheel is caused slowly to revolve, each spoke may be distinctly perceived as it describes its circle; but increase its motion to rapidity, and you will not be able to see whether there are four, eight, or sixteen spokes—but the whole will be blended in one confused and indistinct whirl, to which the confusion of thoughts alluded to is somewhat similar. Thus, then, it is my opinion that there is a continued state of thought during sleep; that the vividness of that thought may be accounted for by the cessation of the sensational faculties, and their occasional confusion by their rapidity.

And thus I have endeavoured to give an outline of my thoughts upon a subject which well deserves a more lengthened attention. If they are incorrect, the fact that I have read no work, and have had no help whatever on the subject, may afford some excuse for

CHARLES IX, OF ST BARTHOLOMEW NOTORIETY.

(From 'Raumer's Historical Documents'.)

HE was liberal to everyone, and was often heard to say, "A King must be ready in giving, for nations are like rivers, which pour down their waters continually to the ocean, that is, the Treasury." His bodily exercises consisted in jumping, tennis, breaking or shoeing horses, or in driving them, which he understood well, even with four-in-hand. Besides these, he forged weapons, cast cannons, fished and hunted. He was especially, from his childhood, addicted to the chase, even to phrenzy. Day and night he wandered about the forests, careless of food or rest, as long as he could indulge his passion. Upon the paraphernalia of the chase, the resorts and haunts of the game, and the manner of taking every sort, he has written a book. This daily pursuit of beasts made him cruel towards them, but not towards men.* He killed horses with his own hand, and if he met with asses he frequently struck off their heads, and paid their value to the owners. He killed swine in the presence of his courtiers, and dabbled with bloody hands in their entrails, like a common butcher's man. As he, on one occasion, fell in this fashion upon a mule of Lausac's, who was a favourite of the courtier's, Lausac cried out, "Whence has this feud arisen between my mule and the most Christian King?"

Of all arts he practised music by preference, cultivated singers, in particular an eunuch, surnamed Le Roi, and sung himself with a strong and melodious voice, in the choir. He also gave to musicians considerable ecclesiastical situations.

Marie Touchet, the beautiful daughter of an apothecary in Orleans, was much beloved by him, and bore him two sons. When a picture was shown her of the new Queen of France, Elizabeth (daughter of Maximilian II), she is said to have laughed, and to have said, "Germany does not alarm me."

When a child he studied grammar, and occupied himself with sciences, but as soon as he was King, he laid aside these pursuits as unworthy of a sovereign; for, in the judgment of the courtiers, it is praiseworthy to be ignorant. Yet he loved poetry, and himself composed poems in the French tongue. Among the authors of Latin poetry he was partial to Dorat; among those of French, to Ronsard and Baif; when they read their poems to him he listened with great attention, and gave them presents, but not large ones, in order that, from want of money, they might return soon, and bring something new. The poets he said, are like good horses, which we must feed, but not fatten.

* "Hæc quotidiana belluarum insectatio sanguineum eum reddebat in feras, non in homines." M. Raumer has considered this passage so much at variance with history, that he has altered the sense in his translation, by supposing that the word non had been falsely inserted. I venture, with much deference, to doubt whether the passage should not be considered as correctly given. The behaviour of Charles IX, in the affair of St Bartholomew, has been recorded to his infamy; but it must be remembered that he was young, and the puppet of others; and it is also recorded of him, that he looked back with horror and repentance to his conduct on that occasion. Such feelings could hardly have been the work of such spiritual advisers as he was likely to have about him, and may be fairly presumed to have been the natural working of a nature not originally cruel.—(Translator's Note.)—[There was a mixture of natures undoubtedly in Charles; and he deserves all the excuses that can be found for him in a bad and despotic education, and the tendency which it superinduces to all sorts of madness. But excessive cruelty, or thoughtlessness, or whatever it may be called, towards the brute creation is, to say the least of it, not likely to dispose a man to consideration for his other fellow-creatures. The habit is dangerous, and likely to turn the scale to their disadvantage, especially the love of excitement is stimulated by circumstances and fancied right or necessity. Butchers are wisely forbidden to be upon juries; not because they are not as good as other men by nature, and often as truly kind, but because the habit of taking away the lives of sheep and oxen inures them of necessity to the sight of blood and violence, and mortal pangs. Poor King Charles, we see, had been suffered to grow up into an amateur pork-butcher! and of the most disgusting description! Who is to wonder what such princes become!—ED.]

He ate little, and for his health's sake drank only water, or hygieenas, made of water, sugar, and cinnamon. He slept very little, and before midnight was generally on horseback, putting the hounds in motion, or about something. His sickness was increased by the fear of the machinations of his brother Francis and his nephew Henry, as well as by the suspicion that he was wasting away by slow poison, or magical contrivances. On this ground two Italian soothsayers, Momus and Kormus, were cast into prison.

Charles was tall, but stooped much. His complexion was pale, of the colour of box-wood, a hook nose, wry neck, thin limbs. He was of over-basty disposition, impatient, wrathful, fierce, but not cruel; a good memory, a master of dissimulation, when he chose; voluptuous, but not to excess; eloquent, and of sharp judgment. Perjury seemed to him nothing but a figure of speech, and no crime; he, therefore, violated his faith as often as it seemed to his profit to do so.

MACKAREL FISHERY.

(From 'Yarrell's History of British Fishes'.)

In May 1707, the first Brighton boat-load of mackarel sold at Billingsgate for forty guineas per hundred,—seven shillings each, reckoning six score to a hundred; the highest price ever known at that market. The next boat-load produced but thirteen guineas per hundred. Mackarel was so plentiful at Dover in 1808, that they were sold sixty for a shilling. At Brighton, in June of the same year, the shoal of mackarel was so great, that one of the boats had the meshes of her nets so completely occupied by them, that it was impossible to drag them in; the fish and nets, therefore, in the end, sunk together; the fishermen thereby sustaining a loss of nearly sixty pounds, exclusive of what the cargo, could it have been got into the boat, would have produced. The success of the fishery in 1821 was beyond all precedent. The value of the catch of sixteen boats, from Lowestoffe, on the 30th of June, amounted to 5852*l.*; and it is supposed that there was no less an amount than 14,000*l.* altogether realized by the owners and men concerned in the fishery of the Suffolk coast.* In March 1833, on a Sunday, four 'Hastings' boats brought on shore ten thousand eight hundred mackarel; and the next day, two boats brought seven thousand fish. Early in the month of February, 1834, one boat's crew from Hastings, cleared 100*l.* by the fish caught in one night; and a large quantity of very fine mackarel appeared in the London market in the second week of the same month. They were cried through the streets of London three for a shilling on the 14th and 22nd of March 1834, and had then been plentiful for a month. The boats engaged in fishing are usually attended by other fast-sailing vessels, which are sent away with the fish taken. From some situations, these vessels sail away direct for the London market; at others, they make for the nearest point from which they can obtain land-carriage for their fish. From Hastings and other fishing towns on the 'Sussex coast the fish are brought to London by vans, which travel up during the night.

The common mode of fishing for mackarel, and the way in which the greatest numbers are taken, is by drift-nets. The drift-net is twenty feet deep, by one hundred and twenty feet long; well corked at the top, but without lead at the bottom. They are of small fine twine, which is tanned of a reddish brown colour, to preserve it from the action of the sea-water; and it is thereby rendered much more durable. The size of the mesh about two and a half inches or rather larger. Twelve, fifteen, and sometimes eighteen of these nets are attached lengthways, by tying along a thick rope, called the drift-rope, and at the ends of each net, to each other. When arranged for depositing in the sea, a large buoy attached to the end of the drift-rope is thrown overboard, the vessel is put before the wind, and, as she sails along, the rope with the nets thus attached is passed over the stern into the water till the whole of the nets are run out. The net thus deposited hangs suspended in the water perpendicularly twenty feet deep from the drift-rope, and extending from three-quarters of a mile, or even a mile and a half, depending on the number of nets belonging to the party or company engaged in fishing together. When the whole of the nets are thus handed out, the drift-rope is shifted from the stern to the bow of the vessel, and she rides by it as if at anchor. The benefit gained by the boat's hanging at the end of the drift-rope is, that the net is kept strained in a straight line, which, without this pull upon it, would not be the case. The nets are shot in the evening, and sometimes hauled once during the night, at others allowed to remain in the water all night. The fish, roving in the dark through the water, hang in the meshes of the net, which are large enough to admit them beyond the gill-covers and pectoral fins, but not large enough to allow the thickest part of the body to pass through. In the morning early, preparations are made for hauling the nets. A capstan on the deck is manned, about which two turns of the drift-rope are taken. One man stands forward to untie the upper edge of each net from the drift-rope, which is called casting off the lashings; others hand in the net with the fish caught, to which one side of the vessel is devoted; the other side is occupied by the drift-rope, which is wound in by the men at the capstan. The whole of the net in, and the fish secured, the vessel runs back into harbour with her fish; or, depositing them on board some other boat in company, that carries for the party to the nearest market, the fishing vessel remains at sea for the next night's operation.

The name (mackarel) is said to be derived from the Latin macularius, in allusion to its spotted appearance; and it is called in most of the countries of Europe by terms that have reference to its variegated and chequered appearance.

COWSLIPPING. MAY-DAY.

(By the Author of 'May Flowers'.)

HAIL to thee, thou most beautiful of months! thou girl-hood of the year! We love thee for thy budding beauties, for the glad smile that thou throwest over garden and woodland and meadow—we love thee for the "merry minstrelsy" which greeteth thee from the "restless cuckoo" and the "twittering swallow"—we love thee for thy bright skies and balmy breezes; but more than all we love thee for the remembrances thou bringest to us of our early school-days—the by far brightest part of our earthly career. It was on May-day that we always sallied out from school to go "cowslipping," to pull the bright golden flowers, for the purpose of making wine, for our kind-hearted school-mistress. I remember well how anxiously the first of May was looked for; for weeks before that joyful advent, our whole conversation in and out of school-hours turned upon the merry "cowslipping;" and it certainly was a merry time, though not characterised by that obstreperous merriment which usually distinguishes the amusements of boyhood. No! it was merry as the first holiday of the year, as the first day we went out together; it seemed like the promise of other days of summer beauty—it whispered to us of hope, and it seemed to some of us—certainly to me—as emblematical of the glorious beauty of a fadeless world.

Well then, early on the May morning, while yet the dew was sparkling in the bright beams of the sun, while yet the sky-lark was "pouring its full heart" in its matin song to heaven, did we joyous creatures commence our ramble "o'er hill and dale." Gentle Reader! the fields, the hedge-sides, and the woodland walks we traversed were those that the "pious Cowper" has made dear to many of you in his 'Task'; they were those in the neighbourhood of Olney; we went either over the meadows to Clifton Hill, or across the fields by the "peasant's nest," to the beautiful park of Weston Underwood. We were not satisfied, as some would have been, with gathering sufficient, we were anxious that we should go home as the bearers of plenty, and for this purpose the great clothes-basket was put into requisition, two taking it by turns to be the flower bearers. The largest cowslips we used to think grew under the hedges and in the spinnies, but those growing in the open field, with the bright sun full upon them, were those that we considered sweetest, and were told made the best wine. What emulation was there to be the quickest gatherer of the best and finest flowers! I remember when by chance we once came upon a sunny baulk of land in a fallow field that we were crossing, what a host of these nodding beauties were congregated together, and what a scramble, and yet what fearful care of treading upon them! for we held it as unworthy of us to tread one of them down if we could help it; and then the display of our different handfuls when we had finished, and the delighted feeling of those whose bunch was the largest; never did successful card-player feel more delight—never could he feel that pure unalloyed delight—that one of us felt at displaying "a good hand;" and yet there were no bickerings—no envious feelings towards the successful. We came out to be happy, and we were so, and joined in the delight of the victors. Miles have we traversed, sometimes running, sometimes stooping, always joyful and good-tempered; and when our basket had become full as it would hold, if we had any sorrow, it was that our pleasant task had ended.

But on our arrival home a repast awaited us of plum-cake, and what else do you think? why of cowslip wine, wine made from the very cowslips that the year before we had gathered; and how pleasant the talk and prattle about our last year's excursion—of poor Joe Brooks's fall into the ditch that was overgrown by thick grass, near Dingleberry-wood; and the charge we made upon a wasp's nest, and how we left them victors; and how some of us had grown since then, and how one of our playfellows of that day, who was dear to us as a brother, and gentle and affectionate as a brother should be, was not amongst our number now, but had departed with the beauty of the departed year; and then the hopes and the expectations and the wonderings as to our next May-day's excursion; and then the separation in the evening, and the pleasant dreams we had of "cowslipping." Since a child, I have been a lover of cowslip wine; the mystery of that love is not in the sweetness or flavour of the cowslip, but in the remembrance that ever comes with it of the days when I was a gatherer of cowslips.

[Youthful spirits are certainly the best of all wines; and pleasant recollections are wine; and good "articles" are wine. Yet cowslip wine is good for its own sake too. Also, for performing the part of a harmless opiate:—

"If your point be rest, Lettuce and cowslip wine; probatum est."

POPE.

Our Correspondent also might have given us a beautiful passage from Shakspeare, relative to cowslips. The sweet wife Imogen (Shakspeare excels in painting sweet wives) has—

"On her left breast

A mole cinque-spotted, like the crimson drops
In the bottom of a cowslip."

Iachimo notes it down in the stealthy list which he had no right to make; otherwise, we should not have it; so we are beholden to him for one good turn, at all events. Shakspeare could not record a wrong, without making it yield us something beautiful.

There is, or used to be, an abundance of cowslips in a meadow at the back of Hendon Church, after passing the archway, through which you go into the fields in that quarter. We mention this for the sake of the lovers of flowers, the cowslip not being commonly met with nearer London.—ED.]

* In an interesting and useful sketch of the 'Natural History of Yarmouth and its Neighbourhood,' by C. and T. Paget, is stated, at page 16, that, in 1823, one hundred and forty-two lots of Mackarel were taken there. A last is ten thousand.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XVII.—RICHARD II.

'RICHARD II.' is a play little known compared with 'Richard III,' which last is a play that every unfledged candidate for theatrical fame chooses to strut and fret his hour upon the stage in; yet we confess that we prefer the nature and feeling of the one to the noise and bustle of the other; at least, as we are so often forced to see it acted. In 'Richard II,' the weakness of the king leaves us leisure to take a greater interest in the misfortunes of the man. After the first act, in which the arbitrariness of his behaviour only proves his want of resolution, we see him staggering under the unlooked-for blows of fortune, bewailing his loss of kingly power, not preventing it, sinking under the aspiring genius of Bolingbroke, his authority trampled on, his hopes failing him, and his pride crushed and broken down under insults and injuries, which his own misconduct had provoked, but which he has not courage or manliness to resent. The change of tone and behaviour in the two competitors for the throne according to their change of fortune, from the capricious sentence of banishment passed by Richard upon Bolingbroke, the suppliant offers and modest pretensions of the latter on his return, to the high and haughty tone with which he accepts Richard's resignation of the crown after the loss of all his power, the use which he makes of the deposed king to grace his triumphal progress through the streets of London, and the final intimation of his wish for his death, which immediately finds a servile executioner, is marked throughout with complete effect and without the slightest appearance of effort. The steps by which Bolingbroke mounts the throne are those by which Richard sinks into the grave. We feel neither respect nor love for the deposed monarch; for he is as wanting in energy as in principle: but we pity him, for he pities himself. His heart is by no means hardened against himself, but bleeds afresh at every new stroke of mischance, and his sensibility, absorbed in his own person, and unused to misfortune, is not only tenderly alive to its own sufferings, but without the fortitude to bear them. He is, however, human in his distresses; for to feel pain, and sorrow, weakness, disappointment, remorse and anguish, is the lot of humanity, and we sympathize with him accordingly. The sufferings of the man make us forget that he ever was a king.

The right assumed by sovereign power to trifle at its will with the happiness of others as a matter of course, or to remit its exercise as a matter of favour, is strikingly shown in the sentence of banishment so unjustly pronounced on Bolingbroke and Mowbray, and in what Bolingbroke says when four years of his banishment are taken off, with as little reason:—

"How long a time lies in one little word?
Four lagging winters and four wanton springs
End in a word: such is the breath of kings."

A more affecting image of the loneliness of a state of exile can hardly be given than by what Bolingbroke afterwards observes of his having "sighed his English breath in foreign clouds;" or than that conveyed in Mowbray's complaint at being banished for life.—

"The language I have learned these forty years,
My native English, now I must forego:
And now my tongue's use is to me no more
Than an unstrung viol or a harp,
Or like a cunning instrument cas'd up,
Or being open, put into his hands
That knows no touch to tune the harmony.
I am too old to fawn upon a nurse,
Too far in years to be a pupil now."

How very beautiful is all this, and at the same time how very English too!

'Richard II.' may be considered the first of that series of English historical plays, in which "is hung armour of the invincible knights of old," in which their hearts seem to strike against their coats of mail, where their blood tingles for the fight, and words are but the harbingers of blows. Of this state of accomplished barbarism the appeal of Bolingbroke and Mowbray is an admirable specimen. Another of these "keen encounters of their wits," which serve to whet the talkers' swords, is where Aumerle answers in the presence of Bolingbroke to the charge which Bagot brings against him of being an accessory in Gloster's death:—

"FITZWATER. If that thy valour stand on sympathies,

There is my gage, Aumerle, in gage to thine;
By that fair sun that shows me where thou stand'st
I heard thee say, and vauntingly thou spak'st it,
That thou wert cause of noble Gloster's death.
If thou deny'st it twenty times thou liest,
And I will turn thy falsehood to thy heart
Where it was forged, with my rapier's point.

AUMERLE. Thou dar'st not, coward, live to see the day.

FITZWATER. Now, by my soul, I would it were this hour.

AUMERLE. Fitzwater, thou art damn'd to hell for this.

PERCY. Aumerle, thou liest; his honour is as true,

In this appeal, as thou art all unjust;
And that thou art so, there I throw my gage
To prove it on thee, to th' extremest point
Of mortal breathing. Seize it, if thou dar'st.

AUMERLE. And if I do not, may my hands rot off,
And never brandish more revengeful steel
Over the glittering helmet of my foe.
Who sets me else? By heav'n, I'll throw at all.
I have a thousand spirits in my breast,
To answer twenty thousand such as you.

SURRY. My lord Fitzwater, I remember well
The very time Aumerle and you did talk.

FITZWATER. My lord, 'tis true: you were in presence then:

And you can witness with me, this is true.

SURRY. As false, by heav'n, as heav'n itself is true.

FITZWATER. SURRY, thou liest.

SURRY. Dishonourable boy,
That lie shall lie so heavy on thy sword,
That it shall render vengeance and revenge,
Till thou the lie-giver and that lie rest
In earth as quiet as thy father's skull.
In proof whereof, there is mine honour's pawn:
Engage it to the trial, if thou dar'st.

FITZWATER. How fondly dost thou spur a forward horse:

If I dare eat or drink or breathe or live,
I dare meet Surry in a wilderness,
And spit upon him, whilst I say he lies,
And lies, and lies: there is my bond of faith,
To tie thee to thy strong correction.
As I do hope to thrive in this new world,
Aumerle is guilty of my true appeal."

The truth is, that there is neither truth nor honour in all these noble persons; they answer words with words, as they do blows with blows, in mere self defence: nor have they any principle whatever but that of courage in maintaining any wrong they dare commit, or any falsehood which they find it useful to assert. How different were these noble knights and "barons bold" from their more refined descendants in the present day, who, instead of deciding questions by brute force, refer everything to convenience, fashion, and good breeding! In point of any abstract love of truth or justice, they are just the same now that they were then.

The characters of Old John of Gaunt and of his brother York, uncles to the King, the one stern and foreboding, the other honest, good-natured, doing all for the best, and therefore doing nothing, are well kept up. The speech of the former, in praise of England, is one of the most eloquent that ever was penned. We should perhaps hardly be disposed to feed the pampered egotism of our countrymen by quoting this description, were it not that the conclusion of it (which looks prophetic) may qualify any improper degree of exultation.

"This royal throne of kings, this scepter'd isle,
This earth of Majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-Paradise,
This fortress built by nature for herself
Against infection and the hand of war;
This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone set in the silver sea,
Which serves it in the office of a wall
(Or as a moat defensive to a house)
Against the envy of less happy lands:
This nurse, this teeming womb of royal kings,
Fear'd for their breed and famous for their birth,
Renowned for their deeds, as far from home,
For Christian service and true chivalry,
As is the sepulchre in stubborn Jewry
Of the world's ransom, blessed Mary's son;
This land of such dear souls, this dear dear land,
Dear for her reputation through the world,
Is now leas'd out (I die pronouncing it)
Like a tenement or pelling farm.
England, bound in with the triumphant sea,
Whose rocky shore beats back the envious surge
Of wat'ry Neptune, is bound in with shame,
With inky-blots and rotten parchment bonds.
That England, that was wont to conquer others,
Hath made a shameful conquest of itself."

The character of Bolingbroke, afterwards Henry IV, is drawn with a masterly hand:—patient, for occasion, and then steadily availing himself of it, seeing his advantage afar off, but only seizing on it when he has it within his reach, humble, crafty, bold, and aspiring, encroaching by regular but slow degrees, building power on opinion, and cementing opinion by power. His disposition is first unfolded by Richard himself, who however is too self-willed and secure to make a proper use of his knowledge.

"Ourself and Bushy, Bagot here and Green,
Observed his courtship of the common people:
How he did seem to dive into their hearts,
With humble and familiar courtesy,
What reverence he did throw away on slaves;
 wooing poor craftsmen with the craft of smiles,
And patient under-bearing of his fortune,
As 'twere to banish their affections with him.
Off goes his bonnet to an oyster-wench;
A brace of draymen bid God speed him well,
And had the tribute of his supple knee,
With thanks my countrymen, my loving friends:
As were our England in reversion his,
And he our subjects' next degree in hope."

Afterwards, he gives his own character to Percy, in these words:—

"I thank thee, gentle Percy, and be sure
I count myself in nothing else so happy,
As in a soul remembr'ing my good friends;
And as my fortune ripens with my love,
It shall be still thy true love's recompense."

We know how he afterwards kept his promise. His bold assertion of his own rights, his pretended submission to the king, and the ascendancy which he tacitly assumes over him without openly claiming it, as soon as he has him in his power, are characteristic traits of this ambitious and politic usurper. But the part of Richard himself gives the chief interest to the play. His folly, his vices, his misfortunes, his reluctance to part with the crown, his fear to keep it, his weak and womanish regrets, his starting tears, his fits of hectic passion, his smothered majesty, pass in succession before us, and make a picture as natural as it is affecting. Among the most striking touches of pathos are his wish "Oh that I were a mockery king of snow to melt away before the sun of Bolingbroke," and the incident of the poor groom who comes to visit him in prison, and tells him how "it yearned his heart that Bolingbroke upon his coronation day rode on Roan Barbary." We shall have occasion to return hereafter to the character of Richard II in speaking of Henry VI. There is only one passage more, the description of his entrance into London with Bolingbroke, which we should like to quote here, if it had not been so used and worn out, so thumbed and get by rote, so praised and painted; but its beauty surmounts all these considerations.

"DUCHESS. My lord, you told me you would tell the rest,

When weeping made you break the story off
Of our two cousins coming into London.

YORK. Where did I leave?

DUCHESS. At that sad stop, my lord,
Where rude misgovern'd hands, from window tops,
Threw dust and rubbish on king Richard's head.

YORK. Then, as I said, the duke, great Bolingbroke,

Mounted upon a hot and fiery steed,
Which his aspiring rider seem'd to know,
With slow, but stately pace, kept on his course,
While all tongues cried—God save thee, Bolingbroke!

You would have thought the very windows spake,
So many greedy looks of young and old
Through casements darted their desiring eyes
Upon his visage; and that all the walls,
With painted imagery, had said at once—
Jesu preserve thee! welcome, Bolingbroke!
Whilst he, from one side to the other turning,
Bare-headed, lower than his proud steed's neck,
Bespoke them thus—I thank you, countrymen:
And thus still doing thus he pass'd along.

DUCHESS. Alas, poor Richard! where rides he the while?

YORK. As in a theatre, the eyes of men,
After a well-grac'd actor leaves the stage,
Are idly bent on him that enters next,
Thinking his prattle to be tedious:
Even so or with much more contempt, men's eyes
Did scowl on Richard; no man cried God save him!

No joyful tongue gave him his welcome home:
But dust was thrown upon his sacred head!
Which with such gentle sorrow he shook off.
His face still combating with tears and smiles,
The badges of his grief and patience—
That had not God, for some strong purpose, steel'd
The hearts of men, they must perforce have melted.
And barbarism itself have pitied him."

FINE ARTS.

The British Atlas. By J. and C. Walker. Part II, Kent and Dorset. Longman and Co.
We expressed our admiration of the work's getting-up on its first appearance; and, in speaking of Part II, must repeat what we said of Part I; adding, however, that the price is surprisingly moderate.

MUSIC.

Mr J. D. Humphreys' Concert, Assembly Rooms, Kensington.

MR HUMPHREYS, assisted by an orchestra composed principally of his fellow pupils of the Royal Academy of Music, got up an unpretending, but very nice concert. The programme included many popular pieces, and yet chiefly consisted of good music, two points requiring some nicety of judgment to unite. E. Seguin sang a duet with his wife, 'Come frenar,' and a song, 'Non piu andrai,' which he much injured by substituting a poor tune of his own, in place of the original melody, at the commencement. It was unworthy the rest of his singing. Mr Patey played a concerto on the violin, by De Beriot, more calculated to show off the skill of the performer than the composer's invention. The sextetto, 'Sola, sola,' from the Don Giovanni, was very excellently sung by Misses Gooch, Dickens, and Birch, and Messrs Barnett, W. Seguin, and Hullah; particularly the solo, in which Leporello (W. Seguin) begs for his life. Mr Humphreys sang a ballad of Weber's, 'We never meet again,' with great taste and feeling, accompanying himself on the pianoforte. He obtained a most unanimous encore; indeed, the ballad appeared the favourite of the morning. The rest of the music was, for the most part, well done; we must make an exception of Mr Lejeune's 'Sorgets,' in which common-place and bravado supplied the place of dignity and energy. Why will he deform everything he does with a profusion of uncouth attempts at execution? This was apparent in the duet also, 'Dunquo is son,' though that was much better in other respects. The whole orchestra, instrumental and vocal, deserve the highest commendation, for the pains-taking, and unanimity with which they performed together. The band, however, might have allowed us to discover for ourselves how well they performed, and not have insisted on making so prominent a display as sometimes to drown the singers. The room was very full, and the natives of this pleasant suburb seemed highly delighted with their morning's treat.

TO — .

LADY! I love thee, as the stars of night
Love distant the moon, when queenly she Sheds o'er the dome of Heaven her holy light,
Illustring earth, purpling the silver sea!
Lady! I love thee with the poet's love
Of feeling sigh'd to song; so the lorn bird,
Of eve, if yearning toward her native grove,
Breaks into saddest music. Thou hast stirr'd
The sleeping sources of my minstrel art
With love that clasps no hope of kindredhood!
With pride that seeks not praise—with joy of heart
Nigh link'd to sorrow. Who like me hath woo'd,
Consenting to his fate? which binds him here
To love—admire—adore—and still despair!

TABLE TALK.

A BAKER PORT.

France as well as England has had her poets in humble life; of one of the most remarkable of whom a letter from Chambery gives the following notice:—"An interesting guest, the baker and poet, Reboul, has recently visited Chambery; he is about thirty-eight years of age, a native of the south of France, and is well known to Charles Nodier, Victor Hugo, Lamartine, and other celebrated men. His recitation of verses in the accent and full-sounding dialect of the south, has a peculiar and pleasing effect. His best poems have been composed in his bakehouse, and although he has been repeatedly entreated to abandon his trade, leave Nîmes, and reside at Paris, yet he has always rejected these proposals. He is devotedly attached to his native town, and to the mode of life, manners, nature, and climate of his provincial country. His dwelling is very simple; butts of meal obstruct the passage to his little chamber behind the oven." Here dwells, not Reboul the baker, but Reboul the poet. Drawings, sent to him by the artists themselves, ornament the walls; books, presented by their authors, lie upon the table; and the cards of all the eminent men of the department are stuck against a small looking-glass; his bed occupies one corner of the apartment. The occasion of his visit to Chambery was to buy meal. His presence in our town being discovered by the secretary of the Academy of Arts, he received more visits in his humble lodging than were perhaps agreeable to him."—Printing Machine.

ADVANTAGES OF READING.

A truth which dawns upon our own minds becomes doubly true when we find that it has enlightened the minds of others, who have left us bright records of its usefulness and beauty; and an error which we perceive in ourselves is far more startling in its effect upon us, when we find that it has been detected by some thoughtful man who lived ages ago, and who has forcibly shown, by his own experience, its fatal tendencies, and who has distinctly warned mankind against its delusive promises. What we see and feel ourselves becomes thus more clearly and distinctly manifest to us; and no one who is true to himself, however false the world around may prove to him, will blind himself to his own consciousness and to the experience and teachings of others, of the beauty of knowledge, the safety and the imperishable dignity and glory of virtue, the deformity of vice, and the dangers and unworthiness of ignorance. We often meet, too, with some happy expressions in books, which flash at once new light upon our souls; and the simplicity with which some old truth is thus enforced incorporates it ever after as a part of our intellect and feelings; so that, if the infirmities of our nature, or the accidents of our lives, ever lead us to the hazard of acting in contradiction to it, some mysterious link in association recalls to us the happy sentiment in the very words in which it was uttered; and the delight with which we first read it steals anew over us, and we turn with disgust from the thoughts or the actions that are opposed to its salutary instruction.—From an Address delivered at the opening of the Reading Room in Grenville street, Brunswick square, by Francis Boott, M.D.

ROUNDNESS OF THE HUMAN CONFIGURATION.

Viewing the human body as a complicated whole, as a congeries of organs made up of various combinations of simple tissues, it may be observed, in reference to its external configuration, that it is rounded. This rounded form is principally owing to the large proportion of fluids which enter into its composition. The roundness of the face, limbs, and entire surface of the child, are in striking contrast to the unequal and irregular surface of the old man, whose humours are comparatively very much smaller in quantity.—Dr Southwood Smith's 'Philosophy of Health.'

LAUGHTER.

Man is the only animal with the powers of laughing, a privilege which was not bestowed upon him for nothing. Let us then laugh while we may, no matter how broad the laugh may be, short of a lock-jaw, and despite of what the poet says about "the loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind." The mind should occasionally be vacant as the land should sometimes lie fallow; and for precisely the same reason.—The Melange; by Egerton Smith.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. was received, and is right; as will be seen; though there is a want of art and probability in the work, which will prevent the Author's real talents from being duly appreciated by the public.

CORLESS-SERREX will find, by and by, that we have not overlooked his just grounds of objection; though we should have thought we had already left none for mistake on that point.

We will endeavour to answer Z.'s question more at length; but need he to doubt what to do, after what has been said?

We are much mistaken, if we have not already intimated our opinion respecting the 'Lines to a First Floor next the Sky,' though we cannot call to mind the reason for their omission. It was nothing discreditable to the writer or his general abilities.

Mr K. has our best thanks and respects. The work in question will receive the proper attention.

An answer respecting 'Frænoonian Tales' next week.

A Notice of the Royal Academy Exhibition, and 'Hints for Table Talk,' are unavoidably postponed till next week.

There are many Correspondents remaining, whose communications we would fain publish; but if we do not, we must beg them to construe us in kindness; particularly as, in accordance with what we stated at the beginning of the year, we are about to make some further additions to the regular stock-matter of the Journal, which will not leave us our usual room for contributions.

PRICE THREE HALFPENCE.

UNION OF THE "LONDON JOURNAL" AND THE "PRINTING MACHINE."

ON Saturday, June 6, at Mr Knight's, 22 Ludgate street, by the speciallest of all licenses (and the most reasonable) to wit, their own, will be married the parties above-mentioned; after which, the happy couple will set off for all parts of the world, and pass four thousand nine hundred and sixty honeymoons; such being, by the most moderate computation, the term of their natural lives.

Yes, dear Reader, the LONDON JOURNAL is about to "change its condition:"—not itself, observe; for why should it? It will never be more itself than at this moment; as a married journal ought to be. It only changes, or rather enriches, its condition, its relative circumstances; and being a paper, it naturally marries a printing-machine; and its partner, being a machine of the most unmechanical and intelligent description, is to be very generous and amiable, and accommodate its humours to it in so charming a manner, that there would be an end of its having any will of its own, if the two wills did not thus become one, and merge will into pleasure. And thus what a happy pair shall we be; and how glad our ninety-nine thousand hosts will be to see us every Saturday morning, like some immortal and ubiquitous Monsieur and Madame Dacier, clubbing their stocks of scholarship, and presenting themselves in all those quarters at once, chatting and to chat, and with hands full of flowers, after the fashion of those groups on the old curtains, in which the same identical shepherd and shepherdess are reiterated through the whole district of chintz!

But marriage is expensive; and we are very much of the honest opinion of that custom in Wales, by which young couples are set up in life by the joint contributions of their friends, the favours to be returned on the like occasion; so, in a like beautiful spirit of reciprocity, we plainly tell our loving Readers, that they must assist us, and prepare themselves for a magnanimous rise in the estimation of our worth, to the value of One Halfpenny;—with this difference, however, from the Welsh state of the case, —that the benefit to be received from us in return is not prospective, but immediate, and that our halfpennyworth of increased attraction and entertainment will have evinced a modesty (not to mince the matter) astonishing, in rating its value so low.—To drop the metaphor, and state the case simply to the readers both of the LONDON JOURNAL and the PRINTING MACHINE, we would have them consider, that such as have already taken in both those papers, and therefore paid four-pence halfpenny for the two, may now have the essence of both for less than half the money, and that such as have only taken in one, may now have two instead of one, at the least possible increase of price in one case, and a great lowering of it in the other. The worth of each paper will be augmented, we conceive, by concentration,—none of the best matter of either being lost, and none of doubtful value being required in order to fill up; so that here will be the LONDON JOURNAL at its old price, with the PRINTING MACHINE added to it for a halfpenny; or the PRINTING MACHINE at two-thirds its old price with the LONDON JOURNAL added to it for nothing! It does not become us to deal in notes of admiration, and statements of our own merits; but we should like some eloquent third party,—Mr Robins, for instance,—to have this matter to expatiate on, in some candid pulpit, or long and just advertisement. We fancy we see the TALL CAPITALS and BRILLIANT ADVANTAGES rearing their heads at intervals amidst the exuberant set-out, like the Pagoda in Kew Gardens, or the minarets of some Eastern paradise; and if he entered thoroughly into our merits, and did really set out the allurements of all our Gardens, fabulous and real, and of the stories told in them, and the great men beheld in them, and the light thrown by the sunbeams upon their minutest flowers and pebbles, we ask, with an emphatic but tranquil modesty, where would he stop? He would be obliged to have a whole 'Times' or 'Chronicle' to himself, —the news of the day coming in at the close of the last column, in a brief paragraph;—lamenting, that it can "barely allude to interesting intelligence from Paris,"—"but the IMPORTANT ADVERTISEMENT" —

We have heard it whispered, we must confess, in one or two quarters, that there may be some possible peril in raising the price of our Journal, even so small a sum, considering how many new readers there are now-a-days, of such publications, struggling with unfitting poverty; but we have reason to doubt whether we have many readers so poor as the doubt supposes, whatever be the narrowness of means which they contrive to square with the demands of intellectual thirst and hunger; and readers of that kind we have no fear of losing. It has even happened to us, that Correspondents have advised us to raise our price, before we had any such grounds for it as at present; and an intelligent and long-established bookseller, who gave us the same advice, said "Depend upon it, that readers who take in such a paper as the LONDON JOURNAL, must like it for the liberal opinions it recommends, and are not the men to part company with it for a halfpenny."

The readers of the London Journal, all rising in a body, and speaking with a soul of loving indignation at the doubt. Believe him, sir; believe him.

Readers of the Printing Machine, rising also. And are we to be doubted? Has not the Printing Machine abounded in contempt of sordidness?

Here the Editor makes a bow to innumerable faces, right and left of him; and endeavours to maintain a becoming aspect, between his natural indifference to pence, and his acquired sense of their value, and gratitude for regard.

In sober truth, we hope this junction of the two papers will be as acceptable to our friends, as it is pleasant to ourselves. The LONDON JOURNAL has long desired to be helped and enriched by other regular contributors. And in this case the Editor will be assisted in point of time, labour, and materials, not only by additional contributions, but by having a large and distinct portion of the united work placed under the responsible management of the gentleman who has edited the PRINTING MACHINE from its commencement. If the separate responsibilities were not so defined as they are in this instance, still we should have no apprehension of any collision of opinion. We are not strangers; and upon all the great principles by which the opinions and feelings of men are determined, we have as perfect an agreement as can be expected from those who hold the right of thinking for themselves, with the most hearty toleration of the thoughts of others. Nor will the Editor of THE LONDON JOURNAL omit a single contribution of his own; the old original articles, and the Romances of Real Life, Fine Arts, &c. will appear as usual, none the worse for an arrangement which may be of very serious benefit to himself; and as circumstances tend to show every day, that more good can be done to all parties by publications rather miscellaneous than critical, Mr Knight gladly takes occasion of throwing one paper into the other, and the writers of the PRINTING MACHINE as gladly avail themselves of their briefer, and more concentrated columns, to confine their notices in future to books of the most interesting description, exclusively, the nuts and sweetmeats of the tribe.

About five Pages will be devoted to the LONDON JOURNAL, and its usual variety of matter; about three to the review of books, constituting the PRINTING MACHINE. And if good spirits, plenty of subjects, and cordial co-operation, can do anything towards making our paper better than before, we confidently reckon upon its being so.

. The Reader will observe that our day of publication is changed from Wednesday to Saturday. We confess we take leave of the old day with a pang, partly for old acquaintance sake (in the 'Indicator' and 'Tailor'), and partly because Charles Lamb (whose praise warrants us in being venturous enough to repeat it) said that the former of those publications made

"Wednesday the sweetest in the week."

(We are afraid we are guilty of a great piece of egotism here, but the recollection of the man must excuse it.) The reason however why we make the change is, that Saturday turns out to be the most convenient and profitable day for publication. Readers of cheap periodical papers, for the most part, find the close of the week the most convenient time for reading them,—making them part of their Sabbath recreation (let us add, no profane part, considering the uses and beauties of God's creation which they set forth); and the vendors of such papers, which are mostly published on the Saturday, crowd for them accordingly towards the close of the week, like people to a fair, and are apt, naturally enough, to look upon a call on their time and attention, on less customary days, as a supererogation which considerate editors might spare them. We propose, therefore, in future, to fall in with the crowd of comforts and conveniences at the end of the week, and become a part of its repose, and leisure, and contemplative enjoyment. We hope we shall be thumbed horribly, and carried about in pockets, like a love-letter, or other certificate of merit.

LETTER-WRITING.

THERE are few occupations which come, in, for, so large a share of abuse as letter-writing. You continually hear persons complain of the hardship of devoting an hour or two to corresponding with their friends. Gentle Reader, art thou one of these complainers? or, like thy humble servant, art thou fond both of receiving and bestowing the dumb-talkers, vulgarly yclept "letters"? If thou art not—although the confession will greatly lower thee in my eyes—I do not mean to scold thee, or to sneer at thee for thy want of taste, for experience has taught me that the dislike is not confined to dull persons, but shared occasionally by men of genius, and even of the finest sympathies of their fellows. I will acknowledge that to me this seems somewhat of a paradox; but it is true. Even the young lady who steals to her chamber at school to spend hours in a secret correspondence with her "dearest Matilda," and who scribbles of the delight, the ecstasy, she experiences, in pouring forth her soul to her sweet friend,—even she, I say, is far more "delighted" when her task is finished, and she may join her less sentimental school-mates at the skipping-rope, or puss-in-the-corner. As to the school-boy, letter-writing is completely out of the question with him; except, indeed, when he takes up his disinterested pen to remind mamma of the quarterly cake, which he never fails to do a full fortnight before it is due. And for the edification of the Reader, and the freshening of his school-day recollections, I will go out of my way to transcribe an epistle of this sort, which was, the other day, triumphantly placed in my hands by the lady to whom it was addressed: it ran as follows:—

"DEAR MOTHER,—I have not written to you for a very long time, but as I am now expecting to receive a parcel from you shortly, I take up my pen to let you know that I received the last cake quite safely, and felt much obliged to you for it; though, as I have been so very busy in preparing for examination-day, I could not possibly find time to acknowledge it before. Now, however, I begin to fear you will think me ungrateful, and therefore contrive to scribble these few lines. Give my best love to Papa, and Sarah, and Mary, and believe me, Dear Mother, your dutiful Son, JOHN SMITH.

"P.S. The last cake was much injured by not being properly packed; it jolted about, and got broken. Some small things are wanted for what my uncle, Captain Harrison, used to call "dunnage." Are the apples good this year? J. S."

¶ This epistle (as the sagacious Reader will doubtless have discovered) is written by a clever boy,—who, when he gets into the world, will understand well "what he is about." I would call particular attention to the consummate skill with which he introduces a hint that his "prog-basket" may contain a few apples. Of course it was successful: his mother could not fail to see at once that apples were the only things to keep the cake steady in its perilous journey to her "dear John," and John is praised to everyone for his "sense."—"Who would have thought such a mere lad could understand packing?" "Dear fellow!" &c. &c. A "friend of the family" who was present at the receipt of this epistle, ventured to remark that, he thought it rather laconic, and that "the cake" had occupied an undue portion of it. Heavens! how the parents bristled up! Papa (a merchant) insists this very circumstance was a proof that John is "a straight-forward, business-like fellow, with no humbug about him;" and then your attention is called to the decidedly nautico-mercantile caste of mind evinced by the use of the word "dunnage;" this is pronounced a most lucky predilection, John being intended for the office. What can you say or do against such strong argument? Decidedly, the only course is to let papa and mamma have their own way.

It is impossible, however, as I have said above, to select any particular class or classes of persons as especial letter-haters; or any on whom a contrary application may be bestowed. Let us therefore inquire why so many of the former are to be found. I take the grand cause to be—indolence. The getting out one's desk, mending a pen, and mere setting down to write a letter or two is, with many, an hour's work; they therefore commence in a cross-grained, lazy humour, and how can they be expected to take a pleasure in the occupation? Many, from the recollection of how they were bored on a former occasion, cannot prevail on themselves to make the attempt again; and, they at least see with perfect indifference the accumulating heaps of letters, consoling themselves with the reflection that it is now quite impossible to answer all, and, therefore, as they do not like to give any a preference,—the desk remains unclosed, the pen is guiltless of ink, and the paper reposes in "spotless innocence."

Another objection is, with a great many, the idea that something clever is expected from them by their correspondents; and, unless they feel in a particularly brilliant mood, they do not consider themselves justified in troubling their friends. I saw, a short time ago, a quotation from Mrs Hannah More which appeared to me satisfactorily to meet this latter. I cannot lay my hand upon the passage just now, but it is to the effect, that she does not require in her correspondents any laboured efforts at wit or "fine writing;" but merely wishes to have their thoughts on paper, just as they would communicate them orally. This is decidedly the true object of letter-writing.

I must acknowledge, for my own part, that I take far greater pleasure in reading letters which come to me without alterations and erasures—even if written hastily or carelessly—than some with which I am occasionally favoured, in which the writers seem chiefly anxious to improve upon their first expressions, and frequently strain and distort their meaning for the sake of introducing some far-fetched and perfectly unnecessary quotation, in order to show their "reading." Few people of true genius resort to these artificial means for producing "effect." Nearly all our great Epistolarians, from Lady Mary Montague downwards, seem to me to have written whatever came uppermost in their minds, trusting to their own facility of language for propriety of expression. Even Lord Byron, who was decidedly a lover of fame, in his correspondence with literary friends maintained an easy, off-hand style, which also forms the peculiar charm of 'Cowper's Letters.' Why, therefore, should not all follow these illustrious examples? and instead of aiming at puzzling their friends by long-winded sentences, equally devoid of sense and meaning, confine themselves to merely saying what they have to say as if they were speaking instead of writing? If such a course were generally adopted, I think we should hear no more of the "bore" and "trouble" of letter-writing, which would become—as it is obviously meant to be—the delightful medium of unreserved communication with absent friends.

CIVIS.

¶ [THIS letter is shrewd and well-felt. We would add, however, four reasons to those mentioned by our Correspondent, for not writing letters; first, being too ill, or at least being affected with that sort of indolence which arises from ill-health: second, being too well, or having so much enjoyment in the passing moment without taking trouble to get it, that anything else becomes an interruption: third (however paradoxical it may seem) something partaking of both these reasons; that is, being ill enough to be indolent, and yet well enough to enjoy some indolent diversion which renders any more practical task unwelcome: and last (we fear not least), an unwillingness to be forced to do anything, even by a sense of duty. Whatever be the cause or causes, it is a fault which (as our Correspondent handsomely observes) besets some natures, otherwise kind; and there is none they should fight harder against, as it tends to diminish kindness and comfort between friends, and sometimes to create serious trouble. Haud impemite loquor. Ed.]

HINTS FOR TABLE TALK.

No. IX.

EXPLANATORY NOTES TO BOOKS—SELF-COMMENTATORS—PRACTICE OF THE ANCIENTS AND STANDARD AUTHORS—LITERARY ADVERTISEMENTS—INSTANCE OF EXTREMES MEETING—LARGE TYPE & SMALL TYPE—PROPOSED SPECTACLE CHARMY.

I AM about to be very presumptuous—to find fault with a practice sanctioned by the usage of almost every author that has written—but more especially those of the present age,—namely, that of disfiguring the foot of every page of a book with explanatory notes. Poems, works of fiction, history, scientific works—but I need not particularize—you cannot take up a book without this fault; such at least I consider it to be. Biographers run riot with foot notations; and these writers have the least excuse, as the nature of the subject admits of all facts, circumstances, and opinions of the life being interwoven. I always consider an author who deals largely in notes to be deficient in the tact and discrimination necessary to make all his materials dovetail into one another. It would be better to make a way for any matter necessary to be stated by a few words in the text, than to put it as a note. Notes are, of course, intended to be read; and as they are inserted on the spot, I suppose that it is intended they should be read immediately. Now, is it not evident that in history they will interrupt the course of the narrative; in a tale, they will weaken the interest you may feel in the story; in discussion, break the thread of the argument; and in a poem, dispel any sympathy the fire of the poet may have created? In biography, I can seldom see any difference between the notes and the text, and often cannot imagine how the biographers can make the distinction why such and such a fact should be printed in small type at the foot of the page, and why such another is worthy of large type in the body. If a person were to read aloud a modern type, and take in the notes at the places marked without any hesitation or observation—I am satisfied no person could discriminate between the small type and the large. This results from the discursive nature of biography, which wants hardly anything but a chronological arrangement. Didactic poems are mere pretences; you never learn any art from the poem, but from the notes, which generally take up the whole of the page, and the poem two or four lines at the top. I may instance Mason's 'English Garden.' The same may be said of satires. Sir John Mandeville's 'Fable of the Bees' is not above two or three hundred lines in length, but the notes make a goodly octavo volume. This is a fault, too, in Rogers' 'Italy'—we have the same story told twice—in verse and in prose. The small type at the bottom of the pages is a great drawback to the beauty of the typography of the last splendid edition of this poem. Those who love variety in all things will find it here; nearly every page contains a finely executed engraving—a few lines of poetry, and eke of notes. To have more than one kind of letter in one sheet, gives it a newspaper-like look; as if the sentences had to be squeezed close for want of room. I love variety in nature, but, for the most part, uniformity in art, and especially in the page of a book! It shows some variety too in an author to make notations on his own productions; it is an indication that he feels assured that no one else will think his book worth the trouble of a commentary, and therefore he gives one himself. These gentry have not the assurance of the author of the 'Tale of a Tub,' who very calmly recommends every Prince in Christendom to take seven of the deepest scholars in his dominions, and shut them up for seven years in seven chambers, to write seven ample commentaries on his work, as he has a strong inclination to taste a blessing before he leaves the world, which other writers seldom reach till they are in their graves. But as no one can be better acquainted with the meaning of a book than the author, he is certainly the best person to give explanation. I do not, of course, include in my censure commentaries on standard authors. We then take the book for the purpose of spying out hidden beauties, which might not be observed in a first perusal. The best way is to put the notes and illustrations, if they are absolutely necessary, and cannot be included in the text, at the end of the book; and if it be worth a second perusal—that is the time to take in any extraneous matter. An author must be very dull indeed, or the subject extremely intricate, who cannot convey his meaning without the small type auxiliary. Or perhaps he may be unable to accomplish it without spoiling a well-rounded period, and so prefers to be smooth and ambiguous, with an interpreter, rather than a little rugged and explicit. A paragraph, with an explanatory foot-note, always puts me in mind of the sign-painter, who wrote, under his daub of red, "This is a red lion;"—in like manner does the author say—the above paragraph means so and so. Reading some of these books is enough to give anyone a headache, if any attention is paid to the notes, by the quick movement of the eye up and down, from top to bottom of the page; and a friend of mine, with weak eyes, complained that even the sudden transition from reading one sized type to another, annoyed him, and that it was always some time before his eye could settle and enable him to distinguish the words.

If our ancient authors, which are generally taken as models, are to be followed in this instance, I think I shall carry my point. We are not annoyed or interrupted with notes and illustrations to the 'Iliad' or 'Odyssey' by Homer, nor by Virgil to his 'Æneid'; nor by Horace to his 'Satires' or 'Odes,' which, as modern productions, would have swarmed with notes, telling who or what the persons referred to were; or at least pretty broadly hinting, with a capital initial, a due number of asterisks, and a final letter. Had these ancients deigned to explain their works, by notes and illustrations, we should certainly have possessed invaluable records of ancient manners; but we see that they rested on the intrinsic merits of their poems, and not upon any extraneous props. Coming nearer home, we have Chaucer, Spenser, and Shakspeare—neither of which illustrious triumvirate ever thought their poetry required the aid of explanation. They left it for posterity to find the foundations of their poems, and to notate and illustrate. Taking a wide step, we have Sir Walter Scott—he thought not of notes to his novels, until it was subsequently demanded by their extensive popularity. Lord Byron noted his poems; but his was a genius that could hardly be restrained within rhyme, and oft ran riot with reason. Had he stooped to enter the list of travel writers, as he was urged, we should have been spared these excrescences on his poetry; but it was so necessary for him to give vent to his feelings through his pen, that he availed himself of an abuse, sanctioned by custom, to utter his criticisms. Milton eschewed notes. I refer only to his poetry, upon which his fame rests. I am unacquainted with his political writings. There are some single pages in 'Paradise Lost,' which would give matter for an octavo volume of notes.

In fine, then, let me advise the literary world to adopt as a maxim, that no notes be tolerated except authorities and references.

Talking of the uniformity of printed pages reminds me of advertisements. I am one among your constant readers, who regretted the discontinuance of the page devoted to these notices in the LONDON JOURNAL. They were generally the first thing I looked at. Under certain restrictions, they, in the course of a few years, would have formed an interesting literary chronology. Had it been a rule, for instance, that they should be confined to announcements of books, and that the same advertisement should never be inserted twice, we should have had, in the course of half a century, materials for a literary history. I was always eager to see what intellectual production was about to issue from the womb of the press, and hailed with equal delight a work from an old hand or a new candidate for fame. We do not now find such illusory announcements as in the case of a certain French historiographer, who was always advertising historical works to save his pension, and at his death had not written a dozen pages.

It is with a singular kind of pleasure we see, in looking over old newspapers and gazettes, Tatlers and Spectators in the original edition, last pages of pamphlets, and leaves stitched in at the end of old books, the announcements of works which we have always been accustomed to look upon as pillars in literature; such as 'An Epic Poem' by Mr John Milton, a Translation of Homer by Pope, or Poems by Mr Dryden. It is something analagous to contemplating a portrait, or hearing a description of your parents when they were children. We have in this last sentence an instance in which extremes meet. It is considered a mark of inferiority or disrespect, for one person to speak of another without the preliminary Mr; and yet, when a fellow man is ennobled by fame, his patronymic is quite sufficient without the title, and, indeed, to add it is a decided mark of inferiority; and used in the cases of Mr Shakspeare, Mr Pope, and so on, sounds perfectly incongruous. Thus do fame and obscurity meet. When we want our valet, or our porter, we call Jenkins! or Jones! and when we talk of immortal geniuses, we say Milton, or Johnson, or Byron.

Since the time that advertising has been carried on systematically, we may easily, in a few years' newspapers, trace an author's rise to popularity. First, you see the work modestly announced with, or perhaps without, his name; the work succeeds, is praised by some reviews and cut up by others; pithy extracts appear in the corners of the papers, with the name of the work at the bottom; then we see a second edition announced, to which the author, with more confidence, puts his name at full length. Allowing due time to pass, we see advertised a new work by Mr So and so, the author of So and so; a kind of double hook to catch the public, because some may remember the pleasure they derived from the work, without recollecting the name of the author; and others may have heard the author spoken of as a clever writer, or as a rising genius, without knowing anything of the former work. We may say that he has now laid a foundation for fame, whether it be the fame of a generation, an age, or for all time; and every stone of the superstructure is announced with an heraldic flourish, "Mr So and so's new work." It is a bad sign to see a book advertised too much after its publication. The news that it is coming is all very well, and also for a week or so after its advent; but when we see repeated every other day, for two or three months, the same work, and always "just published," we begin to suspect that Hudibras's opinion, that advertisements are the epitaphs of books, has some truth in it.

I have one thing more to say a few words about while on the subject of printing. I see by your notices, that you have been solicited to use a smaller type, and not to make use of leads, in the LONDON JOURNAL. This innovation you have very properly resisted. I, for one, must raise my voice against it. Are they really so greedy as to think they have not "enough work for money?" These complainers must also be very selfish; they no doubt are possessed of good eye-sight, and do not consider the infirmities of others. For myself, I am blessed with a good enough eye-sight, but I have several friends, constant readers of the JOURNAL, whose visual organs, some from age and some from a constitutional weakness, are not very perfect, and whose equanimity has been sadly disturbed by these assaults upon their comfort. I have been deputed by these readers to petition you, that should any alteration be made in the type of the JOURNAL (of which they have no desire) it may be, that the leads be taken out, and a proportionally larger type used.

Among the thousands of charities which exist in this nation of Benevolent Societies, there is not one for supplying aged men and women, and poor weak-eyed persons, with spectacles. There are many for supplying books and tracts to read, but not one to supply the infirm with the means wherewith to read. Let this be looked to.

BEAUTIFUL ALLEGORY

ON THE STRENGTH, DIGNITY, AND DIVINENESS OF THE IMAGINATIVE FACULTY.

(From the Novel of 'Arthur Coningsby'.)

WHEN she had uttered these words, she fancied that she felt her cousin gently pressing to his side the arm with which she leaned on him. But it was probably no more than a fancy, for at the next moment he fixed his eyes on a picture by Nicolo Poussin, of Apollo among the Shepherds.

"The god," he observed, "breaks out here nobly through the peasant's dress. I will tell you the story on which Poussin wrought, in a shape which you are not likely to have met with it before.

"The eyelids of Jupiter were closed, not in sleep, but inward contemplation. Suddenly his eagle fanned him with his broad wings, and screamed. He opened his eyes, and looked through the crystal floor of heaven at the worlds which were spread below as on a map. He saw mountains shaking down avalanches, and stormy seas, and plains covered with carnage, and palaces filled with crime. He beheld vast deserts tyrannised over by the lion and the serpent, cities where men were wronging and corrupting one another, and all the complication of good and evil. He saw that all was moving in obedience to general laws, and he was undisturbed. But he perceived the corpse of his servant, the Cyclops, on a mountain, and half shaded by the forest, half illuminated by the glare of the volcano. The breast and the forehead of the giant were transfixed by the avrows of ethereal fire. The deed had been done by the hand of Apollo, in revenge for the death of his son, whom Jupiter had slain with Cyclopean thunder-bolts.

"That evening, while the herdsmen and retainers of Admetus were in arms to protect the flocks and cattle of the chieftain against wild beasts and robbers, and were lighting their watch-fires on the Molossian hills, a youth suddenly appeared among them clad in a rustic dress, with a boar-spear in his hand, and a small stringed instrument slung over his shoulder, beside his bow and quiver. He said that he had lost his way, and would be glad to remain with them, provided they would furnish him with subsistence in return for his services in hunting, and tending cattle. They readily assented to this proposal; and he sat down beside a fire, with the glare of which the last rays of sunset were now mingling.

"The stranger was Apollo, exiled from the skies by Jupiter, and compelled to take refuge on earth. Fresh from divine converse, the God of Poetry yet knew how to temper himself to the humblest as well as the most exalted natures. Although his eyes were sometimes turned in momentary glances towards that occidental empire which was now saddening for its departed lord, his jest and roundelay, his narrative of achievements in love and war, and his tales of ghosts and enchanters were delightful to the ears of the peasants round him, and were received with loud applauses, which rang through all the hills, and started the wolf, low crouching in the distant brake. He touched his instrument, and sang of the fair nymphs of the youthful foresters whom they have chosen to live with them in the woods, and of the dogs baying round the thickets which concealed their master, or lying down to die on the verge of the fountain in which he had vanished. His voice then mounted swiftly and clearly towards the stars, and spread like a silver vapour across the valley; and the pause of silent gladness among his auditors was only interrupted by a faint echo of the last notes from the opposite crags and the bare mountain wall.

"The god lived on among the shepherds. In every hunting match he was a bold assistant; in every festival a mirthful companion; on the lonely hill-side a friend, and a sage prophet of the weather. To him was given the honour of laying at the feet of Admetus the head of the wild-boar and wolf, and the choicest portions of the slain stag; and the maidens, as they danced on the plain, sang of his

at the fountains, had their quickest and softest looks for him.

"The god comprehended all the thoughts of the mountaineers, excelled in all their arts, sympathized with all their sorrows, and delighted in all their enjoyments. He was filled with the spirit of poetry, which, in whatever region it may be thrown, and in whatsoever forms of being immersed, is itself knowledge and power.

"Now, Isabel, my story, if you choose to hear any more of it, leaves Apollo and the Molossians and returns into the skies. We have nothing more to do with that fine ruddy group so imbued with the divine light of antique beauty; and which looks as if it could anywhere have been conceived but in Ionia, or Grecian Sicily.

"Meanwhile the absence of the deity from the celestial palaces was lamented by their inmates; and Jupiter saw that a gloom had gathered on the faces of the Immortals. He was indignant that the presence of the criminal whom he had banished, should be thus important to his race, and he commanded Hermes to bring from earth some human visitant who might supply the place of the exile.

"The herald thought that, among the chosen companions of Apollo, he would be most likely to find a substitute for him; and the rough sandals of a Molossian peasant were soon treading on that crystal floor, into which jewels of all hues seem to have been melted; and his rude limbs, and weather-beaten features, appeared among those translucent forms. At first the peasant remained silent and trembling; but, when he had drunk of the mighty wine, he began to talk of flocks and fields, and to express contempt for Admetus, whom he compared in his thoughts to the radiant beings around him. He awoke, stupefied and staring, among his brethren on his native hills, and uttered broken ravings against his master, which were repaid by blows and curses.

"Hermes next introduced a lawyer, who had just reached his home triumphant, after gaining an important cause. His conversation was full of contemptuous jests and eager contradictions. He wrested the laws of the universe to prove that evil is good and good evil. Hermes, therefore, conducted him again to earth, and gave him, as a fee, an ample purse of gold. But when the lawyer attempted to use the coin, he was apprehended for passing money not recognised by the state, and put upon his trial. He made a long and brilliant speech, in which he described all that had occurred to him, not omitting to report his own conversation; and he so well convinced the judges, that the priests of Jupiter were authorised to appropriate the money which had come from heaven.

"The next candidate for the throne of Apollo was a soldier. He entered completely armed, as he had been found on his post. He looked with admiration at the helmet of Pallas, and the shield of Mars, and was dazzled by the resplendent beauty of the goddesses. But that presence and that banquet admitted not of repose, and for exertion there was no object. He sat, confused and silent, until the goblet did its office, and he sank into heavy slumber. When he recovered his consciousness, he felt the night wind on his brow, and was keeping ineffectual ward before the camp.

"An orator from the public assembly was then presented; and he, when he had tasted of the wine-cup, arose, laid his hand upon his breast, and discoursing in smooth rhetoric of himself and the deities, showed by much argument and many illustrations, that his most becoming demeanour towards them, would be one of modest humility. But before he had reached the peroration, he found himself addressing those assembled people, who were delighted at hearing those epithets applied to them which the speaker had designed for the gods.

"The orator was followed by a philosopher, who earnestly looked and listened, and seemed to meditate in what region of his system he should place his new associates. He gazed at all in turn, and asked some questions, from which it was evident that he considered each a mere abstraction, or pure expression of a principle. When he had mastered, as he believed, the difficulties connected with these transcendent natures, he considered for some time, and then proceeded to explain the laws of refraction and reflection, by which the wondrous light that surrounded him might be accounted for. He enumerated what he supposed were the chemical ingredients of the nectar; assigned its musical character and name to the voice of each of the deities; and analysed the relation they bore to mortals, and that in which mortals stood to them. He was transferred to a blank nook of the universe where he might study all orders of existence, himself unconnected with any.

"Hermes, in despair, then set upon the throne a lovely child, whom he had conveyed from a valley where she was gathering flowers. The first drop of the immortal liquor which passed her lips, destroyed her life; and the messenger was commanded no longer to punish men by bringing them among the deities.

"But suddenly the eagle spread its wings and flew to earth, and perched upon a rock which overhung the sea. To the distant mariner the light that surrounded its beak and talons appeared a watch-fire or a meteor. The rock was beside the mouth of a deep cave, in which mused a poet; to the sound of winds and seas modulating his vast melodies, and revolving his orb'd thoughts.

"The poet looked upon the bird, and knew that it belonged to a kingdom whereof he was himself a rightful inhabitant. He laid his garland upon its head; his limbs quivered with a sudden lightness, and, side by side, they rose into the farthest skies. He placed himself upon the vacant throne as upon his natural seat, and the gods recognised in him the mortal who was worthy of celestial converse. He gazed with delighted but undazzled eyes on the forms of beauty and of power; for the art, which in him was impulse and intuition, made him comprehend and feel wherein was the glory and what the sanctity of those superhuman beings to whom he knew himself the destined equal."

LICHFIELD AND JOHNSON.

Visited the cathedral; the most rich in decoration without, and the most truly elegant within, of any in England; and kept in exemplary condition. The grand western front, profuse in images, exhibits a striking proof of the gorgeous effect of statuary as an architectural embellishment, and excites a deep regret for the general slaughter of these innocents at the Reformation. The choir, unusually large, occupying, with great propriety and good effect, nearly half the whole building; the stone screen to it, most richly and lightly carved. The Ascension, painted on glass, at the east window, behind the altar: a subject happily chosen (a point not always sufficiently consulted) for transparent effect. Two corresponding monuments, to Garrick and Johnson, on the east side of the north transept; severely simple; a plain tablet, surmounted by a bust, in a shallow niche. Johnson's countenance far more powerful in sculpture than Garrick's. The inscription on Johnson very tame and languid; describing him only as "a man of extensive learning, a distinguished moral writer, and a sincere Christian"—unquestionable truths, but feeble characteristics. The palace and gardens very unassuming. Reconnoitred, with much interest, Johnson's father's house—a large corner building, in the market-place, of white plaster; the projection of the first floor over the shop, supported by wooden pillars, and pilasters rising above to the roof; three stories high; apparently much in the same condition as it must have been when the old bookseller occupied it. Observed an inscription on a house, in a street leading from the south towards the cathedral, purporting that Lord Brooke was killed on the spot beneath, by a ball in the forehead, shot by a Mr Dyott from the principal tower of the cathedral, March 2, 1648, as his Lordship was besieging the close with the Parliament forces.—Diary of a Lover of Literature.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

AKENSIDE.

(From the latest and most copious Life of him, by Mr. Bucke).

THE features of Akenside were expressive and manly in a very high degree; but his complexion was pale, and his deportment solemn. He dressed, too, in a very precise manner; and wore a powdered wig in stiff curl. In respect to disposition, he is said to have been irritable, and to have had little restraint upon his temper before strangers; with whom he was precise and ceremonious, stiff, and occasionally sententious and dictatorial.

He had no taste for humour; had little patience in respect to jests; and having no wit himself, could ill-brook the coarse wit of others; and was, moreover, of Lord Waldegrave's opinion, that a true gentleman never jests. Yet he was himself a satirist, and had no mean talent that way, as many of his poems testify.*

The Hon. GEORGE HARDINGE says in his letter to Mr Nichols, that Akenside's "great powers, besides the talent for poetry, were those of elegant reasoning, historical knowledge, and philosophical taste, enlivened by the happiest and most brilliant allusions."—"He had, too, a most astonishing memory, and a most luminous application of it."

Sir JOHN HAWKINS says of his conversation, that it was of the most delightful kind; learned, instructive, and without any affectation of wit; cheerful and highly entertaining; and he gives an account of a dinner party, which he enjoyed with him, Mr Dyson, and another friend, at Putney; when the poet, surrounded by his friends, and enjoying their society in the enlivening sunshine of a summer's day, seemed to feel a joy, that he lived; and in consequence poured out his gratulations and thanksgiving to the great dispenser of all felicity, in words which Plato might have uttered on a similar occasion.

Yet he was not always agreeable in conversation. He had a high sense of his own merits; and when persons of an inferior cast presumed upon their ignorance, or want of good breeding, to intrude their observations too unceremoniously, Akenside seldom denied himself the satisfaction of chastising their presumption by the adoption of a manner, perhaps too severe, satirical, and splenetic. But in the society of those mild and gentle spirits, who admired his genius and respected his virtues, he was mildness itself.

His memory was at once discriminative and comprehensive. He retained all the riches of art, science, and history, legislation, poetry, and philosophy; and these he would draw out and embody to suit the occasion required, in a manner not more wonderful to those who were partially informed, than delightful to those who could follow his track, and continue with him to the end.

Yet he is said to have, in general, wanted gaiety of heart in society. He was naturally of a cheerful temper; but his cheerfulness was accompanied by a mellowness of feeling, which sometimes relapsed into melancholy. Not that corrosive melancholy, however, which unstrings the mind, and renders it incapable of life and action; but of that sweet and delightful nature, which Dyer has so beautifully characterized in his 'Ruins of Rome.'

"There is a mood

(I sing not to the vacant or the young),
There is a kindly mood of melancholy,
That wings the soul and points her to the skies."

* A man may be a satirist, and yet have no talent for conversational jest. As to the remark attributed to Akenside, that "no true gentlemen ever jests," we hope it is a mistake of tradition, and that he never made it. Such observations merely mean, that a man has no talent for what he deprecates. Swift said that nobody ever affected to despise even punning, who could make a good pun himself.—Ed.

PORTRAIT OF MOHAMMED.

! Mohammed was of a middle stature, and ruddy complexion. He had a large head, and a thick bushy beard. The palms of his hands and soles of his feet were rough and strong. He had large black eyes, and smooth lank hair of the same colour. His bones were big and solid, the turn of his jaws agreeable, even, and well proportioned, and his neck, according to Ali's description, resembled a silver river. Though he was sixty-three lunar, or about sixty-one solar years old at his death, scarce any grey hairs, or others signs of age, appeared upon him. He was corpulent, had a clear fair skin, and large, though regular, features. He had round full cheeks, an extended prominent forehead, and long smooth eye-brows, that mutually approached each other, but did not intirely meet; between which there appeared a vein, whose pulse was quicker and higher than usual, when he was angry. He had an aquiline nose, a large wide mouth, and the upper fore teeth placed at some distance from one another. All his teeth were bright, pointed like a saw, and ranged in a beautiful order. When he laughed, he discovered them, and they appeared then like hail-stones, or little white pearls. Even his laughter itself was full of majesty, and when he smiled, he contracted his mouth in a very agreeable manner. On his lower lip he had a little black spot, or excrescence, that did not appear at all unseemly, but rather gave an additional grace to his countenance: he had a good ear, and a fine sonorous voice: he was well furnished with hair, which partly fell in ringlets about his ears, and partly hung down strait between his shoulders. To this, by the application of alenna, or Cyprus indigo, and the herb al catam, he gave a reddish shining colour, in which he is imitated by the Scenite Arabs at this day. Every Thursday night he shaved himself, and pared his nails. As no prophet's head, according to a maxim in the Sonna, was ever white, the hair being by the Moslems supposed to receive that colour from Satan, he had very few white or grey hairs at his death: he had a free open air, a majestic port, and a very engaging address.—Modern Universal History.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXI.—BEAU WILSON. A PUZZLE FOR CONJECTURE.

[FROM 'Granger's Biographical History of England,' vol. vi, p. 25, Granger seems to intimate, in a note, that the Duchess of Cleveland, who had been mistress to Charles the Second, was the possible source of Wilson's splendour; but she could have hardly been rich enough. The probability is, we think, that he was in possession of some secret of state. The "Mr Law," with whom he fought the duel, was (if our memory does not deceive us) the famous Law (of Lauriston), who afterwards made so much noise in France, as a financial speculator, and who was ancestor of the Count de Lauriston, one of Bonaparte's generals.]

THIS very mysterious person was the younger brother of a respectable family, and having, through friends, procured a commission in the army, went to serve in Flanders; where he had not long continued, before he was broke for cowardice, and became so reduced in circumstances, as to accept forty shillings from a friend, to pay his passage back to England. There, within a short time after his arrival, he appeared, to the astonishment of the public, the brightest star in the hemisphere; his coaches, saddle, hunting, and race horses, equipage, dress, and table, were the admiration of the world, and continued so while they saw him maintain such profuse expense, without any visible means to support his glory. He never played, or but inconsiderably, entertained with profuseness all who visited him, drank himself liberally: but at all hours, as well sober as otherwise, he kept a strict guard upon his words; though several were either employed by the curiosity of others, or their own, to take him at his looser moments, and persuade him to reveal his secret: but he so inviolably preserved it, that even their guesses were quite at random, and without probability or foundation. He was not known to be an admirer of ladies; and what added to the surprise was, that he was at all times to be found, and ever with some of his own people, seemingly open in conversation, free from spleen or chagrin; in a word, he had that settled air, as if he were assured his good fortune would continue for ever. One of his friends advised him to purchase an estate while he had money: Mr Wilson thanked him, but said, he did not forget the future in the present: he was obliged to him for his counsel, but whilst he lived, it would be ever thus, for he was always certain to be master of such a sum of money. This more and more confounded the world, for if they would say he derived his good fortune from the ladies, there was scarce any rich enough to support him, neither did he bestow any of his time unaccounted for; and it was not to be believed the fair sex would not exact attention and service for their money, especially for such considerable sums. Those who pretended to guess better, had recourse to chemistry, and said he had found the grand secret, and was master of that invaluable transmuting-stone, or powder, which could convert meaner metals into gold. Some blasted his reputation with the report, that he must once have robbed a Holland mail of a considerable quantity of rough diamonds; though another person suffered for the offence, denying the fact to the last. Others would have it, that the Jews kept him, with many other idle and ridiculous reports, which were circulated concerning him, until the time he was found killed, going to fight a duel with a Mr Law, who it is reported ran him through the body, before he could draw his sword in his own defence. Mr Wilson lived in unabated splendour to the last, and the mystery rather augmented than diminished, when a very inconsiderable sum of money being all that could be found after his death, left the world to conjecture from what source or funds he had derived means to support his state and magnificence.

LOVE.

"Was it not you, Guido, who were telling me of a young maiden, whose lover, in some sudden passion of jealousy or despair, had taken the vows at La Trappe, and who, disguising her sex, followed him to his gloomy retreat, wore the habit, observed the ordinances of that mournful body, and preserved her secret till death? Of all the many instances of woman's strong and enduring affection, none ever produced upon me an impression so forcible. Think of a young, beautiful, and delicately nurtured female, giving up, not only the world, with its vanities and its pleasures, but all comfort, all companionship, all feminine employment, not denied to a nun of the strictest order. She renounced them all to live in seclusion, silence, and perpetual dread; for what but a cruel death could have awaited her had her secret been discovered, save when dying? And this melancholy, this isolated existence was dragged on unsupported by any hope, for no change of circumstance could affect her position, and unsoothed by the thought that her great devotion was held precious by him for whom it was exercised. Not one of the ordinary motives—the vanity or the selfishness which people call by the name of love—actuated her through this long trial. She had everything to fear, and nothing to expect. What creation of the poet ever exceeded this terrible reality of love sepulchred in this living tomb! I often marvel to myself what were her feelings when a shadow fell across the path, and she looked upon one of those shrouded and flitting shapes, and dared not ask if the cowl hid the face which she most desired to see!—and yet this went on for years!" "Enough, my sister!" exclaimed Guido. "I do not like to think of it. What is this story but another instance of the cruel fate whose iron rule is over our world? The love wasted in this pitiless cloister would have made the happiness of a life."—Francesca Carrara.—[But she was with him.]

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XVIII.—HENRY IV.

IF Shakspeare's fondness for the ludicrous sometimes led to faults in his tragedies (which was not often the case) he has made us amends by the character of Falstaff. This is perhaps the most substantial comic character that ever was invented. Sir John carries a most portly presence in the mind's eye; and in him, not to speak it profanely, "we behold the fulness of the spirit of wit and humour bodily." We are as well acquainted with his person as his mind, and his jokes come upon us with double force and relish from the quantity of flesh through which they make their way, as he shakes his fat sides with laughter, or "lards the lean earth as he walks along." Other comic characters seem, if we approach and handle them, to resolve themselves into air, "into thin air;" but this is embodied and palpable to the grossest apprehension: it lies "three fingers deep upon the ribs," it plays about the lungs and the diaphragm with all the force of animal enjoyment. His body is like a good estate to his mind, from which he receives rents and revenues of profit and pleasure in kind, according to its extent, and the richness of the soil. Wit is often a meagre substitute for pleasurable sensation; an effusion of spleen and petty spite at the comforts of others, from feeling none in itself. Falstaff's wit is an emanation of a fine constitution; an exuberance of good-humour and good-nature; an overflowing of his love and laughter, and good-fellowship; a giving vent to his heart's ease and over-contentment with himself and others. He would not be in character, if he were not so fat as he is; for there is the greatest keeping in the boundless luxury of his imagination and the pampered self-indulgence of his physical appetites. He manures and nourishes his mind with jests, as he does his body with sack and sugar. He carves out his jokes, as he would a capon, or a haunch of venison, where there is cut and come again; and pours out upon them the oil of gladness. His tongue drops fatness, and in the chambers of his brain "it snows of meat and drink." He keeps up perpetual holiday and open house, and we live with him in a round of invitations to a rump and dozen. Yet we are not to suppose that he was a mere sensualist. All this is as much in imagination as in reality. His sensuality does not engross and stupify his other faculties, but "ascends me into the brain, clears away all the dull, crude vapours that environ it, and makes it full of nimble, fiery, and delectable shapes." His imagination keeps up the ball after his senses have done with it. He seems to have even a greater enjoyment of the freedom from restraint, of good cheer, of his ease, of his vanity, in the ideal exaggerated descriptions which he gives of them, than in fact. He never fails to enrich his discourse with allusions to eating and drinking, but we never see him at table. He carries his own larder about with him, and he is himself "a tun of man." His pulling out the bottle in the field of battle is a joke to show his contempt for glory accompanied with danger, his systematic adherence to his Epicurean philosophy in the most trying circumstances. Again, such is his deliberate exaggeration of his own vices, that it does not seem quite certain whether the account of his hostess's bill, found in his pocket, with such an out-of-the-way charge for capons and sack with only one halfpennyworth of bread, was not put there by himself as a trick to humour the jest upon his favourite propensities, and as a conscious caricature of himself. He is represented as a liar, a braggart, a coward, a glutton, &c. and yet we are not offended but delighted with him; for he is all these as much to amuse others as to gratify himself. He openly assumes all these characters to show the humorous part of them. The unrestrained indulgence of his own ease, appetites, and convenience, has neither malice nor hypocrisy in it. In a word, he is an actor in himself almost as much as upon the stage, and we no more object to the character of Falstaff in a moral point of view than we should think of bringing an excellent comedian, who should represent him to the life, before one of the police officers. We only consider the number of pleasant lights in which he puts certain foibles (the more pleasant as they are opposed to the received rules and necessary restraints of society) and do not trouble ourselves about the consequences resulting from them, for no mischievous consequences do result. Sir John is old as well as fat, which gives a melancholy retrospective tinge to the character; and by the disparity between his inclinations and his capacity for enjoyment, makes it still more ludicrous and fantastical.

The secret of Falstaff's wit is for the most part a masterly presence of mind, an absolute self-possession, which nothing can disturb. His repartees are involuntary suggestions of his self-love; instinctive evasions of everything that threatens to interrupt the career of his triumphant jollity and self-complacency. His very size floats him out of all his difficulties in a sea of rich conceits; and he turns round on the pivot of his convenience, with every occasion and at a moment's warning. His natural repugnance to every unpleasant thought or circumstance of itself makes light of objections, and provokes the most extravagant and licentious answers in his own justification. His indifference to truth puts no check upon his invention, and the more improbable and unexpected his contrivances are, the more happily does he seem to be delivered of them, the anticipation of their effect acting as a stimulus to the gaiety of his fancy. The success of one adventurous sally gives him spirits to undertake another: he deals always in round numbers, and his exaggerations and excuses are "open, palpable, monstrous as the father that begets them." His dissolute carelessness of what he says discovers itself in the first dialogue with the Prince.

"FALSTAFF. By the lord, thou say'st true, lad; and is not mine hostess of the tavern a most sweet wench?"

P. HENRY. As the honey of Hybla, my old lad of the castle; and is not a buff-jerkin a most sweet robe of duranee?"

FALSTAFF. How now, how now, mad wag, what, in thy quips and thy quiddities? what a plague have I to do with a buff-jerkin?

P. HENRY. Why what a pox have I to do with mine hostess of the tavern?"

In the same scene he afterwards affects melancholy, from pure satisfaction of heart, and professes reform, because it is the farthest thing in the world from his thoughts. He has no qualms of conscience, and therefore would as soon talk of them as of anything else when the humour takes him.

"FALSTAFF. But Hal, I prythee trouble me no more with vanity. I would to God thou and I knew where a commodity of good names were to be bought: an old lord of council rated me the other day in the street about you, sir; but I mark'd him not, and yet he talked very wisely, and in the street too.

P. HENRY. Thou didst well, for wisdom cries out in the street, and no man regards it.

FALSTAFF. Oh, thou hast damnable iteration, and art indeed able to corrupt a saint. Thou hast done much harm unto me, Hal; God forgive thee for it! Before I knew thee, Hal, I knew nothing, and now I am; if a man should speak truly, little better than one of the wicked. I must give over this life, and I will give it over, by the lord! an I do not, I am a villain. I'll be damn'd for never a king's son in Christendom.

P. HENRY. Where shall we take a purse to-morrow, Jack?

FALSTAFF. Where thou wilt, lad, I'll make one; an I do not, call me villain, and baffle me.

P. HENRY. I see good amendment of life in thee, from praying to purse-taking.

FALSTAFF. Why, Hal, 'tis my vocation, Hal. 'Tis no sin for a man to labour in his vocation."

Of the other prominent passages, his account of his pretended resistance to the robbers, "who grew from four men in buckram into eleven" as the imagination of his own valour increased with his relating it, his getting off when the truth is discovered by pretending he knew the Prince, the scene in which in the person of the old king he lectures the prince and gives himself a good character, the soliloquy on honour, and description of his new-raised recruits, his meeting with the chief justice, his abuse of the Prince and Poins, who overhear him, to Doll Tearsheet, his reconciliation with Mrs Quickly who has arrested him for an old debt, and whom he persuades to pawn her plate to lend him ten pounds more, and the scenes with Shallow and Silence, are all inimitable. Of all of them, the scene in which Falstaff plays the part, first, of the King, and then of Prince Henry, is the one that has been the most often quoted. We must quote it once more in illustration of our remarks:

"FALSTAFF. Harry, I do not only marvel where thou spendest thy time, but also how thou art accompanied: for though the camomile, the more it is trodden on, the faster it grows, yet youth, the more it is wasted, the sooner it wears. That thou art my son, I have partly thy mother's word, partly my own opinion; but chiefly, a villainous trick of thine eye, and a foolish hanging of thy nether lip, that doth warrant me. If then thou be son to me, here lies the point;—Why, being son to me, art thou so pointed at? Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a miſher, and eat blackberries? A question not to be ask'd. Shall the son of England prove a thief, and take purses? a question not to be ask'd. There is a thing, Harry, which thou hast often heard of, and it is known to many in our land by the name of pitch: this pitch, as ancient writers do report, doth defile; so doth the company thou keepest: for, Harry, now I do not speak to thee in drink, but in tears; not in pleasure but in passion; not in words only, but in woes also:—and yet there is a virtuous man, whom I have often noted in thy company, but I know not his name.

P. HENRY. What manner of man, an it like your majesty?

FALSTAFF. A goodly portly man, i' faith, and a corpulent; of a cheerful look, a pleasing eye, and a most noble carriage; and, as I think, his age some fifty, or, by'r-lady, inclining to threescore; and now I do remember me, his name is Falstaff: if that man should be lewdly given, he deceiveth me; for, Harry, I see virtue in his looks. If then the fruit may be known by the tree, as the tree by the fruit, then peremptorily I speak it, there is virtue in that Falstaff: him keep with, the rest banish. And tell me now, thou naughty varlet, tell me, where hast thou been this month?

P. HENRY. Dost thou speak like a king? Do thou stand for me, and I'll play my father.

FALSTAFF. Depose me? if thou dost it half so gravely, so majestically, both in word and matter, hang me up by the heels for a rabbit-sucker, or a poulterer's hare.

P. HENRY. Well, here I am set.

FALSTAFF. And here I stand:—judge, my masters.

P. HENRY. Now, Harry, whence come you?

FALSTAFF. My noble lord, from Eastcheap.

P. HENRY. The complaints I hear of thee are grievous.

FALSTAFF. 'Sblood, my lord, they are false:—nay, I'll tickle ye for a young prince, i' faith.

P. HENRY. Swearst thou, ungracious boy? henceforth ne'er look on me. Thou art violently carried away from grace: there is a devil haunts thee, in the likeness of a fat old man; a tun of a man is thy companion. Why dost thou converse with that trunk of humours, that bolting-hutch of beastliness, that swoln parcel of dropsies, that huge bombard of sack, that stuff cloak-bag of guts, that roasted Manning-tree ox with the pudding in his belly, that reverend vice, that grey iniquity, that father ruffian, that vanity in years? wherein is he good, but to taste sack and drink it? wherein neat and cleanly, but to carve a capon and eat it? wherein cunning, but in craft? wherein crafty, but in villany? wherein villanous, but in all things? wherein worthy, but in nothing?

FALSTAFF. I would your grace would take me with you; whom means your grace?

P. HENRY. That villainous, abominable mis-leader of youth, Falstaff, that old white-bearded Satan.

FALSTAFF. My lord, the man I know.

P. HENRY. I know thou dost.

FALSTAFF. But to say, I know more harm in him than in myself, were to say more than I know. That he is old (the more the pity) his white hairs do witness it; but that he is (saving your reverence) a whore-master, that I utterly deny. If sack and sugar be a fault, God help the wicked! if to be old and merry be a sin, then many an old host that I know is damned: if to be fat be to be hated, then Pharoah's lean kine are to be loved. No, my good lord; banish Peto, banish Bardolph, banish Poins: but for sweet Jack Falstaff, kind Jack Falstaff, true Jack Falstaff, valiant Jack Falstaff, and therefore more valiant, being as he is, old Jack Falstaff, banish not him thy Harry's company; banish plump Jack, and banish all the world.

P. HENRY. I do, I will.

[Knocking; and Hostess and Bardolph go out.

Re-enter BARDOLPH, running.

BARDOLPH. Oh, my lord, my lord; the sheriff, with a most monstrous watch, is at the door.

FALSTAFF. Out, you rogue! play out the play: I have much to say in the behalf of that Falstaff."

To be continued.

WILSON, CHARLES LAMB, PEACOCK,

AUTHOR OF 'MELINCOURT,' ORIGIN OF FALSTAFF.

(From the 'Confessions of a Bashful Irishman.')

"As a poetic landscape painter," replied Singong, "Wilson is unrivalled. What a fairy land has he made of Windermere and its little bay! I wonder the elfs and sylphs of the lake country have never yet got up a public meeting by moonlight, under the shadow of Helvellyn (the Spirit of 'Lodore' in the chair), and presented to him the freedom of the Lakes in a handsome snuff-box, made of Queen Mab's agate stone!" But not only is Wilson a poet, he is remarkable, also, for a rich, fantastic vein of humour, which—

"Your mention of humour," said Donovan, "brings to my recollection two books which I lately abstracted from a friend's library, who is rather particular in these matters—"

"God bless me!" rejoined Singong, "I have lately missed several volumes myself. Have you—"

"Sir, your inference is most disrespectful; the books I allude to are 'Eliu,' and 'Melincourt.' What Wilson is to the Lakes, Lamb is to London. Then who feels a snug, social rubber like him? I should detest whist, if it were not for dear, delightful Mrs Battle, whose gentle shade seems mildly to expostulate with me on my heterodoxy. As for 'Melincourt,' its Island of Cimmerian gloom is an allegory worthy of Rabelais."

"You speak of Rabelais. I am just fresh from an acquaintance with that elastic rogue Panurge, and cannot for the life of me help thinking that he is the original Falstaff."

"That is an odd erotchet; but go on. I love a bouncing absurdity."

"The two characters," continued Singong, "have so much in common, such peculiar ingenuity in lying, such endless jokes on, and fantastic extenuations of, their physical defects; such rich, quaint, ever-swelling humour, glossing over, and even lending grace to their preposterous cowardice—such amusing profligacy—such outrageous faculties of buffoonery—such readiness at contrivance—such incredible powers of face and bluster—to say nothing of a hundred other traits, equally far-fetched, yet congenial, that the resemblance could scarcely have been the result of a lucky chance. Falstaff is Panurge plumped out. Panurge is Falstaff fallen away. Panurge with Pantagruel plays the same part as Falstaff with Prince Hal. Panurge in the storm at sea, is the counterpart of Falstaff at Sherwood!

bury. Both hold discretion to be the better part of valour; both have no other idea of life than as a tipsy jest; both are self-catechists on honour; both have their Doll Tearsheet; both the same accommodating theory of debt. Again——"

"But how came Shakspeare acquainted with Rabelais?" asked Donovan.

"How? Why when Shakspeare wrote, Rabelais was the one great man on the continent; and as Lord Bacon had already made him the theme of panegyric; and two of his most prominent characters were, our Lord Chancellor Moor, and Luther, the founder of our Protestant revolution, his fame could scarcely have been a stranger to Englishmen; certainly not to such an active, inquisitive spirit as Shakspeare, who passed much of his time in the better educated circles of the court. Now, our swan of Avon, we all know, was never very scrupulous about the means by which he gained plots and characters for his plays—as he has proved by his profuse pilferings from the old Italian novels—and I think it far from improbable that he had met with some garbled translation of Rabelais, and finding the dramatic capabilities of Panurge, had dressed up the rogue afresh, made him, by way of contrast, a miracle of obesity, and baptised him Falstaff."

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the Royal Academy, Somerset House.

INDEPENDENTLY of sculpture, there are about a thousand pictures hanging on the walls of the Royal Academy's rooms! Among so many, the eye is either confused or baffled, and recognizes nothing but a chaos of uncomprehending groups and compositions; or, slightly glancing at the many, rests on the more prominent as stepping stones by which to command the whole—such has been our plan, and accordingly must we write. Many, even, that we have marked in our catalogue, must yield to the unseen tyrants, Space and Time, and relapse into the chequered ranks of those whom our notice makes not illustrious or infamous! The better to digest the feast, at Somerset House, we devoured but moderately, and confined ourselves to the Great Room; but alas! that contains no fewer than two hundred pictures, and some among them of which more might be said and written than we may now attempt.

The Exhibition, generally, appears to us, from the very slight glance we cast round the other rooms, one of the best we have seen in the Strand, though some of our chief painters have contributed fewer pictures. Turner and Stanfield do not seem at their best; Hilton, we know, has been ill, and does not, this year, so vigorously support the highest branch of the art. But, undoubtedly, the pictures are, for the major part, either for their subject, the treatment, or the mechanical execution, possessed of much interest. 1. 'Genoese Coast, near Ricco' (18), by Callcott, is a most fervid and splendid picture; the golden light of the setting sun is a soft and luscious fluid, which, flowing over every object, seems to steep it in sweetness and pleasure; the colours are bright and glowing, but so perfect in harmony, so transparent, and so true to nature, that all is free from glare, all is calm and mellow. Nowhere is the sun seen in richer or more beautiful condition than in the genial but clear climate of Genoa; and this picture does perfect justice to the scene. 'Keelmen heaving in Coals by Night' (24) by Turner, is, as usual, powerful, and to a degree true to nature; but it is also false; where have we seen so bright a moonlight, such bright remains of delight, and such doubtful shadows, all huddled together, one part of the scene giving the other the lie. We always think, when we are before Turner's pictures, how finely this man can paint "that which is not!" what a pity he will not paint "that which is!" 'Preparing for a Fancy-dress Ball' (14), a couple of portraits by Etty, is well painted, but wants ease and nature. We are glad, however, to see him turn his abilities into a channel acknowledgedly more profitable than others are apt to be, and we heartily wish him success in it. 'Study of the Head of a Youth' (88), is a very pleasant picture by the same artist, forcible, lively, and agreeable; but why will he paint his half tints and shadows so black? There is a picture in the next room, 'A Woman in a Pearl Boat,' (of which more by and by,) not painted intirely in this style; the girl's face is so, but her body is not, and we ask the artist himself, if it is not his best bit of colour in the rooms? 64, 'Christopher Columbus explaining the project of his intended Voyage for the Discovery of the New World, in the Convent of La Rabida,' by Wilkie, is certainly a remarkable picture, clearly and powerfully painted; well conceived and well expressed. The lurking approbation in the face of the accomplished physician, and the incipient comprehension of the friar, are excellent. The tried and unconscious look of the young boy is a happy contrast to the absorbing interest of the older people. Columbus is a fine, dignified, and intellectual man,—benign but powerful; we would only object that he appears rather to be deliberating than explaining. And why Pinjou's future treachery should have induced Mr Wilkie to make him so very like Retsch's Mephistophiles in the contract scene, we cannot imagine. He might have had a treachery lurking among the lines of his physiognomy, without exhibiting it so melo-dramatically and superfluously, handling his telescope as a stage-pirate would his weapon. 74, 'The Bright Stone of Honour (Ehrenbreitstein), and Tomb of Marceau, from Byron's Childe Harold' is one of Turner's incongruities, a misty visionary distance behind a fore-ground of gems and metals;—such, indeed, are the materials of which the picture should seem to be composed. 88, 'The first Ear-ring' has not the nature and expression that Wilkie generally puts in his scenes from common life. Leslie's 'Columbus and the Egg' (89), does not contain any very deep and lively expression; and though there is much bustle, there is little variety in the feeling of the spectators; it is all superficial. We could not but think of Hogarth's treatment of the same subject, and the head-noddings, the "Ah's," the expressive silence of the different personages, and the stand-still to which they are all brought, in that very unpretending but most profound design. 94, 'Venus and her Satellites,' is an assemblage of gamesome young ladies, among whom it is somewhat difficult to discover who is Venus or who is not. We at last suppose her who occupies the middle to be the Goddess, for painters have adopted Venetian etiquette, in making that the post of honour. There is a certain superfluity of body made apparent in Mr Etty's female groups, and so total an absence of soul, that they are anything but gratifying to our feelings. A naked figure is a most beautiful and respectable sight if the soul be naked too, and it "knows not that it is naked;" but if it takes its nakedness for its best merit, we are apt to resent being forced to consider such very equivocal claims upon admiration. In a finely designed naked figure, be it male or female, we derive our gratification, from being presented with a more thorough view of the harmony and beauty of our structure, and with seeing the feelings of the mind illustrated in every turn and action of the limbs it moves; we see our nature too, reduced to its original and elementary state, and our pride is pleased to find how well we do without the tailor, whom we have sometimes thought a greater artist than Nature; being divested of factitious and transitory investiture, human nature takes its proper place among the elements of the universe, and our ideas of man are enlarged and ennobled by associating him with greater and more lasting and perfect things, than the accidents and quaint fashions among which his weakness makes it convenient for him to live. Clothing was not an original necessity; and if the mind were in its pristine purity, it were not so now. This should be the painter's guide; if the subject of a picture be of too simple and early a period to need clothing, if it be simple in its nature, single-minded, and of a far-timed and elementary condition, the want of clothing will never be felt. If, too, in subjects nearer to our own times and habits, it be clothed in modesty and innocence, it may be pardoned;—but that is doubtful ground. But when the covering is wantonly laid aside, we are only sensible that our habits, our weaknesses, and some of our best feelings are outraged; and while we resent the violence, our resentment urges us to be suspicious of the motive. In Mr Etty's picture, (which we have perhaps rather hypercritically made the occasion of our strictures,) contains much bright colour, much beauty, skillfully executed. 101, 'Approach to Verona, from the Tyrol,' by Callcott, is very beautiful, but a little tame. 105, 'The last in,' a group of dilatory scholars coming into school, is full of feeling, pathetic as well as comic. The thin, harassed, care-worn, irritable teacher, making that sarcastic bow to the unhappy loiterer, is painfully real; a type of poverty and disappointment, venting its unconscious spleen in clouding the sunny times of its incongruous workmaster. 118, 'Portrait of Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington, in the dress worn by his Grace in active service,' D. Wilkie, conveys the idea of a taller man than the Great Commander, who, if we mistake not, shares the fate usual to his class, of being something below the middle height. 114, 'Italian scene in the year of the Jubilee,' &c., C. L. Eastlake, is clever and carefully studied, but tame and mannered. We have been told that a cotemporary artist has said of it that the flesh looked as if it were painted with raspberry cream; it could not have been better described. Eastlake has fallen into mannerism, which deadens his faculties; for he really has more than one may find in his later pictures. 127, 'Sancho Panza in the days of his youth,' by Wilkie, has not much in it. 'Fairy, the property of Mrs E. Lytton Bulwer,' (190) could only have been painted by Landseer; those liquid eyes, those moving lips, and funny, sensitive nose, could not have owned another hand. But it is not among the painter's best things; the ears do not look to us quite in keeping with the rest; one must retreat farther off than suits the features, to see them in the proper way, because they are not so highly finished, and thus the latter must be indistinct, or, if near enough to see them distinctly, the execution of the ears is too apparent. 152, 'Tiger-hunting in India,' is one of Daniell's stirring scenes; one of the glimpses he gives of life in that interesting region, with more of feeling and vividness than any artist. 155, 'Venice, from the Porch of Madonna della Salute,' is a most extraordinary clutter of odd and unreal appearances;—the water is like glass; the boats like toys (not touching it either), and the church like a card model. Mr Farner must have painted in the dark, or with his eyes shut. 167, 'A Scene in the Grampians—the Drover's Departure,' E. Landseer, is perhaps the most remarkable picture that has ever hung on the walls of the Academy. Some years back, when we revisited the Academy for the first time since childhood, we thought we saw in Landseer's pictures more solid stuff than we had ever found in native productions; a greater truth; a more thorough comprehension of the objects of nature; a more thorough command over the material. The study and learning were abundant, but there was a total absence of effort. The pictures that year, if we mistake not, were 'Highlanders Deer-stalking,' and three other small pictures on the same sort of subject. Subsequently, the 'Hawking Scene,' with the bold, daring action of the birds, brought as the spectator is to be a witness to their struggles in mid air, with the expression of the oppressed heron, the clinging heartless pertinacity of the rapacious hawk; the Hogarthian depth and variety (only well drawn) of the 'Jack in Office,' and the noble 'Bolton Abbey,' in which all the requisites of a good picture,—colour, drawing, and (oh rare!) expression,—seemed in perfection; in which the beasts, birds, and fishes, and man himself, owned a master's hand, nothing being unsubject to it;—all these things showed a progress in power, and a sustinment of impulse and original feeling such as had never, we think, been manifested by one of our own school. He is the first who has thoroughly mastered his art, who has passed his apprenticeship; one who not merely wishes—whose aspirations outgo his execution; but who can do that which he intends. He has devoted all his soul to nature, has imbued every particular feeling of his mind with her own, and she has rewarded her faithful servant, by giving him the mastery over herself;—he

PLEASURE, PAIN, AND KNOWLEDGE.

"PLEASURE, pain, and knowledge!" echoes the Reader;—"what a vast subject! Why, it includes all that you, Mr London Journalist, or anyone else, ever write about!"

True; and far be it from us to attempt cramming such an universe of a subject into the nutshell of an "article." We only propose to give two specimens of the enjoyment of a pleasure, and the endurance of a pain, in the instance of the one and the same individual, for the purpose of showing how truly the two things accord, when both are genuine, and to what useful account such a man may turn every piece of knowledge he acquires. Nor is the instance Roman or Grecian, or of the possessor of any illustrious or public name,—personages whose business it appears to be heroic, and to furnish illustrations for school-themes, and whom, secretly (owing, perhaps, to the formality and tiresomeness of those themes) one feels too often inclined to leave to the practice and glory of their virtues as things ancient and foreign to us, like their garments, or fit only to be immortalized in stone,—petrifications of ambitious ethics,—not flesh and blood, or next door neighbours,—stars for the sky, not things of household warmth and comfort,—not feasible virtues,—or if feasible, rendered alien somehow by distance and strangeness, and perhaps accompanied by vices which we are hardly sorry to meet with, and which our envy (and something better) converts into reconcilements of their virtue;—as when we hear, for example, that old Cato drank, or Phocion said an aristocratical thing on the "hustings," or Numa (as a Frenchman would say) visited a pretty girl "of afternoons,"—Ma'amselle Egerie,—who, he pretended to the world, was a goddess, and an oracle, and gave him thoughts on legislation. And so, of the professed men of pleasure in the ancient world, or indeed of professed men of pleasure at any time (for their science makes them remote and peculiar, and a sort of body apart, —excessively Free Masons) we do not think ourselves bound to resemble them. Their example is not pernicious, much less of any use for the attainment of actual pleasure. Who thinks of imitating the vices of Caesar or Alexander, out of an ambition of universality? (what a preposterous sop would he be!) or of stopping to drink and carouse when he ought to be moving onward, because Hannibal did it? or of being a rake, because Alcibiades had a reputation of that sort (unless, perhaps, some one of our lively ultra-classical neighbours, whose father has indiscreetly christened him Alcibiade, and who studies Greek beauty in a ballet)? We do not think of imitating men in Greek helmets or the Roman toga. Their example is only for school-exercises, or to be brought forward in the speech of some virgin orator. We must have heroism in a hat and boots, and good fellowship at a modern table. It is our every day names, Smith, Jones, and Robinson, that must be instanced for an example which we can thoroughly feel. Has Thomson done a handsome action? Everybody cries, "What a good fellow is Thomson!" and glows to be like him. Is a living man of wit effeminate and a luxurious liver? The example becomes perilous. It is no remote infection, no "Plague of Athens." The disease is next door,—a pestilence that loungeth at noon,—a dandy cholera.

Nobody cares much for Poetus and Arris, and the fine example they set. Those Romans seem bound to have set them, for the benefit of the "Selectæ e Profanis," and the publications of Mr Valpy. Lucretia sits "alone in her glory," a kind of suicide statue,—too hard of example to be followed. We cannot think, somehow, that she felt much, except as a personage who should one day be in the classical dictionaries. And Portia's appears an odd and unfeeling taste, who swallowed "burning coals," instead of having a proper womanly faint, and taking a glass of water.

But tell us of "Mrs Corbet" (celebrated by Pope), who heroically endured the cancer that killed her, and we understand the thing. Recount us a common surgical case of a man who has his leg cut off without wincing; and being no farther than St Bartholomew's Hospital, it comes home to us. Tell us what a good fellow Thomson the poet was, or how Quin took him out of a spunging-house with a hundred pounds, or how Johnson "loved to dine," or Cowper to solace his grief with flowers and verses, and we all comprehend the matter perfectly, and are incited to do likewise.

We shall make no apology, therefore, to our Readers, nor to the friend himself of whose powers of enjoyment and endurance we are about to give them a taste, for laying before them the substance of two letters which we have lately received from the same individual, one of the best of good fellows, who would fain enjoy this beautiful creation to the utmost, and have it enjoyed by others. He need not fear, however, that we shall often steal this kind of march upon him, for such pleasures and pains (at least the latter) do not occur every day, and the former concerns the LONDON JOURNAL; for which reason we quote it here, to show in what sort of spirit of enjoyment we would have our paper read by every body if possible (and in sight of other persons' grounds, if they have none of their own), and for the purpose of exhibiting with greater force the pangs, and the endurance of them which follow.

In January last we had the pleasure of receiving, from this friend, a letter containing the following passage. Speaking of the JOURNAL, he says:—

"I never fail to read it every Sunday morning in my library, the windows of which overlook a lawn and shrubbery, with a fine grass field adjoining, and having a full view of the banks of a rivulet running along the boundary of my grounds, which are high and beautifully wooded; and commanding besides, over the tops of the fine trees, a more distant view of the high lands of G—, the outline of which is agreeably broken by the spire of a country church, which stands upon the very summit. I describe the locality because it accords so well with 'the spirit of the book,' and because I hope, that if things go on prosperously with you, you may be induced, at no very distant period, to pay a visit to your friends in the north, and to make my house your home."

This house we have never yet seen; but from what we have experienced with our friend in another, we know it must be the abode of all good and hospitable things, and of that rational fair play between enjoyment and the earning of it, which seems to secure a good-hearted man from the chances of any very extraordinary suffering (except what the loss of those he loves might create), and especially of physical suffering, and the pangs of wounds and positive bodily carving. Yet such pangs, not long after the inditing of this luxurious passage, was our friend doomed to undergo; and undergo them he did, as well as if he had been bred up to nothing but endurance. This comes of mixing up intellect with one's pleasures,—of getting part of one's luxuries, O candid Reader! out of LONDON JOURNALS and PRINTING MACHINES. The other day our friend was standing bathing himself from head to foot, with one leg raised at a little distance from the ground, and immersed in a vessel of water, the bottom of which was of earthen-ware. Whether the vessel had been cracked since he last used it, or he pressed harder than usual, evidence sheweth not; but on a sudden, sharply goes his leg through the splitting and cutting earthenware; horribly follows his hand and arm (he being thrown off his balance); and in an instant, arteries were divided, bones laid bare, lumps of the living flesh laid upon the floor; and the man, who has just been enjoying the happy feeling of luxurious cleanliness, was leaning over his torment, in bleeding and burning astonishment.

"I recovered myself, however (says he), in a moment, withdrew my leg and arm from this horrible trap, and instantly perceived that it was only by promptitude that I could possibly save my life. The blood was flowing in a most frightful manner, particularly from the leg, in which three arteries were divided. I got hold of the bell-rope, and rang until the servants appeared. I despatched one to N—, a distance of two miles, for my surgeon, and directed the others to bring some silk handkerchiefs; with which, under my direction, they formed ligatures for the leg and arm. Fortunately I had some anatomical knowledge, and knew precisely where to put the ligatures; and I soon had the satisfaction of perceiving that they had answered the desired purpose, the flow of blood having, in a great measure, ceased. All this was accomplished in about five minutes, and during that time I lost about six quarts of blood. I then got the servants to assist me into bed, where I lay patiently until the surgeon arrived, which was in about an hour. He found the 'tendon Achilles' laid bare to the extent of about four inches, and four small pieces jagged out of it, but it was not cut through. The shin-bone was laid bare for about three inches, and part of the bone scraped off. By a slanting cut upwards, the calf of the leg was completely detached from the bone; and the joints of three of the toes were laid bare. So much for the leg. As to the other unfortunate limb, the joints of three fingers were laid bare, a good large piece of flesh completely cut away, and lying upon the floor, and there were two or three other deep cuts in it."

Our friend, being a reader of philosophy, made up his mind that it was proper for him to practise a bit of it; and so he resolved not to stir an inch, or to utter a groan, while the surgeon was sewing up his wounds and securing his arteries. And he kept his determination. Let the Reader imagine the horrible jagged wounds, caused by such blunt, blind, un-weapon-like weapons as crockery!—the torn and pulled-away flesh,—the bare, bone-scraped skin, part of the bone itself scraped away,—the whole body smarting and burning, as it always seems to do, when any part of it is in such suffering; and then the weakness occasioned by the loss of blood, enough to make the patient more sensitive, though not enough to throw a “manly man” into a swoon and forgetfulness;—and he will honour the courage of our friend, and see why we make public this specimen of the use of knowledge and fortitude, and of the spirit in which true Readers enter into the pleasure of London Journalism;—of which more anon; for we are not going to give up the credit of that matter, or to lose the opportunity of trumpeting or inculcating it. Here, we see, was no effeminacy and whining—no fuss-making—not even the movement of a limb, to throw out the nice hand of the surgeon, and do dishonour to his skill. Our friend, being a man of true pleasure, is a man of true patience; enjoys himself because he is a man; endures himself because he is a man; and gets knowledge as he goes, in order that he may enjoy and endure in the best manner. [And as his “useful knowledge” (more immediately so called) enabled him to anticipate the first proceedings of the surgeon, and probably to save his very life; so the other utility of his pleasurable knowledge, his London Journalism, and his love of the fields and trees, assisted him in gracing his knowledge, and superinducing upon it the beauty of patience, and of making the best of things.

Well, he writes to us on the 17th of May, and says he has been laid up since the 4th of January, during all which time he has been little out of his bed. He has now gone to another place for the benefit of the warm bath and the waters, and expects to be quite well again in a month, but is restricted from undergoing any mental exertion, even the writing of a letter: which order he breaks through, for the purpose of answering that of a friend.

“Now, my dear fellow,” concludes he, “had I got half such a carving from some confounded French ‘Captain Sword’ at the battle of Waterloo, I should have gained great honour and glory, and a pension to boot; but having had my limbs cut into cat’s-meat by so inglorious a machine, I get, of course, neither the glory nor the pension. This I consider very savage of destiny; but I cannot help it. The JOURNAL has been a great comfort to me during my confinement.” * * *

And so he ends, with more of his usual kindness. We like to think of our JOURNAL lying on his bed, like a beam through his shutters, or a flower brought him by some fairer friend; and we would fain have it lie on every suffering bed throughout the kingdom; not merely because it would be good for ourselves (or how should we be able to write it? how gather grapes from such mercenary thorns, or figs from such thistles?), but because we might do something towards diminishing pain in general, and inducing a habit of kindly fortitude.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

WILKIE, AUTHOR OF THE ‘EPICURIAD.’

[We extract this account from Anderson’s life of him, certainly not because Wilkie is any longer to be considered an eminent man, though he was once thought such, and his poem praised by Hume as “an ornament to the language.” His poem has gone to oblivion among other cantos of classical commonplace; and he himself remains only, to curious readers, as an eccentric individual, acute probably in his understanding though preposterous in some of his habits, and perhaps overvalued by his contemporaries partly on that account; for rationality is sometimes set off by what is irrational, out of the mere force of contrast. However, it is impossible to say what intellectual phenomena may not appear in this wonderful world, even in the shape of haters of clean sheets and parsimonious poets! and a man who obtained the admiration of such acquaintances as

Wallace and Smith, could not have been a common one.]

In his public capacity as a preacher, says Mr Robertson, (minister of Ratho,) he was rather original and ingenious than eloquent; and, though he never pursued the ordinary acts of popularity, never failed to fix the attention of his audience. The peculiarity, variety, and even eccentricity of his sentiments or reasoning, invariably procured him approbation. In his public character, he observed a thousand oddities and inattentions. He generally preached with his hat on his head, and often forgot to pronounce the blessing after public service. Once I saw him dispense the sacrament without consecrating the element. On being told, he made a public apology, consecrated and served the second table; after which, he went to the pulpit to superintend the service, forgetting to communicate himself, till informed of the omission by his elders. In his dress he was uncommonly negligent and slovenly, and in his whole manner of life, totally inattentive to all those little formalities on which the generality of mankind are apt to value themselves. He was immediately addicted to the use of tobacco, particularly chewing, in which he went to such extreme excesses, that it was thought, by all his acquaintance, highly prejudicial to his health, and perhaps a cause of his premature death. He was fond of medical aid, but always disputed, and often rejected the prescriptions of doctors: hence he was thought whimsical both in his complaints and his management of them. He slept with an immoderate quantity of bed-clothes. One day he visited a farmer in the neighbourhood, a relation of his own; when prevailed on to stay all night, he begged he might have plenty of bed-clothes. His female friends in the family collected and put on his bed twenty-four pair of blankets. When asked next morning if he had plenty of bed-clothes, he answered he had just enough, and had slept well. He abhorred nothing so much as clean sheets, and whenever he met with such, he wrapt them up, threw them aside, and slept in the blankets. One evening, at Halton, being asked by Lady Lauderdale to stay all night, he expressed an attachment to his own bed, but said, if her ladyship would give him a pair of foul sheets, he would stay.

Hard circumstances, says Dr Robertson, minister of Dalmany, oppressed Wilkie for the greater part of his life, and produced that strong attention to money matters, with which he has been reproached by those who could not explain it. It proceeded, in fact, from a singular love of independence, the passion of a stately mind. He shuddered at the thought of coming under the power of any man, and could hardly think of walking the streets, lest any person to whom he was indebted should meet him. When his father died, he had to borrow the money that was to bury him. He went to an uncle for ten pounds, and was refused. These events could but ill sit upon his mind. After he came to better days, I have often heard him say, says Mr Liston, “I have shaken hands with poverty up to the very elbow, and I wish never to see her face again.” Hence a parsimony to the extreme. Yet, in wealth, would we brand him with the love of money for its own sake. Another passion came in: he loved his relations; and it was his common maxim, that no man should ever break with his kindred. He was not long minister of Ratho, till he apprehended his life would be short; he had two sisters that he feared would be left destitute immediately upon his death. Apprehensive on their account, he always lived plain, heaped up every penny, and at last died worth two or three thousand pounds; not so much acquired by savings, however, as by a rapid profit from his own favourite art of agriculture, in the perfect skill of which no man excelled him. At the same time, after the short period that he became possessed of money, his friends could see that he could part with it. It was his custom to pay the bill, even when travelling with several of his relations that could afford their share. After he settled at St Andrews, his private charities were not less than twenty pounds a year. Born for intense thought; for total absence of mind in ordinary matters; plunged in poverty in early life, without a domestic about his person, and even without the means of any elegance whatever, he naturally became slovenly, dirty, and even nauseous. He chewed tobacco to excess, and at last made himself believe that it was good for his health. It seems on all hands agreed, that no mortal was equal to him in conversation and argument. His own explanation of it was, that he took the right side, while his antagonists took the wrong to display their ingenuity and learning. I have heard the late Dr Wallace, author of the ‘Dissertation on the Numbers of Mankind,’ say, nobody could venture to cope with him. His knowledge in almost all things was deep, solid, and unanswerable. His reasoning was plain to a child. In shrewdness he had no rival. Both his manner and thoughts were masculine in a degree peculiar to himself. Dr Smith says, it was an observation of the late lord Elibank, that wherever Wilkie’s name happened to be mentioned in a company, learned or unlearned, it was not soon dropped; everybody had much to say. In short, he was a great and an odd man. His character, I will venture to say, will never be successfully written, but by a great hand; and even, when written, the theory of the man is above common comprehension.”

It was remarkable, says Professor Dalziel, “that Wilkie with all his learning, could neither read nor spell. I myself was witness to his ignorance of the art of reading. When I was a very young man, residing at Hatton, Wilkie came from St Andrews, on a visit to Lord Lauderdale. He staid a few days, and all the personal knowledge I had of Wilkie was acquired during that time. ‘The Judgment of Paris,’ a poem by Dr Beattie, was brought to Hatton one of those days, as a new publication. Wilkie asked me to retire with him, that we might read and criticise the poem together. At first, when he began to read, I imagined he did not understand the verses at all; as he surely committed the saddest havoc in the point of quantity and pronunciation, that can well be imagined, and even misalled several of the words. And yet his criticisms were so just, and so happily expressed, that I was charmed with the elegance of his taste, and the propriety of his observations.”

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXII.—A GENTLEMAN’S REVENGE.

[FROM Mr Millar’s ‘Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland,’ noticed in our last. Is not “Jean Seymour” an incorrectness? Sir Robert Monro’s father (also a Sir Robert) married a Jean,—daughter of John Forbes, Esq.; but in ‘Burke’s Peerage and Baronetage,’ the Sir Robert of the present story married a Mary Seymour, and it is possible that this was the true name, from the circumstance of his great-grand-daughter’s being christened “Mary Seymour,”—a pleasing evidence, by the way, of the impression which her fair ancestor had left in the family. The following is Mr Burke’s notice of this truly gallant and interesting man:—“Sixth (baronet) Sir Robert, a gallant military officer, who fell at the battle of Falkirk, fighting against the Pretender, on the 17th of January 1746. Sir Robert married Mary, daughter of Henry Seymour, Esq., of Woodlands, in the county of Dorset.” The present baronet is his grandson. His son, Sir Henry Monro, is recorded as distinguished for his “great classical attainments.” The Monro’s appears to have been an interesting race. We believe the young Monro, who was killed some years ago by a tiger in the East-Indies (torn away by the animal, as he was sitting with a party), was of this family, and we think we have read he was a very good and genteel fellow. The Sir Robert here mentioned had a brother killed with him at Falkirk, and another who died in the same way, seven months afterwards, in the Highlands. His only sister survived him for nearly twenty years, “a striking example (says Doddridge) of profound submission and fortitude, mingled with the most tender sensibility of temper.” See the passage in Millar, p. 427.]

THE following anecdote of Sir Robert, which I owe to tradition, sets his character in a very amiable light. On his return from Flanders in 1712, he was introduced to a Miss Jane Seymour, a beautiful English lady. The young soldier was smitten by her appearance, and had the happiness of perceiving that he had succeeded in at least attracting her notice. So happy an introduction was followed up into intimacy, and at length, what had been only a casual impression on either side, was ripened into a mutual passion of no ordinary warmth and delicacy. On Sir Robert’s quitting England for the north, he arranged with his mistress the plan of a regular correspondence, and wrote to her immediately on his arrival at Foulis. After waiting for a reply with all the impatience of the lover, he sent off a second letter complaining of her neglect, which had no better success, and shortly after a third, which shared the fate of the two others. The inference seemed too obvious to be missed, and he strove to forget Miss Seymour. He hunted, he fished, he visited his several friends, he involved himself in a multiplicity of concerns, but all to no purpose; she still continued the engrossing object of his affections, and after a few months’ stay in the Highlands, during which his very character seemed to have undergone a radical change for the worse, he again returned to England. When waiting on a friend in London, he was ushered precipitately into the midst of a fashionable party, and found himself in the presence of his mistress. She seemed much startled by the rencounter; the blood mounted to her cheeks, but, suppressing her emotion by a strong effort, she turned to the lady who sat next her, and began to converse on some common topic of the day. Sir Robert retired, and, beckoning to his friend, entreated him to procure him an interview with Miss Seymour. This was effected, and an explanation ensued. The lady had not received a single letter, and forming, at length, from the seeming neglect of her lover, an opinion of him similar to that from which she herself was suffering in his esteem, she attempted to banish him from her affection, an attempt, however, in which she had been scarcely more successful than Sir Robert. They were gratified to find that they had not been mistaken in their first impressions of each other, and they parted more attached, and more convinced that the attachment was more mutual than ever. In less than a month after Miss Seymour became Mrs Monro.

Sir Robert succeeded in tracing all his letters to one point, a kind of post-office in the confines of Inverness-shire. There was a proprietor in this neighbourhood who was deeply engaged in the interests of the Stuarts, and decidedly hostile to Sir Robert, the scion of a family which had distinguished itself, from the first dawn of the reformation, in the cause of civil and religious liberty. There was, therefore, little difficulty in assigning an author to the contrivance; but Sir Robert was satisfied in merely tracing it to a discovery; for, squaring his principles of honour rather by the morals of the New Testament than by the dogmas of that code which regards death as the only expiation of insult or injury, he was no duellist. An opportunity, however, soon occurred of his avenging himself in a manner agreeable to his character and principles. On the breaking out of the Rebellion of 1715, the person who had so wantonly sported with his happiness joined with the Earl of Mar, and, after the failure of the enterprise, was among the number of the proscribed; Sir Robert's influence with the government, and the peculiar office to which he was appointed, gave him considerable power over the confiscated property, and his power he exerted to its utmost in behalf of the wife and children of the man by whom he had been injured. "Tell your husband," said he to the lady, "that I have now repaid him for the interest he took in my correspondence with Miss Seymour."

FINE ARTS.

An Easy Introduction to Perspective, for the Use of Young Persons. Sixth edition, revised, corrected, and improved, with new Plates. By J. C. Burgess, Professor of Perspective Drawing and Painting in Families and Schools. London: printed for the Author.

"It is true that books of this kind have been greatly multiplied, and that, consequently, the republication of this introduction might appear superfluous; but then it will be conceded by all who are experimentally acquainted with the subject, that, however vain it may appear, almost every instructor thinks his own method of imparting instruction preferable to that of others. But without detracting from treatises on the same subject, which would seem invidious, I must observe, that I cannot help thinking those I have perused are, some of them, too abstruse and prolix, while others are unsatisfactory from their extreme brevity, and most of them rather deficient in simplicity and perspicuity."

So writes Mr Burgess in his preface; and the case is, undoubtedly, just as he has represented it. We have perused other works on the subject, and perfectly agree with his views of the generality. We have one by us, which, from a desire on the part of its author to make Perspective rank among the exact sciences, is composed intirely in the form of postulates, axioms, and propositions, each tagged with its Q. E. D.; and might be taken at the first glance for a Euclid. It is true that the author develops his subject with most clear and logical demonstration; but he has himself prepared for the necessity, by burying his meaning in assumed obscurity; and, as artists are not often profoundly versed in mathematics, its form makes it very unlikely that it could be generally useful. It is, however, complete and satisfactory. This is the extreme of the elaborate class. Mr Burgess's own work may be instanced as the extreme on the other side. The author appears to have a very competent knowledge of his subject, but he is too confident in his powers, and takes his own clear perception of his own meaning, for an equally clear development of it to others. For the sake of brevity, too, we must suppose he has omitted most important and constituent parts of an elementary treatise on perspective. There is no explanation of the optical truth on which the rules of the art are founded; that every picture, in fact, represents a transparent plane, through which we view the objects delineated; that the pencils of light reflected from the liminary points of natural objects, transmitted through a transparent plane (as the pane of a window, for instance), intersect that plane at certain points, whose proportionate distance is determined by the actual size of the objects, and their relative distance from the eye of the spectator; for it is obvious that an object of a certain length or breadth, subtends an angle formed by the pencils of light proceeding from its extremity to the eye of the spectator, and that angle must diminish or increase as the object recedes or approaches the eye; and, finally, that the legs of the angle will intersect a plane, which is at a fixed distance from the eye at points more or less near to each other, in exact proportion to the angle formed at the eye; and that the pencils of light transmitted from all parts between the extremities of the object, will pass between those points in the plane: therefore the distance between those points will be the apparent proportion that the object will bear to the whole size of the plane, as seen by the eye. Such is the fundamental law of natural perspective; that of artificial perspective forms the converse; a picture is an opaque plane, which is to represent a transparent one; and the same objects being laid down at different measurements, and subtending a varying angle at the eye, will appear of different distances. In the former case, the true size of the object is fixed, the distance and the apparent size vary in a certain proportion: in the latter case, the true distance is fixed, the size and the apparent distance vary in a certain proportion. This important point is altogether overlooked in Mr Burgess's work, or at most casually alluded to, by observing that distance diminishes the apparent size of objects. Oblique perspective is very slightly and carelessly mentioned, and the linear perspective of shadows is not so much as mentioned at all. The plates are clearly, but not very carefully drawn, and from the distance point being mostly taken too close, the figures are distorted; thus the chair, in Plate III, looks like a sort of sofa. In short, Mr Burgess's treatise contains nothing that may not be found in other books on perspective; but omits many necessary points, which they generally contain, without, however, being a jot more clear or simple. There is a very unpretending book, written by a man of the name of Noble, (now probably out of date (we have not the volume by us to refer to), which is the simplest, the clearest, most reasonable, and most practical elementary work we have ever seen on the subject. We recommend Mr Burgess to obtain a sight of it, and then let him say whether or not we have been severe upon his deficiencies.

The remarks on the insufficiency and tiresomeness of mechanical apparatuses for drawing are perfectly just; for lovers of the arts they are quite unfitted; they are only calculated for the use of travellers, who, not having sufficient practical knowledge of drawing, are enabled, by their means alone, to preserve memorials of scenes they have visited, for themselves and their friends at home; and for this purpose they are invaluable. The following is an interesting fact:—

"And it may be observed that the study of this and other sciences, as occupation for those who have much leisure, is in many respects vastly superior to those dissipating pursuits, which are often injurious to health, endanger life, and are attended with enormous expense. To prove this, I would just relate an anecdote, the circumstances of which are of recent occurrence. A nobleman, who has a large family, and had for many years been almost wholly devoted to field sports, to hunting, coursing, racing, shooting, &c. &c. &c., lately became fond of drawing, and his fondness for this art so wonderfully increased, that he gave up his horses and his hounds, is now almost constantly in the society of his lovely and accomplished lady, and his beautiful children, and occupies several hours daily in the practice of this very pleasing art."

Landscape Illustrations of Moore's Irish Melodies, with Comments for the Curious. Part I. London. J. Power.

A FITTER work than 'Moore's Melodies' could scarcely be selected for landscape illustrations; the local allusions are so frequent. We are told, on all hands, that the Green Isle is most lovely in its scenery, and we generally know so little about it, compared to other places famous for their beauty. The present number contains four views—'The Meeting of the Waters,'—the 'sweet vale of Avoca,' a charming scene, 'Inniscathery,' a strange and solemn scene, with that old abbey, and that old, old tower, looking so solitary and sacred; 'St Kelvin's Bed,' and 'The Wicklow Gold Mines.' The engravings are nicely executed by S. Rawle; though the third is perhaps a little heavy and murky. We can only object to the high price of the Part, which, we think, is likely to be a serious obstacle to an extensive sale.

RECOLLECTIONS OF CHARLES LAMB.

THOUGH the disposition of Lamb to sacrifice his own feelings and inclinations to those of other people in whom he took a personal interest, was infinitely more conspicuously exercised (as well it might be) in the case I have alluded to above than in any other, yet the disposition itself was an inherent feature of Lamb's character, and showed itself in numerous instances, the details of which would be full of interest and curiosity. A few of them I may allude to; and I do so the rather that the rare and almost more than mortal virtue which they display was shared in its utmost strength and beauty by her who has been left to mourn his loss, with a grief which must be so dreary and desolating, that it is impossible for those who can appreciate it to help exclaiming—

"Happy in my mind was he that died!"

At Islington, and afterwards at Enfield, they had a favourite servant—"Becky." She was an excellent person in all respects; and not the worse that she had not the happiness of comprehending the difference between genius and common sense,—between "an author" and an ordinary man. Accordingly, having a real regard for her master and mistress, she used not seldom to take the liberty of telling them "a bit of her mind," when they did anything "odd," or out of the common way. And as (to do them justice) their whole life and behaviour were as little of a common-place as could well be, Becky had plenty of occasions for the exercise of her self-imposed task, of instructing her master and mistress in the ways of the world! Becky, too, had the advantage of previous experience in observing and treating the vagaries of extraordinary men; for she had lived for some years with Hazlitt before she went to the Lambs. The consequence was, that though, so far as I ever heard or observed, she was never wanting in any one particular of her duties and office, she was very apt to overstep them, and trench on those of her master and mistress. In performing the metier of housekeeping, the Lambs were something like an excellent person of my acquaintance, who, when a tradesman brings him home a pair of particularly well-fitting boots, or any other object perfectionated in a manner that peculiarly takes his fancy, inquires the price, and if it happens to be at all within tradesman-like bounds, says, "No; I cannot give you that price, it is too little—I shall give you so and so,"—naming a third or fourth more than the price demanded! Now, if the Lambs' baker, for example, had charged them (as, it is said, bakers will) a dozen loaves in the weekly bill, when they must have known that they had eaten only half that number, the last thing they would have thought of was complaining of the overcharge. If they had not consumed the proper quantity to pay for the trouble of serving them, it was not the baker's fault; and the least they could do was to pay for it!

Now this was a kind of logic utterly incomprehensible to Becky, and she would not hear of it. Her master and mistress had a right to be as extravagant as they pleased; but they had no right to confound the distinctions between honesty and roguery, and it was what she could not permit. Nor must it be wondered at if she failed to recognise and admit the intellectual pretensions of persons who were evidently so behind the rest of the world in the knowledge of these first rudiments of household duties. Now there are few of us who would not duly prize a domestic with wit and honesty enough to protect us from the consequences of our us, is order, neatness, and sweetness to them; ventilating of rooms, and airing of beds, are to them mere troublesome fancies; dusting is an unnecessary disturbance of what, by nature, falls so noiselessly, and lies so impartially; they remove, of course, only what is pointed out to them, and sit down contentedly in the midst of what remains. In nothing should we reap more every-day satisfaction from judicious education than in the improvement of our domestic servants.—Simpson's Necessity of Popular Education.

BEAUTIFUL FANCY.

* That face has often returned to my mind, but I never could remember where I had seen it, and I have thought for years that I have met it in society, or that it had flitted past me in a dream. I never saw anything more ethereal than the whole countenance and figure. What a golden foliage of clustered hair! and how delicately she holds those flowers, as if they were a sudden bloom opening from her fingers, or growing with her breath from her tremulous lips, and caught while they floated on the air! But there is human living light in those grey eyes, and through them all the spirit of the lady speaks to us. [We have omitted to make a reference for this extract, and forget from what book we took it. Is it from 'Lodore?' or 'Francesca Carrara?' or 'Pierce Falcon, the Outcast?' or from what other novel, lately published? Upon reconsideration we think it must be from 'Arthur Coningsby.' The picture is very beautiful.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

As the new arrangement in this Paper will leave but comparatively little room for Correspondence, and as it is painful at all times to reject letters intended for publication, we must throw ourselves upon the considerate kindness of our friends. We have lately received, for instance, many communications; some of which we should otherwise have inserted, but most of which we should have been compelled to withhold; and, in now withholding almost all of them, we take the opportunity of being silent upon almost all, and of requesting that a like negative answer in future will not be thought uncivil or uncourteous. We have hitherto been very particular in answering Correspondents, partly for ordinary reasons, chiefly to extend a general spirit of courtesy and good-will; nor as long as our space and time allowed us to devote so much room to these notices, should we have thought fit, perhaps, to give up the custom. But circumstances require otherwise; and therefore we must beg our Readers to consider what will be best and least painful for both parties. All letters, as usual, will be carefully read, and all suggestions considered; and where the nature of the case manifestly demands it, an answer will, of course, be given; but in all other instances the Correspondent will have the goodness to make as handsome a construction of our silence as possible, and to attribute it to the cause the least unpleasant both to him and ourselves. In one respect he will assuredly be in the right, and very probably in both; for we would insert every letter sent us, if mere inclination to meet the wishes of the writers could settle such a matter; and we have often had communications which we should have inserted with pleasure for their own sakes, had our room permitted. We trust that the numerous Correspondents, who cultivate the graces of verse, will on one account be the less unwilling to forego their claims upon us, since the poetical part of our Paper will in future be occupied by CHARACTERISTIC SPECIMENS OF THE ENGLISH POETS; the first number of which will appear next week.

As the LONDON JOURNAL and the PRINTING MACHINE, though of one accord in general spirit, will be under the responsibility of two different persons, Correspondents who intend their communications for either department exclusively, will be good enough to address themselves accordingly. Notices to Correspondents will appear, for the same reason, at the foot of each division of the Paper.

Mr Egerton Webbe's 'Thoughts on Language,' No. IV, in our next.

If A LOVER OF LONDON AND ITS JOURNAL will take the trouble to send to the Publisher's, he will find a letter addressed to him.

"Association of Persons and Things during Dreams," the first opportunity.

The 'Reflector,' was published in the way inquired about by a Correspondent, and Charles Lamb did write in it.

In answer to the letter from the author of the 'Dens of London,' we have to say—first, that we think he could not do better than continue these subjects (keeping in mind part of one objection that we made); and, secondly, that we are equally of opinion it would be to his interest to publish them in the same quarter as before. The ground was first broken up in that quarter; the subject, therefore, in some measure, belongs to it, and would be looked for in series (a great advantage); and there is no question, that writing in periodical works is, in almost every instance, much better for an author, than publishing in the shape of a book, especially when he himself is the publisher,—the privater he should rather be called, for it is usually but another mode for secreting and quashing his production. An author, to publish his own work to advantage, should be a regular bookseller. There is, otherwise, no comparison between the two channels of public communication.

THE PRINTING MACHINE.

LORD BROUGHAM ON NATURAL THEOLOGY.

IN dealing with this book, it seems to be our best course not to occupy the space we can allot to it, otherwise than by giving our Readers an account of its object, furnishing, as we proceed, a few extracts to enable them to estimate its character and claims to attention. That its pages are rich in knowledge and strong in thought, the name of its distinguished author will have prepared the public to expect; nor will this expectation be disappointed. To ourselves, the volume seems of peculiar interest, independently of the instruction it conveys, as a striking illustration of the vigour which men of active habits frequently throw into their treatment of those speculative subjects which seem to supply a source of peculiar enjoyment to them, from the very contrast they afford to the activity and excitement of their customary occupations.

The book is dedicated to Earl Spencer, who, as the public will learn with some surprise, has not only devoted much time and thought to inquiries connected with Natural Theology, but had formed the design of giving to the world his thoughts on the subject, which Lord Brougham hopes he "will be moved to do all the more for the present address."

In this dedication we are informed that, the composition of the Discourse was undertaken in consequence of its having been often observed by its author, "that scientific men were apt to regard the subject of Natural Religion as little connected with philosophical pursuits. Many of the persons to whom I allude," continues his lordship, "were men of religious habits of thinking; others were free from any disposition towards scepticism, rather because they had not much discussed the subject, than because they had formed fixed opinions upon it after inquiry. But the bulk of them relied little upon Natural Theology, which they seemed to regard as a speculation built rather on fancy than on argument.

It therefore appeared to me desirable to define, more precisely than had yet been done, the place and the claims of Natural Theology among the various branches of human knowledge." About the same time that the author arrived at this conclusion, the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge was strongly urged to publish an edition of Dr Paley's popular work. Both Lord Brougham and Lord Spencer favoured the plan, but some of their colleagues were apprehensive that the adoption of it might open the door for the introduction of religious controversy, against the fundamental principles of the Society; the scheme was therefore abandoned. Lord Brougham, however, considered it expedient to carry this plan into execution by individual exertion, and had the good fortune to secure the assistance of Sir Charles Bell in the work of illustration. The present Volume is a Preliminary Discourse to Paley's work, the text of which is to be illustrated by his lordship and Sir Charles. We are informed that, with the exception of the third section and the greater portion of the notes, it was written during the intervals of leisure which the author enjoyed while he held the Great Seal of this kingdom, and has been revised and completed since.

In the introduction, the object of the undertaking is thus generally explained:—

"This Discourse is not a treatise of Natural Theology: it has not for its design an exposition of the doctrines whereof Natural Theology consists. But its object is, first, to explain the nature of the evidence upon which it rests—to show that it is a science, the truths of which are discovered by induction, like the truths of Natural and Moral Philosophy—that it is a branch of science partaking of the nature of each of those great divisions of human knowledge, and not merely closely allied to them both. Secondly, the object of the Discourse is to explain the advantages attending this study. The work, therefore is a Logical one."

The work is divided into two parts, the first of which treats of the nature of the subject, and the kind of evidence upon which Natural Theology rests; and the second part treats of the advantages derived from the study of the science. We shall, for the present, limit our attention to the first part, which is divided into seven sections, the contents of which we should endeavour to analyse if we had any hope of doing so satisfactorily without trenching on the space we have allotted to the extracts, to which we now proceed.

The following extract is from one of the passages in the second section, by which the author illustrates his argument that the physical branch of Natural Theology and Physics, or, the two inquiries into the nature and constitution of the universe, and that into the evidence of design which it displays, are not only closely allied to each other, but are to a very considerable extent identical.

"A comparative anatomist, of profound learning and marvellous sagacity, has presented to him what to common eyes would seem a piece of half-decayed bone, found in a wild, in a forest, or in a cave. By accurately examining its shape, particularly the form of its extremity or extremities (if both ends happen to be entire), by close inspection of the texture of its surface, and by admeasurement of its proportions, he can with certainty discover the general form of the animal to which it belonged, its size as well as its shape, the economy of its viscera, and its general habits. Sometimes the investigation in such cases proceeds upon chains of reasoning where all the links are seen and understood; where the connexion of the parts found with other parts and with habitudes is perceived, and the reason understood,—as that the animal had a trunk, because the neck was short compared with its height; or that it ruminated, because its teeth were imperfect for complete mastication. But, frequently, the inquiry is as certain in its results, although some links of the chain are concealed from our view, and the conclusion wears a more empirical aspect—as gathering that the animal ruminated from observing the print of a cloven hoof, or that he had horns from his wanting certain teeth, or that he wanted the collar-bone from his having cloven hoofs. Limited experience having already shown such connexions as facts, more extended experience will assuredly one day enable us to comprehend the reason of the connexion."

"The discoveries already made in this branch of science are truly wonderful, and they proceed upon the strictest rules of induction. It is shown that animals formerly existed on the globe, being unknown varieties of species still known; but it also appears that species existed, and even genera, wholly unknown for the last five thousand years. These peopled the earth, as it was, not before the general deluge, but before some convulsion long prior to that event had overwhelmed the countries then dry, and raised others from the bottom of the sea. In these curious inquiries, we are conversant not merely with the world before the flood, but with a world which, before the flood, was covered with water, and which, in far earlier ages, had been the habitation of birds, and beasts, and reptiles. We are carried, as it were, several worlds back, and we reach a period when all was water, and slime, and mud, and the waste, without either man or plants, gave resting-place to enormous beasts like lions, and elephants, and river-horses, while the water was tenanted by lizards, the size of a whale, sixty or seventy feet long, and by others with huge eyes having shields of solid bone to protect them, and glaring from a neck ten feet in length, and the air was darkened by flying reptiles covered with scales, opening the jaws of the crocodile, and expanding wings, armed at the tips with the claws of the leopard."

"Now wherein, with reference to its nature and foundations, does this vary from the inquiries and illustrations of Natural Theology? When from examining a few bones, or it may be a single fragment of a bone, we infer that, in the wilds where we found it, there lived and ranged, some thousands of years ago, an animal wholly different from any we ever saw, and from any of which any account, any tradition, written or oral, has reached us, nay, from any that ever was seen by any person of whose existence we ever heard, we assuredly are led to this remote conclusion, by a strict and rigorous process of reasoning; but, as certainly, we come through that process to the knowledge and belief of things unseen, both of us and of all men—things respecting which we have not, and cannot have, a single particle of evidence, either by sense or by testimony. Yet we harbour no doubt of the fact; we go farther, and not only implicitly believe the existence of this creature, for which we are forced to invent a name, but clothe it with attributes, till, reasoning step by step, we come at so accurate a notion of its form and habits, that we can represent the one, and describe the other, with unerring accuracy; picturing to ourselves how it looked, what it fed on, and how it continued its kind."

"Now, the question is this: What perceivable difference is there between the kind of investigations we have just been considering, and those of Natural Theology—except, indeed, that the latter are far more sublime in themselves, and incomparably more interesting to us? Where is the logical precision of the arrangement, which would draw a broad line of demarcation between the two speculations, giving to the one the name and the rank of a science, and refusing it to the other, and affirming that the one rested upon induction, but not the other? We have, it is true, no experience directly of that Great Being's existence in whom we believe as our Creator; nor have we the testimony of any man relating such experience of his own. But so, neither we, nor any witnesses in any age, have ever seen those works of that Being, the lost animals that once peopled the earth; and yet the lights of inductive science have conducted us to a full knowledge of their nature, as well as a perfect belief in their existence. Without any evidence from our senses, or from the testimony of eye-witnesses, we believe in the existence and qualities of those animals, because we infer by the induction of facts that they once lived, and were endowed with a certain nature. This is called a doctrine of inductive philosophy."

Our next extract is from a most valuable and interesting chapter, in which the author proves that the phenomena of mind, which natural theologians have studiously overlooked, supply as important and tangible evidences of design, and of the Divine power and goodness, as any which exist in the material world. We are bound to say that, in our opinion, Lord Brougham has never written anything which will procure him more respect from all thinking men, than this chapter. This may be said, indeed, of the entire work; but particularly of this our favourite chapter:—

"It is a law of our nature that any exertion becomes more easy the more frequently it is repeated. This might have been otherwise: it might have been just the contrary, so that each successive operation should have been more difficult; and it is needless to dwell upon the slowness of our progress as well as the painfulness of all our exertions, say, rather, the impossibility of our making any advances in learning, which must have been the result of such an intellectual conformation. But the influence of habit upon the exercise of all our faculties is valuable beyond expression. It is indeed the great means of our improvement both intellectual and moral, and it furnishes us with the chief, almost the only, power we possess of making the different faculties of the mind obedient to the will. Whoever has observed the extraordinary feats performed by calculators, orators, rhymers, musicians, nay, by artists of all descriptions, can want no further proof of the power that man derives from the contrivances by which habits are formed in all mental exertions. The performances of the Italian Improvisatori, or makers of poetry off-hand upon any presented subject, and in almost any kind of stanza, are generally cited as the most surprising efforts in this kind. But the power of extempore speaking is not less singular, though more frequently displayed, at least in this country. A practised orator will declaim in measured and in various periods—will weave his discourse into one texture—form parenthesis within parenthesis—excite the passions, or move to laughter—take a turn in his discourse from an accidental interruption, making it the topic of his rhetoric for five minutes to come, and pursuing in like manner the new illustrations to which it gives rise—mould his diction with a view to attain or to shun an epigrammatic point, or an alliteration, or a discord; and all this with so much assured reliance on his own powers, and with such perfect ease to himself, that he shall even plan the next sentence while he is pronouncing off-hand the one he is engaged with, adapting each to the other, and shall look forward to the topic which is to follow and fit in the close of the one he is handling to be its introducer; nor shall any auditor be able to discover the least difference between all this and the portion of his speech which he has got by heart, or tell the transition from the one to the other."

Is Lord Brougham aware that in this passage he has given us an account of the oratorical faculty as exemplified in himself? There are few other men to whom the description is applicable in all its circumstances.

That, although, writers on Natural Theology have neglected the evidences derivable from the phenomena of the human mind, they have dwelt largely on the instinct of animals, which are unquestionably mental faculties, although unconnected with any exercise of reason. With reference to these instincts, the author observes, that

"Certainly they do afford the most striking proofs of an intelligent cause, as well as of a unity of design in the world. The work of bees is among the most remarkable of all facts in both these respects. The form is in every country the same—the proportions accurately alike—the size the very same to the fraction of a line, go where you will; and the form is proved to be that which the most refined analysis has enabled mathematicians to discover as of all others the best adapted for the purposes of saving room, and work, and materials. This discovery was only made about a century ago; nay, the instrument that enabled us to find it out—the fluxional calculus—was unknown half a century before that application of its powers. And yet the bee had been for thousands of years, in all countries, unerringly working according to this fixed rule, choosing the same exact angle of 120 degrees for the inclination of the sides of its little room, which everyone had for ages known to be the best possible angle, but also choosing the same exact angles of 110 and 70 degrees, for the inclinations of the roof, which no one had ever discovered till the 18th century, when Maclaurin solved that most curious problem of maxima and minima, the means of investigating which had not existed till the century before, when Newton invented the calculus whereby such problems can now be easily worked. It is impossible to conceive anything more striking as a proof of refined skill than the creation of such instincts, and it is a skill altogether applied to the formation of intellectual existence."

Our limits compel us to close here for the present; but we shall endeavour to give another notice of this work.

MISS KEMBLE'S JOURNAL.

Journal. By Frances Anne Butler. 2 vols. Murray. THE notices of Miss Kemble (now Mrs Butler) on American society, have been looked for with some curiosity. Whether that curiosity will be adequately gratified by this Journal, we will not undertake to decide. Miss Kemble has produced a book which exhibits a very curious picture of her own mind, combined with some interesting details of the circumstances by which she was surrounded during her sojourn in the United States. It is, however, much more a record of her own thoughts than a narrative of her personal observations. It will disappoint, therefore, one class of readers, while it will present a much higher interest to another, though a smaller class. Those who delight in the anatomy of individual character will here find abundant materials for speculation.

"Written," says Miss Kemble, "as my Journal was, day by day, and often after the fatigue of a laborious evening's duty at the theatre, it has infinite sins of carelessness to answer for; and but that it would have taken less time and trouble to re-write the whole book, or rather write a better, I would have endeavoured to correct them."—We can scarcely understand the principle upon which the book has been constructed. It is not a transcript of Miss Kemble's Journal, for there is scarcely a page in which omissions are not indicated by stars * * *. We do not object to this, for we have no unreasonable desire to be admitted into the innermost confidence of a young lady who feels as passionately as she expresses herself strongly. But the entirety of the "personal history" being thus destroyed, we confess that, to our minds, many other things might have been omitted with great advantage. It does not appear to us that the interest or the verisimilitude of this book are much increased by the constant repetition of "put out things for the theatre;"—"dressed for dinner;"—"after breakfast, practised;"—or, "mended habit-shirt;"—nor that it is of much historical importance to the English public to learn that, "Mr — called, and sat with us till six o'clock;"—that "Colonel and Mr — called in while we were at supper;"—or that, Miss Kemble making a call, "found Mrs — at home."—As there are omissions, we think that these matters, which literally occupy one fourth of the book, might as well have been omitted too.

We are not quite so sure that many passages of a very different nature, which made us start, ought to have perished under the pruning-knife of an editor. They have a curious human interest about them, and are sometimes delightful in their naïveté, and sometimes ludicrous in their inconsistency. Too often, however, they are very painful; for they reveal to us how much of real misery there is in the struggle which is constantly going forward in an ardent and imperfectly-disciplined mind. We say this with a very sincere regard for the character developed in this Journal;—with a high admiration for the talents of the writer, and a still greater respect for her spirit, and energy, and independence;—but we cannot avoid regretting that these advantages have done so little for her own happiness, and that the "aching void" is so constant. We fear that this is the case with all creatures of impulse, who have cultivated the imagination at the expense of the judgment;—and who, however clear their perceptions or elevated their notions of duty, are alternately votaries of reason or slaves of prejudice, and have not that command over their own stores of gratification, which, in spite of the most adverse circumstances, is entrusted to every human being who has learnt to "Make the happiness we cannot find."

Early in the Journal we are startled by the misanthropy of a young woman, who had earned the applause of admiring crowds long before most persons of her own profession can obtain an opportunity of emerging from the gloomiest obscurity. A land-swallow sinks down on the deck of the packet-ship. The writer exclaims, "Poor little creature! how very much more do I love all things than men and women!" The bird dies. "I am sorry. I could mourn almost as much over the death of a soulless animal, as I could rejoice at that of a brute with a soul." This is not exactly what we should expect; but it is only one of many inconsistencies. Miss Kemble has a natural piety about her, which constantly sheds a beauty and holiness over these pages:—and yet it is as constantly mixed up with a sort of levity, amounting almost to profaneness, which seems absolutely incompatible with the existence of an abiding religious belief. "The devil driving a hurricane,"—the "ghastly smiles of the devil,"—a "miniature hell,"—are samples of expressions not few or far between. Again, it is quite clear, that all Miss Kemble's more sober thoughts are of a liberal nature as regards the improvement of the masses of mankind, and the institutions upon whose onward progress their happiness so mainly depends. And yet the most marked traits of an aristocratic education are constantly exposed to view. "A first visit is an awkward thing; and nothing that isn't thorough-bred ever does it quite well."—"I would rather, by far, have some barbarous Saxon giant to my ancestor, than all the wealth of the earth to my dower." Nor is this sort of pride merely speculative. At New York Miss Kemble goes into a shop to buy some gauze, and, being perfectly aware of the manners of the people, is offended beyond measure when one of the shopmen said, "They were most anxious to show me every attention, and render my stay in this country agreeable." She answered, "Thank you," but adds in the Journal, "I have no idea of holding parley with clerks behind a counter, still less of their doing so with me." And yet, in her own professional case, she holds, and very properly, that there is nothing for an actor to be grateful for to an audience, because the whole affair is one of exchange. Is the clerk behind the counter in a different position? All this, however, is nothing but the dregs of home prejudices. Miss Kemble, in many places, does justice to the much-abused American manners, with a kindness of heart that shows she is above that miserable pride which she conventionally expresses. It is, however, clear that her education has been of a very artificial, and, in many respects, contracted character, which leads her to deliver herself with the most perfect confidence upon matters upon which she is totally uninformed. The following dogma is amusing: "England offers the only exception that I have advanced, namely, that the republican form of government is inimical to poetry. For it was during the short and shameful period of fanatical republicanism, which blots her annals, that the glory and the might of Milton rose upon the world. He is the only great poet who ever flourished under a republic." After this trash we are not surprised to find this modest rhapsody in a young lady's Journal—"I wouldn't be in the Reform Parliament of England for ten thousand pounds!—and—, the bruiser and the bankrupt! Oh shame! England, shame! Poor England!"—Just the same sort of ignorance dictates the miserable inconsistencies of rejoicing in the apparent prosperity of the American labourer, and lamenting over the necessity of his constant toil. "It is a real and deep evil arising from the institutions of this country, that every man must toil from day to day for his daily bread." What can this mean? If institutions were different would "daily bread" be as plenty as blackberries? Ask the savages whom the white men have driven out. Or does it mean that the American institutions prevent the accumulation of property? The book constantly furnishes evidence to the contrary. It means nothing but that the writer too often strives to say a strong thing and a pithy thing, without the slightest knowledge of what she is talking about. Those, therefore (the capitalists of England), whom she denounces as the cruel oppressors of the poor, "wringing hard earnings from their starving grasp, and growing wealthy on their plunder," may smile and pity.

But we turn to better things;—which we shall give in the shape of extracts:—

AMERICAN CIVILITY.

"The street was very much thronged, and I thought the crowd a more civil and orderly one than an English crowd. The men did not jostle or push one another, or tread upon one's feet, or kick down one's shoe-heels, or crush one's bonnet into one's face, or turn it round upon one's head, all which I have seen done in London streets. There is this to be said: this crowd was abroad merely for pleasure, sauntering along, which is a thing never seen in London; the proportion of idle loungers who frequent the streets there being very inconsiderable, when compared with the number of people going on business through the town. I observed that the young men, to-night, invariably made room for women to pass, and many of them, as they drew near to us, took the segar from their mouth, which I thought especially courteous.—Vol. i, page 65.

The people here are more civil and considerate than can be imagined. I sent, yesterday evening, for some water-ice: the confectioner had none; when, lo! to-night he brings me some he has made on purpose for me, which he intreats my acceptance of. I admired a very pretty fan Mrs— had in her hand; and at the end of the play she has sent it to my dressing-room; and these sort of things are done by me, not once, but ten times every day. Nothing can exceed the kindness and attention which has encountered us everywhere since we have been in this country. I am sure I am bound to remember America and the Americans thankfully; for, whatever I may think of their ways, manners, or peculiarities, to me they have shown unmingled goodwill, and cordial real kindness.—Vol. ii, pp. 77, 78.

AMERICAN TREATMENT OF HORSES.

The hackney coaches in this country are very different from those perilous receptacles of dust and dirty straw which disgrace the London stands. They are comfortable within and clean without; and the horses harnessed to them never exhibit those shocking specimens of cruelty and ill-usage which the poor hack-horses of London present. Indeed, (and it is a circumstance which deserves notice, for it bespeaks general character,) I have not seen, during a two-years' residence in this country, a single instance of brutality towards animals, such as one is compelled to witness hourly in the streets of any English town.—Vol. i, p. 125, note.

AMERICAN HURRY.

The Americans are in too great a hurry to plant hedges: they have abundance of native material, but a wooden fence is put up for a few weeks; a hedge takes as many years to grow; and, as I said before, an American has not time to be a year about anything. When first the country was settled, the wood was an encumbrance; and it was cut down accordingly: that is by no means the case now; and the only recommendation of these fences is, therefore, the comparative rapidity with which they can be constructed. One of the most amiable and distinguished men of this country remarked to me, that the Americans were in too great a hurry about everything they undertook to bring anything to perfection. And, certainly, as far as my observation goes, I should calculate that an American is born, lives, and dies, twice as fast as any other human creature. I believe one of the great inducements to this national hurry is, that "time is money," which is true; but it is also true, sometimes, that "most haste makes worst speed."—Vol. i, p. 159, note.

AMERICA AS A NATION.

In beholding this fine young giant of a world, with all its magnificent capabilities for greatness, I think every Englishman must feel unmingled regret at the unjust and unwise course of policy which alienated such a child from the parent government. But, at the same time, it is impossible to avoid seeing that some other course must ere long have led to the same result, even if England had pursued a more maternal course of conduct towards America. No one, beholding this enormous country, stretching from ocean to ocean, watered with ten thousand glorious rivers, combining every variety of climate and soil, therefore every variety of produce and population, possessing within itself every resource that other nations are forced either to buy abroad, or to create substitutes for at home; no one, seeing the internal wealth of America, the abundant fertility of the earth's surface, the riches heaped below it, the unparalleled facilities for the intercourse of men and the interchange of their possessions throughout its vast extent, can for an instant indulge the thought that such a country was ever destined to be an appendage to any other in the world, or that any chain of circumstances whatever could have long maintained in dependence a people furnished with every means of freedom and greatness. But far from regretting that America has thrown off her allegiance, and regarding her as a rebellious subject, and irreverent child, England will surely, ere long, learn to look upon this country as the inheritor of her glory—the younger England, destined to perpetuate the language, the memory, the virtues of the noble land from which she is descended. Loving and honouring my country as I do, I cannot look upon America with any feeling of hostility. I not only hear the voice of England in the language of this people, but I recognise in all their best qualities—their industry, their honesty—their sturdy independence of spirit—the very virtues of their origin—they are English, no other people in the world would have licked us as they did; nor any other people in the world built up upon the ground they won, so sound, and strong, and so fair an edifice.—Vol. i, p. 237, 8, note.

We conclude with an amusing picture which Miss Kemble has drawn from her professional experience;—but which furnishes by no means an average specimen of the American stage:—

The play went off pretty smoothly except that they broke one man's collar-bone, and nearly dislocated a woman's shoulder, by flinging the scenery about. My bed was not made in time, and when the scene drew, half a dozen carpenters, in patched trowsers and tattered shirt sleeves, were discovered smoothing down my pillows and adjusting my draperies. The last scene is too good not to be given verbatim:—

ROMEO. Rise, rise my Juliet,
And from this cave of death, this house of horror,
Quick let me snatch thee to thy Romeo's arms.

Here he pounced upon me, plucked me up in his arms like an uncomfortable bundle, and staggered down the stage with me.

JULIET (aside). Oh! you have got me up horribly!—that'll never do. Let me down; pray let me down.

ROMEO. There, breathe a vital spirit on thy lips,
And call thee back, my soul, to life and love!

JULIET (aside). Pray, put me down; you'll certainly throw me down if you don't set me on the ground directly.

In the midst of "cruel, cursed fate," his dagger fell out of his dress; I, embracing him tenderly, crammed it back again, because I knew I should want it at the end.

ROMEO. Tear not my heart-strings thus!
They crack! they break! Juliet! Juliet! (dies).

JULIET (to corpse). Am I smothering you?

CORPSE (to Juliet). Not at all. Could you be so kind, do you think, as to put my wig on again for me? It has fallen off.

JULIET (to corpse). I'm afraid I can't, but I'll throw my muslin veil over it. You've broken the phial, haven't you?

(Corpse nodded.)

JULIET (to corpse). Where's your dagger?

CORPSE (to Juliet). 'Pon my soul I don't know.

COLERIDGE'S TABLE TALK.

Specimens of the Table Talk of the late Samuel Taylor Coleridge. 2 vols. 12mo, pp. 338 and 364. London, 1835.

THE title which has been given to these volumes is, perhaps, the one most likely to take the public attention; but it is not the most accurately descriptive of their contents that might have been found. It is scarcely, we apprehend, such a title as Coleridge himself, with his scrupulosity about words and names, and his nice appreciation of their differences, would have approved in a similar case. We do not object so much to the term, Table Talk, which ever since the publication of the famous collection of the sayings and opinions of Luther under that title has had a latitudinarian meaning, embracing almost everything which may be anyhow orally delivered; and had the book been designated ragments of, or Gleanings from, the Table Talk of Coleridge, we should have had little or nothing to find fault with. But a fragment and a specimen are quite different things. A specimen, though it be of necessity but a part, is yet a part which shows the whole, and which preserves, in so far as it extends, the entire character and spirit of the whole. To take the common illustration, a single brick is a fragment, but not a specimen, of the building from which it has been taken. Or, to come at once to matters of intellect and literature, the 'Scenes' published by Charles Lamb are properly intitled specimens of our old dramatists, being, at least, perfect portions; but nobody would think of calling Dodd's 'Beauties,' specimens of Shakspeare. Much less, then, is this the true name for a collection like the present, not a single paragraph in which probably retains the exact form in which it fell from the lips of Coleridge. This is as much as confessed by the Editor, who, in his preface, says, "I know better than anyone can tell me, how inadequately these specimens represent the peculiar splendour and individuality of Mr Coleridge's conversation. How should it be otherwise? Who could follow to the turning point his long arrow-flights of thought? Who could fix those ejaculations of light, those tones of a prophet, which at times have made me bend before him as before an inspired man? Such acts of spirit as these were too subtle to be fettered down on paper; they live—if they can live anywhere—in the memories alone, of those who witnessed them." But, in truth, all who have ever heard Coleridge talk will at once perceive that much more than what seems to be here admitted—how much more than manner and tones—has been lost in the process of forming this very imperfect record. How, indeed, could it have been otherwise? We doubt the powers of short-hand, itself, to take down every word of an uninterrupted discourse, of any considerable length, so as to produce, as it were, a perfect cast or fac simile of it; but, at any rate, the most wonderful memory that ever existed, certainly could not achieve anything of the kind. These notes of Mr Coleridge's conversation were, of course, written down, from recollection, some time—often, probably, some hours, or it might be, some days—after the reporter had left the speaker's presence—and we may be pretty certain that, in this way of proceeding, rarely anything more than the mere outline, or skeleton of the discourse, could be preserved. The filling up, in so far as anything of the kind was attempted, would be, really, for the most part not Coleridge's, but the reporter's own. And we find this inference completely confirmed, when we proceed to inspect the book. It ranges over a period of twelve years, and, we suppose, the number of conversations, in all, is not much less than two hundred. But the entire quantity of matter, in the two volumes, is scarcely more than Coleridge would have poured forth in a couple of evenings. Does the style, then, of these specimens, really much resemble that of Coleridge's conversation? In general, we must acknowledge that, to our feeling, it does not. It has, throughout, an artificial, occasionally almost an epigrammatic, trimness—a Dutch minuteness and elaboration of finish—a hardness and air of constraint—very unlike, as it seems to us, to the full, natural flow, and magnificent sweep of that river-like eloquence of which it professes to be the transcript. With perfect correctness of phraseology, and the most logical and luminous method, Coleridge's discourse united an excursive, and a parenthetical luxuriance, if we may so speak, that were altogether wonderful. It was equally remarkable for its diffusion and for its continuousness. As he here says of Shakspeare, one sentence begot the next naturally; the meaning was all interwoven (II, 145); like that poet in his blank dramatic verse, he was “diffused, with a linked sweetness long drawn out” (I, 127). These short, abrupt fragments convey little or nothing of all this. They are but the bare, sapless stick, which is the wintry representative of the leaf-clad and cluster-laden vine of midsummer. But let us give the picture which the Editor himself has drawn, and which we can testify, as all indeed will do who knew the man, is in no lineament overcharged:—

“To leave the every-day circle of society, in which the literary and scientific rarely—the rest never—break through the spell of personality;—where Anecdote reigns everlastingly paramount and exclusive, and the mildest attempt to generalize the Babel of facts, and to control temporary and individual phenomena by the application of eternal and overruling principles, is unintelligible to many, and disagreeable to more;—to leave this species of converse, if converse it deserves to be called, and pass an entire day with Coleridge, was a marvellous change indeed. It was a Sabbath past expression deep, and tranquil, and serene. You came to a man who had travelled in many countries and in critical times; who had seen and felt the world in most of its ranks, and in many of its vicissitudes and weaknesses; one to whom all literature and genial art were absolutely subject, and to whom, with a reasonable allowance as to technical details, all science was in a most extraordinary degree familiar. Throughout a long-drawn summer's day would this man talk to you in low, equable, but clear and musical tones, concerning things human and divine; marshalling all history, harmonizing all experiment, probing the depths of your consciousness, and revealing visions of glory and of terror to the imagination; but pouring withal such floods of light upon the mind, that you might, for a season, like Paul, become blind in the very act of conversion. And this he would do, without so much as one allusion to himself, without a word of reflection on others, save when any given act fell naturally in the way of his discourse,—without one anecdote that was not proof and illustration of a previous position;—gratifying no passion, indulging no caprice, but, with a calm mastery over your soul, leading you onward and onward for ever through a thousand windings, yet with no pause, to some magnificent point in which, as in a focus, all the party-coloured rays of his discourse should converge in light. In all this he was, in truth, your teacher and guide; but in a little while you might forget that he was other than a fellow-student and the companion of your way,—so playful was his manner, so simple his language, so affectionate the glance of his pleasant eye!”

The following is another description, which occurs in one of the notes, the scene, the Exhibition of Ancient Masters (July 1831) at the British Gallery in Pall Mall:—

“Mr Coleridge was in high spirits, and seemed to kindle in his mind at the contemplation of the splendid pictures before him. He did not examine them all by the catalogue, but anchored himself before some three or four great works, telling me that he saw the rest of the gallery potentially. I can yet distinctly recall him, half leaning on his old simple stick, and his hat off in one hand, whilst with the fingers of the other he went on, as was his constant wont, figuring in the air a commentary of small diagrams, wherewith, as he fancied, he could translate to the eye those relations of form and space which his words might fail to convey with clearness to the ear. His admiration for Rubens showed itself in a sort of joy and brotherly fondness; he looked as if he would shake hands with his pictures. What the company, which by degrees formed itself round this silver-haired, bright-eyed, music-breathing, old man, took him for, I cannot guess; there was probably not one there who knew him to be that Ancient Mariner, who held people with his glittering eye, and constrained them, like three years' children, to hear his tale. In the midst of his speech, he turned to the right hand, where stood a very lovely young woman, whose attention he had involuntarily arrested; to her, without apparently any consciousness of her being a stranger to him, he addressed many remarks, although I must acknowledge they were couched in a somewhat softer tone, as if he were soliciting her sympathy. He was, verily, a gentle-hearted man at all times; but I never was in company with him in my life, when the entry of a woman, it mattered not who, did not provoke a dim gush of emotion, which passed like an infant's breath over the mirror of his intellect.”

The report of the discourse of two hours delivered on this occasion fills about five widely printed pages—as much as would be spoken in little more than five minutes. Yet this is one of the fullest reports in the work.

In another place the Editor says of an evening they spent together:—

“When I look upon the scanty memorial, which I have alone preserved of this afternoon's converse, I am tempted to burn these pages in despair. Mr Coleridge talked a volume of criticism that day, which, printed verbatim as he spoke it, would have made the reputation of any other person but himself. He was, indeed, particularly brilliant and enchanting, and I left him at night so thoroughly magnetized, that I could not for two or three days afterwards reflect enough to put anything on paper.”

Nevertheless we are glad that the Editor has not burned his papers, but has given his notes to the world, such as they are—even although, as we have said, we must think them a very inadequate representation of Coleridge's living discourse;—and although, also, there are some things in the book which we certainly wish had not been published. The passages of the latter description, we beg to say, are not any of those in which the speaker is made to expound his views in politics, religion, or as to any other matter, in the form of reasoning, however much they may differ from our own; it would be absurd to expect or to wish that such expositions should have been withheld, nor can we have any other feeling with regard to them than that what of truth they may contain may make, as eventually it no doubt will, its due impression. But there are various mere expressions of opinion in these volumes, unsupported by reasoning of any kind,—which look, therefore, only like effusions of spleen or passion, and are as little calculated, we are sure, to do honour to the memory of the eminent person to whom they are attributed, as they are to convey instruction to anyone who may read them. We must say that we consider the publication of matter of this kind as decidedly unwarrantable, were it only for its unfairness to Coleridge. It is matter which he himself certainly never would have published; for, whatever may be thought of the truth or falsehood of some of his opinions, all who know his printed works will admit, that he is remarkable above most writers for his avoidance on all occasions of mere authoritative statement, and the anxious pains he takes to explain his reasons for whatever he advances. He would have felt that he was insulting the public, if he had ever offered to it his bare ipse dixit on any important point, in lieu of a full and fair examination of it. But some of the dicta here recorded are not only unsupported by any grounds for our acceptance of them; they are, from their nakedness, absolutely unintelligible. As an instance, we may refer to what is said in several places about the doctrines of Mr Malthus, and especially to the violent denunciation of what is called “the monstrous practical sophism” of that writer, at page 88 of volume second. We protest we do not know what it is that is here alluded to; and since the Editor has thought proper to retain the passage, we should have been glad had he at least informed us in a note what the said sophism is. We well remember a conversation which we once had with Coleridge on the subject of Mr Malthus's Essay. On that occasion he denounced, with great indignation, the position which Mr Malthus originally took up;—but he admitted, or rather it was the main object of what he said to show, that in the later editions of his Essay, the author had entirely receded from this ground, and thereby, as Coleridge contended, both abandoned all that was really new in his theory, and wholly destroyed its efficacy, as a demonstration of that which it was at first brought forward to establish. In the form to which it was eventually reduced, he seemed to consider Mr Malthus's doctrine as little more than a harmless truism.

But notwithstanding these abatements, we have no hesitation in saying that the collection before us, taken altogether, is one of the very highest interest. It may be considered as properly belonging to the numerous class of publications called the ‘Ana,’ professing to detail the sayings and opinions of eminent men; but it is by far the most valuable book of that sort that has ever been given to the world. The chief part of its value, however, will only be understood by those who have studied Mr Coleridge's writings. To the multitude of readers much of it, we fear, will be but a stumbling block and foolishness. But to those who have made themselves acquainted with the general spirit and outlines of his philosophy, as already partially delivered in his writings and conversation, the further explanations and illustrations of many points which are here given, are invaluable. To ‘The Friend,’ (of which, by the by, we rejoice to understand that a new and corrected edition is about to appear), ‘The Biographia Literaria,’ ‘The Lay Sermons,’ ‘The Aids to Reflection,’ and the ‘Church and State,’ these volumes will henceforth be indispensable companions.

In the small space that now remains to us, however, we can only add one or two extracts from the lighter portions of the miscellany.

FIELDING.

What a master of composition Fielding was! Upon my word, I think the ‘Edipus Tyrannus,’ the ‘Alchemist,’ and ‘Tom Jones’ the three most perfect plots ever planned. And how charming, how wholesome, Fielding always is! To take him up after Richardson, is like emerging from a sick room heated by stoves, into an open lawn, on a breezy day in May.

CHARACTER OF POLONIUS.—PRINCIPLES AND MAXIMS.

A Maxim is a conclusion upon observation of matters of fact, and is merely retrospective: an Idea, or if you like, a Principle, carries knowledge within itself, and is prospective. Polonius is a man of maxims. Whilst he is descanting on matters of past experience, as in that excellent speech to Laertes before he sets out on his travels, he is admirable; but when he comes to advise or project, he is a mere dotard. You see, Hamlet, as the man of ideas, despises him. A man of maxims only is like a Cyclops with one eye, and that eye placed in the back of his head.

GENIUS AND TALENT.

Genius must have talent as its complement and implement, just as in like manner imagination must have fancy. In short, the higher intellectual powers can only act through a corresponding energy of the lower.

THE WAITER.

Going into the City the other day upon business, we took a chop at a tavern, and renewed our acquaintance, after years of interruption, with that swift and untiring personage, yecept a waiter. We mention this long interval of acquaintance, in order to account for any deficiencies that may be found in our description of him. Our Readers perhaps will favour us with a better. He is a character before the public: thousands are acquainted with him, and can fill up the outline. But we felt irresistibly impelled to sketch him; like a portrait-painter who comes suddenly upon an old friend, or upon an old servant of the family.

We speak of the waiter properly and generally so called,—the representative of the whole, real, official race,—and not of the humourist or other eccentric genius occasionally to be found in it,—moving out of the orbit of tranquil but fiery waiting,—not absorbed,—not devout towards us,—not silent or monosyllabical;—fellows that affect a character beyond that of waiter, and get spoiled in club-rooms, and places of theatrical resort.

Your thorough waiter has no ideas out of the sphere of his duty and the business; and yet he is not narrow-minded either. He sees too much variety of character for that, and has to exercise too much consideration for the “drunken gentleman.” But his world is the tavern, and all mankind but its visitors. His female sex are the maid-servants and his young mistress, or the widow. If he is ambitious, he aspires to marry one of the latter: if otherwise, and Molly is prudent, he does not know but he may carry her off some day to be mistress of the Golden Lion at Chinksford, where he will “show off” in the eyes of Betty Laxon who refused him. He has no feeling of noise itself but as the sound of dining, or of silence but as a thing before dinner. Even a loaf with him is hardly a loaf; it is so many “breads.” His longest speech is the making out of a bill visâ voce—“Two beefs—one potatoes—three ales—two wines—six and twopence”—which he does with an indifferent celerity, amusing to new-comers who have been relishing their fare, and not considering it as a mere set of items. He attributes all virtues to everybody, provided they are civil and liberal; and of the existence of some vices he has no notion. Gluttony, for instance, with him, is not only inconceivable, but looks very like a virtue. He sees in it only so many more “beefs,” and a generous scorn of the bill. As to wine, or almost any other liquor, it is out of your power to astonish him with the quantity you call for. His “Yes Sir” is as swift, indifferent, and official, at the fifth bottle as at the first. Reform and other public events he looks upon purely as things in the newspaper, and the newspaper as a thing taken in at taverns, for gentlemen to read. His own reading is confined to “Accidents and Offences,” and the advertisements for Butlers, which latter he peruses with an admiring fear, not chusing to give up “a certainty.” When young, he was always in a hurry, and exasperated his mistress by running against the other waiters, and breaking the “neguses.” As he gets older, he learns to unite swiftness with caution; declines wasting his breath in immediate answers to calls; and knows, with a slight turn of his face, and elevation of his voice, into what precise corner of the room to pitch his “Coming, Sir.” If you told him that, in Shakespeare’s time, waiters said “Anon, anon, Sir,” he would be astonished at the repetition of the same word in one answer, and at the use of three words instead of two; and he would justly infer, that London could not have been so large, nor the chop-houses so busy, in those days. He would drop one of the two syllables of his “Yes, Sir,” if he could; but business and civility will not allow it; and therefore he does what he can by running them together in the swift sufficiency of his “Yezsir.”

Thomas!
Yezsir.
Is my steak coming?
Yezsir.
And the pint of port?
Yezsir.
You’ll not forget the postman?
Yezsir.

For in the habit of his acquiescence Thomas not seldom says “Yes, Sir,” for “No, Sir,” the habit itself rendering him intelligible.

His morning dress is a waistcoat or jacket; his coat is for afternoons. If the establishment is flourishing, he likes to get into black as he grows elderly; by which time also he is generally a little corpulent, and wears hair-powder, dressing somewhat laxly about the waist, for convenience of movement. Not however that he draws much upon that part of his body, except as a poise to what he carries; for you may observe that a waiter, in walking, uses only his lowest limbs, from his knees downwards. The movement of all the rest of him is negative, and modified solely by what he bears in his hands. At this period he has a little money in the funds, and his nieces look up to him. He still carries however a napkin under his arm, as well as a corkscrew in his pocket; nor, for all his long habit, can he help feeling a satisfaction at the noise he makes in drawing a cork. He thinks that no man can do it better; and that Mr Smith, who understands wine, is thinking so too, though he does not take his eyes off the plate. In his right waistcoat pocket is a snuff-box, with which he supplies gentlemen late at night, after the shops are shut up, and when they are in desperate want of another fillip to their sensations, after the devil and toasted cheese. If particularly required, he will laugh at a joke, especially at that time of night, justly thinking that gentlemen towards one in the morning “will be facetious.” He is of opinion it is in “human nature” to be a little fresh at that period, and to want to be put into a coach.

He announces his acquisition of property by a bunch of seals to his watch, and perhaps rings on his fingers; one of them a mourning ring left him by his late master, the other a present, either from his nieces’ father, or from some ultra-goodnatured old gentleman whom he helped into a coach one night, and who had no silver about him.

To see him dine, somehow, hardly seems natural. And he appears to do it as if he had no right. You catch him at his dinner in a corner,—huddled apart,—“Thomas dining!” instead of helping dinner. One fancies that the stewed and hot meats and the constant smoke, ought to be too much for him, and that he should have neither appetite nor time for such a meal.

Once a year (for he has few holidays) a couple of pedestrians meet him on a Sunday in the fields, and cannot conceive for the life of them who it is; till the startling recollection occurs—“Good God! It’s the waiter at the Grogam!”

THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY EGBERTON WEBBE.

No. IV.

HAVING got rid of America as well as I could, and having endeavoured to show that the principle of advancement in all things,—and therefore in language—is a universal principle, urging men not less in isolated societies than in congregated nations, I consider I have done my best to make good my first proposition, viz. “That we are sent into the world with the seeds of this faculty within us, and that it is as much a part of our instinct to use the tongue and the voice in those articulations and inflexions that have their accomplishment in speech, as it is to apply the hands, the arms, the legs, &c. to the several uses for which they are designed by Providence.”

I therefore turn now to the second proposition; which was, “That there is a propensity to accompany every new discovery, meaning the first sight of every new object, with some exclamation.”

To argue from the child to the man is, upon the whole, a just and sound method. The primitive affections are few, and early developed, and how wide soever in appearance the difference may be which exists between the mind at two years of age and the mind at forty, such difference lies in the accession of no new principles, but only in the infinite diversification of that small original stock. There is no after-passion, to be cut like the teeth,—whatever some people may think of the passion of love; which expresses the same thing, whether it be spoken of an infant or a man, the medium of the passion only being different, as the age is different. It was therefore said as philosophically as beautifully, that “the child is father to the man,” for all that comes after childhood is the offspring and consequence of childhood; and if we would educe the principles of human nature, we cannot study to greater advantage than from the mind of a child, for then we go to the fountain head for information.

To the nursery then.—I have taken it as a safe principle, that utterance of some kind is a part of instinct with us, as much as chirping is with birds, or humming with bees. It is a sort of indication of power which flatters the sense, and is indulged in from that cause, quite independently of a proposed object. Therefore, at first, I see no difference between these two cases. But, as the reasoning faculty begins to stir in the child’s mind, the objects he handles and the sounds he utters come insensibly to be associated, and the seeds of language are thus sown; whilst in the case of an animal not endowed with reason, there are no ideas growing up, with which such a union can be effected. One can hardly go wrong in an argument which proceeds on one of these principles—the instinct of self-preservation—the love of power. When we are threatened with danger, we instinctively apply that power for defense in which we happen to be strongest; and in offence, the same disposition actuates us. Now, a child comes into the world crying; even in that hour, therefore, it has a sense of uneasiness, of fear, of something which it resents, or would control; and its instinct moves it to use its voice for this purpose, because there is no other organ over which it has so much command. If it could kick more violently than it can cry, it would kick; if its hands had more strength than its lungs, it would thump; but it so happens that nothing about it possesses the same efficacy as its voice; and thus the little reluctant stranger is ushered in protesting against the cruel life in that sweet plaint, which everybody who has heard it must allow to be the most delightful music in the world; and which tempts me here to transcribe a little epigram—than which anything more perfect—whether you regard the beauty of the thought, the happiness of the expression, the sweet gravity of the moral, or the infinite classic grace of those two lovely pictures, thus brought before your eyes in as many distichs—does not, I think, exist. In all the Greek anthology there is nothing half so delicious, nothing half so exquisite, as this.

"On parent knees, a naked new-born child,
Weeping thou sat'st, while all around thee smiled.
So live, that sinking in thy last long sleep,
Calm thou may'st smile while all around thee weep."

The voice then is the prime, original seat of power with man. Hence it is exercised earliest, perfected earliest, and earliest associated with all the objects of desire and aversion. And I humbly declare my conviction, that this only circumstance, and no other cause—latent or apparent, has to answer for the origin of language. For if we, abstracting ourselves as much as possible from the prejudice of common associations, consider the structure of language, its wonderful artificial machinery, its arbitrary and capricious laws, its perplexed maze of relations and dependences, purely ideal, its utter inconsequence from any type in Nature or reason, and, lastly, its constitutional defects,—we cannot but perceive, that it is from no surpassing fitness for its discharge that the office of communication devolved upon the tongue. Had Nature so willed it, I am persuaded that a sort of visible speech, perhaps far more serviceable, more perfect than what we use, might have been furnished in a similar course of ingenious improvements on the original hint,—by the hands—the arms—the feet—the face—the head—almost any efficient organ of the body.† Nor will anyone question this, who considers the infinite capabilities of pantomime, and does not forget the extraordinary, and to us, almost incredible accounts, which have come down to us in the old writings relating to this subject; remembering too, that whatever has been achieved at any time in this way, has not had the strong moving principle of necessity working in its favour, but has been simply the fruit of ingenuity exercising itself in the service of pleasure. Besides this, there can be no doubt that the sense of sight is far more perfect than the sense of hearing, and whatever may be said of the power of the voice, with all its inflexions and modulations so expressive of the different qualifications of our meaning, there is the best reason for thinking that the visible offers a still wider and more various field of expression. Cicero acknowledges this, where, having mentioned the other senses and their different objects, he says, "Illa vero oculorum multo acriora," (but those which affect the sight are by far the most striking) and presently he enlarges on this idea, saying, with reference to the association of our ideas, "Facilius enim ad ea, quæ visa, quam ad illa quæ audita sunt, mentis oculi ferantur,"* (for the mind's eye is more readily drawn to a perception of ideas connected with things visible, than with things audible), which was perhaps the hint that suggested those lines in the Ars Poetica to Horace:—

"Segnius irritant animos demissa per aurem, Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus."

The mind, by sounds not easily impressed,
Then seems to wake to recognition best,
When through the medium of the faithful eye addressed.

But because the voice is the seat of power in the child, so in the man it continues to be the predominant agent. Provided with this faculty, and led, in my opinion, by a natural instinct of the ear, which is independent of example, a child learns to create to himself a certain number of tones and inflexions proper for the expression of particular feelings, which tones and inflexions he, as it were, bids us accept as the conventional signs of those feelings. Thus, long before the use of definite words, he has framed a language of his own, sufficiently explicit for his occasions, and offers us, as I conceive, in this untutored exercise of his perceptions, a small but faithful representation of the rise of language among savage tribes. Nor can anything seem more natural than the subsequent passage from vocal inflexions to articulate words, for as those were a general and easy division of the voice into a few parts, when meanings were general and few, so these are only a subdivision or nicer partitioning of it—a multiplying of distinctions—to accommodate a more numerous retinue.

The voice serves the child in sorrow, in joy, in fear, in want—in every case; and the reason why young people are found to have a greater variety of modulations in their voices than grown up people, is that having in the first years of life necessarily depended altogether on the variations of the voice for the expression of their feelings, they retain, through the force of early habit, a great portion of those variations (which we mean when we speak of a "childish tone") after definite speech has rendered them no longer a necessary part of utterance.

But as curiosity is the ruling passion in infancy—for then everything is wonderful—so no new object can come before the eyes of a little child without exciting an emotion in him, which may be of fear or delight, desire or astonishment. Whatever it is, it is met with some exclamation. This is so much a habit at that wondering and delighted age, that you may sometimes see a multitude of toys given to a baby, one after another, every one of them eliciting from it some new syllable of surprise and satisfaction. It is usual, however, in giving anything new, to pronounce the name

* De Orat. lib. 40—41. The English are, generally speaking, so phlegmatic a people, that they neither employ much gesticulation themselves, nor can conceive what legitimate claim mere "dumb show" can have to any place whatever in a system of oratory. So that, when they find this same dumb show occupying a principal share of the attention of all the ancient writers on that subject, they merely stare and go on; as for Demosthenes, the greatest orator that ever lived, he seems to them no better than a madman, with his action and his aphorism. They also look at a Frenchman, and are indignant to see him saying a thousand things with his shoulders, while they "pant after him in vain" in heavy-tongued despair. They ought to consider, however, that they themselves are out of order, and not their neighbours, who have to plead, not only Nature and their spirits, but the example of all former times. Indeed a very little reflection will convince us that, the more nearly any language stood in relation to a first state, the more would it be found associated with gesticulation; since gesticulation must, undoubtedly, in the beginning, have been a principal partner with speech in carrying on the business of communication. But however perfect any modern language may seem to be (and surely none is so perfect as the Greek) it cannot be a wise economy to reject gesture altogether. If no longer a necessary help, it is still a facility, and a grace. What our forefathers found a saving we may reckon as gain.

of it at the same time, and I have known a little girl at an early age, taught a vocabulary of natural history in this way with such success, that in—I should think—upwards of a hundred prints of different animals, many of them very slightly distinguishable, there was not one which she did not immediately name whenever it was afterwards presented to her; so vivid are, generally, the associations of children. But that it is Nature more than Art which is moving within them when they manifest this readiness to name the objects they behold, I am convinced. It may sometimes be noted of very young children, that having uttered some little fanciful word of their own when they have seen any person or thing they were struck with, they have, by association, repeated that very word on the next occasion of seeing such person or thing; so as in fact that they have at last continued wilfully to use a word of no received meaning in connection with some object. In such cases we say they "talk nonsense;" but I would willingly be informed, what higher and more authoritative title we stand upon in respect of our language—we who talk sense? We may say—the word "means nothing;" it is very clear to me, however, that it means the thing it is used for. The word that we should employ—the proper word—may have a "far-fetched pedigree" to point to, perhaps,— but let us go back to the first generation, and then what becomes of our pride of meaning and prescriptive sense? In the case above alluded to, there is a palpable invention of language; quite palpable enough to illustrate to us the nature of the process as it must originally have existed among men.

* 3rd. That this exclamation is not imitative, except in a rare and very limited sense."

Some reasoning on this head has already been given in the second number of these papers.

There may be two kinds of imitation in language; an imitation, or mocking, of the sound peculiar to the act or object, as in the word buzz; and an imitation, or adoption, of the characteristics of other words. The number of the former is insignificantly small; of the latter prodigiously extensive,—for there is hardly a word in any language which, in its first introduction, does not undergo a certain dressing, after the fashion of the class it belongs to; and probably of these two divisions of words—speaking with regard to derived languages—the only exceptions to be found to the latter will be in the former; since the example of the old words, their terminations, accentuation, characteristic vowel sounds, &c. will only have been disregarded in the formation of the new, where it has been for the sake of imitating a sound in nature.† But, with respect to the first spoken words in any original language, neither kind of imitation, I think, can have had a hand in their formation; the latter kind, plainly, not at all, there being no exemplar to copy from; the former kind hardly, for the reasons before stated;—if at all, in a very limited degree indeed, not extending beyond the few objects which were noticed. For I cannot bring myself to think that this species of intelligence which we call imitation—understanding by that word mimicry—forms any natural ingredient in the mind of a savage. He whose utmost endeavour is to live, will eagerly enough seize upon those means and manners which he perceives to conduce to the purposes of life, and, inso-

* Cowley—Poetical Revenge.

† The Reader will understand this first kind of imitation to refer to analogy, that great artifice, whose office is to modify and assimilate words, and to reduce the parts of a language under one common predicament. Thus some languages, like the Latin, are entirely Barytone:—of this the Peruvian language is, I believe, a modern example. Some are called, emphatically, "analogous," (such as, like our own, follow what is considered to be the natural order of the ideas) to distinguish them from the "transpositive," (those wherein that order admits of inversion). Yet even these, the "transpositive" are, in the ordinary sense, analogous; their very transpositions are regulated by analogy. In our language there is a tendency to cut short the ends of words; accordingly, analogy, like a master of the ceremonies, keeps the door, and before any strange word can gain admission, it must forthwith consent to part with its tail. Away go the um's and the oi's, and every superfluous appendage, and in steps the astonished foreigner, neat as a native.

* From the Persian, by Sir Wm. Jones.

much, he will be an imitator; but here this disposition in him will terminate. Mimicry is a wanton imitation of small peculiarities, and finds no place in a mind bent on grave cares. It is a holiday thing, companion of ease and curious pleasure. It is the suggestion of a spirit in a state of enjoyment—the frothy top of a full cup,—not the partner of want.

A savage never laughs. Mimicry, however, always includes the ridiculous; if it does not express it, it implies a wilful and gratuitous observation of strange points—a quaint, self-humouring, unserious regard to the singular and the odd; and it effects its object by an abstraction of these features from the whole, and a preposterous raising of them into individual existence; than which nothing can be more contrary to the natural course of observation. It is so opposed in its nature to earnestness, that even in a case where it could serve purposes, one can hardly conceive a solemn being like a savage adopting it. It would not occur to his mind. Self-contemplation bounds his thoughts—contemplation of himself, or contemplation of nature as to himself,—but he has no supposition—no abstraction. Before the mind, however, can be in a condition to entertain ideas of mimicry, it must transfer itself beyond this self-centering circle, and be for a time wholly occupied and identified with another object. These three things—mimicry, satire, criticism—though by no means amongst the highest, are amongst the latest efforts of the mind. They are all excremental—all artificial and excessive—all of them bespeak a certain superfluity of observation.

For these reasons, in addition to what was urged before, I am inclined to regard as fallacious that favourite theory which ascribes to language an imitative origin.

[P. S. The extremely polite and obliging communication with which I have been favoured, through the hands of the Editor, from a Correspondent, W. F. Godolphin Waldron, has remained long unacknowledged, but not too long, I hope, for me to express my obligation to him for his kindness. The passages quoted were quite to the purpose, and the book from which they were taken shall, if possible, be seen.

I take the same opportunity of acknowledging, with many thanks, the interesting and copious communication on this subject from Liverpool.]

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXIII.—SANDY WOOD; OR INVETERACY IN A GOOD HEART.

[We gave last week a 'Gentleman's Revenge,' in a story from Mr Miller's 'Legends of Scotland and Traditions of Cromarty.' We here give the stubborn yet affecting resentment of a less cultivated goodness, ignorant what to do with its feelings, and, therefore, doubly bent upon being obstinate. The Englishman's zeal in behalf of fair play at the conclusion, is very amusing.]

THE old enclosure of the burying ground (says Mr Miller), which seems originally to have been an earthen wall, has now sunk into a grassy mound; and on the southern and western sides, some of the largest trees of the fence, a fine stately ash, fluted like a Grecian column, a huge elm roughened over with immense wens, and a low bushy larch with a bent, twisted trunk, and weeping branches, spring directly out of it. At one place we see a flat tomb-stone lying a few yards outside the mound. The trees which shoot up on every side, fling so deep a gloom over it during the summer and autumn months, that we can scarcely decipher the epitaph; and in winter, it is not unfrequently buried under a heap of withered leaves. By dint of some little pains, however, we come to learn, from the darkened and half-dilapidated description, that the tenant below was one Alexander Wood, a native of Cromarty, who died in the year 1690; and that he was interred at this place by his own especial desire. His wife and some of his children have taken up their places beside him,—thus lying apart like a family of hermits; while his story which, almost too wild for tradition itself, is yet as authentic as most pieces of written history, affords a curious explanation of the circumstance which directed their choice.

Wood was a man of strong passions, sparingly gifted with common-sense, and exceedingly superstitious. No one could be kinder to one's friends or relatives, or more hospitable to a stranger; but when once offended, he was implacable. He had but little in his power either as a friend or an enemy,—his course through the world lying barely beyond the bleak edge of poverty. If a neighbour dropped in by accident at meal time, he would not be suffered to quit his house until he had shared with him his simple fare. There was benevolence in the very grasp of his hand, and the twinkle of his eye, and in the little set speech, still preserved by tradition, in which he used to address his wife every time an old or mutilated beggar came to his door:—"Alms, gud-wife," he would say, "alms to the cripple, and the blind; and the broken down." When injured or insulted, however, and certainly no one could do either without being very much in the wrong, there was a toad-like malignity in his nature, which would come leaping out like the reptile from its hole, and no power on earth could shut it up again. He would sit hatching his venom for days and weeks together with a slow, tedious, unoperative kind of perseverance, that achieved nothing. He was full of anecdote, and, in all his stories, human nature was exhibited in only its brightest lights, and its deepest shadows, without the slightest mixture of that medium tint which gives colour to its working every-day suit. Whatever was bad in the better class, he transferred to the worse, and vice versa; and thus not even his narratives of the supernatural were less true to nature and fact than his narratives of mere men and women. And he dealt with the two classes of stories after one fashion,—lending the same firm belief to both alike.

In the house adjoining the one in which he resided, there lived a stout little man, a shoemaker, famous in the village for his great wit, and his very considerable knavery. His jokes were mostly practical, and some of them were exceedingly akin to felonies. Poor Wood could not understand his wit, but, in his simplicity of heart he deemed him honest, and would fain have prevailed with the neighbours to think so too. He knew it, he said, by his very look. Their gardens, like their houses, lay contiguous, and were separated from each other, not by a fence, but by four undressed stones, laid in a line. Year after year was the garden of Wood becoming less productive, and he had a strange misgiving, but the thing was too absurd to be spoken of, that it was growing smaller every season by the breadth of a whole row of cabbages. On the one side, however, were the back walls of his own and his neighbour's tenements, the four large stones stretched along the other; and nothing, surely, could be less likely than that either the stones or the houses should take it into their heads to rob him of his property. But the more he strove to exclude the idea, the more it pressed upon him. He measured, and remeasured, to convince himself that it was a false one, and found that he had fallen on just the means of establishing its truth; the garden was actually growing smaller. But how? Just because it was bewitched! It was shrinking into itself under the force of some potent enchantment, like a piece of plaiding in the fulling mill. No hypothesis could be more congenial; and he would have held by it, perhaps, until his dying day, had it not been struck down by one of those chance discoveries which destroy so many beautiful systems, and spoil so much ingenious philosophy, quite in the way that Newton's apple struck down the vortices of Descartes.

He was lying abed one morning in spring, about day-break, when his attention was excited by a strange noise that seemed to proceed from the garden. Had he heard it two hours earlier, he would have wrapped his head up in the bed-clothes and lain still; but now that the cock had crowed, it could not, he concluded, be other than natural. Hastily throwing on part of his clothes, he stole warily to a back window, and saw between him and the faint light that was beginning to peep out in the east, the figure of a man armed with a lever, tugging at the stones. Two had already been shifted a full yard nearer to the houses, and the figure was straining over a third. Wood crept stealthily out at the window, crawled on all-fours to the intruder, and, tripping up his heels, laid him across his lever. It was his knavish neighbour the shoemaker. A scene of noisy contention ensued; groups of half-dressed townsfolk, looming horrible in their shirts and night-caps through the grey of morning, came issuing through the lanes and the closes; and the combatants were dragged asunder. And well was it for the shoemaker that it happened so; for Wood, though in his sixtieth year, was strong enough, and more than angry enough, to have torn him to pieces. Now, however, that the warfare had to be carried on by words, the case was quite reversed.

"Neebors," said the shoemaker, who had the double advantage of being exceedingly plausible, and decidedly in the wrong; "I'm desperately ill used this morning, desperately ill used. He would baith rob and murder me. I lang jaloused, ye out, that my wee bit o' a yard was growing littler and littler ilka season; and though no verra ready to suspect folks, I just thought I would keep watch, and see wha was shifting the mark stanes. Weel, and I did; late and early did I watch for mair now than a fortnight, and wha did I see this morning through the back winnock but auld Sandy Wood there in his verra sark. O, it's no him that has any thought o' his end! poking the stanes wi' a lang kebar, until the verra heart o' my grun'. See," said he, pointing to the one that had not yet been moved, "see if he hasna shifted it a lang ell; and only notice the craft o' the body in turring up the yard about the lave, as if they had been a' moved frae my side. Weel, I came out and challenged him, as wha widna? Says I, Sawney, my man, that's no honest; I'll no bear that; and nae mair had I time to say, when up he flew at me like a wull cat, and if it wasna for your-sels, I dare say he would hae throttled me. Look how I'm bleedin; and only till him,—look till the cankart deceitful bodie, if he has one word to put in for himself."

There was truth in, at least, the last assertion; for poor Wood, mute with rage and astonishment, stood listening, in utter helplessness, to the astounding charge of the shoemaker,—almost the very charge he himself had to prefer. Twice did he spring forward to grapple with him, but the neighbours held him back, and every time he essayed to speak, his words, massed and tangled together, like wreaths of seaweed in a hurricane, actually stuck in his throat. He continued to rage for three days after, and when the eruption had at length subsided, all his former resentments were found to be swallowed up, like the lesser craters of a volcano, in the gulf of one immense hatred.

His house, as has been said, lay contiguous to the house of the shoemaker, and he could not avoid seeing him every time he went out and came in, a circumstance which he at first deemed rather gratifying than otherwise. It prevented his hatred from becoming rapid by setting it a working at least ten times a day, as a musket would a barrel of ale, if discharged into the bung-hole. Its frequency, however, at length sickened him, and he had employed a mason to build a stone wall, which, by stretching from side to side of the close, was to shut up the view, when he sickened in right earnest, and at the end of a few days found himself a dying. Still, however, he was possessed by his one engrossing resentment. It mingled with all his thoughts of the past and of the future; and not only was he to carry it with him to the world to which he was going, but also to leave it behind him as a legacy to his children. Among his many other beliefs, there was a superstition, handed down from the times of the monks, that at the day of final doom, all the people of the sheriffdom were to be judged on the moor of Navity; and both the judgment, and the scene of it, he had indissolubly associated with the shoemaker and the four stones. Experience had taught him the importance of securing a first hearing for his story; for, was his neighbour, he concluded, to be beforehand with him, he would have as slight a chance of being righted at Navity as in his own garden. After brooding over the matter for a whole day, he called his friends and children round his bed, and raised himself on his elbow to address them.

"I'm wearing awa', bairns and neebours," he said, "and it vexes me sair that that wretched bodie should see me going afore him. Mind, Jock, that ye'll build the dike, and make it heigh, heigh, and stobbie on the top; and O keep him out o' my lykewake, for should he but step in at the door, I'll rise, Jock, frae the verra straining board, and do murder. Dinna let him so muckle as look on my coffin. I've been pondering a' this day about the fearfu' meeting at Navity, and the march-stanes, and I'll tell you, Jock, how we'll match him. Bury me ayont the saint's dike, on the Navity side, and dinna lay me deep. Ye ken the bonny green hillock, speckled o'er wi' gowans and puddock flowers; bury me there, Jock, and yoursell, and the auld wife, may just, when your hour comes, tak up your places beside me. We'll a' get up the first tout—the ane helping the other, and I've wad a' I'm worth i' the world, we'll be half way up at Navity afore the schochlan, short-legged bodie wins o'er the dike." Such was the dying injunction of Sandy Wood, and his tombstone yet remains to testify that it was religiously attended to. An Englishman who came to reside in the parish, nearly an age after, and to whom the story had been imparted in rather an imperfect manner, was shocked by what he deemed his unfair policy. The litigants, he said, should start together; he was certain it would be so in England, where a fair field was all that would be given to St Dunstan himself, though he fought with the devil. And that it might be so here, he buried the tombstone of Wood in an immense heap of clay and gravel. It would keep him down, he said, until the little fellow would have clambered over the wall. The townsfolk, however, who were better acquainted with the merits of the case, shovelled the heap aside; and it now forms two little hillocks, which overtop the stone, and which, from the nature of the soil, are still more scantily covered with verdure than any part of the surrounding bank.

CHARACTERISTIC SPECIMENS OF THE ENGLISH POETS.

[The object of these Specimens is to give as thorough an insight into the qualities of our best poets, of whatever degree, as it is in the Editor's power to convey through the medium of brief criticisms, and within the limits of the JOURNAL. It is a work of love with him; and he hopes he may be enough animated by it to put readers of taste, hitherto less acquainted with them, in something like real possession of a knowledge of their merits. At all events, this department of the JOURNAL will contain a succession of extracts from as fine poetry as the world ever saw. Nor will defects be left without the requisite notice; it being the Editor's wish, that after becoming intimate with any one of these Specimens, when complete in all its parts, the readers he alludes to may be enabled, by their own lights, in addition to those furnished them, to speak of the poet for themselves.]

NO. I.—CHAUCER.

GEOFFREY CHAUCER was born in London, in the year 1328, apparently of a gentleman's family, and was bred in the court of Edward the Third. He married a sister of Catherine Swynford, mistress, and afterwards wife, to the King's son, John of Gaunt; and was employed in court offices, and in a mission to Italy, where he is supposed to have had an interview with Petrarch. In the subsequent reign he fell into trouble, owing to his connexion with John of Gaunt's party and the religious reformers of those days; upon which he fled to the continent, but returned; and after an imprisonment of three years, was set at liberty, on condition of giving up the designs of his associates;—a blot on the memory of this great poet, and, apparently, otherwise amiable and excellent man, which he has excused as well as he could, by alleging that they treated him ill, and would have plundered and starved him. He died in the year 1400, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, close to which he had had a house, on the site where Henry the Seventh's chapel now stands: so that the Reader, in going along the pavement there, is walking where Chaucer once lived.

His person, in advanced life, tended to corpulency; and he had a habit of looking down. In conversation he was modest, and of few words. He was so fond of reading, that he says he took heed of nothing in comparison, and would sit at his books till he dimmed his eyes with it. The only thing that took him from them was a walk in the fields.

Chaucer (with Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton) is one of the Four Great English Poets; and it is with double justice that he is called the Father of English Poetry, for, as Dante did with Italian, he helped to form its very language. Nay, it burst into luxuriance in his hands, like a sudden month of May. Instead of giving you the idea of an "old" poet, in the sense which the word vulgarly acquires, there is no one, upon acquaintance, who seems so young, consistently with maturity of mind. His poetry rises in the land like a clear morning, in which you see everything with a rare and crystal distinctness, from the mountain to the minutest flower,—towns, solitudes, human beings,—open doors, shewing you the interior of cottages and of palaces,—fancies in the clouds, fairy-rings in the grass; and in the midst of all sits the mild poet, alone, his eyes on the ground, yet with his heart full of everything round him, beating, perhaps, with the bosoms of a whole city, whose multitudes are sharing his thoughts with the daisy. His nature is the greatest poet's nature, omitting nothing in its sympathy (in which respect he is nearer to Shakspeare than either of their two illustrious brethren); and he combines an epic power of grand, comprehensive, and primitive imagery, with that of being contented with the smallest matter of fact near him, and of luxuriating in pure vague animal spirits, like a dozer in a field. His gaiety is equal to his gravity, and his sincerity to both. You could as little think of doubting his word, as the point of the pen that wrote it. It cuts as clear and sharp into you, as the pen on the paper. His belief in the good and beautiful is childlike; as Shakspeare's is that of everlasting and manly youth. Spenser's and Milton's are more scholarly and formal. Chaucer excels in pathos, in humour, in satire, character, and description. His graphic faculty, and healthy sense of the material, strongly ally him to the painter; and perhaps a better idea could not be given of his universality than by saying, that he was at once the Italian and the Flemish painter of his time, and exhibited the pure expression of Raphael, the devotional intensity of Domenichino, the colour and corporeal fire of Titian, the manners of Hogarth, and the homely domesticities of Ostade and Teniers! His faults are coarseness, which was that of his age,—and in some of his poems, tediousness, which is to be attributed to the same cause,—a book being a book in those days, written by few, and when it was written, tempting the author to cram into it everything that he had learnt, in default of there being any encyclopædias. That tediousness was no innate fault of the poet's, is strikingly manifest, not only from the nature of his genius, but from the fact of his throwing it aside as he grew older and more confident, and spoke in his own person. The 'Canterbury Tales,' his last and greatest work, is almost entirely free from it, except where he gives us a long prose discourse, after the fashion of the day; and in no respect is his 'Palamon and Arcite' more remarkable, than in the exquisite judgment with which he has omitted everything superfluous in his prolix original, 'The Teseide,'—the work of the great, but not poetical, Boccaccio;—(for Boccaccio's heart and nature were poems; but he could not develop them well in verse.)

In proceeding to give specimens from the works of this great poet, the abundance which lies before us is perplexing, and, in order to do anything like justice, we are constrained to be unjust to his context, and to be more piecemeal than we propose to be with others. Our extracts are from the volumes lately given to the world by Mr Clarke, entitled the 'Riches of Chaucer,' in which the spelling is modernized, and the old pronunciation marked with accents, so as to show the smoothness of the versification. That Chaucer is not only a smooth, but a powerful and various versifier, is among the wonders of his advance beyond his age; but it is still doubtful, whether his prosody was always correct in the modern sense,—that is to say, whether all his lines contain the regulated number of syllables, or whether he does not sometimes make time stand for number; or, in other words, a strong and hearty emphasis on one syllable perform the part of two,—as in the verse which will be met with below, about the monk on horseback; of whom he says, that

"Men might his bridle hear
Gingling in a whistling wind as clear,
And eke as loud as doth the chapel bell."

SPECIMENS OF CHAUCER'S PORTRAIT-PAINTING AND HUMOUR.

(From the set of Characters at the beginning of the Canterbury Tales.)

THE KNIGHT.

And evermore he had a sovereign prise,
And though that he was worthy he was wise,
And of his port as meek as is a maid.
He never yet no villainy ne said,
In all his life unto no manner wight:
He was a very perfect gentle knight.

THE SQUIRE.

With him there was his son, a younge Squier,
A lover and a lusty bachelor,
With lockes curl'd as they were laid in press;
Of twenty years of age he was I guess.
Of his stature he was of even length,
And wonderly deliver,* and great of strength;
And he had been some time in chevachie,†
In Flaunders, in Artois, and Picardie,
And borne him well, as of so little space,
In hope to standen in his lady's grace.
Embroidered was he, as it were a mead
All full of freshe flourés, white and red:
Singing he was or floyting‡ all the day;
He was as fresh as is the month of May:

Courteous he was, lowly and serviceable,
And carv'd before his father at the table.

[Which was the custom for sons in those days. His attendant yeoman is painted in a line.]

THE YEOMAN.

A nut-head had he with a brown visage.

THE PRIORESS.

There was also a Nun, a Prioress;
That of her smiling was full simple and coy,
Her greatest oath n'as but by "Saint Eloy,"
And she was clep'd Madam Eglantine;
Full well she sang the service divine,
Entuned in her nose full sweetly;
And French she spake full fair and fetisly,
After the school of Stratford atté Bow,
For French of Paris was to her unknow:

[A touch of good satire that might tell now!]

At mené was she well ytaught withal,
She let no morsel from her lippes fall,
Ne wet her fingers in her saucé deep;
Well could she carry a morsel, and well keep.

[These are the elegancies which it was thought necessary to teach in that age.]

But for to speken of her conscience;
She was so charitable and so piteous,
She wouldé weep if that she saw a mouse
Caught in a trap, if it were dead or bled.
Of smallé houndes had she, that she fed
With roasted flesh, and milk, and wastel bread,
But sore wept she if one of them were dead,
Of if men smote it with a yardé smart:
And all was conscience and tender heart.

[What a charming verse is that!]

THE MONK.

A Monk there was, a fair for the mast'ry,
An out-rider, that loved venery;*
A manly man to been an abbot able;
Full many a dainty horse had he in stable,
And when he rode men might his bridle hear
Gingling in a whistling wind as clear
And eke as loud as doth the chapel bell,
There as this lord was keeper of the cell.
The rulé of Saint Maure and of Saint Bene't,
Because that it was old, and some deal strait,
This liké monk let oldé thinges pace,
And held after the newé world the trace.
He gave not of the text a pulled hen,
That saith, that hunters be not holy men,
Nor that a monk when he is reckéless,
Is like to a fish that is waterless;
This is to say, a monk out of his cloister;
This liké text held he not worth an oyster.

His head was bald, and shone as any glass,
And eke his face, as it had been anioit;
He was a lord full fat and in good point;
His eyen steep, and rolling in his head,
That steamed as a furnace of a lead;
His bootés supple, his horse in great estate;
Now certainly he was a fair prelate:

[Of the sly and accommodating Friar we are told, that]

Full sweetly heard he confession,
And pleasant was his absolútion.

This was a couplet that used to delight the late Mr Hazlitt. To give it its full gusto, it should be read with a syllabical precision, after the fashion of Dominic Sampson,

THE SCHOLAR.

Him was lever† have at his bed's head
Twenty bookes, clothed in black or red,
Of Aristotle and his philosophy,
Than robés rich, or fiddle or psaltry:
But all be that he was a philosopher
Yet haddé he but little gold in coffer,
But all that he might of his friendés hent,
On bookes and on learning he it spent,
And busily gan for the soules pray
Of them that gave him wherewith to scholay.
Of study took he mosté cure and heed;
Not a word spake he more than was need;
And that was said in form and reverence,
And short and quick, and full of high sentence:
Sounding in moral virtue was his speech,
And gladly would he learn and gladly teach.

A noble verse, containing all the zeal and single-heartedness of a true love of knowledge. The account of contains a couplet, which will do for time everlasting to describe a bustling man of business. If Fielding had read Chaucer, he would assuredly have applied it to his Lawyer Dowling, who "wished he could cut himself into twenty pieces," he had so much to do.

THE SERGEANT OF THE LAW.

No where so busy a man as he there n'as,‡
AND YET HE SEEMED BUSIER THAN HE WAS.

THE SAILOR.

A Shipman was there, wonéd far by west;
For aught I wot, he was of Dartmouth:
He rode upon a rounny as he couth,
[He rode upon a hack-horse as well as he could.]
All in a gown of falding to the knee.
A dagger hanging by a lace had he
About his neck under his arm adown:
The hoté summer had made his hue all brown:
And certainly he was a good fellow;
Full many a draught of wine he haddé draw
From Bourdeaux ward, while that the chapmen sleep:
Of nicé conscience took he no keep.
If that he fought and had the higher hand,
By water he sent them home to every land.
But of his craft to reckon well his tides,
His streamés and his strandés him besides;
His harberow, his moon, and his lodemanage,
There was none such from Hull unto Carthage.
Hardy he was, and wise, I undertake;
With many a tempest had his beard been shake:
He knew well all the havens, as they were
From Gothland to the Cape de Finistere;
And every creek in Bretagne and in Spain;
His barge cleyepéd was the Magdalen.

THE PARISH PRIEST.

Wide was his parish, and houses far asunder,
But he ne left nought for no rain nor thunder,
In sickness and in mischief, to visit
The farthest in his parish much and lite.

He setté not his benefice to hire,
And let his sheep accumbred in the mire,
And ran unto Londón unto Saint Poule's
To seeken him a chantery for souls,
Or with a brotherhood to be withold;
But dwelt at home and kepté well his fold,
So that the wolf ne made it not miscarry:
He was a shepherd and no mercenary;

He waited after no pomp or reverence,
Ne makéd him no spiced conscience;
But Christés lore, and his apostles twelve
He taught, but first he followed it himselfe.

How admirably well expressed is spiced conscience,— a conscience requiring to be kept easy and sweet with drugs and luxurious living.

Chaucer's pathos, humour, &c. &c. will require two or three more papers.

TO THE SISTER OF CHARLES LAMB.

Comfort thee, O thou mourner, yet awhile!
Again shall Elia's smile
Refresh thy heart, when heart can ache no more.
What is it we deplore?
He leaves behind him, freed from griefs and years,
Far worthier things than tears:
The love of friends without a single foe,
Unequal'd lot below!
His gentle soul, his genius, these are thine;
Shalt thou for those repine?
He may have left the lowly walks of men.
Left them he has. What then?
Are not his footsteps followed by the eyes
Of all the good and wise?
Tho' the warm day is over, yet they seek
Upon the lofty peak
Of his pure mind the roseate light that glows
O'er Death's perennial snows.
Behold him! From the spirits of the Blest
He speaks, he bids thee rest.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The charming letter of our fair Correspondent in Wales, next week.

Due and most willing attention to * W *.

Insertion shall be given, the first opportunity, to "Flowers in Churchyards," by the author of 'Stray-Flowers,' (not 'May-Flowers,' as erroneously printed in No 60).

J. B. should by all means attend to his ledgers and his verses, both;—founding pleasure on duty.

PORTTROT's very proper and sensible letter shall be handed over to the gentlemen in whose hands are the subjects he speaks of.

Correspondents in general, who have not yet seen it, will oblige us by reading the notice to them in our last

CURIOSITIES OF LAW AND HISTORY.

Tracts, Legal and Historical. By John Riddell, Esq., Advocate. 8vo. pp. 234. Edinburgh. 1835.
7s. 6d.

THIS is a volume full of very curious matter, and yet one which is little likely to fall into the hands of ordinary readers. We shall therefore be doing our proper office as a Journal, one main aim of which is the diffusion of knowledge, in drawing forth a handful or two of its rarities, and scattering them abroad among the many. Its learned author may be said to write only for his learned professional brethren; for although he does occasionally affect the popular, we cannot compliment him on his success in that attempt. On his proper ground of a legal antiquary, however, and especially in the field of family antiquities, where such odd things are frequently to be picked up, Mr Riddell is well known as occupying a place in the very foremost rank of modern enquirers. His great learning here is directed and turned to use by a shrewdness and ingenuity which betoken not only a strong but a highly original mind.

The first, and most important, of the Tracts in the present volume is entitled a 'Reply to Mr Tytler's Historical Remarks on the Death of Richard II.'
The Readers of the PRINTING MACHINE will recollect that we gave an abstract of this speculation of Mr Tytler's in our 24th number. That writer's notion is, that Richard lived for nearly twenty years in Scotland after the time that he is generally supposed to have died or been murdered in Pontefract Castle—and that he died in the Castle of Stirling, in the year 1419.

This curious subject, Mr Riddell tells us, was first broached by himself in the Scotch newspaper called the 'Caledonian Mercury,' for the months of July and August, 1829, where, he says, "he introduced his theory as to the supposed Richard, with relative observations and authorities." What his then theory was—whether the same with Mr Tytler's, or the same that he now puts forward,—we are not informed. The volume of Mr Tytler's History (the third) in which the subject is treated of,
was published at Edinburgh in the same year.

In the present publication, at all events, Mr Riddell contends that the story of Richard's escape is a mere imagination, and that the individual—for there certainly was such an individual—who personated him in Scotland, was beyond all doubt an impostor, or rather a pretender set up and maintained by the government of that country as a means of annoying or keeping in check that of the rival kingdom, unstable as the latter was at any rate from the circumstances of Henry the Fourth's accession, and the disputable nature of his rights.

In the first place, our author remarks that we have very strong and direct evidence of the fact of Richard's death at Pomfret, early in the year 1400.

"Walsingham, a cotemporary, and a favourite authority of Mr Tytler, informs us that Richard's body, after his decease at Pomfret, on St Valentine's day (the 14th of February), in that year, was exhibited at all the places of note on the route to London, where, in St Paul's Cathedral, in the presence of the King and the Londoners, the funeral service was performed. Otterburn, also a cotem-porary, corroborates Walsingham in these particulars, with the addition, that that portion of Richard was disclosed, by which he could be recognized—the face being bare and open from the forehead to the throat. The testimony of Hardyng, independently of being a cotemporary, like the two former, is very important, because, while noticing the funeral ceremony, at the same time, he explicitly says that he himself saw the corse of Richard in "herse rial"—that is,
in the royal hearse in which it was placed. . . .
Froissard, as he informs us, had been secretary to Edward III, the grandfather of Richard, by whom he had been hospitably entertained, and munificently remembered on his leaving England. He states that Richard, after his death, 'was placed in a litter, covered with black, and a canopy of the same;
four black horses were harnessed to it, and two varlets in mourning conducted the litter, followed by four knights, dressed also in mourning.' In this manner they left the Tower, and paraded the streets, at a foot's pace, until they came to Cheapside, which is the greatest thoroughfare in the city, and there they halted for upwards of two hours. More than twenty thousand persons of both sexes came to see the King, who lay in the litter, his head on a black cushion,
and his face uncovered."

In addition to these testimonies, others to the same effect are quoted from Caxton's Chronicle, originally printed in 1480, from Fabyan, and from Speed, who says that the corpse, "barefaced, stood three days for all beholders."

Mr Tytler, however, maintains that the body thus exhibited was not Richard's, but that of a priest of the name of Maudelain. This story he has taken from a French metrical history of Richard's Deposition, which is the only authority for it, and the author of which merely gives it hesitatingly and doubtfully, as his own suspicion. It appears that this person had really attempted to pass himself off for the deposed King, and had some weeks before been, for that act of high treason, put to death by Henry's party. Mr Riddell contends that in these circumstances he would most certainly be drawn, hanged, and quartered, and his members, more especially his head, agreeably to the usual practice, conspicuously exhibited on the bridge or gates of London. "In thi event," he remarks, "being familiar to every Londoner, while pelted by the populace and the elements, and rapidly decomposing, they would be admirably adapted forsooth to stand proxy for Richard!" In point of fact several of the old chroniclers expressly tell us that Maudelain's body was so treated. Caxton, for instance, states that he and another of the persons engaged in the same conspiracy were drawn through the City of London to Tyburn, and there hanged, and their heads smitten off, and set on London Bridge. It appears from other authorities here quoted that the attempt of Maudelain, who was a mere puppet in the hands of the Lords opposed to Henry IV, was the sole origin of the rumour respecting Richard's escape, which certainly prevailed about the time of his death, and on which Mr Tytler lays so much stress. Mr Riddell shows that for some time after Richard's death there was an entire absence of any rumour of his being still alive. For instance, the French King, whose daughter Richard had married, upon that event forthwith disbanded a large naval and military armament, which he had prepared with the view of effecting the restoration of his son-in-law; and some years after, in 1406, even allowed his daughter Isabel, Richard's widow, to contract a second marriage with the Duke of Orleans.

The fact of this marriage may be considered completely to refute an assertion of Mr Tytler's, founded upon some very inconclusive inferences, that in 1404 and 1405 the French generally believed in Richard's escape and safety.

The rise of the first rumour of Richard being still alive is fixed by Mr Riddell, on the strongest concurrent evidence of documents and historical statements, to the early part of the month of June 1402.
It appears that about that time there did appear in Scotland a person bearing a kind of resemblance to Richard, and that he was accompanied by one William Serle. This Serle was a sufficiently notorious character. He had been yeoman of the robes to Richard, and not only one of the chief companions of that prince's low debaucheries, but his ready instrument in his worst acts of violence and tyranny. It was Serle, who, assisted by another minion of the same stamp, murdered, at the King's command, his uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, by throwing a feather-bed on him, and pressing it down with the weight of their bodies until he was suffocated.

"He was a man of the most depraved character;
and, according to Walsingham, a cotemporary, an object of execration to the whole kingdom. With Richard's secrets, habits, and manners, no one could be better acquainted. . . . He had, at one time or other, contrived to steal Richard's signet, so that, with the addition of a little forgery and address, he was well able to impose upon people, by means of supposititious letters from the Prince. When Richard's catastrophe happened, a total reverse, of course, followed in his fortunes—his previous dependence upon Richard, so far from benefiting him, made him unpopular, and an object of distrust; and, finally, the apprehension of Hall, a party in Gloucester's murder, but not so guilty as himself, with his full confession of all the particulars, rendered a stay in England no longer safe; and he, therefore, wisely lost no time in escaping to France."

An old authority, quoted by Leland, expressly states the fact, that Serle had stolen Richard's seal, and that he afterwards confessed having done so. Walsingham says that he forged the seal. Both agree that he made use of such a seal in the plot he now proceeded to get up. It is probable that Serle, either after making the required preparations, proceeded from France to Scotland, taking with him the puppet already mentioned, whose resemblance, in a certain degree, to Richard, is admitted; or, as he afterwards affirmed himself, having heard that there was such a person already personating Richard in Scotland, went over thither and joined him. Serle, at all events, confessed that this person was not Richard. Yet it clearly appears that it was, as we have said, his attempt alone, which gave rise to this first rumour of that King being alive.

"The year 1402," proceeds Mr Riddell, "seems to have been the time when the rumour of Richard's survival, countenanced by the Scots, made the greatest sensation; in 1403 we hear but little of it; and in 1404, the political atmosphere improving, Henry IV was induced to grant a general pardon to all state offenders; but, from this act of clemency, he specially excepts 'William Serle,' and 'Thomas Warde de Trumpington, que se pretende et feigne d'estre roy Richard.'"

Serle was afterwards taken; and, as already noticed, confessed the imposture in which he had been an actor. He confessed that Warde was not the late King Richard. The pretensions of the latter, therefore, may be considered as disposed of. Now, as Mr Riddell states, it is not asserted by any authority, and never has been maintained, that after Maudelain's imposture, there was more than one supposed Richard.

Although Serle, however, after his capture, was hanged and quartered, Warde continued to be protected in Scotland; and he is indisputably the person whom the government of that country, during many years afterwards, professed to treat and occasionally brought forward as the English King. From a curious letter, written in 1407, by the Archbishop of Canterbury to Henry IV, and now, for the first time, printed from the original, preserved in the British Museum, we learn a few particulars respecting this individual. He is described by the Archbishop as stultus et fatuus, that is, a fool or idiot; and, although the word is partially defaced, there is every reason to believe that in another passage he is called servulus natus, one born a servant or domestic. Mr Riddell has shown, that there were various persons of the names of Wyarde and Warde (probably identical), in subordinate situations at the English Court, in the fourteenth century. Among others, it appears, from the Rolls of Parliament, that a John Warde was appointed, by Richard II, his pavilion maker, with certain fees and emoluments. If Thomas Warde of Trumpington was of this family, he would, of course, have had good opportunities of observing; Richard's manner and address.

We now come to those entries in the Scottish Exchequer Rolle, respecting sums advanced, from time to time, by the Regent Albany, for the maintenance of the person asserted to be Richard II, upon which Mr Tytler lays so much stress. Mr Riddell says in a note: "The author had seen these entries, respecting the supposed Richard, nearly twenty years ago, in the Rolls in question, when he was examining them, but he cannot say that they made the impression upon him that they seem to have done upon Mr Tytler. They actually prove no more than what we previously knew, and is vouched for by our historians, including Bellenden,—that a person was nominally held to be King Richard by the Scottish Government; nay, their information is restricted to this only, while the other sources are far more communicative."

The designation of the individual to whom the entries refer by the title of King Richard, commences in 1408, and is continued up to 1417, two years before his alleged death. Now, James I. of Scotland was captured by the English in 1405; and upon this, according to our author's conjecture, "The Scots having lost their king, seem to have resolved upon a ridiculous and absurd reprisal, by affecting to show that they also had a rival monarch in custody." The first entry, in 1408, it is to be observed, is retrospective; referring to charges which had been incurred some time before.

"The funds," proceeds Mr Riddell, "assigned both for his sustenance and confinement, amounted to the mighty sum of one hundred merks. In the year 1404, the salary of James Wedale, a macer in Exchequer, was ten pounds, and at the same time the gown of the door-keeper there cost two pounds. These facts may throw light upon the amount of the sum expended on the supposed Richard, for it is well known that a merk was much less than a pound Scots, the value of the former being only thirteen shillings and four-pence of our (Scottish) money. Hence, it must be confessed that the Scots attempted the deception at a cheap rate, and certainly with no regard to the conceived royalty and importance of their prisoner. We are here unavoidably forced to contrast his treatment with that of James I., a real monarch, when a captive in England. The difference is striking, even as we learn from Mr Tytler, who says that James I 'was provided with the best masters, treated with uniform kindness, and waited on with the honours due to his rank.'"

Mr Riddell next proceeds to trace the future history of Warde, by the original notices of him which remain, with the view of showing that he remained in Scotland till his death. First, we find Henry IV. on the 29th of January 1409, conveying to another person the eight acres of land in Trumpington which had belonged to Warde, on the ground of his forfeiture, but without any mention of his death. Then, it appears by the Rolls of Parliament, that during the investigations into the March conspiracy, in 1415, "it transpired that some persons had secretly cast their eyes upon 'Thomas of Trumpington, an idiot,' of whom they were to avail themselves like another Maudelain, and bring from Scotland to personify Richard." In 1415, therefore, our author continues, "Thomas of Trumpington is explicitly shewn to have been an idiot, capable of personifying Richard, and still resident in Scotland, where, under the appellation of the Scottish impostor, he obviously figures in 1417, as will be seen in the sequel. Now, in addition to all this, when we have the statement of the Scottish Winton, a cotemporary, upon whom, too, Mr Tytler places such great reliance, and who had no access to English writers or authorities, that the Scottish Richard was crazed, while he also questions his royalty, can we, under these circumstances, entertain a doubt of the identity of the latter with Warde, especially when there is not a tittle of evidence, or even plausible surmise, to shake or rebut them? It is humbly conceded that the point is established to demonstration, and in a way not only remarkable, but hardly to be expected in a matter of antiquity. * * It may be only here added, that a 'Tractat of a part of ye Inglis Cronikle,' printed at the Auchinlech Press, from the Aslowan Manuscript, states in reference to the supposed Richard, that he "deit a beggar and out of his mynd, and was erdit (buried) in the Black Freris in Striviling." It is curious that two years before the death of the latter his pension was stopped, the Scots being at last tired of the imposture."

We can only afford room for the following additional extract:—

"During the whole time that the Scottish Government detained Warde, or the pseudo-Richard, it is unquestionable that they did not venture to make a hostile exhibition of him. As is proved by the Scottish Exchequer Rolls, he was kept in close custody, and not allowed to exceed the bounds of his imprisonment. This is fully explained by the circumstance of the imposture; if brought into view, his madness and ignorance, if not appearance also, would soon have unmasked him; and hence it was impracticable to send him to the borders, or to enable him to act against England. * * What is also remarkable, his seclusion in Scotland was not owing to any wish of the Regent Albany to conciliate the English, or in consequence of an interested system of forbearance, because it is proved, independently of other things, by a letter of Henry V. (in 'Ellis's Original Letters,') that Albany, in 1417, had conspired with his enemies to dispatch the pseudo-Richard to England with hostile intentions (the words are, "to stir what he may"). The latter, here, is appropriately styled the 'Mammet' (that is, the impostor, or puppet,) 'of Scotland.' The will, therefore, of making the most of the phantom, was not wanting to Albany, but merely the power, and, accordingly, however he might threaten, he could not act; and, therefore, while he fed his allies with such vain hopes in order to annoy the English, the enterprise, as it is hardly necessary to add, being quite impracticable, proved abortive. * *

"The conduct of the Scots towards the pseudo-Richard, is strikingly contrasted with the treatment of James I. by the English, of whose reality there could be no doubt. They had no scruple in exhibiting him upon all occasions; they not only recognized him as a prince, but actually treated him as one, giving him the seat of honour beside Catherine the wife of Henry V. at the festival of her coronation; nay, they even carried him into France, and displayed him in front of the English and French armies, that his presence might recall his subjects from the French ranks, and induce them to side with the English. It is further remarkable, that many of the Scots resorted to James during his captivity, that they might behold and converse with their lawful monarch, nor does it appear that access was denied them. * * But so far from this, the supposed Richard is carefully withheld from English inspection, and while, after all, but a harmless instrument in the hands of his detainers, is ever veiled in that mystery and concealment which are the sure indications of imposture. A circumstance mentioned by Bower, may illustrate the policy of the Scots in this respect. In the year 1405, or thereabouts, the Earl of Northumberland, then the enemy of Henry IV., but who had resolved to support the cause of Richard II., if alive, having fled to Scotland, desired, naturally enough, to converse with this counterfeiter,—but no, he found it impossible, for the latter would not see him—although, the historian adds, that Albany used his efforts to promote the interview. Any person, with but little penetration, may discover that this was a mock interference on the part of the latter; for if he had been sincere on the occasion, the supposed Richard, whether he wished it or not, could easily have been brought into view. But Albany knew well that the exhibition of the stranger and idiot to one like Northumberland, who had been intimately acquainted with the real Richard, would have unmasked the imposture, and, therefore, it may be inferred, wisely enough, laboured in secret to frustrate the object of the nobleman."

We must say that we think all this is abundantly conclusive. But Mr Riddell has, in the course of his able dissertation, adverted also to many minor points, which we have not space to notice. Several curious matters, besides the main subject of the investigation, are also incidentally illustrated.

The second tract is entitled, 'Observations upon the representation of the Rusky and Lennox Families, and other points in Mr Napier's Memoirs of Merchiston.' It is likewise full of curious matter, though its leading objects and conclusions are of less general interest.

Of the third and last tract also, we can only now give the title. It is 'Upon the Law of Legitimation per Subsequens Matrimonium,' or that principle of the Scottish law which, on the marriage of the parents, legitimizes the children born to them at any previous time. Mr Riddell's investigation of the history of this principle, and of the manner in which it appears to have crept into, and established itself in, the law of Scotland, is perhaps at once the most novel and the most important deduction in the book. At the present moment, when the subject of the Scottish law of marriage, in all its parts, is about to be brought before Parliament, the present Essay possesses peculiar interest.

MILTON'S POETICAL WORKS.

The Poetical Works of John Milton. Edited by Sir Egerton Brydges, Bart. With Imaginative Illustrations. By J. M. W. Turner, Esq. R. A. Vol. I. London. Macrone.

THIS volume contains the life of our great epic poet, which is written with considerable taste and feeling by Sir Egerton Brydges, and which, though not uniformly fair, certainly does infinitely more justice to the genius and moral character of Milton than the Memoir of Dr Johnson that still precedes the 'Paradise Lost,' and the other poems, in nearly all our cheap and popular editions.

Johnson's political feelings and high-church predilections, which he nursed until they became absolute passions, the whole turn of his mind, and all his habits of life, peculiarly unfitted him to be the biographer of the republican and puritan John Milton; and to this must be added, that Johnson had no taste whatsoever for the high and imaginative order of poetry, and would have been inclined to disparage that of Milton even without the bias of party and polemics.

On his side the present biographer has also tastes and aspirations wholly at variance with those of the foreign secretary of the Commonwealth and friend of Cromwell. Sir Egerton Brydges is enamoured of the pomp and power of royalty, the recollections of fealty, the honours of ancient descent, the distinctions of names and ranks, and he loves the title of "My Lord," with a passion amounting almost to insanity. But Sir Egerton, unlike Johnson, appreciates and most enthusiastically admires Milton's poetry, and, though he hates his politics, he charitably makes allowances, acquits him of all base motives, and only in one instance admits that Milton's conduct is to be for ever condemned or deplored. The animus of the work is indeed all charity and affection towards the blind bard, but if Milton could rise from the dead he would frown indignantly at the excuses put in by the biographer for the very writings and doings in which he most gloried, and he would protest with a "trumpet-blast" against the attempt to exonerate him at the expense of his party and the moral character of the people of England.

It is precisely in these uncalled-for excuses and shiftings of responsibility and blame—in the mawkish regrets that Milton should ever have taken part in public affairs, or composed those disputatious prose works which, in their day, produced more effect than fleets and armies, that the objectionable part of this memoir by Sir Egerton Brydges chiefly lies, and it really destroys one's equanimity to bear him labour and plead for the author of 'Defensio pro Populo Anglicano,' as though he were pleading for one who is at the same time his pet, and a criminal.

In spite of these objections, we have been greatly pleased with parts of the book. Sir Egerton thus states his motives for writing it—

"I am conscious what talents far above mine it requires to treat adequately the subject I have here undertaken; but others, as weak as I am, have already entered on the task with less respectfulness and less love, and I am willing to attempt to wipe away some of the stains they have left. For fifty years I have had an unquenchable desire to refute Johnson's perverse criticisms and malignant obloquies. I know not by what spell his authority over the public is still great."

We think he has been completely successful in his refutation of the criticism, and, (as far as Milton's private life is concerned,) of the malignant obloquies. Sir Egerton's running commentary on the different poems is exceedingly animated and agreeable; his sympathy with Milton's muse, the chaste and holy Urania, is warm and almost complete; and he generally speaks as a man thoroughly in earnest, whose heart's core glows with his subject and pours out the loving admiration he gives voice to. Admitting generally the justice of his criticism, we cannot, however, help thinking that he estimates too lowly those exquisite compositions, 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso.'

The materials for Milton's private life are not very numerous, and though our biographer has put together such as exist in an agreeable manner, he has not added to them. By far the most interesting of these materials are derived from Milton's own works—from the very prose works which Sir Egerton repeatedly deplores he should ever have written. As this cheap and elegant edition is calculated to have a large circulation among the people, we are, however, of opinion that by giving these passages, which in the original are mostly in Latin, in good plain idiomatic English, our biographer has done good service to the public and to the cause of liberty, for Milton hardly ever speaks of himself, of his sufferings and his misfortunes, except in connection with that great cause, or with the subject of education, which he ever considered as the only sure basis of a rational and lasting freedom.

Most of our Readers will remember, that when Milton wrote 'Paradise Lost,' 'Paradise Regained,' and 'Samson Agonistes,' (the three greatest of his works) he was stone-blind; but many may not be aware how he lost his sight, or know of the existence of a splendid passage we are about to quote, and which is given in Sir Egerton Brydges' volume.

Milton's eyes, which, as he tells us himself, "were naturally weak," were sadly injured by night-reading and the intensity of his study from his childhood upward. In the scrupulous unflinching performance of the most laborious duties of his office as Latin Secretary to the Commonwealth, and in his incessant efforts to defend with the pen the cause he had embraced, he completely lost the sight of one of his eyes in the year 1651. Nor even then, though fully aware of his impending fate, would he in any way relax his exertions, nor would he lay down the pen which he conscientiously believed he used for the best interests of his country and mankind, until for him it was "total eclipse all night"—until (in 1652) he had lost the sight of both his eyes, and, as he says in a pathetic sonnet, "lost them overplied in liberty's defence."

The melancholy news of his blindness had no sooner gone abroad than Du Moulin, an author retained by that religious and virtuous prince, Charles II, announced to the world that the poet's calamity was a visitation or judgment of the Almighty. To this savage and blasphemous assumption, Milton replied—

"I wish that I could with equal facility refute what this barbarous opponent has said of my blindness; but I cannot do it, and I must submit to the affliction. It is not so wretched to be blind, as it is not to be capable of enduring blindness. But why should I not endure a misfortune, which it behoves everyone to endure if it should happen, which may, in the common course of things, happen to any man, and which has been known to have happened to the most distinguished and virtuous persons in history? What is reported of the Augur Tiresias is well known, of whom Apollonius sung thus in his 'Argonautics':—

'To men he dared the will divine disclose,
Nor feared what Jove might in his wrath impose.
The Gods assign'd him age without decay,
But snatch'd the blessing of his sight away.'

"But God himself is truth; in propagating which, as men display a greater integrity and zeal, they approach nearer to the similitude of God, and possess a greater portion of his love. We cannot suppose the Deity envious of truth, or unwilling that it should be freely communicated to mankind: the less of sight, therefore, which this inspired sage, who was so eager in promoting knowledge among men, sustained, cannot be considered as a judicial punishment: and did not our Saviour himself declare, that that poor man whom he had restored to sight had not been born blind either on account of his own sins, or those of his progenitors?

"And with respect to myself, though I have accurately examined my conduct, and scrutinized my soul, I call thee, O God, the searcher of hearts, to witness that I am not conscious, either in the more early or in the later periods of my life, of having committed any enormity which might deservedly have marked me out as a fit object for such a calamitous visitation; but since my enemies boast that this affliction is only a retribution for the transgressions of my pen, I again invoke the Almighty to witness that I never at any time wrote anything which I did not think agreeable to truth, to justice, and to piety. This was my persuasion, then, and I feel the same persuasion now. Thus, therefore, when I was publicly solicited to write a reply to the defence of the royal cause, when I had to contend with the pressure of sickness, and with the apprehension of soon losing the sight of my remaining eye, and when my medical attendants clearly announced, that if I did engage in this work it would be irreparably lost, their premonitions caused no hesitation, and inspired no dismay: I would not have listened to the voice even of Esculapius himself from the shrine of Epidauria, in preference to the suggestions of the heavenly monitor within my breast. My resolution was unshaken, though the alternative was either the loss of my sight, or the desertion of my duty; and I called to mind those two destinies which the oracle of Delphi announced to the son of Thetis.

"I considered that many had purchased a less good by a greater evil, the meed of glory by the loss of life; but that I might procure great good by little suffering; that, though I were blind, I might still discharge the most honourable duties, the performance of which, as it is something more durable than glory, ought to be an object of superior admiration and esteem; I resolved, therefore, to make the short interval of sight which was left me to enjoy as beneficial as possible to the public interest.

"But, if the choice were necessary, I would, Sir, prefer my blindness to yours; yours is a cloud spread over the mind, which darkens both the light of reason and of conscience; mine keeps from the view only the coloured surfaces of things, while it leaves me at liberty to contemplate the beauty and stability of virtue and of truth. How many things are there besides, which I would not willingly see; how many which I must see against my will; and how few which I feel any anxiety to see! There is, the Apostle has remarked, a way to strength through weakness. Let me then be the most feeble creature alive, as long as that feebleness serves to invigorate the energies of my rational and immortal spirit; as long as in that obscurity, in which I am enveloped, the light of the Divine presence more clearly shines! And, indeed, in my blindness, I enjoy in no inconsiderable degree the favour of the Deity; who regards me with more tenderness and compassion in proportion as I am able to behold nothing but himself. Alas! for him who insults me, who maligns and merits public execration! For the Divine law not only shields me from injury, but almost renders me too sacred to attack; not indeed so much from the privation of my sight, as from the overshadowing of those heavenly wings, which seem to have occasioned this obscurity. To this I ascribe the more tender assiduities of my friends, their soothing attentions, their kind visits, their reverential observances."—Defensio Secunda pro Populo Anglicano; or Second Defence for the English People.

HOW TO OBSERVE.

How to Observe—Geology. By H. T. De la Beche. F. R. S., Hon. Sec. G. S., Memb. Geo. Soc. of France; Corr. Memb. Acad. Nat. Sci. Philadelphia, &c. Post 8vo. Pp. 312. Knight. London. 1835.

This is not a treatise on geology: but it is a book which professes to teach persons but slightly acquainted with that science "how to observe" facts of importance, which might otherwise pass unnoticed. The very prominent place which geology has, within a recent period, assumed, and the increased attention which it is receiving, have rendered such a work as this a very great desideratum to a large number of persons, especially to students and travellers. In all sciences based on observation, and in every branch of knowledge, whether called a science or not, nothing is acquired by a beginner with more slowness and difficulty than the power of distinguishing the facts that are not, from those that are, really worthy of attention, and what are the really essential circumstances in each fact.

It has generally been thought that this faculty or power could not be preceded by, but must result from great acquirements and much experience in any particular branch of knowledge. That it must thus be acquired in its perfection, there can be no dispute; but were it possible that some portion of it might be communicated to those who are yet young in science, not only would their course be smoothed and their labour much diminished, but many more persons than can now be so usefully employed, would be placed in a condition for observing facts which have not come under the notice of experienced observers, and which might yet materially conduce to the advancement of knowledge. Mr De la Beche has, in the work before us, demonstrated the practicability of this in the instance of geology; and in the continuation of the series, of which the present is the first volume, the process is to be extended to other branches of knowledge. We have the most sanguine expectations of the good likely to result from this attempt; the effect of which must be to multiply a thousand fold the hands dispersed abroad throughout the world, gathering, in unexplored places, the facts which are necessary to the nourishment and growth of knowledge.

Such instruction as is thus afforded must be of particular value to travellers, or rather to the world through them. It seldom happens, that those who have opportunities of exploring distant regions and accumulating unregistered facts, are those best qualified to turn such advantages to account. Therefore, to teach persons to whom, in the circumstances of life, such opportunities are afforded, "how to observe," is to confer a great boon, not less on science than on the traveller himself. How on science, we have already seen; and how on the traveller is easily shown. We speak from some experience, when we say, in this matter of geology, for instance, that nothing can be more annoying to one who has occasion to travel in regions not often visited by any, and never by men of science, than to feel his own inability to observe and register facts which would be no less creditable to himself than useful to science. There is also much mortification and some shame attending the consciousness, that one is unable to make any use of opportunities which a man of science would prize beyond expression. Hitherto, travellers have been able to escape pretty well, in consideration of the long previous study of the science which, it was supposed, could alone qualify them to contribute to its advancement; but now that they are taught "how to observe," without any intimate acquaintance with the science being necessary, we really do not know what excuse will remain for them.

The book is illustrated with plenty of wood-cuts and diagrams, a specimen of which, as well as of the text of the work, we give the Reader in the following extract:—

ABRASION OF COASTS BY WAVES.

"We may here notice this power, which is the greatest land-abrading force with which we are acquainted, particularly when its effects are collectively considered.

"Properly to estimate the effects of this power, the observer should be present on some exposed coast, such as that of the western part of Ireland, the Land's End, Cornwall, or among the Western Islands of Scotland, during a heavy gale from the westward, and mark the crash of a heavy Atlantic billow when it strikes the coast. The blow is sometimes so heavy that the rock will seem to tremble beneath his feet. He will generally find in such situations, that though the rocks are scooped and caverned into a thousand fantastic shapes, they are still hard rocks, for no others could continue to resist long the almost incessant action of such an abrading force. Having witnessed such a scene, he will be better able to appreciate the effects, even though the waves be inferior in size, upon the softer rocks of other coasts. * * *

"An observer will scarcely have long directed his attention to the abrading power of waves breaking on coasts, before he will discover many circumstances which modify the effects that would be otherwise produced. He will see that the abrasion of coasts is often greatly assisted by land-springs, as they are termed, that, as it were, shove the cliff into the power of the breakers by moistening a body of rock, which thus loses its cohesive powers, and is launched in the direction of least resistance, or seaward. Other encroachments are made by the fall of masses of cliff, undermined by the waves, the cohesive power of the rock not being equal to its weight, or the action of gravity downwards. If, as in the annexed sketch, a rock be even sufficiently cohesive in the mass, to admit of the considerable excavation there represented without falling, a time must come, if the breakers continue to work in the same direction, when the weight of the superincumbent mass would be such that it must fall.

"When, however, a great mass of cliff does fall, in the manner noticed above, the observer should direct his attention to its conservative influence. To appreciate this, he will consider the hardness of the rock, the position in which it has fallen, and its new power of breaking the waves further from the coast.

"If the mass of fallen rock be stratified, much will depend upon the face presented to the breakers; for if it fall so that the plane of the beds remains sloping seaward, as in the above figure, it will act as a well-contrived wall erected to defend the cliff: but if the beds should be exposed vertically after the fall, as in the subjoined figure, the future destruction of the cliff will be far more rapid, and its conservative influence consequently less."—Pp. 52—56.

There is more on the subject to which the above extract relates, but we reserve our space for another extract from the concluding part of the volume, which treats of the application of geology to the useful purposes of life. The following is part of what is said under the head of Building:—

"The observer desirous of selecting a stone to be exposed to atmospheric influences, would do well to study the mode in which it is weathered in the locality whence it is obtained. He may there learn which part, if it be a compound rock, is liable to give way before such influences, and the conditions under which it does so. Granite, generally, is considered a proper material for national monuments. Some granites, however, though they may be hard and difficult to work when first taken from a quarry, are among the worst building materials, in consequence of the facility with which the felspar in them decomposes when exposed to the action of a wet atmosphere, in a climate which may be warm during part of the year, and cold during the other. Rocks which contain compact felspar are often very durable. Some of the eltons, as they are provincially termed, of Cornwall, seem to be particularly durable when exposed to atmospheric influences; for some of the old and external carved stone work of the churches constructed with this material in that part of England, is as perfect as when first put up.

"Rocks which readily absorb moisture, such as many of those which are termed freestones, are exceedingly bad for the external portions of exposed public buildings; since, in counties where frosts occur, the freezing of the water in the wet surface continually peels off the latter, and eventually destroys the ornamental work carved upon it. It should be recollected that freestones, so termed because they are easily worked, are often valued because they may be cut readily when first taken from the quarry, and subsequently become harder when exposed to the atmosphere; and that this quality arises from the evaporation of the water contained in the stone when forming part of the natural rock. Now, some of these freestones again readily absorb moisture, while others do not, and an observer should ascertain this fact by experiment before any given freestone is selected.

"Some freestones are formed of particles of sand cemented together by different substances, the cementing matter being sometimes siliceous, at others calcareous, and at others again formed of oxide of iron. In the first case, the freestone would not suffer from the chemical action of atmospheric influences upon it; while, in the second, rain water containing carbonic acid would tend to dissolve the calcareous matter, and deprive the sand of its cement; and, in the third, the action of atmospheric influences would tend to render the material unsightly by staining it with iron rust.

"The little attention that has been paid, in the erection of national monuments in this country, to the durability of the materials of which they are constructed, is well known. There is no want of good materials if they would be sought out; and it often occurs to the geologist to find them. A more beautiful stone for public works can no where be obtained than from a mass of white granite near Okehampton, in Devonshire. Judging from the weathered character of this rock, it must be extremely durable. It is composed of white felspar, quartz, and mica, and looks as white as statuary marble. Hitherto, we believe, this beautiful material has only been formed into one or two chimney-pieces."—Pp. 308—311.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

FROM among various expressions of regret which we have received from the old readers of the PRINTING MACHINE, at the discontinuance of that JOURNAL as a separate publication, we have to notice a letter signed CARTHUSIANUS, for the kind terms of which we beg to return the writer our thanks. As for the points which he suggests, we had not failed to give them our best consideration while arranging our new plan; but we came to the conclusion (on the representation of those most conversant with such matters), that the complexity of separate pagings for the two works would be likely to be felt rather as an annoyance than an accommodation by the great majority of readers. It is a plan which has been repeatedly tried, but has never, as we understand, given satisfaction, or succeeded. Let us add, that, while, for convenience sake, the two departments of the JOURNAL will be kept under separate superintendence, our object is, that they should nevertheless be really united and incorporated—that they should form one, not two works. We apprehend (besides all other considerations) that we thus take a ground on which we stand still more distinctly alone among the publications of our class than even the LONDON JOURNAL has hitherto done, and that we attain a comprehensiveness beyond that of any other such publication. We look to this entire and cordial partnership for much of our expected success. Then, as for commencing a new volume, in other words an entirely new work, with our present number, although of course we should have been glad to do so for the sake of the purchasers of the PRINTING MACHINE, we felt that it would have been unfair to the much more numerous purchasers of the LONDON JOURNAL to break the work, at so early a period of its existence, into two series. As the work, although extended and additionally diversified in its contents, still retains the form of the LONDON JOURNAL, and not that of the PRINTING MACHINE, it was thought proper that it should be in all other respects identified with the former. After all, the old readers of the PRINTING MACHINE who shall continue to take in the work in its present shape, are only in the same circumstances with all new subscribers to any work which has been for some time going on—although we confess we wish we could have relieved them entirely even from any inconvenience or disadvantage incidental to that position.

"THE BUTCHER."

BUTCHERS AND JURIES.—BUTLER'S DEFENCE OF THE ENGLISH DRAMA, &c.

It was observed the other day in the LONDON JOURNAL, that "butchers are wisely forbidden to be upon juries; not because they are not as good as other men by nature, and often as truly kind; but because the habit of taking away the lives of sheep and oxen inures them to the sight of blood, and violence, and mortal pangs."

The 'Times,' in noticing this passage, has corrected our error. There neither is, nor ever was, it seems, a law forbidding butchers to be upon juries; though the reverse opinion has so prevailed among all classes, that Locke takes it for granted in his 'Treatise on Education,' and our own authority was the author of 'Hudibras,' a man of very exact and universal knowledge. The passage that was in our mind is in his 'Posthumous Works,' and is worth quoting on other accounts. He is speaking of those pedantic and would-be classical critics who judge the poets of one nation entirely by those of another. Butler's resistance of their pretensions is the more honourable to him, inasmuch as the prejudices of his own education, and even the propensity of his genius, lay on the learned and anti-impulsive side. But his judgment was thorough-going and candid.—The style is of the off-hand careless order, after the fashion of he old satires and epistles, though not so rough:—

"An English poet should be tried by his peers,
And not by pedants and philosophers,
Incompetent to judge poetic fury,
As butchers are forbid to be of a jury,
Besides the most intolerable wrong
To try their masters in a foreign tongue,
By foreign jurymen like Sophocles,
Or tales* false than Euripides,
When not an English native dares appear
To be a witness for the prisoner,—
When all the laws they use to arraign and try
The innocent and wrong'd delinquent by,
Were made by a foreign lawyer and his pupils,
To put an end to all poetic scruples;
And by the advice of virtuosi Tuscans,
Determin'd all the doubts of socks and buskins,—
Gave judgment on all past and future plays, ...
As is apparent by Speroni's case,†
Which Lope Vega first began to steal,
And after him the French filou; Corneille;
And since, our English plagiarists aim
And steal their far-fetch'd criticisms from him,
And by an action, falsely laid, of trover,§
The lumber for their proper goods recover,

* Tales (Latin) persons chosen to supply the place of men impanelled upon a jury or inquest, and not appearing when called. [We copy this from a very useful and pregnant volume, called the 'Treasury of Knowledge,' full of such heaps of information as are looked for in lists and vocabularies, and occupying the very margins with proverbs. Mr D'Iraelli, sen., objects to this last overflow of contents, but not, we think, with his usual good sense and gratitude, as a lover of books. These proverbial sayings, which are the most universal things in the world, appear to us to have a particularly good effect in thus coming in to refresh one among the technicalities of knowledge.]

† Speroni, a celebrated critic in his day, and great plagiarist, among others, of Tasso.

§ Filou—pickpocket! This irreverent epithet must have startled many of Butler's readers and brother-loyalists of the court of Charles the Second. But he suffered nothing to stand in the way of what seemed to him a just opinion.

§ Trover—an action for goods found, and not delivered on demand.—Treasury of Knowledge. Butler's wit dragged every species of information into his net.

Enough to furnish all the lewd impeachers
Of witty Beaumont's poetry and Fletcher's,
Who for a few misprisions of wit,
Are charg'd by those who ten times worse commit,
And for misjudging some unhappy scenes,
Are censured for it with more unlucky sense:

(How happily said!)

When all their worst miscarriages delight
And please more than the best that pedants write."

Having been guilty of this involuntary scandal against the butchers, we would fain make them amends by saying nothing but good of them and their trade; and truly if we find the latter part of the proposition a little difficult, they themselves are for the most part a jovial, good-humoured race, and can afford the trade to be handled as sharply as their beef on the block. There is out and come again in them. Your butcher breathes an atmosphere of good living. The beef mingles kindly with his animal nature. He grows fat with the best of it, perhaps with inhaling its very essence; and has no time to grow spare, theoretical, and hypochondriacal, like those whose more thinking stomachs drive them upon the apparently more innocent but less easy and analogous intercommunications of fruit and vegetables. For our parts, like all persons who think at all,—nay, like the butcher himself, when he catches himself in a strange fit of meditation, after some doctor perhaps has "kept him low," we confess to an abstract dislike of eating the sheep and lamb that we see in the meadow; albeit our concrete regard for mutton is considerable, particularly Welsh mutton. But Nature has a beautiful way of reconciling all necessities that are unmalignant; and as butchers at present must exist, and sheep and lambs would not exist at all in civilised countries, and crop the sweet grass so long, but for the brief pang at the end of it, he is as comfortable a fellow as can be,—one of the liveliest ministers of her mortal necessities,—of the deaths by which she gives and diversifies life; and has no more notion of doing any harm in his vocation, than the lamb that swallows the lady-bird on the thyme. A very pretty insect is she, and has had a pretty time of it; a very calm, clear feeling, healthy, and, therefore, happy little woollen giant; compared with her, is the lamb,—her butcher; and an equally innocent and festive personage is the butcher himself, notwithstanding the popular fallacy about juries, and the salutary misgiving his beholders feel when they see him going to take the lamb out of the meadow, or entering the more tragical doors of the slaughter-house. His thoughts, while knocking down the ox, are of skill and strength, and not of cruelty. And the death, though it may not be the very best of deaths, is, assuredly, none of the very worst. Animals, that grow old in an artificial state, would have a hard time of it in a lingering decay. Their mode of life would not have prepared them for it. Their blood would not run lively enough to the last. We doubt even whether the John Bull of the herd, when about to be killed, would change places with a very gouty, irritable old gentleman; or be willing to endure a grievous being of his own sort, with legs answering to the gout; much less if Cow were to grow old with him, and plague him with endless lowings, occasioned by the loss of her beauty, and the increasing insipidity of the hay. A human being who can survive those ulterior vaccinations must indeed possess some great reliefs of his own, and deserve them, and life may reasonably be a wonderfully precious thing in his eyes; nor shall excuse be wanting to the vaccinators, and what made them such, especially if they will but grow a little more quiet and ruminating. But who would have the death of some old, groaning, aching, effeminate, frightened, lingerer in life, such as Mæcenas for example, compared with a good, jolly knock-down blow, at a reasonable period, whether of hatchet or of apoplexy,—whether the bull's death or the butcher's? Our own preference, it is true, is for neither. We are for an excellent, healthy, happy life, of the very best sort; and a death to match it, going out calmly as a summer's evening. Our taste is not particular. But we are for the knock-down blow, rather than the death-in-life.

The butcher, when young, is famous for his health, strength, and vivacity, and for his riding any kind of horse down any sort of hill, with a tray before him, the reins for a whip, and no hat on his head. It was a gallant of this sort that Robin Hood imitated, when he beguiled the poor Sheriff into the forest, and shewed him his own deer to sell. The old ballads apostrophize him well as the "butcher so bold," or better—with the accent on the last syllable, "thou bold butcher." No syllable of his was to be trifled with. The butcher keeps up his health in middle life, not only with the food that seems so congenial to flesh, but with rising early in the morning, and going to market with his own or his master's cart. When more sedentary, and very jovial and good humoured, he is apt to expand into a most analogous state of fat and smoothness, with silken tones and a short breath,—harbingers, we fear, of asthma and gout; or the kindly apoplexy comes, and treats him as he treated the ox.

When rising in the world, he is indefatigable on Saturday nights, walking about in the front of those white-clothed and joint-abounding open shops, while the meat is being half-cooked beforehand with the gas-lights. The rapidity of his "What-d'ye-buy?" on these occasions is famous; and both he and the good housewives, distracted with the choice before them, pronounce the legs of veal "beautiful—exceedingly."

How he endures the meat against his head, as he carries it about on a tray, or how we endure that he should do it, or how he can handle the joints as he does with that habitual indifference, or with what floods of hot water he contrives to purify himself of the exoterical part of his philosophy on going to bed, we cannot say; but take him all in all, he is a fine specimen of the triumph of the general over the particular.

The only poet, that was the son of a butcher (and the trade may be proud of him) is Akenside, who naturally resorted to the 'Pleasures of Imagination.' As to Wolsey, we can never quite picture him to ourselves apart from the shop. He had the cardinal butcher's virtue of a love of good eating, as his picture shews; and he was foreman all his life to the butcher Henry the Eighth. We beg pardon of the trade for this application of their name; and exhort them to cut the cardinal, and stick to the poet.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

SINGULAR CHARACTER OF HENRY THE EIGHTH,
BY SIR RICHARD BAKER.

BEFORE giving this character, we will give some account of Sir Richard himself, who was a curiosity in his way. We found his Chronicle in the excellent circulating library of Mr Cawthorn, in Cockspur street.

SIR Richard Baker, says Granger, was the noted author of 'A Chronicle of the Kings of England,' a book formerly in great vogue; but which was ever more esteemed by readers of a lower class, than by such as had a critical knowledge of history.

The language of it was, in this reign (that of Charles the First), called polite; and it long maintained its reputation, especially among country gentlemen. Sir Richard's own encomium of his 'Chronicle,' in his preface to that work, is supposed to have recommended it to many of his readers. He says "that it is collected with so great care and diligence, that if all other of our chronicles were lost, this only would be sufficient to inform posterity of all passages memorable, or worthy to be known." The author seems to have been more studious to please than to inform; and, with that view, to have sacrificed even chronology to method. In 1658, Edward Phillips, nephew to Milton, published a third edition to this work, with the addition of the reign of Charles I. It has been several times reprinted since, and is now carried as low as the reign of George I. Sir Richard was also author of many books of divinity, and translated Malvezzi's 'Discourses on Tacitus,' and Balzac's 'Letters.' Most of his books were composed in the Fleet prison, into which he threw himself to avoid his creditors. He died in his confinement the 18th of February 1644-5.

Mr Daines Barrington, ('Observations on the Statutes') speaking of this history, observes, that "Baker is by no means so contemptible a writer as he is generally supposed to be; it is believed," says that author, "that the ridicule on this 'Chronicle' arises from its being part of the furniture of Sir Roger de Coverley's Hall."

What sort of a writer Baker was, the reader may judge for himself by the following extract. He has given a character just as preposterous of James the First, by whom he was knighted, and whom he represents as equally scholarly and warlike! ("tam Marti," says he, "quam Mercurio"). In short, Sir Richard appears to have been a man, either of little scruple in such matters, or wholly moved by a personal sense of his connexion with rank and authority. No such character would probably have been given of Henry the Eighth by his ancestor Sir John Baker, who was the only privy councillor that refused his assent to the royal will and testament, by which Mary and Elizabeth were excluded from the succession. There is a certain picturesque simplicity occasionally (probably not his own), in the midst of his ignorant and unscrupulous compilations, that makes him no unfit author in Sir Roger de Coverley's library; though Addison certainly intended him no compliment on any other score, by putting him there. The passage we here extract, however, is the less unworthy of curiosity, inasmuch as it will show in a very strong light the distinctions habitually entertained by our ancestors, with respect to the moral privileges of man and woman-kind; for Henry, who is here not only excused, but vindicated, for his treatment of his wives, was notoriously no observer of continence himself. Henry the Eighth has a right, of course, to every excuse from a philosophic historian, brought up as he was, and the inheritor of a power and wealth unknown to the crown till his time; but to allow every excuse to him, and none to his unfortunate wives (even if guilty) is no longer the sort of justice which will be meted out by the fellow-creatures of both. All the readers of Sir Richard's chronicle will now laugh at his one-sided and gratuitous absurdities.

"Hee (Henry the Eighth, says our once popular historian) was exceeding tall of stature, and very strong; fair of complexion, in his latter days corpulent and harley. Concerning his condition, he was a prince of so many good parts, that one would wonder he could have any ill; and, indeed, he had not many ill, till flattery and ill counsell in his latter time, got the upper hand of him. His cruelty to his wives may not only be excused, but defended; for if they were incontinent, he did but justice; if they were not so, yet it was sufficient to satisfy his conscience, that he thought he had cause to punish them so. And if the marriage bed be honourable in all, in princes it is sacred." (Then, why didn't he keep it so, himself?) "In suppressing of abbeyes, he shewed not little piety but great providence; but though they were excellent things, being rightly used, yet most pestilent, being abused; and then they were justly suppressed, when the abuse scarce possibly can be restrained. To think he suppressed abbeyes out of covetousness and desire of gain, it is to make him extremely deceived in his reckoning; for if we compare the point with the charge that followed, we shall find him certainly a great loser by the bargain. He was so farre from pride, that he was rather too Amable; at least he conversed with his subjects in a more familiar way than was usuall with princes." (As his very proud man could not do this, out of the sense of unsurpassable distance between them!) "So valiant, that his whole life almost, was nothing but exercise of the valour; and though performed amongst his friends in jest, yet they prepared him against his enemies in earnest, and they that durst be his enemies, found it. It may be said, the complexion of his government for the first twenty years, was sanguine and joviall; for the rest, cholerick and bloody; and it may be doubted, whether in the former, he were more prodigall of his own treasure, or in the latter of his subjects' blood; for as he spent more in fiction, than any other king did in realities; so in any distempers of his people, he had no other physick, but to open a vein! But we shall do him extreme wrong to think that all the blood shed in his time, was of his shedding; they were the bishops that were the Draco to make the bloody laws; the bishops that were the Phalaris, to put them in execution: the King oftentimes scarce knowing what was done. Certain it is, when a great lord put a gentlewoman the second time on the rack, the King hearing of it, exceedingly condemned him for such extreme cruelty. As for religion, though he brought it not to a full reformation; yet he gave it so great a beginning, that we may truly say of that he did—Dimidium plus toto (a half greater than the whole).

Sir Richard here undertakes to disprove the charge of incontinency against Henry, by telling us that he was married one month to Anne of Cleves, yet held her person sacred. The words are not such, but such is his meaning. Every body knows to what this sacredness amounted. He delicately exclaimed when he first beheld her, "They have brought me a Flanders mare!" and resolved from that moment not to live with her. Sir Richard then concludes his character as follows:—"But this is to make nosegays! I like better to leave every flower growing upon its stalk, that it may be gathered fresh, which will be done by reading the story of his life."

We take the early part of the work to be the best. The author got them out of the old English chroniclers, and deserves the thanks of the reader for retaining the truly personal portraits of the Henrys and Edwards, which Hume and other historians, out of an unphilosophical notion of the dignity of history, have too much neglected. Among other amusing particulars, we are startled, even for venerable antiquity's sake, to find, that Henry the Third, whose visual faculties were none of the best, was libellously designated by a man of that time, in language familiar to modern streets, as "a squint-eyed fool!"

FLOWERS IN CHURCHYARDS.

By the Author of 'Stray-Flowers.'

THE custom of planting flowers in churchyards is becoming more prevalent than it used to be; the idea that a churchyard should be a place wholly gloomy is fast fading away; and the yew trees, through which the wind "made lonely music," are being supplanted by the sweetness, and the delicacy, and the incense of flowers. Why should a churchyard be a place for nothing but sorrow? Why should it ever wear the hue and the aspect of sadness? There is quite enough of gloom in the world, without our adding unnecessarily to it.—But is not the memory of days departed, sweet? Do not the remembrances of friends we loved, come upon us in the hours of our tribulation and in the times of our suffering—like winter-flowers, more beautiful from the very desolation they enliven? Then why should not flowers, as emblems of memory, and of those we loved, blossom over the spot where their ashes repose? The 'Forget Me Not,' the magic of whose name is as sweet as it is powerful, is, by virtue of that very name, a churchyard flower; it will do for the grave of the old, or the young, the lover, the husband, the father or the son. There are other flowers, too, which might be made emblematical of the sleeper.—The daisy, and the butter-cup, the violet, and the primrose, might blossom over the grave of childhood, as memorials that the one beneath was cut down

"in the spring and playtime of the year" of life. And for girlhood we might have many types selected from the garden or the field—the lily graceful and beautiful, with its pure white petals, pure as the virgin heart beneath—and if consumption had laid her low, we might take the passion-flower as delicate in its conformation, and as short and as levelly in its existence.—And for manhood we might take the flowers of the more advanced summer; and for age the violet of autumn would be meet, "Wat wi the dew" of the September eve.—The aged are ever fond of the remembrances of their childhood, they all seem to wish to "die at home at last;" that is, near the spots of their earliest associations of thought, when they went out laughing children to gather "King cups in the meadow," or violets that grew in the shaded walk, by the churchyard-wall. There is something in nature so divine, that our love of her seems to look even beyond death.—How many times did a late friend of mine, whose soul was endued with the beauty of poetry, wish to be buried in the churchyard of a romantic village to which we used occasionally to stroll in the still evening time, to talk about poetry and poets. He had chosen the spot, because flowers, by some "hands unseen," had been there planted and nourished, and it was some consolation to him, even in the hour of mortal suffering, to think he should be laid among the beauties of nature that he loved with an ardent love—'tis thus that

"E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires.

Flowers, too, are fitting for church yards,—for they serve to remind us of a world where the flowers fade not away, where hope whispers to us we shall meet with those we loved now sleeping beneath.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LXXIV.—A MODERN BLUE-BEARD.

[FROM the memoirs of Madame de Genlis. The existence of such a monster, as is here described, would be incredible, were it not for the occasional appearance among us of "monsters" in other shapes, poisoners &c.; and being credible, it would be intolerable, did not the comforting and well-grounded reflection come to our aid, that such phenomena are, in fact, madmen; of which there can be no doubt. There is some defect in their organization, most likely physical as well as moral, which makes them a species of wild and inconsistent beast in a human shape.]

My vivacity and my rudeness (says Madame de Genlis, speaking of her childish days) were generally confined to the chamber-maids, or to one of our neighbours who came often to the château, and to whom I had conceived a violent aversion.

The personage so hated was a gentleman who was said to belong to the ancient house of Châlons, now long extinct; he styled himself M. de Châlons, and he was then upwards of thirty; though rich, he had always refused to marry, under pretext of being extremely devout; and he had such a reputation for piety, that he almost passed for a saint. His face was rather handsome, but he had a manner of looking at you from the corner of his eye, and by stealth, which first inspired me with an aversion to him. I remarked also that at church he made many pious contortions; and his uplifted eyes, and hands crossed on his breast, were not at all edifying to me. In short, I considered him a hypocrite, and the event proved him one of the most wicked monsters ever heard of; one who had committed many atrocious crimes, which were discovered in the following manner. Encouraged by the reputation he had usurped, he at last counted upon it too far; and heaven suffered him to be so blinded as to commit crimes which were sure to be discovered. Under the pretext of repairing his household linen, he brought from Autun a pretty young sempstress, whom he had seen in that town; he had detained her in his chateau about six weeks, after which she disappeared. He wrote to her mother that she had run off with a lover, and at the same time he begged her to send him the girl's youngest sister, a girl also extremely pretty, as the repairing of his linen, he said, was not yet finished. She was sent to him; in two months she disappeared also, and the monster wrote to the mother that she had followed the example of her sister, and had taken flight as she did. This time however, the unfortunate mother, enlightened by her despair, laid her complaint before the judge, who gave orders for a search throughout the house of M. de Châlons. The wretch, who had information of this, took flight, and was never afterwards heard of; but providence has surely overtaken him, and caused him to perish in his obscure hiding-place. An examination of his château took place; marks of blood ill-washed out were visible in one of his cabinets, there were deadly poisons found in a cupboard, and in the garden were several specimens of his last buried victims! The body of the first of the young girls was recognised by means of a ring of hair, with a motto, which he had left upon her finger!... Thus, my antipathy for the monster was completely justified by the sequel.

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the Royal Academy, Somerset House.

A few more pictures in the Great Room remain to be mentioned. 180, 'Welsh peasants crossing the sands to market,' W. Collins, is rather heavily coloured; but hearty and genuine. 184, 'On the Dee, North Wales,' T. Creswick, refreshes one in the heat of the exhibition room, with its cool leaves and water. 186, 'The principal gaut at Hardwarde,' W. Daniell, R.A., is interesting for the sake of the scene. 'Wars' Alarms,' A. Fraser, an anticipative little hero, in a round jacket, with trumpet and drum, terrifying his sister, is well coloured, and no more. The School of Painting is headed by a 'Portrait of her Most Faithful Majesty, Donna Maria the Second, Queen of Portugal,' (204), by J. Simpson. As a painting it is rather flat and dry; as to the subject, it is quite otherwise; her Most Faithful Majesty does good credit to Portuguese living, seeming to acquire additional portliness with her added years; meagre days obviously harm her not, nor does she look wasted with over-much anxiety and trouble. 209, 'Tom Jones,'—not the sprightly master of Partridge, the lover of Sophia Western, but a highly respectable and sober-looking dray-horse,—is the best bit of painting contributed by A. Cooper this year. The sleekness of the skin, the velvety surface of the snout, the compact, but powerful limbs, are excellently given. 220, 'Vigilance,' H. Wyatt,—very charmingly painted; the still sleep of the lovely girl bending over her arm, and the bright eyes of the little spaniel, watching so faithfully over his unconscious mistress, made us feel quite apologetic towards both, for our fixed stare at them. 226, 'A Ferry on the river Ninfa, Sermoleta in the distance, a scene in the Pontine Marshes near Rome,' P. Williams, though quaintly coloured in parts, is a rich and true effect of colour and evening light; the boatman is really fine. 227, 'Wood-cutting,' F. R. Lee, is a rural and a pleasing scene, well painted. 235, 'The Bridge of Sighs, Venice,' W. Etty, R.A., a bold and beautiful piece of colouring; the deep blue sky, the stone walls, that solitary little star, the dark, deep-walled canal, all are solitary and sepulchral, and painted with a true feeling for the scene itself, and its solemn associations. 234, 'Line fishing, off Hastings,' J. M. W. Turner, R.A.;—a powerful painting, as to the foreground; but flimsy and fantastic in the colouring of the farther parts of the picture. 241, 'The Embarkation,' by J. J. Chalon, is very sprightly and fine, but flimsy and over-dressed. 242, 'Scene in the Sunderbunds, Bengal,' W. Daniell, R.A.; a cool and silent water, overhung by trees heavy with excess of growth, a dragging robe of leaves; the deep shade and motionless repose give one an idea of a corner, cool, and sequestered from a burning sun. 243, 'The Circling Hours,' 244, 'Pandora,' and 245, 'Night with the Pleiades,' H. Howard.—"The above three pictures are intended for compartments in a ceiling in Sir John Soane's museum."—The 'Pandora' is not very original, but all are fanciful and pleasing. We prefer the 'Night and the Pleiades'; it is not so grand as the subject might demand, nor indeed grand at all; but it is the most original, and tells its meaning best. 261, 'The Boy's Song of Love, Bay of Naples,'—a charming rich bit of colour. 267, 'Cranmer reynoking his recantation at Oxford,' a picture crammed with interesting portraits. It is full of excitement, and tells its story; but there is a pervading want of power, both in the execution and the design. 270, 'The Chivalric Vow of the Ladies and the Peacock,'

M'Clise, is a magnificent assemblage of courtly shows; but we cannot admire it as a painting; the figures are stiff and flat, and hard in the outline; the chiaro-scuro is very defective, so that there is no keeping in the distance; the drawing is weak; and finally, however distinguished the original of the principal figure may be, in modern fashionable society, and however handsome, his appearance is by no means the beau-ideal of the chivalric; he might have served for the Alfonso of Fortiguerra; but Alfonso, though a brave and loyal knight, is not the type of chivalrous potency and exaltedness. The present picture seems to us quite unworthy of the painter of 'All Halloween.' 277, 'Meditation,' H. Wyatt;—a very graceful portrait. 278, 'Christ Walking on the Sea,' R. Westall, R.A., possesses one characteristic of the grand, it is simple; but meagre; it is broadly painted, but the figures look feeble; the effect is solemn, the expression weak and undecided. 283, 'Festa della Madonna dell' Arco,' T. Uwins, A., a glowing Neapolitan scene, very finely coloured. That head in the middle with the vine leaves, is glorious,—and so is the yellow dress. Uwins makes us like colour simply for its own sake. 294, 'The Burning of the Houses of Lords and Commons,' J. M. W. Turner, R.A., is a splendid show of red and yellow, and blue, in very fine contrast; a fine "flare-up" as it is termed by those connoisseurs in imaginative metaphor, the slang-speakers; but there is no keeping in the picture, no plain truth; it does not come to the point. 299, 'Portrait of the late Edward Irving, Esq.' D. Wilkie, R.A. The Irving before us is a small-featured, acute, lively, lawyer-like sort of personage; but the Edward Irving whom we recollect, was large, serious, inward-thinking, wild-featured, a man like the prophets of old. The picture is well painted, but does not represent its subject. 203, 'Favourites, the property of his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge,' E. Landseer, R.A.; a white horse, and a couple of dogs, one of them holding a whip in his mouth, apparently waiting for their master. Not much of a subject; but out of these simple materials has Landseer constructed a fine painting. Look at the sensitive face of the smaller dog; the ample coat, the powerful limbs, and mild countenance of the other; have you not, Reader, seen such faces before, and wondered what might be the range of thought and sympathy in the living spirit within, beyond what we can know or guess at? How full is the firm and solid flesh of the well-conditioned horse, how living his eye, how soft and mobile his "innocent smile." 304, 'The citadel of Agra, &c.' W. Daniell, R.A. is a curious scene, and interesting, but heavily painted, and singularly low-toned. 310, 'Phædria and Cymochles on the Idle Lake,' W. Etty, R.A. A picture to which we have before alluded, like all by that artist, contains much that is objectionable, but, this one, much more that is very beautiful. Some strange muddy spots in the back ground, a peculiar blackness in some of the shadows, and a degree of license in the treatment of the subject, are the chief defects of the picture. The bright flesh of the woman, soft, terse, fair, and white, but warm, and transparent, is a triumph of colour. The sportiveness of Phædria, her vivacity, has not been caught, perhaps not attempted, and the little Cupid is introduced in very questionable taste; part of Phædria's character, is her uniqueness and solitariness; she sits, and glides, and laughs alone; surely Mr Etty does not consider the little god as a nobody. The flowers, and the boat, which the artist has made to be of mother-of-pearl, are most admirable; the boat is a perfect wonder of brilliant, varied, and true colour. 326, 'A scene from the comedy of the Honey Moon,' G. Clint, A. is very well painted; particularly the girls hint.

There is not much in 342, 'Shakspeare reading one of his plays to Queen Elizabeth,' and the drawing is more defective than we should have expected from Mr Wood. 354, 'Portrait of a Lady,' H. Sass,—not a favorable specimen of what the artist can do; but Mr Sass has rested his fame rather upon his teaching, to which he has devoted all his life, and all his remarkable energy, and is now without a rival. Acuteness of eye, ready comprehension of character, encouraging manners, familiarity with technicalities and unflinching patience are the requisites for a teacher; and in Mr Sass, they are joined to the most enthusiastic love of the art, and a universal kindness and intense interest in his pupils. 359, 'The Cathedral of Burgos,' D. Roberts, is a fine building, and very vigorously painted; but it is scarcely so solid as Roberts generally paints. 363, 'On the coast of Normandy,' C. Stanfield, R. A. elect, not one of Stanfield's best; but in parts extremely beautiful—as the water in the foreground, which is wonderfully fresh and salient. 387, 'The Bride of Lammermuir,' H. Montague. The unfortunate victim of parental tyranny, has just murdered her ill-fated and ill-assorted Bridegroom, and is crouching, crazed and gibbering, in the chimney corner. The subject is an awful one, and the design falls no way short of the subject; the face of the girl is a fearful mixture of beauty, feminine gentleness, fierce madness, and horror. 395, 'King Richard the First of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, and the Soldan Saladin,' S. A. Hart. A very showy picture, possessing a good deal of interest, but overcharged in the action, and not quite true we think in the expression; the view taken of the subject is insartificial. Richard is vulgar, neither kingly, nor knightly in his bearing; Saladin is wanting in life and elevation of character. 416, 'Tam O'Shanter,' J. P. Knight,—the jolly party carousing previous to Tam's departure. The characters are decidedly and spiritedly portrayed, and the effect of fire-light is excellent;—the illusion is complete.

Besides the pictures, there are in the rooms up stairs, many portraits, which our limits forbid our more than generally alluding to, but which will interest all who care to see the faces of those they hear talked of;—portraits of public characters, male and female, literary, scientific, political, and so forth.

To be concluded next week.

NO. II.—CHAUCER, (CONTINUED).

SEVERAL of Chaucer's best poems are translations from the Italian and French, but of so exquisite a kind, so improved in character, so enlivened with fresh natural touches and freed from comparative superfluity (in some instances, freed from all superfluity) that they justly take the rank of originals. We are sorry that we have not the poem of Boccaccio by us, from which he took the 'Knight's Tale,' containing the passages that follow,—in order that we might prove this to the reader; but it is lucky perhaps in other respects, for it would have led us beyond our limits; and all that we profess in these extracts, is to give just so many passages of an author as shall suffice for evidence of his various characteristics. We take, from his garden, specimens of the flowers for which he is eminent, and send them before the public as in a horticultural show. To see them in their due juxtaposition and abundance, we must refer to the gardens themselves; to which it is of course one of our objects to tempt the beholder ultimately.

PHYSICAL LIFE AND MOVEMENT.

A young Knight going a-Maying.

Compare the saliency, and freshness, and natural language of the following description of Arcite going a-Maying, with the more artificial version of the passage in Dryden. Sir Walter Scott says of it, that the modern poet must yield to the ancient, in spite of "the beauty of his versification." But with all due respect to Sir Walter, here is the versification itself, as superior in its impulsive melody, even to Dryden's, as a thoroughly unaffected beauty is to a beauty half spent.

The busy lark, the messenger of day,
Saluteh in her song the morrow grey.

• Saluteh.

And fiery Phœbus riseth up so bright,
That all the orient laugheth of the sight,
And with his streamés drieth, in the grévés (1)

Is ridden to the fieldés, him to play,
Out of the court, were it a mile or tway;

[These are the mixtures of the particular with the general, by which natural poets come home to us.]

And to the grove, of which that I you told,

To make him a garland of the grévés,
Were it of woodbind, or of hawthorn leavés,
And loud he sang against the sunny shéen; (4)

Right welcome be thou, fairé freshé May:

"For thee, sweet month, the groves green kiveries wear!" &c.]

PORTRAITS OF TWO WARRIOR KINGS.

There mayst thou see, coming with Palamon,
Licurge himself, the greaté King of Thrace,
Black was his beard, and manly was his face;

[Here is Dryden's and Pope's turn of line anticipated under its noblest form.]

The circle of his eyen in his head
They gloweden betwixen yellow and red,
And like a griffon looked he about,
With combéd hairés on his browés stout;

[That is to say, a forehead of the simplest, potent appearance, with no pains taken to set it out.]

His limbés great his brawnés hard and strong;
His shoulders broad, his armés round and long;
And as the guisé was in his countrée,
Full high upon a car of gold stood he,
With fouré whité bullés in the trace
Instead of coat armóur on his harnáce, (5)
With nailés yellow, and bright as any gold,
He had a bear's skin, cole-black for old.
His longé hair was comb'd behind his back
As any raven's feather it shone for black.
A wreath of gold arm-great, of hugé weight,
Upon his head sate full of stonés bright,
Of fine rubies and of diámonds.
About his ear there wenten white alauns (6)
Twenty and more, as great as any steer,
To huntén at the lion or the deer,
And followed him, with muzzle fast ybound,
Collar'd with gold, and tourettes (7) filéd round.
A hundred lordés had he in his rout
Armed full well with heartés stern and stout.
With Arcite, in stories as men find,
The great Emétrius, the King of Ind,
Upon a steedé bay, trapped in steel,
Cover'd with cloth of gold diápréd wele,
Came riding like the god of armés, Mars;

[There's a noble line, with the monosyllable for a climax!]

His coat-armóur was of a cloth of Tars;
Couchéd (8) with pearlés white and round and great;

His crispéd hair like ringés was y-run,
And that was yellow, and glittéréd as the sun;
His nose was high, his eyen bright citrine, (9)
His liprés round, his colour was sanguine,
A few frackness (10) in his face ysprent, (11)
Betwixen yellow and black somdeál yment (12)
And as a lion he is looking cast.

HAPPY MARRIAGES.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

MY DEAR SIR,—One of your delightful Journal's greatest charms, is, that it teaches us to look on the bright, the poetic side of life; and to be grateful that it offers us so many sun-shiny prospects. "There is a story in one of Zitter's Letters to Youth," says the writer of the eloquent defence of Coleridge, against the accusations of 'The Opium Eater,'* "of two of Frederick's guards, one of whom said to the other, as the king went by—'Look what a bad hat the king has on!' 'Stupid dog!' cried the other, 'look what a head he has!' These speeches," the writer continues, "are typical of the two classes of mankind." Your Correspondent in his letter, in No. 58—not only considers happy marriages as events of rarest occurrence, but also that unhappy ones are the universal misery. I am not one who can see a married pair "get on pretty well together," as the phrase runs, (which means, with extremely well-bred indifference) and call them 'happy'; and yet I venture to hope that you will agree with me, when I say, that earth would be "a vale of tears" indeed, despite all its gorgeous colouring, if there were not very many blessedly happy marriages in it—though, your Correspondent will pardon my saying, it would be difficult to imagine their happiness founded on his philosophy of opposite qualities. Nature has formed man and woman essentially different characters, and though

"was the nobler birth,

For we from man were made—man but of earth,
The son of dust!"—

I cannot admit either of inferiority or superiority but if less of

"The original clay of coarse mortality Harden and flaws around" us, than man,—if woman is the more refined creature, it may be owing to her "nobler birth." But it is in man that genius loves to immortalise her incomprehensible powers, and all her wonderful gifts are lavished on him. Woman hovers very sweetly over the "shine and shade" of our beautiful world, but man only can soar to heaven and fetch from thence the heavenly fire that woman worships. Philosophers have censured our indiscriminate admiration of the bravery of "Captain Sword;" and we grant that the mere soldier's bravery, if it include no better species of valour—no loftier moral courage—ought not to be ranked much above a fine animal instinct. We do indeed give it all the admiration it deserves, and,

perhaps, a little more; first, because it is our nature's opposite; and secondly, because we are generous: (I know you love a little frankness), but no woman, who has two ideas in her head, is content even with a lion's valour, unless there be joined to it the man's heart. And moral courage is part of the wisdom of the heart. I will make no remark on that different, and peculiarly feminine mental courage, which is woman's fairest attribute; for, methinks, you already smile at my eagerness to prove what few would disallow, that nature has kindly bestowed on man and his help-meet so ample a dower of opposites, that they are in no danger of falling victims to the dulness of monotony: but Nature's opposites, when conducted wisely, all blend together into harmony; while the artificial unlikenesses of habits, pursuits, &c., would, almost unavoidably produce discord, even if they could exist with true love.

When I have next the pleasure of being in company with a phrenologist, I will beg the favour to be informed whether the organ of devotion (of veneration,
I believe I should say) is not strikingly developed in woman; for she can love her God with all her heart, yet prays

—"to be forgiven for the sin
Of loving aught on earth with such a love,"

as overflows the same heart for that being, whom, next to her God, she "looks up to;"—for this is the very essence of woman's love. Surely then, with such feelings, she would unconsciously abandon her former pursuits, tastes, and habits, for his—nay, her very thoughts and opinions would be apt to receive from his, new impressions.

You have given us a very beautiful story, in No.
56, of "true love." Will you accept a pendant to it, that will defend me from the charge of being a theorist:—But your story is of true love before marriage—mine is, of true, and, thank God, living wedded love.

While I was staying with my sister and her husband, some few years ago, I spent the greatest part of a day from their happy home. On my return, when all the children were put to bed, my sister and I sat ourselves to talk over, as sisters are wont, 'the hours of absence—and I had an incident to relate, which we examined minutely; trying it by all the severe tests of ifs and buts—and we ended by assuring each other, that our opinions entirely coincided.
My brother-in-law had been dining out, and, though he returned late, my little story was told and discussed anew, and his opinion was directly opposite to my sister's and mine. To this moment I think he was mistaken—but my sweet sister turned her bright and loving smile from her husband's face to me, saying, in the softest tone of gentle decision, "Well, after all, I'm sure P—must be right." I threw my arms round her neck, exclaiming—"Delightful!"
and ran off to bed.

We hear of the unhappy marriages; but the sound of the multitude of happy ones seldom passes beyond their own atmosphere of bliss.

FEMINA.

* * This letter (of which, with a horrible self-denial, we have been obliged to leave out a passage, engraved in our heart) is worth a hundred ordinary disquisitions on some of the questions agitated respecting marriage, and the relative claims of the sexes. That there will be great improvements in all the conditions of society, as knowledge and justice advance together, we doubt not; and that in the mean time, marriages are too often unhappy, will be denied by no one. But as our fair Correspondent says, it is in the nature of unhappy marriages to make a noise and be heard of, while the happy ones are less known, by reason of their very quiet. The charming sisterly anecdote, so honourable to all parties,—with the running off to bed, and the father of several children still so implicitly beloved—is like a scene in Wycherly or Congreve, with innocence added to the gaiety.—En.

TABLE TALK.

SPECIMEN OF THE FAMOUS SOCRATIC MODE OF PUZZLING A DISPUTANT.

In the latter, he attacks the fastness of pagan priestcraft; and reduces Euthyphron, who maintains that there are duties peculiarly due to the gods, and who is engaged on this principle in the prosecution of his own father for a murder, to a nonplus. The toil is thus artfully spread. Euthyphron, on Socrates' pretended wish for information, lays down, that what is pleasing to the gods is sacred, what is otherwise, profane: a position he is obliged to abandon on considering the acknowledged difference of sentiment among the gods: when he adopts, at Socrates' suggestion, the amendment, that what is pleasing to all the gods is sacred, what is displeasing to all pro-fame, and the not indifferent. On which, Socrates, who has apparently gained little advantage in this first round, but the credit of giving his antagonist a fall and setting him on his legs again, proceeds to involve him in perplexity in this way. As when any thing acts or suffers, it is active and passive because it acts and suffers, and does not act and suffer because it is active and passive; so when anything pleases, it is pleasing because it pleases, and does not please because it is pleasing; but that which is sacred confessedly pleases the gods, because it is sacred, and is not sacred because it pleases the gods; therefore, that which pleases the gods cannot be sacred, nor that which is sacred pleasing to the gods, the one being pleasing because it pleases, while the other pleases because it is pleasing:—an entangling subtlety, which can hardly be exhibited but in Greek; and which we might wish, perhaps, with Johnson, not difficult merely, but impossible of exhibition in any language. Socrates then leads Euthyphron to assert or to allow, that sanctity is a part of duty; that it is that part which relates to the service of the gods; that it consists in rightly giving and rightly taking: and that it may be regarded consequently as a sort of commerce between heaven and earth. But in commerce, what is useful is given for what is useful. Do we give for their favours what is useful to the gods? Euthyphron, with a sort of pious horror, instantly rejects this idea, and says,—not what is useful, but what is agreeable. He is then brought round to the point from whence they started, since what is agreeable is synonymous to what is pleasing: and, feigning an awkward excuse, abruptly breaks up the conference. There is in all this, surely, much solemn trifling—a childish attempt to puzzle and confound, by considerations entirely foreign from the merits of the question; and the best apology for Socrates, if justly reported on this occasion by Plato, is, that he fought the sophists with their own weapons, and endeavoured, in a good cause, to—win his way by yielding to the tide.—Diary of a Lover of Literature.

FOOD FOR REFLECTION.

"All individuals have but a certain portion of love in their composition, and it is a pity to exhaust it at once. Who are the persons with whom we remain on good terms to our old age?—why those whom we never cared about."—"What a selfish idea!" exclaimed Madame de Merveur.—"I am only speaking the truth, which, to be sure, I might have put into finer words. Had I talked of inconstancy, the misery of unreciprocated feelings, of love enduring as love never yet endured, both yourself and Signora Carrara would have been equally charmed and touched. Ay, ay, merge the selfishness in the sentiment, and it will be sure to take; people will be so thankful to you for a decent excuse."—"Have you, then, no belief," asked Madame de Merveur, "in disinterested and lasting attachment?"—"Passe pour cela," exclaimed the chevalier, "I will not answer for all the vain beliefs that may have passed through that receptacle of confusion the human mind; but this I will say, that the causes of inconstancy are much misunderstood. It is commonly said, that love never lasts. Now, that is not so much from change or that it exhausts itself, as that it is mixed up with the paltry cares and daily interests of life; thus losing its ideality, which constitutes its great charm. Two lovers begin by reading poetry, and end by casting up bills together. The reason why an unfortunate attachment outlasts the one more happy, is that it is less confounded with the commonplace of existence."—"I must say," cried the Duc de Merveur, "you are the very last person I should have suspected of subtilising on sentiment."—"Ah!" replied De Joinville, "the truth is, that nobody knows anything about anybody. Our nearest and dearest friends have a thousand thoughts and feelings which we have never even suspected. We look in them only for what reflects our own. Our very sympathy is egotism."—"Nay," said Francesca, "there is nothing which appears to me so exaggerated as the common exclamations about the selfishness of human nature. We are a great deal better than we make ourselves out to be."—"If Mademoiselle Carrara speaks from her own personal experience, I, for one, will not contradict her."—"Nay," answered she, "I will not be complimented out of my position; mine was a general position. Kind and generous impulses are rife in our nature. Look at the pity which springs, spontaneously, at the sight of affliction—witness the admiration, so ready, to welcome any great action; and call to mind the thousand slight acts of kindness almost unmarked, because of such daily occurrence."—"I felicitate you, on your experience," said the Chevalier, rising, "and will now depart, and, at least, try to preserve so grateful an impression."—"True enough was the Chevalier's assertion, that we know but little of even our most intimate friends—and yet this does not originate from want of sympathy; it is rather owing to the extreme sensitiveness of all our more imaginative feelings. How many emotions are in every heart, which we never dream of communicating! They are too fine, too fragile, for expression, like those delicate hues on the atmosphere, which never yet could painter embody. Moreover, there is an odd sort of satisfaction which we take in making ourselves other than we are. This is a species of deception which defies analysis and is yet universally practised. Some make themselves out better, some worse, than they really are, but none give themselves their exact likeness. Perhaps it is, that the ideal faculty is so strongly developed in us, that we cannot help exercising it, even upon the reality of ourselves.—Francesca Carrara.

MILTON'S EGOTISM.

In the 'Paradise Lost'—indeed in every one of his poems—it is Milton himself whom you see; his Satan, his Adam, his Raphael, almost his Eve—are all John Milton; and it is a sense of this intense egotism that gives me the greatest pleasure in reading Milton's works. The egotism of such a man is a revelation of spirit.—Coleridge's Table Talk.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We do not know whether to be most delighted with the letter of our warm-hearted Correspondent of Croydon, or most to regret that she should take a different view from our own, of any matter. But we fear the selfish part of the dilemma predominates; and that we are so pleased, we cannot be generous enough to feel the becoming amount of sorrow.

The American vessel, so obligingly alluded to by our fair friend of "Auld Lang Syne," conveyed kindred of the person in question, but not the person himself.

Various Correspondents will oblige us by looking at the last number of our Journal but one.

THE PRINTING MACHINE.

LIFE OF KEAN.

The Life of Edmund Kean. 2 vols. post 8vo. pp. 260 and 280. London. Moxon. 1835.

NATURALLY connected, and in some sort dependent upon each other as the two often are, how different in all things are the positions of a great author [and a great actor! Take the case in which each fills while alive a large space in the public eye. Yet, whatever may be an author's popularity in his lifetime, and even the influence which he exercises over his fellow-men, his true fame and dominion begin only after his death, and lie in that boundless future which he may not behold, save with the eye of hope or prophetic anticipation. Being dead, he yet liveth in his immortal books; and no comparison can be drawn between that unripe and every way limited power which he wields, even in the most favourable cases, for some dozen or score of years over a portion of his contemporaries, and the universal empire which becomes his inheritance after the consenting voices of successive generations have ratified his claims, and the world looks up to him as one of its fixed and permanent lights as naturally and believingly as it does to the stars in the firmament of heaven. To the actor there is no future. Remembered he may be, and, if great enough, will be, long after his death; but of his power over the minds and hearts of men he will not, and cannot, retain one particle, let him have been as great as you choose. His life is merely in the breath of his nostrils;—he is the man of his own times, and no more.

There is one way, however, in which persons eminent only during their lives may bequeath something of themselves to posterity; and in that they have often the advantage over those whose chief eminence comes after death. As men exclusively of the present, it will generally happen that they have played a more bustling and conspicuous part within that narrow circle, than the others, whose more real existence is in the time to come. Their personal history, therefore, will often be more varied and striking,—more interesting, and even more instructive;—and that they may leave behind them. It may be written and given to the world, we mean, either by themselves or others. In this way the name which is now nothing but a name, may be made at least "to point a moral or adorn a tale"—the proper duty in such cases made and provided.

Among lives of this sort, the lives of actors are apt to be not the least curious. The world in which they professionally move is, to be sure, a sufficiently circumscribed one, and so peculiar withal, that it has scarcely any attraction at all for the more catholic, which are also the deepest and most intense, of our human sympathies; but this is of little consequence. Biography is interesting not for the events of extensive importance with which the career of the hero may be connected—such things, extinguishing the individual in the act and its consequences, make rather the interest of history—but for what he is in himself, and for what he does and suffers that affects only his own fortunes or displays his own character. Let the narrative be only rich in incidents and manifestations of the latter kind, and we are satisfied. Give us strength of mind, or of passion, earnestness in the pursuit of any object, and something in adventure out of the common straight and level rail-road of existence, and we are sure to be carried along, up hill and down dale, with the subject of the story, be he who or what he may. Now, whatever else there may be either not in players which we like, or in them which we do not like, they usually have at least enthusiasm in abundance, and their dance through life is often fantastic to the wildest degree. Accustomed as they are to represent or mimic all sorts of fictitious wonders, they would seem to have a right to live more poetically or dramatically than other people, and to encounter more plentifully in their eccentric course those realities which are even stranger than fiction.

We have not for a long time met with a book that has absorbed us more completely than this 'Life of Kean.' It is the production of Mr Procter (better known by his poetical name of Barry Cornwall) and its literary merits, of course, are in many respects of a very superior order. The narrative, for the most part, is admirably well given, in a style equally forcible and easy; and the criticism is just and eloquent; though we think the author might have omitted the dissertations on the Shakspearian characters in the second volume, which will be the less desired in proportion to the interest Mr Procter has excited in his story. What we regret more however is, that our author should have thought it necessary to elevate himself so much above his subject. The tone which prevails throughout the work of something not certainly amounting to contempt on the part of the author for his subject, but yet of indifference towards it, or, as we have already said, of superiority to it, is not agreeable. We suppose, for one thing, it offends our self-love that a writer should affect himself to despise, or at least not to care for, what he nevertheless evidently expects that we, his readers, shall take an interest in, and what in fact we feel does interest us a great deal.

attainable Swansea! The cold boiled leg of mutton and cider which they that evening ate down before, in the boat-house, and ate with an appetite surpassed only by those who were shut up in the Tower of Famine, existed like a splendid and happy vision in their memories for more than twenty years.

"We have extended the account of this journey somewhat beyond what we originally intended, in order that 'all young readers' (as good Mr Newberry's books say—or used to say) may see how one of the high and crowned kings of tragedy was accustomed to travel: before they resolve irrevocably to enrol themselves under those ragged and tawdry colours which float above the English Drama—a sign and prophecy of the player's fortunes!"

Kean's first child, a boy, to whom he gave the name of Howard, was born at Swansea, on the 13th of September 1809. About two years after, his second son, the present Mr Charles Kean, was born at Waterford. By this time the habits of the husband and father seem to have become those of a confirmed drunkard; the friends which he made by his talents he constantly lost by his misconduct; and the misery of the wretched family was now greater than ever.

"It is needless (proceeds our author) to repeat the every-day wants and troubles which the poor actor and his family, day after day, encountered in this and other peregrinations. Their long journeys, in all weathers,—their arrivals, weary and foot-sore, at the squalid public-houses where they put up,—their scanty meals,—their visits to the pawnbroker and the Jew,—their hopeless appeals to the public taste,—the cries of the children (from fatigue or want of food),—the tears of the woman, and the curses of the man,—all these, fifty times repeated, would make but an unprofitable and tedious history. We content ourselves with giving a few facts, illustrative of our hero's forlorn condition; without exhibiting, at every turn, the poverty and wretchedness of his course. At York, as we have said, he arrived, utterly destitute. So extreme was his need, that he wished to enlist as a common soldier, and actually presented himself, for that purpose, to an officer attached to a regiment at York, who very good-naturedly dissuaded him from his design. He was, perhaps, as desperate of attaining the objects of his ambition, at this particular time, as at any period of his chequered life. And with his despair, his wife's despondency naturally kept pace. She saw no hope of extricating her infants from the load of misery and want which oppressed them. More than once, she has knelt down by the side of her bed, in which the two half-famished children lay, and prayed that they and herself might at once be released from their sufferings. Happily, they were relieved by the intervention of a friend. The wife of a Mr Nokes (then a dancing-master at York), heard of their extreme distress, and went with a heart brimful of benevolence to their aid. She was shown up to the room where Mrs Kean and the children were, and after having ascertained the truth of the report concerning their condition, she spoke kindly to them all, put something in Mrs Kean's hand, wished her good morning, and left the house. On her departure, Mrs Kean opened the paper which this excellent woman had left, and discovered that she had given her a five pound bank note! She threw herself on her knees, and fainted. They had been rescued from absolute starvation."

At last, in the summer of 1813, while Kean was sitting at Teignmouth, he attracted the notice of Dr Drury (formerly head-master of Harrow) and this eventually led to his introduction to the committee of management at Drury Lane. But some of the hardest sufferings of his life had still to be undergone on the very eve of his triumphant conquest of fame and fortune. So poor was he at this time, that having sent forward his wife and their eldest child, who was ill, in the coach, from Barnstable to Dorchester, on their way to London, he was himself obliged to follow on foot with the youngest on his back. At Dorchester he sustained a terrible blow by the death of the poor little boy Howard, who seems to have been a child of much promise, and was the pride and darling of his father. And then when he at last found himself in London, a misunderstanding with the authorities at Drury Lane suddenly dashed the cup of hope to the ground, while he had it at his lips. The negotiation which had been begun was broken off, and he was left, without an engagement, to starve. After giving a long letter, which he wrote to Dr Drury, detailing the usage he had met with, the author proceeds:—

"From the 6th of November 1813, to the 26th of January, 1814, Kean remained at his lodgings,

No. 21 Cecil street, in the Strand, in much the same state of commotion that he appears to have been in at the time of writing the foregoing letter. During this period, he did not receive a single shilling from the theatre (except the sum of 8*l.* before alluded to, which was sent to Dorchester), and he neither earned nor borrowed money from any other quarter. He lived—he, his wife, and child—in the most penurious way; sometimes disposing of a few clothes; sometimes, and not unfrequently, being indebted for their food to the untiring kindness of the Misses Williams, with whom they lodged; and occasionally undergoing a course of starvation. They had meat once a week, if possible; but their aliment was generally of the poorest sort, and taken in the slenderest quantities. The necessity of supporting the child as tenderly as might be, doubled their difficulties; and something of that pride "which flesh is heir to," prevented their acknowledging the extremity of their distress to their excellent hostesses. These ladies, with a generous delicacy, forbore to ask them for any rent during the first three months of their residence in London, and even resorted to expedients to furnish them with a meal, now and then, when the desperate condition of the poor players became too manifest for concealment. When Mrs Kean apologised for the rent being still unpaid, Miss Williams (instead of adopting the landlord's usual remedy, and ejecting her debtors promptly into the street) cheered her up; told her that they could wait; and prophesied, good-naturedly as to the future renown and prosperity of her husband. 'There is something about Mr Kean, Ma'am,' said she, 'which tells us he will be a great man.'

At last, the state of affairs at Drury constantly getting worse, induced the Committee to turn their attention once more to Kean. The result was that he was announced for the part of Shylock, on Wednesday the 26th of January 1814. We wish we had room to quote our author's animated and cordial account of the public events of that night, so celebrated in the annals of the stage. We must content ourselves with giving a part of its still more interesting domestic history. That day Kean had had, what he had not always, a dinner. "His courage," says our author, "was to be braced, and his voice strengthened, by a little generous diet. Accordingly, his wife produced before him, (by the usual alchemy, we suppose, some rapid conversion of velvet or satin into silver,) a beef-steak and a pot of porter." On this he dined heartily. "After dinner," the narrative goes on, "Kean prepared for the awful evening. His stock of 'properties' was very scanty. He tied up his wig and collar, however, and an old pair of black silk stockings, in a pocket-handkerchief, thrust them into his great-coat pocket, and trudged through the snow to Drury Lane." During the hours of performance Mrs Kean had remained waiting the result at home.

"It may be imagined," proceeds the author, "how much anxiety must have prevailed, when not only the fame of her husband, but the very existence of himself and family hung on the event. For, to be damned in London is to be damned in the country; and the actor who once earned his humble crust in the provinces, whilst satiated at the fastidious bar of the metropolis, is by no means sure of regaining his old position, if, on being tried, he should be found wanting. The hours, therefore, passed gloomily enough. At last, about half-past ten o'clock, the Misses Williams, also Mr Hewan and Mr Watts (two artists who lodged in the house), returned. "The first comer was Mr Hewan, in reply to whose knock, Mrs Kean ran down to the door, and, in breathless haste, demanded to know their fate."

The announcements of Mr Hewan and Mr Watts were all that could be desired; but we must pass them over.

"Next followed the Misses Williams, exulting in the accomplishment of their prophecies; and, finally, about eleven o'clock, arrived the hero of the night himself. He ran up stairs, wild with joy, and cried out, 'Oh, Mary! my fortune's made: now you shall ride in your carriage.' A mighty change had been wrought in a brief period. Four or five hours before, he said, on quitting the house, that he wished he was going to be shot. Now, all the gloom of the morning dissipated and forgotten, he seemed to tread on air. He told his wife, indeed, that when he found the audience 'going with him,' he was inspired and exalted to such a degree, that 'he could not feel the stage under him.' His sensations had now sunk a little,—almost to a rational level. In order, however, that everyone might be a partaker of the new happiness, even the child (the present Mr Charles Kean) was taken out of his cradle and kissed by his father, who said, 'Now, my boy, ye shall go to Eton.' Kean had always been ambitious that his son should have an aristocratic education and the project seemed now no longer improbable. During the remainder of the night, and, indeed, until four o'clock in the morning, Kean and his wife sat together, congratulating each other on their good fortune; he talking of what he would do, what he would play next, and forming schemes of all sorts for the future. Once, indeed, his mind was touched with a melancholy recollection; for he said, 'Oh! that Howard was alive now!—but he is better where he is.' With this exception there was nothing to cast a shade over his golden dreams."

During the remainder of this season Kean appeared in Richard III, in Hamlet, and in Othello—and, by his wonderful success, brought a gain to the treasury of the theatre of not less than twenty thousand pounds. For his happiness, as well as for his glory, he ought to have died now. The latter part of his history is only a sad and sickening tale of blackguardism, disgrace, and ruin. The evil of his nature seems at this period to have completely overpowered and extinguished whatever was good in him. Such an utter abandonment to brutality and selfishness is scarcely on record; though the philosophic reader will set off against it the frightful disadvantages, in a moral point of view, of a poor, fatherless, half-owned, vagabond childhood. For the partisans, we must send our readers to the work itself, from which we have already extracted much more largely than with our limited space we should be excused in doing, except in the case of a publication of unusual interest.

LORD BROUGHAM ON NATURAL THEOLOGY.

[Concluded from No. 62.]

We now proceed to place before our readers a few more extracts from this interesting work. The very powerful chapter in which Lord Brougham contends for the separate existence of the mind, independently of the body, supplies so much matter of great interest, that we hardly know what to select. Perhaps the following passage on the phenomena of dreams may be most acceptable to our Readers.

"The bodily functions are in part suspended during sleep, that is, all those which depend upon volition. The senses, however, retain a portion of their acuteness; and those of touch* and hearing, especially, may be affected without awakening the sleeper. The consequence of the cessation which takes place of all communication of ideas through the senses, is that the action of the mind, and, above all, of those powers connected with the imagination, becomes much more vigorous and uninterrupted. This is shown in two ways—first, by the celerity with which any impression upon the senses, strong enough to be felt without awaking, is caught up and made the groundwork of a new train of ideas, the mind instantly accommodating itself to the suggestions of the impression, and making all its thoughts chime in with that; and, secondly, by the prodigiously long succession of images that pass through the mind, with perfect distinctness and liveliness, in an instant of time.

"The facts upon this subject are numerous, and of undeniable certainty, because of daily occurrence. Every one knows the effect of a bottle of hot water applied during sleep to the soles of the feet: you instantly dream of walking over hot mould, or ashes, or a stream of lava, or having your feet burnt by coming too near the fire. But the effect of falling asleep in a stream of cold air, as in an open carriage, varies this experiment in a very interesting, and, indeed, instructive manner. You will, instantly that the wind begins to blow, dream of being upon some exposed point, and anxious for shelter, but unable to reach it; then you are on the deck of a ship, suffering from the gale—you run behind a sail for shelter, and the wind changes, so that it still blows upon you—you are driven to the cabin, but the ladder is removed, or the door locked. Presently you are on shore, in a house with all the windows open, and endeavour to shut them in vain; or, seeing a smith's forge, you are attracted by the fire, and suddenly a hundred bellows play upon it, and extinguish it in an instant, but fill the whole smithy with their blast, till you are as cold as on the road. If you from time to time awake, the moment you fall asleep again, the same course of dreaming succeeds in the greatest variety of changes that can be rung on our thoughts.

"But the rapidity of these changes, and of the succession of ideas, cannot be ascertained by this experiment: it is most satisfactorily proved by another. Let any one who is extremely overpowered with drowsiness—as after sitting up all night, and sleeping none the next day—lie down, and begin to dictate: he will find himself falling asleep after uttering a few words, and he will be awakened by the person who writes repeating the last word, to show he has written the whole; not above five or six seconds may elapse, and the sleeper will find it at first quite impossible to believe that he has not been asleep for hours, and will chide the amanuensis for having fallen asleep over his work—so great apparently will be the length of the dream which he has dreamt, extending through half a lifetime. This experiment is easily tried: again and again the sleeper will find his endless dream renewed; and he will always be able to tell in how short a time he must have performed it. For suppose eight or ten seconds required to write the four or five words dictated, sleep could hardly begin in less than four or five seconds after the effort of pronouncing the sentence; so that, at the utmost, not more than four or five seconds can have been spent in sleep. But, indeed, the greater probability is, that not above a single second can have been so passed; for a writer will easily finish two words in a second; and suppose he has to write four, and half the time is consumed in falling asleep, one second only is the duration of the dream, which yet seems to last for years, so numerous are the images that compose it."

From these and other facts, the author is disposed to conclude that we only dream during the moment of transition into and out of sleep. The following passage, from the same chapter, will be very cheering to our more aged readers.

"The changes which the mind undergoes in its activity, its capacity, its mode of operation, are matter of constant observation, indeed of every man's experience. Its essence is the same; its fundamental nature is unalterable; it never loses the distinguishing peculiarities which separate it from matter; never acquires any of the properties of the latter; but it undergoes important changes, both in the progress of time, and by means of exercise and culture. The development of the bodily powers appears to affect it, and so does their decay; but we rather ought to say, that, in ordinary cases, its improvement is contemporaneous with the growth of the body, and its decline generally is contemporaneous with that of the body, after an advanced period of life. For it is an undoubted fact, and almost universally true, that the mind, before extreme old age, becomes more sound, and is capable of greater things, during nearly thirty years of diminished bodily powers; that, in most cases, it suffers no abatement of strength during ten years more of bodily decline; that, in many cases, a few years more of bodily decrepitude produce no effect upon the mind; and that, in some instances, its faculties remain bright to the last, surviving the almost total extinction of the corporeal endowments. It is certain that the strength of the body, its agility, its patience of fatigue, indeed all its qualities, decline from thirty at the latest; and yet the mind is improving rapidly from thirty to fifty; suffers little or no decline before sixty; and therefore is better when the body is enfeebled, at the age of fifty-eight or fifty-nine, than it was in the some of the corporeal faculties thirty years before. It is equally certain, that while the body is rapidly decaying, between sixty or sixty-three and seventy, the mind suffers hardly any loss of strength in the generality of men; that men continue to seventy-five or seventy-six in the possession of all their mental powers, while few can then boast of more than the remains of physical strength; and instances are not wanting of persons who, between eighty and ninety, or even older, when the body can hardly be said to live, possess every faculty of the mind unimpaired. We are authorised to conclude, from these facts, that unless some unusual and violent accident interferes, such as a serious illness or a fatal contusion, the ordinary course of life presents the mind and the body running courses widely different, and in great part of the time in opposite directions; and this affords strong proof, both that the mind is independent of the body, and that its destruction in the period of its entire vigour is contrary to the analogy of nature."

The consideration that the phenomena of mind afford ample and almost untouched evidence of design in the Creator, frequently brings Lord Brougham into contact with the materialists, whose fundamental positions are demolished in passing, in a few nervous passages of reasoning and illustration which, in other hands, might have formed the basis of several volumes. The following extract contains what the author himself describes as "the strongest of all the arguments both for the separate existence of mind, and for its surviving the body," and as being "drawn from the strictest induction of facts."

"The body is constantly undergoing change in all its parts. Probably no person at the age of twenty has one single particle in any part of his body which he had at ten; and still less does any portion of the body he was born with continue to exist in or with him. All that he before had has now entered into new combinations, forming parts of other men, or of animals, or of vegetable or mineral substances, exactly as the body he now has will afterwards be resolved into new combinations after his death. Yet the mind continues one and the same, "without change or shadow of turning." None of its parts can be resolved; for it is one and single, and it remains unchanged by the changes of the body. The argument would be quite as strong though the change undergone by the body were admitted not to be so complete, and though some small portion of its harder parts were supposed to continue with us through life.

"But observe how strong the inferences arising from these facts are, both to prove that the existence of the mind is entirely independent of the existence of the body, and to shew the probability of its surviving! If the mind continues the same while all or nearly all the body is changed, it follows that the existence of the mind depends not in the least degree upon the existence of the body; for it has already survived a total change of, or, in the common use of the words, an entire destruction of that body. But again, if the strongest argument to shew that the mind perishes with the body, nay, the only argument be, as it is indubitably derived from, the phenomena of death, the fact to which we have been referring affords an answer to this. For the argument is that we know of no instance in which the mind has ever been known to exist after the death of the body. Now here is exactly the instance desiderated, it being manifest that the same process which takes place on the body more suddenly at death is taking place more gradually, but as effectually in the result, during the whole of life, and that death itself does not more completely resolve the body into its elements and form it into new combinations than living fifteen or twenty years does destroy, by like resolution and combination, the self-same body. And yet after those years have elapsed, and the former body has been dissipated and formed into new combinations, the mind remains the same as before, exercising the same memory and consciousness, and so preserving the same personal identity as if the body had suffered no change at all. In short, it is not more correct to say that all of us who are now living have bodies formed of what were once the bodies of those who went before us, than it is to say that some of us who are now living at the age of fifty have bodies which in part belonged to others now living at that and other ages. The phenomena are precisely the same, and the operations are performed in like manner though with different degrees of expedition. Now all would believe in the separate existence of the soul if they had experience of its existing apart from the body. But the facts referred to prove that it does exist apart from one body with which it once was united, and though it is in union with another, yet as it is not adherent to the same, it is shown to have an existence separate from, and independent of, that body. So all would believe in the soul surviving the body, if after the body's death its existence were made manifest. But the facts referred to prove that after the body's death, that is, after the chronic dissolution which the body undergoes during life, the mind continues to exist as before. Here, then, we have that proof so much desiderated—the existence of the soul after the dissolution of the bodily frame with which it was connected. The two cases cannot, in any soundness of reasoning, be distinguished; and this argument, therefore, one of pure induction, derived partly from physical science, through the evidence of our senses, partly from psychological science by the testimony of our consciousness, appears to prove the possible Immortality of the Soul almost as rigorously as "if one were to rise from the dead."

The distinct existence of mind, and its continued existence after the dissolution of the body having been affirmed, the reader will naturally be curious to know what Lord Brougham has to say on the subject of a future state. He speaks, of course, with distinctness as to the existence of such a state; but on its formal nature and circumstances, he expresses himself with a reserve and diffidence more truly characteristic of a logical and well-disciplined mind, than the most refined or elevated speculation could be. From any other way of considering the subject he was, indeed, precluded not only by the nature of the subject, but by the principles of the inductive philosophy of which the whole of the present volume is so fine an exemplification. The following is the passage in question,

"Upon the particulars of a future state—the kind of existence reserved for the soul—the species of its occupations and enjoyments—Natural Theology is, of course, profoundly silent; but not more silent than Revelation. We are left wholly to conjecture, and in a field on which our hopelessness of attaining any certain result is quite equal to our interest in the success of the search. Indeed, all our ideas of happiness in this world are such as rather to disqualify us for the investigation, or what may more fitly be termed the imagination. Those ideas are, for the most part, either directly connected with the senses, or derived from our condition of weakness here, which occasions the formation of connexions for mutual comfort and support, and gives to the feeblery the feeling of allegiance, to the stronger the pleasure of protection. Yet may we conceive that, hereafter, such of our affections as have been the most cherished in life shall survive and form again the delight of meeting those from whom death has severed us—that the soul may enjoy the purest delights in the exercise of its powers, above all, for the investigation of truth—that it may expatiate in the full discovery of whatever has hitherto been most sparingly revealed, or most carefully hidden from its view—that it may be gratified with the sight of the useful harvest reaped by the world from the good seed which it helped to sow. We can only conjecture or fancy. But these, and such as these, are pleasures in which the gross indulgences of sense have no part, and which are even removed above the less refined of our moral gratifications: they may, therefore, be supposed consistent with a pure and faultless state of spiritual being."

"Perhaps the greatest of all the difficulties which we feel in forming such conjectures, regards the endless duration of an immortal existence. All our ideas in this world are so adapted to a limited continuance of life—not only so moulded upon the scheme of a being incapable of lasting beyond a few years, but so inseparably connected with a constant change even here—a perpetual termination of one stage of existence and beginning of another—that we cannot easily, if at all, fancy an eternal, or even a long-continued, endurance of the same faculties, the same pursuits, and the same enjoyments. All here is in perpetual movement—ceaseless change. There is nothing in us or about us that abides an hour—nay, an instant. Resting-place there is none for the foot—no haven is provided where the mind may be still. How then shall a creature, thus wholly ignorant of repose—unacquainted with any continuation at all in any portion of his existence—so far abstract his thoughts from his whole experience as to conceive a long, much more a perpetual, duration of the same powers, pursuits, feelings, pleasures? Here it is that we are the most lost in our endeavours to reach the seats of the blessed with our imperfect organs of perception, and our inveterate and only habits of thinking."

The second part of the "Discourse" is much shorter than that to which our attention has been hitherto confined. It is divided into three sections, the first of which treats of the pleasures which attend the study of Natural Theology in common with all other scientific pursuits; the second describes the pleasures and improvement peculiar to the study which forms the main subject of the work; and the third explains the connection between natural and revealed religion, showing the service which natural theology renders to the doctrines of revelation. The length to which our notice has already extended, only leaves us room to extract one short passage from the second section of this portion of the work.

"The universal recurrence of the facts on which Natural Theology rests, deserves to be regarded as increasing the interest of this science. The other sciences, those of Physics at least, are studied only when we withdraw from all ordinary pursuits, and give up our meditations to them. Those which can only be prosecuted by means of experiment, can never be studied at all without some act of our own to alter the existing state of things, and place nature in circumstances which force her, by a kind of question, as Lord Bacon phrases it, to reveal her secrets. Even the sciences which depend on observation have their fields spread only here and there, hardly ever lying in our way, and not always accessible when we would go out of our way to walk in them. But there is no place where the evidences of Natural Religion are not distributed in ample measure. It is equally true, that those evidences continually meet us in all the other branches of science. A discovery made in these almost certainly involves some new proofs of design in the formation and government of the universe."

STRAWBERRIES.

If our article on this subject should be worth little (especially as we are obliged to be brief, and cannot bring to our assistance much quotation or other helps) we beg leave to say, that we mean to do little more in it than congratulate the reader on the strawberry-season, and imply those pleasant interchanges of conventional sympathy, which give rise to the common expressions about the weather or the state of the harvest,—things which everybody knows what everybody else will say about them, and yet upon which everybody speaks. Such a charm has sympathy, even in its commonest aspect.

A.—A fine day to-day.

B.—Very fine day.

A.—But I think we shall have rain.

B.—I think we shall.

And so the two speakers part, all the better pleased with one another merely for having uttered a few words, and those words such as either of them could have reckoned upon before-hand, and has interchanged a thousand times. And justly are they pleased. They are fellow-creatures living in the same world, and all its phases are of importance to them, and themselves to one another. The meaning of the words is—"I feel as you do"—or "I am interested in the same subject, and it is a pleasure to me to let you see it." What a pity that mankind do not vent the same feelings of good-will and a mutual understanding on fifty other subjects! And many do;—but all might;—and as Bentham says, "with how little trouble!"

There is Strawberry weather, for instance, which is as good a point of the weather to talk about, as rain or sun. If the phrase seems a little forced, it is perhaps not so much as it seems; for the weather, and fruit, and colour, and the birds, &c. &c., all hang together; and for our parts, we would fain think, and can easily believe, that without this special degree of heat (while we are writing) or mixture of heat and fresh air, the strawberries would not have their special degree of colour and fragrance. The world answers to the spirit that plays upon it, as musical instruments to musician; and if cloud, sunshine, and breeze (the fine playing of nature) did not descend upon earth precisely as they do at this moment, there is good reason to conclude, that neither fruit, nor anything else, would be precisely what it is. The cuckoo would want tone, and the strawberries relish.

Do you not like, reader, the pottle of strawberries? And is it not manifest, from old habit and association, that no other sort of basket would do as well for their first arrival? It "carries" well: it lies on your arm like a length of freshness; then there is the slight paper covering, the slighter rush tie, the inner covering of leaves; and when all these give place, fresh, and fragrant, and red lie the berries,—the best, it is to be feared, at the top. Now and then comes a half-mashed one, sweet in its over-ripeness; and when the fingers cannot conveniently descend further, the rest, urged by a beat on the flat end, are poured out on a plate; and perhaps agreeably surprise us with the amount.—

[From the Steam-Press of C. & W. REYNELL, Little Pulteney-street.]

Meantime the fingers and nails have got coloured as with wine.

What matter of fact is this! And how everybody knows it! And yet, for that very reason, it is welcome; like the antiquities about the weather. So abundant is Nature in supplying us with entertainment, even by means of simply stating that anything is what it is! Paint a strawberry in oil, and provided the representation be true, how willing is everybody to like it! And observe, even in a smaller matter, how Nature heaps our resources one upon another,—first giving us the thing, then the representation of it, or power of painting it, (for art is nature also), then the power of writing about it, the power of thinking, the power of giving, of receiving, and fifty others. Nobles put the leaves in their coronets. Poets make them grow for ever, where they are no longer to be found. We never pass by Ely-place, in Holborn, without seeing the street there converted into a garden, and the pavement to rows of strawberries.

"My Lord of Ely, when I was last in Holborn,
I saw good strawberries in your garden there;
I do beseech you send for some of them"—

quoth Richard the Third to the Bishop, in that scene of frightful calmness and smooth-speaking, which precedes his burst of thunder against Hastings. Richard is gone with his bad passions, and the garden is gone; but the tyrant is converted into poetry, and the strawberries also; and here we have them both, equally harmless.

Sir John Suckling, in his richly-coloured portrait of a beautiful girl in the tragedy of Brennoralt, has made their dying leaves precious:—

"Eyes full and quick,
With breath as sweet as double violets,
And wholesome as dying leaves of strawberries."

Strawberries deserve all the good things that can be said of them. They are beautiful to look at, delicious to eat, have a fine odour, and are so wholesome, that they are said to agree with the weakest digestions, and to be excellent against gout, fever, and all sorts of ailments. It is recorded of Fontenelle (as was mentioned some weeks ago in the LONDON JOURNAL), that he attributed his longevity to them, in consequence of their having regularly cooled a fever which he had every spring; and that he used to say, "If I can but reach the season of strawberries." Boerhave (Mr Phillips tells us in his 'History of Fruits,') looked upon their continued use as one of the principal remedies in cases of obstruction and viscosity, and in putrid disorders: Hoffman furnished instances of obstinate disorders cured by them, even consumptions; and Linnæus says that by eating plentifully of them, he kept himself free from the gout. They are good even for the teeth.

A fruit so very useful and delightful deserves a better name; though the old one is now so identified with its beauty, that it would be a pity to get rid of it. Nobody thinks of straw, when uttering the word strawberry, but only of colour, fragrance, and sweetness. The Italian name is Fragola,—fragrant. The English one originated in the custom of putting straw between the fruit and the ground, to keep it dry and clean; or perhaps, as Mr Phillips thinks, of a still older practice among children, of threading the wild berries upon straws of grass. He says, that this is still a custom in parts of England where they abound, and that so many "straws of berries" are sold for a penny.

One of the most luxurious of simple dishes is strawberries and cream. The very sound of the word seems to set one's page floating like a bowl. But there is an Italian poet, who has written a whole poem upon strawberries, and who, with all his love of them, will not hear of them without sugar. He invokes them before him in all their beauty, which he acknowledges with enthusiasm, and then tells them, like some capricious sultan, that he does not chuse to see their faces. They must hide them, he says;—put on their veils,—to wit, of sugar. "Strawberries and sugar" are to him what "sack and sugar" was to Falstaff, the indispensable companions, the sovereign remedy for all evil—the climax of good. He finds fault with Moliere's 'Imaginary Sick Man' for not hating them; since, if he had eaten them, they would have cured his hypochondria. As to himself, he talks of them as Fontenelle would have talked, had he written Italian verse:—

"Io per me d'esse, a boccon ricchi e doppi
Spesso rigonfio, e rinconforto il seno;
E brontolando per dispetto scoppi
Quel vecchio d' Ippocrasso e di Galeno,
Che i giulebbi, l'essenzie, ed i sciloppi
Abborro, come l'ostico veleno;
E di Fragole un' avida satolla
Mi purga il sangue, e avviva ogni midolla."

For my part, I confess I fairly will
And stuff myself with strawberries: and abuse
The doctors all the while, draught, powder, and pill,
And wonder how any sane head can chuse
To have their nauseous jalaps, and their bill,
All which, like so much poison, I refuse.
Give me a glut of strawberries; and lo!
Sweet through my blood, and very bones, they go.

Almost all the writers of Italy who have been worth anything, have been writers of verse at one time or another.—Prose-writers, historians, philosophers, doctors of law and medicine, clergymen,—all have contributed their quota to the sweet art. The poet of the strawberries was a Jesuit, a very honest man too, notwithstanding the odium upon his order's name, and a grave, eloquent, and truly christian theologian, of a life recorded as "evangelical." It is delightful to see what playfulness such a man thought not inconsistent with the most sacred aspirations. The strawberry to him had its merits in the creation, as well as the star; and he knew how to give each its due. Nay, he runs the joke down, like a humourist who could do nothing else but joke if he pleased, but gracefully withal, and with a sense of Nature above his Art, like a true lover of poetry. His poem is in two cantos, and contains upwards of nine hundred lines, ending in the following bridal climax, which the good Jesuit seems to have considered the highest one possible, and the very cream even of strawberries and sugar. He has been apostrophising two young friends of his, newly married, of the celebrated Venetian families Mocenigo and Loredano, and this is the blessing with which he concludes, pleasantly smiling at the end of his gravity:—

"A guesta coppia la serena pace
Eternamente intorno scherzi e voli:
E la ridente sanità vivace
La sua vita longhissima consoli;
E la felicità, pura e verace,
Non dal suo fianco un solo di s' involi;
E a dire che ogni cosa lieta vada,
Su le Fragole il zucchero le cada."

Around this loving pair may joy serene
On wings of balm for ever wind and play;
And laughing health her roses shake between,
Making their life one long, sweet, flowery way;
May bliss, true bliss, pure, self-possessed of much,
Be absent from their side, no, not a day;
In short, to sum up all that earth can prize,
May they have sugar to their strawberries.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

MILTON.

MILTON is always interesting; but the new edition of his works by Sir Egerton Brydges gives a new gloss to him at the moment, like a shower of rain upon a laurel-tree; and, as Sir Egerton, in the Life which constitutes his first volume, has dealt rather in a certain fondness of criticism (with which, and his antiquarian reminiscences, we strongly sympathise) than in the usual routine of biography, we here extract Mr Todd's account of the person and manners of the great poet.

We think there can be little doubt, that Milton, however estimable and noble at heart, was far from perfect in his notions of household government, and exacted somewhat too much submission to be loved as he wished. His wife (a singular proceeding in the bride of a young poet) absented herself from him in less than a month after their marriage, that is to say, during the very honeymoon; and stayed away the whole summer with her relations: he made his daughters read to him in languages which they did not understand; and in one part of his works he piques himself, like Johnson, on being a good hater. Now "good haters," as they call themselves, are sometimes very good men, and hate out of zeal for something they love; neither would we undervalue the services which such haters may have done mankind. They may have been necessary; though a true christian philosophy proposes to supersede them, and certainly does not recommend. But as all men have their faults, so these men are not apt to have the faults that are least disagreeable, even to one another; for it is observable that good haters are far from loving their brethren, the good haters on the other side; and their tempers are apt to be infirm and overbearing. In the most authentic portraits of Milton, venerate them as we must, we cannot but discern a certain uneasy austerity,—we fear, even a peevishness,—a blight of something not sound in opinion and feeling.

"Milton, in his youth, is said to have been extremely handsome. He was called the Lady of his College; an appellation which Mr Hayley says he could not relish; and I may add, that he might be less inclined to be pleased with the title, as, at that period, the appearance of effeminacy was attacked from the pulpit. 'We live in an age,' says Bishop Lake, 'wherein it is hard to say, whether in clothes men grow more womanish, or women more mannish!' Milton had a very fine skin and fresh complexion. His hair was of a light brown; and, parted on the forehead, hung down in curls upon his shoulders. His features were regular; and when turned of forty, he has himself told us, he was generally allowed to have had the appearance of being ten years younger. He has also represented himself as a man of moderate stature, neither too lean nor too corpulent; and so far endued with strength and spirit, that as he always wore a sword, he wanted not, while light revisited his eyes, the skill or the courage to use it. His eyes were of a greyish colour; which, when deprived of sight, did not betray their loss. At first view, and at a small distance, it was difficult to know that he was blind. The testimony of Aubrey respecting the person of Milton is happily expressed:—'His harmonical and ingenious soul did lodge in a beautiful and well-proportioned body.' Milton's voice was musically sweet, as his ear was musically correct. Wood describes his deportment to have been affable, and his gait erect and manly, bespeaking courage and undauntedness. Of his figure in his declining days, Richardson has left the following sketches:—'An ancient clergyman of Dorsetshire, Dr Wright, found John Milton, in a small chamber hung with rusty green, sitting in an elbow-chair, and dressed neatly in black, pale but not cadaverous, his hands and fingers gouty and with chalk-stones. He used also to sit in a gray coarse cloth coat, at the door of his house near Bunhill fields, in warm sunny weather, to enjoy the fresh air; and so, as well as in his room, received the visits of people of distinguished parts as well as quality.'

"His domestic habits were those of a sober and temperate student. Of wine, or any strong liquors, he drank little. In his diet he was rarely influenced by delicacy of choice. He once delighted in walking and taking exercise, and appears to have amused himself in botanical pursuits; but after he was confined by age and blindness, he had a machine to swing in for the preservation of his health. In summer he then rested in bed from nine to four, in winter to five. At these hours, he was not disposed to rise, he had a person by his bedside to read to him. When he first rose, he heard a chapter in the Hebrew Bible, and commonly studied till twelve; then used some exercise for an hour; then dined; afterwards played on the organ or bass-viol, and either sung himself or made his wife sing, who, he said, had a good voice but no ear. It is related, that, when educating his nephews, he made them songsters, and sang from the time they were with him. No poet, it may be observed, has more frequently or more powerfully commended the charms of music than Milton. He wished, perhaps, to rival, and he has successfully rivalled, the sweetest descriptions of a favourite bard, whom the melting voice appears to have often enchanted,—the tender Petrarch. After his regular indulgence in musical relaxation, he studied till six; then entertained his visitors till eight; then enjoyed a light supper; and, after a pipe of tobacco and a glass of water, retired to bed.

"It has been observed by Dr Newton, that all who had written any accounts of the life of Milton, agreed that he was affable and instructive in conversation, of an equal and cheerful temper; 'yet I can easily believe,' says the learned biographer, 'that he had a sufficient sense of his own merits, and contempt enough for his adversaries.' Milton acknowledges his own honest haughtiness and self-esteem; with which, however, he professes to have united a becoming 'modesty.' Aubrey notices that he was 'satirical.'

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XII.—HENRY V.

HENRY V is a favourite monarch with the English nation, and he appears to have been also a favourite with Shakspeare, who labours hard to apologise for the actions of the king, by showing us the character of the man, as "the king of good fellows." He scarcely deserves this honour. He was fond of war and low company:—we know little else of him. He was careless, dissolute, and ambitious;—idle, or doing mischief. In private, he seemed to have no idea of the common decencies of life, which he subjected to a kind of regal licence; in public affairs, he seemed to have no idea of any rule of right or wrong, but brute force, glossed over with a little religious hypocrisy and archiepiscopal advice. His principles did not change with his situation and professions. His adventure on Gadshill was a prelude to the affair of Agincourt, only a bloodless one; Falstaff was a puny prompter of violence and outrage, compared with the pious and politic Archbishop of Canterbury, who gave the king carte blanche, in a genealogical tree of his family, to rob and murder in circles of latitude and longitude abroad—to save the possessions of the church at home. This appears in the speeches in Shakspeare, where the hidden motives that actuate princes and their advisers in war and policy are better laid open than in speeches from the throne or woolpack. Henry, because he did not know how to govern his own kingdom, determined to make war upon his neighbours. Because his own title to the crown was doubtful, he laid claim to that of France. Because he did not know how to exercise the enormous power, which had just dropped into his hands, to any one good purpose, he immediately undertook (a cheap and obvious resource of sovereignty) to do all the mischief he could. Even if absolute monarchs had the wit to find out objects of laudable ambition, they could only "plume up their wills" in adhering to the more sacred formula of the royal prerogative, "the right divine of kings to govern wrong," because will is only then triumphant when it is opposed to the will of others, because the pride of power is only then shown, not when it consults the rights and interests of others, but when it insults and tramples on all justice and all humanity. Henry declares his resolution "when France is his, to bend it to his awe, or break it all to pieces"—a resolution worthy of a conqueror, to destroy all that he cannot enslave; and what adds to the joke, he lays all the blame of the consequences of his ambition on those who will not submit tamely to his tyranny. Such is the history of kingly power, from the beginning to the end of the world;—with this difference, that the object of war formerly, when the people adhered to their allegiance, was to depose kings; the object latterly, since the people swerved from their allegiance, has been to restore kings, and to make common cause against mankind. The object of our late invasion and conquest of France was to restore the legitimate monarch, the descendant of Hugh Capet, to the throne; Henry V in his time made war on and deposed the descendant of this very Hugh Capet, on the plea that he was a usurper and illegitimate. What would the great modern catspaw of legitimacy and restorer of divine right have said to the claim of Henry and the title of the descendants of Hugh Capet? Henry V, it is true, was a hero, a king of England, and the conqueror of the king of France. Yet we feel little love or admiration for him. He was a hero, that is, he was ready to sacrifice his own life for the pleasure of destroying thousands of other lives: he was a king of England, but not a constitutional one, and we only like kings according to law; lastly, he was a conqueror of the French king, and for this we dislike him less than if he had conquered the French people. How then do we like him? We like him in the play. There he is a very amiable monster, a very splendid pageant. As we like to gaze at a panther or a young lion in their cages in the Tower, and catch a pleasing horror from their glistening eyes, their velvet paws, and dreadless roar, so we take a very romantic, heroic, patriotic, and poetical delight in the boasts and feats of our younger Harry, as they appear on the stage and are confined to lines of ten syllables; where no blood follows the stroke that wounds our ears, where no harvest bends beneath horses' hoofs, no city flames, no little child is butchered, no dead men's bodies are found piled on heaps and festering the next morning—in the orchestra!

So much for the politics of the play; now for the poetry. Perhaps one of the most striking images in all Shakspeare is that given of war in the first lines of the Prologue.

"O for a muse of fire, that would ascend
The brightest heaven of invention,
A kingdom for a stage, princes to act,
And monarchs to behold the swelling scene!
Then should the warlike Harry, like himself,
Assume the port of Mars, and at his heels
Leash'd in like hounds, should famine, sword, and fire
Crouch for employment."

Rubens, if he had painted it, would not have improved upon this simile.

The conversation between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Ely relating to the sudden change in the manners of Henry V, is among the well-known Beauties of Shakspeare. It is indeed admirable both for strength and grace. It has sometimes occurred to us that Shakspeare, in describing "the reformation" of the Prince, might have had an eye to himself—

"Which is a wonder how his grace should gleam fit,
Since his addiction was to courses vain,
His companies unletter'd, rude, and shallow,
His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports;
And never noted in him any study,
Any retirement, any sequestration
From open haunts and popularity."

ELZ. The strawberry grows underneath the nettle,
And wholesome berries thrive and ripen best
Neighbour'd by fruit of baser quality:
And so the prince obscur'd his contemplation
Under the veil of wildness, which no doubt
Grew like the summer-grass, fastest by night,
Unseen, yet crevice in his faculty."

This is at least as probable an account of the progress of the poet's mind as we have met with in any of the 'Essays on the Learning of Shakspeare.'

Nothing can be better managed than the caution which the king gives the meddling Archbishop, not to advise himself rashly to engage in the war with France; his scrupulous dread of the consequences of that advice, and his eager desire to hear and follow it.

"And God forbid, my dear and faithful lord,
That you should fashion, wrest, or bow your reading,
Or nicely charge your understanding soul
With opening titles miscreate, whose right
Suits not native colours with the truth.
For God doth know how many now in health
Shall drop their blood, in approbation
Of what your reverence shall incite us to.
Therefore take heed how you impawn your person,
How you awake our sleeping sword of war;
We charge you in the name of God, take heed.
For never two such kingdoms did contend
Without much fall of blood, whose guiltless drops
Are every one a woe, a sore complaint
'Gainst him, whose wrong gives edge unto the swords
That make such waste in brief mortality.
Under this conjuration, speak, my lord;
For we will hear, note, and believe in heart,
That what you speak is in your conscience wash'd
As pure as sin with baptism."

Another characteristic instance of the blindness of human nature to everything but its own interests is the complaint made by the king of "the ill neighbourhood" of the Scot in attacking England when she was attacking France.

"For once the eagle England being in prey,
To her unguarded nest the weasel Scot
Comes sneaking, and so sucks her princely eggs."

It is worth observing that in all these plays, which give an admirable picture of the spirit of the good old times, the moral inference does not at all depend upon the nature of the actions, but on the dignity or meanness of the persons committing them. "The eagle England" has a right "to be in prey," but "the weasel Scot" has none "to come sneaking to her nest," which she has left to pounce upon others. Might was right, without equivocation or disguise, in that heroic and chivalrous age. The substitution of right for might, even in theory, is among the refinement and abuses of modern philosophy.

To be concluded next week.

FINE ARTS.

Wanderings through North Wales. By Thomas Roscoe, with Engravings by W. Radclyffe after Cox, Creswick, and Cattermole. Part III. Tilt. Simpkin and Marshall.

An amusing number. The illustrations are, we think, an improvement on the former numbers. Though still rather hard, they are broader in the effect. "Bolingbroke's false homage to Richard II" is one of Cattermole's best designs; the attitudes, it is true, bear too obvious an appearance of study, and Richard is not young enough, nor is the levity of his character sufficiently marked; but there is his weakness; and Bolingbroke's mixed deference and indifference tell the story well. The lovely "Flower of Dolbadern" is very pleasingly shadowed forth by Creswick; "Cader Idria, from Kinsamer Abbey," by Cox, is a rare union of majesty and beauty; mountains never look so beautiful as when they are seen over trees.

Gallery of Portraits. Part XXXVII. Charles Knight.

CONTAINS three very different but familiar names, beginning with a head of the energetic and acute Herschell, with a fine, successful, happy look about his face, and an habitual contractedness between the brows. Next is the melancholy and sensitive countenance of the good Romilly; Lawrence seldom put so much sentiment in his pictures as he has in this. Lastly, there is the head of all heads, the inexhaustible head of Shakespeare. The engraving is from the Chandos head. We must own we, however, we prefer the monument, which bears the most probable show of authenticity.

The Poetical Works of John Milton. Edited by Sir Egerton Brydges, Bart., with Imaginative Designs by J. M. W. Turner, R.A. Vol. I. Macrone.

A very handsome volume. We cannot, however, say much for the illustrations. The head of Milton is a very poor version of the fine portrait with which we are all familiar; and the design in the title-page is in Turner's worst manner. There is a certain shining splendour in it, but neither imagination nor common sense; the worlds look like so many balloons, or like a luminous erry at the theatre; and the "heavenly host" is a very human concourse of rickety individuals—it is like a "chorus of knights" at the Opera House.

Ancient Picture.—We saw a picture, the other day, at Messrs Paul and Bartleys', Bucklersbury, which lies at their house, for sale. Lionardo da Vinci is claimed as the artist; but, we should think, unadvisedly. One of the heads, Joseph of Arimathea, is certainly in his manner; but the very imperfect drawing of parts, and the deficiency of an effective chiaroscuro, of which he was the father, render us very doubtful of his having had any share in it. Nor will the elaborate colour and finish allow us to suppose it a young work. In Da Vinci's paintings, too, there is an unceasing action in all the figures, almost amounting to restlessness, which we do not perceive in this. For these reasons, in spite of the monogram, we cannot but doubt that the painter of it is as yet to be identified. Indeed monograms are so obscure and arbitrary, that it requires much additional evidence to establish a picture; they did not always even consist of the initials of the artist's name, and, if they did, Lionardo is not the only painter with L. D. V. to his initials. There was a Spanish painter, for instance, Luis de Vargas, who flourished about the same time; or rather later. And is the picture decidedly Italian? The colouring of the whole figure of the Virgin, the white drapery on her head, and the drapery about the middle of the body, in harsh, small folds, are very like what we have seen in Spanish pictures.

Be it Italian, Spanish, or of any other country, it is a fine picture, and old, and, we doubt not, really valuable. The gilt background is not necessarily the addition of some repairer, as a cotemporary has imagined; but was in use among early painters; if we mistake not, even Titian has used it. The finish, as we have observed, is most elaborate and minute, and yet the effect is broad and solid, and the colour bold and powerful.

NO. III.—CHAUCER (CONTINUED.)

HIS PATHOS.

CHAUCER's pathos is true nature's: it goes directly to its object. His sympathy is not fashioned and clipped by modes and respects; and herein, indeed, he was lucky in the comparatively homely breeding of his age, and in the dearth of books. His feelings were not rendered critical and timid. Observe the second line, for instance, of the following verses. The glossaries tell us that the word "swell" means fainted—died. There may be a Saxon word with such a meaning,—but luckily for nature and Chaucer, there is another Saxon word, swell, of which swell'd is the past tense, and most assuredly this is the word here; as the reader will feel instantly. No man, however much in love, faints "full oft a day;" but he may swell, as the poet says,—that is to say, heave his bosom and body with the venting of his long-suspended breath, and say, Alas! The fainting is unnatural; the sigh and the heaving is most natural, and most admirably expressed by this homely word. We have, therefore, spelt it accordingly, to suit the rest of the orthography.

THE UNHAPPY LOVER.

(From the Knight's Tale.)

When that Arcite to Thebes comen was,
Full oft a day he swell'd, and said, Alas!
For see his lady shall be never mo. (1)
And shortly to concluden all his woe,
So muckle sorrow had never creature!
That is, or shall be, while the world may dure.
His sleep, his meat, his drink is him beraft,
That lean he wax'd, and dry as is a shaft,—
His eyen hollow, and grisly to behold,
His hue sallow, and pale as ashes cold;
And solitary he was, and ever alone,
And wailing all the night, making his moan;
And if he heardé song or instrument,
Then would he weep; he might not be stant.

that, is, could not be stopped; the wilful, washing, self-pitying tears would flow. This touch about the music is exquisite.

Dryden, writing for the court of Charles the Second, does not dare to let Arcite weep, when he hears music. He restricts him to a gentlemanly sigh—

He sighs when songs or instruments he hears.

The cold ashes, which have lost their fire (we have the phrase still, "as pale as ashes") he turns to "sapless boxen leaves" (a classical simile); and far be it from him to venture to say "swell." No gentleman ever "swell'd;" certainly not with sighing, whatever he might have done with drinking. But instead of that, the modern poet does not mind indulging him with a good canting common-place, in the style of the fustian tragedies.

He raved with all the madness of despair:

He raved, he beat his breast, he tore his hair.

And then we must have a solid, sensible reason for the lover's not weeping:

Dry sorrow in his stupid eyes appears,
For wanting nourishment, he wanted tears!

It was not sufficient, that upon the principle of extremes meeting, the excess of sorrow was unable to weep,—that even self-pity seemed wasted. When the fine gentlemen of the court of Charles the Second, and when Charles himself, wept, (see Pepys) it was when they grew maudlin over their wine, and thought how piteous it was that such good eaters and drinkers should not have everything else to their liking. But let us not run the risk of forgetting the merits of Dryden, in comparing him with a poet so much the greater.

(1) Mora. "Mo" is still to be found in the old version of the Parson's.

THE SAME LOVER DYING.

Alas the woe! alas the paines strong
That I for you have suffer'd, and so long!
Alas the death! alas mine Emily!
Alas, departing of our company!
Alas mine heart's queen! Alas my wife!

Alas, it is to be observed, was the common expression of grief in those days; and all these repetitions of it only shew the loud, wilful, self-commiseration natural to dying people of a violent turn of mind, as this lover was. But he was also truly in love, and a gentleman. See how he continues:

Mine heart's lady, ender of my life!
What is this world? What asken men to have?
Now with his love, now in his cold grave:
Alone,—withouten any company.

How admirably expressed the difference between warm social life, and the cold solitary grave! How piteous the tautology—"Alone—withouten any company!"

Farewell, my sweet;—farewell, mine Emily
And soft—take me in your arm's away
For love of God, and hearken what I say.

He has had an unjust quarrel with his rival and once beloved friend, Palamon:—

I have here, with my cousin Palamon,
Had strife and rancour many a day agone,
For love of you, and for my jealousy;
And Jupiter so wis my soule gie, (1)
To speken of a servant (2) properly
With all circumstances truly
That is to say, truth, honour, and knighthood,
Wisdom, humblés, estate, and high kindred,
Freedom, and all that longeth to that art, (3);
So Jupiter have of my soule part,
As in this world right now ne know I none
So worthy to be lov'd as Palamon,
That serveth you, and will do all his life;
And if that ever ye shall be a wife,
Forget not Palamon, the gentle man.

SIMILE OF A MAN LED TO EXECUTION.

(From the Man of Law's Tale.)

The virtuous Constance, wrongfully accused, stands pale, and looking about her, among a king's courtiers.

Have ye not see, sometime, a pale face
(Among a press) (4) of him that hath been led Toward his death, where as he getteth no grace,
And such a colour in his face hath had,
They mighten know him that was so bested
Amongst all the faces in that rout;
So stant Custance, and looketh her about.

THE MOTHER AND CHILD PUT TO THE MERCY OF THE OCEAN.

The same Constance, accused by the king's mother of having produced him a monstrous child, is treated as above, against the will of the Constable of the realm, who is forced to obey his master's orders.

Weepen both young and old in all that place,
When that the king this cursed letter sent,
And Custance, with a deadly pale face,
The fourth day, toward the ship she went;
But natheless she tak'th in good intent
The will of Christ, and kneeling on the strand
She said, "Lord, aye welcome be thy sond. (5)
He that me kepte from the false blame
Whiles I was in the land amongstes you,
He can me keep from harm, and she from shame,
In the salt sea, although I see not how.
As strong as ever he was, he is yet now.
In him trust I, and in his mother dear
That is to me my sail, and eke my steer."
Her little child lay weeping in her arm;
And kneeling piteously, to him she said,
"Peace, little son, I will do thee no harm;"
With that, her kerchief off her head she braid,
And over his little eyes she it laid,
And in her arm she balleth it full fast,
And into the heav'n her eyes up she cast.

(1) So surely guide my soul.

(2) A lady's servant, or lover.

(3) The art of truly serving.

(4) In a multitude.

(5) Thy sending—the lot thou sendest.

Mother (quoth she) and maiden bright, Mary!
Sooth is, that thorough womanna's eggment (1)
Mankind was born, and damn'd aye to die,
For which thy child was on a cross yrent: (2)
Thy blissful eyes saw all his torment;
Then is there no comparison between
Thy woe and any woe man may sustain.

The true piteous emphasis on the words in this line is not to be surpassed.

Thou saw'st thy child yslain before thine eyes,
And yet now liveth my little child, parlay. (3)
Now, Lady bright! to whom all woeful cries,
Thou glory of womanhood, thou faire May!
Thou haven of refuge, bright star of day.
Rue on my child, that of thy gentleness
Ruest on every rueful in distress.

O little child, alas! what is thy guilt,
That never wroughtest sin as yet, pardie?
Why will thine hard father have thee spilt?
O mercy, dearé Constable (quoth she)
As let my little child dwell here with thee;

The silence of the pitying constable, here hurriedly passed over by poor Constance, as if she would not distress him by pressing him for what he could not do, is a specimen of those eloquent powers of omission, for which great masters in writing are famous. Constance immediately continues:—

An' if thou dar'st not saven him from blame,
So kiss him on's (4) in his father's name.

Therewith she looketh backward to the land,
And said, "Farewell, husband ruthelous!"
And up she rose, and walketh down the strand
Toward the ship: her followeth all the press:
And ever she prayeth her child to hold his peace,
And tak' th' her leave.

The mixture of natural kindness, bewildered feeling, and indelible good-breeding in this perpetual leave-taking, is excessively affecting.

And with a holy intent
She bleaseth her, and into the ship she went.

Glorious, sainted Griselda next week.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXV.—HEAD-SENSE WANTING HEART-WISDOM.

WE extract this account of a well-known character from a new and highly-respectable magazine, called the 'Literary Union.' It would not have appeared in these pages (nor assuredly in those of our authority) had anything like scandal attached to it; but Mr Colton persisted in making his own want of sympathy so public, appears to have been so unconnected with any one who could feel in pain for his memory, and indeed must be looked upon as so manifest a specimen of a clever lunatic, originally defective in his nature, and therefore a subject rather for the physiologist than the preacher (unless the latter preached a little more physiology, which would not be amiss) that, with this caveat against misconception, we can have no hesitation in adding him to our list of "Romances." It may be as well to add, that clever as he was, his talents have been highly over-rated. He got a little more head-knowledge than ordinary, by dint of not caring where he went for it, or what he did; but for the same reason, he was totally deficient in profundity and real wisdom. His best thoughts are from others; and his cleverest trick was his having a style that made them pass for his own—a style, however, betraying its trickery. See his regular set out of ables in the bit of sophistry about suicide. The poor man was absolutely turning a sentence, while meditating his last act of self-reference and egotism, though in the shape of a tragedy. "When life is unbearable (says he), death is desirable, and suicide justifiable;"—and so poor, clever, flaring, silly fellow! he goes off, like a man on the stage, with a fine line in his mouth, and thinks he will have made a profound sensation on us. But life is seldom unbearable, except by want of imagination and an outrageous egotism; and suicide, to be justifiable, except in the eyes of melancholy charity, should be preceded by nothing that renders it formidable to the survivors, or avoidable by medicine, or by patience.

"It was in the year 1826, if memory serves (says the writer in the 'Literary Union'), that we first saw the Rev. C. Colton in Paris; he had then just arrived from America, sported a splendid cab and tiger, and lived in dashing style. He derived his means from certain visits to Frescati's gaming-house, and No. 113, Palais Royal, whence he usually returned laden with gold. He played upon system, and the fame of his plan reaching England, two speculators with plenty of cash, (whose names it were well not to mention), were tempted to leave London for Paris, and adopt his mode of play. A short time after their arrival, Colton joined them—an arrangement having been made that they should find cash, and he science—and he was then to be met with at the Salon-au-dessus du Café Anglais, corner of the Place des Italiens, every evening; fortune favoured him for some years, and all went merrily; but, during this period, which was his meridian, we never saw one generous or praiseworthy action, never met with a recorded trait of charity or goodness; avarice was his ruling passion, and to gratify this he would stick at nothing. About this time, not content with the rapidity with which he gained money at the table, the thought took possession of him that he was a first-rate judge of pictures, and with his dominant idea in view, that of duping others in the re-sale, he purchased a great number: but, as Colton discovered to his cost, this is a trade that requires some apprenticeship; he was imposed upon in every way, and paintings for which he had paid as much as 150,000 francs, scarcely produced, after his death, as many centimes. Fortune now began to turn tail at the table, and Colton found it was much easier to talk of breaking the bank, as he had so often boasted he could do by his system, than to effect it. He fell as rapidly as he had risen; he had saved no money—few do who live by chance; they put implicit faith in the fickle goddess, and fancy she is never to desert them—so that his distress was great in the extreme. Without other resource, (for having no money, the table was closed to him,) he adopted the singular expedient of advertising in Galignani's Journal, that a clerical gentleman was willing, for a certain sum, to teach an unfailling method by which the bank might be broken at Rouge et Noir: like the alchemist of old, who was willing, nay desirous, to sell for a trifle the means of making gold in quantities unlimited. There are always gulls to be found when a clever rascal will give himself the trouble to seek for them; the bait took, and for some little time Colton lived well upon the flats thus caught. At every opportunity he would venture to his old haunts with the trifle he could spare, nay, sometimes with that which he could not, and occasionally would have a run of luck; we used then to meet him at 'Poole's,' an English tavern, in the Rue Favart, near the Boulevard Italien, in all the pomp and pride of worn-out velvet, mock jewelry, and dirty hands; on these occasions, when the sun-shine of circumstance had, for an instant, dispelled the fogs usually enveloping him, his conversation was sparkling and delightful, and his arrival was hailed as the promise of amusement. Colton possessed a most retentive memory, as his Lacon—which is perhaps more remarkable for the terseness of style, in which an amazing number of the opinions of others are expressed, than for any great originality or depth of thought—will abundantly testify; he had a smattering of most of the sciences, and an amazing fund of amusing anecdote. To a stranger—more especially if unlearned, for this would insure from him an elaborate display—he must have appeared a man of immense and varied talent, (he loved to be a lion, and thus unrestrainedly to rule the roast,) but when in the company of really scientific men, men who had drunk deeply where he had only sipped, his consequence was considerably lessened. Arrogance and conceit often drew from him off-hand opinions upon subjects of which he knew but little; and his pride compelled him to maintain them to the last, however absurd, however wrong; but if his adversary proved too powerful for him, he would suddenly quit the field for his stronghold, anecdote, carry off the laugh on his side, and thus rid himself of what he termed, with strange blindness, "the d—st bore in life—an obstinate man;" this, however, would not always succeed; and we well remember him, among other instances, to have been roughly handled and exposed by Mr Charles M—n, a young man of talent, (related to one of the most eminent performers of the day) who failed as an actor, some few seasons past, in London.

"Colton's appearance was singular in the extreme; he painted his cheeks, and was usually bedecked with mock jewels and gilded chains. With his pockets filled with eatables, a market basket in his hand, crammed with vegetables, fish, &c., most incongruously, and an octavo volume of some fashionable work under his arm, he might be sometimes met walking the streets of Paris, the very picture of eccentricity, nearly of madness. Thus equipped, he one morning called in at Mr T—n's, a noted Pâtissier, in the Rue St Honoré: 'I say T—n, I have called to give you a good recipe for curing hams; my mother has just now sent me some over, which I shall cure myself; and, damme, Sir, they shall beat your Strasburgs to H—.' He did cure them himself, and invited some of his friends to meet him at Poole's to taste; as might have been expected, however, the moment he entered the room with his basket on his arm, containing the precious morceaux, all were convinced of the failure of his recipe; the odour was intolerable, but this, with unyielding gravity, he argued, proceeded merely from the substitution of brown sugar for treacle: from treacle he went to metaphysics; and, being somewhat humbled by the previous event, never were we better pleased with his society than on that evening.

"At this period of his career, Colton had for hanger-on, or rather associate in his projects for raising the wind, one H—n, a well educated man of good family, but bad principles; pupils in the occult science were becoming rare, and he now endeavoured to obtain a living by a series of begging letters. Colton forged the darts, and H—n launched them. Every person of wealth resident in Paris, or stranger visiting it, was waited upon by H—n; and the plea of an unfortunate divine, in embarrassed circumstances, a broken down author, or a distressed widower with six children, as the case might be, produced for sometime a supply of cash. Colton, of course, would never allow that he derived any benefit from this proceeding; it was for his poor friend, his protégé, H—n; and he was thus enabled to plead, with all his eloquence, in H.'s behalf, and so increase the share which was to go into his own pocket. He did not, however, confine himself to this; and one example of his mode of proceeding may not be uninteresting:—A young Englishman, D—, with more money than wit, arrived at Paris, and was introduced to Dr Colton, as he was sometimes called in common parlance, by one B—, from whom we have the trait; and, proud of having formed an acquaintance with the noted author of 'Lacon,' he feasted and flattered him to his heart's content. Colton, finding money was plentiful, began to interest D— in behalf of his poor friend H—n, and succeeded in raising within his breast a desire to serve him. One day, after dining together at Vefeur's, they retired to the Café de l'Univers, one of Colton's usual resorts; while ascending the staircase, Colton drew from his pocket a large brooch, showed it to D—, said it was the property of a gentleman in distress, who wished to dispose of it, and managed to let him guess that this gentleman was H—n; and then regretted it was not within his means to purchase so valuable a stone as that, which he termed a Brazilian diamond, and said that for the first time in his life he envied D— the means he possessed of doing good. This was attacking him in the right place, D— bought the jewel, gave him the price he asked, 175 francs, and then politely presented it to Mr Colton, as a token of his friendship. This same brooch Colton had repeatedly displayed at Poole's, previous to the above transaction, and did so many times afterwards, always declaring it to be worth some hundreds of pounds—this was generally believed; but after his death, when the few miserable remnants of his property were sold by auction, it was bought by Mr T—n, beforementioned, for the astounding sum of two shillings and eleven-pence, English money!!

"These schemes, however, would not last for ever, and Colton gradually fell lower and lower. B—d, the celebrated horse-dealer, was now his constant companion, and together they dragged out a miserable existence in the Faubourg St Germain; it could hardly be said they lived: occasionally Colton would visit Poole's, bringing with him his scanty pittance, usually accompanied by a jug of milk; and his appearance at this time was miserable indeed. Colton had strong prejudices, more especially with respect to his own country; 'd—n France, d—n Frenchmen, and d—n their very dogs,' he would often say—alas, he had good reason to abuse their dogs; one unlucky evening, we shall never forget it, poor Colton entered Poole's, 'H—l take France, dogs and all.'—'What is the matter, Parson?'—'Why, gentlemen, an infernal dog has followed me this last half hour, snapping continually at my pocket; there was no driving him away; at last he made a nibble, and with success, for, in throwing him off, the thief bolted with the skirt of my coat, containing my supper.' It was not to be wondered at; his pocket, which had been the repository of many similar loads, was so saturated with grease, that it must have proved a most tempting bait to a hungry dog. That evening he was doomed to be unfortunate, for, scarcely had he placed his milk between his feet upon the floor—its usual situation—than, forgetting in the heat of conversation to secure it, a dog upset the can, and when Colton remembered his milk, his four-footed friend was revelling in that, which to him was a disaster.

"Colton had been afflicted for many years with a violent disease, for which he was several times operated upon, and his sufferings had been so dreadful, that we have little doubt his intellect was affected by them; whether this was so or not, when the cholera raged so fearfully in Paris, he fled in the utmost alarm to Fontainebleau to avoid it, and there, as a novel method of avoiding contagion, and radically curing the disease with which he was tormented, he blew out his brains. Previous to the fatal act, strange, wayward being that he was, he made a will, by which he left property he did not possess to a Mr G., one of his associates; and upon a secretaire in the room was found this apothegm, the last he ever wrote: 'When life is unbearable, death is desirable, and suicide justifiable,' thus contradicting in his last moments, both by word and deed, what he had previously printed in 'Lacon;' where he says, speaking of a gamester, that 'If he die a martyr to his profession, he is doubly ruined. He adds his soul to every other loss; and, by the act of suicide, renounces earth to forfeit heaven!!'

Very good people have committed suicide, owing to some access of frenzy, acting upon a morbid temperament, or to the "last feather that breaks the horse's back;" but self-slaughter is so unnatural, that in general a certain violence, and hardness of character, are necessary to enable a man to go through it. Strong will in his own purposes, and little sympathy with other people, except inasmuch as they bend to it, will, in most instances, be found at the bottom of a suicide's character.

TABLE TALK.

HONEST AND GOOD TASTE IN GARDENS.

I know nothing more pleasant than the half kitchen—half flower-garden;—the few trees that extend a light shade—either the apple, with its spring shower of fair blossoms, tinted with the faintest crimson, and its summer show of fruit, reddening every day; or the cherry, with its scarlet multitude, berries more numerous than leaves. Below, long rows of peas put forth their white-winged flowers, tempting the small butterflies to flutter round their inanimate likenesses; or else of beans, whose fresh, sweet odour, when in bloom, might challenge competition with the sea-gales of the spice islands. Then the deep glossy green of the gooseberry is so well relieved by the paler shade of the currant bush; and alongside, spreading the verdant length of the strawberry bed, so beautiful in its first wealth of white blossoms—pale omens of the blushing fruit, which so soon hides beneath its large and graceful leaves. The strawberry is among fruits what the violet is among flowers. Then, I do so like the one or two principal walks, neatly edged with box, cut with most precise regularity, keeping guard over favourite plants: columbines, pink and purple, bending on their slender stems; rose-bushes covered with buds enow to furnish roses for months; pinks, with their dark eyes; and the orient glow of the marigold. And there are the spots planted with thyme, so sweet in its crushed fragrance; the sage, with that touch of hoar frost on its leaves, which, perhaps, has gained for it its popular name of wisdom; the sprig of lavender, with its dim and deep blue blossom, so lastingly sweet; and the emerald patches of the rapidly springing mustard and cress. I would not give a common garden like this, with the free air tossing its boughs, and the sun laughing upon its flowers, for all that glass and gardener ever brought from a hot-house. Many a quiet hour did Guido pass in that honey-sucked harbour, lulled by the murmuring bees, whose hives stood in the covert of a large old beech, the only tree not a fruit-tree in the chosen patch of ground.—Francesca Carrara.—[We wish Miss Landon would give us a whole novel, full of these charming pieces of candour and sweetness; or at least, with an overbalance of them, compared with the melancholy. We suspect we are a little unreasonable when we object so much to the darkness in which she seems to delight; but it is out of the very impatience of our sympathy and respect for her that we speak; and she is of a nature the very sorrows of which ought to turn into pleasure for others, and pleasure, too, not of an uneasy or perplexing description. Her very tears, produced by whatsoever clouds they may have been, belong to a generous soil, and should refresh it like the brooks, and make flowers and music for the world.]

NATURAL MISGIVING OF A MANY-THOUGHTED MIND.

On Sunday we used to assemble, my companions and I, to communicate our essays to each other. But I was soon disquieted by a singular apprehension. My own poetical lucubrations, of course, always appeared to me to be the best; but I soon remarked that my companions, who often brought very wretched compositions, thought no less highly of them than I did of mine. Another circumstance which also occupied my meditations, was the self-delusion of a young scholar, who was totally incapable of making verses. He used to get them composed by his master, and it is no wonder they seemed to him excellent: but he would persuade himself, at last, that he had made them; and although we were so intimately acquainted, he wished me to believe it likewise. Struck with the ridiculous folly of this conceit, I began to fear that I might be my own dupe also, and appear to him as foolish as he did in my eyes. This idea rendered me very uneasy. My judgment could not be decided by any irrefragable rule. I became discouraged. But the natural levity of my age, an internal consciousness, and the praises of my masters and relations, at length restored my confidence.—Goethe's Life.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr Landon on 'Purity of Language' &c. next week.

There are some of our poetical Correspondents, to whom we are very loth to say (but we must), that Chaucer and Shakspeare, at present, leave us no room whatever for the verses of others.

We shall gladly avail ourselves of the kind communications of a LOVER OF LONDON AND ITS JOURNAL.

Many thanks again to R. A.

CRIMINAL TRIALS.

Criminal Trials. Vol. II. (Library of Entertaining Knowledge Parts 53 and 54). Pp. 416.

THIS new volume of Mr Jardine's interesting and able work—unquestionably one of the most valuable contributions that have been lately made to English history—is entirely occupied with one of the most famous transactions in our annals, 'The Gunpowder Plot.' Not only from the extent and fullness of the narrative, and the great pains that have been bestowed in investigating and weighing the facts and evidence, but, from the large quantity of hitherto unpublished matter which it contains, the present account of that affair must supersede every other that has yet appeared; and indeed the extraordinary opportunities which the author has enjoyed of access not only to the State Paper Office, and the other depositories of information under the control of the government, but to documents in the hands of private individuals, together with the great diligence with which he has manifestly pursued his researches, make it extremely improbable that any more complete work upon the subject will be soon produced.

The source, he states in his preface, from which his chief materials have been drawn, is the collection of original documents respecting the plot, at the State Paper Office, arranged and indexed some years ago by Mr Lawson. These documents contain a large proportion of the depositions of more than five hundred witnesses and real or supposed confederates, which were taken during an enquiry of nearly six months by the Commissioners of the Privy Council, together with numerous contemporary letters and papers. Although partial extracts from this large mass of evidence have been published at different times, the whole has never till now been digested and arranged into a connected narrative. Other documents that are here printed have been obtained from the Baga de Secretis, preserved in the Crown Office. "The Baga de Secretis," says Mr Jardine, "is a depository for records of attainers, convictions, and other matters, chiefly relating to the title of the Crown to forfeited lands. From ancient usage, the most scrupulous care has always been observed in the custody of these records; the bag (which is in reality a large press, filled with records) being secured by three separate locks, the keys of which are separately kept by the Lord Chief Justice, the Attorney-General, and the Custos Brevium, and being never in practice opened without the concurrent authority of these officers. In consequence of this extreme caution in the custody of records supposed to affect the revenues of the Crown, permission has rarely been granted to open the Baga de Secretis, and consequently its contents have never been used for historical purposes." The Bodleian Library has also been ransacked, and has supplied some documents that are missing in the collections preserved in the public offices. Among the private manuscripts which have been used, one from which some of the most interesting details have been taken, is the relation by Father Greenway, in the possession of Dr Lingard, by whom it has been much referred to in his History of England. This narrative (the object of which is to exculpate Greenway and his brother Jesuit, Garnet, from the charge of having been among the number of the conspirators) is in the Italian language, but is evidently a translation from an English original. Another of the authorities of this description has a curious history.

"Much information," says the author, "respecting the family connexions of the conspirators, and the domestic history of the catholics shortly before the period of the Gunpowder Plot, has been derived from a mass of papers lately discovered in a singular manner at Rushton, in Northamptonshire. In the early part of the year 1832, on the removal of a lintel over an ancient doorway in the old mansion of the Treshams, at Rushton, a handsomely-bound breviary fell out upon the workmen. On further search, an opening was discovered in a thick stone wall, of about five feet long and fourteen or fifteen inches wide, almost filled with bundles of manuscripts, and containing about twenty Catholic books in excellent preservation. The contents of the manuscripts were various; consisting of historical note by Sir Thomas Tresham, rolled up with building bills, deeds, and farming contracts, of no interest and importance, and also of a portion of the domestic correspondence of the Tresham family between the years 1590 and 1605. The paper of the latest date is a memorandum, without a signature, of certain bonds, therein stated to have been delivered up to Mrs Tresham on the 28th of November 1605, by the writer of the memorandum. In all probability, therefore, this was about the period when these books and papers were enclosed. Sir Thomas Tresham died in September 1605, and his estates upon that event descended to Francis Tresham, his eldest son, the conspirator in the Gunpowder Plot. Upon his apprehension, which took place on the 14th of November, it is natural to suppose that his papers at Rushton would be destroyed or concealed by his friends. From the almost total absence of letters of a political tendency amongst the papers thus discovered, it is probable that all such were destroyed. By the liberality of Mr Hope, the present proprietor of Rushton, we have been favoured with a perusal of these papers; and though there is nothing among them specifically relating to the Gunpowder Plot, they contain much valuable information upon the condition and domestic history of the Catholics at that period, their expectations from James I, and their grievous disappointment on his accession; and they throw great light upon the causes which led to the conspiracy."

Having thus introduced the Tresham family to the reader's acquaintance, we may as well begin our extracts from the body of the work with an interesting passage relating to the father of the conspirator, who appears to have been a character of a very different mould and metal from his son. It occurs near the commencement of the work, in the course of a very striking exposition of the oppression endured by the Catholics in the reigns of Elizabeth and James.

"Sir Thomas Tresham, the father of Francis Tresham, one of the most conspicuous characters in the Gunpowder Treason, belonged to a family who, from very early times, had possessed a princely estate in Northamptonshire. On the restoration of the Knights Hospitallars of St John of Jerusalem by Queen Mary, his grandfather had been made Lord-Prior of that order. Sir Thomas Tresham himself was originally a Protestant, and was knighted by Elizabeth at Kenilworth in 1577; three years afterwards, when the first missionary priests came into England, he was converted by Campion and Parsons to the Catholic faith, and reconciled to the Church of Rome.* From the time of his conversion until his death, in 1606, he was constantly the subject of persecution. Shortly after Campion's apprehension in 1580, he was arrested and sent to the Fleet on suspicion of having harboured the missionaries; on his refusal to swear before the Council that Campion had not been at his house, he was prosecuted in the Star-Chamber, together with Lord Vaux, Sir William Catesby, and several other Catholics, and sentenced by the Court to pay a heavy fine, and to be imprisoned in the Fleet until he swore as required by the Council. Under this sentence Sir Thomas Tresham languished in close imprisonment for several years. He was afterwards repeatedly imprisoned, on the ground of his religion, in the Fleet and at Banbury Castle, for long periods of time, and also at Ely, which he terms, in some of his letters, his 'familiar prison.'† It appears also from the receipts at the Exchequer, that for more than twenty years he constantly paid 260*l.* per annum into the Treasury, being the statutory penalty of 20*l.* per lunar month for recusancy.‡ In a letter of his, dated the 7th of October 1604, he says that 'he had undergone full twenty-four years' term of restless adversity and deep disgrace, only for testimony of his conscience.' The resolute devotion of the old man to his religion appears from a letter to Lord Henry Howard, in July 1603, in which he says, that 'he has now completed his triple apprenticeship of one and twenty years in direct adversity, and that he should be content to serve a like long apprenticeship to prevent the foregoing of his beloved, beautiful, and graceful Rachel; for it seemed to him but a few days for the love he had to her.§'

In negotiations with the Catholic leaders before he came to the throne, and even for a short period after his accession, James perfidiously encouraged the hopes of the Catholics, that the new reign would bring them a new era. Mr Jardine has completely established this charge. By the summer of 1604, however, the true character and intention of the royal promises became evident; and at this period the author conceives that 'the design of blowing up the House of Lords with gunpowder, at the opening of Parliament, and thus destroying, at a single blow, the King, the Lords, and the Commons, first presented itself to the mind of Robert Catesby.' The gradual introduction into the dark project of the other conspirators is then minutely traced. The following is part of the notice of the individual of the number who has gained the greatest popular notoriety:—

"Guido, or Guy Fawkes, whose name has been more generally associated with this Plot than that of any of the other conspirators, in consequence of the prominent part he undertook in the execution of it, was a gentleman of good family, and respectable parentage in Yorkshire. His father, Edward Fawkes, was a notary at York, and held the office of Registrar and Advocate of the Consistory Court of the Cathedral Church there. He died in 1558, leaving a large family. Of the education and early history of Guy Fawkes nothing is known; but having spent the little property he derived from his father, he enlisted as a soldier of fortune in the Spanish army in Flanders, and was present at the taking of Calais, by the Archduke Albert, in 1598. He was well known to the English Catholics, and had been despatched by Sir William Stanley and Owen, from Flanders, to join Christopher Wright on his embassy to Philip II, immediately after Queen Elizabeth's death. Father Greenway, who knew all the conspirators intimately, describes him as 'a man of great piety, of exemplary temperance, of mild and cheerful demeanour, an enemy of broils and disputes, a faithful friend, and remarkable for his punctual attendance upon religious observances.' His society is stated, by the same authority, to have been 'sought by all the most distinguished in the Archduke's camp for nobility and virtue.' If this account of his character is correct, we are to look upon this man, not according to the popular notion, as a mercenary ruffian, ready for hire to perform the chief part in any tragedy of blood, but as an enthusiast whose understanding had been distorted by superstition, and in whom fanaticism had conquered the better feelings of nature. His conduct after the discovery of the Plot is quite consistent with the character of a fanatic."

The narrative of the progress of the operations which follows forms a tale of deep and fearful interest. Everything at this time conspired to throw the English Catholics into utter despair. The persecution of the government was becoming more active and unsparring every day, and the treaty of peace concluded in the autumn of 1604 with Spain, in which that power, upon whose influence and exertions great expectations had rested, had abandoned their cause almost without making an effort in their behalf, took from them their last hope. In May (as appears from the original agreement, dated the 24th of that month, which is preserved in the State Paper Office), a house next to the Parliament House, which was occupied by one Ferris, as tenant to Wionheard, the keeper of the king's wardrobe, was taken in the name of Thomas Percy, one of the conspirators. The design was to drive a mine from this house through the wall of the Parliament House, and in that way to place a large quantity of gunpowder immediately under the House of Lords. Fawkes, who was not known in London, was to keep possession of the house, under the assumed name of Johanson, as Percy's servant. Parliament, in the meantime, had been adjourned till the 7th of February 1605; and the conspirators, the better to prevent suspicion, separated and went to the country. Soon after, however, another house was taken at Lambeth, at which the powder might be collected in small quantities at a time, and afterwards removed by night to the house at Westminster. The custody of this house was given to a person of the name of Robert Keyes, after he had been sworn, and received as an associate in the plot. About the end of October, the conspirators again met in London; and it was now determined to proceed at once with the mine. But although a large quantity of powder had been already collected, they were obliged to defer the commencement of their operations by a singular incident. It was found that the Parliamentary Commissioners for arranging the union then proposed between England and Scotland, had appointed to hold their meetings in the house taken by Percy. It was therefore agreed to wait for another month. The narrative then proceeds:—

"Catesby and his confederates assembled together in London, according to their previous arrangement, about the 11th of December, at which time the conspirators, with the exception of Keyes, who remained at first at Lambeth, entered the house late at night. They had provided themselves with tools fit for making their excavation, and had taken with them a quantity of hard eggs, baked meats, and pasties, in order to avoid exciting suspicion by going frequently abroad for provisions. They began their work immediately by carrying a mine up to the stone-wall which separated the house in which they were from the Parliament House; this wall proved to be three yards in thickness, and finding their undertaking to be one of much greater labour and difficulty than they had anticipated, they first sent for Keyes from Lambeth, and then enlisted into their party Christopher, a younger brother of John Wright, to assist at the work. 'All which seven,' says Fawkes, 'were gentlemen of name and blood; and not any was employed in or about this action (no, not so much as in digging and mining) that was not a gentleman. And while the others wrought, I stood as sentinel to desory any man that came near; and when any man came near the place, upon warning given by me, they ceased until they had again notice from me to proceed; and we seven lay in the house, and had shot and powder, and we all resolved to die in that place before we yielded or were taken.' All day long they worked at the mine, carrying the earth and rubbish into a little building in the garden behind the house, and at night they removed it from the building into the garden, spreading it abroad, and covering it carefully over with turf. In this manner these determined men worked without intermission until Christmas-eve; and during the whole of that time not one of them showed himself in the upper part of the house, or was ever seen by the neighbours or passengers, excepting Fawkes, who was supposed to be keeping the house for his master Percy. Their principal reason for keeping close was to avoid raising a suspicion (which if so many notorious Catholics had been observed resorting to one house, would naturally have occurred) that they assembled there for religious purposes; and in that case a diligent search might have been instituted for the priest, which would at once have discovered the scheme."

While they were thus at work, the Parliament was again suddenly prorogued to the 3rd of October. On this they agreed to suspend their labours till after the Christmas holidays. Having met again at the time appointed, they had succeeded, by the beginning of February, in piercing about half through the stone wall.

* Fawkes's Examination, 8th November.—State-Paper Office.

"Father Greenway," proceeds the author, "observes that 'it seemed almost incredible that men of their quality, accustomed to live in ease and delicacy, could have undergone such severe labour; and especially that, in a few weeks, they should have effected much more than as many workmen would have done, who had been all their lives in the habit of gaining their daily bread by their labour.' In particular, he remarks that 'it was wonderful how Percy and Catesby, who were unusually tall men, could endure for so long a time the intense fatigue of working day and night in the stooping posture, which was rendered necessary by the straitness of the place.' Greenway also relates an incident which occurred while they were at work, and which is perhaps worth repeating, as an instance of the gross superstition of the times, and also as evincing the workings of conscience on the minds of the conspirators as they proceeded with their design. They were one day surprised by the sound of the tolling of a bell, which seemed to proceed from the middle of the wall under the Parliament House; all suspended their labour, and listened with alarm and uneasiness to the mysterious sound. Fawkes was sent for from his station above; the tolling still continued, and was distinctly heard by him as well as the others. Much wondering at this prodigy, they sprinkled the wall with holy water, when the sound instantly ceased. Upon this they resumed their labour, and after a short time the tolling commenced again, and again was silenced by the application of holy water. This process was repeated frequently for several days, till at length the unearthly sound was heard no more."

It was soon after this that, one morning while at work, they suddenly heard a rushing noise in a cellar, nearly above their heads. They at first thought that they had been discovered; but it turned out that the noise was occasioned by a person of the name of Bright, to whom the cellar belonged, selling off his coals, in order to remove. This cellar was found to be immediately under the House of Lords; and the conspirators now determined to abandon their mine, and hiring the cellar in Percy's name, at once to deposit their gunpowder here. Accordingly, about twenty barrels were immediately brought from Lambeth, and placed in the cellar, which was then locked up. This was about the beginning of May.

The parliament was afterwards once more prorogued till the 5th of November. As that day approached, the conspirators held frequent consultations for the final arrangement of their plans. Among other things, it was determined upon "that Fawkes, as a man of approved courage and of experience in emergencies, should be intrusted to set fire to the mine. This he was to do by means of a slow burning match, which would allow him full a quarter of an hour for his escape before the explosion took place. He was instantly to embark on board a vessel in the river, and to proceed to Flanders with the intelligence of what had been done."

A matter which from the first had given rise to much difference of opinion among the conspirators, was the arrangement of means by which certain persons should be saved from the intended destruction. They could neither agree upon who those persons should be, nor upon the plan that should be adopted to give them warning of the danger.

"In his own mind, Catesby had probably little compunction on this point, as he was heard to declare, that 'he made account of the nobility as of Atheists, fools, and cowards, and that lusty bodies would be better for the commonwealth than they.' In order, however, to allay the anxieties of those who had relations and friends in this dangerous predicament, he assured them that he had already ascertained that several of the Catholic peers would not be present at the meeting of Parliament; that he had spoken with Lord Montague, and had persuaded him to make suit to be absent from the Parliament altogether, on the ground that his single voice would not avail against the making of more penal laws against the Catholics; with respect to Lord Mordaunt, he declared that 'he would not for the chamber full of diamonds acquaint him with the secret, for that he knew that he could not keep it';† but that he was assured that his lordship would not take his seat until the middle of the Parliament, because he objected to sitting in his robes in the Parliament House while the King was at church. He also declared that he had good reason to believe that Lord Stourton would not come to town till the Friday after the meeting of Parliament. He further assured them that he wished, as much as they could do, that 'all the nobles that were Catholics might be preserved, and that tricks should be put upon them to that end; but, said he, 'with all that, rather than the project should not take effect, if they were as dear unto me as mine own son, they also must be blown up.'"

Everybody is aware of the manner in which the conspiracy is said to have been detected, by means of an anonymous letter received by Lord Montague at his mansion at Hoxton, on Saturday the 26th of October, ten days before the intended meeting of Parliament. Mr Jardine's examination of this part of the story is in the highest degree curious and interesting; but it is impossible for us to attempt to follow him even in the most meagre abstract. He shows it to be extremely probable that the letter to Lord Montague was merely a feint to conceal the manner in which and the individual by whom the communication was really made to the government. That person, also, contrary to the common opinion of later writers, he all but proves, by an induction of numerous particulars, to have been Francis Tresham, the eldest son and heir of Sir Thomas Tresham already mentioned, who had been received among the number of the conspirators only a few weeks before. His motives appear to have been partly a desire to save his intimate friend and relation Lord Montague and other persons in whom he was interested, partly a strong misgiving as to the chance of success, and, in consequence of that, an eager anxiety to shake himself free from an enterprise with which he regretted he had ever had anything to do. He seems to have been of an infirm and pusillanimous character, and his fidelity had been suspected by some of his associates from the moment of his joining the confederacy.

That the detection might be the more complete, nothing was done to interrupt the proceedings of the conspirators till their scheme should be matured. At length, shortly before midnight, on the eve of the fifth of November, Sir Thomas Knevet, a magistrate of Westminster, accompanied by several assistants, having suddenly repaired to the spot, found Fawkes just leaving the house, and on proceeding to examine the cellar, discovered thirty-six barrels of powder, in casks and hogheads, under a heap of billets. A dark lantern (still preserved in the Bodleian Library) was also found, with a light in it, in a corner behind the door, and a watch, with slow matches and touchwood, was taken from Fawkes, who was immediately bound and carried before the council at Whitehall.

"It was now about one o'clock in the morning. Such of the Council as slept at Whitehall were called, and the others who were in town summoned; and the doors and gates being secured, all assembled in the King's bedchamber. Fawkes was brought in and questioned. Undismayed by the suddenness of his apprehension, or by the circumstances of his nocturnal examination before the King and Council, this resolute fanatic behaved with a Roman firmness of nerve, which filled the minds of all who were present with astonishment, and his cool audacity naturally suggested a comparison with the conduct of Mutius Scaevola when brought before King Porcenna. To the impatient and hurried questions which were put to him with some violence and passion, he answered calmly and firmly. He said that 'his name was John Johnson, and that he was a servant of Thomas Percy;' he further declared 'that when the King had come to the Parliament House that day, and the Upper House had been sitting, he meant to have fired the match, and fled for his own safety before the powder had taken fire; and that if he had not been apprehended that night, he had blown up the Upper House, when the King, Lords, Bishops, and others had been there.' Being asked if his purpose had taken effect, what would have been done with the Queen's Majesty and her royal issue, he replied that 'if they had been there he could not have helped them.' Being further asked who were party or privy to this conspiracy, he answered that 'he could not resolve to accuse any.' Being asked by the King how he could conspire against his children and so many innocent souls, he answered, 'Dangerous diseases require a desperate remedy;' and when questioned as to his intentions by some of the Scotch courtiers, he told them that 'one of his objects was to blow them back into Scotland.' After a great part of the night had been spent in examination, Fawkes was sent with a guard to the Tower; where for the present we leave him, in order to trace the fortunes of his companions.

"Immediately after Fawkes had given notice of the visit of the Lord Chamberlain and Lord Montague to the cellar, Catesby and John Wright fled; Percy and Christopher Wright waited till they ascertained that Fawkes was seized, and then left London; but Rookwood and Keyes, who dwelt in the same lodging, and whose persons were not known in London, determined to remain till they received more conclusive intelligence. On going abroad the next morning they perceived amazement and terror in the countenances of all they met; the news of Fawkes's apprehension, and exaggerated rumours of a frightful plot discovered, were spread in every direction; guards of soldiers were placed not only at the palace gates, but at all the streets and avenues in the neighbourhood, and no person was allowed to pass. Upon this, being convinced that all was known, they also determined to fly. Keyes went away from London immediately; but Rookwood, who had placed relays of horses all the way to Dunchurch, lingered to the last moment, in order that he might be able to convey to his confederates in Warwickshire the latest intelligence of what had taken place in London. At eleven o'clock in the forenoon he also took horse and rode hastily away. About three miles beyond Highgate he came up with Keyes, in whose company he rode on for some distance. It does not distinctly appear what became of Keyes from this time until he was apprehended in Warwickshire several days afterwards. It is clear that he parted from Rookwood in Bedfordshire, and it may therefore be fairly conjectured that he went to Lord Mordaunt's house at Turvey, where his wife resided. Rookwood rode on to Brickhill, near which place he overtook first Catesby and John Wright, and shortly afterwards Percy and Christopher Wright; and from thence all five rode together with the utmost speed to Ashby St Legers, in Northamptonshire. The astonishing rapidity with which they travelled appears from the fact that Rookwood left London at about eleven o'clock in the forenoon and reached Ashby at six in the evening of the same day, a distance of nearly eighty miles. He says himself that 'he rode thirty miles of one horse in two hours,' and that 'Percy and John Wright cast off their cloaks and threw them into the hedge to ride the more speedily.'"

But we cannot further pursue the story of the fugitives, although their wild flight, their agitated consultations, their subsequent desperate attempt to excite a rising of the country in their support, the rapid desertion of their few followers, their terror and misery while hunted like beasts of prey, the stand which some of them made at last, and the butchery that ensued, the escape for the moment of others, their skulking in mysterious recesses within the walls of old mansions, and under trap-doors in the floor, their sufferings during their concealment, and their eventual discovery and capture, have all the interest of romance. The narrative as here given is enriched by numerous facts that have never before appeared in print.

Upon the trials themselves also we cannot enter. Suffice it to say, that they have never before been detailed with anything approaching to the minuteness and accuracy with which Mr Jardine has here extracted them from the original documents. The whole account of Garnet, the Jesuit, in particular, his concealment at Hendlip Hall, his singular connexion with Anne Vaux, the daughter of Lord Vaux, his discovery, his confinement in the Tower, his trial, his execution, the miracles that were alleged to follow his death, the spring of oil that was said to have broken out on the spot where he suffered, at the west-end of St Paul's Cathedral, and the ear of corn on which his effigy appeared depicted, and which stirred to so extraordinary a degree the superstition of the times,—all this will be found in the high heat degree curious and instructive. The long disquisition which follows on the question, as to the extent to which the Jesuits in particular, and the Catholics generally were probably implicated in the plot, distinguished as it is by good sense and perfect freedom from prejudice, will probably be considered by most readers as setting this question at rest. It is at any rate by far the most impartial, as well as the most masterly examination which the subject has yet received. We prefer, however, closing our notice, by quoting the following remarks from the earlier part of the work:—

"In a legal point of view, the only observations which suggest themselves respecting the trials of the chief conspirators are such as are common to all the state prosecutions of the time. The evidence appears to have consisted entirely of the written declarations of the several prisoners, and of a servant of Sir Everard Digby, and it is evident, from the report of the proceedings, that no witness was orally examined. Of the guilt of all the prisoners there could not be the shadow of a doubt; indeed all of them, as appears from the several examinations above given, had fully and circumstantially confessed their guilt before the trials, and though they all, excepting Sir Everard Digby, pleaded not guilty, no attempt was made by any of them to deny a full participation in all the villany of the plot. That the project amounted to high treason is unquestionable; the design of blowing up the Parliament House, when the King and Prince were there, was compassing and imagining the death of the King and the heir-apparent to the crown, within the literal meaning of the statute of treasons; while the conduct of the conspirators who assembled in Warwickshire, after the apprehension of Fawkes, and rode armed through the country in warlike array, in defiance of the established government, and exciting others to insurrection, was nothing short of open rebellion, and clearly constituted a 'levying of war against the King in his realm,' within the words of another clause of the same statute. In legal consideration, therefore, the justice of their conviction and sentence is too plain for discussion; and in a moral point of view, the most scrupulous objector to capital punishments will hardly consider the loss of life as too severe a retribution for an offence of such unexampled barbarity. The political situation of the Catholics,—resentment of the oppression and contumely which they had suffered,—the dread of further persecution, and, above all, perhaps, indignation at the faithless conduct of the King, were sufficient motives to insurrection; but the inhuman contrivance of the Gunpowder Plot can only be ascribed to the baneful influence of superstition; and it may be doubted whether there is any other engine by which the natural feelings of the human heart could be so far distorted and deadened, that the indiscriminate slaughter of several hundreds of persons could be considered as a laudable and pious undertaking.

"One of the most singular features of the history of this conspiracy was the character and description of the persons engaged in it. Dissolute and needy adventurers have been, at all times, the ready instruments in any scheme calculated to raise a storm on the surface of society, and produce confusion and uproar. Such characters may possibly gain by disturbance and revolution, and have, at all events, nothing to lose. Thus Catiline, at Rome, registered in his desperate band all the ruined spendthrifts; the disgraced, the idle, and the hopeless prodigals, who wander up and down a populous city, prepared alike for plunder or for outrage, as the opportunity presents itself. 'Semper in ciuitate,' says Sallust, 'quibus opes nulla sunt, videri odere, nova exoptant; odio suarum rerum mutari omnia student; turbidæque seditionibus sine curâ aluntur, quantum egestas facili habetur sine damno.' But in the case of the Gunpowder Treason, many of the conspirators, such as Robert Winter, Rookwood, Digby, Tresham, and Grant, were men of large possessions; others again, such as Percy, Fawkes, and Keyes, were engaged in useful and honourable occupations which raised them far above the temptation of want; not one of them but Catesby was in pecuniary difficulty, and his motive was clearly a religious one. In another respect also we find in this conspiracy men not usually acting in the ranks of insurrection;—men of mild and amiable manners, unaccustomed to tumult, and dwelling quietly in the midst of their respective families. It must have been a much more powerful motive than any of those that usually influence the actions of mankind, which could induce such persons to do violence to their nature and their usual habits, and produce strange delusion that, in committing a barbarous murder,—'a murder,' as it has been termed, 'of a whole nation in their representatives,'—they were performing an action by which they secured to themselves the approbation of Heaven.

"Notwithstanding the occasional misgivings suggested by humanity and conscience to the minds of the conspirators, it is clear that they were really actuated by a mistaken sense of duty, and that many of them maintained to the last a conviction that their project was not only justifiable, but in the highest degree meritorious in the sight of God. Father Greenway relates, that as Rookwood was being drawn to the place of execution, his lady stood at an open window in the Strand, giving him words of comfort as he passed, and calling upon him to be of good courage, inasmuch as he suffered for a great and noble cause. In the conversation between Fawkes and Robert Winter in the Tower, above related, the latter says, 'Nothing grieves me, but there is not an apology made by some to justify our doings in this business; but our deaths will be a sufficient justification of it, and it is for God's cause.' Casaubon, in his Epistle to Fronto Ducaeus, which we shall have occasion to notice more fully hereafter in the case of Garnet, mentions the following fact respecting another of the conspirators. 'John Grant,' says he, 'once the traitors, on the very day when he was to be executed for his share in this plot, was entreated by a pious and learned clergyman, to entertain, at the last, a proper sense of his situation, and duly reflecting upon the magnitude of his crime, with hearty penitence to seek for pardon from Heaven." Grant replied, with a cheerful countenance, and full of confidence, 'I am satisfied that our project was so far from being sinful, that I rely entirely upon my merits in bearing a part of that noble action, as an abundant satisfaction and expiation for all sins committed by me during the rest of my life.'

LAMARTINE'S PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND

Souvenirs, Impressions, Pensées, et Paysages, pendant un Voyage en Orient (1832-1833), ou Notes d'un Voyageur. Par M. Alphonse de Lamartine, Membre de l'Académie Française. En deux volumes. Tome I. London. Reprinted for Edward Churton.

A Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, &c. &c. By Alphonse de Lamartine, &c. 3 vols. post 8vo. London. Richard Bentley.

UNDER a slight change of title the latter of these two works is a translation of the former one, which appeared lately at Paris, and is now in the course of republication in London. The reprint, which bears Mr Churton's name, is exceedingly well got up, with good paper and type, and, as far as we have examined, with a very correct text; it is also remarkably cheap, as the volume contains as much as two of the volumes of the French edition, and only costs six shillings. Another volume which, we believe, is nearly ready, will complete the work. The entire translation, published by Mr Bentley, is done in a superior manner, and will, no doubt, prove very acceptable to the many who cannot read the original. The three volumes are elegantly printed, and the first contains a portrait of the author. Having done this justice to our English publishers, we will now say a few words about M. de Lamartine (who has long been esteemed one of the first of the living poets of France) in his new capacity of traveller.

No one acquainted with this writer's character, or his preceding works, will expect that these volumes should contain much accurate statistical information, or any detailed descriptions of the countries passed through, with their manners, customs, and habits. De Lamartine has not the turn of mind necessary for such subjects. He has travelled as a poet, and his work is rather a prose poem on feelings suggested by the objects he saw, than a book of travels. We confess, that to us, his strain of sentimentality seems somewhat too long drawn out and unvaried, but we have been occasionally delighted by its tone, and doubt not that many will relish the whole of the melody. The book which it most resembles is Chateaubriand's well-known 'Itinerary from Paris to Jerusalem.' M. de Lamartine, however, after his peregrinations in the Holy Land, went on to Smyrna and Constantinople; and, after staying some time in the Turkish capital, returned homewards by land, passing in his way through Servia, on which very imperfectly known country he has collected some highly interesting notes. We are not quite sure that these notes are not the best part of the work; but the large majority of readers will probably be more delighted with the author's musings and speculations in the city of Jerusalem and its neighbourhood. M. de Lamartine is a sentimentally-religious man, and a lover of kings, and he seems to think that these things must go together, and that no one can be religious without being a royalist, or have any veneration for the scenes of Scripture unless he have an awful respect for the scenes of courts. We need scarcely look into this naked fallacy. Milton, who was a religious man, and one of the greatest poets that ever lived, did not love kings. And who would have trod the soil of Palestine with such reverential feet as Milton?—or who, like him, ever doted in imagination on the secret tops of Oreb and Sinai, on the hill of Sion, and

"Silos's brook that flow'd Fast by the oracle of God?"

Among the things which have least pleased us in these volumes is M. de Lamartine's account of a visit he paid to Lady Esther Stanhope, who, after spending nearly the whole of her fortune in vain attempts to rival the splendour of the oriental princes of the Arabian nights, now lives cooped up among the druses of Mount Lebanon, figuring away as a conjuror and fortune-teller, and keeping a bay mare on which the new Messiah (when he comes) is to ride into reconquered Jerusalem, and a spotless white mare on which she (Lady E. S.) is to ride by his side. The poor woman is notoriously crazed, and much to be pitied; but we have no patience with de Lamartine, who mystified common sense, and writes in such a manner as to invest her wretched hallucinations with an air of solemnity, and a shadowy, awful mysteriousness.

The same thing was attempted a few years ago by an English traveller; and between Doctor Madden, who, it is suspected, never saw the lady in question, and Monsieur de Lamartine, insanity has been made strikingly picturesque, and poor Lady Esther converted into a heroine of romance. We cannot help thinking that our French friend was slightly infected with the malady of the place when he wrote what he has written about his aristocratic birth, his glory, his verses, and his foot.

"You will go back to Europe," she said, "but you will not long delay your return to the East. It is your country."

"It is, at least, Lady Esther, the country of my imagination."

"Do not laugh," she said, "it is your true country; it is the country of your forefathers; I am sure of it—look at your foot."

"I see nothing there," said I, "but the dust of your roads which covers it, and of which I should be ashamed in a drawing-room of old Europe."

"That is not it!" she answered hastily, "look at your foot."

"I had never before observed myself what she was going to say about my high instep."

"Look!" she continued, "your instep is very high; there is a space between your heel and your toes when your foot is on the ground, sufficient to let water run through it without wetting the sole. (Query—Did Monsieur wear Parisian boots, which are apt to be very high in the heel?) It is the foot of the Arab—the foot of the East. You are a child of these climates, and the day is approaching, when every man shall return to the land of his fathers. We shall see each other again."

We turn with pleasure from such balderdash as this, which does not often disgrace the volumes before us, to give a specimen of de Lamartine's beautiful scenic descriptions.

"This city (Jerusalem) is not, as it has been represented, an unshapely and confused mass of ruins and ashes, over which a few Arab cottages are thrown, or a few Bedouin tents pitched; neither is it like Athens, a chaos of dust and crumbling walls, where the traveller seeks in vain the shadow of edifices, the trace of streets, the phantom of a city;—but it is a city shining in light and colour! presenting nobly to view her intact and battlemented walls, her blue mosque with its white colonades, her thousand resplendent domes, from which the rays of the autumnal sun are reflected in a dazzling vapour; the façades of her houses, tinted by time and heat, of the yellow and golden hue of the edifices of Pæstum or of Rome; her old towers, the guardians of her walls, to which neither one stone, one loophole, nor one battlement is wanting; and above all, amidst that ocean of houses, that cloud of little domes which cover them, is a dark elliptical dome, larger than the others, overlooked by another and a white one. These are the churches of the Holy Sepulchre and of Calvary; from hence they are confounded and appear drowned in the labyrinth of domes, edifices, and streets, which encompass them; and one finds it difficult to credit such a situation for Calvary and the Sepulchre; which, according to the ideas we derive from the gospel history, should be placed on a separate hill without the walls, and not in the centre of Jerusalem. The city, confined on the side of Mount Sion, has no doubt enlarged herself on the north to embrace within her circuit those two sites which make her shame and glory, that of the murder of the just man, and the resurrection of the incarnate Deity!

Such is the city from the height of the Mount of Olives! She has no horizon behind her to the west nor to the north. The line of her walls and her towers, the points of her numerous minarets, the arches of her shining domes, stand out in bold relief against the deep blue of an orient sky; and the town, thus exhibited on its broad and elevated platform, seems again to shine in all the antique splendour of its prophecies, or to be only waiting the word to rise in dazzling glory from its seventeen successive ruins, and to be transformed into that New Jerusalem which is to come out of the bosom of the desert, radiant with brightness.

The view is the most splendid that can be presented to the eye, of a city that is no more; for she still seems to exist as one full of life and youth; but on contemplating the scene with more attention, we feel that it is really no more than a fair vision of the city of David and Solomon. No noise arises from her squares and streets, no roads lead to her gates from the east or from the west, from the north or from the south, except a few paths winding among the rocks, on which you meet only half-naked Arabs, some camel-drivers from Damascus, or women from Bethlehem or Jericho, carrying on their heads a basket of raisins from Engaddi, or a cage of doves, to be sold on the morrow under the trebinthus beyond the city gates.—No one passed in or out; no mendicant even was seated against her curbstones; no sentinel showed himself at her threshold; we saw, indeed, 'no living object, heard no living sound; we found the same void, the same silence, at the entrance of a city containing thirty thousand' souls, during the twelve hours of the day, as we should have expected before the entombed gates of Pompeii or Herculaneum.

We saw nothing pass the gate of Damascus, except four funeral processions, silently winding their way along the walls to the Turkish cemetery; nor the gate of Sion, while we were within view, except a poor Christian, who died in the morning of the plague, and was carried by four grave-diggers to the Grecian burial-place."

In his appendix, M. de Lamartine gives a curious chapter of 'Political Reflections;' in which he speculates on the imminent fall of the empire of the Turks, and on the proper mode of disposing of their territory. We cannot go into these matters, but they are of the greatest importance; and although our author's scheme of forming Russia, Austria, England, and France, into four protectorates, each of which is to hold a certain portion of Turkey, does not seem to be at present of very easy accomplishment, we think it merits attention, while the eloquence with which it is set forth cannot fail in affording some gratification.

The appendix is further enriched by a very curious narrative of the residence of a certain Fatalla Sayeghir among the wandering Arabs of the great desert, which has been collected and translated by the care of Monsieur de Lamartine.

COWPER'S WORKS.

The Works of William Cowper. His Life and Letters. By William Hayley, Esq. Now first completed, by the Introduction of Cowper's Private Correspondence. Edited by the Rev. T. S. Grimshawe, A.M., Rector of Burton, Northamptonshire, &c. &c. Vols. I, II, III, IV. Small 8vo. London, Saunders and Otley.

WILLIAM COWPER is 'one of the most delightful of our domestic poets, and, probably, the very best letter-writer in our language.—For familiar, epistolary correspondence, which ought to be as free and as flowing as one's conversation, all prescribed models are dangerous;—but we think nobody can study Cowper's letters without advantage, and without finding that all their charm lies in the presence of nature and simplicity, and the absence of all affectation, and effort, prescription, and imitation. His works, altogether, are well suited to the people at large; and we are glad to see them brought out in this cheap and elegant edition, which is embellished with views of the different places where the poet and recluse resided, and the scenes he celebrated in his beautiful verses.

Another edition, to be issued like this in monthly volumes, was announced some time ago, but has not as yet begun to make its appearance. There is, however, good room for both, and we wish them both success. In the present edition there are above a hundred letters, chiefly on religious topics, which, although they have appeared before in another form, are the copy-right of the publishers, and cannot be included in any other edition of Cowper.

LEICESTER SQUARE AND ST MARTIN'S LANE.

St Martin's lane, and Leicester square.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.—Hogarth.—Sir Isaac Newton.

ST. MARTIN'S LANE (see Charing Cross, for a notice of the church) was once as famous for artists as Newman street has been since. In Salisbury court and in St Martin's lane the Royal Academy may be said to have originated, for in those places successively its original members first came together as a society established by themselves. Perhaps there was not a single artist, contemporary with Sir Joshua, who was unconnected with St Martin's lane, either as a lodger, student, or visitor. Old Slaughter's coffee-house in the same lane, became celebrated on the same account, and as a resort of the contemporary wits, especially Hogarth, who may be said to have amalgamated in his works the wit and the painter. St Martin's lane and Leicester square are the head-quarters of the memory of English art. In the annals of the former we meet with the names of Wilson and Gainsborough: in the latter flourished and died, Hogarth and Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Sir Joshua's house in Leicester square was on the eastern side, four doors from Sydney's alley. It was there he kept a handsome table, and was visited by Johnson and Goldsmith, and had the whole round of the fashionable world fluttering before him, and steadying itself to become immortal in his pictures: if, indeed, immortal they are to be, in the ordinary meaning of that word; for out of certain misgivings which perhaps argued a want of perfect claim to that destiny, he dabbled in experiments upon colour, which have failed; and his pictures, though but of yesterday, already look old and worn out, while Titian's are as blooming as Apollo.

Hogarth, the greatest name in English art, lived in one of the two houses which now form Sabloniere's hotel. It was the one to the north. He was a little bustling man, with a face more lively than refined, a sort of knowing, jockey look; and was irritable and egotistical, but not ungenerous. As a painter, he did what no man ever did before or since,—brought out the absurdities of artificial life, and fairly painted even goods and chattels with a meaning! His intentions were less profound than his impulses; that is to say, he sometimes had a professed common-place in view, as in the instance of the Industrious and Idle Apprentice, while the execution of it was full of much higher things and profounder humanities. As to the rest, if ever there was a wit on canvass, it was he. To take one instance alone, his spider's web over the poor's box is a union of remote ideas, coalescing but too perfectly.*

"Showed vice her own features, scorn her own image,"

* For masterly criticisms on Hogarth, see the 'Works of Charles Lamb,' vol. II, p. 88, and the 'Picture Galleries of England,' p. 181.

Leicester square, formerly Leicester fields, was not built upon till towards the restoration of Charles II. It took its name from a family mansion of the Sydneys, Earls of Leicester, which stood on the north side, on the site of the present houses and of Leicester place. "It was for a short time," says Pennant, "the residence of Elizabeth, daughter of James I, the titular Queen of Bohemia, who, on February 13th, 1661, here ended her unfortunate life. It has been tenanted for a great number of years. It was successively the pouting-place of princes. The late King [George II], when Prince of Wales, after he had quarrelled with his father, lived here several years. His son Frederic followed his example, succeeded him in his house, and in it finished his days."

"Behind Leicester House," the same author informs us, "stood, in 1658, the Military-yard, founded by Henry Prince of Wales, the spirited son of our peaceful James. M. Faubert afterwards kept here his academy for riding and other gentleman-like exercises, in the reign of Charles II, which, in later years, was removed to Swallow street, opposite the end of Conduit street. Part is retained for the purpose of a riding-house; the rest is converted into a work-house for the parish of St James's."

But the glory of the neighbourhood of Leicester fields is in St Martin's street, where the house is still remaining which was occupied by the great Newton.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

CHARING CROSS AND WHITEHALL.

Contents:—Old Charing Cross, and New St Martin's Church.—Statue of Charles I.—Execution of Regicides.—Ben Jonson.—Wallingford House, now the Admiralty.—Villiers, Duke of Buckingham; Sir Walter Scott's account of him.—Misrepresentation of Pope respecting his death.—Charles's horse a satirist. Locket's Ordinary.—Sir George Etherege.—Prior and his uncle's tavern.—Thompson.—Spring Gardens.—Mrs Centlivre.—Dorset place, and Whitcomb street, &c., formerly Hedge Lane.—The wits and the bailiffs. Suffolk street.—Swift and Miss Vanhomrigh.

In the reign of Edward I, on the country road from London to Westminster, stood the hamlet of Charing; a rustic spot, containing a few houses, and the last cross set up by that Prince in honour of the resting-places of his wife's body on its way to interment in the Abbey. The Cross was originally of wood, but afterwards of stone. The reader may see it in the old map of London by Aggas. He will there observe, that towards the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, Charing Cross was united with London on the Strand side, and at little intervals with Whitehall; but Spring gardens was then, and long after, what its name implies; and, in the reign of Charles II, Hedge lane (now Whitcomb street) and the Haymarket, were still real lanes and passages into the fields. In Elizabeth's time you might set out from the site of the present Pall-mall, and leaving St Giles in the Fields on the right hand, walk all the way to Hampstead without encountering perhaps a dwelling place. Lovers plucked flowers in Cranbourne alley, and took moonlight walks in St James's market.

On this spot, in Dr Johnson's opinion, is to be found the fullest "tide of human existence" in the metropolis. We know not how that may be at present when the tide is so full everywhere; but Charing Cross has long been something the reverse of a rural village, and is now exhibiting one of the newest and grandest evidences of an improving metropolis. By way of north front, the Mews (formerly the mews of the King's falcons), is giving way to a palace for the Fine Arts; on the west is a very handsome edifice, including the new college of Physicians; on the east, St Martin's church has obtained its long desired opening; and in the midst of these buildings and of the Strand-end, is to be a new square, named after the greatest of our naval victories.

"In the reign of Henry VIII," says Pennant, speaking of St Martin's, "a small church was built here at the King's expense, by reason of the poverty of the parishioners, who possibly were at that period very poor. In 1607 it was enlarged because of the increase of buildings. In 1721 it was found necessary to take the whole down, and in five years from that time this magnificent temple was completed at the expense of near thirty-seven thousand pounds. This is the best performance of Gibbs, the architect of the Ratsliffe Library. The steeple is far the most elegant of any of that style which I named the pepper-box; and with which (I beg pardon of the good people of Glasgow) I marked their boasted steeple of St Andrew."

Our lively biographer seems chiefly to admire the steeple of this church. The Corinthian portico, we believe, is the usual object of praise. Both of them may deserve praise separately; nor, indeed, will their size and situation allow them to be regarded with indifference in conjunction; but the elevation of the steeple on the neck of the church, or without any apparent or proper base to rest upon, is a fault not to be denied; and Mr Pennant perhaps would not have been in the wrong, had he found an ill name for steeples in general, as well as for the species which he "peppered." Steeples, however noble, and porticos, however Greek, can never truly coalesce. The finest steeple with a portico to it is but an excrescence and an anomaly, a horn growing out of the church's neck. The Italians felt this absurdity so much, that they have often made a separate building of the steeple, converting it into a beautiful tower aloof from the church, as in the instances of the famous Hanging Tower in Pisa, and the Campanile in Florence. Suppose a shaft like the Monument, in a space near St Martin's church, and the church itself a proper building with a portico, like St Paul's, Covent garden, and you have an improvement in the Italian style. The best thing to say for — sharpened steeples high shot up in air

* Pennant, p. 120.

(as the poet calls them) is, that they seem to be pointing to heaven, or running up into space like an intimation of interminability. An idea of this kind is supposed to have given rise to them. But they always have a meagre, incongruous look, considered in their union with the body to which they are attached. Their best appearance is at a distance, and when they are numerous, as in the view of a great city; but even then, how inferior are they to the massive dignity of such towers as those of Westminster Abbey, or to a dome like that of St Paul's! The origin of the word Charing is unknown. The cross was destroyed during the Reformation. The spot where it stood is occupied by the statue of Charles I, originally the property of the Earl of Arundel, for whom it was a cast by Le Scur in 1633. It was not placed in its present situation till the decline of the reign of Charles II. The pedestal is the work of Grinling Gibbons. The statue had been condemned by parliament to be sold and broken in pieces; "but John River, the brazier who purchased it," says Pennant, "having more taste or more loyalty than his masters, buried it unutilized and shewed to them some broken pieces of brass in token of his obedience. M. D'Archenholz gives a diverting anecdote of this brazier, that he cast a vast number of handles of knives and forks in brass, which he sold as made of the broken statue. They were bought with great eagerness by the loyalists, from affection to their monarch; by the rebels as a mark of triumph over the murdered sovereign." The sovereign now faces Whitehall as if in triumph: yet behind the Banqueting house lurks a statue of another of this unfortunate race, who lost his throne for attempting to renew the dictatorial spirit which cost his ancestor his head. The omission of the horse's girth in this statue has been thought a singular instance of forgetfulness in the artist. But it is hardly possible he could have forgotten it. Most likely he took a poetical license, and rejected what might have hurt the symmetry of his outline.

Charles's memory, like this life, was destined to be connected with tragedies. On this spot, before the statue was erected, a number of the regicides were executed with tortures; and till of late years it was a place for the pillory. Harrison died there, Scrope, Colonel Jones, Hugh Peters, and others of those extraordinary men, who, in welcoming a bloody death, gave the last undoubted proof that they were real patriots as well as bigots. The spirit in which they died (bold and invincible, though, in the very glow and loquacity evincing that lingering love of life which is so effecting to one's own mortality) had such an effect on the public that the king was advised not to have any more such executions near the court, and the scaffold was accordingly removed to Tyburn. A ghastly story is related of Harrison;—that after he was cut down alive (according to his sentence) and had his bowels removed and burnt before his face by the executioner, he rose up and gave the man a box on the ear. He had behaved with great patience before this half-death; so that there appears to have been something of delirium in this action,—the action, perhaps, of a being feeling himself to be no longer under the ordinary condition of his species.

The particular sort of religious enthusiasm evinced by these men is now as obsolete as some of the absurdities which they fought against, and others which they would have upheld; but there are passages of lasting interest in the account of their last moments which the reader will perhaps expect to see.

As Harrison was going to suffer, "one in derision called to him and said, 'where is your Good Old Cause?' He with a cheerful smile clapt his hand on his breast, and said 'Here it is, and I am going to seal it with my blood!' And when he came to the sight of the gallows, he was transported with joy, and his servant asked him how he did; he answered 'Never better in my life!' His servant told him, Sir, there is a crown of glory ready prepared for you. O yes, said he, I see. When he was taken off the sledge, the hangman desired him to forgive him. I do forgive thee, said he, with all my heart, as it is a sin against me; and told him he wished him all happiness. And further said, Alas, poor man, thou dost it ignorantly; the Lord grant that this sin may not be laid to thy charge! And putting his hand into his pocket gave him all the money he had, and so parting with his servant, hugging of him in his arms, he went up the ladder with an undaunted countenance.

"The people observing him to tremble in his hands and legs, he, taking notice of it, said:—

"Gentlemen, by reason of some scoffing that I do hear, I judge that some do think I am afraid to die, by the shaking I have in my hands and knees; I tell you, no, but it is by reason of much blood I have lost in the wars, and many wounds I have received in my body, which caused this shaking and weakness in my nerves; I have had it this twelve years: I speak this to the praise and glory of God; he hath carried me above the fear of death; and I value not my life, because I go to my Father, and am assured I shall take it again.

"Gentlemen, take notice, that for being instrumental in that cause, and instrument of the Son of God, which hath been pleaded amongst us, and which God hath to my appeals and wonderful victories, I am brought to this place to suffer death this day, and if I had ten thousand lives, I could freely and cheerfully lay them down all, to witness to this matter."

The time of Colonel Jones's departure being come, "this aged gentleman," says the account, "was drawn in one sledge with his aged companion Scrope, whose grave and graceful countenances, accompanied with courage and cheerfulness, caused great admiration and compassion in the spectators, as they passed along the streets to Charing Cross, the place of their execution; and after the executioner had done his part upon three others that day, he was so drunk with blood, that, like one sarfeited, he grew sick at stomach; and not being able himself, he set his boy to finish the tragedy upon Col. Jones." The night before he died he "told a friend he had no other temptation but this, lest he should be too much transported, and carried out to neglect and slight his life, so greatly was he satisfied to die in that cause."

"The day he suffered, he grasped a friend in his arms, and said to him with some expressions of endearment, Farewell: I could wish thee in the same condition with myself, that thou mightest share with me in my joys."

The famous Hugh Peters, the commonwealth preacher, whom Burnet speaks of as an "enthusiastical buffoon," and a very "vicious man," is thought by a greater loyalist (Burke) to have had "hard measure dealt him at the Restoration." He calls him a "poor good man." Peters was afraid at first he should not behave himself with the proper courage, but rallied his spirits afterwards, and according to the account published by his friends (and all the accounts, it should be observed, emanate from that side), no man appears to have behaved better. Burnet says otherwise, and that he was observed all the while to be drinking cordials to keep him from fainting, and Burnet's testimony is not to be slighted, though he seems too readily to have taken upon trust some evil reports of Peters's life and manners, which the "poor man" expressly contradicted in prison. Be this as it may, "Being carried," says the account, "upon the sledge to execution, and made to sit thereon within the rails at Charing Cross to behold the execution of Mr Cook, one comes to him, and upbraided him with the death of the King, bidding him (with opprobrious language) to repent: he replied, Friend, you do not well to trample upon a dying man; you are greatly mistaken, I had nothing to do in the death of the King.

"When Mr Cook was cut down and brought to be quartered, one they called Colonel Turner, called to the Sheriff's men to bring Mr Peters near that he might see him; and by and by the hangman came to him all besmeared in blood, and rubbing his bloody hands together, he tauntingly asked, 'Come, how do you like this, how do you like this work?' To whom he replied, 'I am not, I thank God, terrified at it; you may do your worst.'

"When he was going to his execution, he looked about and espied a man to whom he gave a piece of gold (having bowed it first), and desired him to go to the place where his daughter lodged, and to carry that to her as a token from him, and to let her know that his heart was as full of comfort as it could be, and that before that piece should come into her hands he should be with God in glory.

"Being upon the ladder, he spake to the Sheriff, saying, Sir, you have here slain one of the servants of God before mine eyes, and have made me to behold it on purpose to terrify and discourage me; but God hath made it an ordinance to me for my strengthening and encouragement.

"When he was going to die, he said, What! Seest thou unwilling to go to God through the fire and jaws of death? Oh (said he), this is a good day, he is come that I have long looked for, and I shall be with him in glory; and so smiled when he went away.

"What Mr Peters said farther at his execution, either in his speech or prayer, it could not be taken, in regard his voice was low at that time, and the people uncivil."

Ben Jonson is supposed to have been born in Hartshorn lane, Charing Cross, where he lived when a little child. "Though I cannot," says Fetter, "with all my industrious inquiry, find him in his cradle, I can fetch him from his long coats. When a little child he lived in Hartshorn lane, Charing Cross, when his mother married a bricklayer for her second husband. He was first bred in a private school in St Martin's court; then in Westminster school." But we shall have other occasions of speaking of him elsewhere.

The famous reprobate Duke of Buckingham, William, the second of that name, was born in Wallingford house, which stood on the site of the present Admiralty. "The Admiralty Office," says Pennant, "stood originally in Duke street, Westminster: but in the reign of King William was removed to the present spot, to the house then called Wallingford, I believe from its having been inhabited by the Knollys, Viscounts Wallingford. From the roof the pious Usher, Archbishop of Armagh, then living here with the Countess of Peterborough, was prevailed on to take the last sight of his beloved master Charles I. when brought on the scaffold before Whitehall. He sank at the horror of the sight, and was carried in a swoon to his apartment." Wallingford house was often used by Cromwell and others in their consultations.

"The present Admiralty office," continues Pennant, "was rebuilt in the late reign, by Ripley: it is a clumsy pile, but properly veiled from the street by Mr Adam's handsome screen." Where the poor Archbishop sank in horror at the sight of the misguided Charles, telegraphs now ply their dumb and far-seen discourses, like spirits in the guise of mechanism, and tell news of the spread of liberty and knowledge all over the world. Of the Villierses, Dukes of Buckingham, who have not heard? The first one was a favourite not unworthy of his fortune, open, generous, and magnificent; the second, perhaps because he lost his father so soon, a spoiled child from his cradle, wilful, debauched, unprincipled, but witty and entertaining. Here, and at York house in the Strand, he turned night into day, and pursued his intrigues, his concerts, his dabbings in chemistry and the philosopher's stone, and his designs on the crown: for Charles's character, and the devices of Buckingham's fellow quacks and astrologers persuaded him that he had a chance of being king. When a youth, he compounded with Cromwell, and married Fairfax's daughter;—he was afterwards all for the king, when he was not "all for rhyming" or outsting him;—when an old man, or near it (for these prodigious possessors of animal spirits have a trick of lasting a long while), he was still a youth in improvidence and dissipation, and his whole life was a dream of uneasy pleasure. He is now best known from Dryden's masterly portrait of him in the 'Absalom and Achitophel.'

Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong,
Was everything by starts, and nothing long;
But in the course of one revolving moon,
Was chemist, fiddler, statesman, and buffoon;
Then all for women, painting, rhyming, drinking,
Besides ten thousand freaks that died in thinking.
Blind madmen! who could every hour employ
With something new to wish or to enjoy!
Railing and praising were his usual themes;
And both, to show his judgment, in extremes;
So over violent, or over civil,
That every man with him was God or devil.*
In squandering wealth was his peculiar art;
Nothing went unrewarded but desert.
Beggared by fools, whom still he found too late,
He had his jest, and they had his estate.
He laughed himself from court; then sought relief
By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief;
For spite of him, the weight of business fell
On Absalom, or wise Achitophel;†
Thus wicked but in will, of means bereft,
He left not faction, but of that was left."

"This inimitable description," observes Sir Walter Scott, in a note on the subject, "refers, as is well known, to the famous George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, son of the favourite of Charles I. who was murdered by Felton. The Restoration put into the hands of the most lively, mercurial, ambitious, and licentious genius who ever lived, an estate of 20,000*l.* a year, to be squandered in every wild scheme which the lust of power, of pleasure, of license, or of whim could dictate to an unrestrained imagination. Being refused the situation of President of the North, he was suspected of having favoured the disaffected in that part of England, and was disgraced accordingly. But in 1666 he regained the favour of the King, and became a member of the famous administration called the Cabal, which first led Charles into unpopular and arbitrary measures, and laid the foundation for the troubles of his future reign. Buckingham changed sides about 1675, and becoming attached to the country party, made a most active figure in all proceedings which had relation to the Popish plot; intrigued deeply with Shaftesbury, and distinguished himself as a promoter of the bill of exclusion. Hence, he stood an eminent mark for Dryden's satire; which we may believe was not the less poignant, that the poet had sustained a personal affront, from being depicted by his graven under the character of Bayes in the 'Rehearsal.' As Dryden owed the Duke no favour, he has shown him none. Yet even here the ridiculous rather than the infamous part of his character is touched upon; and the unprincipled libertine, who slew the Earl of Shrewsbury while his adulterous countess held his horse in the disguise of a page, and who boasted of caressing her before he changed the bloody clothes in which he had murdered her husband, is not exposed to hatred, while the spendthrift and castle builder are held up to contempt. So just, however, is the picture drawn by Dryden, that it differs little from the following sober historical account.

"The Duke of Buckingham was a man of great parts, and an infinite deal of wit and humour; but wanted judgment, and had no virtue, or principle of any kind. These essential defects made his whole life one train of inconsistencies. He was ambitious beyond measure, and implacable in his resentments; these qualities were the effects or different faces of his pride; which, whenever he pleased to lay aside, no man living could be more entertaining in conversation. He had a wonderful talent in turning all things into ridicule; but, by his own conduct, made a more ridiculous figure in the world, than any other he could, with all his vivacity of wit and turn of imagination, draw off others. Frolic and pleasure took up the greatest part of his life: and in these he had neither any taste nor set himself any bounds; running into the wildest extravagances and pushing his debaucheries to a height, which even a libertine age could not help censuring as downright madness. He inherited the best estate which any subject had at that time in England; yet his profuseness made him always necessitous, as that necessity made him grasp at everything that would help to support his expenses. He was lavish without generosity, and proud without magnanimity; and though he did not want some bright talents, yet no good one ever made part of his composition; for there was nothing so mean that he would not stoop to, nor anything so flagrantly impious but he was capable of undertaking."

"Buckingham's death," concludes the commentator, "was as awful a beacon as his life. He had dissipated a princely fortune and lost both the means of procuring and the power of enjoying the pleasures to which he was devoted. He had fallen from the highest pinnacle of ambition into the last degree of contempt and disregard." His dying scene, in a paltry inn, in Yorkshire, has been immortalized by Pope's beautiful lines:—

"In the worst inn's worst room, with mat half hung;
The floors of plaister and the walls of dung;
On once a flock bed, but repaired with straw,
With tape-tied curtains never meant to draw,
The George and Garter dangling from that bed,
Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red,
Great Villiers lies! Alas! how changed from him!
That life of pleasure and that soul of whim;
Gallant and gay in Cliefden's proud alcove;
The bower of wanton Shrewsbury and love;
Or just as gay at council, in a ring.
Of mimicked statesmen and a merry king;
No wit to flatter left of all his store,
No fool to laugh at, which he valued more;
There victor of his health, of fortune, friends,†
And fame, this lord of useless thousands ends!"*

"The worst inn's worst room," however, is a poetical fiction. Buckingham died at the house of one of his tenants at Kirby Mallory, where he was overtaken with illness. He had wasted his fortune to a comparative nothing; but was not reduced to such necessity as the poet would imply.†

Andrew Marvel makes the statue of Charing Cross the speaker in one of his witty libels on Charles and his brother. There was an equestrian statue of Charles II. at Woolchurch, the horse of which is made to hold a dialogue with this other. The poet fancies that the riders, "weary of sitting all day," stole off one evening, and the two horses came together. The readers at Will's must have been a little astonished at the boldness of such passages as the following:—

"Quoth the marble horse, It would make a stone speak,
To see a Lord Mayor and a Lombard street beak,
Thy flounder and mine, to cheat one another,
When both knaves agreed to be each other's brother.
Here Charing broke forth, and thus he went on—
My brass is provoked as much as thy stone
To see church and state bew down to a —
And the King's chief ministers holding the door,
The money of widows and orphans employed,
And the banker's quite broke to maintain the —'s pride.

WOOLCHURCH. To see Dei Gratia writ on the throne.

And the King's wicked life says God there is none.

CHARING. That he should be styled Defender of the Faith

Who believes not a word what the word of God saith.

WOOLCHURCH. That the Duke should turn Papist, and that church defy,
For which his own father a Martyr did die.

CHARING. Tho' he changed his religion, I hope he's so civil,

Not to think his own father is gone to the Devil,

CHARING. Pause brother, awhile, and calmly consider

What thou hast to say against my royal rider.

* Scott's Edition of 'Dryden,' vol. ix., p. 270.

† See the life of him by his retainer Fairfax, and the account of him on his death-bed in the 'Collection of Letters of several Persons of Quality and others.'

WOOLCHURCH. Thy priest-ridden King turned desperate fighter

For the surplice, lawn-sleeves, the cross, and the mitre;

THU at last on the scaffold he was left in the lurch,
By knaves, who cried themselves up for the church,
Archbishops and bishops, archdeacons and deans.

CHARING. Thy king will ne'er fight unless for his queens.

WOOLCHURCH. He that dys for ceremonies, dys like a fool.

CHARING. The king on thy back is a lamentable tool.

WOOLCHURCH. The goat and the lion I equally hate,

And freemen alike value life and estate:

Tho' the father and son be different rods,

Between the two scourgers we find little odds;

Both infamous stand in three kingdoms' votes,
This for picking our pockets, that for cutting our throats.

What is thy opinion of James Duke of York?

CHARING. The same that the frogs had of Jupiter's stork.

With the Turk in his head, and the Pope in his heart,

Father Patrick's disciples will make Englewood smart.

If e'er he be king, I know Britain's doom,

We must all to a stake, or be converts to Rome.

Ah! Tudor, Ah! Tudor, of Stuarts enough;

None ever reigned like old Bess in the ruff.

WOOLCHURCH. But canst thou devise when things will be mended?

CHARING. When the reign of the line of the Stuarts is ended."

And these very lampoons had a great hand in ending them.

In the days of Buckingham there was a famous house of entertainment in Charing Cross, called Locket's Ordinary. Where it exactly stood is no longer known: we suspect ourselves by the great Northumberland Coffee-house. "It is often mentioned," says a manuscript in Birch's collection, "in the plays of Gibber, Vanburgh, &c. where the scene sometimes is laid. It was much frequented by Sir George Etherege, as appears from the following anecdotes, picked up at the British Museum. Sir George Etherege and his company, 'provoked by something amiss in the entertainment or attendance, got into a violent passion and abused the waiters. This brought in Mrs. Locket: We are so provoked, said Sir George, that even I could find in my heart to pull the nose-gay out of your bosom, and throw the flowers in your face.' This turned all their anger into jest.

"Sir G. Etherege discontinued Locket's Ordinary, having run up a score, which he could not conveniently discharge. Mrs. Locket sent one to dun him, and to threaten him with a prosecution. He bid the messenger tell her that he would kiss her if she stirred a step in it. When this answer was brought back, she called for her hood and scarf, and told her husband, who interposed, that 'she'd see if there was any fellow alive who had the impudence.' 'Pr'ythee, my dear, don't be so rash,' said her husband, 'you don't know what a man may do in his passion.'"

The site of the tavern is now also unknown, where Prior was found, when a boy, reading Horace. It was called the Rummer. Mr. Nichols has found that in the year 1685, it was kept by "Samuel Prior," and that the "annual feasts of the nobility and gentry living in the parish of St. Martin" was held there, October 14, in that year. "Prior," says Johnson, "is supposed to have fallen, by his father's death, into the hands of his uncle, a vintner near Charing Cross, who sent him for some time to Dr. Beaby, at Westminster; but, not intending to give him any education beyond that of the school, took him when he was well educated in literature, to his own house, where the Earl of Dorset, celebrated for patronage of genius, found him by chance, as Burnet relates, reading Horace, and was so well pleased with his proficiency, that he undertook the care and cost of his academical education."⁶

It is doubtful, however, from one of Prior's epistles to Fleetwood Shepherd, whether the poet was more indebted to the Lord Dorset or to that gentleman for his first advancement in life, though the Earl finally became his great patron. He says to Shepherd,—

"Now, as you took me up when little,
Gave me my learning and my vittle.
Asked for me, from my lord, things fitting
Kind, as I'd been your own begetting,
Confirm what formerly you've given,
Nor leave me now at six and seven,
As Sunderland has left Mun Stephen."

And again:—

"My uncle, rest his soul! when living,
Might have contrived me ways of thriving;
Taught me with cider to replenish
My vats, or ebbing tide of Rhenish.
So, when for hock I drew pricked white-wine,
Swear 't had the flavour, and was right-wine.
Or sent me with ten pounds to Furni-
Val's inn, to some good rogue attorney;
Where now, by forging deeds and cheating,
I'd found some handsome ways of getting.
All this you made me quit to follow
That sneaking whey-fac'd god Apollo;
Sent me among a fiddling crew
Of folks, I'd never seen nor knew,
Calliope, and God knows who.
I add no more invectives to it,
You spoiled the youth to make a poet."

Johnson says, "A survey of the life and writings of Prior may exemplify a sentence which he doubtless understood well when he read Horace at his uncle's; 'the vessel long retains the scent which it first receives.' In his private relaxation he revived the tavern, and in his amorous pedantry he exhibited the college. But on higher occasions and nobler subjects, when habit was overpowered by the necessity of reflection, he wanted not wisdom as a statesman, or elegance as a poet." It is doubtful whether the general colour of everybody's life and character might not be found in that of his childhood; but there is no more reason to think that Prior's tavern propensities were owing to early habit than those of his patrician companions. No man was fonder of his bottle than Lord Dorset, and of low company than many a lord has been. According to Burke, who was a king's man, kings are naturally fond of low company. Yet they are no nephews of tavern-keepers. Nor does it appear that Prior did anything in his uncle's house but pass the time and read.

Thompson wrote part of his 'Seasons' in the room over the shop of Mr Egerton, bookseller, where he resided when he first came to London. He was at that time a raw Scotchman, gaping about town, getting his pocket picked, and obliged to wait upon great men with his poem of 'Winter.' Luckily his admiration of freedom did not hinder him from acquiring the highest patronage. He obtained an easy place, which required no compromise with his principles, and passed the latter part of his life in a dwelling of his own at Richmond, writing in his garden, and listening to nightingales. He was of an indolent constitution, and has been seen in his garden eating peaches off the trees, with his hands in his waistcoat pockets. But his indolence did not hinder him from writing. He had the luck to have the occupation he was fond of, and no man, perhaps, in his native country, with the exception of Shakespeare, has acquired a greater or more unenvied fame. His friends loved him, and his readers love his memory.

In Spring Gardens, originally a place of public entertainment, died Mrs Centlivre, the sprightly authoress of the 'Busy Body,' and the 'Bold Stroke for a Wife.' She was buried at St Martin's. She is said to have been a beauty, an accomplished linguist, and a good-natured, friendly woman. Pope put her in his 'Dunciad,' for having written (it is said) a ballad against his 'Homes' when she was a child!

⁶ Life of Prior in the 'Lives of the Poets.'

But the probability is that she was too intimate with Steele and other friends of Addison while the irritable poet was at variance with them. It is not impossible, also, that some raillery of hers might have been applied to him, not very pleasant from a beautiful woman against a man of his personal infirmities, who was actually jealous of not being well with the sex. Mrs Centlivre is said to have been seduced when young by Anthony Howard, Esq., father of the author of the 'Love Elegies,' who took her to Cambridge with him in boy's clothes. This did not hinder her from marrying a nephew of Sir Stephen Fox, who died a year afterwards; nor from having two husbands afterwards. Her second was an officer in the army, of the name of Carrol, who, to her great sorrow, was killed in a duel. Her third husband, Mr Centlivre, who had the formidable title of yeoman of the mouth, being principal cook to Queen Anne, fell in love with her when she was performing the part of Alexander the Great, at Windsor; for she appears at one time to have been an actress, though she never performed in London. Mrs Centlivre's dramas are not in the taste of Mrs Hannah More's, but the public seem to be very fond of them. They are still acted as often as if they had just come out. The reason is, that careless as they are in dialogue, and not very scrupulous in manners, they are full of action and good-humour.

Hedge lane retained its name till the other day, when, ceasing to be a heap of squalidity, it was new christened, and received the appellation of Dorset place. Part of it is merged in Pallmall East. It is now the handsomest end of the thoroughfare which runs up into Oxford road, and takes the successive names of Whitcomb, Princes, and Wardour streets. Not long ago the whole thoroughfare appears to have been called Hedge lane. It is related of Steele, Budgel, and Phillips, that issuing from a tavern one day in Gerrard street, they were about to turn into Hedge lane, when they were told that some suspicious persons were standing there as if in wait. "Thank ye!" said the wits, and hurried three different ways.

It is not pleasant to have old places altered which are connected with interesting recollections, even if the place or recollection be none of the pleasantest. When the houses were pulled down the other day in Suffolk street, we could not help regretting that the abode was among them in which poor Miss Vanhomrigh lived, who died for love of Swift. She resided there with her mother, the widow of a Dutch merchant, and had a small fortune. Swift, while in England, upon the affairs of the Irish church, was introduced to them, and became so intimate as to leave his best gown and cassock there for convenience. He found the coffee also very pleasant, and gradually became too much interested in the romantic spirit and flattering attentions of the young lady, whose studies he condescended to direct, and who, in short, fell in love with him at an age when he was old enough to be her father. Unluckily he was married; and most unluckily he did not say a word about the matter. It is curious to observe in the letters which he sent over to Stella (his wife), with what an affected indifference he speaks of the Vanhomrighs, and his visits to them, evidently thinking it necessary all the while to account for their frequency. When he left England, Miss Vanhomrigh, after the death of her mother, followed him, and proposed that he should either marry or refuse her. He would do neither.

At length both the ladies, the married and unmarried, discovered their mutual secret: a discovery which is supposed ultimately to have hastened the death of both. Miss Vanhomrigh's survival of it was short,—not many weeks. For what may remain to be said on this painful subject the reader will allow us to quote a passage from one of the magazines. "There was a vanity, perhaps, on both sides, though it may be wrong to attribute a passion wholly to that infirmity, where the object of it is not only a person celebrated, but one full of wit and entertainment. The vanity was certainly not the less on his side. Many conjectures have been made respecting the nature of this connexion of Swift's, as well as another more mysterious.

The whole truth, in the former instance, appears obvious enough. Swift, partly from vanity, and partly from a more excusable craving after some recreation of his natural melancholy, had suffered himself to take a pleasure, and exhibit an interest, in the conversation of an intelligent young woman, beyond what he ought to have done. An attachment on her part ensued, not greater, perhaps, than he contemplated with a culpable satisfaction as long as it threatened no very great disturbance of his peace, but which must have given him great remorse in after-times, when he reflected upon his encouragement of it. On the occasion of its disclosure his self-love inspired him with one of his most poetical fancies:—

"Cadenus many things had writ;
Vanessa much esteemed his wit,
And called for his poetic works:
Meantime the boy in secret lurks,
And while the book was in her hand
The urchin from his private stand,
Took aim, and shot with all his strength
A dart of such prodigious length,
It pierced the feeble volume through,
And deep transfixed her bosom too.
Some lines more moving than the rest,
Stuck to the point that pierced her breast,
And borne directly to the heart,
With pains unknown increased her smart.
Vanessa, not in years a score,
Dreams of a gown of forty-four,
Imaginary charms can find
In eyes with reading almost blind:
Cadenus now no more appears
Declined in health, advanced in years,
She fancies music in his tongue,
Nor farther looks, but thinks him young."

A reflection ensues which it is a pity he had not made before:—

"What mariner is not afraid
To venture in a ship decayed?
What planter will attempt to yoke
A sapling with a fallen oak?
As years increase she brighter shines,
Cadenus with each day declines;
And he must fall a prey to time
While she continues in her prime."

"If he had thought of this when he used to go to her mother's house in order to change his wig and gown and drink coffee, he would have avoided those encouragements of Miss Vanhomrigh's sympathy and admiration, which must have given rise to very bitter reflections when she read such passages as the lines that follow:—

"Cadenus, common forms apart,
In every scene had kept his heart;
Had sighed and languished, vowed and writ
For pastime, or to show his wit."

"It was sport to him, but death to her. His allegations of not being conscious of anything on her part, are not to be trusted. There are few men whose self-love is not very sharp-sighted on such occasions,—men of wit in particular; nor was Swift, notwithstanding the superiority he assumed over fopperies of all sorts, and the great powers which gave a passport to the assumption, exempt, perhaps, from any species of vanity. The more airs he gives himself on that point, the less we are to believe him. He was fond of lords and great ladies, and loves, and canonicals, and of having the verger to walk before him. He saw very well, we may be assured, the impression which he made on the young lady; but he hoped, as others have hoped, that it would accommodate itself to circumstances in cases of necessity; or he pretended to himself that he was too modest to believe it a great one, or, sacrificing her ultimate good to her present pleasure and to his own, he put off the disagreeable day of alteration and self-denial till it was too late. There are many reasons why Swift should have acted otherwise, and why no man, at any time of life, should hazard the peace of another by involvements which he cannot handsomely follow up. If he does, he is bound to do what he can for it to the last."

DIED AT HEATHFIELD, IN STAFFORDSHIRE, MDCCCXIX.

The above noble inscription, from the pen of Lord Brougham, has just been placed upon the base of Chantrey's statue of James Watt, in Westminster Abbey. Watt's remains, we believe, are deposited elsewhere;—the Baron Dupin (in his Discours et Leçons sur l'Industrie, le Commerce, &c.) speaks of them as lying in the obscure retirement of some unknown cemetery (dans le réduit obscur de quelque cimetière ignoré);—so that this monument is what the ancients would have called a cenotaph—that is, literally, an empty tomb, or a monument erected to the memory of one buried elsewhere. It stands in the middle of what is called St. Paul's Chapel, the Chapel between that of Henry VII. and that of Edward the Confessor, and, both from its great size and the brilliancy of the new marble, at once catches the visitor's eye, which a nearer inspection can hardly in any case fail to arrest. The attitude of the statue is probably familiar to most of our readers, from the frequent engravings that have been made of it. One is given in the 26th number of the 'Penny Magazine,' from a drawing taken by permission of Mr Chantrey, immediately before the statue was removed to the Abbey. Those who knew its illustrious subject admit that nothing can be truer than the representation which this statue conveys of the figure and aspect of the living man. As a work of art it is one of Chantrey's greatest performances—by its massive simplicity and repose, breathing the very spirit of Watt's clear, capacious, and philosophic intellect, and of his mild and beautiful moral nature.

Without entering upon the question of the comparative value to mankind of great mechanical inventions and great intellectual creations of a more perfectly spiritual character—upon the question, in other words, whether upon the whole the steam engine is or is not a greater boon to humanity than the 'Fairy Queen,' or 'Paradise Lost,' or the dramas of Shakspeare (upon which, although we should probably have the multitude against us, we might perhaps be inclined to come to a different conclusion from that intimated in the inscription, where this monument is contrasted with the others that fill our National Pantheon, as showing that mankind have learned to honour those who best deserve their gratitude)—without, we say, debating this matter at present, we can have no hesitation in admitting the claim of the inventor of the Steam Engine to all the honours which the gratitude and admiration of his country can lavish on his memory. No man of his time, no man of any time, has wrought such a metamorphosis upon at least the external circumstances of society as his genius has done. The present may be called emphatically the Age of the

Steam Engine; and it is he that has made it so. He called himself only the improver of this wonderful mechanical agent; but in every sense, except the merely literal sense of the term, he was its inventor. Steam had indeed been employed as a mechanical power before he arose; but it had been employed at most merely as a substitute for other mechanical powers, which, if they could not have done the same work quite as economically in all instances, could yet have done it, at a somewhat greater expense. Newcomen's Engine, which was in use before Watt's invention, could we believe, effect nothing which would have been of impossible accomplishment without it. It only made some operations easier or less expensive. Such a power never could have revolutionized, or greatly affected, the condition of society. At most, steam-power then, was what gas-light is now,—a means (but not nearly so extensively applied a means) of enabling us to do in one way, what we could do without its aid, though not quite so conveniently, in another. It did not, as Watt's Steam Engine is in this inscription truly said to have done, increase the power of man. It gave to man no new power, if by that is meant a power of doing something which he could not do before. It gave him no hitherto unpossessed mastery over nature. But Watt's invention may be said to have made him the King of new worlds. With it human industry, which crept before, now soars on wings. A poet would say that this invention has annihilated space and time. It has, in sober truth, vastly reduced the dimensions of both. It has enabled one man to do what a hundred could not have done before; it has made a few days or a few hours sufficient for what formerly would have been the work of many years. "When we would humble," says Dupin, in the work to which we have already referred, "the vain pride of certain modern structures, we immediately oppose to them the magnitude and duration of the edifices of Egypt. Let us choose from among the monuments of that country, the one which contains the greatest mass of materials, and of materials raised to the greatest height. The great Pyramid has been always ranked by the ancients among the wonders of their industry. The number of years and of workmen employed in the building of that monument, frightens our imagination; the account seems more like the exaggerations of fable than the fidelity of history. And yet, as I have ascertained by calculation, the numbers are much less exaggerated than their greatness would lead us to suppose. Be they what they may, let us propose to ourselves this question: How long time would it take the possessors of the steam-engines of England to raise all the stones of which the great Pyramid is composed, first from the deepest quarries to the surface of the ground, and then from the ground to the position which they occupy in the different strata of this lofty edifice? By a calculation, in which I have made a liberal allowance for whatever could diminish the advantage of the modern means, I have arrived at the following conclusion:—In order to execute a work representing the sum of all the manual efforts employed in the two great operations which have been mentioned, it would be sufficient to put in action the steam-engines of England for only eighteen hours." M. Dupin takes the power of the English steam-engines, at the time when he wrote, as equivalent to the power of about 320,000 horses. If all at work together, they would have, he says, employed the services of only 36,000 men at the most. This was in 1821, since which time the number of steam-engines in his country has immensely increased. Herodotus tells us that the Great Pyramid, without counting the time which it took to cut the stones into shape, to convey them from the quarry, and to make the subterranean abodes in which the men employed in these operations worked, was twenty years in building, and employed 100,000 men.

But there are some of the miracles of the steam-engine, which no number of men, aided by all the mechanical contrivances previously in existence, could, in any length of time, have achieved. With much and long labour we might have built high enough into the air—where there is nothing to be got, were we ever so high;—but it is the steam-engine alone that has enabled us to penetrate to the depth to which we can now descend into the earth, where lie those treasures of iron and coal which now chiefly feed the power of this country, and the industry of the world. It is well known, that many of our most productive coal mines would have had to be abandoned long ago, had we not been enabled to drain them and keep them clear of water, by this machine, whose gigantic powers, it would seem that, no labour can over-task. And then think of its conquest over what used to be deemed the most untameable of all the elements—in the triumphing way in which it carries us through the waters, in the very face of that wind, without whose favour no navigation could heretofore proceed—thus more than realising the fiction of the phantom ship of the poet,—

"Without a breeze, without a tide,
She steadies with upright keel!"

And think, also, of that still swifter flight in which we are borne along, by this same potent agent, over our railways on land, where loads almost of the weight of mountains may be seen cleaving the air with the velocity of an arrow shot from a bow. An eminent lecturer stated, the other day, that he had been actually carried on a railroad at the rate of sixty miles an hour—and he expressed his confident expectation, that this flying speed would, probably at no distant day, become the ordinary rate of travelling. Can anything be imagined that would more completely transform this world, or go nearer to turn it into what we have been accustomed to dream a world might be, in which the powers of magic held sway, and people flitted about, like thought itself, almost without the intervention of space or time at all? The invention, be it remembered, which has done so much for us already, is but yet in its infancy,—at least it has only been in men's hands for a few years;—who shall say what, in course of time, it may not bring forth?

The erection of the monument to the genius of Watt, which now adorns Westminster Abbey, was determined upon at a great meeting held in the Freemasons' Hall, on Friday, the 18th of June, 1824. On this occasion the late Earl of Liverpool, then Prime Minister, was in the chair, and was supported by his colleagues, Mr Peel and Mr Huskisson. Mr Canning was also to have been present, but was detained by official business. The other principal speakers were Sir Humphry Davy, Mr Wilberforce, Sir James Mackintosh, and Mr Brougham. Alas! what a sweep death has made since then of those brilliant ranks! With the exception of Mr Peel and Mr Brougham, all who that day vied with each other in paying their eloquent tributes to the genius of their recently-departed friend are now with him in the tomb; and of these, how many who might reasonably have expected to live to see the completion of the memorial which they met to found, suddenly cut off in the strength of their days, and the noon of their eminence! Davy, Canning, Huskisson, have all thus been snatched from us, the last by the instrumentality of the very power whose might he was at this meeting one of the most ardent in celebrating, but which, like all the other powers of nature, is as mighty for evil, if it be misdirected, or allowed to escape from control, as it is for good when properly managed and applied. Mackintosh, too, might have looked forward to many more days of honourable exertion in the cause of literature and patriotism, when his earthly career was brought to an end. And Lord Liverpool, though advanced in years, was yet unexpectedly removed from the high public station which he had so long filled. Wilber-on the 'Mechanics of Law-making' in all its parts—and embraces not only the whole subject of the form and constituents of a law, but those also of the classification and consolidation of the statutes, and of institutional reforms connected with law-making.

BOSWELL'S JOHNSON.

Boswell's Life of Johnson. Vol. IV. Murray. 1885.

In this volume we have that singular being, Boswell, in all his glory; for his Journal of the Tour to the Hebrides, of which it consists, is really the richest portion of his wonderful biographical portraiture of Johnson, from the rest of which, it is strange that it should ever have been separated. We should say, indeed, of his portraiture of Johnson and himself together—for the one scarcely interests us more than the other. Scarcely was there ever a more effective contrast, either in dramatic scene, or other work of fiction. It is the next best thing of the kind we have to Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. In this Journal, however, as we have said, Boswell is still more Boswell, even than in his larger and better-known work. Here we have him making an exhibition of himself with a lavish honesty, compared to which, Montaigne, Rousseau, and all the other confessions in literature are affectation and concealment. It is the case of a man altogether incapable of thinking except aloud, and, as it were, under the necessity of printing and publishing everything, wise or foolish, that comes into his head. Even Pepys, with his short-hand, was reserve itself to such a loud and universal proclamation as 'this. Hear, for example, what he says in one place:—"Mr Tait, the clergyman, read prayers very well, though with much of the Scotch accent. He preached on 'Love your Enemies.' It was remarkable that, when talking of the connexions amongst men, he said that some connected themselves with men of distinguished talents; and since they could not equal them, tried to deck themselves with their merit by being their companions. The sentence was to this purpose. It had an odd coincidence with what might be said of my connecting myself with Dr Johnson." Again, at Kingsburgh:—"He (Johnson) was rather quiescent to-night, and went early to bed. I was in a cordial humour, and promoted a cheerful glass. Honest Mr McQueen observed that I was in high glee, "my governor being gone to bed." Soon after, at Dunvegan:—"I was elated by the thought of having been able to entice such a man to this remote part of the world. A ludicrous, yet just, image presented itself to my mind, which I expressed to the company. I compared myself to a dog who has got hold of a large piece of meat, and runs away with it to a corner, where he may devour it in peace, without any fear of others taking it from him." Or, to quote only another instance: Johnson, in dilating upon the superior cleanliness of vegetable to animal substances had said, "I have often thought that, if I kept a seraglio, the ladies should all wear linen gowns or cotton;" on which the narrative thus proceeds:—"To hear the grave Dr Samuel Johnson, 'that majestic teacher of moral and religious wisdom,' while sitting solemn in an arm-chair in the Isle of Sky, talk, ex-cathedra, of his keeping a seraglio, and acknowledge that the supposition had often been in his thoughts, struck me so laughably with ludicrous contrast, that I could not but laugh immoderately. He was too proud to submit even for a moment, to be the object of ridicule, and instantly retaliated with such keen, sarcastic wit, and such a variety of degrading images, of every one of which I was the object, that, though I can bear such attacks as well as most men, I yet found myself so much the sport of the company, that I would gladly expunge from my mind every trace of this severe retort." What other writer has ever reported of himself to the world in this style? 'Boswell's Tour' had become rather a scarce book, till it was re-printed, a few years ago, and incorporated, for the first time, with the 'Life of Johnson,' in Mr Croker's edition of that work. The present edition, though founded upon Mr Croker's, is both decidedly superior to that, and also much cheaper. The volume is ornamented with a very striking view (by the burine of E. Finden, after a drawing by Stanfield,) of St Andrew's, the ancient ecclesiastical capital of Scotland—now a city of ruins—and by a tasteful vignette of Loch Lomond, by the same artists. It is also furnished with a map of the Tour.

GIGOUX'S EDITION OF GIL BLAS.

Histoire de Gil Blas de Santillane. Par Le Sage. Vignettes par Jean Gigoux. Paris. Paulin. London. H. Hooper, Pall-mall, East.

THIS is a beautifully illustrated edition of Le Sage's immortal work, forming part of a collection of French classics which is to be published from time to time in parts. The elegance of the letter-press will recommend it to all purchasers of French books; but what we have especially to notice is, the rare spirit, humour, and grace of the vignette etchings. In their way we have seldom seen cleverer things than these. The lively, witty, versatile spirit, with which the author was brimful, has descended freely, and without stint, on the artist.

A hundred years of admiration and fame which the work has enjoyed in all the civilized countries of the world, render it unnecessary to say a single word as to the merits of 'Gil Blas,' but we are induced to mention one little fact which some of our readers may not be acquainted with. The scenes of the tale, it will be remembered, are fixed wholly in Spain, and the numerous characters introduced are all Spanish. Now, struck with the truth and nature of these characters, and the correctness of these descriptions, the Spaniards have long insisted that none but a native could have written the book, and that the witty, far-seeing Frenchman must have stolen all the matter it contains from some unknown Spanish writer. So strong is this impression, that the most popular Spanish editions of the work bear on the title-page "Gil Blas de Santillana, robbed from the Spaniards by M. Le Sage, and here restored (not translated) to its original Spanish."—The most circumstantial details in the literary history of France, place, however, the original authorship of Le Sage beyond the reach of a doubt, and the assumption of the Spaniards is a striking tribute to his genius. Like the 'Don Quixote' of Cervantes, and the 'Tom Jones' of our own Fielding, 'Gil Blas' will continue to delight remote ages and all classes and conditions of men. It would be difficult, we fancy, to find any reader unacquainted with the work. The number of editions, in a great variety of languages, already spread about the world, is immense, but we are glad to see the press employed in multiplying them, and truly delighted with the impression now under our notice.

A graceful edition is to a favourite author what a good frame is to a picture, and something more.

BROCKEDON'S ROAD BOOK.

Road Book from London to Naples. By William Brockedon, F.R.S., author of 'The Passes of the Alps,' &c. &c. Illustrated with twenty-five views, from drawings by Stanfield, Prout, and Brockedon. Engraved by W. E. Finden. 1 vol. 8vo. London. John Murray.

THE engravings in this volume are, almost without an exception, exceedingly beautiful, and the letter-press may be found useful to such travellers as are altogether new on the continent, although the work is far from being so good a guide as Mrs Starke's well-known book. In the post-chaise or diligence it may be a different matter, but looking over Mr Brockedon's work in the calm abstraction of the study, we cannot help being risibly affected by the contrast between the beauty and poetry of his views and sketches, and the homeliness of his hints about lodgings, houses, hotels, bills, soda-powders, drugs, English medicines, &c. &c. For our own part we should prefer seeing these good engravings bound up in Forry's or Matthew's Tour, which have both been recently republished, each in one convenient and elegant octavo volume.

We are sorry to see that Mr Brockedon, whose short stay in the country and very imperfect knowledge of their language must have prevented him from forming any correct notion on the subject, has hazarded one or two hasty remarks on the character of the Italian people.

The frontiers of the Neapolitan kingdom have always been infested by a certain number of banditti, but to set down all the peasantry as brigands and objects of disgust and horror, is the unwise and untrue; and instead of saying that the squalid people as Fondi looked as if they all regretted that they had not had the opportunity of robbing him and cutting his throat, he ought to have said they looked as if they had all had the malaria fever. Place a colony of handsome, healthy, open-countenanced English peasants in the neighbourhood of the same rank swamps, and put them on the same miserable diet, and they will soon either die outright, or look just as "villanously" as the poor Neapolitans now at Fondi.

SAFETY DURING THUNDER STORMS.

Directions for Insuring Personal Safety during Storms of Thunder and Lightning. By John Leigh, jun. Esq. London. Ridgway. 1885. 12mo. Pp. 44.

ALTHOUGH the superstitions, and also the nervous terrors felt by many persons during a thunder storm, are foolish enough, there is no denying that there is some real danger on such an occasion to be guarded against. The annual number of fatal accidents from lightning in this country is indeed very inconsiderable—perhaps smaller than that of those arising from any other common danger to which human life is exposed. The number of persons killed by lightning bears, we should suppose, no proportion, for instance, to that of those who are destroyed either by the burning of dwelling-houses, or by being run down by or thrown out of carriages, or by drowning. With regard to most of these other accidents by flood and field, however, timid people have probably a feeling that they have it more completely in their power to keep out of their way than in the case of lightning. Thus, if I am very much afraid of being drowned, I need never venture on the water, and I shall be tolerably secure of a dry death. If I have a great dread of coach accidents, I may keep myself pretty much at ease by determining never to ride. And even the risk of being burned by your house catching fire from any ordinary cause, may be reduced nearly to nothing by proper attention and caution. But the electric fluid is an enemy so mysteriously sudden and subtle that it seems to set all preparation, all circumsppection, at defiance. The feeling, too, of the instant effect that is sure to follow the stroke, naturally bewilders and baffles the mind in attempting to guard against it. To those who are apt to be made miserable by such sensations, and intending to others also, we recommend Mr Leigh's undepending little publication. The facts stated, and the directions given in it, are so much useful knowledge which every body should be familiar with. As a specimen we give the following short passage:—

"Some persons, who are shocked during thunder storms, will open all the doors in a house, and shut the windows; others open the windows, and shut the doors; and some are silly enough to keep open both doors and windows. Now all these little contrivances are of no use. You cannot bow the lightning in at one end of the room, and out at another. You cannot shut up lightning in a box; and if it comes down the chimney, as it usually does, you cannot, either by leaving the door or window open, direct it to pass through: it will always follow the best conductors. Concern yourself only about your situation in the room. Sit as far removed from the wall as circumstances permit, and not very near the fire-place; for, besides there being so much metal about the fire-place, which would attract the lightning towards it, by whatever means it might enter the room, it is usually found, that, when a house is struck, the lightning has descended by one of the chimneys, probably owing to their prominent situation, rising some feet above the rest of the building. After arriving at a fire place in an upper room, it will frequently pass through the floor, attracted by the metal around the fire place in the room beneath.

When it has once entered a room, it will leave traces of having passed over almost everything of a metallic nature near at hand. It runs round the gilded frames of pictures, strikes along the metallic rods from which curtains are hung, the strips of gilt wood running along the tops of wainscoting, and bell wires, which are usually melted. If no metallic conductor is at hand, it will pass round the walls of a room, conducted by the paste between the paper and the walls, if at all damp, or even without such assistance. Unbattened walls, and the walls of most cottages and out-buildings, contain more or less moisture, which facilitates the passage of the electric fluid around them; and it is therefore very dangerous to be in contact with them. Under any circumstances, walls form imperfect conductors, whether they are supposed to be damp or dry, and whether they are outside or inside. A position in a room immediately adjoining the walls, is always therefore to be particularly avoided."

"Since a current of air will in some measure conduct lightning, a position between a door and window, if open, or window and chimney, should be avoided. The door-way of a house, or a passage, is not so safe as the middle of a room, through which there is no similar current of air.

"A bed is one of the safest places a person can be in; and it would be rendered more secure still, if removed a little from the walls; and if provided with wooden curtain-rods instead of metal, and if there was no bell wire immediately over-head. Under ordinary circumstances, it may, however, be considered a tolerably safe situation."

The pamphlet also contains some directions, which seem to be the product of good sense and acquaintance with the subject, for the right application of conductors to houses and other buildings.

EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.

It may be necessary to state for the information of our new readers, that under this title the PRINTING MACHINE when a separate publication was accustomed to give a weekly record of the progress of popular instruction, embracing notices of the proceedings of Mechanics' Institutes, Schools of Art, and other associations for kindred objects in all parts of the country. It is intended, as was stated in the notice announcing the incorporation of the two Journals, to continue this register in our Monthly Supplements; but as the space that can now be afforded to the subject is comparatively limited, it will be necessary to confine the notices principally to such matters as have not only a local but also a general interest. We hope, however, to be able to insert all facts relating to the subject that have much novelty or importance.

Statistics of Public Education.—At a late meeting of the Statistical Society, a paper was read from Thomas Vardon, Esq., containing a table founded on the parochial returns to the House of Commons, obtained on the motion of the Earl of Kerry, of the numbers of children receiving instruction in the different Infant, National, Public, and Private Schools in England and Wales. The total number of young persons receiving daily instruction is stated to be 1,222,000. This number includes all those educated at the various colleges, with the exception of the members of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The number of children under fifteen years of age in the kingdom may be estimated at about 4,000,000, and deducting from this amount those who are under two years of age, or about 500,000, there will remain 3,500,000 of the proper age for attending school. If the number of those who receive private instruction be further deducted, and these be estimated at 500,000, there are still 3,000,000 to be provided for. The existing means of instruction, therefore, do not provide for nearly one half of the existing want. The number of children taught at Sunday Schools is stated to be 1,359,719; but these Schools, although justly to be considered valuable auxiliaries in the formation of religious habits, cannot be considered to impart education. The principal part of the children receiving their instruction at Sunday Schools also, are in the habit of attending day schools, although it must be noted that there are 908 Sunday Schools, containing upwards of 40,000 children, in places where no other description of School exists. The Infant Schools, also where the children leave at the age of seven years, can only be considered as auxiliaries. Considering the great benefit that has resulted from the annual Parliamentary grant of 20,000*l.* for aiding in the erection of School-houses, Mr Vardon expresses a hope that the grant may not only be continued, but increased.

Charitable Institutions for the purposes of Education.—In Mr. Harvey's speech, on the 11th of June, in the House of Commons, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the Public Charities of England, with a view to render them more efficient for the education of the people, the following particulars were stated:—

The inquiries respecting these institutions commenced in 1818, and have been continued down to 1834. The commission has presented the 24th volume of its labours, each volume averaging about 800 folio pages. The expense of printing each volume, has been, on an average, about 600*l.* or 700*l.* In round numbers, the Commission of Inquiry has cost about a quarter of a million sterling. The charities of twenty-eight English counties have been inquired into, and it has appeared that they contain 26,751 charities or endowments, having property of various descriptions connected with them. There are six other counties, the charities of which have been partially investigated, and they amounted to 1,734. In twenty-four counties, (these counties being twenty-four out of the twenty-eight in which the investigation was perfected) the actual amount of the charitable incomes arising from land and houses was 331,703*l.* a year. In connection with these charities, confined to these twenty-four counties, there was actually money in the Funds, on mortgages, and in various convertible securities, amounting to 2,228,513*l.* Mr Harvey, after detailing various cases in which legal proceedings had been taken, and the progress which has been made, moved that a Select Committee be appointed to examine and consider the evidence in the several reports presented to the House of Commons by the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the charities of England and Wales, which motion was agreed to by the House.

North of England Schoolmasters' Association.—The annual meeting of this association was held in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on the 8th of June. The society is in a flourishing state. The twelfth anniversary of the Hull, East Riding, and North Lincoln Schoolmasters' Association was held in Hull. The benefits of the society are already enjoyed by several pensioners, and the accumulated funds amount to upwards of 900*l.*, the greater part of which is placed out on approved securities.

Edinburgh Model Infant School.—The exhibition of this institution took place on the 30th of May, at the Waterloo Rooms, Edinburgh. Lord Cockburn was in the chair, in the room of the Lord Justice Clerk, who was detained in Court. There were present Lords Jeffrey and Medwyn, Sheriffs L'Amey and Matheson, Professor Pillans, Messrs Scott, Spence, Combe, Simpson, Dr Spittal, and many other persons, who are well known as taking a warm interest in the cause of education. The day being fine, the children came in procession, bearing nosegays and coloured diagrams, and attracted much attention. The meeting was much gratified by the interesting exhibition.

Edinburgh Association for procuring Instruction in the Useful and Entertaining Sciences.—This institution has been in full vigour during the winter. A voluntary course of six lectures on sideral astronomy was delivered by the Rev. J. P. Nicholl, which was attended by crowded audiences.

South Shields Mechanics' Institution.—This institution entered upon the occupation of its new building on the 10th of June, when there was a general meeting of the members, Dr Winterbottom, V.P., in the chair. The building is a spacious hall, 50 feet long, 20 feet wide, and 18 feet high, lighted with gas, and furnished with ornamental fittings. The library, consisting of 1400 volumes, is at one end.

Leeds Library.—The annual general meeting of the subscribers to the Leeds Library was held on June 1st. The committee reported plans and estimates for increasing the means of arranging the rapidly accumulating stores of the Institution; and they were authorised by the meeting to lay out a sum not exceeding 300*l.* in the erection of additional galleries in the library room.

West Riding Proprietary School, Wakefield.—The annual meeting of the friends of this Institution was held on the 10th June, and was numerously attended. Letters were read from Earls Fitzwilliam and Mexborough, and from Lord Morpeth, and one or two other members of Parliament, apologising for inability to attend. The Vicar of Halifax was in the chair. The Principal's Report stated that the termination of the first year's labours was very satisfactory—that the parents of the pupils continued to express high satisfaction with the progress of their children—that the numbers were increasing so rapidly as to render it difficult to procure a nomination—and that there was a confident assurance that the Institution was based on a solid and firm foundation. The report also adverted to some remarks in the Quarterly Journal of Education, in which, while praising the general management of the school, the writer condemned the retention of corporal punishment, even for immoral and flagrant offences, and contrasted the school with the Bristol College. The Principal contended for flogging, as occasionally indispensable in a large school, though to be sparingly resorted to. The report of the Directors stated, that the number of pupils was 175, and that there was a prospect of an immediate and large increase to this number—that additional masters for the school had been appointed—that owing to the expenses incurred in completing the buildings, grounds, &c. the Institution was 1800*l.* in debt—that towards liquidating this debt, a saving of 300*l.* would be effected in the expenses of the year, and that there was every prospect of its being cleared off in four years. But in order to get rid of the incumbrance at once, the Directors proposed the creation of sixty additional shares, raising the number from 240 to 300, a resolution to effect which was proposed and adopted.

Liverpool Mechanics' Institute.—It has been for some time contemplated to erect an appropriate building for the use of this Institution, and it is now stated that the arrangements for effecting this object are so far completed, that plans have been called for, in order that the building may be proceeded with. The new building will occupy one thousand nine hundred square yards, and will comprise a lecture-room capable of containing from one thousand to one thousand two hundred persons; a comfortable house for the keeper; an apparatus room; a laboratory and chemical class-room; a class-room for the English language, capable of containing from eighty to one hundred and twenty persons; one for writing and arithmetic, for from one hundred and sixty to two hundred persons; one for mathematics, for from eighty to one hundred and twenty persons; one for receiving musical instruction, for from forty to fifty persons; one for figure-drawing, for from eighty to one hundred and twenty persons; one for landscape, perspective, and architectural drawing, for from one hundred and sixty to two hundred persons; one for mechanical drawing, for from sixty to eighty persons; one for geography, use of maps, globes, &c., for from fifty to sixty persons; one for the study of the French language, for from fifty to sixty persons; one for other Continental languages, for from thirty to forty persons; making, in all, eleven class-rooms, capable of containing about one thousand pupils, and affording the opportunity of instructing, at the same time, this large number, in eleven different branches of knowledge and art. Besides this accommodation, there will be a library and reading-room, a committee-room, a museum-room for casts, models, &c.; and cellaring will be constructed, from which the committee deem it probable that they may derive an annual rent.

Royal Naval School.—The annual meeting of this institution, (which is established for the purpose of educating, at a small expense, the sons of naval officers not in affluent circumstances) was held on June 9th, at the rooms of the Horticultural Society, Regent street, Sir Robert Stopford, G.C.B., in the chair. It appeared from the report of the council, that the funds were in a flourishing state.

Society of Arts.—The ceremony of distributing the rewards adjudged by this society during the present session to successful essayists in matters connected with the arts, manufactures, and commerce, took place in the large room at Exeter Hall, on June 8th. The room was filled by a most respectable and fashionable company;—Sir E. Coddington in the chair, in the absence of the president of the society, his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. Among the receivers of rewards were a number of ladies.

Glasgow Educational Society.—The Sub-Committee of this Society state that, in visiting the parochial and private schools of Glasgow and its vicinity, they were forcibly struck with the unequal excellence of the schools. In some might be seen the utmost activity and intelligence in masters and scholars, with the most recent improvements in operation; but in the same city, nay in the same street, might be seen a school conducted on the worst possible methods, whose master knew little, and could impart little, save the mechanical arts of reading and writing, and even these in a slovenly manner. The Committee press strongly the necessity of attending to the education of schoolmasters, in preparing them for their profession.

Sunday Schools.—The twentieth anniversary of the Leeds Sunday School Union was celebrated on June 9th. The teachers and scholars to the number of 6,000 or 7,000, assembled in the Coloured Cloth Hall Yard, Leeds, and then proceeded to their respective places of worship. In the evening the meeting for business was held. The number of schools in the Union is 78; teachers 2,174; scholars 9,941. In Sheffield, on the same day, the children of the Sunday School Union assembled to the number of 10,000; those of the National school to the number of 3,000; and the Wesleyans to the number of 5,000.

On the 9th, the twelfth annual festival of the Newcastle Sunday School Union was celebrated. The children of 54 schools, amounting to 4,065, and accompanied by 538 teachers, assembled. The Worcester Sunday Schools assembled, as usual, on Whit-Monday, when about 2,700 children were present. On the same day, the Bristol Methodist School Society held its thirty-first anniversary, at which 2,500 children, accompanied by 400 teachers, appeared.

Manchester Sunday Schools.—The children belonging to the schools of the various societies in Manchester were assembled during the Whitsun holidays, to celebrate their anniversaries. The schools of the Establishment Society assembled 2,400 children; the Society for Children of all Denominations about 6,000; and the Catholic School Society about the same number. The number of children assembled by the Methodists, Unitarians, &c. is not stated.

WHY SWEET MUSIC PRODUCES SADNESS.

SWEET music, that is to say, "sweet" in the sense in which it is evidently used in the following passage,—something not of a mirthful character, but yet not of a melancholy one,—does not always produce sadness; but it does often, even when the words, if it be vocal music, are cheerful. We do not presume to take for granted, that the reason we are about to differ with, or perhaps rather to extend, is Shakspeare's own, or that he would have stopped thus short, if speaking in his own person; though he has given it the air of an abstract remark;—but Lorenzo, in the 'Merchant of Venice,' says, that it is because our "spirits are attentive."

"I'm never merry when I hear sweet music," says pretty Jessica.

"The reason is, your spirits are attentive," says her lover;—

"For do but note a wild and wanton herd,
Or race of youthful and unhandled colts,
Fetching mad bounds, bellowing and neighing loud,
Which is the hot condition of their blood;
If they but hear perchance a trumpet sound,
Or any air of music touch their ears,
You shall perceive them make a mutual stand,
Their savage eyes turned to a modest gaze,
By the sweet power of music."

How beautiful! But with the leave of this young and most elegant logician, his reason is, at least, not sufficient; for how does it account for our being moved even to tears, by music which is not otherwise melancholy? All attention, it is true, implies a certain degree of earnestness, and all earnestness has a mixture of seriousness; yet seriousness is not the prevailing character of attention in all instances, for we are attentive to fine music, whatever its character; and sometimes it makes us cheerful, and even mirthful. The giddier portions of Rossini's music do not make us sad; Figaro does not make us sad; nor is sadness the general consequence of hearing dances, or even marches.

And yet, again, on the other hand, in the midst of any of this music, even of the most light and joyous, our eyes shall sometimes fill with tears. How is this?

The reason surely is, that we have an instinctive sense of the fugitive and perishing nature of all sweet things,—of beauty, of youth, of life, of all those fair shows of the world, of which music seems to be the voice, and of whose transitory nature it reminds us most when it is most beautiful, because it is then that we most regret our mortality.

We do not, it is true, say this to ourselves. We are not conscious of the reason; that is to say, we do not feel it with knowingness; but we do feel it, for the tears are moved. And how many exquisite criticisms of tears and laughter do not whole audiences make at plays, though not one man in fifty hall be able to put down his reason for it on paper.

THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY EGBERTON WHELAN.

No. V.

THE fourth and fifth propositions remain to be considered.

"4th. That it" (the exclamation naturally accompanying the first sight of a new object) "is for the most part purely capricious and accidental, admitting of no critical inquiry, except as concerns the superior facility of utterance of certain syllables or sounds."

If the vulgar observer is apt to make too light of the rationale of language, and not sufficiently to consider the steps by which it has been put together, it is perhaps the fault of the etymologist, on the other hand, that he over-does conjecture, running into the extreme of believing that every fact in language is to be accounted for. He conceives his rudest forefather to have been as deliberate and orderly a man as himself, as full of method, and as fond of analogy. He will not believe him capricious, he cannot think he would be guilty of inconsistency, but he conceives he must uniformly have been guided by the most reasonable considerations, and the most unexceptionable motives. Hence every present anomaly is a corruption, every defalcation a perfection lost, and all that is contradictory in language is regarded as a deflection from a certain original model of simplicity and good sense—which never existed. Perhaps no philologist was more guilty of this error than Horne Tooke. It may be suspected that the contempt in which he held the greater part of his fellow-labourers contributed not a little to dispose him to it, since their foolish perplexities are rendered more odious in our eyes when they are represented to us as wilfully obscuring some fair and perspicuous archetype; we visit the confusion of Mr Harris, not with pity, but with something like abhorrence, when we believe that with his web of sophistries he conceals from our view some fine and simple image of truth. But verily such happy vision did never bless human sight, but—like the golden age—may serve for a topic of discourse,—perhaps frighten a few sinners into a penitent regard for lucid phraseology, or convert an occasional dissenter from the dictionary,—nothing more. It can never reform us altogether, because it cannot itself be realized. And with respect to the metaphysical elaboration—the κακόζηλον—of such men as Harris, if it is indeed "confusion worst confounded"—as no one will now dispute—it is so in this sense only, viz. that they, by a perverse ingenuity, further confounded that which was already, and in its own nature, confusion. But this disposition to ascribe method and order to the remotest beginnings of things, among other results, produced that belief in the imitative origin of language which has been discussed. Philosophers—influenced by the pleasure they receive in discovering fixed processes—cannot endure to attribute anything to chance. Firmly believing in the existence of a regular course for every natural phenomenon, they imagine it only remains for them to discover the clue. And diligently they seek, and often think they find, this clue, which we as often following up, when we fancy we are being inducted to the promised truths, perceive ourselves to be only more and more involved in error. They will believe in a chaos for matter, but not in a chaos for language. They will not believe in a riotous composition of the first elements. It does not flatter philosophy enough—it seems to take away its occupation. These first elements being given, there was no trouble in accounting for the rest; but to account for these—in which they could derive no possible assistance from their usual friend, Analogy,—that was the task. Accordingly, the doctrine of imitation was eagerly caught hold of, because it looked like something substantial and satisfactory; it seemed to put the finishing stroke to the revelations of philology, and to crown it handsomely as a science. I am afraid, however, that in this case (as in most cases—by your leave—Philosophy) that which is least satisfactory is most true; that is to say, that in the formation of the first elements of speech,

"Chance governed all."

If it be true that the first ejaculations of a man or a child, in a state of nature, would not be imitative, the question is—by what principle would they be directed? Let us then manfully avow, that they would be directed by no principle at all—unless that one circumstance, of which I am about to take notice, is to be considered as a principle of direction. We have seen that the chattering of babies is a mere effusion of spirit. But though the voice, here, has no definite course marked for it, one thing is certain—it will of itself seek the easiest channels; like a stream of water, it will pass at one side all the rocky points, but issue gladly over a level bed. Therefore, though you cannot tell what sounds an infant may utter in its prattling moments, you may very safely declare what sounds it will not utter, by considering the condition of the organs in childhood. In the same way the ejaculations of the savage, which, as I think, will be equally devoid of any legitimate significance, will so far, at least, be under regulation that they will always depend on the power of the organs to pronounce given sounds with more or less facility. I am not going into a dry discussion on the principles of pronunciation, though I believe the subject to be full of conclusions favourable to these views; but I may, perhaps, be allowed to make one or two observations which occur to me. Assuredly those consonants are the most easy of utterance which we pronounce with our lips. To be convinced of this, listen to a person whispering, or, still better, listen to one who is trying to say something, when he is half asleep; you will find the labial letters, to the very last, almost perfect, when the gutturals, dentals, &c. have long since been hors de combat. Besides, we know that these are the letters which infants earliest acquire. I was surprised, therefore, to meet with the following in one of the *Encyclopædias (from what source gathered, I do not know).

"It is natural to suppose that the first languages were, for the greater part, spoken from the throat; that what consonants were used to vary the cries were mostly guttural;" (and more to the same purpose.)

Now, I have always fancied, to the contrary of this, that an analysis of the Hebrew language would exhibit a proportion for the guttural letters greatly below that of any other kind, and I am still convinced of it. For the want of a more copious abstract—which would be a work of great time and labour—take the following, made from the two first Psalms, according to the text of Leusden. I have divided the letters, for the sake of simplicity, into four kinds only—labials, linguals, gutturals, and sibilants. Many objections, no doubt, may be found to this division, as not being sufficiently dis-

* Good and Gregory, Art. Language.

inctive; but a greater number of distinctions would only embarrass us and lead us into tiresome length, without contributing, in any essential degree, to the present purpose. If any one shall further remark, that the pronunciation of the Hebrew letters is not with certainty known to us, he too will be right; but not in thinking that this circumstance need invalidate our conclusions. If the question were as to the relative value of the cognate letters, it would indeed be futile, but there is very little to prevent us from ascertaining with accuracy the proportions of the different kinds of letters. Thus, whether is to be considered as having had the power of a B, or a P, or both, it is certain, at least, that it was a labial. According, then, to the most generally received scheme of Hebrew pronunciation, let us consider M, B, P, and Faw (incipient) as labials; L, R, Th, N, D, and T as linguals; C, Ch, K, and G as gutturals; and S, Sh, Tsade,* and Z as sibilants. The two first Psalms will be found to exhibit these in the following proportions:—

	First.	Second.	Total.
Linguals . .	70	+ 72	= 142
Labials . .	59	+ 48	= 107
Sibilants . .	26	+ 33	= 59
Gutturals . .	24	+ 30	= 54

In round numbers these proportions will be—linguals 28, labials 21, sibilants 12, gutturals 11. (I cannot pledge myself for perfect accuracy in this calculation, but it is as accurate as three or four trials can make it.) Here then we see, that in these two specimens—which confirm one another in all respects—so far from the language being “mostly guttural,” as it was “natural to suppose,” the guttural division of it is so much below the rest, as to be exceeded in a proportion of two to one in one case, and two and a half to one in another. I have remarked that the labial letters are the easiest to utter. I do not mean by this that they are therefore most numerous. It may, indeed, be justly supposed that their number, from the circumstance of this facility, will have been considerable in all early languages—in the earliest, perhaps, preponderant; but from the greater variety of movements which the tongue can make, and the greater number of shapes it assumes, it would soon come to pass that the offspring of the latter would multiply beyond that of the lips, which have performed all the evolutions they are capable of when they have closed and unclosed, thrust themselves outward, or retreated upon the teeth. All that the above calculation is intended to prove is, the small relative proportion of the guttural letters in the Hebrew, contrary to the opinion which supposes them to have predominated in early languages.

With respect to that division of the letters into Dentals, which our orthoepists usually adopt, it will be seen that I have rejected it altogether from the foregoing plan. In fact, I am glad of an opportunity of doing so, and of showing my ill-will to that division, because I think it a very foolish one. What in the world, for instance, do they mean, by calling L a dental? If L is a dental, then it would be pleasant to know, how it happens that infants pronounce that letter quite well, before they have cut their teeth, to say nothing of old men, after they have lost theirs? In pronouncing L very briskly, the tongue may possibly just tip the teeth in coming away from the roof of the mouth; you may likewise be able to produce it from the teeth at once, if you purposely endeavour it; but the natural and ordinary way is quite independent of teeth. The teeth, by throwing up a wall all round the tongue, act as an important auxiliary to it in its different operations, preventing the escape of more breath than the tongue desires to liberate, and in many cases completing some necessary figure of the mouth which the tongue has begun. But in all these, and any other cases, let me ask, which is the principal operator—tongue or teeth? D is a dental, says Walker; yet, without a tooth in my head, I would undertake to tell Walker he was a dull dog for saying so;—without a tongue I could not. The fact is, there is not a single letter in the alphabet that merits this name of dental, if you except the two sounds of Th, in which the teeth perform so conspicuous a part, as perhaps to justify the distinction. Most of the other letters usually classed as dentals are pronounced by an appulse of the tongue against the upper gums, and perhaps it was from the reluctance of orthodox linguists to coin a new word for the occasion that these letters came to be called dentals,—“teeth” seeming the best way of saying “gums,” I suppose, in the absence of the appropriate word. Booth, in his Analytical Dictionary, is not content with fewer than ten dental consonants, viz. D, L, N, R, S, T, Th, (soft and hard), Y, and Z! Now with the exception only of the two Th's, there is not one letter among all these but what a man might very well pronounce “sans teeth, sans everything”—but the tongue. Walker talks of “mute dentals” and “hissing dentals,” and “lispings dentals,” and “dento-gutturals,” and dento-liquids,” and “dento-nasal-liquids,” and, so talking, seems not to have the slightest suspicion that he wags his tongue all the while. If he had called F and V dento-labials or labio-dentals, (he calls them “hissing labials”) there would have been an obvious propriety in such a compound; he might also have called Th a dento-lingual; but in the above compounded terms, he gives the most prominent place to the least prominent, as if he had said “Walker, John,” or “published by Co. Brown, Orme, Rees, and Longman.” For the teeth, in short, are in every case the inferior partners of the firm, the undistinguishable “Co.” whom nobody should inquire for—Tongue, Lips, and Co. I cannot conceive what objection orthoepists have to recognise the claims of that lively organ, the tongue; but if they desire a different distinction for those so-called dentals, above named, let me propose a new term. What think you, gentlemen, of the Gingival, or the gum letters? Better be laughed at and understood, than wondered at and found perplexing. At any rate, gums are not teeth.

In inventing a name for anything, I conceive the rule should be, to memorialise its most conspicuous quality or circumstance, as by this it will best be known and recognised. In pronouncing such letters as D, L, N, &c. the tongue is the chief agent; therefore, those letters ought to be called linguals. In C, K, G, &c. the tongue also plays a part, but the thick sound which the throat contributes forms the stronger characteristic; therefore these are properly called gutturals. The letters S, Sh, &c. would require to be numbered with the linguals, but that peculiar hissing sound which accompanies them constitutes so striking a feature in spoken language as to seem to merit a distinctive name. It is this which is considered to characterise English in so remarkable a degree, and we shall presently see what proportion it bears in our language,—“the language of serpents,” as it has been called.

* Gingival, with the accent on the second syllable. Catullus has a poem on one Egnatius who, having white teeth, smiled incessantly. A line in this poem, which represents the hero as rubbing his gums with a very odd kind of tooth powder (see the Latin), discovers to us the proper pronunciation of the word gingiva, as above marked, what the grammarians call an antithetichus;

“russum defricare gingivam.”

But if the dictionaries cannot stomach such an uncouth word, let them go to the Greeks, who have a much prettier one at their service,—δύλον or ἐνδύλον—as if to say tender part, from δύλος tender. The enonic consonants!

ASSOCIATION OF PERSONS AND THINGS DURING DREAMS.

To the Editor of the LONDON JOURNAL.

SIR, — I beg to relate to you a curious instance of the association of real events with the fictions of sleep, which occurred to me a short time since; for I think that the clear manner in which I was enabled, on waking, to trace the things that I had dreamed, to sources which had a true existence, renders them sufficiently interesting to be recorded; since no published facts are fewer in extent, than those which afford materials for constructing a good “theory of dreaming.” A perusal of the article at page 157 of your Number for May 20, has induced me to write to you.

As I rode into London one morning, some months since, I suddenly met a gentleman who, a few months before, had left England to enter on the duties of a foreign medical appointment. Knowing that the station was acceptable to him, I was astonished to see him again in London, but the wanness of his appearance, and a something peculiar about his teeth, which had the character of those of a man who is in mental and bodily distress, who resorts to fluid stimulants, and who does not consume much solid food;—teeth not closely united; looking worn, unhealthy, and not firm and perpendicular in the jaw,—these things told me in an instant the history of his journey and his return, which I need not detail now. Subsequent conversations (a month after) confirmed my impressions. The nature of these is of no moment to my story.

In the course of the afternoon I was examining a manuscript which contained the words “hunger and the mange,” under circumstances that rendered them particular objects of note to me.

In the evening I wrote a letter to a gentleman, conveying to him an appointment which had previously been held by a friend of my own, and was vacated by the latter on his leaving Europe for India.

This friend had now been so long away from the shores of England without writing to me, that I was much troubled about his fate, and begun to fear that some untoward accident of flood, climate, or field, had carried him from this world of trials. At night, in my dreams, the mystery was thus solved by the creative power of the brain,—a solution which I should premise was not a true one. I relate the events for no accomplishment of a prophecy, no rare coincidence, but simply as evidence of a distinct combination of ideas which occurred in one state of the mind, with events which occupied the mind when in another state. Such combinations occur, I believe, during every dream, but the difficulty is to trace them. There are causes for all things: even the vagaries of the mind during sleep are not purely inventive.

My dream on this occasion turned on my friend in India, because I had written on the previous day to the gentleman who had obtained the appointment which my Indian friend formerly held. I thought he came into my study the picture of wretchedness—sallow, wan, emaciated, and with marks of eruptive disease on the skin. Surprise filled me, and I questioned him as I should have done if awake; whereupon he told me a heart-rending tale of his voyage, of which the chief event was supplied by the rustling of those two day words in my brain, “hunger and the mange.” The captain of the ship, he said, had not taken out a sufficient stock of provisions, and all the miseries of starvation visited the unhappy crew and passengers. The last meal on board was made from candles, and debility had brought forth an eruption on the passengers which was like the mange of dogs, and his hunger had been such, that involuntarily attempts to supply the reality of eating by the imaginative process of grinding food, had worn his teeth to stumps; to prove which he took me to the light of the window, threw back his head, opened wide his mouth, and showed me the miserable remnants of those instruments. I had seen their fellows in the morning, unintentionally displayed, in the mouth of the physician in the street. “Alas,” said I, “dear and suffering friend, why did you not return a few hours sooner. I have but this day conveyed an appointment of the post you held to another person, and you again might have had it.” He afterwards detailed to me the cause of his long silence and absence,—the eagerness with which he left the provisionless ship for one that was homeward bound, and the perils and delays he had met with on his return.

So powerfully did the fiction move me, that I woke with the agony which the affecting and truly natural character of the relation had excited. I at once distinctly traced the connexion between the series of events, including many that I have not here given, and cannot now fully recollect. The voyage of the physician whom I had met in the morning, was plainly the parent fact to the voyage which occupied my attention in the dream. The parties connected with the events, and the dream, all belonged to the same profession.

* Supposed to have the sound of French j.

This class of phenomena of the brain will bear more investigation than I have time to give them, but I feel pleasure in contributing them to your highly interesting Journal, for the reflection of your readers,

And remain, Sir,
Your well-wisher and humble servant,
G. I. M.

EPITAPH ON LUDLOW.

SUCH of our readers as are acquainted with the LONDON JOURNAL from its commencement will bear us testimony, that we have been as good as our word in keeping it free from politics. But we have always considered that very freedom as giving us a special right, nay, as imposing upon us the duty, of honouring the memory of noble spirits of all parties,—the true Christians, whether among orthodox or heterodox,—the true martyrs to a sense of right, whether mistaken or otherwise,—the Hookers and the De Sales, the Falklands, Ludlows, and Hutchinsons,—the royalist who built up his king out of the princeliness of his own heart, and the republican who thought all the world fit to govern themselves, because love and knowledge had given him generous self-government. We shall therefore make no apology, even to the most Tory part of the humanists among our readers for giving them an opportunity, furnished us by a friend, of doing honour to the spirit common to all the honourable, in the person of the famous Parliamentary officer Ludlow, one of the most undeniably honest men that ever existed. The gentleman alluded to, who has favoured us with this inscription, copied it himself from Ludlow's tomb at Vevay, and has added an interesting particular or two respecting his house. The people there, it seems, are still proud of the memory of the virtuous exile.

We have given a version of the epitaph, in obedience to the wishes of the lady who forwarded our communicant's information, and who justly asks in what respect a "finite mind" can rise higher, than in conscientiously adhering, as Ludlow did, to the opinions he thought right, through all trials?

It may not be generally known, says our correspondent, that the house where the patriot lived still remains, and is called by his name. On the stone over the door, is an inscription difficult to render in English, because of a play upon the words patria and patrie, but implying that every soil is the country of a brave and high-minded fellow-creature. The back of the house is only separated from the lake of Geneva by a small grassy mound and perpendicular tier of rock, now not more than fifteen feet in depth, with winding steps cut into it, that lead down to the water. And there, the inhabitants told our traveller, the boat had been moored, as related by Ludlow in his memoirs; and they pointed out a spot close by, where some of the poor wretches were concealed, that were employed to put an end to him and his companions.

The inscription on Ludlow's tomb is in the principal church at Vevay, and runs as follows. His widow, with a pardonable enthusiasm, has exaggerated a little in giving him the title of "conqueror of Ireland" (in which country however he really did set an important and effective part); and her own merits are sufficiently set forth, if we are to suppose that this part of the inscription was of the same date as the other. But most probably some learned native wrote it for her; and if she did not alter it, a little excess of pride in the love and fortunes of such a man may be forgiven to the wife that adhered to him in all hours.

[TRANSLATION.]

Stop, and consider.

HERE lieth Edmund Ludlow, Englishman, of the county of Wiltshire, son of Sir Henry Ludlow, Member of Parliament, of which house himself was a member; noble by his descent, nobler by his own virtues; in his religion a Protestant, in piety a shining light. He commanded a regiment at the age of twenty-three, and not long afterwards was appointed Major-General. Conqueror of Ireland, intrepid in action, and scornful of his life; in victory, clement and merciful; he was the defender of the liberties of his country, and the untiring foe of arbitrary power; in which cause, though worthy of a better fortune, he betook himself into an exile of thirty-two years standing in Switzerland, where dying in the seventy-third year of his age, he left his friends longing for him, and flew joyful to his eternal abode.

This monument, in everlasting testimony of true and sincere wifely affection, was raised to his memory by Elizabeth Thomas, his courageous, grieving, and beloved consort, the partner alike of his joys and his sorrows, who, in the greatness of her spirit and the strong force of conjugal love, was his constant companion to the day of his death. In the year of our Lord 1693.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXVI.—THE SHEPHERD-LORD.

WITH A WORD ON SIR EGERTON BRYDGES, AND ON THE NAME OF BROUGHAM.

THE following extract from the Memoirs written by the celebrated Anne, Countess of Dorset, Pembroke, and Montgomery, (herself a romance—we must give her Character in a future number) we take from the 'Censura Literaria' of Sir Egerton Brydges, a book counted as dry as dust by some, but erroneously, for the dust is often precious,—now disclosing some curious old book of poetry, now some gorgeous shield &c., like the ruins of an ancient scholarly monastery; and now and then we meet the figure of Sir Egerton himself, walking in his melancholy, and brooding over fallen greatness,—a little beyond the necessity perhaps, but earnestly, and with a faith; and all earnestness is interesting to us, especially in a poetical shape. Sir Egerton, after his fashion, and by no means the least touching fashion, is original; and of how few claimants of the public attention can this be said?

At the close of his extract in the 'Censura' are three sonnets by him upon the subject, not his best, though not uninteresting; and he has quoted passages from Mr Wordsworth's beautiful poem, 'On the Restoration of Lord Clifford to the Mansion of his Ancestors, Brougham Castle,' with some verses of which we shall close this article. They are like the festal echo of its walls, followed by their every-day silence. It will not be uninteresting to a reader in these, or after times, to know that Brougham Castle derives its name from the Ham or Village, now town, on the little river Brough, which town gives the family name to its present illustrious possessor, the descendant of its ancient lords.

"Henry Lord Clifford, born 1454, (says the Countess, his descendant) was between six and seven years of age at his father's death; for whose act, (the killing the young Earl of Rutland, Edward IV's brother, somewhat unmercifully, in battle,) the family was soon after attainted. He was one of the examples of the variety of fortunes in the world; for, at seven years old, he was put into the habit of a shepherd's-boy, by the care and love of an industrious mother, to conceal his birth and parentage; for had he been known to have been his father's son and heir, in all probability he would either have been put in prison, or banished, or put to death; so odious was the memory of his father for killing the young Earl of Rutland, and for being so desperate a commander in battle against the house of York, which then reigned.

"So in the condition of a shepherd's-boy at Lanesborough, where his mother then resided for the most part, did this Lord Clifford spend his youth till he was about fourteen years of age, about which time, his mother's father, Henry Bromfiel, Lord Vesey, died.

"And a little after his death it came to be murmured at court, that his daughter's two sons were alive, about which their mother was examined; but her answers were, that she had given directions to send them beyond seas, to be bred there, and she did not know whether they were dead or alive; which equivocation of hers did the better pass, because presently after her husband's death, she sent both her sons away to the sea-side; the younger of which, called Richard Clifford, was indeed transported into the seas over the Low Countries, to be bred there, where he died not long after; so as his elder brother, Henry, Lord Clifford, had, after his restitution, the enjoyment of that little estate that this Richard, his younger brother, should have had, if he had lived.

"But her eldest son, Henry Lord Clifford, was secretly conveyed back to Lanesborough again, and committed to the hands of shepherds as aforesaid, which shepherds' wives had formerly been servants in that family, as attending the nurse who gave him suck, which made him, being a child, more willing to that mean condition, where they infused into him that belief, that he must either be content to live in that manner, or be utterly undone.

"And as he did grow to more years he was still more capable of this danger, if he had been discovered; and, therefore, presently after his grandfather, the Lord Vesey, was dead, the said murmur of his being alive being more and more whispered at the court, made his said loving mother, by means of her second husband, Sir Lancelot Thirkeld, to send him away with the said shepherds and their wives to Cumberland, to be kept as a shepherd there, sometimes at Thirleot, and amongst his father-in-law's kindred, and sometimes on the borders of Scotland, where they took land purposely for these shepherds who had the custody of him, where many times his father-in-law came purposely to visit him, and sometimes his mother, though very secretly.

"By this mean kind of breeding this inconvenience befel him—that he could neither read nor write; for they durst not bring him up in any kind of learning, for fear, lest by it, his birth should be discovered; yet after he came to his lands and honours he learned to write his name only.

"And after this Henry Lord Clifford had lived twenty-four or twenty-five years in this obscure manner, and that himself was grown to be about thirty-one or thirty-two years of age, Henry VII. then obtaining his crown did, in the first part of his reign, in 1486, restore him in blood and honour, and to all his baronies and castles.

"This Henry Lord Clifford did, after he came to his estate, exceedingly delight in astronomy and the contemplation of the stars, which it was likely he was seasoned in during the time of his shepherd's life. He built a great part of Barden tower, which is now much decayed; and there he lived much, which it is thought he did rather, because in that place he furnished himself with materials and instruments for that study.

"He was a plain man, and lived for the most part a country life, and came seldom either to the court or to London, but when he was called thither to sit in them, as a peer of the realm, in which parliament it is reported he behaved himself wisely and nobly, like a good Englishman.

"He died when he was sixty-nine or seventy years old, 28d April, 1523."

"He retired," says Wiltaker, "to the solitude of Barden, where he seems to have enlarged the tower out of a common keeper's lodge, and where he found a retreat equally favourable to taste, to instruction, and to devotion. The narrow limits of his residence show that he had learned to despise the pomp of greatness, and that a small train of servants could suffice him who had lived to the age of thirty a servant himself."

CONCLUSION OF MR WORDSWORTH'S 'SONG AT THE FEAST OF BROUGHAM CASTLE.'

The poet is repeating the song of his ancient predecessor, the Minstrel; which, after describing the shepherd-state of his lord, thus terminates, followed by the modern Minstrel's comments:—

"Now another day is come,
Fitter hope, and nobler doom;
He hath thrown aside his crook,
And hath buried deep his book;
Armour rusting in his Halls
On the blood of Clifford calls;—
'Quell the Scot,' exclaims the Lance,— 'Bear me to the heart of France,'
Is the longing of the Shield—
Tell thy name, thou trembling Field;
Field of death, where'er thou be,
Groan thou with our victory!
Happy day and mighty hour,
When our Shepherd, in his power,
Mailed and horsed, with lance and sword,
To his Ancestors restored
Like a re-appearing star,
Like a glory from afar,
First shall head the Flock of War!"

"Alas! the fervent Harper did not know,
That for a tranquil soul the lay was framed,
Who, long compelled in humble walks to go,
Was softened into feeling, soothed, and tamed.

*Love had he found in huts where poor men lie;
His daily teachers had been woods and rills,
The subsistence that is in the starry sky,
The sleep that is among the lonely hills.*

In him the savage virtue of the race,
Revenge, and all ferocious thoughts were dead:
Nor did he change; but kept in lofty place
The wisdom which adversity had bred.

Glad were the valea, and every cottage hearth;
The Shepherd-Lord was honoured more and more;
And, ages after he was laid in earth,
'The Good Lord Clifford' was the name he bore."

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

CORBET, THE FACTIOUS BISHOP IN THE TIME OF CHARLES I.

CORBET was a man of wit, whose poems have survived in the collections. His constitutional vivacity was so strong, as hardly to have been compatible with episcopal decorum; but times and manners must be taken into consideration; and, though he would have been compelled, had he lived now, to be more considerate of place and occasion, there is no reason to doubt that he took himself for as good a churchman as he was an honest man. And liberties are sometimes taken by such men with serious objects of regard, not so much of a light consideration, as from the confidence of love. Had Corbet lived in later times, he would, perhaps, have furnished as high an example of elegant episcopacy as any of the Rundles or Shipleys. As it was, he was a sort of everlasting college-boy, who never grew old. Yet his appearance is described as "venerable;" and he could be serious enough on occasion, especially in behalf of Christian charity.

"His person, if we may rely upon a fine portrait of him in Christ Church, Oxford," says Mr Gilchrist (from whose edition of his Poems we make the following extracts) "was dignified, and his frame about the common size: one of his companions says he had 'A face that might heaven to affection draw;'

and Aubrey says he had heard that 'he had an admirably grave and venerable aspect.'

"In no record of his life is there the slightest trace of malevolence or tyranny: 'he was,' says Fuller, 'of a courteous carriage, and no destructive nature to any who offended him, counting himself plentifully repaid with a jest upon him.' Benevolent, generous, and spirited in his public character; sincere, amiable, and affectionate in private life; correct, eloquent, and ingenious as a poet; he appears to have deserved and enjoyed, through life, the patronage and friendship of the great, and the applause and estimation of the good.

"But the predominant faculty of his mind was wit, which he employed with most success when employed ironically; to this 'The Address to the Ghost of Wisdom,' and 'The Distracted Puritane,' are memorable examples. Indeed, he was unable to overcome his talent for humour, even when circumstance and character concurred to repress its indulgence. Of this propensity the following anecdotes, copied verbatim from Aubrey's MSS. in Mrs Ashmole, are curious proofs.

"After he was doctor of divinity, he sang ballads at the crosse at Abingdon; on a market day he and some of his comrades were at the tavern by the crosse (which, by the way, was then the finest of England; I remember it when I was a freshman; it was an admirable curious Gothicque architecture, and fine figures in the niches: 'twas one of those built by king Edward for his queen.) The ballad-singer complained he had no custom—he could not put off his ballads. The jolly doctor puts off his gowne, and puts on the ballad-singer's leathern jacket, and, being a handsome man and a rare full voice, he presently vended a great many, and had a great audience.

"After the death of Dr Goodwin he was made dean of Christ Church. He had a good interest with great men, as you may find in his poems; and that with the then great favourite, the Duke of Bucks, his excellent wit 'twas ever of recommendation to him. I have forgot the story; but at the same time Dr Fell thought to have carried it, Dr Corbet put a pretty trick on him, to let him take a journey to London for it, when he had already the graunt of it.

"His conversation was extreme pleasant. Dr Stubbins was one of his cronies; he was a jolly, fat doctor, and a good housekeeper. As Dr Corbet and he were riding in Lob lane, in wet weather ('tis an extraordinary drep, dirty lane), the coach fell, and Corbet said that Dr S. was up to the elbows in mud, and he was up to the elbows in Stubbins.

"One time, as he was confirming, the countrie people pressing in to see the ceremonie, said he, 'Beare off there! or I'll confirm ye with my staff.' Another time, being to lay his hand on the head of a man very bald, he turns to his chaplaine, and said, 'Some dust, Lushington,' to keep his hand from slipping. There was a man with a great, venerable beard; said the bishop, 'You behind the beard!'

"This chaplaine, Dr Lushington, was a very learned and ingenious man, and they loved one another. The bishop would sometimes take the key of the wine-cellar, and he and his chaplain would go and lock themselves in, and be merry; then, first he lays down his episcopal hood, 'There layes the doctor,' then he puts off his gowne, 'there layes the bishop; then 'twas, 'here's to thee, Corbet; 'here's to thee, Lushington.'"

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the Royal Academy, Somerset House.

In the Antique Academy all classification is lost, and pictures of every kind, in all sorts of material, are crowded together in almost inextricable confusion. Among the mass, however, there are few that call for more than a passing glance. 418, 'The Lord's Prayer,' designs by Flaxman, R. J. Lane, A. E., is an engraving of some very chaste and graceful sketches. The illustrations are not always literally typical of the text; but it is not possible to represent every separate limb of a sentence which has only a moral reference. Chalon is in his best condition this year. His portraits are, it is true, mere sketches, coloured after an arbitrary mode, rather serving as hints for the complexion of the originals, than positively imitating and conveying their actual appearance; but there is a life and spirit in what he does,—a united delicacy and freedom, which are perfect of their kind. There are several female heads in the Antique Room, which are excellent; witness the 'Portrait of Lady Agnes Byng' (561), and the 'Portrait of Lady Augusta Baring' (580).

There are some very good flower pieces in the room. Barbank's 'Fable of the Lily and the Rose' (512), Spry's 'Study of Holyoaks' (517), and 537, 'Fogcloves,' by Mrs Harrison, are the best. 458, 'Fruit and Flowers,' is not equal to Bartholomew's usual performances. 518, 'Group of Foreign Birds,' A. Pelletier, is a lively bit of colour. 583, 'The Mosque and Mausoleum of Sheik Nizam-ud-diin Aoulid, at Delhi,' W. Daniell, is a nice sketch of a most elegant and splendid building.

The Sculpture Room appears to us very full; but we cannot say we found there much that we thought interesting. 1045, 'Devotion,'—a statue in marble, R. Westmacott, R. A.; a female figure, kneeling (not particularly beautiful,) is devout certainly as to her action, according to conventional forms; but there is no corresponding expression in the countenance. It is rather a face of care-worn patience; it might more fitly have been named Resignation. Either we have seen 1048, 'Group, in marble, of a Mother and Child,' E. H. Bailey, R. A., or it is marvellously like something we have before seen. It is a graceful representation of a popular subject; but we think something equivocal. Is maternity meant to be the principal characteristic of the female? or captivating beauty? Were not Venus and Cupid in Mr Bailey's head when he designed it? We confess they were in ours when we saw it, till we were corrected by the title in the catalogue. 1048, 'A Sleeping Shepherd Boy, a statue in marble,' J. Gibson, A., is elegant; but the action wants probability; there is a want of something to support the sleeping body; we are anxious lest he should fall from his seat, and therefore the feeling of repose is broken in upon. 1047, 'Marble Statue of Diana,' R. J. Wyatt, is spirited and beautiful; but not original. 1060, 'Alto Relievo,' J. Henning, Jun., is full of action and energy, and very well composed. The horse, particularly the head, is admirable; so is the stag; and the figures all look busy and interested in their work. The figure on the right is the only exception; a thick-set fellow, who seems too indolent to work hard. 1081, 'Statue in Marble, of George, the eldest son of Mr and Lady Agnes Byng,' R. Westmacott, Jun., very simply and feelingly designed. The child is in the attitude of prayer; the expression of the face is grave, but not sorrowful; confiding in his destiny. The action is perfectly easy and natural, and the head is really finely modelled. 1096, 'St George and the Dragon,' E. Corbould, is imperfect in the execution, but extremely spirited. The start sideways of the horse, the action of the warrior Saint, thrusting his lance with both hands down the Dragon's throat; the monster, on his back, grappling with a huge claw the horse's flank,—the whole design is original and stirring. It would have been better if we could have seen the Dragon's other paw; we should always see both hands of the principal figures in any design. 1134, 'Part of a Monument to the Memory of the late — Palmer, Esq.,' H. W. Sievier, including a portrait of the deceased, with a female holding the bible to him, is designed with feeling, though the combination of the usual costume of the gentleman and the classic habiliments of the female are rather a startling, though not an uncommon, licence.

Society in Staines for the Promotion of Science and Literature.—An association has been formed for the promotion of science and literature in Staines and its vicinity; the first season of which was closed by an address from the Rev. Dr. Jones, vicar of Bedfont, on the 28th of April last. The same gentleman delivered an address at the opening of the society, and both addresses have been printed. The evening meetings of the first season were held in the National School-room: but the society, feeling the inconvenience of preparing the room each evening for the lectures, as well as the want of other permanent accommodation, have resolved on erecting a suitable building for their purposes, to accomplish which, a sum of 1000*l.* has been subscribed, in shares of 25*l.* each. The number of Members of the Society is eighty-one; at the close of the season, the amount of subscriptions and collections from non-subscribers was 58*l.* 1*s.*; the disbursements were 27*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, leaving a balance in the hands of the Treasurer of 30*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*

In the address of the Rev. Dr. Jones, the following passage occurs—it may serve as a specimen.

"If the last age did yield more erudite scholars than this, we in our turn, may boast of a more general diffusion of knowledge—let me add, of a truer estimate of its worth. What we lecturers advocate, and what we disseminate, may appear superficial in the estimation of one, armed cap-à-pié with pedantic prescription, or living in the enchanted circle of fashionable adulation; but to us every-day people, with common minds, humble hopes, and daily cares, it is a privilege to catch even a glimpse of better things. The mere notice of such subjects casts a halo of blessedness around the toils and bereavements of life. It is the rainbow in the shower. It unlocks the springs of intellect—it engenders and enlivens inquiry—it teaches at least the alphabet of science, and leaves to the option of the hearer its further combination. Nay, the very lecture-day, on which we meet as friends and neighbours for the promotion of an object, innocent, intellectual, social, and benevolent, is expected with anxiety, and hailed with delight; and I confess I cannot depreciate—I cannot question the utility or virtue even of this: I am not one of those who would cast a blight upon the very patches of verdure, that do occur in the cloudy and cheerless wilderness of human existence."

MUSIC.

THE other day we spent the afternoon at M. Herz's morning concert; a morning concert which dawned at two o'clock, and terminated an hour or two before sunset. As might be supposed, there was a preponderance of pianoforte music; but it was agreeably varied with other kinds, and we spent our post-meridian morning very pleasantly, although doomed to benumb the alternate leg where there was "no room for standing, mis-called standing-room."

Grisi and Lablache sang the duet, 'Guardate che figura,' from La Prova d'un Opera Seria, and startled the sober lifeness of the concert room with a burst of animal spirits and dramatic humour truly delightful. In the same style was 'Se Fiato in corpo avete,' from Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, sung by Tamburini and Lablache. The subject of the duet is identical with the well-known scene between Sterling and Sir John, in the 'Clandestine Marriage,' which some of us remember in the 'School Speaker,' but how dry, literal, and tiresome the English dialogue, compared with the exuberant spirits and humour of the duet. Lablache was the calculating father, Tamburini the liberal bargainer for the younger sister; and each entered freely into the feeling of his part, and made us laugh again—first at the squabble, then at the joyous conclusion of the bargain.

Malibran was there, and gave us an air, 'Ombra adorata aspetta,' in fine potent style; and, what we preferred, two little French romances at the pianoforte. Ivanhoff dispensed his sugary notes, but he should vary his subject more; there is a sameness in his style, which should be relieved by variety in the music. Mr Boehsa exhibited on the harp with amazing skill; but he affords a prominent instance of the tiresomeness of mere mechanical excellence when it is uninformed by feeling. A Mr Cottignies made his first appearance in public, in a solo on the flute, a dreary composition of his own, with some strange noises in the harmonics. We could not see anything in the performance to relieve the tedium of so subjectless a piece of writing.

One of the things that pleased us much was Miss Woodyatt's execution of a little ballad. Her voice is rich and mellow, and she sings with her heart in her mouth; and if she assiduously cultivate the former, and keep the latter in that very unusual place, and unspoilt by a mistaken wisdom, which imagines art greater than the nature that has made it, she will be that rare creature, a fine English singer.

De Beriot played a 'Fantasia' in chaste and severe mastery: he is truly a fine performer; but why will some of his admirers force him into a comparison with Paganini? In attempting to exalt their favourite by speaking in derogatory terms of the Italian, they do not show their admiration of him more vividly, but rather less; since if they are so incapable of perceiving the unspeakable beauties of the one, the best things of the other are likely not to be rightly understood. It is confounding reason and passion; comparing Dryden to Dante; a mortal working with his clay-moulded hands to one who hath a devil.

It is not our cue to give the first place to practical excellence, however refined; but as high as manual skill, a great tact for the power of his instrument, and knowledge of its effects, and considerable taste, may exalt an artist, so high must we rank M. Herz. 'A grand concerto in D minor' was full of brilliant effects, and handled in masterly style. The 'Duet Concertante' (à la Handel) by Moscheles, performed by the composer, and M. Herz, on two pianofortes, abounds in striking passages; but we could not recognize in it much resemblance to the Michelangelo of music. 'Brilliant Variations di Bravura,' (Herz,) was an amazing assemblage of feats of manual difficulty, not without elegance in the composition, and played with consummate skill. Of the 'Grand Characteristic Fantasia,' we cannot say we much approve. The numerical reduplication of the pianoforte serves but the more to betray its essential defect of a certain flippant poverty of tone and manner. It is an instrument to which we have all just reason to be grateful, for the command it gives to one or two pair of hands in an easy and accessible form, so to speak of a whole band in itself. It gives to the head and hands of one performer, the compass and range of many. But it does this at the expense of the power and richness of the individual instruments. Moreover its peculiar quality, the beating unsustained effect of its sound, makes it very unprofitable to multiply it to any extent. Eight performers, on four instruments, as in the present instance, may make more noise; but the effect is no grander, the tone no richer; while the staccato style to which the instrument is confined becomes more obtrusive. The result is somewhat analogous to very large engravings, which approach no nearer to the richness and depth of a picture, but, on the contrary, look poor and flat, and distress one with the confusion of hard, unblending lines.

The room, as we have already hinted, was extremely full, and the proportion of ladies greater than usual; their bonnets, of all the colours, looked like a perfect bed of artificial flowers.

PLEASANT LETTER OF MACCHIAVELLI.

"I can tell you that, on the arrival of your messenger, with a bow to the ground, and a declaration that he was sent express and in haste, every one arose with so many bows and so much clamour, that all things seemed turned topsy-turvy. Many persons asked me the news; and I, to increase my importance, said that the Emperor was expected at Trent, that the Swiss were assembling a new diet, and that the King of France was going to have an interview with the King of England; so that all stood open-mouthed and cap in hand to hear me. I am surrounded by a circle now, while writing, who, seeing me occupied upon so long a letter, wonder and regard me as one possessed; and I, to excite their surprise, pause now and then, and look very wise; and they are deceived. If they knew what I was writing, their wonder would increase. Pray send one of your men again; and let him hurry, and arrive in a heat, so that these people may be more and more astonished; for thus you will do me honour, and the exercise will be good for the horse at this season of the year. I would now write you a longer letter, if I were willing to tire out my imagination; but I wish to preserve it fresh for to-morrow. Remember me; and farewell.

"Your servant,

"NICOLO MACCHIAVELLI,

"Ambassador to the Minor Friars."

THE SONNET.

In the sonnets of most great poets, we almost always find traces of the violent impressions which agitated them; and these little pieces seem essentially adapted to convey a transient emotion, which perhaps would have been lost for ever, had not a few verses sufficed to express its vivacity, or its sorrow.—Literature of Portugal—Fraser's Magazine.

GOETHE'S EARLY READING (FROM HIS AUTOBIOGRAPHY).

I pursued my studies with zeal. Geography, universal history, and mythology occupied me by turns. I read Ovid's Metamorphoses with avidity. I studied the first book with an attention almost peculiar. My youthful head was filled with a multitude of marvellous facts, images, and events. I was seldom idle, and I employed myself only in fixing and combining in my mind the knowledge I had acquired. The study of these antiquities was not unattended with fatigue, nor wholly suitable to my age. A book which produced a much better effect on me was Fenelon's Telemachus. Notwithstanding the imperfection of the translation, I imbibed from this work sentiments of pure morality and piety. In Robinson Crusoe, the faithful picture of a reduced man to lead a solitary life for a long period, fixed my attention with equal force. I never could have fancied that there is no such place as the Isle of Felsenberg. I found in Lord Anson's voyages the merit and interest of truth combined with all the charms of the marvellous, such as they might have been invented by the most fertile imagination. We traversed, in idea, the whole world with that great seaman. We took pleasure in tracing out his course on the globe with the finger. But I soon had a harvest of another kind in hand. The warehouse, or rather manufactory, of the books which afterwards became so celebrated, under the title of Contes Bleus, was at Frankfurt. As there was an immense demand for these books, they were printed from plates which were preserved, but on very bad paper, and in almost illegible characters. It was a great happiness to us to be able to exchange a few pieces of coin daily at a bookstall for these inestimable relics of the middle ages. It was, however, impossible for us to feel their actual interest; but they did not prevent our being delighted with the book of Facetiae, the Quatrefits Aimon, the Fair Melusine, the Fair Blaguelonne, the Emperor Octavian, Fortunatus, and the Wandering Jew.

AN AUTHOR MORE BIG THAN GREAT.

Schlömer wished to avail himself of his residence at Leipsic, in order to get acquainted with persons of celebrity. I introduced him to those whom I knew. We also visited some with whom I was not acquainted at that time. I shall never forget our introduction at Gottsched's; it was characteristic of the man. He lived in a handsome first floor at the Golden Bear; old Breithof had given him these apartments for life, in consideration of the benefits arising to his bookselling business from the translations and other works of his guest. We were announced. The servant told us his master would be with us immediately, and showed us into a spacious room. Perhaps we did not comprehend a sign he made us. We thought he was directing us into an adjoining chamber, on entering which we witnessed a whimsical scene. Gottsched appeared at the same instant at an opposite door. He was enormously corpulent. He wore a damask robe-de-chambre lined with red taffety. His monstrous bald head was bare, contrary to his intention, for his servant rushed in at the same instant by a side door, with a long wig in his hand, the curls of which descended below the shoulders. He presented it to his master with a trembling hand. Gottsched, with the greatest apparent serenity, took the wig with his left hand, with which he dexterously fitted it to his head, whilst with the right he gave the poor devil a most vigorous box on the ear, which sent him to the door in a pirouette, like a valet in a play; after which, the old pedagogue, turning to us with an air of dignity, requested us to be seated, and conversed with us very politely for a considerable time.—Goethe's Life.

ANCESTORS AND DECENDANTS.

Young gentlemen! let not the highest of you who hear me this evening be led into the delusion, for such it is, that the founder of his family was originally a greater or better man than the lowest here. He willed it, and became it. He must have stood low; he must have worked hard; and with tools, moreover, of his own invention and fashioning. He waved and whistled off ten thousand strong and importunate temptations; he dashed the dice-box from the jewelled hand of Chance; the cup from Pleasure; and trod under foot the sorceries of each; he ascended steadily the precipices of Danger, and looked down with intrepidity from the summit; he overawed arrogance with sedateness; he seized by the horn and overleaped low Violence; and he fairly swung Fortune round. * * * This is not the doctrine, my friends, of the silk-enly and lawnly religious; it wears the coarse texture of the fisherman, and walks uprightly and straightforward under it. In speaking now more particularly to you amongst us, upon whom God hath laid the encumbrance of wealth. The sweets whereof bring teasing and poisonous things about you, not early sent away. What now are your pretensions under sacks of money? or your enjoyments under the shade of genealogical trees? Are they rational? Are they real? Do they exist at all? Strange inconsistency! to be proud of having as much gold and silver laid upon you as a mule hath, and yet to carry it less composedly. The mule is not answerable for the conveyance and discharge of his burthen: you are. Stranger infatuation still, to be proud of an excellent thing done by another than by yourselves, supposing any excellent things to have actually been done; and, after all, to be more elated on his cruelties than his kindnesses, by the blood he hath spilt than by the benefits he hath conferred; and to acknowledge less obligation to a well-informed and well-intentioned progenitor than to a lawless and ferocious barbarian. Would stocks and stumps, if they could utter words, utter such gross stupidity? Would the apple boast his crab origin? or the peach of his prune? Hardly any man is ashamed of being inferior to his ancestors, although it is the very thing at which the great should blush, if, indeed, the great in general descended from the worthy. I did expect to see the day, and although I shall not see it, it must come at last, when he shall be treated as a madman or an impostor who dares to claim nobility or precedence, and cannot show his family name in the history of his country. Even he who can show it, and who cannot write his own under it in the same or as goodly characters, must submit to the imputation of degeneracy, from which the lowly and obscure are exempt. He alone who maketh you wiser, maketh you greater; and it is only by such an implement that Almighty God himself affects it. When he taketh away a man's wisdom, he taketh away his power over himself and over others. What help of him, then! He may sit idly and swell his spleen, saying—Who is this? who is that? and at the question's end the spirit of inquiry dies away in him. It would not have been so, if, in happier hour he had said within himself—Who am I? What am I? and had prosecuted the search in good earnest.—Landor's Examination of William Shakespeare.

THE PRINTING MACHINE.

ITALY AND ITALIAN LITERATURE.

Italy and Italian Literature. By Charles Herbert, Esq. 8vo. London: Sherwood and Co.

AMONG all the modern absurdities in prose and rhyme, in tours, essays, novels, and romances, that have been published about Italy, we dread taking up a new book which professes to treat of that country. We are quite sure we speak within compass when we say we could fill one large quarto volume with the palpable mistakes, and another with the gross misrepresentations, of these shameless writers. A set of men and women brimful of prejudice, generally ignorant of the language, and in a tremendous hurry, run from the Alps as far as Naples, see the public sights, the churches, the operas, the picture and statue galleries, the ruins, and the outsides of the houses, and then running back again, print a book to tell the good people at home all about all Italy, one of the corners and small states of which would require the residence and observation of many months in order to be correctly appreciated. If these flying tourists would be satisfied like the good people in the Fair of Wakefield with talking about "Shakespeare and the musical-glasses," and confine themselves to blundering about antiquities and subjects of virtù, we should not so much mind them. But far from this moderation, with the half-effaced recollection of the rapid bird's-eye glance they have taken, they set themselves to pass judgment on the character and morals of a nation, and will damn you ten or twelve millions of Italians into a brace of sentences.

It is much to be regretted that even the best of our tourists,—men of high acquirements and abilities, like Forsyth and Henry Matthews, saw very little of Italian society. Hence, though their remarks on the fine arts, on scenery, and out-of-door life, are admirable, their broad notions about men and manners are, for the most part, perfectly absurd.

There are several reasons why the generality of Englishmen, even if they were to stay longer than they do in the country, should not become acquainted with the in-door life and real character of the Italians. With a few exceptions, the nobility of the country have been impoverished by many successive changes and revolutions; and entertaining, as they do, a high, and in many instances, an exaggerated notion of English wealth, pomp, and lordliness, they do not like to expose their interior establishments and the comparative narrowness of their own circumstances to the chances of a foreigner's contempt. The middle class, including professional men, untitled landed proprietors, and the like, and among whom is to be found by far the larger share of Italian talent, education and virtue, are very seldom the persons addressed by writers of introductory letters for nobili viaggiatori inglesi; and the Italians generally, though good-natured, easy and affable, have a certain pride, or self-respect, which prevents them from being over-forward, or forcing their acquaintance, or, at least, their intimacy, upon those who do not seek for it.

What Englishman is there out of the host that have written about them, who has ever been domesticated in half a dozen, nay, in one single noble Italian family—who has seen them at all times and under all circumstances—in all their relations of private life—in joy and sorrow, and without the artificial mask we all wear, more or less, in society? What Englishman has associated freely, not for weeks and months, but for years, with Italian lawyers, doctors, professors, merchants, and country-gentlemen, dining at their tables, joining their small family parties, and frequenting them familiarly both in the provinces and the capital cities? What Englishman among all these posting tourists has lived for ever so short a time with the farmers, the peasantry (il popolo), properly so called? We answer confidently not one!

Yet until the pen falls into the hands of some one who has had these advantages, and who possesses besides a clear, liberal, and discerning spirit, we shall never have a correct rendre of the domestic habits, the virtues, the vices, the strong parts, and the weak parts, of the Italian character; which, be it said, (and let it be remembered) varies exceedingly in different parts of the peninsula.

If we could rely on our own experience and observation, we should say decidedly that the result of such a general process of examination as we have alluded to, would be, on the whole, highly favourable to the Italians. Of one thing we are sure—it would be made evident that the dissoluteness—the disregard to the marriage tie, which is now commonly attributed to all classes, obtains only (and that now far from universally) among the highest class—that the middling class, particularly that large portion of it living away from the great cities, is mainly correct, and that the peasants, and the very lowest or poorest class, entertain more strict notions on this particular point than are to be found in almost any other country in Europe. If among our own peasantry and labouring people, fathers and brothers felt the sting of dishonour inflicted by a daughter's or a sister's shame but half so acutely as the poor Calabrians or Sicilians, their females' virtue would be better preserved, and the obnoxious clause in the new Poor-laws' Bill no longer thought a severity.

We are sorry we cannot make an exception to the rule we have laid down in favour of Mr Herbert. Judging from his book, though liberally and kindly disposed, he seems to have scarcely any knowledge of the Italian character, and very little indeed of Italian literature. As we suspect he is a young man, we will not be severe, but give a few not unfavourable specimens from his volume.

The following is his description of an Improvisatore, or poet that chaunts verses, in all sorts of rhyme, and all sorts of subjects, improvisu.

"To the no small satisfaction of our party, we learnt that the celebrated improvisatore, who happened to be on a provincial tour, had been prevailed on to delight the joyous inhabitants, for that night only, by the display of his extraordinary talents. This exhibition having the charm of novelty for most of us, was thankfully received at fortune's hands.

"We were all punctual, therefore, to the appointed hour, and carefully secured our seats in the small but neat theatre, which was soon to be graced by the presence of the bard. After a considerable interval employed in impressive preparation, a practice common with great men, adopted probably in the hope of rendering their appearance more imposing, the long looked-for hero presented himself. His air was rather prepossessing, and his person most scrupulously adorned to the nicest point of fashion. After having read over, in a slow and solemn manner, the rules to be observed in this poetic exhibition, he called for a subject worthy of his muse. The theme selected by one of the audience, Napoleon at Elba, was received with perfect composure, and with all the gravity of a parish clerk, was duly committed to paper; then slowly rising, and reading it over carefully, he proceeded to pace the boards with melancholy steps and slow, while, "his brow like to a tragic leaf," he ruminated over the delphic sheet which he held in his hand.

"One moment, as if suddenly seized by the poetic flatus, he marched with rapid strides; in the next, slightly starting, he halted, as if his muse had met with some unusual obstacle; to clear away this impediment, he drew a perfumed handkerchief from his pocket, and by applying it soothingly to his nose, he seemed to succeed in propitiating her. Again he slackened his pace to take a pinch of snuff, and lastly, applying his forefingers forcibly to his forehead, to support it under the throes of the forthcoming birth, he, in a most monotonous tone of voice, gave utterance to her inspirations, sawing the air all the while with his extended arm. His poetic effusions flowed pretty rapidly, and were honoured with due applauses. On the conclusion of the first exhibition of his powers, he sat down, apparently rather exhausted, and afterwards retired for a short interval to recruit his strength.

"The next performance consisted of the composition of a series of lines, a certain number of which terminated with given syllables. This task, which must have required considerable practice, was also completed to the general satisfaction. On the whole, our poet, though at no period of his improvisation, like some modern Corinna, affected to tears, (nor indeed was his audience,) seemed to understand his trade well. Far, however, from trembling under the inspirations of the god, like the Pythian priestess of old, our Magnus Apollo never once lost himself; nor do I believe that any consideration, either human or divine, could have diverted him from his subject; to it he most tenaciously adhered; he gave all he bargained for, but not a title beyond."

The next short extract we shall give relates to a mysterious state manoeuvre, touching which we should have been greatly obliged to the author for any information. What he says about Misley and his mission is merely the vague, popular report.

"There is no petty sovereign of Italy more heartily disliked by his subjects than the Duke of Modena. A capricious and arbitrary exercise of authority, heavy taxation, and a harassing system of espionage, are the very sufficient causes of this unpopularity. Probably, this mean-souled ruler is thus endeavouring to re-establish himself in the good graces of Austria, for his former questionable conduct towards that state, in having organized, through the agency of a Mr Misley, and the promised support of the French liberals, a revolutionary project, the end of which was to make himself monarch of Italy. His excuse, on the failure of this scheme, for betraying his associates, and even seeking the life of his prime agent, Misley, that he was himself betrayed by the French King to Metternich, is but a poor defence of his ungenerous and unworthy conduct. But this is not all: there is a mixture of vindictiveness and of refined selfishness in the mode in which he himself visits his own misdeeds in the eyes of his superiors, the Austrians, upon his unfortunate hereditary subjects."

This Mr Misley, who is descended from an English family that settled in Upper Italy, had interviews with other European sovereigns than Louis Philippe, and counted on the assistance of people very different from the French liberals. If we have been correctly informed, he went both to Berlin and St Petersburg, and that more than once; and performed almost as many journeys to win converts to his employer's wild views, as that distinguished conspirator of the middle ages, John of Procida, undertook, for the purpose of driving the princes of the house of Anjou and the French out of Sicily. As soon as the futility of the whole plan was felt, the Duchino, as a matter of course, cast off and disavowed his agent—and these people expected that Misley, from feelings of pique and revenge, would make one of the richest of political exposures, and proclaim the plots and the counterplots of the ambitious little Duke of Modena together with the measure of countenance or discountenance he, as the Duke's secret envoy, had met with at the different continental courts. Misley, however, did nothing of the sort; but, retiring to Paris, he merely published a volume on the abuses, oppression, and unpopularity of the Austrian government in Italy—a subject about which he had nothing new to offer to the world. By the latter course he might think he was still serving his old master, whose starting point was the necessity of a native dynasty and national government for the peninsula; and it is possible that Misley and the Duke are better friends than it is convenient for them to appear to be. We hear that this active, secret agent is now in Portugal. Can there be any connexion between his sojourn in that country and Dom Miguel's recent intimacy with the Duke of Modena, whose daughter, it is reported, the Portuguese prince is to marry?

Our concluding extract may be read with some interest, as it relates to one who was once the Empress of France and Queen of Italy, though now only Duchess of Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla. The author's observations are mainly correct, but he should have mentioned that Maria Louise's extravagance, her frequent and stately journeys to Vienna, her gifts to her favourites, &c. have battered the little States with a very heavy debt. She has, however, built a fine bridge across the Po, and erected one or two useful and ornamental public edifices in Parma.

"Under the mild government of this princess, Parma enjoys as much happiness as any of the minor Italian states. Her constant residence, with her little court around her, and the desire she evinces to encourage industry, according to the best of her judgment, deserve praise. She allows a municipal body to regulate the taxes; but the power of this assembly is nearly nominal, every thing being finally under the authority of the prime minister. The greatest bars to industry and improvement arise from the impolitic and vexatious restrictions imposed on the freedom of commercial intercourse, by each of these different little states: in this, indeed, they do but ape the greater European powers; but the consequences to a limited population of a few hundreds of thousands are felt in an immeasurably greater degree than where millions are concerned. Maria Louisa is generally and deservedly in much better odour as a sovereign than the Modenese tyrant. She has always visited with milder penalties than any other Italian sovereign, the unfortunate patriots, who rose in the two last revolutions; giving them, in many instances, the choice between voluntary exile to a foreign country, and imprisonment at home. She has one failing, which seemed hereditary in the family with which she became connected, and which appears to exist among the collateral branches of her own house. It would surely have been becoming in the wife, now the widow of Napoleon, to have played the part of Penelope; but this she has not done."

PHILOSOPHY OF MANUFACTURES.

The Philosophy of Manufactures. By Andrew Ure, M.D. London. 1835. 8vo. Pp. 492.

THE author explains in his Preface the purpose for which this volume has been undertaken and prepared. He says, "Were the principles of the manufactures exactly analyzed, and expounded in a simple manner, they would diffuse a steady light to conduct the masters, managers, and operatives, in the straight paths of improvement, and prevent them from pursuing such dangerous phantoms as flit along in the monthly patent lists. Each department of our useful arts stands in need of a guide-book to facilitate its study, to indicate its imperfections, and to suggest the most probable means of correcting them." The present volume, introductory to a series of works in more ample detail, is submitted to the public as a specimen of the manner in which the author conceives technological subjects should be discussed."

This work, then, is intended to introduce, by an exposition of the general principles of manufacturing industry, and also of the leading peculiarities which distinguish the application of these principles in each different department, a set of treatises which are to follow, forming each a complete account of a separate branch of our factory system. Under that name Dr Ure comprehends only our textile manufactures, namely, those of cotton, wool, flax, and silk. In the body of the work he says:—

"The term Factory, in technology, designates the combined operation of many orders of work-people, adult and young, in tending with assiduous skill a system of productive machines continuously impelled by a central power. This definition includes such organizations as cotton-mills, flax-mills, silk-mills, woollen-mills, and certain engineering works; but it excludes those in which the mechanisms do not form a connected series, nor are dependent on one prime mover. Of the latter class, examples occur in iron-works, dye-works, soap-works, brass-foundries, &c. Some authors, indeed, have comprehended, under the title Factory, all extensive establishments wherein a number of people co-operate towards a common purpose of art; and would therefore rank breweries, distilleries, as well as the workshops of carpenters, turners, coopers, &c., under the factory system. But I conceive that this title, in its strictest sense, involves the idea of a vast automaton, composed of various mechanical and intellectual organs, acting in uninterrupted concert for the production of a common object, all of them being subordinated to a self-regulated moving force. If the marshalling of human beings in systematic order for the execution of any technical enterprise were allowed to constitute a factory, this term might embrace every department of civil and military engineering, a latitude of application quite inadmissible."

The exposition is divided into four books; the subject of the first of which is, the "General Principles of Manufactures;" that of the second, the "Scientific Economy of the Factory System;" that of the third, the "Moral Economy of the Factory System;" and that of the fourth, the "Commercial Economy of the Factory System."

Dr Ure states, that in the course of the last summer he spent several months in the factory districts of Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, &c., all the principal establishments of which he had the best opportunities of inspecting and examining. Being accompanied on his tour by a clever draughtsman, who had particularly directed his attention to the delineation of mechanical contrivances, he was enabled to carry away with him drawings executed under his own eye of as much as he pleased of the wonderful machinery that fell under his observation. On the part of the proprietors of the factories, nearly without exception, he experienced an absence of all mystery and reserve, in the highest degree honourable to their intelligence and liberality. Indeed, he has not occasion, we believe, in the course of his work, to refer to a single instance of any indisposition to afford him whatever information he wished, while he repeatedly notices the kind attention of individuals, who accompanied him in his inquiries, assisted him with their explanations, and in various other ways showed their anxiety to promote his views.

The 'General view of Manufacturing Industry,' which forms the first Chapter of Book I. of the present work, is undoubtedly the most complete and masterly exposition which the subject has yet received. It is distinguished alike by extensive views, and by minute technical knowledge—by knowledge implying a perfect familiarity both with the principles of mechanical and chemical science, and with their practical application in the various processes described. Within the space to which we must confine ourselves, we cannot attempt any abstract, however rapid, of this interesting and admirable review; but we will notice one or two of the points in the reasoning with which we have been most struck.

The most remarkable circumstance developed in the progress of our manufactures is, their tendency to assume every day more and more of an automatic or self-acting character. This is particularly the case with such as are carried on entirely or chiefly by machinery; but even those that depend upon other agencies, show something of the same tendency.

"A mechanical manufacture being commonly occupied with one substance, which it conducts through metamorphoses in regular succession, may be made nearly automatic; whereas, a chemical manufacture depends on the play of delicate affinities between two or more substances, which it has to subject to heat and mixture under circumstances somewhat uncertain, and must, therefore, remain, to a corresponding extent, a manual operation. The best example of pure chemistry on self-acting principles which I have seen, was in a manufacture of sulphuric acid, where the sulphur being kindled and properly set in train with the nitre, atmospheric air, and water, carried on the process through a labyrinth of compartments, and supplied the requisite heat of concentration, till it brought forth a finished commercial product. The finest model of an automatic manufacture of mixed chemistry, is the five-coloured calico machine, which continuously, and spontaneously, so to speak, prints beautiful webs of cloth with admirable precision and speed. It is, in a cotton-mill, however, that the perfection of automatic industry is to be seen; it is there that the elemental powers have been made to animate millions of complex organs, infusing into forms of wood, iron, and brass, an intelligent agency."

Let the reader now mark the practical importance of the tendency thus described, as afterwards illustrated by the following account of one of its results:—

"The constant aim and effect of scientific improvement in manufactures are philanthropic, as they tend to relieve the workmen either from noisiness of adjustment which exhausts his mind, and fatigue his eyes, or from painful repetition of effort which distorts or wear out his frame. At every step of each manufacturing process described in this volume, the humanity of science will be manifest. New illustrations of this truth appear almost every day, of which a remarkable one has just come to my knowledge. In the woollen-cloth trade there is a process between carding and spinning the wool, called slubbing, which converts the spongy rolls, turned off from the cards, into a continuous length of fine porous cord. Now, though carding and spinning lie within the domain of automatic science, yet slubbing is a handicraft operation, depending on the skill of the slubber, and participating therefore in all his irregularity. If he be a steady, temperate man, he will conduct his business regularly, without needing to harass his juvenile assistants, who join together the series of card-rolls, and thus feed his machine; but if he be addicted to liquors, and passionate, he has it in his power to exercise a fearful despotism over the young pieceners, in violation of the proprietor's benevolent regulations. This class of operatives, who, though inmates of factories, are not, properly speaking, factory workers, being independent of the moving power, have been the principal source of the obloquy so unparingly cast on the cotton and other factories, in which no such capricious practices or cruelties exist. The wool slubber, when behind hand with his work after a visit to the beer-shop, resumes his work with violence, and drives his machine at a speed beyond the power of the pieceners to accompany; and if he finds them deficient in the least point, he does not hesitate to lift up the long wooden rod from his slubbing-frame, called a billy-roller, and beat them unmercifully. I rejoice to find that science now promises to rescue this branch of the business from handicraft caprice, and to place it, like the rest, under the safeguard of automatic mechanism. The details of this recent invention will be given in describing the woollen manufacture."

Dr Ure considers Arkwright to have been the true founder of the Factory System of Great Britain, and in that title he conceives the real glory of this celebrated person, to consist rather than in any of those mechanical inventions, his claim to which has been the subject of so much controversy. We must pass over the glowing description which is given of the general consequences of the great change thus effected by the ingenuity and perseverance of a single individual; but one of its results, here mentioned, is in so high a degree curious and important, that we must make room for a short statement of it. Having remarked that when Adam Smith wrote, automatic machinery being hardly known, he was properly led to regard the division of labour as the grand principle of manufacturing improvement, our author proceeds:—

"The principle of the factory system then is, to substitute mechanical science for hand skill, and the partition of a process into its essential constituents, for the division or gradation of labour among artisans. On the handicraft plan, labour, more or less skilled, was usually the most expensive element of production—Materiam superabat opus; but on the automatic plan, skilled labour gets progressively superseded, and will, eventually, be replaced by more overlookers of machines.

"By the infirmity of human nature it happens, that the more skilful the workman, the more self-willed and intractable he is apt to become, and, of course, the less fit a component of a mechanical system, in which, by occasional irregularities, he may do great damage to the whole. The grand object, therefore, of the modern manufacturer is, through the union of capital and science, to reduce the task of his work-people to the exercise of vigilance and dexterity, —faculties, when concentrated to one process, speedily brought to perfection in the young. In the infancy of mechanical engineering, a machine-factory displayed the division of labour in manifold gradations—the file, the drill, the lathe, having each its different workmen in the order of skill: but the dexterous hands of the filer and driller are now superseded by the planing, the key-groove cutting, and the drilling machines; and those of the iron and brass turners, by the self-acting slide-lathe. Mr Anthony Strutt, who conducts the mechanical department of the great cotton factories of Belper and Milford, has so thoroughly departed from the old routine of the schools, that he will employ no man who has learned his craft by regular apprenticeship; but in contempt, as it were, of the division of labour principle, he sets a plough-boy to turn a shaft of, perhaps, several tons weight, and never has reason to repent his preference, because he infuses into the turning apparatus a precision of action, equal, if not superior, to the skill of the most experienced journeyman.

"An eminent mechanician in Manchester told me, that he does not choose to make any steam-engines at present, because, with his existing means, he would need to resort to the old principle of the division of labour, so fruitful of jealousies and strikes among workmen; but he intends to prosecute that branch of business whenever he has prepared suitable arrangements on the equalization of labour, or automatic plan. On the graduation system, a man must serve an apprenticeship of many years before his hand and eye become skilled enough for certain mechanical feats; but on the system of decomposing a process into its constituents, and embodying each part in an automatic machine, a person of common care and capacity may be entrusted with any of the said elementary parts after a short probation, and may be transferred from one to another, on any emergency, at the discretion of the master. Such translations are utterly at variance with the old practice of the division of labour, which fixed one man to shaping the head of a pin, and another to sharpening its point, with most irksome and spirit-wasting uniformity, for a whole life."

What a field for speculation does this statement open! "It is, in fact," as the author afterwards observes, "the constant aim and tendency of every improvement in machinery to supersede human labour altogether, or to diminish its cost, by substituting the industry of women and children for that of men; or that of ordinary labourers for trained artisans." What, then, will be the final results of the process which is thus going on? While the unskilled labourer, be it observed, is supplanting the skilled labourer, the dead machine is supplanting both. That, therefore, will remain the conqueror in the end; in so far as it is possible in the nature of things, there will be no labour done but by machinery. The consequence then will be, some one exclaims, that all human labourers must starve; for if they do no work, they will earn no wages. Must starve! Why, it will be something beyond that; they will, in so far as their place is filled by machinery, be annihilated altogether. Suppose that all the cotton cloth that is now made by the labours of some hundreds of thousands of spinners, and weavers, and other artisans, were to be manufactured by machines, without any human assistance, save that of a few hundreds of superintendents. The inevitable effect would be, that the hundreds of thousands of artisans in question would pass away altogether—they would cease to exist: that is to say, they would cease to exist as artisans employed in the cotton manufacture; and if all the other industrious arts were to run the same course of advancement, they would cease to exist as labourers at all. But they would not cease to exist as human beings. There is no reason whatever to anticipate that if such a state of things as we have now supposed were to arrive, the actual number of people in the world would be lessened. The only difference would be, that there would be less manual labour than there now is, which is the same thing with saying that there would be fewer manual labourers. In other words, that portion of the community who now labour with their hands, would not have so to labour any longer. Would this be an evil? The misapprehension with which some persons frighten themselves upon this subject, arises from confounding two things which are altogether different. They see that when an individual labourer loses his employment, he loses his means of living; and on this they conclude, that employment, or labour, and the means of living, are the same thing. Whereas, they are actually two things only, occasionally conjoined by accident. Even in the present state of society, it is obviously by no means an universal truth, that the man who has no employment has no means of living. There are already thousands of people in every country who live very well without resorting to manual labour, and many who so live without working in any way. But these are rich men, you say; these are capitalists. Be it so; would it be any terrible misfortune that all men should become so far 'rich that they should be enabled to live without labouring with their hands? Suppose a thousand working people now employed in one of the factories in Lancashire were to find out some means of making all the operations of the establishment go on just as they now do, while they, instead of superintending and assisting the machinery, as they do at present, sat all day with their hands folded, or went abroad and amused themselves in the fields, or remained at home reading books and cultivating their minds;—would that be a thing to be deplored, either for their sakes, or for that of the community at large? Suppose all the work-people in the country were to discover they could,—by some process of magic, if you will,—thus free themselves from toil, while they still performed their tasks, and of course entitled themselves to their wages, where (excepting the magic) would be the harm? Now machinery, if it do what we have been speaking of,—if it at last supplant, or nearly supplant, all labour in manufactures—will have done precisely the same thing which we here suppose to be done by magic. The hundreds of thousands of artisans now employed in these manufactures will be so employed no longer; but the quantity of production will be the same as before, and, therefore, the earth will be able to maintain the same number of inhabitants as ever. No doubt, were the change to take place in an instant, and not by any such magical operation as has been supposed, but by merely some sudden development of new powers in machinery, which would leave the whole advantage in the hands of the present possessors of machinery, or of other capitalists able to purchase it, the working population would be exposed to great inconvenience. But that is not the way in which the thing will happen. The movement towards the point we have been imagining, be the distance to be gone over long or short, will unquestionably be a gradual one. The actual possessors of machinery and capital, at any one moment, may have their share of the accruing benefit, but they will not monopolise it all. The process will be one which will carry forward the whole system of society. The numbers whom it may from time to time detach from the ranks of the labouring population, it will be all the while also providing room for elsewhere, and elevating to a higher condition. If machinery could be made to produce by its own unassisted action all those things which the consumption of the world requires, and which now demand the labour of so many hands, there is certainly no reason why human beings could not then be maintained in the same numbers as well without anybody labouring as they are at present. We might have been required to labour for a great many more things than we do labour for. The water we drink might have been made as costly as the bread we eat. Or suppose the Creator had ordained that the labour of a large portion of the race should have been constantly necessary, in order to procure for all a sufficiency of fresh air. Would not that have been a heavy curse? Wages would of course have been paid for that labour, as for all other labour. It would, in the popular phrase, have been the support of many of our fellow creatures. But are we not, for all that, infinitely better without it? Does not the earth maintain at least as large a population without this so-called means of supporting people, as it would have done had such a means existed? And would not the same thing be true of any other kind of labour?

The subject of the second chapter of Book I. is the Arrangement and Connexion of Manufactures; and the third presents a Sketch of the Topography and Statistics of the British Factory System. Both, the former especially, are full of valuable and luminously arranged information; which, however, we must pass over, as well as the whole of Book II., in order that we may have room for a single extract from the latter part of the work, which is occupied with the Moral Economy of the Factory System. The following is one of several similar accounts of well-regulated manufacturing establishments, which the author gives from his own observation:—

"I paid an unexpected visit to Hyde, in order to view the factories of Thomas Ashton, Esq., uncle to the amiable youth who was shot dead sometime ago near his father's door, by assassins who had hired themselves during the ferment of the spinners' strikes, to murder mill-owners at the rate of ten pounds for each. This lamented victim of violence was not a proprietor, was personally unknown to the assassins, and had never given offence to the operatives. It was an unprovoked murder, which impressed every heart with horror, and has cast upon Unions a bloody stain which they will never wash away.

"Mr T. Ashton and four of his brothers possess, in their five independent establishments in the township of Hyde, 4000 power-loom, with all the subsidiary spinning machinery, and expend fully 4000*l.* weekly in wages. At the period of my visit, the work-people were paid 1000*l.* per diem in these several factories of Hyde, a district which consisted, not many years ago, of cold clay land, ill-cultivated and thinly peopled. Along with the adjoining small townships of Duckenfield and Stayley-bridge, it contains now upwards of 60,000 inhabitants, all comfortably employed and fed.

"Mr T. Ashton's cotton-works are agreeably grouped together on a gentle declivity, which is traversed by a little tributary stream of the Mersey. This supplies the condensing power to his steam-engines, while their expansive force is furnished from rich coal-measures immediately under the factory lands. This is the motive-element which pervades and animates the region all around. The houses occupied by his work-people lie in streets, are built of stone, and are commodious; consisting each of at least four apartments in two stories, with a small back-yard and a mews lane. The rent for a good lodging, containing an improved kitchen-grate, with boiler and oven, is only 8*l.* per annum, and good fuel may be had for 9*s.* a ton. I looked into several of the houses, and found them more richly furnished than any common work-people's dwelling which I had ever seen before. In one I saw a couple of sofas, with good chairs, an eight-day clock in a handsome mahogany case, several pictures in oil on the walls, freshly painted for the family, a representation of one of the younger daughters like a smart peasant girl carrying a basket on her arm, one of the Virgin and Child at Bethlehem, and another of Christ crowned with thorns, all creditable to the travelling artist. In another house I observed a neat wheel barometer, with its attached thermometer, suspended against the snow-white wall. In a third there was a piano, with a little girl learning to play upon it.

"My notice was particularly attracted to a handsome house and shop, in one of the streets where Mr T. Ashton's operatives dwell. On asking who occupied it, I learned it was a spinner, who having saved from his earnings, 200*l.*, had embarked this capital in a retail business, now managed by his wife, a tidy-looking person, while the husband continued to pursue his profitable avocations in the mill.

"Many of the factory youths of both sexes cultivate their musical tastes. The proprietor having erected a handsome school-house, the workers subscribed spontaneously among themselves 160*l.*, and bought a good organ, now set up in the gallery of the large hall of the school. It is played upon on the Sundays at divine service, and on certain evenings through the week alternately, by certain of the girls employed at the power-loom. One of them, only seventeen years of age, is said to be a tolerable organist. So much nonsense has been uttered about the deformities and diseases of factory children, that I may hardly be credited by some of my readers, when I assert that I have never seen, among a like number of young women of the lower ranks in any country, so many pleasing countenances and handsome figures, as I saw in Mr Ashton's nine power-weaving galleries. Their light labour and erect posture in tending the looms, and the habit which many of them have in exercising their arms and shoulders, as if with dumb-bells, by resting their hands on the lay or shuttle-bearer, as it oscillates alternately backwards and forwards with the machinery, opens their chest, and gives them generally a graceful carriage. Many of them have adopted tasteful modes of wearing neat handkerchiefs on their heads, and have altogether not a little of the Grecian style of beauty. One of them, whose cheeks had a fine rosy hue, being asked how long she had been at factory work, said nine years, and blushed from bashfulness at being so slightly spoken to. The female figures sketched in the engraving of a loom-shed at the end of this volume, are by no means fancy forms of the painter, but realities, to be seen every day at Hyde, and in many other factory districts."

The whole of the chapter from which this extract is taken, well merits perusal. The author has embodied in it, in addition to the facts he has himself collected, a mass of information from the evidence of other witnesses, and especially from the reports of the Factory Commissioners and Inspectors, some of the most interesting and valuable matter contained in which we are glad to see thus published in a generally accessible form. Upon the whole, this examination of the moral economy of the Factory system must be considered as an effective refutation of many gross calumnies with which the public ear has been of late abused. By every unprejudiced and right-minded person it will be felt to be a most gratifying and cheering representation; and that, even although it may be admitted that, in the position of an advocate of a particular side of the question into which the writer has been almost necessarily thrown, he has coloured some parts of his picture a little too bright. He has, in a manner, been driven to take up a tone of defence, and even of retaliation, by the manner in which the controversy has been waged on the other side. Let us hope, however, that this angry jealousy which has hitherto divided the manufacturing and agricultural interests will, ere long, give way to that mutual respect and attachment which, dependent as they really are upon each other, ought to unite them, and to that amicable competition, which shall see in the prosperity of either the support and benefit of both.

A DUSTY DAY.

AMONG the "Miseries of Human Life," as a wit pleasantly entitled them, there are few, while the rascal is about it, worse than a Great Cloud of Dust, coming upon you in street or road, you having no means of escape, and the carriages, or flock of sheep, evidently being bent on imparting to you a full share of their besetting horror. The road is too narrow to leave you a choice, even if it had two pathways; which it has not:—the day is hot; the wind is whisking; you have come out in stockings instead of boots, not being aware that you were occasionally to have two feet depth of dust to walk in:—now, now the dust is on you,—you are enveloped,—you are blind; you have to hold your hat on against the wind; the carriages grind by, or the sheep go pattering along, baaing through all the notes of their poor gamut; perhaps carriages and sheep are together, the latter eschewing the horses' legs, and the shepherd's dog driving against your own, and careering over the woolly backs:—Whew! what a dusting! What a blinding! What a whirl! The noise decreases; you stop; you look about you; gathering up your hat, coat, and faculties, after apologising to the gentleman against whom you have "lumped," and who does not look a bit the happier for your apology. The dust is in your eyes, in your hair, in your shoes and stockings, in your neck-cloth, in your mouth. You grind your teeth in dismay, and find them gritty.

Perhaps another carriage is coming; and you, finding yourself in the middle of the road, and being resolved to be master of, at least, this inferior horror, turn about towards the wall or paling, and propose to make your way accordingly, and have the dust behind your back instead of in front; when lo! you begin sneezing, and cannot see. You have taken involuntary snuff.

Or you suddenly discern a street, down which you can turn, which you do with rapture, thinking to get out of wind and dust at once; when, unfortunately, you discover that the wind is veering to all points of the compass, and that instead of avoiding the dust, there is a ready-made and intense collection of it, then in the act of being swept into your eyes by the attendants on a—dust-cart!

The reader knows what sort of a day we speak of. It is all dusty;—the windows are dusty; the people are dusty; the hedges in the roads are horribly dusty,—pitifully,—you think they must feel it; shoes and boots are like a baker's; men on horseback eat and drink dust; coachmen sit screwing up their eyes; the gardener finds his spade slip into the ground, fetching up smooth portions of earth, all made of dust. What is the poor pedestrian to do?

To think of something superior to the dust,—whether grave or gay. This is the secret of being master of any ordinary, and of much extraordinary trouble:—bring a better idea upon it, and it is hard if the greater thought does not do something against the less. When we meet with any very unpleasant person, to whose ways we cannot suddenly reconcile ourselves, we think of some delightful friend, perhaps two hundred miles off,—in Northumberland, or in Wales. When dust threatens to blind us, we shut our eyes to the disaster, and contrive to philosophize a bit, even then.

"Oh, but it is not worth while doing that."

Good. If so, there is nothing to do but to be as jovial as the dust itself, and take all gaily. Indeed, this is the philosophy we speak of.

"And yet the dust is annoying too."

Well—take then just as much good sense as you require for the occasion. Think of a jest; think of a bit of verse; think of the dog you saw just now, coming out of the pond, and frightening the dandy in his new trousers. But at all events don't let your temper be mastered by such a thing as a cloud of dust. It will show, either that you have a very infirm temper indeed, or no ideas in your head.

On all occasions in life, great or small, you may be the worse for them, or the better. You may be made the weaker or the stronger by them; aye, even, by so small a thing as a little dust.

When the famous Arbuthnot was getting into his carriage one day, he was beset with dust. What did he do? Damn the dust, or the coachman? No; that was not his fashion. He was a wit, and a good-natured man; so he fell to making an epigram, which he sent to his friends. It was founded on scientific knowledge, and consisted of the following pleasant exaggeration:—

ON A DUSTY DAY.

The dust in smaller particles arose,
Than those which fluid bodies do compose.
Contraries in extremes do often meet;
It was so dry, that you might call it wet.

Dust at a distance sometimes takes a burnished or tawny aspect in the sun, almost as handsome as the great yellow smoke out of breweries; and you may amuse your fancy with thinking of the clouds that preceded armies in the old books of poetry,—the spears gleaming out,—the noise of the throng growing on the ear,—and, at length, horses emerging, and helmets, and flags,—the Lion of King Richard, or the Lilies of France.

Or you may think of some better and more harmless palm of victory, "not without dust" (palma non sine pulvere); dust, such as Horace says the horse-men of antiquity liked to kick up at the Olympic games, or as he more elegantly phrases it, "collect" (collegisse juvat);—which a punster of our acquaintance translated, "kicking up a dust at college"; or if you are in a very philosophic vein indeed, you may think of man's derivation from dust, and his return to it, redeeming your thoughts from gloom by the hopes beyond dust, and by the graces which poetry and the affections have shed upon it in this life, like flowers upon graves,—lamenting with the tender Petrarch, that "those eyes of which he spoke so warmly," and that golden hair, and "the lightning of that angel smile," and all those other beauties which made him a lover "marked out from among men,"—a being abstracted "from the rest of his species,"—are now "a little dust, without a feeling"—

"Poca polvere son che nulla sente"— or repeating that beautiful lyric of the last of the Shakspearian men, Shirley, which they say touched even the thoughtless bosom of Charles the Second:—

DEATH'S FINAL CONQUEST.

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things:
There is no armour against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings:
Sceptre and crown
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field
And plant fresh laurels where they kill;
But their strong nerves at last must yield,
They tame but one another still.
Early or late
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their murmuring breath,
When they, pale captives, creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,
Then boast no more your mighty deeds;
Upon death's purple altar now
See where the victor-victim bleeds:
All heads must come
To the cold tomb:
*Only the actions of the just Smell sweet, and blossom in the dust.

Most true;—but with the leave of the fine poet (which he would gladly have conceded to us), Death's conquest is not "final;" for Heaven triumphs over him, and Love too, and Poetry; and thus we can get through the cloud even of his dust, and shake it, in aspiration, from our wings. Besides, we know not, with any exactitude, what, or who, Death is, or whether there is any such personage, even in his negative sense, except inasmuch as he is a gentle voice, calling upon us to go some journey; for the very dust that he is supposed to deal in, is alive; is the cradle of other beings and vegetation; nay, its least particle belongs to a mighty life;—is planetary,—is part of our star,—is the stuff of which the worlds are made, that roll and rejoice round the sun.

Of these or the like reflections, serious or otherwise, are the cogitations of the true pedestrian composed;—such are the weapons with which he triumphs over the most hostile of his clouds, whether material or metaphorical; and, at the end of his dusty walk, he beholdeth, in beautiful perspective, the towel, and the basin and water, with which he will render his eyes, cheeks, and faculties, "as cool and fresh, as if no dust had touched them; nay, more so, for the contrast. Never forget that secret of the reconcilments of this life: to sit down, newly washed and dressed, after a dusty journey, and hear that dinner is to be ready "in ten minutes," is a satisfaction—a crowning and "measureless content"—which we hope no one will enjoy who does not allow fair play between the harmless lights and shadows of existence, and treat his dust with respect. We defy him to enjoy it, at any rate, like those who do. His ill-temper, somehow or other, will rise in retribution against him, and find dust on his saddle of mutton.

* See p. 76 of the first volume of 'Songs of England and Scotland,' edited by Mr Cunningham, jun.; a welcome book, and of hereditary promise. But it might have been much improved. We ought to have had more of Sedley, Suckling, Herrick, and others, and a great deal more of Beaumont and Fletcher (the truest lyricists in the language), and other old dramatists; also more of Dibdin, Barry Cornwall, and various writers "about town" in the last century. There is even an O'Keefe,—a great omission in a song-book. His muse was as fresh as a dairymaid.

CHARACTERISTIC SPECIMENS OF THE ENGLISH POETS.

NO. IV.—CHAUCER (CONTINUED.)

STORY OF GRISELDA.

THE famous story of Griselda, or Patient Grisel, who supposes her husband to kill her children and to dismiss her finally from his bed under circumstances of the greatest outrage, and yet behaves meekly under all, was not long since the most popular story in Europe, and still deeply affects us. Writers have asserted that there actually was some such person. In vain has the husband been pronounced a monster, and the story impossible. In vain have critics in subsequent time, not giving sufficient heed to the difference between civilized and feudal ages, or to the beauties with which the narrative has been mingled, declared it to be no better than the sight of a "torment on the rack." The story has had shoals of narrators, particularly in old France, and been repeated and dwelt upon by the greatest and tenderest geniuses,—Boccaccio, Petrarch, and Chaucer. The whole heart of Christendom has embraced the heroine. She has passed into a proverb; ladies of quality have called their children after her, the name surviving (we believe) among them to this day, in spite of its grisly sound; and we defy the manliest man, of any feeling, to read it in Chaucer's own consecutive stanzas (whatever he may do here) without feeling his eyes moisten.

How is this to be accounted for? The husband is perfectly monstrous and unnatural;—there can be no doubt of that;—he pursues his trial of his wife's patience for twelve years, and she is supposed to love as well as to obey him all the time;—him, the murderer of her children! This, also, is unnatural,—impossible. A year, a month, a week, would have been bad enough. The lie was bad in itself. And yet, in spite of that utter renouncement of the fiction, to which civilization finally brings us, we feel for the invincibly obedient creature; we are deeply interested; we acknowledge instinctively, that the story had a right to its fame; nay (not to speak it profanely), that like other permanent and popular stories, of a solemn cast, it is a sort of revelation in its way, at once startling us with contrasts of good and evil, and ending in filling us with hope and exaltation. How is this?

The secret is, that a principle—the sense of duty—is set up in it above all considerations;—that the duty, once believed in by a good and humble nature, is exalted by it, in consequence of its very torments, above all torment, and all weakness. We are not expected to copy it, much less to approve or be blind to the hard-heartedness that fetches it out; but the blow is struck loudly in the ears of mankind, in order that they may think of duty itself, and draw their own conclusions in favour of their own sense of it, when they see what marvellous effect it can have even in its utmost extravagance, and how unable we are to help respecting it, in proportion to the very depth of its self-abasement. We feel that the same woman could have gone through any trial which she thought becoming a woman, of a kind such as we should all admire in the wisest and justest ages. We feel even her weakness to be her strength,—one of the wonderfullest privileges of virtue.

We are travelling, at present, far out of the proposed design of these specimens, which were intended to consist of little more than extracts, and the briefest possible summary of the author's characteristics. But the reader will pardon an occasional yielding to temptations like these. Our present number shall consist of as brief a sketch as we can give, of the successive incidents of Chaucer's story, which are managed with a skill exquisite as the feeling; and whenever we come to an irresistible Specimen, it shall be extracted.

At Saluzzo in Piedmont, under the Alps,

Down at the root of Vesulus the cold, there reigned a feudal lord, a Marquis, who was beloved by his people, but too much given to his amusement, and an enemy of marriage; which alarmed them lest he should die childless, and leave his inheritance in the hands of strangers. They therefore, at last, sent him a deputation which addressed him on the subject, and he agreed to take a wife, on condition that they should respect his choice whatsoever it might fall.

Now among the poorest of the Marquis's people

There dwelt a man
Which that was holden poorest of them all,
But highé God somtyme senden can.
His grace unto a little ox's stall;
Janicola, men of that thorp him call:
A daughter had he fair enough to sight,
And Grisildis this youngé maiden hight.

Tender of age was "Grisildis" or "Grisilda" (for the poet calls her both) but she was a maiden of a thoughtful and steady nature, and as excellent a daughter as could be, thinking of nothing but her sheep, her spinning, and her "old poor father," whom she supported by her labour, and waited upon with the greatest duty and obedience.

Upon Grisild', this pooré créature,
Full often with this Marquis set his eye,
As he on hunting rode paraventure;
And when it fell that he might her espy,
He not with wanton looking of folly
His eyen cast on her, but in sad wise
Upon her cheer he would him oft avise.

The Marquis announced to his people that he had chosen a wife, and the wedding-day arrived, but nobody saw the lady; at which there was great wonder. Clothes and jewels were prepared, and the feast too; and the Marquis, with a great retinue, and accompanied by music, took his way to the village where Griselda lived.

Griselda had heard of his coming, and said to herself, that she would get her work done faster than usual, on purpose to stand at the door, like other maidens, and see the sight; but just as she was going to look out, she heard the Marquis call her, and she set down a water-pot she had in her hand, and knelt down before him with her usual steady countenance.

The Marquis asked for her father, and going in doors to him, took him by the hand, and said, with many courteous words and leave-asking, that he had come to marry his daughter. The poor man turned red, and stood abashed and quaking, but begged his lord to do as seemed good to him; and then the Marquis asked Griselda if she would have him, and vow to obey him in all things, be they what they might; and she answered trembling, but in like manner; and he led her forth and presented her to the people as his wife.

The ladies, now Griselda's attendants, took off her old peasant's clothes, not much pleased to handle them, and dressed her anew in fine clothes, so that the people hardly knew her again for her beauty.

Her hairés have they comb'd that lay untresséd
Full rudely, and with their fingers small
A coronne on her head they have ydressed,
And set her full of nouches, (1) great and small.

Thus Walter lowly, nay but royally,
Wedded with fortunate honesty, and Griselda behaved so well, and discreetly, and behaved so kindly to everyone, making up disputes, and speaking such gentle and sensible words,

And couldé so the people's heart embrace,
That each her lov'th that looketh on her face.

In due time the Marchioness had a daughter, and the Marquis had always treated his consort well, and behaved like a man of sense and reflection; but now he informed her that his people were dissatisfied at his having raised her to be his wife; and, reminding her of her vow to obey him in all things, told her that she must agree to let him do with the little child whatsoever he pleased. Griselda kept her vow to the letter, not even changing countenance; and shortly afterwards an ill-looking fellow came, and took the child from her, intimating that he was to kill it. Griselda asked permission to kiss her child ere it died, and she took it in her bosom, and blessed and kissed it with a sad face, and prayed the man to bury its "little body" in some place where the birds and beasts could not get it. But the man said nothing. He took the child and went his way; and the Marquis bade him carry it to the Countess of Pavia, his sister, with directions to bring it up in secret.

1 Nouches—nuts?—buttons in that shape made of gold & jewellery?

Griselda lived on, behaving like an excellent wife, and four years afterwards she had another child, a son, which the Marquis demanded of her, as he had done the daughter, laying his injunctions on her at the same time to be patient. Griselda said she would, adding, as a proof nevertheless what bitter feelings she had to control,

I have not had no part of children twain,
But first, sickness; and after, woe and pain.

The same "ugly sergeant" now came again, and took away the second child, carrying it like the former to Bologna; and twelve years after, to the astonishment and indignation of the poet, and the people too, but making no alteration whatsoever in the obedience of the wife, the Marquis informs her, that his subjects are dissatisfied at his having her for a wife at all, and that he had got a dispensation from the Pope to marry another, for whom she must make way, and be divorced, and return home; adding insultingly, that she might take back with her the dowry which she brought him. Woefully, but ever patiently, does Griselda consent, not, however, without a tender exclamation at the difference between her marriage day and this; and as she receives the instruction about the dowry as a hint that she is to give up her fine clothes, and resume her old ones, which she says it would be impossible to find, she makes him the following exquisite prayer and remonstancé.—If we had to write for only a certain select set of readers, never should we think of bespeaking their due reverence for a passage like the following, and its simple, primitive, and most affecting thoughts and words. But a journal must accommodate itself to the chances of perusal in all quarters, either by alteration or explanation; and, therefore, in not altering any of these words, or daring to gainsay the sacred tenderness they bring before us, we must observe, that as there is not a more pathetic passage to be found in the whole circle of human writ, so the pathos and the pure words go inseparably together, and his is the most refined heart, educated or uneducated, that receives them with the delicatest and profoundest emotion.

"My Lord, ye wot that in my father's place
Ye did me strip out of my pooré weed,

[How much, by the way, this old and more lengthened pronunciation of the word poor, pooré (French, pauvre), adds to the piteous emphasis of it.]

And richely ye clad me of your grace;
To you brought I nought elles out of drede, (2)
But faith, and nakedness, and 'womanhede';
And here again your clothing I restore,
And eke your wedding ring, for evermore.
"The remnant of your jewels ready be Within your chamber", I dare it safely sain.
Naked out of my father's house (quoth she)
I came, and naked I must turn again.

[How beautifully is the Bible used here!]

All your pleasauncé would I follow fain;
But yet I hope it be not your intent
That I smockless out of your palace went.

"Ye could not do so dishonest a thing
That thilke (3) womb, in which your children lay,
Shouldé before the people in my walking
Be seen all bare; wherefore, I you pray,
LET ME NOT LIKE A WORM GO BY THE WAY:
Remember you, mine owen Lord so dear,
I was your wife, though I unworthy were.

"Wherefore in guerdon of my 'womanhede,'
Which that I brought and 'yet' again I bear,
As vouchésafe to give me to my need
But such a smock as I was wont to wear,
That I therewith may wrie (4) the womb of her
That was your wife. And here I take my leave
Of you, mine owen Lord, lest I you grieve."

"The smock," quoth he, "that thou hast on thy back,
Let it be still, and bear it forth with thee."
But well unnethés (5) thilke word he spake,

2 Out of drede—without doubt.
3 Wrie—cover.

3 Thilke—this.
5 Unnethés—scarce.

But went his way for ruth and for pittie.
Before the folk herselven strippeth she,
And in her smock, with foot and head all bare,
Toward her father's house, forth is she fare.

The people follow her weeping and wailing, but she went ever as usual, with staid eyes, nor all the while did she speak a word. As to her poor father, he cursed the day he was born. And so with her father, for a space, dwelt "this flower of wifely patience," nor showed any sense of offence, nor remembrance of her high estate.

At length arrives news of the coming of the new Marchioness, with such array of pomp as had never been seen in all Lombardy; and the Marquis, who has, in the meantime, sent to Bologna for his son and daughter, once more desires Griselda to come to him, and tells her, that as he has not women enough in his household to wait upon his new wife, and set everything in order for her, he must request her to do it; which she does, with all ready obedience, and then goes forth with the rest, to meet the new lady. At dinner, the Marquis again calls her, and asks her what she thinks of his choice. She commends it heartily, and prays God to give him prosperity; only adding, that she hopes he will not try the nature of so young a creature as he tried hers, since she has been brought up more tenderly, and perhaps could not bear it.

And when this Walter saw her patience,
Her gladdé cheer, and no malice at all,
And he so often had her done offence,
And she aye sad (6) and constant as a wall,
Continuing aye her innocence over all,
This sturdy marquis 'gan his heart dress
To rue upon her wifely steadfastness.

He gathers her in his arms, and kisses her; but she takes no heed of it, out of astonishment, nor hears anything he says; upon which he exclaims, that as sure as Christ died for him, she is his wife, and he will have no other, nor ever had;—and with that, he introduces his supposed bride to her as her own daughter, with his son by her side; and Griselda, overcome at last, faints away.

When she this heard, aswoon'd down she falleth
For piteous joy; and after her swooning
She both her youngé children to her calleth,
And in her arms, piteously weeping,
Embrace them, and tenderly kissing
Full like a mother, with her salté tears
She bathed both their visage and their hairs.

O, which a piteous thing it was to see
Her swooning, and her humble voice to hear!
"Grand mercy! Lord, God thank it you (quoth she)

That ye have savéd me my children dear:
Now reck (7) I never to be dead right here,
Since I stand in your love and in your grace,
No force of death, (8) nor when my spirit pace.

"O tender, O dear, O youngé children mine!
Your woful mother weened steadfastly
That cruel houndés or some foul vermin
Had eaten you; but God of his mercy
And your benigné father tenderly
Hath done you keep;" and in that samé stound
All suddenly she swapp'd adown to ground.

And in her swoon so sadly holdeth she
Her children two, when she 'gan them embrace,
That with great slaight and great difficulty
The children from her arm they 'gan arrace. (9)
O! many a tear on many a piteous face
Down ran of them that stoodén her beside;
Unnethe aboutén her might they abide.

That is, they could scarcely remain to look at her, or stand still.—And so, with feasting and joy, ends this divine, cruel story of Patient Griselda; the happiness of which is superior to the pain, not only because it ends so well, but because there is ever present in it, like that of a saint in a picture, the sweet, sad face of the fortitude of woman.

6—Sad—composed in manner—unaltered.

7—Reck—care. 8. No force of death—no matter for death.

9—Arrace—(French, arracher) pluck.

—The worst mistake of morbid feelings is supposing one's own individual fate harder than any other in the world.—The Wife.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXVII.—SANDY WRIGHT, AND THE PUIR ORPSON.

(Abridged from Mr Miller's 'Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland'.)

EARLY in the month of April 1734, three Cromarty boatmen, connected with the Custom house, were journeying along the miserable road which at this period winded along between the capital of the Highlands, and that of the kingdom. They had already travelled since morning more than thirty miles through the wild Highlands of Inverness-shire, and were now toiling along the steep side of an uninhabited valley of Badenoch.

The gloom of evening, deepened by a coming snow storm, was closing round them as they entered one of the wildest recesses of the valley, an immense precipitous hollow, scooped out of the side of one of the hills: the wind began to howl through the cliffs, and the thickening flakes of snow to beat against their faces. The house in which they were to pass the night was still ten miles away. "It will be a terrible night, lads, in the Moray frith," said the foremost traveller, a broad-shouldered, deep-chested, strong-looking man of about five feet eight; "I would ill like to have to beat up through the drift along the rough shores of Cadboll. It was in just such a night as this, ten year ago, that old Walter Hogg went down in the Red Sally." "It will be as terrible a night, I'm feared, just where we are, in the black strath of Badenoch," said one of the men behind, who seemed much fatigued: "I wish we were a' safe in the clachan." "Hoot, man," said Sandy Wright, the first speaker. "It canna now be muckle mair nor sax miles afore us, an' we'll hae the tail of the glosmin for half an hour yet.—But gude save us! what's that?" he exclaimed, pointing to a little figure that seemed sitting by the side of the road, about twenty yards before him, "it's surely a fairy." The figure rose from its seat, and came up staggering, apparently from weakness, to meet them. It was a boy, scarcely more than ten years of age. "O, my puir boy," said Sandy Wright, "what can hae taken ye here in a night like this?" "I was going to Edinburgh to my friends," replied the boy; "for my mother died, and left me among the fremie: but I'm tired, and canna walk farther; and I'll be lost, I'm feared, in the yowndrift." "That ye winna, my puir bairn, if I can help it," said the boatman; "gi'e a baud o' your han'," grasping, as he spoke, the extended hand of the boy; "dinna tane heart, an' lean on me as muckle's ye can." But the poor little fellow was already exhausted, and after a vain attempt to proceed, the boatman had to carry him on his back. The storm burst out in all its fury, and the travellers half suffocated, and more than half blinded, had to grope onwards along through the rough road, still more roughened by the snow-wreaths that were gathering over it. They stopped at every fiercer blast, and turned their backs to the storm to recover breath; and every few yards they advanced, they had to stoop to the earth to ascertain the direction of their path, by catching the outline of the nearer objects between them and the sky. After many a stumble and fall, however, and many a groan and exclamation from the two boatmen behind, who were well nigh worn out, they all reached the clachan in safety, about two hours after nightfall.

The inmates were seated round an immense peat fire, placed, according to the custom of the country, in the middle of the floor. They made way for the travellers, and Sandy Wright, drawing his seat nearer the fire, began to chaff the hands and feet of the boy, who was almost insensible from cold and fatigue. "Bring us a mitchkin o' brandy here," said the boatman, "to drive out the cold fra our hearts; an' as the supper canna be ready for a while yet, get me a piece for the boy. He has had a narrow escape, puir little fellow: an' may be there's some that would miss him, lanerly as he seems. Only hear how the win' roars on the gable, an' rattles at the winnocks and the door. O! it's an awfu' night in the Moray frith!"

Sandy Wright shared with the boy his supper and his bed, and on setting out the following morning, he brought him along with him, despite the remonstrances of the other boatmen, who dreaded his proving an incumbrance. The story of the little fellow, though simple, was very affecting. His mother, a poor widow, had lived, for the five preceding years, in the vicinity of Inverness, supporting herself and her boy by her skill as a sempstress. As early as his sixth year, he had shown a predilection for reading; and with the anxious solicitude of a Scottish mother, she had wrought early and late to keep him at school. But her efforts were above her strength, and after a sore struggle of nearly four years, she at length sunk under them.

"One day," said the poor little boy, "when she was sick, two neighbour women came in, and she called me to her, and told me that when she should be dead, I would need to go to Edinburgh, for I had no friends anywhere else. Her own friends were there, she said, but they were poor, and couldna do muckle for me; and my father's friends were there too, and they were poor, and couldna do muckle for me."

wadna' own her. She told me no to be feared by the way, for that Providence kent every bit o't, and that he would make folk be kind to me. I have letters to show me the way to my mither's friends when I reach the town, for I can read and write."

Throughout the whole of the journey, Sandy Wright was as a father to him. He shared with him his meals and his bed, and usually for the last half dozen miles of every stage, he carried him on his back. On reaching the Queensferry, however, the boatman found that his money was well nigh expended. I must just try and get him across, thought he, without paying the fare. Sandy Wright does so, with much difficulty. "An' now my boy," said he, as they reached the head of what is now Leith walk, "I hae business to do at the Custom-house, an' some money to get: but I must first try and find out your friends for ye. Look at your letters, and tell me the street an' the number where they put up."—The boy untied his little bundle, and named some place in the vicinity of the Grassmarket, and in a few minutes they were both walking up the High street.

"O, yonder's my aunt," exclaimed the boy, to a young woman who was coming down the street, "yonder's my mither's sister:" and away he sprang to meet her. She immediately recognised and welcomed him, and he introduced the boatman to her, as the kind friend who had rescued him from the snow-storm and the ferryman. She related, in a few words, the story of the boy's parents. His father had been a dissipated young man, of good family, whose follies had separated him from his friends; and the difference he had rendered irreconcilable by marrying a low-born, but industrious and virtuous young woman, who, despite of her birth, was deserving of a better husband. "Two of his brothers," said the woman, "who are gentlemen of the law, were lately inquiring about the boy, and will, I hope, interest themselves in his behalf." In this hope the boatman cordially joined. "An' now, my boy," said he, as he bid him farewell, "I have just one groat left yet:—here it is; better in your pocket than wi' the gruff carle at the ferry. It's an honest groat, any how, an' I'm sure I wish it luck."

Fifteen years elapsed before Sandy Wright again visited Edinburgh. He had quitted it a robust, powerful man of forty-seven, and he returned to it a gray-headed old man of sixty-five. His humble fortunes too, were sadly in the wane. His son William, a gallant young fellow, who had risen in a few years on the score of merit alone, from the fore-castle to a lieutenantcy, had headed, under Admiral Vernon, some desperate enterprise, from which he never returned; and the boatman himself, when on the eve of retiring on a small pension from his long service in the custom-house, was dismissed without a shilling, on the charge of having connived at the escape of a smuggler. He was slightly acquainted with one of the inferior clerks in the Edinburgh custom-house, and in the slender hope that this person might use his influence in his behalf, and that that influence might prove powerful enough to get him reinstated, he had now travelled from Cromarty to Edinburgh, a weary journey of near two hundred miles. He had visited the clerk, who had given him scarcely any encouragement, and he was now waiting for him in a street near George's square, where he had promised to meet him in less than half-an-hour. But more than two hours had elapsed, and Sandy Wright, fatigued and melancholy, was sauntering slowly along the street, musing on his altered circumstances, when a gentleman, who had passed him with the quick, hurried step of a person engaged in business, stopped abruptly a few yards away, and returning at a much slower pace, eyed him steadfastly as he repassed. He again came forward and stood. "Are you not Mr Wright?" he enquired. "My name, sir, is Sandy Wright," said the boatman, touching his bonnet. The face of the stranger glowed with pleasure, and grasping him by the hand, "Oh, my good, kind friend, Sandy Wright!" he exclaimed, "often, often have I enquired after you, but no one could tell me where you resided, or whether you were living or dead. Come along with me: my house is in the next square. What! not remember me! ah, but it will be ill with me when I cease to remember you. I am Hamilton, an advocate—but you will scarcely know me as that."

The boatman accompanied him to an elegant house in George's square, and was ushered into a splendid apartment, where sat a young lady engaged in reading. "Who of all the world have I found," said the advocate to the lady, "but good Sandy Wright, the kind brave man who rescued me when perishing in the snow, and who was so true a friend to me when I had no friend besides." The lady welcomed the boatman with one of her most fascinating smiles, and held out her hand. "How happy I am," she said, "that we should have met with you. Often has Mr Hamilton told me of your kindness to him, and regretted that he should have no opportunity of acknowledging it." The boatman made one of his best bows, but he had no words for so fine a lady.

The advocate enquired kindly after his concerns, and was told of his dismissal from the Custom House, and made application on his behalf, keeping him in the meantime in his house, and treating him with the attentions of a son, in which he was joined by his lovely wife.

A fortnight passed away very agreeably to the boatman; but at length he began to weary sadly of what he termed the life of a gentleman. He sighed after his little smoky cottage, and the "puir auld wife." "Just remain with us one week longer," said the advocate, "and I shall learn in that time the result of my application. You are not now quite so active a man as when you carried me ten miles through the snow, and frightened the tall ferryman, and so I shall secure for you a passage in one of the Leith traders." In a few days after, the advocate entered the apartment, his eyes beaming with pleasure, and a packet in his hand. "This is from London," he said, as he handed it to his lady. "It intimates to us that one Alexander Wright, a custom-house boatman, is to retire from the service on a pension of twenty pounds per annum."

But why dwell longer on the story? Sandy Wright parted from his kind friends, and returned to Cromarty where he died in the spring of 1789, in the eighty-second year of his age. "Folk hae aye to learn," he used to say, "an for my own part, I was a sixty-year old scholar afore I kent the meaning of the verse, 'Cast thy bread on the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days.'"

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

BARROW, THE CELEBRATED MATHEMATICIAN AND DIVINE.

THE sermons of this excellent man and accomplished scholar are still in great estimation. Many a time have we heard them read in our childhood, but we cannot speak to them from later knowledge. The humour and address manifested in the famous dialogue with Lord Rochester, here given, are exquisite:—

"Barrow (his biographers tell us) was low of stature, lean, and of a pale complexion, and negligent of his dress to a fault; of extraordinary strength, a thin skin, and very sensible of cold; his eyes grey, clear and somewhat short-sighted; his hair, a light brown, very fine, and curling. He was of a healthy constitution, very fond of tobacco, which he used to call his panpharmakon or universal medicine, and imagined it helped to compose and regulate his thoughts. If he was guilty of any intemperance, it seemed to be in the love of fruit, which he thought was very salutary. He slept little, generally rising in the winter months before day. His conduct and behaviour were truly amiable; he was always ready to assist others, open and communicative in his conversation, in which he generally spoke to the importance, as well as truth, of any question proposed; facetious in his talk upon fit occasions, and skilful to accommodate his discourse to different capacities; of indefatigable industry in various studies, clear judgment on all argument, and steady virtue under all difficulties; of a calm temper in factious times, and of large charity in mean estate; he was easy and contented with a scanty fortune, and with the same decency and moderation maintained his character under the temptations of prosperity.

"Several good anecdotes are told of Barrow, as well of his great integrity, as of his wit, and bold intrepid spirit and strength of body. His early attachment to fighting, when a boy, is some indication of the latter; to which may be added the two following anecdotes: in his voyage between Leghorn and Smyrna, already noticed, the ship was attacked by an Algerine pirate, which, after a stout resistance, they compelled to sheer off, Barrow keeping his post at the gun assigned him to the last. And when Dr Pope in their conversation asked him 'Why he did not go down into the hold, and leave the defence of the ship to those to whom it did belong?' he replied, 'It concerned no man more than myself: I would rather have lost my life, than to have fallen into the hands of those merciless infidels.'

"There is another anecdote told of him, which showed not only his intrepidity, but an uncommon goodness of disposition, in circumstances where an ordinary share of it would have been probably extinguished. Being once on a visit at a gentleman's house in the country, where the necessary was at the end of a long garden, and consequently at a great distance from the room where he lodged; as he was going to it before day, for he was a very early riser, a fierce mastiff, that used to be chained up all day, and let loose at night for the security of the house, perceiving a strange person in the garden at that unusual time, set upon him with great fury. The Doctor caught him by the throat, grappled with him, and, throwing him down, lay upon him; once he had a mind to kill him; but he altered his resolution on recollecting that this would be unjust, since the dog did only his duty, and he himself was in fault for rambling out of his room before it was light. At length he called out so loud, that he was heard by some of the family, who came presently out, and freed the Doctor and the dog from the danger they both had been in.

"Among other instances of his wit and vivacity, they relate the following rencontre between him and the profligate Lord Rochester. These two meeting one day at court, while the Doctor was King's Chaplain in ordinary, Rochester, thinking to banter him, with a flippant air and a low formal bow, accosted him with, 'Doctor, I am yours to my shoe-tie.' Barrow, perceiving his drift, returned the salute with, 'My Lord, I am yours to the ground.' Rochester on this, improving his blow, quickly returned it with, 'Doctor, I am yours to the centre;' which was as smartly followed up by Barrow with, 'My Lord, I am yours to the antipodes.' Upon which, Rochester, disdaining to be foiled by a musty old piece of divinity, as he used to call him, exclaimed, 'Doctor, I am yours to the lowest pit of hell;' upon which, Barrow, turning upon his heel, with a sarcastic smile, archly replied, 'There, my Lord, I leave you.'

LANGUAGE AND ORTHOGRAPHY.

MY DEAR SIR,—Your zeal to maintain the purity of our language is my motive in writing to you. Yet I would rather any other should undertake the business, because nine in ten will honestly think me fantastical in my ideas on this subject; and the tenth, who does not think it, will politely acquiesce in their opinion; people are grown so candid, so open to conviction, so averse to dissent, so shy and coy with one person, so modest with the multitude. In my Imaginary Conversations I have been censured, I hear, for attempts at innovation in orthography. I never defend myself. I never answer, and seldom know of any remark against me; but I may vindicate the wisdom of my betters. I am unconscious that I have presumed to innovate in a single instance. I have followed my leaders at due distance through their grander scenery, setting up, at my own expense, a cross in those places where the traveller was likely to go astray, and more significantly where wanton violence had been committed against analogy.

At the Restoration of Charles II., something disorderly and slovenly was thought necessary to distinguish the man of fashion. Even the interjections were novel and affected. Whoever looks into the comedies of those times will discover at once the full meaning of this observation. Waller and indeed Cowley bore upon them some of the plague-spots in the general corruption; yet they appear to have been indifferent to the treatment their orthography was to experience from the press. Milton, and Jonson, and Spenser, were more solicitous about it. Spenser was not followed as an authority, because it was believed that he always wrote in the language of an earlier age,—which is not true; nor Milton and Jonson, because they were thought scholastic and pedantic. The reigns of William and Anne have been celebrated for the purification of our literature. I have not been able to discover any accession of strength or grace. What is beautiful in Addison and Steele exists not in the language itself, but in that which the language conveys. They are less correct, less fluent, less forcible, and less varied, than Dryden and than Cowley. Throughout the reigns of the two first Georges, innovation in the manners of men and the style of authors, was continued. Nobody wished to be thought a writer by profession: and those who wrote for their bread, ate it with more contentment and complacency for having displayed what appeared to them the carelessness of gentlemen. But carelessness is just as inconsistent with good breeding as with good writing: they rather incline to the opposite extreme, fastidiousness. A rare instance of propriety, in regard to style, was exhibited by Daniel de Foe. His powerful genius left him alone with Nature. I know not whether any human work is likely to produce so great an effect on the formation of character as 'Robinson Crusoe;' and the 'History of the Plague in London' is the only piece of history that the moderns can oppose to the ancients. It is deplorable that so mighty a mind should have been compelled by poverty to enter the ranks of party; and that the wisest minister who hath ever presided over the counsels of England should have undertaken the office of Paymaster

General to perverted pens. But, if Walpole gave sometimes to the unworthy, never has the obloquy been cast against him of turning the royal bounty from the worthy into the craws of domestic cravers. Totally free from the stupidity of pride, he had too much within him to be arrogant, and was too clear-sighted to be selfish; nevertheless, he left behind him a large fortune, and a name for political sagacity that will increase in proportion to the capacity of men for comprehending it. At present, it appears to be half covered by the mischievous gang of Lilliputians, partly under his own banners, and partly under his adversary's.

Is somebody pulling my skirts? Yes; and whispers that I am wandering from my proper object. It is Daniel de Foe! What says he? Believe me, sir, he has been entreating me to mention him in particular, lest he should be mistaken for Confucius. He tells me that the 'x' in his name is the very last thing belonging to him. He then adds, "and pray, out of christian charity, throw in a word for poor Robinson Crusoe." Amid all his mishaps, never "was he in more imminent danger."

Let us try, sir, what we can do. The artificial flowers are removed from the chimney-piece: let us bring fresh ones from the garden and the field. We have swept into another room the frippery of Gibbon, the inflexible plush that overloaded the distorted muscles of Johnson, and the broken trinkets, the inextricable inanities, the ancient dust and recent cobweb, of Harris and Monboddo. We come again into the open air and see Old England all around us. Thanks to Goldsmith! thanks to Southey! thanks in the highest Heavens to Charles Lamb! The Essays of Elia will afford a greater portion of pure delight to the intellectual and the virtuous, to all who look into the human heart for what is good and graceful in it, whether near the surface or below, than any other two prose volumes, modern or ancient. Deep as was the reading of Charles Lamb in the list of our early writers, and warm as was his admiration of them, he could not be unaware that a reference to them on many occasions might improve our style, and in some correct our orthography. For myself, since I cannot be a reformer, I would fain be a conservative. Now do not imagine, my dear sir, that you are hearing any well-known voice at Westminster; here I am, under Fiesole; yet even here my country, and particularly the best part of her, the language, interests me deeply. In my scanty reading, for scanty it has truly been of late, I find innovations in the spelling which displease me. Our authors appear to have left it entirely at the mercy of those who by more than courtesy, are called Printer's Devils. The printers, I know not whether with any exception, surely have hired the idlest, the most ignorant, and the most presumptuous, for an office which requires accuracy, fidelity, and patience. This is not the case, I believe, in any other country. It is well when the errors of the press lead only to nonsense; generally they give sense perverted, sense different from the author's. I have remarked that we are more prodigal of our commas than other nations are, and that we always hedge round with them perhaps, indeed, &c. I find in all new books the word was printed wo. We have ceased to have toes for many years, otherwise they too would be sadly cramped and curtailed.

Wishing you a fair riddance of all your fo's,

I am, my dear sir,

Yours, very truly,

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ATTENTION to our friend THOS. D.

Thanks to ARGUS; but does he not confound the two words, parental and paternal?

The wishes of Mr L. and Mr R. H. have been complied with.

The MS. of Mr J. F. shall be attended to.

In answer to two friendly readers, who have written to us respecting the merits of the late amiable Kirke White, we will refresh our acquaintance with his poems, and see whether we ought not to rate him higher than our memory had led us to do; for we had not forgotten him among the births that do honor to the blue-vested trade.

We shall at any time be glad to hear from Mr G. J. M., especially as an observer of his philosophic turn will not take it amiss, that in consequence of the overflow of matter under our new system, we must request him to be as brief in his communications as may not do them injustice.

NEW SHAKSPEARIANA.

New Facts Regarding the Life of Shakspeare. By J. Payne Collier, F.S.A. 8vo. Rodd. pp. 55.

It is, as has been remarked, one of the strongest proofs of the high, and especially of the essentially dramatic, nature of Shakspeare's genius, that in all his poetry he has told us so little of himself. Speaking of the proofs or promises of genius furnished by his earliest productions, Coleridge says ('Biographia Literaria,' vol. ii.), "I have found that where the subject is taken immediately from the author's personal sensations and experiences, the excellence of a particular poem is but an equivocal mark, and often a fallacious pledge, of genuine poetic power. We may perhaps remember the tale of the statuery, who had acquired considerable reputation for the legs of his goddesses, though the rest of the statue accorded but indifferently with ideal beauty; till his wife, elated by her husband's praises, modestly acknowledged that she herself had been his constant model. In the Venus and Adonis, this proof of poetic power exists even to excess. It is throughout as if a superior spirit, more inventive, more intimately conscious, even than the characters themselves, not only of every outward look and act, but of the flux and reflux of the mind in all its subtlest thoughts and feelings, were placing the whole before our view; himself meanwhile unparticipating in the passions, and actuated only by that pleasurable excitement, which had resulted only from the energetic fervour of his own spirit in so vividly exhibiting what it had so accurately and so profoundly contemplated. I think I should have conjectured from these poems, that even then, the great instinct which impelled the poet to the drama was secretly working in him." It is indeed this power of wholly forgetting and going out of himself, that constitutes the dramatist's distinguishing attribute. His very business is to cast off altogether his own feelings and passions, that he may successively enter into, and clothe himself with those of each character he brings upon the scene. For want of this power several writers of high poetical genius have either entirely failed as dramatists, or have only succeeded on the very narrow ground which the drama affords to the display of that egotistical propensity which is often the soul of other poetry. Milton and Byron may be mentioned as two remarkable examples. 'Both have written dramas; but of Milton's two, the 'Comus' is merely a beautiful poem in dialogue, with almost nothing of the true dramatic character, and the 'Sampson Agonistes' derives its chief inspiration from the principal personage being in fact the representative of the author himself. The tone even of Milton's epic poetry is throughout egotistical, that is to say, it constantly keeps you in recollection of the mighty writer as an individual; and in this respect it is strikingly contrasted with what (if we might take the liberty to coin a word) we would call the universalism of the Homeric poetry, in reading which the human artist is never thought of, but everything sounds like the voice of nature herself. There are some admirable observations upon this subject in the 'Specimens of Coleridge's Table Talk' lately published. Byron, again, we need not remark, has in everything that he has written, by whatever name he calls it, drawn only one character—himself. He has presented sometimes one part of it, indeed, and sometimes another—and from this fragmentary delineation he has contrived to produce an outside semblance of variety; but the variety is really nothing more than the result of the writer's incapacity to present at any one time a complete whole. Shakspeare, for instance, would have given us 'Childe Harold' and 'Don Juan' in one; but that Byron could not do. He had so little of the peculiar dramatic faculty that, so far from being able to go out of himself into another being, he could not easily and naturally pass from one to another of the phases of his own single character, and so comprehend and exhibit the whole in one picture. The drama is the highest region of poetry principally because it demands in the highest degree the exercise of this peculiar faculty, itself again plainly the highest exercise of the imagination, since it implies the most entire escape from and triumph over all the impediments of materialism and selfishness. But it requires to be united to other powers in order to form the great dramatist—to passion, to sensibility, to subtle apprehension of character and of the secret springs of conduct and events, in short, to that very intenseness of sympathy with all things human which would seem to be the thing of all others the most remote from its own spirituality and detachment from the bonds of personality and clay. It is the difficulty of this combination that makes the great dramatic poet the rarest and greatest of all poets.

Shakspeare has not only told us nothing of himself; so thoroughly dramatic, (that is, indifferent to self) was the character of his mind and nature, that he has not even left us the ordinary means of inferring or conjecturing the facts of his history. Of his wonderful works, after they had been produced, he seems to have taken no more care or thought than mother earth herself does of the herbage and flowers that spring from her bosom, and which she leaves to wither and die where they sprang. Had it depended upon himself, this, the most extraordinary man that ever lived, would actually have left the earth without leaving behind him any memorial of his existence. To others we are indebted for gathering up a few of those Sibylline leaves which he was wont to scatter around him to the winds. Even as it is, we cannot satisfactorily ascertain the time and the order of the appearance of those productions which we now place at the head of the world's literature. We have no text of any one of them which we are sure that the author himself revised as it was passing through the press. Many of them, there is every reason to believe, he never saw in print. How many others may be lost we know not. Thus, even that which makes in almost all other cases a sure portion of an author's biography, the history of his works, is, with the exception of a few conjectural and for the most part disputed dates, a blank here. And the works themselves, as we have said, precious as they are in other respects, convey not one tittle of information respecting the author. We cannot except even the Sonnets, at least till the mystery of their meaning be somewhat better cleared up. They rather puzzle, than inform us. Except merely his poetry, we possess nothing whatever of Shakspeare. His countenance, for instance, from the diversity of the several portraits, and the doubts that exist as to all of them, can hardly be said to be known to us. Of Milton's countenance, on the other hand, in accordance with the more egotistical character of his genius, we have representations at three or four different periods of his life, of unquestioned authenticity. Of the manuscripts of Milton, again, we have volumes; of the handwriting of Shakspeare we have not one line, save the last, probably, he ever traced, the half-illegible signatures to his will.

As for the incidents of his life, they were for the first time collected from tradition, about a century after his death, by Rowe, and to his meagre narrative, made up as it is in the greater part of what is fabulous or doubtful, scarcely anything has since been added. The chief thing that has been done by Shakspeare's more recent biographers has been to disprove or dispute what Rowe had advanced. So that now, with the exception, as we said before, of a few dates, the life of our great dramatist has been nearly all volatilized away into matter of scepticism at the best, if not of utter disbelief.

In a former work, the 'History of Dramatic Poetry and the Stage,' Mr Collier gave to the world several previously unknown particulars respecting Shakspeare, which he considered to rest on good evidence. He has since pursued his curious researches with great enthusiasm, and has been fortunate enough to discover a few additional facts, which he now communicates in a letter to Thomas Amyot, Esq., the Treasurer of the Society of Antiquaries. Only a very limited number of copies of the letter have been printed.

The principal source of his discoveries has been the manuscript collections of Lord Ellesmere, the Keeper of the Great Seal and Lord Chancellor in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Lord Ellesmere's manuscripts are preserved at Bridgewater House; and Mr Collier was permitted to inspect them by the kindness of Lord Francis Egerton. "The Rev. H. I. Todd," he says, "had been there before me, and had classed some of the documents and correspondence; but large bundles of papers, ranging in point of date between 1581, when Lord Ellesmere was made Solicitor-General, and 1616, when he retired from the office of Lord Chancellor, remained unexplored, and it was evident that many of them had never been opened from the time when, perhaps, his own hands tied them together." Among these papers, "in a most unpromising heap," as he calls it, "chiefly of legal documents," the author found most of the new facts which he here announces. These we shall now proceed to notice in the order in which they are given.

Shakspeare, in all probability, came to London in 1586 or 1587, when he was in his twenty-second or twenty-third year. Although, however, there is reason to believe that he began to write for the stage so early as 1590 or 1591, no mention of his name in connection with the theatre had hitherto been discovered before 1596. The mention of him under that year occurs in a petition to the Privy Council, respecting the Blackfriars theatre, which was, for the first time, printed by Mr Collier in his former work. Among the Ellesmere papers, however, is a petition, addressed apparently to the Privy Council, and dated November 1589, in which Shakspeare appears as the twelfth in a list of sixteen persons, described as "all of them sharers in the Blackfriars Playhouse." "This information," says the author, "seems to me to give a sufficient contradiction to the idle story of Shakspeare having commenced his career by holding horses at the playhouse door; had such been the fact, he would hardly have risen to the rank of a sharer in 1589." So that we see the present contributor of 'New facts regarding the life of Shakspeare' must also signalise himself, like his predecessors, by demolishing so much of the biography commonly received. Although we admit, however, that this new fact is of some weight in reference to the point on which he brings it to bear—that it "may help to thicken other proofs That do demonstrate thinly,"

we do not think the reasoning quite so conclusive as Mr Collier conceives it to be. Shakspeare's rise in his profession was tolerably rapid after this, and we cannot be quite sure at what rate he may have advanced in the first instance also. In 1589, as we have seen, he was the twelfth of sixteen sharers in the theatre; in 1596, as appears by the other document printed by Mr Collier in his former work, he was the fifth of eight sharers; and, in 1608, he was second in a new patent granted by King James on his accession.

The next document which our author brings forward, is a paper which appears to have been drawn up in the course of a negotiation entered into with the Blackfriars Company by the Corporation of the City, who, after a series of unsuccessful attempts to shut up the play-house by the exercise of their municipal authority, had at last resorted to the plan of buying up the interest of the several proprietors. This paper is an account of the claims made by the latter, and, although it seems to be without a date, is referred by Mr Collier (by inference, we suppose, from other papers found along with it), to the year 1608. One of the entries (the third) in this inventory, is as follows:—

"W. Shakspeare asketh for the wardrobe and properties of the same play-house, 500*l.*, and for his four shares, the same as his fellows, Burbage and Fletcher; viz. 98*9*l.* 6*s.* 8*d."

"Hence, we learn," our author remarks, "that Shakspeare's property in the Blackfriars Theatre, including the wardrobe and properties, which were exclusively his, was estimated at more than 1400*l.* which would be equal to between 6000*l.* and 7000*l.* of our present money. Burbage was even richer, as the owner of what is called "the fee" of the play-house, and perhaps he or his father had bought the ground on which it stood, as well as the building."

"Till now, all has depended upon conjecture, both as to the value of theatrical property generally in the time of Shakspeare, and as to the particular sum he may be supposed to have realised as an author of plays, and as an actor of them. Malone "suspected that the whole clear receipt of a theatre was divided into forty shares" ('Shakspeare,' by Boswell, iii, 170), and proceeds to guess at the mode in which the money was distributed. Here we have positive proof that, at the Blackfriars at least, the profits were divided into twenty shares. Of these

Burbage had	4 shares,
Fletcher	3 shares,
Shakspeare	4 shares,
Hemmings	2 shares,
Condell	2 shares,
Taylor and Lowen	3 shares,
Four other Actors	2 shares.

"Burbage and Shakspeare, therefore, in the number of their shares, were upon equal terms: the former, as the owner of the fee, was probably paid the rent of the theatre; which I shall hereafter show, from a document of a subsequent date, was then 50*l.* per annum; and the latter, as the owner of the wardrobe and properties, no doubt obtained as large a sum for the use of them. Though they are only estimated at half the value of the fee, yet wear and tear is to be taken into the account. We are to presume that the materials for this statement were derived from the actors, and that they made out their loss as large as it could well be shown to be, with a view to gaining full compensation; but if each share produced on an average, or (to use the terms of the document) "one year with another," 33*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, the twenty shares would net an annual sum of 666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, or somewhat less than 3,400*l.* of our present money. Shakspeare's annual income, from the receipts at the Blackfriars theatre, without the amount paid him for the use of the wardrobe and properties, would therefore be 133*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* It is possible, however, that there might be a deduction for his proportion of the rent to Burbage, and of the salaries to the "hired men," who were always paid by the sharers. To this income would be to be added the sums he received for either new or altered plays. At about this date it appears that from 12*l.* to 25*l.* were usually given for new dramatic productions. Much would of course depend upon the popularity of the author.

"We have a right to conclude that the Globe was at least as profitable as the Blackfriars: it was a public theatre, of larger dimensions, and the performances took place at a season when, probably, playhouses were more frequented; if not, why should they have been built so as to contain a more numerous audience? At the lowest computation, therefore, I should be inclined to put Shakspeare's yearly income at 300*l.*, or not far short of 1,500*l.* of our present money. We are to recollect that, in 1608, he had produced most of his greatest works, the plausible conjecture being, that he wrote only five or six plays between that year and his final retirement from London. In what way, and for what amount, he previously disposed of his interest in the Blackfriars and Globe theatres, it is useless to attempt to speculate."

In another document, however, which is given immediately after, we have a warning that these estimates of the value of their property, by the players themselves, are not to be implicitly relied upon. This is a report on the value of this very theatre of Blackfriars, made by the Aldermen of the Ward, and two other magistrates, in 1633, when the Privy Council entertained the plan of removing the playhouse, and of making compensation to the parties. "It seems by this document," to borrow our author's words, "that the company first put a gross sum of 16,000*l.* upon the Blackfriars theatre and its appurtenances—that, being called upon for particulars, they advanced their claim to 21,900*l.*; but that the magistrates, extraordinary as it may seem, subsequently reduced the whole demand to only 2900*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*" The magistrates state, too, that they had made this valuation "with their (the players) own consent."

Mr Collier's next document is merely an agreement, preserved among the Fines, at the Charter-house, Westminster, between Shakspeare and one Hercules Underhill, for the purchase, in 1603, by the former from the latter, of a messuage, with barn, granary, garden, and orchard, at Stratford-upon-Avon, for 60*l.*

The next document that is produced, is, if its genuineness, and the interpretation here put upon it, could be depended on, much more curious. It is a copy of a letter (marked "Copia Vera"), signed H. S., written on half a sheet of paper, and without direction or date; "but the internal evidence it contains," says Mr Collier, "shows that, in all probability, it refers to the attempt at dislodgment, made in the year 1608; and it was in the same bundle as the paper giving a detail of the particular claims of Burbage, Fletcher, Shakspeare, and the rest."

The initials, H. S., subscribed to this letter, Mr Collier considers to be those of Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, the early and constant patron of Shakspeare. The letter begins, "My very honoured Lord," and certainly has the appearance of having been addressed to Lord Ellesmere, in whose hands Mr Collier thinks there can be little doubt that the original was placed by Burbage or Shakspeare, when they waited upon him together. It is a warm recommendation of the Blackfriars players to the protection and good offices of his lordship, in consequence of their being "threatened," as the writer states, "by the Lord Mayor and aldermen of London, never friendly to their calling, with the destruction of their means of livelihood, by the pulling down of their play-house, which is a private theatre, and hath never given occasion of anger by any disorders." The bearers of the letter are described as "two of the chief of the company." Of Burbage, it is said, in Shakspeare's own well-known phrase, "that he is a man famous as our English Roscius, one who fitteth the action to the word, and the word to the action most admirably." The letter then proceeds: "The other is a man no whit less deserving favour, and my especial friend, till of late an actor of good account in the company, now a sharer in the same, and writer of some of our best English plays, which, as your lordship knoweth, were most singularly liked of Queen Elizabeth, when the company was called upon to perform before her Majesty at court, at Christmas and Shrovetide. His most gracious Majesty King James, also, since his coming to the crown, hath extended his royal favour to the company in divers ways, and at sundry times. This other hath to name William Shakspeare, and they are both of one county, and, indeed, almost of one town; both are right famous in their qualities, though it longeth not to your lordship's gravity and wisdom to resort unto the places where they are wont to delight the public ear. Their trust and suit now is, not to be molested in their way of life, whereby they maintain themselves and their wives and families (being both married, and of good reputation), as well as the widows and orphans of some of their dead fellows."

We have divested this letter of its antique spelling—and thus presented, it has to us, we confess, a most suspicious air of modern imitation. Is it possible, from the appearance of the manuscript, or the circumstances attending its discovery, that Mr Collier should, in this instance, have been deceived by a cunning forgery? Can any one have imposed upon his well-known enthusiasm, by throwing in his way another of those fabricated Shakspearian relics, by which so many of his brethren have ere now been taken in? Is it not strange, too, that a copy should have been taken of such a letter, which, whatever may be the interest attaching to it now, could scarcely, at the time when it was written, have been considered of much importance? Besides, is the signature that which Lord Southampton would have used?

Mr Collier himself, however, appears to have no doubt of the genuineness of the letter. He says, "When first I obtained permission to look through the Bridgewater MSS. in detail, I conjectured that it would be nearly impossible to turn over so many state papers, and such a bulk of correspondence, private and official, without meeting with something illustrative of the subject to which I have devoted so many years; but I certainly never anticipated being so fortunate as to obtain particulars so new, curious, and important, regarding a poet who, above all others, ancient or modern, native or foreign, has been the object of admiration. When I took up the copy of Lord Southampton's letter, and glanced over it hastily, I could scarcely believe my eyes, to see such names as Shakspeare and Burbage in connection with a manuscript of the time. There was a remarkable coincidence, also, in the discovery, for it happened on the anniversary of Shakspeare's birth and death."

Our author's next documents are, an item in an original Entry Book of Patents and Warrants for Patents, kept by William Tutbill, "the riding clerk," containing lists of all that had passed the Great Seal, while it was in the hands of Lord Ellesmere, in 1609; and a draft, either for a patent or privy seal;—both relating to the licensing of Robert Daborne and others, "to bring up and practice children in plays, by the name of the children of the Queen's Revels, for the pleasure of her Majesty." In the draft, which is dated 4th of January 1609, Shakspeare is mentioned as the first of the three other persons whom it was proposed to associate with Daborne in this grant. Mr Collier seems to assume that it appears "on the face of the draft, that it was never carried into effect as far as regards Shakspeare;" but we must confess that we cannot perceive any evidence to that effect in the document as here given. It may, however, be true, as he afterwards remarks, that "there can be little doubt" that Shakspeare was not eventually one of Daborne's partners, "Then it may be asked," he proceeds, "how it happens that the name of Shakspeare is found in the draft? This answer may be given, and perhaps it is the true one:—That the destruction of the Blackfriars Theatre was about this date, or a very little earlier, contemplated; and that Shakspeare projected the transference of his interest, or part of it, to a different dramatic concern; because, although the Blackfriars is specifically mentioned, the words 'or elsewhere within our realm of England,' are added, so that the children of the Queen's Revels might, in fact, perform in any English Theatre. When, however, it turned out that the corporation of London could not succeed in their design of expelling the King's servants from the privileged precinct of the Blackfriars, Shakspeare might resolve, as long as he remained in London, to continue his old connexion, as we know that he did to the last."

Our author's last document relating to Shakspeare is a letter to Lord Ellesmere, from Samuel Daniel, the poet (author of 'The Civil Wars'), thanking his Lordship for his recent appointment to the office of Master of the Queen's Revels. This letter, which, like the other papers, is preserved at Bridgewater House, has no date; but, as Daniel's appointment took place on the 30th of January, 1603, it may be presumed to have been written very shortly afterwards. The writer says—"I cannot but know that I am less deserving than some that sued by other of the nobility unto her majesty for this room; if M. Drayton, my good friend, had been chosen, I should not have murmured, for sure I am he would have filled it most excellently; but it seemeth to mine humble judgment that one who is the author of plays now daily presented on the public stages of London, and the possessor of no small gains, and moreover himself an actor in the King's Company of Comedians, could not with reason pretend to be Master of the Queen's Majesty's Revels, forasmuch as he would sometimes be asked to approve and allow of his own writings. Therefore he, and more of like quality, cannot justly be disappointed, because, through your Honour's gracious interposition, the chance was haply mine."

There can be no doubt, we think, that Mr Collier is right in considering the portion of the above passage which we have printed in Italics, to refer to Shakspeare. The description, he remarks, could apply to no other person than a member of the King's Company of Players, except Shakspeare. Ben Jonson is known to have quitted the stage before the date to which the letter must be assigned; and, besides, instead of being them "the possessor of no small gains," he appears to have been living in poverty upon one of his friends.

Such are the "new facts regarding the life of Shakspeare" with which Mr Collier has here favoured us. They are somewhat minute, it will perhaps be said; but here, to a lover of literary antiquities, the smallest accession to our previous knowledge is precious. The volume also, besides its contributions to the biography of Shakspeare, contains a great deal of curious information, which we have not been able to notice, respecting the plays, playhouses, players, and theatrical affairs generally, of the times with which it is occupied. The author, in these matters, has all the zeal of an apostle. "I shall offer no other apology," he thus addresses his brother antiquary, on concluding the detail of his discoveries, "for the length of this letter, than by saying that, if I had consulted my own inclination, I should have made it at least four times as long, by adding a great deal of other new matter relating to Shakspeare, his works, and his fellow dramatists and actors. I wish a few other people had half your knowledge of, and half your liking for such details; but perhaps, after all, you may only have a temporary escape." For our own parts, we shall be glad to hear whatever more Mr Collier may have to tell us, and that as soon as it shall suit his convenience.

MR BECKFORD'S NEW WORK.

Recollections of an Excursion to the Monasteries of Alcobaca and Batalha. By the Author of 'Vathek.' 1 vol. 8vo. London: Bentley.

We have been spell-bound while reading this remarkable book. We have felt as if we were in the presence of a potent magician, sneering at his own might, and yet every moment drawing wider and more impassable circles around us—every moment brightening the atmosphere on one side with more than oriental splendour, and darkening it on the other with worse than Cimmerian gloom, from which there is no possibility of escape or retreat. The relater of his own adventures, revels, and voluptuous enjoyments, stands forth at once like Solomon in his prime, at the height of pomp, pleasure, and luxury, and Solomon in old age and satiety, who has brought home the conviction to his void and desolate heart, that all these enjoyments, as everything else the beautiful world can give, are all vanity. After describing all the material luxuries of this life—the beauty and voluptuousness of women—the banquet where all the senses are gratified at the same time—the garden, grove, and bower, and the exquisite sleeping-chamber, where art and elegance have almost etherealized the grossness of corporeal enjoyments, he pauses for a moment to concentrate them all, and then turns round and sneers at them. This too, he does with a tact, a force, and an exquisiteness of language which were probably never surpassed. If that laughing devil Mephistopheles, who deceives others with the exhibition of earthly pleasures and pomp, could once be deluded by his own bait, the manner in which he would chuckle over the self-delusion might be an apt parallel to Mr Beckford's general tone of writing. He composed that wonderful eastern tale 'Vathek' in the days of his youth, drawing its dazzling and yet saddening materials from the mysterious mine of his own heart;—he has been a sort of Oriental Caliph, without the cares of a throne, ever since, and for a long time his enormous wealth allowed him to realize nearly every scene of eastern magnificence, ease, and luxury.

When Lord Byron in his introduction to 'Childe Harold,' spoke of the fulness of satiety—the Paphian girls that sang and smiled,—“the gathered revellers from far and near,”—and of “his goblets brimm'd with every costly wine,” he did very little more than draw from his imagination, for Byron was poor, and Newstead then, a bare and desolate place. But the halls of Cintra, the perfumed galleries of Mr Beckford's quinta of San José, saw, indeed, if reports speak truly, more than a realisation of what the author of 'Childe Harold' only dreamed of, or what was only a poetical exaggeration of common enough revels.

There probably never was an Englishman (we suppose the fact, seeing in what it all ended, rather in pity than in envy) who to such ample means of gratifying it, united such a gusto, or what we may call such a genius for the enjoyment of pleasure. Apart from the more sordid gratifications, he loved and relished everything that was material and beautiful—the works of art, the works of nature, pictures and statues, flowers, trees, and gliding streams; but he loved all these things as a voluptuary, and glowed in the presence of lovely woods and rivers as if they were blooming hamadryades, or exquisitely delicate Naiads, whom he could fold in his arms and transfer to his own harem. But if this was voluptuousness, it was the very sublimity and perfection of the thing, and the fineness and fastidiousness of Mr Beckford's taste would have made him expire under a week's probation of the life led by young men of pleasure, commonly so called. We believe it is Boniface in the 'Beaux's Stratagem,' who, in speaking of a country squire of a century and a half ago, says, "Oh! he is a man of pleasure! he will smoke his pipe twelve hours at a time, and drink strong ale by the gallons!" As this squire stood at about the lowest point of a refined luxury, so did Mr Beckford stand at about the very highest. We will not take upon ourselves to determine which of the two might have the more egotistical heart, but Mr B.'s egotism is certainly as strongly displayed in the volume before us, as it was in his 'Travels in Spain, Portugal and Italy,' which we reviewed last year. Both these books are highly characteristic of the man, and both little more than variations upon the original theme, and a filling up of the half-angelic, half-demoniac harmony of the 'Caliph Vathek,' in which tale the way to hell lies over a mosaic pavement of luxuries and sneers, pleasures and sarcasms, and people move about in the hall of audience of his infernal majesty, as if they were in very good company, smiling and as much at their ease as courtiers at a merely mortal king's levée—only every man among them has his hand in his left breast, and underneath that hand his heart is burning with unquenchable fire.

We are sure nobody will take up the brief volume now more immediately under our notice without reading it to the end, or being haunted by its recollection long after reading it.

We need not point out the obvious moral our readers may derive from it, but, recommending it to their perusal, we will endeavour to give them some idea of the contents of the volume.

Being at Lisbon in the month of June of the year 1794 (ahen! fugaces! just forty-one years ago) Mr Beckford was warmly recommended to pay a visit to the monasteries of Alcobaca and Batalha, by the prince regent of Portugal, who appointed two voluptuous dignitaries of the church, the grand prior of Avis, and the prior of St Vincent's, to be his conductors and companions. Accordingly at an early day, this well assorted trio set out on their journey, from Beckford's quinta or villa of San José, travelling in dormousses or the most convenient of carriages, and taking with them a complete army of attendants, most conspicuous among whom were the admirable, the divine Monsieur Simon, the English Caliph's French cook, Franchi, his confidant and pianofortist, and Ehrhart, his physician, who was to cure indigestions and mend broken bones, should any of the latter occur in traversing the rough roads of the interior.

High-bred led-horses for the saddle, both Arabian and English, followed close in the rear, and Franchi's well-packed and well-tuned piano went with him wherever he went. His companions, the rosy friars, though enormously rich for Portuguese, were poor compared with "England's wealthiest son;" yet did they almost rival him in the stateliness and completeness of their travelling appointments.

"As my right reverend companions had arranged not to renounce one atom of their habitual comforts and conveniences, and to take with them their confidential acolytes and secretaries, as well as some of their favourite quadrupeds, we had in the train of the latter-mentioned animals a rare rabble of grooms, ferradors, and mule-drivers. To these, my usual followers being added, we formed altogether a caravan which, camels and dromedaries excepted, would have cut no despicable figure even on the route of Mecca or Mesched-Ali!

A page or two farther on Mr Beckford gives other details as to the plan of his luxurious journey—a plan which seems to have been adhered to with admirable precision.

"We were to proceed, or rather creep along, by short and facile stages; stopping to dine, and sup, and repose, as delectably as in the most commodious of homes. Everything that could be thought of, or even dreamed of, for our convenience or relaxation, was to be carried in our train, and nothing left behind but Care and Sorrow; two spectres, who, had they dared to mount on our shoulders, would have been driven off with a high hand by the Prior of St Vincent's, than whom a more delightful companion never existed since the days of those polished and gifted canons and cardinals who formed such a galaxy of talent and facetiousness round Leo the Tenth."

In this manner, eating and drinking of the best, reposing in the coolest and most picturesque spots, and taking their fill of every pleasure, this Anacreontic party, in four days, contrived to reach the regal monastery of Alcobaca, the burying-place of the ancient Kings of Portugal, where Pedro, surnamed the Just, after having indulged his grief and revenge almost beyond mortal limits, interred his beautiful wife Inez, who had been murdered by his father's orders. The gloom of these old recollections did not overcloud the arrival of our travellers.

"The first sight of this regal monastery is very imposing; and the picturesque, well-wooded and well-watered village, out of the quiet bosom of which it appears to rise, relieves the mind from a sense of oppression the huge domineering bulk of the conventual buildings inspires.

"We had no sooner hove in sight, and we loomed large, than a most tremendous ring of bells of extraordinary power announced our speedy arrival. A special aviso, or broad hint from the secretary of state, recommending these magnificent monks to receive the Grand Prior and his companions with peculiar graciousness, the whole community, including fathers, friars, and subordinates, at least four hundred strong, were drawn up in grand spiritual array on the vast platform before the monastery to bid us welcome. At their head the Abbot himself, in his costume of High Almoner of Portugal, advanced to give us a cordial embrace.

"It was quite delectable to witness with what coolings and comfortings the Lord Abbot of Alcobaca greeted his right reverend brethren of Avis and St Vincent's—turtle-doves were never more fondlesome, at least in outward appearance. Preceded by these three graces of holiness, I entered the spacious, massive, and somewhat austere Saxon-looking church. All was gloom, except where the perpetual lamps burning before the high altar diffused a light most solemn and religious—(inferior twinkles from side chapels and chantries are not worth mentioning). To this altar my high clerical conductors repaired, whilst the full harmonious tones of several stately organs, accompanied by the choir, proclaimed that they were in the act of adoring the real Presence.

"Whilst these devout prostrations were performing, I lost not a moment in visiting the sepulchral chapel, where lie interred Pedro the Just and his beloved Inez. The light which reached this solemn recess of a most solemn edifice was so subdued and hazy, that I could hardly distinguish the elaborate sculpture of the tomb, which reminded me, both as to design and execution, of the Beauchamp monument at Warwick, so rich in fretwork and imagery.

"Just as I was giving way to the effecting reveries which such an object could not fail of exciting in a bosom the least susceptible of romantic impressions, in came the Grand Priors hand in hand, all three together. 'To the kitchen,' said they in perfect unison,—'to the kitchen, and that immediately; you will then judge whether we have been wanting in zeal to regale you.'

"Such a summons, so conveyed, was irresistible; the three prelates led the way to, I verily believe, the most distinguished temple of gluttony in all Europe. What Glastonbury may have been in its palmy state, I cannot answer; but my eyes never beheld in any modern convent of France, Italy, or Germany, such an enormous space dedicated to culinary purposes. Through the centre of the immense and nobly-groined hall, not less than sixty feet in diameter, ran a brisk rivolet of the clearest water, flowing through pierced wooden reservoirs, containing every sort and size of the finest river-fish. On one side, loads of game and venison were heaped up; on the other, vegetables and fruit in endless variety. Beyond a long line of stoves extended a row of ovens, and close to them hillocks of wheaten flour whiter than snow, rocks of sugar, jars of the purest oil, and pastry in vast abundance, which a numerous tribe of lay brothers and their attendants were rolling out and puffing up into an hundred different shapes, singing all the while as blithely as larks in a corn-field.

"My servants, and those of their reverend excellencies the two Priors, were standing by in the full glee of witnessing these hospitable preparations, as well pleased, and as much flushed, as if they had been just returned from assisting at the marriage at Cana in Galilee. "There," said the Lord Abbot, "we shall not starve: God's bounties are great, it is fit we should enjoy them." (By the bye, I thought this allegro, contrasted with the pensive of scarecrow convents, quite delightful.)—"An hour hence supper will be ready," continued the Lord Abbot; "in the meanwhile, let me conduct you to your apartment."

We cannot venture to quote the description of the monastic feasting and banqueting which followed in the splendid saloon, which was "covered with pictures, and lighted up by a profusion of wax-torches, in sconces of silver." It would be a tantalizing or an insulting of those who are condemned to plain beef and mutton. So thoroughly had these monks of Alcobaca refined on the art of ingeniously gormandizing, that they did not take their dessert in the same saloon where they ate their dinners. The extract which follows is curious in more ways than one:

"Confectionery and fruits were out of the question here; they awaited us in an adjoining still more spacious and sumptuous apartment, to which we retired from the effluvia of viands and sauces.

"In this apartment we found Franchi and the Grand Prior of Aviz's secretary, the Prior of St Vincent's acolyte, and ten or twelve principal personages of the neighbourhood, most eager to enjoy a stare at the stranger whom their lordly Abbot delighted to honour. The table being removed, four good-looking novices, lads of fifteen or sixteen, demure even to primness, came in, bearing cassioles of Goa filigree, steaming with a fragrant vapour of Calambac, the finest quality of wood of aloes.

"This pleasing ceremony performed, the saloon was cleared out as if for dancing. I flattered myself we were going to be favoured with a bolero, fandango, or perhaps the fofa itself,—a dance as decent as the ballets exhibited for the recreation of Muley Liezit, his most exemplary Marrochese Majesty. A crowd of clarionet and guitar players, dressed in silk dominoes like the serenaders in Italian burlettas, followed by a posse of young monks and young gentlemen in secular dresses as stiff as buckram, began an endless succession of the most decorous and tiresome minuets I ever witnessed, ten times longer, and alas! ten times less ridiculous, than even the long minuet at Bath.

"Tired to death of remaining motionless, and desirous of exhibiting something a little out of the common way, I gently hinted a wish to dance, and that I should have no objection were one of the three right reverend Priors to take me out. It would not do—they kept their state. Yawning piteously, I longed for the hour when it should become lawful to retire to bed; which I did right gladly when the blessed hour came, after good-nighting and being good-nighted with another round of ceremony."

The narrative of the time spent in this remarkable monastery, strikingly exhibits the author's inimitable vein of description, his humour, taste, and his passion for objects of virtu, and is well worthy of repeated perusal.

From Alcobaca the party travelled in the same pompous and luxurious manner to Batalha, another celebrated but much poorer monastery, at the distance of an easy day's journey; during which they all drank copiously of the wine of Aljubarota, "the perfumed, ethereal, divine Aljubarota!" compared with which Monsieur Simon swore the Clos de Vougeot of France was mere ditch-water. It was a fine moonlight night when they arrived in front of Batalha, within whose walls, among other illustrious dead, repose John the first of Portugal and his generous-hearted wife, Philippa—"linked hand in hand in death, as fondly as they were in life."

"My eyes being fairly open, I beheld a quiet solitary vale, bordered by shrubby hills; a few huts, and but a few, peeping out of dense masses of foliage; and high above their almost level surface, the great church, with its rich cluster of abbatial buildings, buttresses, and pinnacles, and fretted spires, towering in all their pride, and marking the ground with deep shadows that appeared interminable, so full and so wide were they stretched along. Lights glimmered here and there in various parts of the edifice; but a strong glare of torches pointed out its principal entrance, where stood the whole community waiting to receive us.

"Whilst our sumpter-mules were unloading, and ham and pies and sausages were rolling out of plethoric hampers, I thought these poor monks looked on rather enviously. My more fortunate companions—no wretched cadets of the mortification family, but the true elder sons of fat mother church—could hardly conceal their sneers of conscious superiority. A contrast so strongly marked amused me not a little.

"The space before the entrance being narrow, there was some difficulty in threading our way through a labyrinth of panniers, and coffers, and baggage,—and mules, as obstinate as their drunken drivers, which is saying a great deal, and all our grooms, lackeys, and attendants, half asleep, half muddled.

"The Batalha Prior and his assistants looked quite astounded when they saw a gauze-curtained bed, and the Grand Prior's fringed pillow, and the Prior of St Vincent's superb cover-lid, and basins, and jewels, and other utensils of glittering silver, being carried in. Poor souls! they hardly knew what to do, to say, or be at—one running to the right, another to the left—one tucking up his flowing garments to run faster, and another rebuking him for such a deviation from monastic decorum.

"At length, order being somewhat established, and some fine painted wax tapers, which were just unpacked, lighted, we were ushered into a large plain chamber, and the heads of the order presented by the humble Prior of Batalha to their superior mightinesses of San Vicente and Aviz. Then followed a good deal of gossiping, endless compliments, still longer litanies, and an enormous supper.

"One of the monks who partook of it, though almost bent double with age, played his part in excellent style. Animated by ample potations of the very best Aljubarota that ever grew, and which we had taken the provident care to bring with us, he exclaimed lustily, 'Well, this is as it should be—rare doings! such as we have not witnessed at Batalha since a certain progress that great king, John the Fifth, made hither more than half a century ago. I remember every circumstance attending it as clearly as though it had taken place last week. But only think of the atrocious impudence of the gout! His blessed Majesty had hardly sat down to a banquet ten times finer than this, before that accursed malady, patronized by all the devils in hell, thrust its fangs into his toe. I was at that period in the commencement of my novitiate; a handsome lad enough, and had the much-envied honour of laying a cloth of gold cushion under the august feet of our glorious sovereign. No sooner had the extremities of his royal person come in contact with the stiff embroidery, than he roared out as a mere mortal would have done, and looked as black as a thunder-storm; but soon recovering his most happy benign temper, gave me a rouleau of fine, bright, golden coin, and a tap on the head—ay, on this once comely, now poor old shrivelled head. Oh, he was a gracious, open-hearted, glorious monarch,—the very King of Diamonds, and Lord of Hearts! Oh, he is in Heaven, in Heaven above! as sure—ay, as sure as I drink your health, most esteemed stranger.'

"So saying, he drained a huge silver goblet to the last drop, and falling back in his chair, was carried out, chair and all, weeping, puling, and worse than drivelling, with such maudlin tenderness that he actually marked his track with a flow of liquid sorrows."

That night our caliph was not disposed to sleep: a jumble of ideas and recollections fermented in his brain, springing, in part, from the indignant feelings which Donna Francesca's fervour for the monk of Alcobaca, and her coolness for himself, had inspired. Owing to this wakefulness, he heard something which strikingly contrasted with the maudling of the drunken friar at the supper-table.

"Seating myself in the deep recess of a capacious window which was wide open, I suffered the balsamic air and serene moonlight to quiet my agitated spirits. One lonely nightingale had taken possession of a bay-tree just beneath me, and was pouring forth its ecstatic notes at distant intervals.

"In one of those long pauses, when silence itself, enhanced by contrast, seemed to become still deeper, a far different sound than the last I had been listening to, caught my ear,—the sound of a loud but melancholy voice echoing through the arched avenues of a vast garden, pronouncing distinctly these appalling words—'Judgment! judgment! tremble at the anger of an offended God! Woe to Portugal! woe! woe!'

"My hair stood on end—I felt as if a spirit were about to pass before me; but instead of some fearful shape—some horrible shadow, such as appeared in vision to Eliphaz, there issued forth from a dark thicket, a tall, majestic, deadly-pale old man; he neither looked about nor above him; he moved slowly on, his eye fixed as stone, sighing profoundly; and at the distance of some fifty paces from the spot where I was stationed, renewed his doleful cry, his fatal proclamation:—'Woe! woe!' resounded through the still atmosphere, repeated by the echoes of vaults and arches; and the sounds died away, and the spectre-like form that seemed to emit them retired, I knew not how or whither. Shall I confess that my blood ran cold—that all idle, all wanton thoughts left my bosom, and that I passed an hour or two at my window fixed and immovable."

The next morning the mystery was explained by the Prior of Batalha. For the better understanding of it our readers should be reminded that some thirty years before, a plot against Government, in which some of the high nobility and the monks of the order of St Ignatius (the Jesuits), were implicated, was discovered, or was pretended to have been discovered, and that this led to the perpetration of execrable cruelties, commanded by Pombal the prime minister and the Queen, whose remorse afterwards drove her mad. At the time of Mr Beckford's visit to Batalha, the first French revolution was running its career of atrocities; every despatch from France received in Portugal, was full of frightful intelligence, and every throne in Europe seemed threatened with destruction. The storm did not then reach the house of Braganza, but twelve years later it burst over their heads, and drove those princes into exile across the Atlantic. We now come to the Prior's explanation:—

"The being who uttered these dire sounds is still upon the earth, a member of our convent—an exemplary, a most holy man—a scion of one of our greatest families, and a near relative of the Duke of Aveiro, of whose dreadful, agonizing fate you must have heard. He was then in the pride of youth and comeliness, gay as sunshine, volatile as you now appear to be. He had accompanied the devoted Duke to a sumptuous ball given by your nation to our high nobility. At the very moment when splendour, triumph, and merriment were at their highest pitch, the executioners of Pombal's decrees, soldiers and ruffians, pounced down upon their prey; he too was of the number arrested—he too was thrown into a deep, cold dungeon; his life was spared; and in the course of years and events, the slender, lovely youth, now become a wasted, care-worn man, emerged to sorrow and loneliness.

"The blood of his dearest relatives seemed sprinkled upon every object that met his eyes; he never passed Belem without fancying he beheld, as in a sort of frightful dream, the scaffold, the wheels on which those he best loved had expired in torture. The current of his young, hot blood was frozen; he felt benumbed and paralysed; the world, the court, had no charms for him; there was for him no longer warmth in the sun, or smiles on the human countenance: a stranger to love or fear, or any interest on this side the grave, he gave up his entire soul to prayer; and to follow that sacred occupation with greater intenseness, renounced every prospect of worldly comfort or greatness, and embraced our order.

"Full eight-and-twenty years has he remained within these walls, so deeply impressed with the conviction of the Duke of Aveiro's innocence, the atrocious falsehood of that pretended conspiracy, and the consequent unjust tyrannical expulsion of the order of St Ignatius, that he believes—and the belief of so pure and so devout a man is always venerable—that the horrors now perpetrating in France are the direct consequences of that event, and certain of being brought home to Portugal, which kingdom, he declares, is foredoomed to desolation, and its royal house to punishments worse than death."

We had marked for extract several other splendidly written passages—particularly two or three descriptions of the gothic interior of the church, vaults, and Monastery of Batalha, but we can spare no more room, and have already given enough to enable our friends to judge of this extraordinary book.

Mr Beckford soon left Batalha for the wealthier and more luxurious Alcobaca, whence he returned with much the same state that he went, and in much the same humour; now describing a sumptuous dinner—now a sublime scene;—at one moment pouring forth the loftiest eloquence, and in the next indulging in withering sarcasm.

On the twelfth day after his departure from his quinta of San José he arrived at Queluz, in which royal palace he describes circumstances and a scene that would have suited the Hall of Eblis. We leave off the book, as we began it, by thinking of Vathek!

A WORD ON EARLY RISING.

As we are writing this article before breakfast, at an earlier hour than usual, we are inclined to become grand and intolerant on the strength of our virtue, and to look around us and say, "Why is not every body up? How can people lie in bed at an hour like this,—the cool, the fragrant?"

"Falsely luxurious, will not man awake?"

Thus exclaimed good-natured, enjoying Thomson, and lay in bed till twelve, after which he strolled into his garden at Richmond, and eat peaches off a tree, with his hands in his waistcoat pockets! Browzing! A perfect specimen of a poetical elephant or rhinoceros! But we have told this story before. Thomson, however, left an immortal book behind him, which excused his trespasses. What excuse shall mortality bring for hastening its end by lying in bed, and anticipating the grave? for of all apparently innocent habits, lying in bed is perhaps the worst; while on the other hand, amidst all the different habits through which people have attained to a long life, it is said that in this one respect, and this only, they have all agreed! No very long-lived man has been a late riser, Judge Holt is said to have been curious respecting longevity, and to have questioned every very old man that came before him, as to his modes of living; and in the matter of early rising there was no variation: every one of them got up betimes. One lived chiefly upon meat, another upon vegetables; one drank no fermented liquors, another did drink them; a fifth took care not to expose himself to the weather, another took no such care; but every one of them was an early riser. All made their appearance at Nature's earliest levee, and she was pleased that they valued her as soon as she waked, and that they valued her fresh air, and valued her skies, and her birds, and her balmy quiet; or if they thought little of all this, she was pleased that they took the first step in life, every day, calculated to make them happiest and most healthy; and so she laid her hands upon their heads, and pronounced them good old boys, and enabled them to run about at wonderful ages, while their poor senior juniors were tumbling in down and gout.

"A most pleasant hour it is certainly,—when you are once up. The birds are singing in the trees; everything else is noiseless, except the air, which comes sweeping every now and then through the sunshine, hindering the coming day from being hot. We feel it on our face, as we write. At a distance, far off, a dog occasionally barks, and some huge fly is loud upon the window-pane. It is sweet to drink in at one's ears these innocent sounds, and this very sense of silence, and to say to one's self, "We are up;—we are up, we are doing well;—the beautiful creation is not unseen and unheard for want of us." Oh, it's a prodigious moment when the vanity and the virtue can go together. We shall not say how early we write this article, lest we should appear im-modest, and excite envy and despair. Neither shall we mention how often we thus get up, or the hour at which we generally rise,—leaving our readers to hope the best of us; in return for which we will try to be as little exalted this morning, as the sense of advantage over our neighbours will permit, and not despise them—a great stretch for an uncommon sense of merit. There for instance, is C.;—hard at it, we would swear; as fast asleep as a church:—of what value are his books now, and his subtleties, and his speculations? as dead, poor man, as if they never existed. What proof is there of an immortal soul in that face with its eyes shut, and its mouth open, and not a word to say for itself, any more than the dog's?—And W. there;—what signifies his love for his children and his garden, neither of which he is now alive to, though the child-like birds are calling him, hopping amidst their songs; and his breakfast would have twice the relish?—And the L.'s with their garden and their music?—the orchard has all the music to itself; they will not arise to join it, though Nature manifestly intends concerts to be of a morning as well as evening, and the animal Spirits are the first that are up in the universe.

Then the streets and squares. Very much do we fear, that for want of a proper education in these thoughts, the milkman, instead of despising all these shut-up windows, and the sleeping incapables inside, envies them for the riches that keep injuring their diaphragms and digestions, and that will render their breakfast not half so good as his. "Call you these gentlefolks?" said a new maid-servant, in a family of our acquaintance, "why, they get up early in the morning!—Only make me a lady, and see if I wouldn't lie a-bed."

Seriously speaking, we believe that there is not a wholesomer thing than early rising, or one which, if persevered in for a very little while, would make a greater difference in the sensations of those who suffer from most causes of ill-health, particularly the besetting disease of these sedentary times, indigestion. We believe it would supersede the supposed necessity of a great deal of nauseous and pernicious medicine, that pretended friend, and ultimately certain foe, of all impatient stomachs. Its utility in other respects everybody acknowledges, though few profit by it as they might. Nothing renders a man so completely master of the day before him; so gets rid of arrears, anticipates the necessity of haste, and insures leisure. Sir Walter Scott is said to have written all his greatest works before breakfast; he thus also procured time for being one of the most social of friends, and kind and attentive of correspondents. One sometimes regrets that experience passes into the shape of proverbs, since those who make use of them, are apt to have no other knowledge, and thus procure for them a worldly character of the lowest order. Franklin did them no good, in this respect, by crowding them together in 'Poor Richard's Almanack'; and Cervantes intimated the common-place abuse into which they were turning, by putting them into the mouth of Sancho Panza. Swift completed the ruin of some of them, in this country, by mingling them with the slip-slop of his 'Polite Conversation,'—a Tory libel on the talk of the upper ranks, to which nothing comparable is to be found in the Whig or Radical objections of modern times. Yet, for the most part, proverbs are equally true and generous, and there is as much profit for others as for a man's self in believing that "Early to bed and early to rise, will make a man healthy, and wealthy, and wise;" for the voluntary early riser is seldom one who is insensible to the beauty as well as the uses of the spring of day; and in becoming healthy and wise, as well as rich, he becomes good-humoured and considerate, and is disposed to make a handsome use of the wealth he acquires. Mere saving and sparing (which is the ugliest way to wealth) permits a man to lie in bed as long as most other people, especially in winter, when he saves fire by it; but a gallant acquisition should be as stirring in this respect, as it is in others, and thus render its riches a comfort to it, instead of a means of unhealthy care, and a preparation for disappointment. How many rich men do we not see jaundiced and worn, not with necessary care but superfluous, and secretly cursing their riches, as if it were the fault of the money itself, and not of the bad management of their health? These poor, unhappy, rich people, come at length to hug their money out of a sort of spleen and envy at the luckier and less miserable poverty that wants it, and thus lead the lives of dogs in the manger, and are almost tempted to hang themselves: whereas, if they could purify the current of their blood a little, which, perhaps, they might do by early rising alone, without a penny for physic, they might find themselves growing more patient, more cheerful, more liberal, and be astonished and delighted at receiving the praises of the community for their public spirit, and their patronage of noble institutions. Oh, if we could but get half London up at an earlier hour, how they, and our colleges and universities, and royal academies, &c., would all take a start together; and how the quack advertisements in the newspapers would diminish!

But we must not pretend, meanwhile, to be more virtuous ourselves than frail teachers are apt to be. The truth is, that lying in bed is so injurious to our particular state of health, that we are early risers in self-defence; and we were not always such; so that we are qualified to speak to both sides of the question. And as to our present article, it is owing to a relapse! and we fear is a very dull one in consequence; for we are obliged to begin it earlier than usual, in consequence of being late. We shall conclude it with the sprightliest testimony we can call to mind in favour of early rising, which is that of James the First, the royal poet of Scotland, a worthy disciple of Chaucer, who, when he was kept in unjust captivity during his youth by Henry the Fourth, fell in love with his future excellent queen, in consequence of seeing her through his prison windows walking in a garden at break of day, as Palamon and Arcite did Emilia; which caused him to exclaim, in words that might be often quoted by others out of gratitude to the same hour, though on a different occasion,

"My custom was to rise
Early as day. Oh happy exercise,
By thee I come to joy out of torment!"

See the 'King's quair,' the poem he wrote about it. We quote from memory, but we believe with correctness.

FRANCONIAN TALES.

No. I.

THE SLEEP-WALKER.

About fifty years ago, there lived in the village of Windisch-Abtsdorf, an old bachelor, whose name was Sebastian Holzapfel. He carried on a small trade in iron, and, therefore, was commonly called Ironchops. So many wonderful things were whispered about, concerning his private doings, that people found it rather difficult to say what was true, and what was false. One thing is certain, that he often shut himself up in his room for days together, and then nobody could get access to him but his old servant-maid, who had been with him from a child. No one was able to find out, with any certainty, what he did when his door was locked. Many supposed that he was a coiner and gold-maker; for thick golden smoke often rose from his chimney, and his money was generally new and shining. Others were satisfied that he could raise and lay spirits, for in the evening a dull murmuring noise was often heard in his room, and a blue flame would suddenly start up. In addition to this, one moonshiny night, about twelve o'clock, they saw the figure of a man, with his shirt flickering about him, and his arms stretched out, standing on the gable of his house. Others again asserted, without the smallest hesitation, that he had made a covenant with the Evil One, (God be with us!) for he was often seen at his window with his face quite transformed, and of a blackish-blue colour—first large and then small, and wearing a grey hood, in which he probably hid a pair of horns; and, at other times again, with no head at all.

Now since Procopius, Recorder and Alderman of Constantinople, was not ashamed to accuse the great lawgiver, Justinian, of being no real man, but an incarnate devil, and to assert that his face frequently resembled a raw, shapeless piece of flesh, and that a horrible goblin would be seen in the seat that he had just left, and other neat things of the kind,* Sebastian the ironmonger at Windisch-Abtsdorf, might be proud of falling under the same suspicions as the great Greek Emperor.

On the other hand, persons were not wanting who liked Ironchops, and maintained that he was a God-fearing, excellent, kind-hearted man; that he hurt nobody, went regularly to church, listened to the sermon most attentively, and always put a bright sixpence into the poor's-box, not a red half-penny, like many rich miners; and was very charitable to the poor besides. The children, and pretty girls in particular, who were always very numerous at Windisch-Abtsdorf, would hear nothing against friend Holzapfel; for he would often give nice little children, that he saw in the street, a penny, or a few spice-cakes, from the pocket of his old-fashioned blue coat; and would gladden the heart of a merry girl with a crimson sash, or a silver schilling, from Würzburg. Hence these young folks were extremely grieved, when the news ran through the village one morning, that Ironchops had suddenly died, in the night, of an apoplectic fit. Those who had been wont to speak ill of him, immediately said, that they supposed the Evil One had twisted his neck. But the other party, especially the girls and the children, to whom he was now lost for ever, firmly maintained, that God had meant well with him, in taking him to himself, so quickly and so gently, and making an angel of him. Sebastian, dressed in a long white winding-sheet, with a lemon in his ashy hands, and a neat white cotton nightcap on his head, was now laid out in front of his house, and the priest, clerk, and school-boys, chanted the funeral hymn around his coffin; while his distant relations and smiling heirs, who were expecting good fat legacies, had the greatest difficulty to keep a proper portion of grief on their faces.

And when, after the burial and the funeral sermon, the cousins, friends, aunts, and pall-bearers had assembled in the house of mourning to take a funeral cup, each and every one soon forgot the deceased. They made themselves very comfortable with wine, cake, white bread, and Dutch cheese; and, to say the truth, nothing but fiddles and harps were wanting to make it a regular jollification.

* Procopius of Cæsarea's Secret History, Chap. 12.

But old Anna, the servant of him who was now at rest, took no part in the gaiety of this funeral banquet. She alone was really grieved at the departure of her master, for she alone knew who and what he was.

On the Sunday after the funeral, as Anna was sitting in the afternoon in her quiet and solitary room, she heard a knock at the door, and in came her old neighbours, Goody Kundel and the shoemaker's crooked wife, to console her, as well as to satisfy their curiosity about the life and doings of the deceased. Anna received them very kindly, and made ready for them the hot black drink, for which so many a female mouth waters. While they were comfortably employed in gulping it down, the conversation turned on Sebastian and his way of life. Much was said about him pro and con; at last, Anna could no longer resist her inclination to tell her tale, and so began as follows:—"You know that I have been in this house since I was a child, and was taken in by the mother of the deceased when I was a poor girl. Sebastian was then a child of three years old. I well remember his mother telling me in confidence that, one twilight evening, as she was softly stepping up to the cradle, in which the baby was sleeping, she saw an old and ugly woman standing by it, and touching its face with a fox's tail; but on her entering, the woman left the room and became invisible. From this very hour the child began to alter. He became very odd, grave, and covetous, had no more quiet sleep, and his features looked different from what they used to do. You must remember how he grew up and behaved when he was a young man; and therefore I need not give an account of it.

"When Sebastian's mother was upon her death-bed, she entreated me to stop with her son, who, as I well knew, could not marry; and to take care of him and watch over him as long as I lived. I promised with hand and with mouth that I would, and I have kept my word. I am aware that the wicked world thought and spoke evil of him; but I can assert with a good conscience, that he was neither a gold-maker, nor a coiner, nor a conjurer, nor a devil's playfellow. But you must know that he had the misfortune to be moonstruck, and a sleepwalker. As often as the first quarter of the moon showed itself, and its bright rays came down, Sebastian began to be disturbed in his sleep about midnight. This unquietness increased from night to night, and when the moon's broad face stood full and round in the sky, it was impossible to keep him in bed. He got up, put on his trowsers, wandered up and down his room without saying a word, opened his chests and boxes, and shut them again, without seeing or hearing. When the walking fit was very strong upon him, he would leave his room, and stray into all the passages and corners in the house, (while I followed him with a lamp in my hand) and very often went up the stairs leading to the loft. Here he would swing himself by his hands from one beam to another, and after jumping about for hours together boldly and safely, he would let himself down again as cautiously. Meantime I stood looking on these awful doings with fear and trembling, for certainly the boldest man, if awake, would not have dared the like. He once even slipped out upon the roof, got upon the gable, and stood there, without holding or stumbling, to the amazement of the few who were witnesses of it. But his walking and climbing did not always end without an accident; for the squeaking of a mouse, the flapping of an owl, or the creaking of a board, was able to rouse him out of his sleepy condition. He then was quite frightened and heartless, and often fell down from the rafters, so as to bruise his face and limbs. When he was asleep, and did these dreadful things, he used to shew the most prodigious strength, such as is told of Sampson in the Bible. He would carry several hundred-weight of iron rods on his shoulders out of the iron room, just as if they had been so many vine-props. The great safe that stands here full of heavy tinware, he once lifted up as if it had been a work-box, with one hand, and stuck it before the street door, so that the next morning we could not go out. I was obliged to empty it entirely, and then dragged it into its place with Sebastian's assistance.

"But when the moon began to wane, and his inclination for night-walking began to lessen with it, he felt himself weak and exhausted. He then shut himself up in his room, lay whole days in bed, and would speak to nobody but me. If he had hurt himself by a fall, so as to make his face all blue and yellow, he would pour some brandy into a great spoon, and set it on fire, making a bright blue flame, and then when it was out, and the liquor was cool, he would wash his face with it. He often tied a large cloth round his head, or when his weakness and imbecility were extremely great, he would even put an old carpet over the cloth, so that he seemed to have no head at all. He would then do a great number of strange odd things, and I was obliged to let him be busy his own way. He dealt particularly in old paper, carried great bundles into the kitchen, and made such an immense fire with it, that the yellow suffocating smoke filled the whole house.

"As soon, however, as the days of his fatigue and odd way of life were over, he dressed in his usual style, kept his shop, went out, and was cheerful and sociable. When he took a journey to Bamberg to buy iron, on his return he always brought home something new. He was specially pleased with Bamberg pennies, and Würzburg schillings and dreters, which he never spent, but always gave away, as you know, to boys and girls. He would willingly have married, as he was certainly no enemy to womankind, but he was ashamed of his condition, and afraid that no wife would stay with him. And thus we lived together for many a long year; until a few mornings ago, when, after a night spent in the greatest trouble, I found him dead in bed. May God give him everlasting bliss! He was not a wicked man, and the ill that was spoken of him you may explain to yourselves, from what I have just told you."

Here the talkative Anna ended her speech, to which her friends had listened with the greatest attention. They now thanked her, and took their leave, and Anna was once more alone, and waited for the things that were to happen.

After three days there appeared honest Mr. Moller, the bailiff of the village, the clerk of the court, with paper, ink, and pens, the cousins of Ironchops, and several other persons. The bailiff, after a short preface, sat down to table, and drew out a letter with three seals, telling them that this was the real will of the deceased Sebastian Holzapfel, and opened it. The clerk of the court then read aloud what follows:—

"I, Sebastian Holzapfel, having considered the perishableness of human life and my own weak state of health, and that nothing is more certain than death, or more uncertain than its time, have resolved and decided, I. To make my testament or last will, that I may know what is to become of my things when I am dead, and that no quarrel may arise about them. And what stands in my will is to be, and Mr. Bailiff is to take care that it is so.

"1. Pro primo, and in the first place, I bequeath my body, when it is dead, to the earth, and my soul to God Almighty, that he may receive it into his heavenly kingdom of grace.

"2. In the second place, as to what concerns the disposition of my temporal goods, I will, that Anna Susanne Höferin, my old maid servant, who has been with me many years, and has stayed with me and served me faithfully and truly, is to be the chief heirress of my property, and is to have my house, and all that is in it, and whatever else belongs to me, except what follows:—

"3. To God's house, or the Church of this place, in which I was baptized, and first went to the Lord's table, I leave one hundred light florins to make a silver communion cup, as a perpetual memorial of me.

"4. Our dear Vicar Mr. Westendorfer, who, as I hope, will hold a fine funeral discourse over me, is to have the lamb decata, that are with the other money in the iron chest placed in the great cupboard.

"5. I leave my Godfather, Sebastian Neumeister, the two pony ducats that are in the same place; and also my Sunday clothes, namely, my blue coat with metal buttons, the red waistcoats, and the black velvet breeches. Although they are rather worn in front about the knees, he will be pleased with them. Also he is to have my silver shoe-buckles.

"6. My Godfather's aunt, Elisabeth Barbara Seemanna, who has so often come to me on a Sunday afternoon, and drunk coffee with me, is to have three of my six coffee spoons, and the coffee things; not the new set that I first brought with me from Bamberg a year ago, but the other, in which the milk pot has got a little crack at the top.

"7. To each of my three cousins Von Schnotzenbach, Zeubebried, and Ziegelsambach, I leave five good florins. They may be content with these; as they have not troubled themselves much about me, never invited me to their church ales, and only waited for my death.

"8. Lastly and to conclude, I should have liked to leave something to Mr Bailiff Moltzer, whom I have always held in great esteem, but I don't exactly know what—and I suppose that he will take, of himself, what pleases him.

"These special legacies are to be paid by Anna Susanna, and Mr Bailiff is to put everything in order.

"This is my last Will—Done at Wandisch-Abtsdorf, the 27th of August 1778. Signed by me, Sebastian Holzappel, manu propria."

When the clerk had read all this, the three cousins Schnotzenbach, Zeubebried, and Ziegelsambach made three long faces, and swore that they would not touch cousin Sebastian's beggarly legacy. But when old Anna gave them to understand, that if they thought proper, she was ready to pay five Franconian florins down on the nail, they consulted a bit with one another, pocketed the cash, drank off their ill-humour at a public-house, and returned to the place from whence they had come. Mister Bailiff put everything in order as he was desired, and old Anna enjoyed her well-earned inheritance for many years in peace and solitude. But the memory of Ironchops lives in Windisch-Abtsdorf even to this very day.

FINE ARTS.

1. Portrait of Lady Blessington. Painted by E. T. Parris; engraved by W. Giller. London: J. McCormick; Rittner and Goupil, Paris.

2. Young Female. Painted by E. T. Parris; engraved by Thomas Lupton. J. McCormick; E. Graves.

MR PARRIS is an artist of taste, with considerable feeling for what is beautiful and gentle; but he is apt to overlay the genuine graces of his subject with finery in the costume and accessories, and to blunt the effect of his design by some sentiment implied in the title, which the expression of the picture hardly bears out. The young female in the second of the engravings before us, is a gentle and kind-hearted looking young creature, extremely beautiful withal, caressing a letter; she seems tender and affectionate; but looks too conscious of having spectators, and the superscription we have observed upon some of the impressions demands more lurking passion in the expression. The head, however, is very pleasing, and most tastefully set forth; we wish our female friends would take the head-dress as a model. There are one or two defects in the drawing of the limbs, which injure what would otherwise be graceful. The right fore-arm, for instance, in the girl, is weak; as if it had no bone to support it; and the left arm is long.

The portrait of Lady Blessington is the handsomest we have seen; whether it is the most like we cannot say, never having had the good fortune to see the original. But where graces of mind and person unite, what result may not be expected? The accessories, which, though somewhat closely drawn round the figure, are not inappropriate, are very well touched in. The dress, in particular, is rich, but lightly and delicately handled. It is very nicely engraved.

The Portrait of Horace Smith, in the current volume of 'Colburn's Modern Novelists,' is drawn with feeling, and is undoubtedly like;—the benignity and amenity of the author of 'Brambletye House' are caught; but there is a want of the manly bearing of the original.

BORROWING AND LENDING PERIODICALS, BOOKS, AND UMBRELLAS. — SUGGESTION FOR RETURNING THE SALE OF A JOURNAL OR MAGAZINE. — BOOK-KEEPERS — LANGUAGE. — HINTS ABOUT A UNIVERSAL TONGUE.

THE other day I was requested by a friend to lend him the LONDON JOURNAL to read every week. As I professed to be an admirer and well-wisher of that work, he was astonished at my refusal so to do; and his astonishment swelled into the exclamation, "Indeed!"—when I told him that it was for that very reason I denied him a loan of the paper. Allow me, then, to make public the reasons which moved me to this course of conduct—and which were so effectual that they converted my friend from a borrower, to a buyer of the LONDON JOURNAL.

I have no doubt that many a clever work which would otherwise have had a fair chance of succeeding, and remunerating its conductors, has been ruined by its being borrowed and lent. Let those beneficent beings who are in the practice of regularly lending the periodicals they take in, to a small or large circle of acquaintances, just think, that for every individual to whom they lend a magazine, or journal, they are probably,—I will not say robbing or defrauding,—but certainly wrongfully depriving, the proprietors of that journal of the price thereof—especially if that price be confined within pence. This may appear hard doctrine to be inculcated in the pages of a Journal so full of the milk of human kindness, and so saturated with a desire for the improvement of mankind as yours; but certainly it is true and right. It may be said that it is with a hope of instilling virtue and promoting knowledge, that you lend such a journal; but it has been well said that we may "not do evil, that good may come." Again, it may be said that it is for the purpose of promoting the fame or sale of the journal. But neither of these effects can ensue from the lending system. As to fame, how do you promote it, when by lending, you deprive the journalist of that which is wanted to procure the best matter for his pages? The labourer in the vineyard of literature is as worthy of his hire as the tiller of the earth; and, wherewithal is the overseer to pay the workmen, if those who derive benefit or pleasure from the work, give not the price in exchange thereof? As to the sale—there are few so disinterested, so independently-minded, as to pay for what they can get at the expense of as much breath as will utter a "Thank ye!"

There is a mode of lending which may have a tendency to promote the sale of a work, if judiciously managed. By allowing a friend, for instance, to peruse a first number or so, to tempt him to become a regular subscriber; or by lending a number containing some particularly amusing or well written article, or the first part of some intensely interesting tale, so that he may be induced to buy the following numbers to ascertain the conclusion. A real friend to a periodical would manœuvre in this way to extend its circulation, which would be more effectual than all the plaudits he could bestow upon it. As the curiosity of the ladies is said to be very great (though a friend whispers me he has known men quite as curious), the manœuvre of the unconcluded tale, breaking off just as a dagger is uplifted to pierce some innocent bosom, is the most effectual; they would be dying to know whether the god of romance permitted the weapon to strike, or called forth some champion to arrest the assassin's hand; they would count the hours till the next day of publication to know the event. Nor would such a friend of a periodical labour without his reward. If the work gives him pleasure or information, then will it be for his advantage that it be continued. This may be called honourable selfishness, as it is leavened with the leaven of a desire for the welfare or pleasure of his fellow readers. I hope the readers of the new married pair will take into consideration what I have said, and act as their judgment may suggest.

I would not have my prohibition against lending periodicals extend to the magazines and reviews of high price; there are thousands, indeed the greatest number of readers are, in my opinion, to be found amongst those who cannot spare half-a-crown, three-and-sixpence, or six shillings, but who would willingly, because easily, expend any sum per week within the pence.

Books and umbrellas are two things most frequently borrowed, and least frequently returned; and which remissness is least evilly thought of by the world. If a little more probity were observed in respect both of books and umbrellas, it would manifestly be for the benefit of society in general; for unquestionably a great many more books and umbrellas would be lent, nay, pressed upon the borrower. I cannot help thinking that the case must have been of the latter description in the days of the philanthropist, who inscribed over his library, "Mine and my friends." Now-a-days a communion of books would quickly separate into a variety of small individual libraries. Even the benevolent-minded Sir Walter Scott, who seldom spoke ill of anyone, characterized his friends as "good book-keepers."

When I have happened to be in a speculative mood, it has often occurred to me, that circumstances are revolving towards the establishment of a universal language,—a tongue, different from any that at present exist, yet composed of the essence of them all.

The different modes of expressing thought now used by the different nations of the earth, is the great bar to the general spread of knowledge and civilization; and as the confusion of tongues was the means of scattering mankind, may we not infer that a return to one language will be the precursor of universal happiness, and the re-union of the human race into one great and amicable family?

Several facts have occurred to me as warranting such a conclusion. I may mention, as one, the constant endeavour of conquerors to supersede the language of the vanquished by their own. Also, that wherever the civilized nations of Europe have established colonies, they have engrafted their language. Thus are the few European tongues gradually spreading over the globe, and we may reasonably conclude that these few may, in process of time, amalgamate into one. English, French, and German are so generally spoken, that with a knowledge of the three a man may make himself understood in any civilized part of the world. In the United States of America, the East Indies, and the West India Islands, the English, and very partially, the French and Dutch languages, are the mediums of communication. It is when the traveller enters savage regions, and amongst uncivilized tribes, that the difficulty of communication is found; and then he makes it as great a point of endeavour to leave the natives a knowledge of his language, as for himself to acquire theirs.

The question whether all languages diverged from one source, I conceive to be of less utility than an inquiry into the likelihood of their meeting again. There is good reason to believe this will eventually be the case. The English has been called poor in its powers of expression, and it is also acknowledged that it is made up of many other languages; but if this latter be the case, any one at a loss to express himself in received English has a right to appropriate any foreign word that may answer his purpose. This extensive admixture also renders it most useful as a general means of communication; from which we may infer that it is the beginning of a universal tongue. Since the days of Johnson, thousands of words have been introduced into our language from others, and have been added to the Dictionary by subsequent editors; and there are still thousands which have never been received within the logical pale, but which, nevertheless, are in very extensive use. We may note the gradual amalgamation of languages in the borders of nations; how little difference there is on the two immediate sides of the Tweed, and what a mongrel dialect of English and French is spoken in the Channel Islands. All this tends to support my position; but I leave it to be more fully discussed by those who may be better able to treat the subject argumentatively and philologically. I merely throw out the suggestion, because I have never met with the speculation in any works I have read upon languages.

CHARACTERISTIC SPECIMENS OF THE ENGLISH POETS.

NO. V.—CHAUCEER (CONTINUED).

FURTHER SPECIMENS OF HIS PLEASANTRY AND SATIRE.
THE FAIRIES SUPERSEDED BY THE FRIARS.

CHAUCEER was one of the Reformers of his time, and like the celebrated poets and wits of most countries, Catholic included, took pleasure in exposing the abuses of the church; not because he was an ill-natured man, and disliked the church itself (for no one has done greater honour to the true christian pastor than he, in a passage already quoted), but because his very good-nature and love of truth, made him the more dislike the abuses of the best things in the most reverend places. He measures his satire, however, according to its desert, and is severest upon the severe and mercenary,—the holders of such livings as give no life but rather take it. In the following exquisite banter, he rallies the mere jovial and plebeian part of the church, the ordinary begging-friars, with a sly good-humour. And observe how he contrives to sprinkle the passage with his poetry. The versification also is obviously good, even to the most modern ears.

In oldé dayés of the King Artour,
Of which that Britons spoken great honour,
All was this land fulfill'd of Faéry;
The Elf-queen with her jolly company
Dancéd full oft in many a greene mead,
This was the old opinion as I read;
I speak of many hundred years ago,
But now can no man see none elvés mo;
For now the greaté charity and prayers
Of limiters and other holy freres,
That searchen every land and every stream,
As thick as motte in the sunné beam,
Blessing hallés, chambers, kitchenés, and bowers,
Cities and boroughs, castles high and towers,
Thorpes and barnés, shepénés and dairies,
This maketh that there be no Faeries:
For there as wont to walken was an elf,
There walketh now the limiter himself
In undermealés and in morrowings,
And saith his matins and his holy things
As he go'th in his limitation.
Women may now go safely up and down;
In every bush, and under every tree,
There is no other Incubus but he.

AN IMPUDENT DRUNKEN SELLER OF PARDONS AND INDULGENCES CONFESSES FOR WHAT HE PREACHES.

Lordings, quoth he, in churché when I preach
I painé me to have an hautein speech,

(I do my best to speak out loud.)

And ring it out, as round as go'th a bell,
For I can all by roté that I tell;

(I learn all I say by heart.)

My theme is always one, and ever was,
Radix malorum est cupiditas.

"Covetousness is the root of all evil." Chauceer has fitted his Latin capitally well in with the measure,—a nicety singularly ill observed by poets in general.

First I pronouncé whennés that I come,
And then my bullés

(the Pope's bulls)

shew I, all and some;
Our liegé lord's seal on my patent,
That shew I first, my body to warrant,
That no man be so bold, nor priest, nor clerk,
Me to disturb in Christ's holy work:
And after that, then tell I forth my tales;
Bullés of Popés and of Cardinales,
Of Patriarchs, and of Bishopés, I shew,
And in Latin I speak a wordés few,
To saffron with my predication,

To give a colour and relish to his sermon, like saffron in pastry)—

And for to steer men to devotiön.

The preacher here banter his own relics, and then proceeds with the following ludicrous picture and exquisitely impudent avowal:—

Then pain I me to stretchén forth my neck,
And east and west upon the people I beek,
As doth a dove sitting upon a barn:
My handés and my tongué gone so yearn—

(Go so briskly together)—

That it is joy to see my business.
Of avarice and of such cursedness
Is all my preaching, for to make them free
To give their pence, and NAMELY,—UNTO ME.
For mine intent is nought but for to win,
And nothing for correction of sin;
I reek never, when that they be buried,
Though that their soulés gone a black-berried.

(That is,—though their souls go by bushels into the lower regions, like so many black-berries.)

Therefore—

(repeats he, at the end of the next paragraph, varying the note a little like a relishing musician,—)

Therefore my theme is yet, and ever was,
Radix malorum est cupiditas.

IRONICAL BIT OF TRANSLATION.

In the story of the Cock and the Fox, the gallant bird, who has been alarmed by the fox, is complimenting his favourite wife, and introduces some Latin, the real purport of which is that the fair sex are the "confusion of mankind," but which, he informs her, signifies something quite the reverse. Sir Walter Scott admired this passage.

But let us speak of mirth, and stint all this.

(Stop all this)—

Madamé Partelot, so have I bliss,
Of one thing God hath sent me largé grace,
For when I see the beauty of your face.
Ye be so scarlet red about your eyen,
It maketh all my dreadé for to dien
For all so siker as

(As sure as—)

"In principio

Mulier est hominis confusio;
Madam, the sentence of this Latin is,
"Woman is mannés joy, and mannés bliss."

In principio, mulier est hominis confusio—Woman, from the first, was the confusion of man. "In principio," observes Sir Walter, in a note on the passage in his edition of 'Dryden,' refers to the beginning of Saint John's Gospel. And in a note on the word confusio, he says it is taken from a fabulous conversation between the Emperor Adrian and the philosopher Secundus, reported by Vincent de Beauvais, in his 'Speculum Historiale.' Quid est mulier? Hominis confusio: insaturabilis bestia, &c. What is woman? The confusion of man, &c. "The Cock's polite version (he adds) is very ludicrous."

How pleasant to hear one great writer thus making another laugh, as if they were sitting over a table together, though five centuries are between them. But genius can make the lightest as well as gravest things the property of all time. Its laughs, as well as its sighs, are immortal.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXVIII.—REAL HISTORY OF THE "DUCHESS OF C."

Of which Madame de Genlis has made an episode in her 'Adelaide and Theodore.'

MADAME DE GENLIS saw this lady at Rome, where she was present, for a quarter of an hour, at an entertainment given to a Princess of the House of Bourbon; retiring at the expiration of that time, on account of the shattered state of her health. Though she was but forty-six years old, she looked ten years older; her head and eyes were inclined to the ground, and from time to time she had "attacks of shuddering."

This last circumstance, and the one noticed in Italy at the conclusion of the following account, are affecting evidences of the sufferings she had gone through.

"The Duchess of Cerifalco," says Madame de Genlis, "had the mildness and the piety of an angel. She never knew, nor could any one ever discover, why her barbarous spouse shut her up in the cave. Religion, which is always useful in all things, was the means of saving her life; for the monster, who still preserved some religious sentiments, did not dare to poison her; and when he himself was on his death-bed, he confided to his valet the secret, that for family reasons he had confined in a subterraneous cavern a woman who was at once mad and criminal. He did not acknowledge that this woman was his own wife, who was believed to have been dead for nine years. The valet-de-chambre, on receiving the key of the cavern, went to succour the unfortunate woman, who had wanted food for two days; he knocked in vain at the door—she did not come to receive her bread and water,—she had fainted; the servant entered, gave her the necessary assistance to enable her to get up, recognized her, left her nourishment for several days, and gave her the key of the cavern; but being obliged to remain with the Duke, he sent a courier to Rome to the Prince of Palestrina, with a note from the Duchess, who, in four lines and a half, acquainted him with her existence, and demanded his aid. The Prince, followed by all the members of his family, went to the King of Naples, and related the melancholy history. The King gave him a regiment to escort him to the château of the Duke, in case force should be found necessary. When the Prince of Palestrina arrived, the Duke was still living; he was told, on the part of the Prince, that his crime was known, and that his victim was about to be released; the Duke expired a few hours afterwards. The Prince had preserved most preciously his daughter's note; at my earnest entreaty he showed it me; I gazed a long time at this little bit of paper; the handwriting, the expressions, the words, almost all of which wanted the last syllable—all was precious in my eyes."

Madame de Genlis adds a remark, which she believes has never been before made; to wit, that "in cases where the memory has been lost without any change in the reasoning faculty, it is always the last syllables of the words that are forgotten." She says, that this was the case with Alexander Selkirk, the prototype of Robinson Crusoe; and that she had observed the same phenomenon in a young person who had been blind for fourteen years.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

BURNET, BISHOP OF SALISBURY.

BURNET was a good and hearty-natured man, though somewhat ostentatious of his clerical and political importance, and perhaps too active in politics for a divine. He was tall and stoutly built,—a circumstance which Dryden has turned to his disadvantage in his picture of him as King Buzzard in 'Absalom and Achitophel':—

"A portly prince, and goodly to the sight,
He seemed a son of Anak, for his height,
Like those whom stature did to crowns prefer,
Black-brow'd and bluff, like Homer's Jupiter,
Broad-back'd and brawny-built."

According to more friendly observers, his personal conduct was an epitome of all that was becoming in the episcopal character. "His time, we are told, was employed in one regular and uniform manner: he was a very early riser, seldom in bed later than five or six o'clock in the morning. Private meditation took up the two first hours, and the last half hour of the day. His first and last appearance to his family was at the morning and evening prayers, which he always read himself, though his chaplains were present. He took the opportunity of the tea-table to instruct his children in religion, and in giving them his own comment upon some portion of Scripture. He seldom spent less than six, often eight hours a day, in his study. He kept an open table, in which there was plenty without luxury: his equipage was decent and plain; and all his expenses generous, but not profuse. He was a most affectionate husband to his wives; and his love to his children expressed itself, not so much in boarding up wealth for them, as in giving them the best education. After his sons had perfected themselves in the learned languages, under private tutors, he sent them to the University, and afterwards abroad, to finish their studies at Leydeh. In his friendships he was warm, open-hearted, and constant; and though his station and principles raised him many enemies, he always endeavoured, by the kindest good offices, to repay all their injuries, and overcome them by returning good for evil. He was a kind and bountiful master to his servants, and obliging to all in employment under him. His charities were a principal article of his expense. He gave a hundred pounds at a time for the augmentation of small livings: he bestowed constant pensions on poor clergymen and their widows, on students for their education at the Universities, and on industrious, but unfortunate families: he contributed frequent sums towards the repairs or building of churches and parsonage-houses, to all public collections, to the support of charity schools (one of which, for fifty children at Salisbury, was wholly maintained by him), and to the putting out apprentices to trades. Nor were his aims confined to one nation, sect, or party; but want and merit in the object were the only measures of his liberality. He looked upon himself, with regard to his episcopal revenue, as a mere trustee for the church, bound to expend the whole in a decent maintenance of his station, and in acts of hospitality and charity; and he had so faithfully balanced this account, that, at his death, no more of the income of his bishopric remained to his family than was barely sufficient to pay his debts."

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XIX.—HENRY V.

A more beautiful rhetorical delineation of the effects of subordination in a commonwealth can hardly be conceived than the following:—

"For government, though high and low and lower, Put into parts, doth keep in one consent, Congruing in a full and natural close, Like music.

Therefore heaven doth divide The state of man in divers functions, Setting endeavour in continual motion; To which is fixed as an aim or butt, Obedience: for so work the honey bees— Creatures that by a rule in nature, teach The art of order to a peopled kingdom. They have a king, and officers of sorts Where some, like magistrates, correct at home; Others, like merchants, venture trade abroad; Others, like soldiers, armed in their stings, Make boot upon the summer's velvet buds; Which pillage they with merry march bring home To the tent-royal of their emperor; Who, bustled in his majesty, surveys The singing mason building roofs of gold, The civil citizens kneading up the honey, The poor mechanic porters crowding in Their heavy burdens at his narrow gate; The sad-eyed justice, with his surly hum, Delivering o'er to executors pale The lazy yawning drone. I this infer, That many things, having full reference To one consent, may work contrariously: As many arrows, loosed several ways, Come to one mark; as many ways meet in one town; As many fresh streams meet in one salt sea; As many lines close in the dial's centre; So may a thousand actions, once a-foot, End in one purpose, and be all well borne Without defeat."

Henry V is but one of Shakespeare's second-rate plays. Yet by quoting passages, like this, from his second-rate plays alone, we might make a volume "rich with his praise."

"As is the oozy bottom of the sea With sunken wrack and sumless treasures."

Of this sort are the king's remonstrance to Scroop, Grey, and Cambridge, on the detection of their treason, his address to the soldiers at the siege of Harfleur, and the still finer one before the battle of Agincourt, the description of the night before the battle, and the reflections on ceremony put into the mouth of the king.

"O hard condition; twin-born with greatness, Subjected to the breath of every fool, Whose sense no more can feel but his own wringing! What infinite heart's ease must kings neglect, That private men enjoy? and what have kings, That privates have not too, save ceremony? Save general ceremony? And what art thou, thou idol ceremony? What kind of god art thou, that suffer'st more Of mortal griefs, than do thy worshippers? What are thy rents? what are thy comings-in? O ceremony, show me but thy worth! What is thy soul, O adoration? Art thou aught else but place, degree, and form, Creating awe and fear in other men? Wherein thou art less happy, being feared, Than they in fearing. What drink'st thou oft, instead of homage sweet, But poison'd flattery? O, be sick, great greatness, And bid thy ceremony give thee cure! Think'st thou, the fiery fever will go out With titles blown from adulation? Will it give place to flexure and low bending? Can'st thou, when thou command'st the beggar's knee, Command the health of it? No, thou proud dream, That play'st so subtly with a king's repose, I am a king, that find thee: and I know, 'Tis not the balm, the sceptre, and the ball

The sword, the mace, the crown imperial, The enter-tissu'd robe of gold and pearl, The farmed title running 'fore the king, The throne he sits on, nor the tide of pomp That beats upon the shore of the world— No, not all these, thrice-gorgeous ceremony, Not all these, laid in bed majestical, Can sleep so soundly as the wretched slave; Who, with a body fill'd, and vacant mind, Gets him to rest, cramm'd with distressful bread, Never sees horrid night, the child of hell; But, like a laquey, from the rise to set, Sweats in the eye of Phoebus, and all night Sleeps in Elysium; next day, after dawn, Doth rise, and help Hyperion to his horse; And follows so the ever-running year With profitable labour, to his grave: And, but for ceremony, such a wretch, Winding up days with toil, and nights with sleep, Has the forehand and vantage of a king. The slave, a member of the country's peace, Enjoys it; but in gross brain little wots, What watch the king keeps to maintain the peace, Whose hours the peasant best advantages."

Most of these passages are well known: there is one which we do not remember to have seen noticed, and yet it is no whit inferior to the rest in heroic beauty. It is the account of the deaths of York and Suffolk.

"EXETER. The Duke of York commends him to your majesty.

K. HENRY. Lives he, good uncle? thrice within this hour, I saw him down; thrice up again, and fighting; From helmet to the spur all blood he was.

EXETER. In which array (brave soldier) doth he lie,

Larding the plain; and by his bloody side (Yoke-fellow to his honour-owing wounds) The noble Earl of Suffolk also lies.

Suffolk first died: and York all haggled o'er, Comes to him, where in gore he lay insteep'd, And takes him by the beard; kisses the gashes, That bloodily did yawn upon his face; And cries aloud—Tarry, dear cousin Suffolk! My soul shall thine keep company to heaven: Tarry, sweet soul, for mine, then fly a-breast; As, in this glorious and well-foughten field, We kept together in our chivalry!

Upon these words I came, and cheer'd him up: He smil'd me in the face, caught me his hand, And, with a feeble gripe, says—Dear my lord, Commend my service to my sovereign. So did he turn, and over Suffolk's neck He threw his wounded arm, and kissed his lips; And so, espous'd to death, with blood he seal'd A testament of noble-ending love."

But we must have done with splendid quotations. The behaviour of the king, in the difficult and doubtful circumstances in which he is placed, is as patient and modest as it is spirited and lofty in his prosperous fortune. The character of the French nobles is also very admirably depicted; and the Dauphin's praise of his horse shows the vanity of that class of persons in a very striking point of view. Shakespeare always accompanies a foolish prince with a satirical courtier, as we see in this instance. The comic parts of 'Henry V' are very inferior to those of 'Henry IV.' Falstaff is dead, and without him, Pistol, Nym, and Bardolph, are satellites without a sun. Fluellen the Welshman is the most entertaining character in the piece. He is good-natured, brave, choleric, and pedantic. His parallel between Alexander and Harry of Monmouth, and his desire to have "some disputations" with Captain Macmorris on the discipline of the Roman wars, in the heat of the battle, are never to be forgotten. His treatment of Pistol is as good as Pistol's treatment of his French prisoner. There are two other remarkable prose passages in this play: the conversation of Henry in disguise with the three centinels on the duties of a soldier, and his courtship of Katherine in broken French. We like them both exceedingly, though the first savours perhaps too much of the king, and the last too little of the lover.

TABLE TALK.

THE VENERABLE DOUBLES.

The climate of Montreux is the softest in Switzerland; and of all the churchyards we had ever seen in our wanderings, no one overlooks such various and delicious scenery. It is not more distinguished for the attraction of its site, than for the singular excellence of the aged minister who has so long exercised in it his pastoral care. Monsieur — the learned curé of the village, is ninety-six years of age, and still preaches every Sabbath in his secluded church, with an eloquence that the approach to a century of years has not abated. He has resided many years in England, as tutor to a lady of high rank; and about fifty years since he returned to take charge of his present flock. Patronage has been heaped on him from England; but though his income is handsome, he preserves the utmost simplicity of life, and a charm and amiableness of manners that seem to belong to a purer age and scene than to the valley of tears through which he has nearly passed. His hair is not thin, and as white as the snow of his own mountains; and his large light eye is yet full of fire; nor is its sight dim. The power of his memory is but little impaired, as is evident by the animation that spreads over his impressive features, when engaged in conversation that interests him. To relieve the wants of his people, and to labour for their spiritual good, are the chief pleasures of this curé. It is a singular circumstance that Monsieur — has a twin brother, who is also a minister and preacher, and bears his age of ninety-six with equal vigour, though of a less strong and accomplished mind than the pastor of Montreux. They are so exactly alike in size and feature, that even their friends have sometimes been at a loss to distinguish one from the other. The most ludicrous scenes have sometimes occurred from this strange resemblance. When one brother has taken a walk along the high-road to the neighbouring town or villages, peasants, who were perfect strangers to the two curés, have been struck by meeting so venerable and impressive a personage, and in the course of a few miles after, have beheld, apparently, the same being, with the same dress, features, and manner, as the one who had previously passed, advancing full upon them. They have sometimes looked on in mute terror, or else taken to their heels out of the way, while the pastor passed on to join his relative.—Carné's Letters from Switzerland and Italy, p. 164.

PETRARCH A DANDY IN HIS YOUTH.

Petrarch and his brother resided at Avignon, and became the favourites and companions of the ecclesiastical and lay nobles who formed the papal court, to a degree which, in aftertimes, excited Petrarch's wonder; though the self-sufficiency and ardour of youth then blinded him to the peculiar favour with which he was regarded. His talents and accomplishments were, of course, the cause of this distinction; besides that his personal advantages were such as to prepossess everyone in his favour. He was so handsome as frequently to attract observations as he passed along the streets. His complexion was between dark and fair; he had sparkling eyes, and a vivacious and pleasing expression of countenance. His person was rather elegant than robust; and he increased the gracefulness of his appearance by a sedulous attention to dress. "Do you remember," he wrote to his brother Gerard, many years after, "our white robes, and our chagrin when their studied elegance suffered the least injury, either in the disposition of their folds, or in their spotless cleanliness? Do you remember our tight shoes, and how we bore the tortures which they inflicted, without a murmur? and our care lest the breezes should disturb the arrangement of our hair?"—Lives of Eminent Italians.

MOORISH LITERARY RE-UNIONS.

In the winter time the evening parties are more frequent and more regular than in summer. A learned alfaquir of Toledo was accustomed in the months of December and January to assemble thirty or forty men of letters every evening. In the centre of this hall there was a great vase of the height of a man, full of burning charcoal, and all around were spread carpets and cushions of silk and wool, and the walls were lined with figured stuffs. Each sat at the distance he best liked from the fire, and a hispe or verse from the Koran, or some new and favourite poem, was read and discussed. Meantime perfumes were handed round and rose-water sprinkled on the guests; after which a table was brought in, on which were various dishes of mutton and kid, and stews, with oil: then followed different preparations of milk, boiled or frothed, butter, sweetmeats, and fruit. The drink of such as did not transgress the Koran, was sherbet of various kinds. The most usual was that like our lemonade; but it was often flavoured with other fruits besides lemons, and even flowers.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ATTENTION shall be paid to the address mentioned by Mr B. in his obliging letter. We have not seen the posthumous paper he speaks of.

We shall insert with pleasure the 'Dialogue between a Customer and a Sculptor,' provided we have leave to omit one or two passages not quite congenial with our very considerate pages.

The book has been left at Mr Hooper's for Mr P., as desired.

SKETCHES OF BERMUDA.

Sketches of Bermuda. By Susette Harriet Lloyd, with maps and plates. 1 vol. 8vo. London. Cochrane and Co.

This little volume is the production of a young lady, who, in addition to very amiable feelings, has some talent for observation and description. She does not tell us all we should wish to know on the subject, but our recent information respecting the Bermudas is so scanty, that we feel thankful for any addition to it. Miss Lloyd sailed from England in the summer of 1829, and seems to have remained eighteen months among the islands. Though small and comparatively obscure, and out of the high roads of navigation, this group has been singularly fortunate in poetical associations, which have a power to make even barren rocks beautiful. Shakespeare speaks of the islands in the 'Tempest,' as "the still vexed Bermoothes," for in his time they had not been long discovered, and seamen incorrectly described them as being vexed by continual storms or violent currents; the mellifluous Waller, who seems to have lived some time upon them, much improved their character, and devoted many verses to them under the name of the 'Summer Isles;' and nearly at the same period the honest old patriot, and good old poet, Andrew Marvel, sang of

"Where the remote Bermudas ride
In the ocean's bosom."

In our own days, Mr Thomas Moore has resided there, and celebrated the islands in some of the sweetest of his verses. Now all this we call being in luck. Miss Lloyd thus describes the situation and general form of the Bermudas:—

"They lie in 32° 20' N. Lat. 64° 50' W. Long.; and are between six and seven hundred miles from Cape Hatteras, in North Carolina, the nearest point of land.

"They form an isolated Archipelago, which rises like a speck in the Atlantic, and are the work of that industrious little island-building zoophyte, the coral worm, which, by its unwearying perseverance, has accomplished works of such vast magnitude. Above this coral foundation lies a thick stratum of sand and shells, which, by the operation of the air, forms the indurated sand-stone of which the surface of the island is chiefly composed. They are encircled by an elliptical belt of coral reefs, which at its inner circumference measures about twenty-seven miles at the largest axis, and fourteen at the smallest. It is said that there are as many islands as there are days in the year, but of these the greater number are so small, that they have neither name nor inhabitants.

"The principal are St George's, the chief military station of the colony, and formerly the capital; Bermuda, or the main island, the present seat of government; Somerset, and Ireland, in which last are the dock-yards, convict-ships, &c. These, with very little interruption, form a continued chain, which runs from north-east to south-west, in the outline of a shepherd's crook, the convex side of which lies towards the S.W. and W. The whole occupies a space of fifteen to twenty miles in a straight line, but it is considerably more measured round the curve. St George's is three miles and a half in length, Bermuda fifteen, Somerset three, and Ireland three. The breadth of the chain, in its widest part, is two miles, and in the narrowest, not above one-eighth of a mile. Of this chain, St George's lies at the eastern, and Somerset and Ireland at the western extremity.

"The minor islands are St David's, Cooper's, Smith's, Longbird, Nonesuch, &c., and they everywhere form numerous picturesque creeks and bays, some of which are very large and deep, such as the Great Sound, Castle Harbour, Harrington Sound &c."

Upon this narrow ridge, which has been slowly raised above the level of the mighty ocean, and then partially covered with soil, grass, herbs, fruit trees, and lofty cedars, there exists a prosperous, fixed population of more than eleven thousand souls, independently of fifteen hundred convicts, and the troops in garrison, which are changed from time to time. At the period of Miss Lloyd's visit, the slave inhabitants amounted to 3,920, which was rather more than half of the number of the white and free-coloured fixed population. She did not think that there were above three or four native Africans among the slaves, all the rest being born in Bermuda. From a charge delivered by the Chief Justice, in May 1830, it appeared that there were four hundred inhabitants for every square mile. Our authoress found the character of the Bermudians to be kind and humane, and (for slavery had not then been most nobly abolished), she says that their slaves enjoyed many advantages and comforts, which the poor of our own country are frequently destitute of. The poor negroes have always fared worst where there are mines or sugar plantations:—in Bermuda there are neither; and consequently they were employed in light agricultural or mechanical labour, but principally as domestic servants. They seem to be a merry set—very fond of music, and by no means stupid. We should enjoy, of all things, to hear one of these sable Chansoniens sing 'I'd be a butterfly!'

"Their Gombey parties are preceded by really tolerable bands, composed of negroes dressed in a neat white uniform with scarlet facings. These musicians are all self-taught, and play many favourite airs with great accuracy. This is the more surprising since they do not know a single note in music. They learn and play everything by ear, and certainly have great natural taste and love for music. When engaged about their work, or walking along the road, they generally beguile the time with a song; and in the evening you frequently hear the sounds of a flute or violin from a negro cottage. Many also possess the talent of extemporaneous composition, which they exercise in finding words for Di piacer, and various Italian airs. Others content themselves with singing the last new song, and 'I'd be a butterfly,' and 'Oh, no, we never mention her,' were beginning to be general favourites."

"There is a black woman here who ranks high as an improvisatrice; every important event, everyone who is so unfortunate as to incur her displeasure, is made the subject of her verse. * * * These verses are, of course, very uncouth, but possess a great deal of wit."

We would gladly give up the reading, for a twelvemonth, of all the poetry that may appear in magazines, annuals, and albums, provided we could but have our ears tickled with some of this negro improvisation,—some of these Africa-English verses. A few years ago, the Bible Society, not much to the credit of their own good judgment, seeing that the effect they thereby produced was altogether different from what they proposed, presented to the world most copious printed specimens of Negro-English prose, which was certainly the funniest and most irresistibly laughable hybrid of a language it was ever our fortune to meet with!

In spite of strong prejudices, and a certain degree of opposition on the part of the white Bermudians, even in Miss Lloyd's time they had begun to impart the blessings of education to the negroes and half castes, and had established free-schools and infant-schools for them. She says,—

"This blessing is now imparted to nearly a thousand persons, in which number I do not include those who are educated in the schools under the dissenters, some of which are very flourishing."

On occasion of the visitation of a Bishop from our American colonies, Miss Lloyd saw the examination of one of these Negro schools.

"On Wednesday, after examining a White free-school in our parish, the Bishop visited our Negro-infant school, accompanied by Doctor Spencer and Mr Wix, Archdeacon of Newfoundland. It presented a spectacle no less interesting to the eye than gratifying to the heart. Above seventy children were present, some not more than two years old, all arranged in classes. The girls wore their neat pink frocks, with a gaily coloured handkerchief tastefully folded round the head, while their dark expressive eyes and sable countenances, added a high degree of interest to their appearance in the eyes of the European. The school-room was prettily ornamented with flowering branches of the pride of India and Palmetto: and when this little band joined in the morning hymn, and knelt down to receive the good Bishop's benediction, I cannot describe the feelings which this scene excited. The children went through their lessons extremely well, and his lordship expressed himself delighted with their proficiency, and with the novelty of the system, this being the first infant-school he had ever seen."

We hope Miss Lloyd makes some mistake in saying the Bishop had never seen an infant school before; but, to continue, in her own words:—

"I feel an encouraging hope, that this, and similar institutions, will lead to a gradual, but sure amelioration in the condition and character of the negro and coloured population, and prepare them for a right use of that emancipation, which all feel cannot be far distant." (This, it must be remembered, was written in 1830) * * * "But there is a shade that dims this pleasing picture, which, I trust, will gradually vanish before the enlightening influence of instruction—I mean the petty pilfering which is so common among the negroes, and which, until lately, was looked upon by very many as a perfectly venial offence. There is, however, an increasing conviction of its guilt, and the open effrontery with which it was formerly practised, and the systematic prevarication to which the negroes resorted, when detected, are now everyday becoming less frequent. I was pleased to hear from the Bishop, that he had been assured by persons, who formerly considered it a matter of course that a large portion of their poultry would be stolen from them, that in the last three years, during which period greater attention had been paid to the instruction of the slaves, they had not lost a single fowl. * * * I can only say, that I have never missed a single article of any description, though my room was so situated as to be accessible to anyone who might feel disposed to enter the open door, and carry off whatever might be lying about."

Well! thanks to the principles and exertions of the more liberal of our two great political parties which has predominated during the last four or five years, the great measure of Negro emancipation has been carried, and evidently sooner than our authoress expected. We thank her for showing how the slaves were being prepared to take their rank as free-men, but we wish that she had staid longer, and could have told us from her own experience and observation, how they have behaved themselves since they were suddenly made free. We are the more particular in this wish, as there are peculiar circumstances attending the measure in the Bermudas, where the emancipation was indeed sudden, and carried into full effect at once; it having been determined to discard altogether the system of apprenticeship, and to give entire and unconditional freedom to the whole body of slaves. Miss Lloyd says in her preface,

"The local legislature was enabled to take so decisive a step with confidence and safety, partly because the mitigated form of slavery which prevailed here, could not generate such reciprocal feelings of acrimony or distrust as may have been awakened in the sugar colonies, and also because experience had proved that a judicious system of moral and religious instruction had exercised a beneficial influence on the character and conduct of the slaves."

Perhaps the fair authoress ought to have mentioned the relative numbers of blacks and whites as among the facilitating causes. In the Bermudas, without counting the garrison, there are about two whites to one black; in several of the West Indian islands there are two and more blacks to one white, including the soldiery from Europe, and all other classes; and in Jamaica the slaves are to the rest of the population as seven to one.

Miss Lloyd's account of the productions of the island, its trade, its exports and imports, is rather incomplete, and, we have reason to believe, in some respects incorrect. On the other hand, her sketches of the beautiful scenery, whether done by pen or pencil, are very graceful and pleasing. The three views introduced in her volume are executed in a style very superior to that of the generality of small aqua-tinta plates, and give a delicious notion of the prospects of the narrow islands in which water is always blended with land, snow-white sails with luxuriantly green trees. Above all things, we most admire the delightful, sweet-smelling Bermuda cedar, which timber is so abundant that they build ships, and boats, and houses of it, and burn it in their do-metlic fires. Miss Lloyd says that it is impossible to conceive anything more delicious than a cedar fire!

"The lofty cedar, which to heaven aspires,
The prince of trees! is fuel for their fires;
The smoke, by which their loaded spits do turn,
For incense might on sacred altars burn;
Their private roofs, on od'rous timber borne,
Such as might palaces for kings adorn."

WALLER.

SOMETHING NEW IN POETRY.

Poems by Albius. London. Churton. 1835. 12mo. pp. 26.

'THE Poems of Albius,' to adopt the title which the author places at their head, are productions as unlike ordinary modern poetry, as Albius is unlike the generality of modern names. To judge both by this appellation which he has assumed, and by the subjects on which he has expended his greatest efforts, the author seems to intend that we should take him for a sort of modern addition to the Delphin Classics, or one of the old Romans come alive again, rather than a bard properly belonging to these degenerate times. We may remark, too, that although he has thought proper, in partial accommodation to existing usages, to write in a modern dialect, his English, or what seems to be such, is of a singularly original description, and might really pass very well for that of a person who had merely acquired a little of the language by a few week's practice, after having dropt from the clouds, or lain in his grave for the last two thousand years.

The first of the 'Poems of Albius' is entitled an 'Elegy to Sappho,' and opens in the following striking manner:—

"Famed Heloise, by all the world admired,
The Maidens influenced, and the Bards inspired,
To laud her merit, and inscribe her tomb,
Pity the Lovers, and lament their doom.

Then why is Sappho's 'well-known name' to sleep
With her lost frame in the Leucadian deep?—
Is it because no Abelard could raise
A column worthy to record her praise?
Or is it that her soul, too rashly brave,
Preferred a watery to an earthly grave?"

The reasons here suggested to account for the oblivion into which "Sappho's well known name" is assumed to have fallen, are all but as capital in their way as that assumption itself. In particular, the reader will admire the poetic invention displayed in the novel notion that a monumental column was raised to Heloise by Abelard, who died more than twenty years before her.

In the next lines, the agitation of both the verse and the grammar finely betrays the poet's growing fervour:—

"No abbey she aspired to raise, no solemn state,
No maidens govern, or harsh rules dictate;
No mitred preachers to extol her fame,
Her deeds to gloss, and sanctify her shame;
But a great soul that meanness did disdain,
And thus neglected, sought the Lesbian main."

This, however, is merely preparatory. The author having thus cleared his throat, now takes up his story from the beginning, and proceeds to inform us that Sappho, "by nature gifted with a noble mind, and splendid talents with the same combined," "at length became the slighted object (as he poetically phrases it, for subject) of a fatal flame." The inspiration now comes very strong upon him. "Apollo's temple," he exclaims, in a strain of sublimity, in which we confess he soars far beyond our power of accompanying him, —

"now her image bears,
And Lesbos still her sable garment wears.
Leucadian rocks shall mourn her hapless fate,
And my inscription shall record the date."

Above twenty lines are then devoted to a most emphatic assertion of the fact, that this great poetess has never yet had her epitaph written. The following are half-a-dozen of them:—

"Many centuries now have passed away,
Long tedious nights, and each revolving day,
Without a line on the wide earth to state
Her early doom, or to perpetuate
A name renowned in all the works of art,
As skilled in music as in learning great."

This, by the by, seems to be precisely Albius's own case. The skill in the music of verse shown in this last couplet, would almost entitle us to say that he is "himself the great sublime he draws." That he is "as skilled in music as in learning great," the conclusion of the Elegy again abundantly proves:—

"The task shall hence be my peculiar care.
This little merit Albius now will claim,
And raise a tablet to her honoured fame.

(An ordinary writer, for the sake both of the rhyme and the reason, would have said fame here; but the other word is more characteristic of the curiosa felicitas of our author.)

And soon shall Phaon climb Leucadia's height,
To seek his Sappho in the realms of night;
Soon shall regret his proud and cruel disdain,
And join his mistress in the watery main."

The word cruel, commonly reckoned a dissyllable, is, we believe, uniformly pronounced as a monosyllable by Albius. Thus, for instance, a few pages after:—

"Who cruelly (pronounce, cruelly) thus requites her generous flame."

This line is taken from a long Epistle from Phaon to Sappho, of which, however, it must be our only sample. Nor can we do more than notice an intermediate effusion, entitled, 'Elegy to Hector, concluded with an Epitaph,' in which it is said of that hero, that

"His might and prowess everywhere proclaimed
The chief who only by a God was armed."

With a similar easy flow of metre, the Epitaph begins as follows:—

"— By Albius' hand was raised
This simple tablet to the hero's praise."

An Epistle from Dido to Æneas must also be passed over. The descriptive eloquence of the Carthaginian Queen is, in some passages, much too ardent for our sober pages. The letter, however, seems to have produced a powerful effect on the nerves of poor Æneas. In his answer (also here given) he screams out on sight of it in an agony of terror:—

"But what's this dread epistle which I see,
All stained with gore, and sent express from thee?
My Dido's name the superscription bears,
And harrows up my soul with conscious fears:
Its harsh contents my daring mind subdues,
Unfits me quite to meet my hostile foes."

After this comes an Epistle from Corinna to Ovid, dated Pisa, 3rd February 1830. She "concludes," says our author, "by expressing her unalterable attachment to him in the most glowing colours." Here is the glowingly-coloured passage in question:—

"If not, at least, my last request attend,
And on my tomb my mournful theme shall end:
'Here the wronged mistress of false Ovid lies,
By his disdain she fell a sacrifice
To dire despair, and all-consuming grief,
When him, and only him, could give relief:
But death more kind, did her complaint remove,
And sent her early to the ethereal grove."

An ode to (or rather, against) Achilles, which follows, ends with an inscription for the Statue in Hyde Park, which the pious and poetical author looks upon to be a very shocking performance indeed. "This massive pile," he indignantly exclaims,

"— is to commemorate
The savage hero of the Grecian state,
Whose brutal courage to the world is known,
And deeds ascribed that never were his own;
The indelicate posture of whose effigy,
And immodest state of shameless nudity,
Bespeak a want of common decency,
To grace or figure not the least pretence,
Devoid of meaning—still more void of sense."

Not satisfied with this torrent of eloquent verse, the writer resumes the subject in a long note in prose. "Ovid," he remarks, "in his writings on this subject, with the exception of myself, has been the only author who has yet dared to unmask this invincible son of Thetis." He will allow poor Achilles no merit in anything. "His sallying out at last," he argues, "to meet Hector, appears to have been wholly instigated by a direful thirst of revenge for the loss of his friend Patroclus, who, according to the chances of war, was as liable to fall as another man, and which common occurrence a great mind would soon have reconciled." Nay, even the courage of this celebrated personage, Albius earnestly insists, was very far from being what it has been generally accounted. "His impenetrable armour," he argues, "and enormous spear gave him a decided advantage over his antagonist; for it appears that Hector's lance was broken in pieces, against the shield of Achilles, early in the contest, and consequently he had nothing but his side-arms left to defend himself against the unequal weapon of his exulting foe. During the martial glory and success of Hector, the 'great Pelides,' never once attempted to emulate his achievements, or put himself in his way, or I am fully persuaded that the fate of Greece would have terminated under less auspicious circumstances."

The hottest of our author's wrath, however, is poured out against what he calls the "preposterous statue." We decline transcribing all the strong expressions he uses on this subject—but his concluding accusation against the statue is so curious that we must give it. "It is," he says, after calling it every thing else best fitted to excite our aversion, "a complete outrage of public decency, by the pretended guardians of public morals, and but for which it is probable that this poem would never have appeared."

A sort of new Iliad and Æneid in one, which is next presented to us, under the title of 'The Siege of Troy, Destruction of Troy, and Foundation of the Roman Empire' is too long an affair for our examination at present. We can only state that the object of the Poem is, in the words of the author, "to more clearly and distinctly point out the cause and historical facts connected with the Trojan wars, than those recorded in the works of Homer."

The latter part of the volume contains a few pieces on modern subjects. One is called 'An Hour in Kensington Gardens,' and begins thus:—

"Majestic and neglected pile,
The monarch's famed retreat;
The fairest of the British isle,
And once the royal seat."

This is addressed to what the author calls "the venerable palace," in comparison with which he seems to think Windsor a very modern structure. "Forsaken," he goes on,

"Forsaken and deserted now
Are thy enchanting bowers;
Thy garland plucked to grace the brow
Of Windsor's lofty towers.

Altho' the wreck of former days,
By various tempests tost,
Thy ancient grandeur yet displays
The state thou then couldst boast."

If in future days, however, a good and great monarch should arise, and restore the state to its ancient happiness and grandeur, he prophesies that

"Then Kensington once more,
Her regal palace shall behold
In all its days of yore,"—

whatever that may signify.

'The Farewell and Departure of Albius,' the next of these pieces, is a somewhat ambitious performance, being no less than an attempt to throw into the shade the well-known 'Farewell' of Lord Byron—as is pretty plainly intimated in the opening lines:—

"Like that great bard, whom late the world admired,
Whose ardent mind seraphic subjects fired,
I little thought when first he said "farewell,"
That I myself should the same story tell:
When to his country last he bade adieu,
That I so soon should that farewell renew."

The cause that sent Albius abroad was, it seems, "great pecuniary losses, which he sustained by his purse and services to pretended friends," as he puts it in prose,—or, as he sings in still more impressive prosody:—

"At my own loss I've others' interests raised,
And my reward has been but empty praise."

To use his own language on another occasion, we should have thought that such a common occurrence as this was one "which a great mind would soon have reconciled;" but he takes on about it in the most distressing way, pouring out his soul in the following, among other passionate exclamations:—

"No more my verse in tuneful numbers flow,
My lute's strung now to elegies of woe;
No more will I inscribe to fruitless Fame,
Though science henceforth may record my name.
Friendship, adieu! Society I disclaim,
And no more know mankind than by the name.
The sacred Nine already chide my stay,
My Goddess muse cries, "Albius haste away!"
Farewell, ye charming bightingales that sing
Notes to my verse, fair Goddess of the Spring!
I could have once sung out a summer's day,
But now the inspiring charm is done away;
My notes no longer will assist my rhyme,
And anguish quickens on the brink of time.
My numbers here in painful accents glide,
My song is done—my harp I lay aside.
Let those few friends who strove my wounds to heal,
Accept my thanks, and this, my last farewell:
Thro' stormy seas, to distant climes I'll rove,
And pace my journey to the ethereal grove."

This was in the end of 1825. However, by the very next poem, we find that, for all his melancholy resolves, our author's exile wanted the consolations neither of song nor of love. "Near Ingouville," he chants,

"within a grove
Where once I did retire,
The world to shun, in woods to rove,
And tune the sacred lyre;—

"The first and subject of my verse,
The country I had left," &c.

"When to the winds I told my tale," &c.

"Beneath the shade a goddess sat,
More fair than Venus she,
Who often listened to my lute,
And kindly smiled on me."

This kind lady, after a few fine speeches, fairly makes him an offer of her hand:—

"Accept the hand of an unknown fair,
Though stranger as thou art;
For ever live in quiet here,
And meet a generous heart."

We are sorry to have to relate so discreditable a termination to so interesting a love tale; but after telling us of the many pleasant days they continued to pass together after this frank declaration, our author adds:—

"But mortal joys are transient, vain," &c.

"For cruel fate had me forbade
This lovely fair to wed;
At length with grief the blissful shade,
The charming spot I fled."

We must say that, since the famous flight of Horace, we do not remember to have seen any running away so very coolly recorded.

But we must bring our account of this very remarkable volume to a close. The last poem we shall notice is entitled 'The Indispensable Requisites and Qualifications for an Accomplished Poet, with the best rules for acquiring that sublime study.' We may safely say, that nothing which had been previously written upon the art of poetry had anticipated anything we have here. The writer evidently looks to nature alone. In such lines as the following, with which we shall conclude our extracts, it is easy to see who has been his "great example":—

"No precept, rule, or beaten tracts of time
Can give the force and harmony of rhyme;
Untaught, untaught, is the poet's verse,
Who with the Muses only would converse."

"One timely bred to serve the Sacred Nine,
In verse instructed by a Bard divine:
Who from a sylvan Goddess dates his name,
And early traced the rugged paths of Fame:
In Science' temple his first theme begun,
And one acknowledged born the Muse's son.
(The bard without which his rank unjustly claim,
And only lives a poet by the name.)
One in whose breast the softest passions glow,
And soul from which the finest feelings flow;
A modest choice, mixt with a taste refined,
And talent far above the vulgar mind.
One who the Muses' honour will sustain,
Low wit contemn, and little minds disdain:
One whose chaste style and language both agree,
And such a being should the poet be."

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF GARDENING.

An Encyclopedia of Gardening. By J. C. Loudon.
New Edition. 8vo. London. 1835. Pp. 1310.

If the ear should be struck with a momentary feeling of something like incongruity in the unaccustomed collocation of a name so redolent of nature and primitive life as Gardening, with so learned a term as Encyclopedia, let it be remembered that gardening is, after all, the eldest of the sciences, and, as such, is surely well entitled to be associated with the most learned term we can find for it. Till lately, indeed, in our foolish contempt for the "common things that round us lie," we did not recognize it as a science at all—hardly even as an art. It would have been thought strange to speak of the trainer of fruit-trees, or even of the disposer of parterres, as an artist. And the eldest of the sciences, in the orthodox creed, is not Gardening, but Astronomy. Yet, although both are no doubt of most respectable antiquity, we have no warrant either in prose or verse, for carrying the birth of the latter quite to so high a date as that of the former. When our first great ancestor in Eden inquired of the Archangel respecting the celestial motions, his curiosity, if we may trust the account of Milton, was rather repressed than encouraged:—

"Solicit not thy thoughts with matters hid;
Leave them to God above; him serve, and fear!
Of other creatures, as him pleases best,
Wherever placed, let him dispose; joy thou
In what he gives to thee, this Paradise
And thy fair Eve; Heaven is for thee too high
To know what passes there; be lowly wise."

It was reserved for the shepherd sages of Chaldea, after the world was many ages old, to be the fathers of Astronomy; the father of Gardening was the father of mankind—aye, and its mother was also the mother of all of us—

"Eve
Rose and went forth among her fruits and flowers,
To visit how they prospered, bud and bloom,
Her nursery; they at her coming sprung,
And touched by her fair tendance gladlier grew."

However, the two are not sciences that ought either to quarrel about precedence, or to have any other feelings towards each other than those of affection. They may be said to be of kin through the common blood of a poetry which is denied to the other sciences. For as the stars have been called "the poetry of heaven," so may the flowers, and the fruits too, of our gardens, be appropriately styled the poetry of earth. Of both sciences the nature and ends are mainly connected with those capacities of our being that yearn after something more and higher than either the necessary or the convenient. They both carry us away out of sense into sentiment—out of the visible into the visionary. Important as are some of the practical applications of Astronomy, such mere utilities respect only a small portion of the field of that vast science. Of by far the greater number of its soaring abstractions the whole result and purpose can only be described as being to exercise some of the noblest faculties of the intellect—to gratify the desire of knowledge for its own sake—to help the wings of the imagination, which in that endless starry maze, and those far depths of blue, finds one of the regions in the universe of thought in which it loves most to range and lose itself. The scope of the science of Gardening, it must be confessed, is not so lofty. The poetry that is in it is of a humbler and more familiar character. It has more to do with the affections than with the imagination. Yet the gardener is a poet of his kind, and every garden is a true poem, in which blossoms, and fragrance, and green leaves, not ill supply the place of glowing imagery and tuneful words. Even the smallest flower-plot beside the cottage door, is it not like a lamp of celestial light hung up to brighten the prose of ordinary life to parent and child, upon whom it smiles in their going out and in their coming in? And in all cases where a dwelling-house and a garden are associated, whatever the former—the creation as it is the shelter of our coarser needs and desires,—may suggest to the mind of what is more earthy in our humanity, is taken off and relieved by the less artificial character of the latter, by the predominance in it of the ornamental and the beautiful over mere physical serviceableness. In the house, grace and decoration, though by no means excluded, are yet throughout kept in subordination to the useful and convenient; in the garden it is the reverse—here, as in every other poetical creation, beauty sits queen—in that spirit everything is shaped—by that everything is animated—the useful or commodious only comes in as supplementary, and where it does not interfere with the other which is the reigning principle.

As might have been expected from its high pretensions, Gardening has not been without its literature, either in other countries or in our own. But we believe we may safely say, that nothing has been written upon the subject in any country or language, that can be compared for completeness, for accuracy, for enlarged views, with the admirable work now before us. Indeed, we have few treatises upon any art or science that deserve to be placed beside this Encyclopedia of Gardening by Mr Loudon. It is evidently the production of a writer with whom his subject has been the study of his life, and who has made himself master of it in all its extent and details, both from books and from his own observation and experience. The success of a work, prepared with so much labour, ability, and real knowledge, could hardly have been doubtful from the first; and we rejoice to see successive impressions giving evidence of the public appreciation of its merits. The present edition, which has come out in twenty half-crown parts, is stated to have been revised throughout, and in many parts re-written. The wood-engravings, remarkable for their neatness and clearness, with which it is embellished and illustrated, now amount to upwards of 1,200, and of that number above 500 are entirely new.

"Part I, containing the 'History of Gardening,'" says the author, "is nearly all re-written; it has been enriched with a great number of new facts, and descriptions of gardens; and with numerous engravings of ground-plans, and views of garden and park scenery. In order to give a complete view of the present state of gardening throughout the world, nearly every book of travels, published since 1810, has been consulted, and the author made a tour (in 1829) for the purpose of personally examining the finest gardens in France and Germany." In Part II, containing the 'Science of Gardening,' the first book, which treats on Botany, has been entirely recomposed, so as to embrace the most approved modern opinions on Vegetable Physiology, and in other respects to harmonize with the present state of Botanical science. All the other books have been brought into similar harmony with the present state of knowledge and practice, and more particularly Book III, on the Mechanical Agents employed in Gardening. In this book are described and figured all the new implements, instruments, and machines, considered valuable, and all the improvements in the construction of hot-houses, and more especially the different modes of heating them by steam, and by hot water—the latter, the greatest improvement which has been made in Gardening since this Encyclopedia originally appeared. In Book IV, which treats of the operations of Gardening, the chapter on insects, vermin, and the enemies of gardens, has been entirely re-written and greatly enlarged, by an eminent Naturalist. It is illustrated by numerous new engravings, and will be found a most important addition to this department of the work. Part III, on 'Gardening as Practised in Britain,' has received most invaluable additions, more particularly in the descriptive catalogues of fruits and culinary vegetables, with their synonyms. For these we are indebted to the Committee of the Horticultural Society, who permitted us to consult on these subjects with their head gardener, Mr Munro, and with the gardener of their fruit department, Mr Thompson; and the result is that we are enabled to present such descriptive catalogues, and such selected lists for particular situations, and particular purposes, as could, at no former period, and even at this time from no other source, be produced. Under Floriculture, in most of the preceding editions, the tables of ornamental plants were comparatively meagre and imperfect, and in the first and second editions, full of orthographical errors. These tables were entirely recomposed by Mr George Don, for the edition of 1831, and then received copious additions: they have now been brought down to the present time, and for accuracy, we will venture to state that if they are equalled, they are not surpassed in any work whatever. Arboriculture has received those improvements in the details of transplanting, pruning, &c. which the advanced state of physiological knowledge required;—Landscape Gardening has also undergone revision. Throughout the Work, wherever the subject of insects and vermin has occurred, it has been corrected, or re-written, by the eminent naturalist above referred to; and advantage has been taken, as far as garden insects are concerned, of the more recent discoveries communicated to the 'Entomological Magazine,' and to the 'Magazine of Natural History.' The botanic names have been put in harmony with the nomenclature of our 'Hortus Britannicus,' preserving, however, the Linnaean, or popular synonyme where it has been considered advisable."

WIT MADE EASY, OR A HINT TO WORD-CATCHERS.

A.—Here comes B., the liveliest yet most tiresome of word-catchers. I wonder whether he'll have wit enough to hear good news of his mistress.—Well, B., my dear boy, I hope I see you well.

B.—I hope you do, my dear A., otherwise you have lost your eye-sight.

A.—Good. Well, how do you do?

B.—How? Why as other people do. You would not have me eccentric, would you?

A.—Nonsense. I mean, how do you find yourself?

B.—Find myself? Where's the necessity of finding myself? I have not been lost.

A.—Incorrigible dog! come now; to be serious.

B.—(Comes closer to A. and looks very serious.)

A.—Well, what now?

B.—I am come, to be serious.

A.—Come now; nonsense, B.; leave off this. (Laying his hand on his arm.)

B.—(Looking down at his arm.)—I can't leave off this. It would look very absurd to go without a sleeve.

A.—Ah, ha? You make me laugh in spite of myself. How's Jackson?

B.—The deuce! How's Jackson! Well, I never should have thought that. How can Howe be Jackson? "Surname and arms," I suppose, of some rich uncle? I have not seen him gazetted.

A.—Good bye.

B.—(Detaining him.)—"Good Bye!" What a sudden enthusiasm in favour of some virtuous man of the name of Bye! "Good Bye!"—To think of Ashton standing at the corner of the street, doating aloud on the integrity of a Mr Bye!

A.—Ludicrous enough. I can't help laughing, I confess. But laughing does not always imply merriment. You do not delight us, Jack, with these sort of jokes, but tickle us; and tickling may give pain.

B.—Don't accept it then. You need not take everything that is given you.

A.—You'll want a strait-forward answer some day, and then—

B.—You'll describe a circle about me, before you give it. Well, that's your affair, not mine. You'll astonish the natives, that's all.

A.—It's great nonsense, you must allow.

B.—I can't see why it is greater nonsense than any other pronoun.

A.—(Is deppair.)—Well, it's of no use, I see.

B.—Excuse me: it is of the very greatest use. I don't know a part of speech more useful. It performs all the greatest offices of nature, and contains, in fact, the whole agency and mystery of the world. It rains. It is fine weather. It freezes. It thaws. It (which is very odd) is one o'clock. "It has been a very frequent observation." It goes. Here it goes. How goes it?—(which, by the way, is a translation from the Latin, Eo, is, it; Eo, I go; is, thou goest; it, he or it goes. In short—

A.—In short, if I wanted a dissertation on it, now's the time for it. But I don't; so, good bye.—(going)—I saw Miss M. last night.

B.—The devil you did! Where was it?

A.—(To himself)—Now I have him, and will revenge myself. Where was it? Where was it, eh? Oh you must know a great deal more about it than I do.

B.—Nay, my dear fellow, do tell me. I'm on thorns.

A.—On thorns! Very odd thorns. I never saw a thorn look so like a pavement.

B.—Come now, to be serious.

A.—(Comes close to B. and looks tragic.)

B.—He, he! Very fair, egad. But do tell me where was she? How did she look? Who was with her?

A.—Oh, ho! Hoo was with her, was he? Well, I wanted to know his name. I could not tell who the devil it was. But I say, Jack, who's Hoo?

B.—Good. He, he! Devilish fair! But now, my dear Will, for God's sake, you know how interested I am.

A.—The deuce you are! I always took you for a disinterested fellow. I always said of Jack B., Jack's apt to overdo his credit for wit; but a more honest disinterested fellow I never met with.

B.—Well, then, as you think so, be merciful. Where is Miss M.?

A.—This is more astonishing news than any. Ware is Miss M. I know her passion for music; but this is wonderful. Good Heavens! To think of a delicate young lady dressing herself in man's clothes, and going about as a musician under the name of Ware.

B.—Now, my dear Will, consider. I acknowledge I have been tiresome; I confess it is a bad habit, this word-catching; but consider my love.

A.—(Falls into an attitude of musing.)

B.—Well.

A.—Don't interrupt me. I am considering your love.

B.—I repent; I am truly sorry. What shall I do?—(Laying his hand on his heart.)—I'll give up this cursed habit.

A.—You will?—upon honour?

B.—Upon my honour.

A.—On the spot.

B.—Now, this instant. Now and for ever.

A.—Strip away then.

B.—Strip? for what?

A.—You said you'd give up that cursed habit.

B.—Now, my dear A. for the love of everything that is sacred; for the love of your own love—

A.—Well, you promise me sincerely?

B.—Heart and soul.

A.—Step over the way, then, into the coffee-house, and I'll tell you.

Street-Sweeper.—Pleaze your honour, pray remember the poor swape.

B.—My friend, I'll never forget you, if that will be of any service. I'll think of you next year.

A.—What again!

B.—The last time, as I hope to be saved. Here, my friend; there's a shilling for you. Charity covers a multitude of bad jokes.

Street-Sweeper.—God send your honour thousands of them.

B.—The jokes or the shillings, you rascal?

Street-Sweeper.—Och, the shillings. Devil a bit the bad jokes. I can make them myself, and a shilling's no joke anyhow.

A.—What! really silent! and in spite of the dog's equivocal Irish face! Come, B., I now see you can give up a jest, and are really in love; and your mistress, I will undertake to say, will not be sorry to be convinced of both. Women like to begin with merriment well enough: but they think ill of a man who cannot come to a grave conclusion.

CELEBRATED SPECIMEN OF THE LETTER-WRITING OF MADAME DE SEVIGNE,

[FAMOUS for her wit and good-nature in the reign of Louis XIV, and her love for the daughter to whom she chiefly addressed her letters.]

A M. DE COULANGES.

A Paris, Lundi, 15 Décembre 1670.

Je m'en vais vous mander la chose du monde la plus étonnante, la plus surprenante, la plus merveilleuse, la plus miraculeuse, la plus triomphante, la plus étourdissante, la plus inouïe, la plus singulière, la plus extraordinaire, la plus incroyable, la plus imprévue, la plus grande, la plus petite, la plus rare, la plus commune, la plus éclatante, la plus secrète jusqu'à aujourd'hui, la plus brillante, la plus digne d'envie; enfin, une chose dont on ne trouve qu'un exemple dans les siècles passés, encore cet exemple n'est-il pas juste; une chose que nous ne saurions croire à Paris; comment la pourroit-on croire à Lyon? une chose qui fait crier miséricorde à tout le monde; une chose qui comble de joie Madame de Rohan et Madame d'Hauterive; une chose enfin qui se fera dimanche, où ceux qui la verront croiront avoir la berlus; une chose qui se fera dimanche, et qui ne sera peut-être pas faite lundi. Je ne puis me résoudre à vous la dire, devinez-la; je vous le donne en trois; jetez-vous votre langue aux chiens? Hé bien! il faut donc vous la dire. M. de Lausun épouse dimanche au Louvre, devinez qui? Je vous le donne en quatre, je vous le donne en six, je vous le donne en cent. Madame de Coulanges dit: Voilà qui est bien difficile à deviner; c'est Madame de la Vallière. Point du tout, Madame. C'est donc Mademoiselle de Retz? Point du tout, vous êtes bien provinciale. Ah! vraiment, nous sommes bien bêtes, dites-vous; c'est Mademoiselle Colbert. Encore moins. C'est assurément Mademoiselle de Créqui. Vous n'y êtes pas. Il faut donc à la fin vous le dire: il épouse dimanche au Louvre, avec la permission du Roi, Mademoiselle, Mademoiselle de Mademoiselle, devinez le nom; il épouse Mademoiselle, la grande Mademoiselle, Mademoiselle, fille de feu Monsieur, Mademoiselle, petite fille de Henri IV, Mademoiselle d'Eu, Mademoiselle de Dombes, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, Mademoiselle d'Orléans, Mademoiselle, cousine germaine du Roi, Mademoiselle, destinée au trône, Mademoiselle, le seul parti de France qui fût digne de Monsieur. Voilà un beau sujet de discourir. Si vous criez, si vous êtes hors de vous-même, si vous dites que nous avons menti, que cela est faux, qu'on se moque de vous, que voilà une belle raillerie, que, cela est bien fade à imaginer; si enfin vous nous dites des injures, nous

SKETCHES OF BERMUDA.

Sketches of Bermuda. By Susette Harriet Lloyd, with maps and plates. 1 vol. 8vo. London. Cochrane and Co.

This little volume is the production of a young lady, who, in addition to very amiable feelings, has some talent for observation and description. She does not tell us all we should wish to know on the subject, but our recent information respecting the Bermudas is so scanty, that we feel thankful for any addition to it. Miss Lloyd sailed from England in the summer of 1829, and seems to have remained eighteen months among the islands. Though small and comparatively obscure, and out of the high roads of navigation, this group has been singularly fortunate in poetical associations, which have a power to make even barren rocks beautiful. Shakespeare speaks of the islands in the 'Tempest,' as "the still vexed Bermoothes," for in his time they had not been long discovered, and seamen incorrectly described them as being vexed by continual storms or violent currents; the mischievous Waller, who seems to have lived some time upon them, much improved their character, and devoted many verses to them under the name of the 'Summer Isles'; and nearly at the same period the honest old patriot, and good old poet, Andrew Marvel, sang of

"Where the remote Bermudas ride
In the ocean's bosom."

In our own days, Mr Thomas Moore has resided there, and celebrated the islands in some of the sweetest of his verses. Now all this we call being in luck. Miss Lloyd thus describes the situation and general form of the Bermudas:—

"They lie in 32° 20' N. Lat. 64° 50' W. Long.; and are between six and seven hundred miles from Cape Hatteras, in North Carolina, the nearest point of land.

"They form an isolated Archipelago, which rises like a speck in the Atlantic, and are the work of that industrious little island-building zoophyte, the coral worm, which, by its unwearying perseverance, has accomplished works of such vast magnitude. Above this coral foundation lies a thick stratum of sand and shells, which, by the operation of the air, forms the indurated sand-stone of which the surface of the island is chiefly composed. They are encircled by an elliptical belt of coral reefs, which at its inner circumference measures about twenty-seven miles at the largest axis, and fourteen at the smallest. It is said that there are as many islands as there are days in the year, but of these the greater number are so small, that they have neither name nor inhabitants.

"The principal are St George's, the chief military station of the colony, and formerly the capital; Bermuda, or the main island, the present seat of government; Somerset, and Ireland, in which last are the dock-yards, convict-ships, &c. These, with very little interruption, form a continued chain, which runs from north-east to south-west, in the outline of a shepherd's crook, the convex side of which lies towards the S.W. and W. The whole occupies a space of fifteen to twenty miles in a straight line, but it is considerably more measured round the curve. St George's is three miles and a half in length, Bermuda fifteen, Somerset three, and Ireland three. The breadth of the chain, in its widest part, is two miles, and in the narrowest, not above one-eighth of a mile. Of this chain, St George's lies at the eastern, and Somerset and Ireland at the western extremity.

"The minor islands are St David's, Cooper's, Smith's, Longbird, Nonessuch, &c., and they everywhere form numerous picturesque creeks and bays, some of which are very large and deep, such as the Great Sound, Castle Harbour, Harrington Sound &c."

Upon this narrow ridge, which has been slowly raised above the level of the mighty ocean, and then partially covered with soil, grass, herbs, fruit trees, and lofty cedars, there exists a prosperous, fixed population of more than eleven thousand souls, independently of fifteen hundred convicts, and the troops in garrison, which are changed from time to time. At the period of Miss Lloyd's visit, the slave inhabitants amounted to 3,920, which was rather more than half of the number of the white and free-coloured fixed population. She did not think that there were above three or four native Africans among the slaves, all the rest being born in Bermuda. From a charge delivered by the Chief Justice, in May 1830, it appeared that there were four hundred inhabitants for every square mile. Our authoress found the character of the Bermudians to be kind and humane, and (for slavery had not then been most nobly abolished), she says that their slaves enjoyed many advantages and comforts, which the poor of our own country are frequently destitute of. The poor negroes have always fared worst where there are mines or sugar plantations:—in Bermuda there are neither; and consequently they were employed in light agricultural or mechanical labour, but principally as domestic servants. They seem to be a merry set—very fond of music, and by no means stupid. We should enjoy, of all things, to hear one of these sable Chansonniers sing 'I'd be a butterfly!'

"Their Gombey parties are preceded by really tolerable bands, composed of negroes dressed in a neat white uniform with scarlet facings. These musicians are all self-taught, and play many favourite airs with great accuracy. This is the more surprising since they do not know a single note in music. They learn and play everything by ear, and certainly have great natural taste and love for music. When engaged about their work, or walking along the road, they generally beguile the time with a song; and in the evening you frequently hear the sounds of a flute or violin from a negro cottage. Many also possess the talent of extemporaneous composition, which they exercise in finding words for Di piacer, and various Italian airs. Others content themselves with singing the last new song, and 'I'd be a butterfly,' and 'Oh, no, we never mention her,' were beginning to be general favourites."

"There is a black woman here who ranks high as an improvisatrice; every important event, everyone who is so unfortunate as to incur her displeasure, is made the subject of her verse. * * * These verses are, of course, very uncouth, but possess a great deal of wit."

We would gladly give up the reading, for a twelvemonth, of all the poetry that may appear in magazines, annuals, and albums, provided we could but have our ears tickled with some of this negro improvisation,—some of these Africa-English verses. A few years ago, the Bible Society, not much to the credit of their own good judgment, seeing that the effect they thereby produced was altogether different from what they proposed, presented to the world most copious printed specimens of Negro-English prose, which was certainly the funniest and most irresistibly laughable hybrid of a language it was ever our fortune to meet withal!

In spite of strong prejudices, and a certain degree of opposition on the part of the white Bermudians, even in Miss Lloyd's time they had begun to impart the blessings of education to the negroes and half castes, and had established free-schools and infant-schools for them. She says,—

"This blessing is now imparted to nearly a thousand persons, in which number I do not include those who are educated in the schools under the dissenters, some of which are very flourishing."

On occasion of the visitation of a Bishop from our American colonies, Miss Lloyd saw the examination of one of these Negro schools.

"On Wednesday, after examining a White free-school in our parish, the Bishop visited our Negro-infant school, accompanied by Doctor Spencer and Mr Wix, Archdeacon of Newfoundland. It presented a spectacle no less interesting to the eye than gratifying to the heart. Above seventy children were present, some not more than two years old, all arranged in classes. The girls wore their neat pink frocks, with a gaily coloured handkerchief tastefully folded round the head, while their dark expressive eyes and sable countenances, added a high degree of interest to their appearance in the eyes of the European. The school-room was prettily ornamented with flowering branches of the pride of India and Palmetto: and when this little band joined in the morning hymn, and knelt down to receive the good Bishop's benediction, I cannot describe the feelings which this scene excited. The children went through their lessons extremely well, and his lordship expressed himself delighted with their proficiency, and with the novelty of the system, this being the first infant-school he had ever seen."

We hope Miss Lloyd makes some mistake in saying the Bishop had never seen an infant school before; but, to continue, in her own words:—

"I feel an encouraging hope, that this, and similar institutions, will lead to a gradual, but sure amelioration in the condition and character of the negro and coloured population, and prepare them for a right use of that emancipation, which all feel cannot be far distant." (This, it must be remembered, was written in 1830) * * * "But there is a shade that dims this pleasing picture, which, I trust, will gradually vanish before the enlightening influences of instruction—I mean the petty pilfering which is so common among the negroes, and which, until lately, was looked upon by very many as a perfectly venial offence. There is, however, an increasing conviction of its guilt, and the open effrontery with which it was formerly practised, and the systematic prevarication to which the negroes resorted, when detected, are now everyday becoming less frequent. I was pleased to hear from the Bishop, that he had been assured by persons, who formerly considered it a matter of course that a large portion of their poultry would be stolen from them, that in the last three years, during which period greater attention had been paid to the instruction of the slaves, they had not lost a single fowl. * * I can only say, that I have never missed a single article of any description, though my room was so situated as to be accessible to anyone who might feel disposed to enter the open door, and carry off whatever might be lying about."

Well! thanks to the principles and exertions of the more liberal of our two great political parties which has predominated during the last four or five years, the great measure of Negro emancipation has been carried, and evidently sooner than our authoress expected. We thank her for showing how the slaves were being prepared to take their rank as free-men, but we wish that she had staid longer, and could have told us from her own experience and observation, how they have behaved themselves since they were suddenly made free. We are the more particular in this wish, as there are peculiar circumstances attending the measure in the Bermudas, where the emancipation was indeed sudden, and carried into full effect at once; it having been determined to discard altogether the system of apprenticeship, and to give entire and unconditional freedom to the whole body of slaves. Miss Lloyd says in her preface,

"The local legislature was enabled to take so decisive a step with confidence and safety, partly because the mitigated form of slavery which prevailed here, could not generate such reciprocal feelings of acrimony or distrust as may have been awakened in the sugar colonies, and also because experience had proved that a judicious system of moral and religious instruction had exercised a beneficial influence on the character and conduct of the slaves."

Perhaps the fair authoress ought to have mentioned the relative numbers of blacks and whites as among the facilitating causes. In the Bermudas, without counting the garrison, there are about two whites to one black; in several of the West Indian islands there are two and more blacks to one white, including the soldiery from Europe, and all other classes; and in Jamaica the slaves are to the rest of the population as seven to one.

Miss Lloyd's account of the productions of the island, its trade, its exports and imports, is rather incomplete, and, we have reason to believe, in some respects incorrect. On the other hand, her sketches of the beautiful scenery, whether done by pen or pencil, are very graceful and pleasing. The three views introduced in her volume are executed in a style very superior to that of the generality of small aqua-tinta plates, and give a delicious notion of the prospects of the narrow islands in which water is always blended with land, snow-white sails with luxuriantly green trees. Above all things, we most admire the delightful, sweet-smelling Bermuda cedar, which timber is so abundant that they build ships, and boats, and houses of it, and burn it in their do-mettle fire. Miss Lloyd says that it is impossible to conceive anything more delicious than a cedar fire!

"The lofty cedar, which to heaven aspires,
The prince of trees! is fuel for their fires;
The smoke, by which their loaded spits do turn,
For incense might on sacred altars burn;
Their private roofs, on od'rous timber borne,
Such as might palaces for kings adorn."

SOMETHING NEW IN POETRY.

Poems by Albius. London. Churton. 1835. 12mo. pp. 26.

'The Poems of Albius,' to adopt the title which the author places at their head, are productions as unlike ordinary modern poetry, as Albius is unlike the generality of modern names. To judge both by this appellation which he has assumed, and by the subjects on which he has expended his greatest efforts, the author seems to intend that we should take him for a sort of modern addition to the Delphic Classics, or one of the old Romans come alive again, rather than a bard properly belonging to these degenerate times. We may remark, too, that although he has thought proper, in partial accommodation to existing usages, to write in a modern dialect, his English, or what seems to be such, is of a singularly original description, and might really pass very well for that of a person who had merely acquired a little of the language by a few week's practice, after having dropt from the clouds, or lain in his grave for the last two thousand years.

The first of the 'Poems of Albius' is entitled an 'Elegy to Sappho,' and opens in the following striking manner:—

"Famed Heloise, by all the world admired,
The Maidens influenced, and the Bards inspired,
To laud her merit, and inscribe her tomb,
Pity the Lovers, and lament their doom."

Then why is Sappho's 'well-known name' to sleep
With her lost frame in the Leucadian deep?—
Is it because no Abelard could raise
A column worthy to record her praise?
Or is it that her soul, too rashly brave,
Preferred a watery to an earthly grave?"

The reasons here suggested to account for the oblivion into which "Sappho's well known name" is assumed to have fallen, are all but as capital in their way as that assumption itself. In particular, the reader will admire the poetic invention displayed in the novel notion that a monumental column was raised to Heloise by Abelard, who died more than twenty years before her.

In the next lines, the agitation of both the verse and the grammar finely betrays the poet's growing fervour;—

"No abbey she aspired to raise, no solemn state,
No maidens govern, or harsh rules dictate;
No mitred preachers to extol her fame,
Her deeds to gloss, and sanctify her shame;
But a great soul that meanness did disdain,
And thus neglected, sought the Lesbian main."

This, however, is merely preparatory. The author having thus cleared his throat, now takes up his story from the beginning, and proceeds to inform us that Sappho, "by nature gifted with a noble mind, and splendid talents with the same combined," "at length became the slighted object (as he poetically phrases it, for subject) of a fatal flame." The inspiration now comes very strong upon him. "Apollo's temple," he exclaims, in a strain of sublimity, in which we confess he soars far beyond our power of accompanying him. —

"now her image bears,
And Lesbos still her sable garment wears.
Leucadian rocks shall mourn her hapless fate,
And my inscription shall record the date."

Above twenty lines are then devoted to a most emphatic assertion of the fact, that this great poetess has never yet had her epitaph written. The following are half-a-dozen of them:—

"Many centuries now have passed away,
Long tedious nights, and each revolving day,
Without a line on the wide earth to state
Her early doom, or to perpetuate
A name renowned in all the works of art,
As skilled in music as in learning great."

This, by the by, seems to be precisely Albius's own case. The skill in the music of verse shown in this last couplet, would almost entitle us to say that he is "himself the great sublime he draws." That he is "as skilled in music as in learning great," the conclusion of the Elegy again abundantly proves:—

"The task shall hence be my peculiar care.
This little merit Albius now will claim,
And raise a tablet to her honoured fame."

(An ordinary writer, for the sake both of the rhyme and the reason, would have said fame here; but the other word is more characteristic of the curiosa felicitas of our author.)

And soon shall Phaon climb Leucadia's height,
To seek his Sappho in the realms of night;
Soon shall regret his proud and cruel disdain,
And join his mistress in the watery main."

The word cruel, commonly reckoned a dissyllable, is, we believe, uniformly pronounced as a monosyllable by Albius. Thus, for instance, a few pages after:—

"Who cruelly (pronounce, cruelly) thus requites her generous flame."

This line is taken from a long Epistle from Phaon to Sappho, of which, however, it must be our only sample. Nor can we do more than notice an intermediate effusion, entitled, 'Elegy to Hector, concluded with an Epitaph,' in which it is said of that hero, that

"His might and prowess everywhere proclaimed
The chief who only by a God was armed."

With a similar easy flow of metre, the Epitaph begins as follows:—

"— By Albius' hand was raised
This simple tablet to the hero's praise."

An Epistle from Dido to Æneas must also be passed over. The descriptive eloquence of the Carthaginian Queen is, in some passages, much too ardent for our sober pages. The letter, however, seems to have produced a powerful effect on the nerves of poor Æneas. In his answer (also here given) he screams out on sight of it in an agony of terror:—

"But what's this dread epistle which I see,
All stained with gore, and sent express from thee?
My Dido's name the superscription bears,
And harrows up my soul with conscious fears:
Its harsh contents my daring mind subdues,
Unfits me quite to meet my hostile foes."

After this comes an Epistle from Corinna to Ovid, dated Pisa, 3rd February 1830. She "concludes," says our author, "by expressing her unalterable attachment to him in the most glowing colours." Here is the glowingly-coloured passage in question:—

"If not, at least, my last request attend,
And on my tomb my mournful theme shall end:
'Here the wronged mistress of false Ovid lies,
By his disdain she fell a sacrifice
To dire despair, and all-consuming grief,
When him, and only him, could give relief:
But death more kind, did her complaint remove,
And sent her early to the ethereal grove."

An ode to (or rather, against) Achilles, which follows, ends with an inscription for the Statue in Hyde Park, which the pious and poetical author looks upon to be a very shocking performance indeed. "This massive pile," he indignantly exclaims,

"— is to commemorate
The savage hero of the Grecian state,
Whose brutal courage to the world is known,
And deeds ascribed that never were his own;
The indelicate posture of whose effigy,
And immodest state of shameless nudity,
Bespeak a want of common decency,
To grace or figure not the least pretence,
Devoid of meaning—still more void of sense."

Not satisfied with this torrent of eloquent verse, the writer resumes the subject in a long note in prose. "Ovid," he remarks, "in his writings on this subject, with the exception of myself, has been the only author who has yet dared to unmask this invincible son of Thetis." He will allow poor Achilles no merit in anything. "His sallying out at last," he argues, "to meet Hector, appears to have been wholly instigated by a direful thirst of revenge for the loss of his friend Patroclus, who, according to the chances of war, was as liable to fall as another man, and which common occurrence a great mind would soon have reconciled." Nay, even the courage of this celebrated personage, Albius earnestly insists, was very far from being what it has been generally accounted. "His impenetrable armour," he argues, "and enormous spear gave him a decided advantage over his antagonist; for it appears that Hector's lance was broken in pieces, against the shield of Achilles, early in the contest, and consequently he had nothing but his side-arms left to defend himself against the unequal weapon of his exulting foe. During the martial glory and success of Hector, the 'great Pelides,' never once attempted to emulate his achievements, or put himself in his way, or I am fully persuaded that the fate of Greece would have terminated under less auspicious circumstances."

The hottest of our author's wrath, however, is poured out against what he calls the "preponderous statue." We decline transcribing all the strong expressions he uses on this subject—but his concluding accusation against the statue is so curious that we must give it. "It is," he says, after calling it every thing else best fitted to excite our aversion, "a complete outrage of public decency, by the pretended guardians of public morals, and but for which it is probable that this poem would never have appeared."

A sort of new Iliad and Æneid in one, which is next presented to us, under the title of 'The Siege of Troy, Destruction of Troy, and Foundation of the Roman Empire' is too long an affair for our examination at present. We can only state that the object of the Poem is, in the words of the author, "to more clearly and distinctly point out the cause and historical facts connected with the Trojan wars, than those recorded in the works of Homer."

The latter part of the volume contains a few pieces on modern subjects. One is called 'An Hour in Kensington Gardens,' and begins thus:—

"Majestic and neglected pile,
The monarch's famed retreat;
The fairest of the British isle,
And once the royal seat."

This is addressed to what the author calls "the venerable palace," in comparison with which he seems to think Windsor a very modern structure. "Forsaken," he goes on,

"Forsaken and deserted now
Are thy enchanting bowers;
Thy garland plucked to grace the brow
Of Windsor's lofty towers."

Altho' the wreck of former days,
By various tempests lost,
Thy ancient grandeur yet displays
The state thou then couldst boast."

If in future days, however, a good and great monarch should arise, and restore the state to its ancient happiness and grandeur, he prophesies that

"Then Kensington once more,
Her regal palace shall behold
In all its days of yore,"—

whatever that may signify.

'The Farewell and Departure of Albius,' the next of these pieces, is a somewhat ambitious performance, being no less than an attempt to throw into the shade the well-known 'Farewell' of Lord Byron—as is pretty plainly intimated in the opening lines:—

"Like that great bard, whom late the world admired,
Whose ardent mind seraphic subjects fired,
I little thought when first he said "farewell,"
That I myself should the same story tell:
When to his country last he bade adieu,
That I so soon should that farewell renew."

The cause that sent Albius abroad was, it seems, "great pecuniary losses, which he sustained by his purse and services to pretended friends," as he puts it in prose,—or, as he sings in still more impressive prosody:—

"At my own loss I've others' interests raised,
And my reward has been but empty praise."

To use his own language on another occasion, we should have thought that such a common occurrence as this was one "which a great mind would soon have reconciled;" but he takes on about it in the most distressing way, pouring out his soul in the following, among other passionate exclamations:—

"No more my verse in tuneful numbers flow,
My lute's strung now to elegies of woe;
No more will I inscribe to fruitless Fame,
Though science henceforth may record my name.
Friendship, adieu! Society I disclaim,
And no more know mankind than by the name.
The sacred Nine already chide my stay,
My Goddess muse cries, "Albius haste away!"
Farewell, ye charming nightingales that sing
Notes to my verse, fair Goddess of the Spring!
I could have once sung out a summer's day,
But now the inspiring charm is done away;
My notes no longer will assist my rhyme,
And anguish quickens on the brink of time.
My numbers here in painful accents glide,
My song is done—my harp I lay aside.
Let those few friends who strove my wounds to heal,
Accept my thanks, and this, my last farewell:
Thro' stormy seas, to distant climes I'll rove,
And pace my journey to the ethereal grove."

This was in the end of 1825. However, by the very next poem, we find that, for all his melancholy resolves, our author's exile wanted the consolations neither of song nor of love. "Near Ingouville," he chants,

"within a grove
Where once I did retire,
The world to shun, in woods to rove,
And tune the sacred lyre;—

"The first sad subject of my verse,
The country I had left," &c.

"When to the winds I told my tale," &c.

"Beneath the shade a goddess sat,
More fair than Venus she,
Who often listened to my lute,
And kindly smiled on me."

This kind lady, after a few fine speeches, fairly makes him an offer of her hand:—

"Accept the hand of an unknown fair,
Though stranger as thou art;
For ever live in quiet here,
And meet a generous heart."

We are sorry to have to relate so discreditable a termination to so interesting a love tale; but after telling us of the many pleasant days they continued to pass together after this frank declaration, our author adds:—

"But mortal joys are transient, vain," &c.

"For cruel fate had me forbade
This lovely fair to wed;
At length with grief the blissful shade,
The charming spot I fled."

We must say that, since the famous flight of Horace, we do not remember to have seen any running away so very coolly recorded.

But we must bring our account of this very remarkable volume to a close. The last poem we shall notice is entitled 'The Indispensable Requisites and Qualifications for an Accomplished Poet, with the best rules for acquiring that sublime study.' We may safely say, that nothing which had been previously written upon the art of poetry had anticipated anything we have here. The writer evidently looks to nature alone. In such lines as the following, with which we shall conclude our extracts, it is easy to see who has been his "great example":—

"No precept, rule, or beaten tracts of time
Can give the force and harmony of rhyme;
Untaught, unstudied, is the poet's verse,
Who with the Muses only would converse."

"One timely bred to serve the Sacred Nine,
In verse instructed by a Bard divine:
Who from a sylvan Goddess dates his name,
And early traced the rugged paths of Fame:
In Science' temple his first theme begun,
And one acknowledged born the Muse's son.
(The bard without which his rank unjustly claim,
And only lives a poet by the name.)
One in whose breast the softest passions glow,
And soul from which the finest feelings flow;
A modest choice, mixt with a taste refined,
And talent far above the vulgar mind.
One who the Muses' honour will sustain,
Low wit contemn, and little minds disdain:
One whose chaste style and language both agree,
And such a being should the poet be."

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF GARDENING.

An Encyclopedia of Gardening. By J. C. Loudon.
New Edition. 8vo. London. 1835. Pp. 1310.

If the ear should be struck with a momentary feeling of something like incongruity in the unaccustomed collocation of a name so redolent of nature and primitive life as Gardening, with so learned a term as Encyclopedia, let it be remembered that gardening is, after all, the eldest of the sciences, and, as such, is surely well entitled to be associated with the most learned term we can find for it. Till lately, indeed, in our foolish contempt for the "common things that round us lie," we did not recognize it as a science at all—hardly even as an art. It would have been thought strange to speak of the trainer of fruit-trees, or even of the disposer of parterres, as an artist. And the eldest of the sciences, in the orthodox creed, is not Gardening, but Astronomy. Yet, although both are no doubt of most respectable antiquity, we have no warrant either in prose or verse, for carrying the birth of the latter quite to so high a date as that of the former. When our first great ancestor in Eden inquired of the Archangel respecting the celestial motions, his curiosity, if we may trust the account of Milton, was rather repressed than encouraged:—

"Solicit not thy thoughts with matters hid;
Leave them to God above; him serve, and fear!
Of other creatures, as him pleases best,
Wherever placed, let him dispose; joy thou
In what he gives to thee, this Paradise
And thy fair Eve; Heaven is for thee too high
To know what passes there; be lowly wise."

It was reserved for the shepherd sages of Chaldea, after the world was many ages old, to be the fathers of Astronomy; the father of Gardening was the father of mankind—aye, and its mother was also the mother of all of us—

"Eve
Rose and went forth among her fruits and flowers,
To visit how they prospered, bud and bloom,
Her nursery; they at her coming sprung,
And touched by her fair tendance gladlier grew."

However, the two are not sciences that ought either to quarrel about precedence, or to have any other feelings towards each other than those of affection. They may be said to be of kin through the common blood of a poetry which is denied to the other sciences. For as the stars have been called "the poetry of heaven," so may the flowers, and the fruits too, of our gardens, be appropriately styled the poetry of earth. Of both sciences the nature and ends are mainly connected with those capacities of our being that yearn after something more and higher than either the necessary or the convenient. They both carry us away out of sense into sentiment—out of the visible into the visionary. Important as are some of the practical applications of Astronomy, such mere utilities respect only a small portion of the field of that vast science. Of by far the greater number of its soaring abstractions the whole result and purpose can only be described as being to exercise some of the noblest faculties of the intellect—to gratify the desire of knowledge for its own sake—to help the wings of the imagination, which in that endless starry maze, and those far depths of blue, finds one of the regions in the universe of thought in which it loves most to range and lose itself. The scope of the science of Gardening, it must be confessed, is not so lofty. The poetry that is in it is of a humbler and more familiar character. It has more to do with the affections than with the imagination. Yet the gardener is a poet of his kind, and every garden is a true poem, in which blossoms, and fragrance, and green leaves, not ill supply the place of glowing imagery and tuneful words. Even the smallest flower-plot beside the cottage door, is it not like a lamp of celestial light hung up to brighten the prose of ordinary life to parent and child, upon whom it smiles in their going out and in their coming in? And in all cases where a dwelling-house and a garden are associated, whatever the former—the creation as it is the shelter of our coarser needs and desires,—may suggest to the mind of what is more earthy in our humanity, is taken off and relieved by the less artificial character of the latter, by the predominance in it of the ornamental and the beautiful over mere physical servableness. In the house, grace and decoration, though by no means excluded, are yet throughout kept in subordination to the useful and convenient; in the garden it is the reverse—here, as in every other poetical creation, beauty sits queen—in that spirit everything is shaped—by that everything is animated—the useful or commodious only comes in as supplementary, and where it does not interfere with the other which is the reigning principle.

As might have been expected from its high pretensions, Gardening has not been without its literature, either in other countries or in our own. But we believe we may safely say, that nothing has been written upon the subject in any country or language, that can be compared for completeness, for accuracy, for enlarged views, with the admirable work now before us. Indeed, we have few treatises upon any art or science that deserve to be placed beside this Encyclopedia of Gardening by Mr Loudon. It is evidently the production of a writer with whom his subject has been the study of his life, and who has made himself master of it in all its extent and details, both from books and from his own observation and experience. The success of a work, prepared with so much labour, ability, and real knowledge, could hardly have been doubtful from the first; and we rejoice to see successive impressions giving evidence of the public appreciation of its merits. The present edition, which has come out in twenty half-crown parts, is stated to have been revised throughout, and in many parts re-written. The wood-engravings, remarkable for their neatness and clearness, with which it is embellished and illustrated, now amount to upwards of 1,200, and of that number above 500 are entirely new.

"Part I, containing the 'History of Gardening,'" says the author, "is nearly all re-written; it has been enriched with a great number of new facts, and descriptions of gardens; and with numerous engravings of ground-plans, and views of garden and park scenery. In order to give a complete view of the present state of gardening throughout the world, nearly every book of travels, published since 1810, has been consulted, and the author made a tour (in 1829) for the purpose of personally examining the finest gardens in France and Germany." In Part II, containing the 'Science of Gardening,' the first book, which treats on Botany, has been entirely recomposed, so as to embrace the most approved modern opinions on Vegetable Physiology, and in other respects to harmonize with the present state of Botanical science. All the other books have been brought into similar harmony with the present state of knowledge and practice, and more particularly Book III, on the Mechanical Agents employed in Gardening. In this book are described and figured all the new implements, instruments, and machines, considered valuable, and all the improvements in the construction of hot-houses, and more especially the different modes of heating them by steam, and by hot water—the latter, the greatest improvement which has been made in Gardening since this Encyclopedia originally appeared. In Book IV, which treats of the operations of Gardening, the chapter on insects, vermin, and the enemies of gardens, has been entirely re-written and greatly enlarged, by an eminent Naturalist. It is illustrated by numerous new engravings, and will be found a most important addition to this department of the work. Part III, on 'Gardening as Practised in Britain,' has received most invaluable additions, more particularly in the descriptive catalogues of fruits and culinary vegetables, with their synonyms. For these we are indebted to the Committee of the Horticultural Society, who permitted us to consult on these subjects with their head gardener, Mr Munro, and with the gardener of their fruit department, Mr Thompson; and the result is that we are enabled to present such descriptive catalogues, and such selected lists for particular situations, and particular purposes, as could, at no former period, and even at this time from no other source, be produced. Under Floriculture, in most of the preceding editions, the tables of ornamental plants were comparatively meagre and imperfect, and in the first and second editions, full of orthographical errors. These tables were entirely recomposed by Mr George Don, for the edition of 1831, and then received copious additions: they have now been brought down to the present time, and for accuracy, we will venture to state that if they are equalled, they are not surpassed in any work whatever. Arboriculture has received those improvements in the details of transplanting, pruning, &c. which the advanced state of physiological knowledge required;—Landscape Gardening has also undergone revision. Throughout the Work, wherever the subject of insects and vermin has occurred, it has been corrected, or re-written, by the eminent naturalist above referred to; and advantage has been taken, as far as garden insects are concerned, of the more recent discoveries communicated to the 'Entomological Magazine,' and to the 'Magazine of Natural History.' The botanic names have been put in harmony with the nomenclature of our 'Hortus Britannicus,' preserving, however, the Linnæan, or popular synonyme where it has been considered advisable."

WIT MADE EASY, OR A HINT TO WORD-CATCHERS.

A.—Here comes B., the liveliest yet most tiresome of word-catchers. I wonder whether he'll have wit enough to hear good news of his mistress.—Well, B., my dear boy, I hope I see you well.

B.—I hope you do, my dear A., otherwise you have lost your eye-sight.

A.—Good. Well, how do you do?

B.—How? Why as other people do. You would not have me eccentric, would you?

A.—Nonsense. I mean, how do you find yourself?

B.—Find myself? Where's the necessity of finding myself? I have not been lost.

A.—Incorrigible dog! come now; to be serious.

B.—(Comes closer to A. and looks very serious.)

A.—Well, what now?

B.—I am come, to be serious.

A.—Come now; nonsense, B.; leave off this. (Laying his hand on his arm.)

B.—(Looking down at his arm.)—I can't leave off this. It would look very absurd to go without a sleeve.

A.—Ah, ha? You make me laugh in spite of myself. How's Jackson?

B.—The deuce! How's Jackson! Well, I never should have thought that. How can Howe be Jackson? "Surname and arms," I suppose, of some rich uncle? I have not seen him gazetted.

A.—Good bye.

B.—(Detaining him.)—"Good Bye!" What a sudden enthusiasm in favour of some virtuous man of the name of Bye! "Good Bye!"—To think of Ashton standing at the corner of the street, doating aloud on the integrity of a Mr Bye!

A.—Ludicrous enough. I can't help laughing, I confess. But laughing does not always imply merriment. You do not delight us, Jack, with these sort of jokes, but tickle us; and tickling may give pain.

B.—Don't accept it then. You need not take everything that is given you.

A.—You'll want a strait-forward answer some day, and then—

B.—You'll describe a circle about me, before you give it. Well, that's your affair, not mine. You'll astonish the natives, that's all.

A.—It's great nonsense, you must allow.

B.—I can't see why it is greater nonsense than any other pronoun.

A.—(Is deppair.)—Well, it's of no use, I see.

B.—Excuse me: it is of the very greatest use. I don't know a part of speech more useful. It performs all the greatest offices of nature, and contains, in fact, the whole agency and mystery of the world. It rains. It is fine weather. It freezes. It thaws. It (which is very odd) is one o'clock. "It has been a very frequent observation." It goes. Here it goes. How goes it?—(which, by the way, is a translation from the Latin, Eo, is, it; Eo, I go; is, thou goest; it, he or it goes. In short—

A.—In short, if I wanted a dissertation on it, now's the time for it. But I don't; so, good bye.—(going)—I saw Miss M. last night.

B.—The devil you did! Where was it?

A.—(To himself)—Now I have him, and will revenge myself. Where was it? Where was it, eh? Oh you must know a great deal more about it than I do.

B.—Nay, my dear fellow, do tell me. I'm on thorns.

A.—On thorns! Very odd thorns. I never saw a thorn look so like a pavement.

B.—Come now, to be serious.

A.—(Comes close to B. and looks tragic.)

B.—He, he! Very fair, egad. But do tell me where was she? How did she look? Who was with her?

A.—Oh, ho! Hoo was with her, was he? Well, I wanted to know his name. I could not tell who the devil it was. But I say, Jack, who's Hoo?

B.—Good. He, he! Devilish fair! But now, my dear Will, for God's sake, you know how interested I am.

A.—The deuce you are! I always took you for a disinterested fellow. I always said of Jack B., Jack's apt to overdo his credit for wit; but a more honest disinterested fellow I never met with.

B.—Well, then, as you think so, be merciful. Where is Miss M.?

A.—This is more astonishing news than any. Ware is Miss M. I know her passion for music; but this is wonderful. Good Heavens! To think of a delicate young lady dressing herself in man's clothes, and going about as a musician under the name of Ware.

B.—Now, my dear Will, consider. I acknowledge I have been tiresome; I confess it is a bad habit, this word-catching; but consider my love.

A.—(Falls into an attitude of musing.)

B.—Well.

A.—Don't interrupt me. I am considering your love.

B.—I repent; I am truly sorry. What shall I do?—(Laying his hand on his heart.)—I'll give up this cursed habit.

A.—You will?—upon honour?

B.—Upon my honour.

A.—On the spot.

B.—Now, this instant. Now and for ever.

A.—Strip away then.

B.—Strip? for what?

A.—You said you'd give up that cursed habit.

B.—Now, my dear A. for the love of everything that is sacred; for the love of your own love—

A.—Well, you promise me sincerely?

B.—Heart and soul.

A.—Step over the way, then, into the coffee-house, and I'll tell you.

Street-Sweeper.—Place your honour, pray remember the poor swape.

B.—My friend, I'll never forget you, if that will be of any service. I'll think of you next year.

A.—What again!

B.—The last time, as I hope to be saved. Here, my friend; there's a shilling for you. Charity covers a multitude of bad jokes.

Street-Sweeper.—God send your honour thousands of them.

B.—The jokes or the shillings, you rascal?

Street-Sweeper.—Och, the shillings. Devil a bit tha bad jokes. I can make them myself, and a shilling's no joke anyhow.

A.—What! really silent! and in spite of the dog's equivocal Irish face! Come, B., I now see you can give up a jest, and are really in love; and your mistress, I will undertake to say, will not be sorry to be convinced of both. Women like to begin with merriment well enough: but they think ill of a man who cannot come to a grave conclusion.

CELEBRATED SPECIMEN OF THE LETTER-WRITING OF MADAME DE SEVIGNE,

[FAMOUS for her wit and good-nature in the reign of Louis XIV, and her love for the daughter to whom she chiefly addressed her letters.]

A. M. DE COULANGES.

A Paris, Lundi, 15 Décembre 1670.

Je m'en vais vous mander la chose du monde la plus étonnante, la plus surprenante, la plus merveilleuse, la plus miraculeuse, la plus triomphante, la plus étourdissante, la plus inouïe, la plus singulière, la plus extraordinaire, la plus incroyable, la plus imprévue, la plus grande, la plus petite, la plus rare, la plus commune, la plus éclatante, la plus secrète jusqu'à aujourd'hui, la plus brillante, la plus digne d'envie; enfin, une chose dont on ne trouve qu'un exemple dans les siècles passés, encore cet exemple n'est-il pas juste; une chose que nous ne saurions croire à Paris; comment la pourroit-on croire à Lyon? une chose qui fait crier miséricorde à tout le monde; une chose qui comble de joie Madame de Rohan et Madame d'Hauterive; une chose enfin qui se fera dimanche, où ceux qui la verront croiront avoir la berlus; une chose qui se fera dimanche, et qui ne sera peut-être pas faite lundi. Je ne puis me résoudre à vous la dire, devinez-la; je vous le donne en trois: jetez-vous votre langue aux chiens? Hé bien! il faut donc vous la dire. M. de Lauzun épouse dimanche au Louvre, devinez qui? Je vous le donne en quatre, je vous le donne en six, je vous le donne en cent. Madame de Coulanges dit: Voilà qui est bien difficile à deviner; c'est Madame de la Vallière. Point du tout, Madame. C'est donc Mademoiselle de Retz? Point du tout, vous êtes bien provinciale. Ah! vraiment, nous sommes bien bêtes, dites-vous; c'est Mademoiselle Colbert. Encore moins. C'est assurément Mademoiselle de Créqui. Vous n'y êtes pas. Il faut donc à la fin vous le dire: il épouse dimanche au Louvre, avec la permission du Roi, Mademoiselle, Mademoiselle de Mademoiselle, devinez le nom; il épouse Mademoiselle, la grande Mademoiselle, Mademoiselle, fille de feu Monsieur, Mademoiselle, petite fille de Henri IV, Mademoiselle d'Eu, Mademoiselle de Dombes, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, Mademoiselle d'Orléans, Mademoiselle, cousine germaine du Roi, Mademoiselle, destinée au trône, Mademoiselle, le seul parti de France qui fût digne de Monsieur. Voilà un beau sujet de discourir. Si vous criez, si vous êtes hors de vous-même, si vous dites que nous avons menti, que cela est faux, qu'on se moque de vous, que voilà une belle raillerie, que, cela, est bien fado à imaginer; si enfin vous nous dites des injures, nous

On the 19th of June he was informed of his sentence, and on the 20th of the same month it was executed in all its points, in the presence of an innumerable multitude, who flocked from all parts to see his death.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXIX.—A MAN IMPRISONED IN ENGLAND FOR FORTY YEARS WITHOUT BEING DECLARED GUILTY.

THE story of Major Bernardi has been told at considerable length in the 'Biographia Britannica,' and we think also in the 'Lounger's Common-Place Book,' though we cannot find it on referring to that work. Probably it was in the additional volume subsequently printed, which we do not happen to have by us. The following abridgment is taken from the 'General Biographical Dictionary.' The Major's "courage" in venturing upon a second marriage we do not understand. The courage was rather on the side of the lady, in wedding a poor man and a prisoner. She appears to have been a noble-hearted woman, and to have met with a man that deserved her. But both the parties seem to have been truly attached, and, as far as the marriage union is concerned, what courage is there in having one's way under those circumstances? The biographer appears also to have been too hasty in calling the children "inheritors of misery and confinement," and assuming it as "probable" that they were left destitute. Why need he have assumed anything so melancholy of the children of two such people, happy with each other and in their own virtues, and therefore not likely to have had such a prospect to contemplate? The most likely thing is, that two people, so good and kind, had some reliance upon the future, of whatever nature, sufficient to warrant the calmness of their philosophy.

Major Bernardi's history is a puzzle, and of very doubtful credit to the energy of the government at that period, and its professed liberality. The probability, we think, is, that he was in possession of some state secret, which, out of a sense of duty to his old master, he refused to give up.

JOHN BERNARDI, says the biographer, usually called Major Bernardi, was born at Evesham, in 1657, and was descended from an honourable family which had flourished at Lucca in Italy, from the year 1097. His grandfather Philip, a count of the Roman empire, lived in England as resident from Genoa twenty-eight years, and married a native of this country. His father Francis succeeded to this office; but, taking disgust at some measures adopted by the senate at Genoa, resigned, and retiring to Evesham, amused himself with gardening, on which he spent a considerable sum of money, and set a good example in that science to the town. John, his son, the subject of this article, of a spirited and restless temper, having received some harsh usage from his father, at the age of thirteen ran away to avoid his severity, and perhaps without any determinate purpose. He retained, notwithstanding, several friends, and was for some time supported by them, but their friendship appears to have gone little farther; for soon after he enlisted as a common soldier in the service of the Prince of Orange. In this station he showed uncommon talents and bravery, and in a short time obtained a captain's commission in the service of the States. In April 1677, he married a Dutch lady of good family, with whom he enjoyed much conjugal happiness for eleven years. The English regiments in the Dutch service being recalled by James II, very few of them, but among these few was Bernardi's, would obey the summons, and of course, he could not sign the association, into which the Prince of Orange wished the regiments to enter. He thus lost his favour, and having no other alternative, and probably wishing for no other, he followed the abdicated James II into Ireland; who soon after, sent him on some commission into Scotland, from whence, as the ruin of his master now became inevitable, he once more retired to Holland. Venturing, however, to appear in London in 1695, he was committed to Newgate, March 25, 1696, on suspicion of being an abettor of the plot to assassinate king William; and although sufficient evidence could not be brought to prove the fact, he was sentenced and continued in prison by the express decree of six successive parliaments, with five other persons, where he remained for more than forty years. As this was a circumstance wholly without a precedent, it has been supposed that there was something in his character particularly dangerous, to induce four sovereigns and six parliaments to protract his confinement, without either legally condemning or pardoning him.

In his confinement he had the courage to venture on a second marriage, which proved a very fortunate event to him, as he thus not only enjoyed the soothing converse of a true friend, but was even supported during his whole imprisonment by the care and industry of his wife. Ten children were the produce of this marriage, the inheritors of misery and confinement. In the mean time he is said to have borne his imprisonment with such resignation and evenness of temper, as to have excited much respect and love in the few who enjoyed his acquaintance. In the earlier part of his life he had received several dangerous wounds, which now breaking out afresh, and giving him great torment, afforded a fresh trial of his equanimity and firmness. At length he died Sept. 20, 1796, leaving his wife and numerous family probably in a destitute state; but what became of them afterwards is not known. Bernardi was a little, brisk, and active man, of a very cheerful disposition, and, as may appear from this short narrative, of great courage and constancy of mind.

SONNET.

INSCRIBED AFFECTIONATELY TO LUKE THOMPSON, ESQ., YORK.

[We violate a rule, under our new system, in giving insertion to the following Sonnet; but the circumstances which have come to our knowledge as giving rise to it, are so creditable to all parties, that we could not but do it such honour as lay in our power. Readers, however, must still be good enough to bear in mind, for all sakes, that we are obliged to decline elegancies of the like nature in general.—Ed.]

STILL in this glen, deep-channelled in the woods,
Untrod by pilgrim now, fair RIVAUX! stands,
Though bruised and broken by Time's serpent-folds,
The glorious fabric once of pious hands—
In splendid ruin! What a thrilling scene
Of solitude, of grandeur, of decay,—
With stream and woodland graced, and meadows
green,
Where Peace unchallenged holds perennial sway!
Yet doubly dear to me, since yonder cot,
Yon modest home of independent worth,
To holiest duties aye a welcome spot,
Saw Hope delighted wait upon the birth
Of him, whom Friendship, without slight of other,
Gave me to love instead of a young brother.

Old May Day, 1835.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM MAZLITT.

XX.—HENRY VI. IN THREE PARTS.

DURING the time of the civil wars of York and Lancaster, England was a perfect bear-garden, and Shakspear has given us a very lively picture of the scene. The three parts of Henry VI. convey a picture of very little else; and are inferior to the other historical plays. They have brilliant passages; but the general ground-work is comparatively poor and meagre, the style "flat and unraised." There are few lines like the following:—

"Glory is like a circle in the water;
Which never ceaseth to enlarge itself,
Till by broad spreading it disperses to nought."

The first part relates to the wars in France after the death of Henry V. and the story of the Maid of Orleans. She is here almost as severely treated as in Voltaire's Pucelle. Talbot is a very magnificent sketch: there is something as formidable in this portrait of him, as there would be in a monumental figure of him, or in the sight of the armour which he wore. The scene in which he visits the Countess of Auvergne, who seeks to entrap him, is a very spirited one, and his description of his own treatment while a prisoner to the French is not less remarkable.

"SALISBURY. Yet tell'st thou not how thou wast entertained."

TALBOT. With scoffs and sneers, and contumelious terms.

In open market-place produced they me,
To be a public spectacle to all.
Here, said they, is the terror of the French,
The scarecrow that affrights our children so.
Then broke I from the officers that led me,
And with my naked digg'd stones out of the ground,

To hurl at the beholders of my shame.
My grisly countenance made others fly,
None durst come near for fear of sudden death.
In iron walls they deem'd me not secure:
So great a fear my name amongst them spread,
That they supposed I could rend bars of steel,
And spurn in pieces poets of adamant.
Wherefore a guard of chosen shot I had:
They walk'd about me every minute while;
And if I did but stir out of my bed,
Ready they were to shoot me to the heart.

The second part relates chiefly to the contests between the nobles during the minority of Henry, and the death of Gloucester, the good Duke Humphrey. The character of Cardinal Beaufort is the most prominent in the group: the account of his death is one of our author's master-pieces. So is the speech of Gloucester to the nobles on the loss of the provinces of France by the King's marriage with Margaret of Anjou. The pretensions and growing ambition of the Duke of York, the father of Richard III. are also very ably developed. Among the episodes, the tragi-comedy of Jack Cade, and the detection of the impostor Simcox are truly edifying.

The third part describes Henry's loss of his crown: his death takes place in the last act, which is usually thrust into the common acting play of Richard III. The character of Gloucester, afterwards King Richard, is here very powerfully commenced, and his dangerous designs and long-reaching ambition are fully described in his soliloquy in the third act, beginning, "Ay, Edward will use women honourably." Henry VI. is drawn as distinctly as his high-spirited Queen, and notwithstanding the very mean figure which Henry makes as a king, we still feel more respect for him than for his wife.

We have already observed that Shakspear was scarcely more remarkable for the force and marked contrasts of his characters than for the truth and subtlety with which he has distinguished those which approached the nearest to each other. For instance, the soul of Othello is hardly more distinct from that of Iago than that of Desdemona is shewn to be from Emilia's; the ambition of Macbeth is as distinct from the ambition of Richard III. as it is from the meekness of Duncan;—the real madness of Lear is as different from the feigned madness of Edgar* as from the babbling of the fool;—the contrast between wit and folly in Falstaff and Shallow is not more characteristic though more obvious than the gradations of folly, loquacious or reserved, in Shallow and Silence;—and again, the gallantry of Prince Henry is as little confounded with that of Hotspur as with the cowardice of Falstaff, or as the sensual and philosophic cowardice of the Knight is with the pitiful and cringing cowardice of Parolles. All these several personages were as different in Shakspear as they would have been in themselves: his imagination borrowed from the life, and every circumstance, object, motive, passion, operated there as it would in reality, and produced a world of men and women as distinct, as true and as various as those that exist in nature. The peculiar property of Shakspear's imagination was this truth, accompanied with the unconsciousness of nature: indeed, imagination to be perfect must be unconscious, at least in production; for nature is so.—We shall attempt one example more in the characters of Richard II. and Henry VI.

The characters and situations of both these persons were so nearly alike, that they would have been completely confounded by a common-place poet. Yet they are kept quite distinct in Shakspeare. Both were kings, and both unfortunate. Both lost their crowns owing to their mismanagement and imbecility; the one from a thoughtless, wilful abuse of power, the other from an indifference to it. The manner in which they bear their misfortunes corresponds exactly to the causes which led to them. The one is always lamenting the loss of his power, which he has not the spirit to regain; the other seems only to regret that he had ever been king, and is glad to be rid of the power with the trouble; the effeminacy of the one is that of a voluptuary,—proud, revengeful, impatient of contradiction, and inconsolable in his misfortunes; the effeminacy of the other is that of an indolent, good-natured mind, naturally averse to the turmoils of ambition and the cares of greatness, and who wishes to pass his time in monkish indolence and contemplation.—Richard bewails the loss of the kingly power only as it was the means of gratifying his pride and luxury; Henry regards it only as a means of doing right, and is less desirous of the advantages to be derived from possessing it, than afraid of exercising it wrong. In knighting a young soldier, he gives him ghostly advice—

"Edward Plantagenet, arise a knight,
And learn this lesson, draw thy sword in right."

Richard II. in the first speeches of the play betrays his real character. In the first alarm of his pride, on hearing of Bolingbroke's rebellion, before his presumption has met with any check, he exclaims—

* There is another instance of the same distinction in Hamlet and Ophelia. Hamlet's pretended madness would make a very good real madness in any other author.

"Mock not my senseless conjuration, lords:
This earth shall have a feeling, and these stones
Prove armed soldiers, ere her native king
Shall faultier under proud rebellious arms.

Not all the water in the rough rude sea
Can wash the balm from an anointed king;
The breath of worldly man cannot depose
The deputy elected by the Lord.
For every man that Bolingbroke hath prest,
To lift sharp steel against our golden crown,
Heaven for his Richard hath in heavenly pay
A glorious angel; then if angels fight, Weak men must fall; for Heaven still guards the right."

Yet, notwithstanding this royal confession of faith, on the very first news of actual disaster, all his conceit of himself as the peculiar favourite of Providence vanishes into air.

"But now the blood of twenty thousand men
Did triumph in my face, and they are fled.
All souls that will be safe fly from my side;
For time hath set a blot upon my pride."

Immediately after, however, recollecting that "cheap defence" of the divinity of kings which is to be found in opinion, he is for arming his name against his enemies.

"Awake, thou coward Majesty, thou sleep'st;
Is not the King's name forty thousand names?
Arm, arm, my name: a puny subject strikes
At thy great glory."

King Henry does not make any such vapouring resistance to the loss of his crown, but lets it slip from off his head as a weight which he is neither able nor willing to bear; stands quietly by to see the issue of the contest for his kingdom, as if it were a game at push-pin, and is pleased when the odds prove against him.

When Richard first hears of the death of his favourite, Bushy, Bagot, and the rest, he indignantly rejects all idea of any further efforts, and only indulges in the extravagant impatience of his grief and his despair, in that fine speech which has been so often quoted:—

"AUMERLE. Where is the duke my father, with his power?"

K. RICHARD. No matter where: of comfort no man speak.

Let's talk of graves, of worms, and epitaphs,
Make dust our paper, and with rainy eyes
Write sorrow in the bosom of the earth!
Let's choose executors and talk of wills:
And yet not so—for what can we bequeath,
Save our deposed bodies to the ground?
Our lands, our lives, and all are Bolingbroke's.
And nothing can we call our own but death,
And that small model of the barren earth,
Which serves as paste and cover to our bones.
For heaven's sake let us sit upon the ground,
And tell sad stories of the death of Kings:
How some have been deposed, some slain in war;
Some haunted by the ghosts they dispossessed;
Some poison'd by their wives, some sleeping kill'd;
All murder'd!—for within the hollow crown,
That rounds the mortal temples of a king,
Keeps death his court: and there the antic sits,
Scoffing his state, and grinning at his pomp!
Allowing him a breath, a little scene,
To monarchize, be fear'd, and kill with looks;
Infusing him with self and vain conceit—
As if this flesh, which walls about our life,
Were brass impregnable; and, humour'd thus,
Comes at the last, and with a little pin,
Bores through his castle wall, and—farewell king!
Cover your heads, and mock not flesh and blood
With solemn reverence; throw away respect,
Tradition, form, and ceremonious duty,
For you have but mistook me all this while:
I live on bread like you, feel want, taste grief,
Need friends, like you;—subjected thus,
How can you say to me—I am a king?"

There is as little sincerity afterwards in his affected resignation to his fate, as there is fortitude in this exaggerated picture of his misfortunes before they have happened.

When Northumberland comes back with the message from Bolingbroke, he exclaims, anticipating the result,—

"What must the king do now? Must he submit?
The king shall do it: must he be deposed?
The king shall be contented: must he lose
The name of king? O' God's name let it go:
I'll give my jewels for a set of beads;
My gorgeous palace for a hermitage;
My gay apparel for an alm's-man's gown;
My stirr'd goblets for a dish of wood;
My sceptre for a palmer's walking staff;
My subjects for a pair of carved saints,
And my large kingdom for a little grave—
A little, little grave, an obscure grave."

How differently is all this expressed in King Henry's soliloquy during the battle with Edward's party:—

"This battle fares like to the morning's war,
When dying clouds contend with growing light,
What time the shepherd blowing of his nails,
Can neither call it perfect day or night.
Here on this mole-hill will I sit me down;
To whom God will, there be the victory!
For Margaret my Queen and Clifford too
Have chid me from the battle, swearing both
They prosper best of all whence I am thence.
Would I were dead, if God's good will were so.
For what is in this world but grief and woe?
O God! methinks it were a happy life
To be no better than a homely swain,
To sit upon a hill as I do now,
To carve out dials quaintly, point by point,
Thereby to see the minutes how they run;
How many make the hour full complete,
How many hours bring about the day,
How many days will finish up the year,
How many years a mortal man may live.
When this is known, then to divide the times;
So many hours must I tend my flock,
So many hours must I take my rest,
So many hours must I contemplate,
So many hours must I sport myself;
So many days my ewes have been with young,
So many weeks ere the poor fools will yean,
So many months ere I shall shear the fleece;
So many minutes, hours, weeks, months, and years
Past over, to the end they were created,
Would bring white hairs unto a quiet grave.
Ah! what a life were this! how sweet, how lovely!
Gives not the hawthorn bush a sweeter shade
To shepherds looking on their silly sheep,
Than doth a rich embroidered canopy
To kings that fear their subjects' treachery?
O yes! it doth, a thousand fold it doth.
And to conclude, the shepherds homely curds,
His cold thin drink out of his leather bottle,
His wonted sleep under a fresh tree's shade,
All which secure and sweetly he enjoys,
Is far beyond a prince's delicacies,
His viands sparkling in a golden cup,
His body couched in a curious bed,
When care, mistrust, and treasons wait on him."

This is a true and beautiful description of a naturally quiet and contented disposition, and not, like the former,
the splenetic effusion of disappointed ambition.

In the last scene of Richard II. his despair lends him courage: he beats the keeper, slays two of his assassins, and dies with imprecations in his mouth against Sir Pierce Exton, who "had staggered his royal person." Henry, when he is seized by the deer-stealers, only reads them a moral lecture on the duty of allegiance and the sanctity of an oath; and, when stabbed by Gloucester in the Tower, reproaches him with his crimes, but pardons him his own death.

RECOLLECTIONS OF CHARLES LAMB.

There was something so peculiarly characteristic, and (for lack of a better word) interesting, in the personal appearance of Charles Lamb, that the want of an adequate portrait of him is greatly to be regretted.

It is a remarkable fact, that we have no tolerable portraits, much less any adequate ones, of nine-tenths of the distinguished men of our own day. Though, upon the whole, Art was never in so creditable a condition among us as it has been during the last quarter of a century—and especially the portrait department of it—yet we may look in vain for anything like worthy effigies of the men who have illustrated that period to a degree that was never before equalled in our annals. And this while the press literally teems with imaginary portraits, culled from every possible source, and executed in a manner that leaves nothing to wish for—except the only thing worth wishing for at all in a portrait—the truth! At the moment, we do not call to mind a single worthy representation of any one of our great poets or prose writers, other excepting Boxall's portrait of Wordsworth, engraved in mezzotint by Bromley. The only means which the general public have, whereby to judge of the outward appearance of their most popular writers and instructors, are the various series of mere ébauches, which have appeared in certain of the periodical works of the day; and even of those, half have been, in a great degree, as "imaginary" as the 'Byron Beauties' or the 'Gallery of the Graces'; and of the other half, many have been mere caricatures, and not a few, mere "historical recollections" of what the originals were, before anybody cared anything about them!

Of Lamb there have been three or four miserable attempts at portraiture: the last (that in 'Fraser's Magazine') the most miserable of all. By many degrees the best—or rather the least unsatisfactory—was one that appeared in the Suffolk street Exhibition, some five or six years ago, by an artist named (I think) Meyer. There was a general resemblance to the form and look of the face—what is called by courtesy a "likeness;"—but as to the high and various intellectual characteristics of it, they were wholly wanting, no less than the general and individual expressions; and in their place we had one of those amiable nonentities, so aptly described as "portrait of a gentleman." Let those who have ever seen Charles Lamb "in his habit as he lived," conceive him figuring in a public exhibition, under the above designation!

Those who have not seen him, and who nevertheless know enough of him, through his exquisite writings, to feel an interest in these desultory recollections, will doubtless expect me to describe his person. But I fear that when I have done so as distinctly as I can, they will know not much more about him than they may have learned by looking on the would-be effigies of him alluded to above. But at least they will learn something different; so I will make the attempt.

I do not know whether Lamb had any oriental blood in his veins; but I cannot help thinking, that by far the most marked characteristic of his head was a Jewish look, which pervaded every part of it, even to the sallow and uniform complexion, and the black and crisp hair standing off loosely from the head, as if every single hair was independent of the rest. His nose, too, was large and slightly hooked, and his chin rounded and elevated to correspond. Thus much of form merely. For intellectual character and expression a finer face was never seen, or one more fully, however vaguely, corresponding with the mind whose features were marked upon it.
There was something Rabbinical about it, yet blended with a mingled sadness and sweetness, which gave to it an effect quite peculiar, yet in all respects pleasing. There was the gravity of learning and knowledge, without the slightest tinge of their usual assumption and affectation; the intensity and the elevation of genius, without any of its pretension or its oddity; there was the sadness of high thought and baffled aspirations, but none of the severity and the spirit of scorning and contempt that these are so apt to engender. Above all, there was a pervading sweetness and gentleness of general expression, which went straight to the heart of everyone who looked on it; and not the less so, perhaps, that it bore about it an air, a something, seeming to tell that it was,—not put on—for nothing would be more unjust than to charge Lamb with assuming anything, even a virtue, which he did not feel,—but preserved and persevered in, spite of opposing and contradictory feelings within, that struggled (in vain) for mastery. It was something to remind you of the painful smile that disease and agony will sometimes put on, to conceal their pangs from the observance of those they love.

I feel it a very difficult and delicate task to speak of this peculiar feature in Lamb's physiognomy; and the more so that (from not having seen or heard it noticed by others) I am by no means sure of meeting with an accordance in the opinions, or rather the feelings, of those who knew him as well, or even better, than I did. But I am sure that the peculiarity
I speak of was there, and therefore I venture to persevere in alluding to it for a moment longer, with a view to its seeming explanation. The truth then is, that Lamb was what is by no means so contradictory or so uncommon a character as the inobedient may deem it: he was a most gentle, amiable, and tender-hearted—misanthrope! He hated or despised men with his mind and judgment, in proportion as (and precisely because) he loved and yearned towards them in his heart; and, individually, he loved those best whom everybody else hated. He generally through life had two or three especial pets, who were always the most disagreeable people in the world—to the world; and to be taken into his favour and protection, you had only to get discarded, defamed, and shunned by everybody else. If I may venture so to express myself, there was, in Lamb's eyes, a sort of virtue in sin and its ill consequences to the sinner.
He seemed to open his arms and his heart to "the rejected and reviled of men," in a spirit kindred at least with that of the Deity himself.

Returning to the description of Lamb's personal appearance—his head, which I have endeavoured to characterise, might have belonged to a full-sized person; but it was set upon a figure so petite, that it acquired an appearance of inappropriate largeness by the comparison. This was the only striking peculiarity in the ensemble of his figure. In other respects it was well formed, though so slight and delicate as to bear the appearance of extreme spareness, as if that of a man air-fed, instead of one rejoicing in an avowed predilection for roast pig! Its only defect was, that the legs were even too slight for the slight body; and that was only observable from the peculiar costume of the owner.

Lamb had laid aside his snuff-coloured suit before I knew him; and during the last ten years of his life, he was never seen in anything but a suit of uniform black, with knee breeches, and (sometimes, not always) gaiters of the same to meet them. Probably he was induced to admit this innovation by a sort of compromise with his affection for the colour of other years;—for though his dress was "black" in name and nature, he always contrived that it should exist only in a state of rusty brown. I can scarcely account for his having left off his suit of the latter colour, especially as he had stuck to it through the daily ordeal, for twenty years, of the Long Room of the East India House. He abandoned it, I think, somewhere about the time his friend Wordsworth put forth his ideal of the personal appearance of a poet; which may perchance have been drawn, in part, from Lamb himself,—so exact is the likeness in several leading particulars.

"But who is he, with modest looks,
And clad in homely russet brown,
Who murmurs near the running brooks
A music sweeter than their own?"

"He is retired as noontide dew,
Or fountain in a noonday grove;
And you must love him e'er to you
He will seem worthy of your love," &c. &c.

Now Lamb did not like to be taken for a poet, or for anything else; so, latterly, he always dressed in a way to be taken, by ninety-nine people out of every hundred who looked upon him, for a Methodist preacher! the last person in the world that he really was like! This was one of his little wilful contradictions.

FINE ARTS.

The Poetical Works of John Milton. Edited by Sir E. Brydges. With Imaginative Illustrations by J. M. W. Turner, R.A. Vol. II. Macrone.

WHY Mr Turner's illustrations are so particularly described as imaginative it is difficult to guess. Any designs are to be supposed to possess some amount of imagination, inasmuch as they fulfil a part of the poet's creation that is beyond the means with which he works—the visible image; for if the artist do not to a certain extent partake in the poet's inspiration, his bodying forth will not coincide with the author's, and will be no illustration, but only an incumbrance to the text. Just as an artist must see something of the same country with a traveller whose works he would illustrate; or, unless he copies other men, he will be quite at sea, and give us, perhaps, English, French, or Dutch figures to illustrate travels in Asia.

It is therefore tautological to talk of imaginative designs, unless, indeed, the artist takes up some matter of fact text, and runs a commentary of fanciful designs upon it, not obviously suggested by the language itself. But is this the way to treat the work of a great poet? or has Mr Turner so treated the Paradise Lost? On the contrary, imagination is the most glaring deficiency in the design before us—'The Expulsion from Paradise!' There is, it is true, prodigious effort, and a bold defiance of the ordinary rules for making a fine picture furnished by all theory and practice; no attempt at unity or concentration; on the other hand, no attempt at size or aggrandizing mystery. The only power exhibited is that of obtaining a considerable effect of brilliancy; and thus a bright flood of light is thrown upon a crowded, disorderly assemblage of petty details, too distinct and pretty for even a spurious grandeur, too vague and careless for truth. We have spoken of the 'Expulsion from Paradise,' with regard to the whole scene. As a design it is difficult to handle, it is so scattered and fragile: a splendid gateway is the groundwork of the grouping, not so large or magnificent but that some luxurious Emperor might have had the like to his pleasure-grounds; below are the expelled pair driven forth by a quasi angel; above is the flaming sword, looking very little and pretty, and out of place, in a cabinet-maker's style of ornament; and there are a few angels, male and female, helmeted and robed in most theatrical style, suitable to a burlesque at the Olympie, but most unfit to bind up with the gigantic, severe sublimities of the Paradise Lost. The good thing in the design is the landscape behind, which is manseered, but certainly a beautiful scene, not unlike the view from Richmond Terrace.

Romney's design of 'Milton dictating to his Daughters' is impressive, from the broad light and shade, and the simplicity of the general treatment.

The figure of Milton is disposed a little too much in the melodramatic fashion, with a mantle shouldered up to the chin; and the girls' countenances, perhaps, answer too well to certain apocryphal traditions of their having been far from agreeable; but nothing can be better than the simplicity of the grouping, and the broad and solemn masses of light and shade. The artist felt the character of the poem while he thus depicted its creation. This is to illustrate.

Brambletye House. By Horace Smith. Vol. II. Colburn.

The two illustrations in this number are clever, but the execution of the engraving is such as to mar them considerably; it is black, heavy, and cut up. The old man in the vignette is very good; and the frontispiece, in a design which very aptly tells the story, includes a faithful portrait of that thoughtless old child, Isaac Walton. We omitted to mention in our notice of the first volume of this new edition of 'Brambletye House,' that Mr Horace Smith has given an interesting account of his first acquaintance with Mr Colburn as a publisher, highly honourable to both parties.

History of British Fishes. By W. Yarrell, F.L.S. Parts IV. V. Longman and Co.

This excellent work as much delights us with the beautiful execution of its many wood-cuts as it did at first. We are particularly pleased with the variety in the manner; the style of execution being chosen that is best adapted to the imitation of the immediate object of each; the bright, sharp, firm surface of the Lead, the dowdy John Dory, and the black, slippery Blackfish, and the spectral Vagmæ, are capital instances of this variety of execution, and of the spirit and delicacy of all.

In part V. the tail-pieces are more numerous and more varied; and are highly amusing and pleasant. The sly connoisseur in fish, at page 288, the fish-woman, burly and lax-gowned, the view on the Arun, so calm and solitary, and the fishermen and boats, at page 229, are so many piquant and agreeable amplifications of the text, supplying, as illustrations should do, little bits of collateral information as we go.

CRITICISM ON MRS RADCLIFFE'S 'ITALIAN.'

Finished the 'Italian.' This work will maintain, but not extend, Mrs Radcliffe's fame as a novelist. It has the same excellences and defects as her former compositions. In the vivid exhibition of the picturesque of nature, in the delineation of strong and dark character, in the excitation of horror by physical and moral agency, I know not that Mrs R. has any equal; but she languishes in spinning the thread of the narrative on which these excellences are strung; natural characters and incidents are feebly represented; probability is often strained without sufficient compensation; and the development of those mysteries which have kept us so long stretched on the rack of terror and impatience (an unthankful task at best) is lame and impotent. Eleanor and Vivaldi, either in their separate character or mutual attachment (a wire drawn theme), touched me but little; but I confess myself to have been deeply and violently impressed by the midnight examination of the corpse of Bianchi; by the atrocious conference of Schedoni and the Marchesa, in the dim twilight of the church of San Nicolo; and, above all, by what passed in Spalatro's solitary dwelling on the sea-shore.—Diary of a Lover of Literature.—[This striking romance is now to be had entire, in Mr Limbird's edition, for two abillings! with wood-cuts to boot.]

VIRGIL'S TOMB.

The tomb of the Mantuan poet is situated on the height of Pausilippo: it consists of a small structure shaped like a rude hut, but evidently of ancient date. It is overgrown with rich vegetation; the wild aloe and prickly pear issue from its clefts, and ivy and other parasites climb up its sides, and cling thickly to its summits. A dark rock rises immediately before; it is shut in, secluded and tranquil: but at the distance of only a few yards, a short ascent leads to the top of the hill, where the whole of the bay of Naples opens itself to the eye. The exceeding beauty of this scene fills every gazer with delight; the widespread sea is adorned by various islands, and by picturesque promontories which shut in secluded bays; the earth is varied by hills, dells, and lakes, by towering heights and woody ravines; the sky, serenely though darkly blue, imparts matchless hue to the elements beneath. Nature presents her most enchanting aspect; and the voice of human genius breathing from the silent tomb, speaks of the influence of the imagination of man, and of the power which he possesses to communicate his ideas in all their warmth and beauty to his fellow-creatures.—Lives of Eminent Italians.

THE RAISER OF THE FAMILY.

[Now that people wear their hair plain, there is something ludicrous as well as touching in the incident of the hair-powder. But Nature carries everything before it; and the old grandmother is venerable and affecting.]—Towards evening Wilhelm took his son to walk in the fields. He spoke much with him on his past and future fate, just in the manner of old Stilling; so that his son was penetrated with reverence. At length Wilhelm said, "Hear me my son; thou must visit thy grandmother; she suffers much from the rheumatism, and will not live much longer. She very often speaks of thee, and wishes to converse with thee once more before her end." The next morning, therefore, Stilling rose and went to Tiefenbach. How he felt when he saw the old castle, der hitzige Stein, the Giller, and the village itself! His sensations were inexpressible; he examined himself, and found, that if he were able, he would gladly exchange his present state for that of his youth. He arrived in a short time, at the village; all the people ran out, so that he came, as it were, in a crowd, to the venerable house of his father. He felt a thrill through him as he entered, just as if he had been entering some ancient temple. His aunt Elizabeth was in the kitchen; she ran to him, gave him her hand, and led him into the parlour; there lay his grandmother, Margaret Stilling, in a neat little bed by the wall, near the stove; her chest was drawn upwards, the joints in her hand were swollen, and the fingers stiff and turned inwards. Stilling ran to her, took hold of her hand, and said with tears in his eyes, "How are you, my dear grandmother? It rejoices my soul to see you again." She strove to raise herself up, but sank powerless back again. "Ah!" cried she, "I can still hear and feel thee before my bed; come nearer to me, that I may feel thy face again!" Stilling bent himself towards her; she felt his forehead, and in doing this her stiff fingers came in contact with his hair, and she felt the powder. "So," said she, "thou art the first of our family that has worn powder; but be not the first to forget integrity and the fear of God!"—Autobiography of Heinrich Stilling.

A PIECE OF TRUE CRITICISM.

Here, I see, is a landscape of Ruysdael; how different from his ordinary subjects, and yet how completely in his best style! Unnumbered times that prospect has haunted me. Could you have conceived, without seeing it, that there is so much beauty in a flat extent of meadow, with a pool at one corner, and a humble church in the distance? How often does everyone look at a similar landscape, and turn away from it with indifference! A man of genius sees in it at a glance all that it really involves of beauty; and when he has created it anew upon his canvass, it remains for ever a portion of the more splendid region, towards which our thoughts habitually journey. Who can forget that glow of emerald in the centre, (where the sunshine escapes out of the clouds) that glimmer on the water, and the clear tranquil shades over the rest of the prospect, through which the grey steeple lifts itself! That unpretending expanse of verdure belongs, does it not, Isabel? to the Eden, the Meru, the Isles of Asphodel, and the Fairy-land, which hover like evening clouds above our actual earth, and to which we constantly recur as to our evening home. To say so much of Claude is comparatively nothing; for by his enchanted seas, and sculptured palaces, and spiritual atmosphere, and fields visited of the gods, he evidently designed to produce this impression. But here is a fog-encircled Dutchman, snatching, he knew not wherefore, at every shred of natural beauty within his reach; and who, when he has gazed upon a patch of green grass, and a sky of broken cloud, exalts it into a province of the mind's imperishable kingdom.—Arthur Co-ningsby.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIMENS of the English Poets, No. VI, next week.

We are obliged to PHILOMATH, but if we inserted a paper of the kind sent us, we should hurt the feelings of many Correspondents, by the necessity of declining many similar to it.

If J. S. is a very young beginner indeed in Logic, he might commence with 'Pinnock's Catechism,' and afterwards go to the treatise by Dr Watts.

THE PRINTING MACHINE.

NEW EDITION OF THE WEALTH OF NATIONS.

An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. By Adam Smith, LL.D.; with a Commentary by the Author of 'England and America.' In six vols. Vol. I. 12mo. London. 1865. Pp. 329. 5s.

If this were nothing more than a reprint of 'The Wealth of Nations,' the appearance of such a work in the cheap and popular mode of publication by periodical volumes, which has been hitherto employed almost exclusively in the case of works of light reading and entertainment, would be an event in literature worthy of notice, and that, considered as an indication, might afford some matter for remark. But at present we must give our attention not to Adam Smith, but to his new commentator. All that we shall say of the reprint is, that it is beyond comparison the handsomest, as well as the most easily read and handled of any we have. The bulk and form of the volume are those of a manual, or a book for the pocket, and the type, both of text and commentary, is as large and clear as any eye can desire. This edition of 'The Wealth of Nations' also contains Dugald Stewart's able and interesting account of the life and writings of the author, not abridged, as usual, but printed at length, together with a translation of the Abbé Garnier's useful little treatise, entitled 'A short view of the Doctrine of Smith compared with that of the French Economists.' Prefixed to the volume is a portrait of Smith, engraved by Holl, from Tassie's medallion, the only original likeness that exists of this distinguished writer.

The commentary is given in the form of notes appended to the several chapters, and its quantity in the present volume is not much less than half that of the text.

In several respects this commentary is one of the most remarkable works the science of Political Economy has ever produced: in one respect it is, perhaps, the most remarkable. It will do more than even Adam Smith's great work to ventilate and dust the science. In his Preface the writer makes the following frank declaration, which will doubtless shock many, and startle more, but which the perusal of the volume will, we apprehend, abundantly justify to most people: "I am humbly, but very sincerely, of opinion, that the science of Political Economy is yet in its infancy. Even the alphabet of the science, —the meaning of every common term, whether used by the vulgar or by the most learned professors, is still unsettled. There is scarcely a term of any weight which is not employed by different persons, and even by the same person, to express different meanings; while the known principles of the science leave unexplained some of its most important phenomena." And let us add, that this is the case with every one of the moral sciences, without exception.

What havoc might we not make on any system of ethics or metaphysics in existence by the application of this test of important phenomena which it leaves unexplained! In conformity with the expressions we have just quoted, the author afterwards says, in enumerating five objects he has particularly had in view in this commentary:—"My fourth object has been to warn the student in political economy against implicit faith in the doctrines of a science which yet wants a complete alphabet; to show how imperfect that science is, after all that has been done for it; and to indicate some questions of great moment, as it appears to me, concerning which next to nothing has been done. I offer the parts of my commentary which relate to this object, as a humble contribution towards the improvement of the science."

In matters of practical morality at least, the answer to the great question, what is Truth or Right? is almost universally, if not universally, 'The middle

term between two errors. Or more correctly, every truth produces two errors, flying off from it in opposite directions, and keeping at equal distances on each side of it. That is to say, to speak in the language of the mechanicians, the case is one, not of the combination, but of the resolution of forces; the middle line of truth is not the resultant diagonal of the parallelogram, but the two diverging sides are the produce of that middle line. Although, however, the errors may thus be said, in one sense, to be the offspring of the truth (just as every illusion must be the effect of something real), yet, in human speculation, the errors most frequently make their appearance first, and the truth seems to be produced or struck out, that is to say, is eventually discovered, by their opposition and collision. It is easy to see why this should be the case. The discovery of the error, that is of the partial truth, requires that only one side or half of the whole truth should be perceived. But the curious part of the process is the way in which the error or deviation on the right hand, giving rise in the first instance to an equivalent error on the left, brings men's minds eventually to the middle truth, and fixes them there. It seems to happen usually in this way. The first error shooting out from the truth, so as to form an angle with it, the farther its line is pursued, carries men farther away from the light, till they find themselves at length left half in the dark. It becomes plain, now, that they have been proceeding in a wrong direction,—and they very wisely abandon the track. But not quite so wisely, though perhaps naturally enough,—seeing that in all moral speculation we are drifted by winds and currents of imagination and passion, as well as guided by our reason,—having found that they were wrong in taking the path that led off to the right hand, they now, to mend the matter, set out anew in a correspondingly oblique direction towards the left;—because the north-east has failed them, they try the north-west. Using the terms with a popular latitude, as meaning, not the precise points of the compass technically so designated, but any points in the same quarters, there are numberless lines radiating in these lateral directions, but there is only one due north line. In other words, error is manifold, but truth is one. It is much more difficult to miss the former than to find the latter. Hence, in fact, the truth is in general only arrived at and discovered through a process of groping or gradual approximation—by the examination and rejection of one after another of errors lying on both sides of it, and, as it were, concealing it from our search.

There cannot be a better example of this common course which speculation takes, than is afforded by the history of what we may call the fundamental proposition of political economy, that which states what are the elements of production.

"The French economists, who invented the science of political economy," observes the author of the present commentary, (p. 233) "treated land as the only source of wealth: some of their successors in our day, carried away, it would seem, by Adam Smith's great discovery, that 'labour is the original purchase-money of all things,' have not even admitted land amongst the elements of production."

In fact, until very recently, the statement, or assumption, in all the modern treatises on Political Economy was, that the two and the only two elements of production were capital and labour. The author of the present commentary, in a former work, entitled 'England and America,' published only two or three years ago, was, we believe, the first who distinctly called attention to the importance of a third element, land, or, as he called it, by a more general expression, the field for the employment of capital. But the subject has nowhere been so systematically developed as it is in the volume before us. The deduction, as here given, is so perfect and beautiful, that although we must injure it by the compression to which we are obliged to resort, we shall endeavour to lay an abstract of it before our readers.

The writer begins by stating that since the publication of the 'WEALTH OF NATIONS,' two principles or general truths have been discovered, which throw new and most important light on the subject of wages and profits.

The first of these is what is called the Principle of Population, which is, simply, that there is a tendency in population to increase beyond the means of subsistence.

The second principle is thus explained by the present writer; and we request the attention of the reader to the statement:—

"In the next place, during the process by which a society arrives at the utmost limit of its supply of food, a circumstance occurs, by which the amount of that part of the produce of capital and labour which is divided between capitalists and labourers, comes to be continually diminished. The owners of land, in a word, come to obtain a continually increasing portion of that produce. The continual increase of that share of the produce raised by capital and labour, which falls to the owners of land, will be explained by referring to what happens on one occasion, when more capital and labour are employed with less return. In consequence of a certain increase of capital and people, capitalists are ready to invest their property with a smaller return. He who used to raise a hundred quarters of corn with a thousand pounds, is now ready to invest two thousand pounds on raising a hundred and fifty quarters. The second thousand pounds will produce only fifty quarters. But if one capitalist is content with fifty quarters as the return for a thousand pounds, competition will make all capitalists of the same mind with respect to all their capital; and their competition for the use of land will induce them to pay to the owner of land whatever return their capitals may bring above the ordinary rate of fifty quarters for a thousand pounds. Thus he who did employ a thousand pounds in raising a hundred quarters, will now raise a hundred and fifty quarters with two thousand pounds, and pay fifty quarters to the landlord. He will pay so much to the landlord, because, if he did not, some other would. This principle has been called the Theory of Rent."

This, it is to be observed, is a more comprehensive statement of what is called the Theory of Rent than has been given by any preceding writer, even including those by whom the theory was first broached. It explains not only the origin and progress of rent, but also, what has been in modern times one of the great puzzles of political economy, the cause of the diminution of the profits of capital as society advances. In fact, as we shall see presently, it resolves all the questions that can be raised respecting both high and low profits, and high and low wages:—

"The four following cases will describe all the common conditions of society, which exhibit different rates of profit and wages.

"First, the case in which capital bears a large proportion to labourers, and a small proportion to the field of production. The United States and some old colonies are the example. In this case, wages are high in share, and in amount; profits being, though low in share, high in amount.

"Secondly, the case in which capital bears a large proportion to labour, and also a large proportion to the field of production. High wages and low profits will be the result. The principle of population forbids that this should be a very common case, but it has occurred nevertheless; as, for example, in France, towards the close of the revolutionary war, when the conscription had rendered labourers scarce, and in several countries after a pestilence.

"Thirdly, the case in which capital bears a small proportion to labourers, and also a small proportion to the field of production. Low wages and high profits will be the result; the produce divided being great, but the labourer's share very small. This is the case in nearly all countries where, with superabundance of labourers in proportion to capital, there is plenty of room for the employment of more capital without any decrease of productiveness. Bengal is a good example, where capital has obtained enormous profits, while wages were at the rate of about twopence a day. This case of high profits with low wages, and the preceding case of low profits with high wages, would be, if profits and wages depended on nothing but the division of produce, the only cases that could by possibility occur.

Lastly, the case in which capital bears a small proportion to labour, and a great proportion to the field of production. This case gives low wages, and low profits also; that part of the produce of industry which is divided between labourers and capitalists, being reduced to so small an amount, that the capitalist, after giving the labourer but just enough to provide him with a motive for working, reserves for himself but just enough to provide him with a motive for continuing to employ labourers. There have been many examples of this case, as in Genoa, Venice, and Holland, but never was there a more striking one than that of Great Britain at the present time.

"Without, however, bearing in mind that all these are cases of mere proportion; that wages and profits depend, not on any absolute quantities of people, capital, and land, but on various proportions, whether the absolute quantities be increasing or diminishing, amongst the three elements of production; without attending to the distinction between positive and relative, we shall not arrive at a satisfactory explanation of the present state of Great Britain with regard to wages and profits.

"Political economists, following Adam Smith, describe three different states of society—the progressive, the stationary, and the retrograde. They call progressive, that state of society in which the field of production, and capital, increase as fast as population can possibly increase; so that profits and wages, both, being constantly high, the people do actually increase as fast as possible. They call stationary, that condition of society in which there is no further room for the productive employment of industry; in which case profits and wages are constantly as low as possible. They call the retrograde state of society, that in which the field of production constantly decreases; in which case, not only are profits and wages constantly at the minimum, but every year some capitalists are reduced to the state of labourers; and yet the labouring class becomes less and less numerous. The Venetian republic, and some of the Hanseatic towns, while they were gradually losing the trade by which they had obtained food, were examples of this case. But there appears to be a fourth state of society which, though stationary as to profits and wages, is progressive as to the extent of the field of production, the amount of capital, and the number of people. The field, the capital, and the people may increase, yet if the enlargement of the field be not more rapid than the increase of capital, no alteration of profits will occur; nor any alteration of wages, unless the field be enlarged and capital increased, both at the same time, more rapidly than people shall increase. All the elements of wealth may increase absolutely, but without any change in their proportions to each other. Though, in such a state of society, both capitalists and labourers will increase in number, though new means of communication will be formed, though fresh towns will arise, though the increase of population and of national wealth may be striking, nevertheless the rate of profit may still be very low, the rate of wages but just sufficient to permit an increase of labourers, the majority of capitalists in a state of uneasiness, and the whole body of labourers miserable and degraded. Nay, along with increasing national wealth, the state of capitalists and labourers may grow worse, provided that the field of production be not extended at the same rate with the increase of people and capital. This appears to have happened in Great Britain during the last twenty years. War ceasing, great masses of capital were no longer wasted every year, but were accumulated at home; new modes of investment were discovered; the number of capitalists was visibly augmented; signs of increasing wealth appeared in all directions. But as the field of production was not enlarged so rapidly as capital increased, more and more competition amongst capitalists made the condition of the greater number worse than that of the smaller number. In like manner, with respect to the labouring classes, together with the peace, which removed one check to the increase of people, came great improvements in medicine, and especially in treating the diseases of children, which removed other checks, and thus the common people increased faster than the field of employment for increasing capital. This change in the proportion between two of the elements of production, and the third, or chief element, while all three were rapidly increasing, explains the coincidence of rapidly increasing national wealth, with the greater uneasiness of the middle class, and the greater misery of the bulk of the people. It accounts for the loud outcry about pauperism and distress, in the midst of wealth so great, as to be without a parallel in the history of the world."

From the fact, it is afterwards observed, of the superabundance of capital, not in proportion to labourers, but in proportion to the means of profitable investment, some conclusions of the utmost practical moment may be deduced.

"If all the British men and money that were wasted during the last war; if, further, the hundreds of millions of capital which have been lent to Foreign Governments and lost in distant speculations during the peace, together with the hundreds of thousands of people who have emigrated from Britain during the last twenty years; if this prodigious mass of capital and people should be suddenly recalled, what would become of it? Inevitably, considering that the English field of production is full to overflowing,—so full, that every year witnesses the departure to other countries of a great amount of capital, and a great number of people,—somehow or other, an amount of capital and a number of people equal to the mass which had been recalled, must be speedily destroyed; but not, let us observe, until after a period of aggravated suffering amongst the whole body of small capitalists, and the whole of the labouring class. In what way, by what process would take place the destruction of that portion of capital for which there was no profitable employment? By means of investment without profit, or rather with loss; by means of undertakings in which the capital would be what is called "sunk;" by means of "selling at less than prime cost." Then should we see a terrible aggravation of that process by which, even at present, profit is turned into loss, and capital is effectually kept down to the limit of investment. If the national debt of Britain were paid off with available capital, by tribute from foreign countries, and if the amount of available capital were further increased by a total remission of taxes, the competition of British capitalists, one with another, would be more severe than ever; and along with so great an increase of national wealth, there would be more and more "distress;" in that case, it seems probable that the supposition of Mr Mill would come to pass, and "none but the owners of large masses of capital would be able to derive from it the means of subsistence." In that case, however, the people of Britain would see the true cause of their "distress;" we should hear no more of the burthen of taxation, and of relieving this or that interest by the repeal of some tax; the Chancellor of the Exchequer would no longer gravely talk of the fairness of relieving tiles, after having relieved bricks, and of doing something for soap, after having done so much for beer and leather. Nor would the town and country interests—on one side the farmers, on the other the manufacturers and dealers—be diverted, by the eager pursuit on either side of some peculiar but impossible relief, from seeking a general remedy for general uneasiness. In that case, provided, that is, the whole burthen of taxation were removed, and Britain were richer than at present by eight hundred millions, all classes would see what was, and therefore what had been, the cause of their distress. But what is the cause of the present low rate of profit in all employments alike, may be discovered by investigation without a miracle. If the view here taken of that cause should turn out to be correct, all the industrious classes of Britain will combine to raise the general rate of profit, by enlarging the field of employment for British capital and labour."

Dr. Chalmers, who has lately pointed out the inconveniences arising from a superabundance of capital, in a most striking manner, in his work entitled, On Political Economy in connexion with the Moral State and Moral Prospects of Society—a work which, as the present writer remarks, "so abounds in novel and important speculations, that no one who has derived his knowledge from other books on political economy can truly suppose that he has mastered that science, even in its present imperfect state"—has proposed as a check upon the growth of the evil in question, that capitalists should, individually, save less and spend more. He urges that, as the labouring classes can only effectually resist the decline of wages by refraining from over-population, so capitalists can only resist the decline of profits by refraining from over-speculation—by each, as he elsewhere expresses it, expending more of his capital on personal or family indulgences, and reserving less of it for additional outlay on his business. In this parallel, however, and the proposal deduced from it,—which, in the work before us, is approved of as being "not only a reasonable one, but the only one which points out a way of escape from the pauperism of labourers and the distress of capitalists—the only one, that is, provided there be no way of causing the field of employment for capital and labour to increase as fast as population and capital"—an important distinction seems to be overlooked, which exists between superabundance of population and superabundance of capital. Whatever inconveniences the latter may bring upon the community at large, an individual is certainly, in all cases, better off with a large capital than with a small one. A capital, however large, is never a burthen to its possessor, as a large family may be. We want altogether, therefore, in regard to capital, the motive which we may reasonably expect to act upon individuals in inducing them to refrain from over-population. That imprudence brings along with it a punishment to the individual committing it; the rapid production and accumulation of capital, whatever inconveniences it may entail upon the state, entails upon the producer and accumulator none. The larger his capital, and the faster he can increase it, the better for him, always.

The views of the present writer look in a different direction,—to the possibility, namely, of enlarging the field for the employment of capital and labour. Provided the means of such enlargement exist, he remarks, "and may be readily employed, all will allow that the time is not yet come for seeking to diminish either capital or population. The two means which do exist for enlarging the field of employment for British capital and labour, are Colonization, and the Importation of Food. Whether those measures are likely to prove adequate, as means to the end in view, will be considered in another place."

Next to this inquiry into the elements of production, which occurs in the latter part of the volume, the most important portion of the present commentary is the note on Smith's first chapter, the well known dissertation on the principle which he has called the Division of Labour. With more precision of phraseology, the author of the note prefers to call the principle the Division of Employments,—reserving the term labour to denote, not the operation, which Smith often uses it for, but the power actually exerted by the agent. In this use of the terms it is evident that in manufactures and all the other operations of an advanced state of society, there is both a division of employments, and a combination of labour. The present writer thinks that from his unfortunate adoption of the term "labour" in the less exact sense, Smith was led nearly to overlook the latter of these two things, which, however, is really the more important of the two, and is, moreover, that which gives rise to the division of employments. The practical conclusions to be drawn from a consideration of the principle of co-operation are here developed in a most ingenious and striking manner. We can only now afford to extract one or two paragraphs from the disquisition,—though we wish we had room for the whole. The following is the first conclusion stated:—

"1. The inhabitants of England, it may be presumed, obtain more and better food than the inhabitants of France; yet all the food of England is said to be raised by the labour of less than one-third of the people, while more than two-thirds of the people of France are supposed to be engaged in raising food for the whole. If it be so, then, in France, only three people are supported by the labour of two cultivators, while, in England, the labour of two cultivators supports six people; English agriculture is twice as productive as French agriculture. To what are we to attribute this remarkable difference? It has been attributed, and with much appearance of truth, to the French law of division, which, at the death of a French proprietor, separates his land into properties as numerous as his children, and which has thus established, in the greater part of France, a system of agriculture resembling that which is practised in the greater part of Ireland, where agricultural industry does not appear to be more productive than it is in France. In both countries, the greater part of the land is divided into very small farms, or rather separate fields. But this division of the land into small holdings does not in any degree affect its natural fertility; nay, the soils of France and Ireland are considered to be more fertile than the soil of England. In what way, then,—by what process is it, that this division of the land into a great number of small holdings, has so injurious an effect on the productiveness of agricultural labour in Ireland and France? By means, it would appear, of dividing the greater part of the agricultural labour of those countries into fractions as numerous as the labourers. A small cultivator in France, like a cottier in Ireland, works by himself, or at most with no other assistance than that of his children. Not only is his labour separated from that of all other workmen, but it is necessarily divided again amongst the several employments, few though they be, which must be pursued before the scanty wants of his family can be supplied: he practises the very reverse of the two great causes of improvement in the productiveness of labour, which are—combination of labour and division of employments; he divides labour into the smallest fraction into which it can be divided, viz., a single pair of hands; and he combines as many different employments as he has time to engage in. Only a portion of his labour is bestowed on agriculture, so that he wants the skill of one, the whole of whose labour is applied, by means of the division of employments, to a single object; and that portion of his unskilful labour, never being assisted by the labour of any other person, is always as weak as possible. The result is, that he produces but little, if

NEW EDITION OF THE WEALTH OF NATIONS.

An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. By Adam Smith, LL.D.; with a Commentary by the Author of 'England and America.' In six vols. Vol. I. 12mo. London. 1865. Pp. 329. 5s.

If this were nothing more than a reprint of 'The Wealth of Nations,' the appearance of such a work in the cheap and popular mode of publication by periodical volumes, which has been hitherto employed almost exclusively in the case of works of light reading and entertainment, would be an event in literature worthy of notice, and that, considered as an indication, might afford some matter for remark. But at present we must give our attention not to Adam Smith, but to his new commentator. All that we shall say of the reprint is, that it is beyond comparison the handiest, as well as the most easily read and handled of any we have. The bulk and form of the volume are those of a manual, or a book for the pocket, and the type, both of text and commentary, is as large and clear as any eye can desire. This edition of 'The Wealth of Nations' also contains Dugald Stewart's able and interesting account of the life and writings of the author, not abridged, as usual, but printed at length, together with a translation of the Abbé Garnier's useful little treatise, entitled 'A short view of the Doctrine of Smith compared with that of the French Economists.' Prefixed to the volume is a portrait of Smith, engraved by Holl, from Tassie's medallion, the only original likeness that exists of this distinguished writer.

The commentary is given in the form of notes appended to the several chapters, and its quantity in the present volume is not much less than half that of the text.

In several respects this commentary is one of the most remarkable works the science of Political Economy has ever produced: in one respect it is, perhaps, the most remarkable. It will do more than even Adam Smith's great work to ventilate and dust the science. In his Preface the writer makes the following frank declaration, which will doubtless shock many, and startle more, but which the perusal of the volume will, we apprehend, abundantly justify to most people: "I am humbly, but very sincerely, of opinion, that the science of Political Economy is yet in its infancy. Even the alphabet of the science, —the meaning of every common term, whether used by the vulgar or by the most learned professors, is still unsettled. There is scarcely a term of any weight which is not employed by different persons, and even by the same person, to express different meanings; while the known principles of the science leave unexplained some of its most important phenomena." And let us add, that this is the case with every one of the moral sciences, without exception.

What havoc might we not make on any system of ethics or metaphysics in existence by the application of this test of important phenomena which it leaves unexplained! In conformity with the expressions we have just quoted, the author afterwards says, in enumerating five objects he has particularly had in view in this commentary:—"My fourth object has been to warn the student in political economy against implicit faith in the doctrines of a science which yet wants a complete alphabet; to show how imperfect that science is, after all that has been done for it; and to indicate some questions of great moment, as it appears to me, concerning which next to nothing has been done. I offer the parts of my commentary which relate to this object, as a humble contribution towards the improvement of the science."

In matters of practical morality at least, the answer to the great question, what is Truth or Right? is almost universally, if not universally, 'The middle

term between two errors. Or more correctly, every truth produces two errors, flying off from it in opposite directions, and keeping at equal distances on each side of it. That is to say, to speak in the language of the mechanicians, the case is one, not of the combination, but of the resolution of forces; the middle line of truth is not the resultant diagonal of the parallelogram, but the two diverging sides are the produce of that middle line. Although, however, the errors may thus be said, in one sense, to be the offspring of the truth (just as every illusion must be the effect of something real), yet, in human speculation, the errors most frequently make their appearance first, and the truth seems to be produced or struck out, that is to say, is eventually discovered, by their opposition and collision. It is easy to see why this should be the case. The discovery of the error, that is of the partial truth, requires that only one side or half of the whole truth should be perceived. But the curious part of the process is the way in which the error or deviation on the right hand, giving rise in the first instance to an equivalent error on the left, brings men's minds eventually to the middle truth, and fixes them there. It seems to happen usually in this way. The first error shooting out from the truth, so as to form an angle with it, the farther its line is pursued, carries men farther away from the light, till they find themselves at length left half in the dark. It becomes plain, now, that they have been proceeding in a wrong direction,—and they very wisely abandon the track. But not quite so wisely, though perhaps naturally enough,—seeing that in all moral speculation we are drifted by winds and currents of imagination and passion, as well as guided by our reason,—having found that they were wrong in taking the path that led off to the right hand, they now, to mend the matter, set out anew in a correspondingly oblique direction towards the left;—because the north-east has failed them, they try the north-west. Using the terms with a popular latitude, as meaning, not the precise points of the compass technically so designated, but any points in the same quarters, there are numberless lines radiating in these lateral directions, but there is only one due north line. In other words, error is manifold, but truth is one. It is much more difficult to miss the former than to find the latter. Hence, in fact, the truth is in general only arrived at and discovered through a process of groping or gradual approximation—by the examination and rejection of one after another of errors lying on both sides of it, and, as it were, concealing it from our search.

There cannot be a better example of this common course which speculation takes, than is afforded by the history of what we may call the fundamental proposition of political economy, that which states what are the elements of production.

"The French economists, who invented the science of political economy," observes the author of the present commentary, (p. 233) "treated land as the only source of wealth: some of their successors in our day, carried away, it would seem, by Adam Smith's great discovery, that 'labour is the original purchase-money of all things,' have not even admitted land amongst the elements of production."

In fact, until very recently, the statement, or assumption, in all the modern treatises on Political Economy was, that the two and the only two elements of production were capital and labour. The author of the present commentary, in a former work, entitled 'England and America,' published only two or three years ago, was, we believe, the first who distinctly called attention to the importance of a third element, land, or, as he called it, by a more general expression, the field for the employment of capital. But the subject has nowhere been so systematically developed as it is in the volume before us. The deduction, as here given, is so perfect and beautiful, that although we must injure it by the compression to which we are obliged to resort, we shall endeavour to lay an abstract of it before our readers.

The writer begins by stating that since the publication of the 'WEALTH OF NATIONS,' two principles or general truths have been discovered, which throw new and most important light on the subject of wages and profits.

The first of these is what is called the Principle of Population, which is, simply, that there is a tendency in population to increase beyond the means of subsistence.

The second principle is thus explained by the present writer; and we request the attention of the reader to the statement:—

"In the next place, during the process by which a society arrives at the utmost limit of its supply of food, a circumstance occurs, by which the amount of that part of the produce of capital and labour which is divided between capitalists and labourers, comes to be continually diminished. The owners of land, in a word, come to obtain a continually increasing portion of that produce. The continual increase of that share of the produce raised by capital and labour, which falls to the owners of land, will be explained by referring to what happens on one occasion, when more capital and labour are employed with less return. In consequence of a certain increase of capital and people, capitalists are ready to invest their property with a smaller return. He who used to raise a hundred quarters of corn with a thousand pounds, is now ready to invest two thousand pounds on raising a hundred and fifty quarters. The second thousand pounds will produce only fifty quarters. But if one capitalist is content with fifty quarters as the return for a thousand pounds, competition will make all capitalists of the same mind with respect to all their capital; and their competition for the use of land will induce them to pay to the owner of land whatever return their capitals may bring above the ordinary rate of fifty quarters for a thousand pounds. Thus he who did employ a thousand pounds in raising a hundred quarters, will now raise a hundred and fifty quarters with two thousand pounds, and pay fifty quarters to the landlord. He will pay so much to the landlord, because, if he did not, some other would. This principle has been called the Theory of Rent."

This, it is to be observed, is a more comprehensive statement of what is called the Theory of Rent than has been given by any preceding writer, even including those by whom the theory was first broached. It explains not only the origin and progress of rent, but also, what has been in modern times one of the great puzzles of political economy, the cause of the diminution of the profits of capital as society advances. In fact, as we shall see presently, it resolves all the questions that can be raised respecting both high and low profits, and high and low wages:—

"The four following cases will describe all the common conditions of society, which exhibit different rates of profit and wages.

"First, the case in which capital bears a large proportion to labourers, and a small proportion to the field of production. The United States and some old colonies are the example. In this case, wages are high in share, and in amount; profits being, though low in share, high in amount.

"Secondly, the case in which capital bears a large proportion to labour, and also a large proportion to the field of production. High wages and low profits will be the result. The principle of population forbids that this should be a very common case, but it has occurred nevertheless; as, for example, in France, towards the close of the revolutionary war, when the conscription had rendered labourers scarce, and in several countries after a pestilence.

"Thirdly, the case in which capital bears a small proportion to labourers, and also a small proportion to the field of production. Low wages and high profits will be the result; the produce divided being great, but the labourer's share very small. This is the case in nearly all countries where, with superabundance of labourers in proportion to capital, there is plenty of room for the employment of more capital without any decrease of productiveness. Bengal is a good example, where capital has obtained enormous profits, while wages were at the rate of about twopence a day. This case of high profits with low wages, and the preceding case of low profits with high wages, would be, if profits and wages depended on nothing but the division of produce, the only cases that could by possibility occur.

Lastly, the case in which capital bears a small proportion to labour, and a great proportion to the field of production. This case gives low wages, and low profits also; that part of the produce of industry which is divided between labourers and capitalists, being reduced to so small an amount, that the capitalist, after giving the labourer but just enough to provide him with a motive for working, reserves for himself but just enough to provide him with a motive for continuing to employ labourers. There have been many examples of this case, as in Genoa, Venice, and Holland, but never was there a more striking one than that of Great Britain at the present time.

"Without, however, bearing in mind that all these are cases of mere proportion; that wages and profits depend, not on any absolute quantities of people, capital, and land, but on various proportions, whether the absolute quantities be increasing or diminishing, amongst the three elements of production; without attending to the distinction between positive and relative, we shall not arrive at a satisfactory explanation of the present state of Great Britain with regard to wages and profits.

"Political economists, following Adam Smith, describe three different states of society—the progressive, the stationary, and the retrograde. They call progressive, that state of society in which the field of production, and capital, increase as fast as population can possibly increase; so that profits and wages, both, being constantly high, the people do not actually increase as fast as possible. They call stationary, that condition of society in which there is no further room for the productive employment of industry; in which case profits and wages are constantly as low as possible. They call the retrograde state of society, that in which the field of production constantly decreases; in which case, not only are profits and wages constantly at the minimum, but every year some capitalists are reduced to the state of labourers; and yet the labouring class becomes less and less numerous. The Venetian republic, and some of the Hanseatic towns, while they were gradually losing the trade by which they had obtained food, were examples of this case. But there appears to be a fourth state of society which, though stationary as to profits and wages, is progressive as to the extent of the field of production, the amount of capital, and the number of people. The field, the capital, and the people may increase, yet if the enlargement of the field be not more rapid than the increase of capital, no alteration of profits will occur; nor any alteration of wages, unless the field be enlarged and capital increased, both at the same time, more rapidly than people shall increase. All the elements of wealth may increase absolutely, but without any change in their proportions to each other. Though, in such a state of society, both capitalists and labourers will increase in number, though new means of communication will be formed, though fresh towns will arise, though the increase of population and of national wealth may be striking, nevertheless the rate of profit may still be very low, the rate of wages but just sufficient to permit an increase of labourers, the majority of capitalists in a state of uneasiness, and the whole body of labourers miserable and degraded. Nay, along with increasing national wealth, the state of capitalists and labourers may grow worse, provided that the field of production be not extended at the same rate with the increase of people and capital. This appears to have happened in Great Britain during the last twenty years. War ceasing, great masses of capital were no longer wasted every year, but were accumulated at home; new modes of investment were discovered; the number of capitalists was visibly augmented; signs of increasing wealth appeared in all directions. But as the field of production was not enlarged so rapidly as capital increased, more and more competition amongst capitalists made the condition of the greater number worse than that of the smaller number. In like manner, with respect to the labouring classes, together with the peace, which removed one check to the increase of people, came great improvements in medicine, and especially in treating the diseases of children, which removed other checks, and thus the common people increased faster than the field of employment for increasing capital. This change in the proportion between two of the elements of production, and the third, or chief element, while all three were rapidly increasing, explains the coincidence of rapidly increasing national wealth, with the greater uneasiness of the middle class, and the greater misery of the bulk of the people. It accounts for the loud outcry about pauperism and distress, in the midst of wealth so great, as to be without a parallel in the history of the world."

From the fact, it is afterwards observed, of the superabundance of capital, not in proportion to labourers, but in proportion to the means of profitable investment, some conclusions of the utmost practical moment may be deduced.

"If all the British men and money that were wasted during the last war; if, further, the hundreds of millions of capital which have been lent to Foreign Governments and lost in distant speculations during the peace, together with the hundreds of thousands of people who have emigrated from Britain during the last twenty years; if this prodigious mass of capital and people should be suddenly recalled, what would become of it? Inevitably, considering that the English field of production is full to overflowing,—so full, that every year witnesses the departure to other countries of a great amount of capital, and a great number of people,—somehow or other, an amount of capital and a number of people equal to the mass which had been recalled, must be speedily destroyed; but not, let us observe, until after a period of aggravated suffering amongst the whole body of small capitalists, and the whole of the labouring class. In what way, by what process would take place the destruction of that portion of capital for which there was no profitable employment? By means of investment without profit, or rather with loss; by means of undertakings in which the capital would be what is called "sunk;" by means of "selling at less than prime cost." Then should we see a terrible aggravation of that process by which, even at present, profit is turned into loss, and capital is effectually kept down to the limit of investment. If the national debt of Britain were paid off with available capital, by tribute from foreign countries, and if the amount of available capital were further increased by a total remission of taxes, the competition of British capitalists, one with another, would be more severe than ever; and along with so great an increase of national wealth, there would be more and more 'distress': in that case, it seems probable that the supposition of Mr Mill would come to pass, and 'none but the owners of large masses of capital would be able to derive from it the means of subsistence.' In that case, however, the people of Britain would see the true cause of their 'distress'; we should hear no more of the burthen of taxation, and of relieving this or that interest by the repeal of some tax; the Chancellor of the Exchequer would no longer gravely talk of the fairness of relieving tiles, after having relieved bricks, and of doing something for soap, after having done so much for beer and leather. Nor would the town and country interests—on one side the farmers, on the other the manufacturers and dealers—be diverted, by the eager pursuit on either side of some peculiar but impossible relief, from seeking a general remedy for general uneasiness. In that case, provided, that is, the whole burthen of taxation were removed, and Britain were richer than at present by eight hundred millions, all classes would see what was, and therefore what had been, the cause of their distress. But what is the cause of the present low rate of profit in all employments alike, may be discovered by investigation without a miracle. If the view here taken of that cause should turn out to be correct, all the industrious classes of Britain will combine to raise the general rate of profit, by enlarging the field of employment for British capital and labour."

Dr. Chalmers, who has lately pointed out the inconveniences arising from a superabundance of capital, in a most striking manner, in his work entitled, On Political Economy in connexion with the Moral State and Moral Prospects of Society—a work which, as the present writer remarks, "so abounds in novel and important speculations, that no one who has derived his knowledge from other books on political economy can truly suppose that he has mastered that science, even in its present imperfect state"—has proposed as a check upon the growth of the evil in question, that capitalists should, individually, save less and spend more.] He urges that, as the labouring classes can only effectually resist the decline of wages by refraining from over-population, so capitalists can only resist the decline of profits by refraining from over-speculation—by each, as he elsewhere expresses it, expending more of his capital on personal or family indulgences, and reserving less of it for additional outlay on his business. In this parallel, however, and the proposal deduced from it,—which, in the work before us, is approved of as being "not only a reasonable one, but the only one which points out a way of escape from the pauperism of labourers and the distress of capitalists—the only one, that is, provided there be no way of causing the field of employment for capital and labour to increase as fast as population and capital"—an important distinction seems to be overlooked, which exists between superabundance of population and superabundance of capital. Whatever inconveniences the latter may bring upon the community at large, an individual is certainly, in all cases, better off with a large capital than with a small one. A capital, however large, is never a burthen to its possessor, as a large family may be. We want altogether, therefore, in regard to capital, the motive which we may reasonably expect to act upon individuals in inducing them to refrain from over-population. That imprudence brings along with it a punishment to the individual committing it; the rapid production and accumulation of capital, whatever inconvenient it may entail upon the state, entails upon the producer and accumulator none. The larger his capital, and the faster he can increase it, the better for him, always.

The views of the present writer look in a different direction,—to the possibility, namely, of enlarging the field for the employment of capital and labour. Provided the means of such enlargement exist, he remarks, "and may be readily employed, all will allow that the time is not yet come for seeking to diminish either capital or population. The two means which do exist for enlarging the field of employment for British capital and labour, are Colonization, and the Importation of Food. Whether those measures are likely to prove adequate, as means to the end in view, will be considered in another place."

Next to this inquiry into the elements of production, which occurs in the latter part of the volume, the most important portion of the present commentary is the note on Smith's first chapter, the well known dissertation on the principle which he has called the Division of Labour. With more precision of phraseology, the author of the note prefers to call the principle the Division of Employments,—reserving the term labour to denote, not the operation, which Smith often uses it for, but the power actually exerted by the agent. In this use of the terms it is evident that in manufactures and all the other operations of an advanced state of society, there is both a division of employments, and a combination of labour. The present writer thinks that from his unfortunate adoption of the term "labour" in the less exact sense, Smith was led nearly to overlook the latter of these two things, which, however, is really the more important of the two, and is, moreover, that which gives rise to the division of employments. The practical conclusions to be drawn from a consideration of the principle of co-operation are here developed in a most ingenious and striking manner. We can only now afford to extract one or two paragraphs from the disquisition,—though we wish we had room for the whole. The following is the first conclusion stated:—

"1. The inhabitants of England, it may be presumed, obtain more and better food than the inhabitants of France; yet all the food of England is said to be raised by the labour of less than one-third of the people, while more than two-thirds of the people of France are supposed to be engaged in raising food for the whole. If it be so, then, in France, only three people are supported by the labour of two cultivators, while, in England, the labour of two cultivators supports six people; English agriculture is twice as productive as French agriculture. To what are we to attribute this remarkable difference? It has been attributed, and with much appearance of truth, to the French law of division, which, at the death of a French proprietor, separates his land into properties as numerous as his children, and which has thus established, in the greater part of France, a system of agriculture resembling that which is practised in the greater part of Ireland, where agricultural industry does not appear to be more productive than it is in France. In both countries, the greater part of the land is divided into very small farms, or rather separate fields. But this division of the land into small holdings does not in any degree affect its natural fertility; nay, the soils of France and Ireland are considered to be more fertile than the soil of England. In what way, then,—by what process is it, that this division of the land into a great number of small holdings, has so injurious an effect on the productiveness of agricultural labour in Ireland and France? By means, it would appear, of dividing the greater part of the agricultural labour of those countries into fractions as numerous as the labourers. A small cultivator in France, like a cottier in Ireland, works by himself, or at most with no other assistance than that of his children. Not only is his labour separated from that of all other workmen, but it is necessarily divided again amongst the several employments, few though they be, which must be pursued before the scanty wants of his family can be supplied: he practises the very reverse of the two great causes of improvement in the productiveness of labour, which are—combination of labour and division of employments; he divides labour into the smallest fraction into which it can be divided, viz., a single pair of hands; and he combines as many different employments as he has time to engage in. Only a portion of his labour is bestowed on agriculture, so that he wants the skill of one, the whole of whose labour is applied, by means of the division of employments, to a single object; and that portion of his unskilful labour, never being assisted by the labour of any other person, is always as weak as possible. The result is, that he produces but little, if any, more food, than is sufficient for the support of his own family, even according to the miserable way in which such families are generally supported.

"In England, on the other hand, the greater part of the land is held in such large pieces, that the cultivation of each piece requires the employment of a considerable number of hands. On an English farm, speaking generally, many labourers help each other, not only in those simple operations where all the work is alike, but in those complex ones which admit of division of employments. On an English farm, therefore, labour is applied not only with the maximum of power, but also with the maximum of skill; and the quantity of food raised consequently is, in proportion to the number of labourers, as great as our present knowledge of agriculture permits. It is by means of co-operation, one cannot repeat it too often, that the agricultural labour of England is twice as productive as that of France or Ireland; or, to reverse the proposition, it is by means of a minute division of labour that the agricultural labour of France or Ireland is but half as productive as that of England.

"Two-thirds of the people of France or Ireland being engaged in agriculture, only one-third is set free, as it were, to engage in other occupations; whereas in England, all the food of the people being produced by one-third of their number, two-thirds of the people may be occupied in pursuits not agricultural. The obvious superiority of England to France or Ireland, in respect to general wealth, is thus satisfactorily explained. This consideration also explains by what process it is, that the foreign commerce of England—her power of exchanging objects of home production for useful or agreeable objects, which are produced in distant countries—is so very much greater, having regard to numbers in each country, than that of Ireland or France.

"But what are the useful conclusions that we are here to draw from observing in France some of the bad effects of division of labour, and in England some of the admirable effects of co-operation? They are, in the first place, that a constant misapplication of the term 'division of labour,' seems to have kept out of sight a more important principle than that of the division of employments; and that the sooner we can learn to use the term 'division of labour' in its proper sense, the sooner shall we perceive all the value of the principle of co-operation. Secondly, that in one respect, at least, it is in the power, and seems to be within the province of legislation, to interfere with the operations of political economy; in so far, that is, as to prevent or correct the hurtful effects on the production of national wealth, which arise from a minute subdivision of landed property, whether held in fee or on lease."

The author's second conclusion is, that "the division of landed property, or any other cause that produces a minute subdivision of labour, tends to check the intellectual and moral improvement of the people who are governed by it." This proposition is illustrated by a reference to the present condition of the great mass of the people in France and Ireland, as well as in China and Turkey.

"In all those countries," it is observed, "the greater part of society consists of a mere multiplication of one grower of food. Such monotonous, ignorant, and stagnant masses, in which whatever affects one man affects all in the same way, are well suited to be governed by one central, and, as regards them, wholly irresponsible authority. At the present time, a single man leads or governs the greater part of the Irish people,—those of them who are precisely like each other,—as if he held them all by one unbroken string. The facility with which the central and irresponsible governments of China, Turkey, and France, are carried on, as well as the passionate but unreasoning love of equality which, in Turkey and France, at least, seems to be not inconsistent with a slavish respect for the worst kind of authority, may be traced, it would appear, to the operation of causes in political economy. Here is one proof amongst many, that political economy is not, as it has been termed by a modern poet and novelist of reputation, "a material science;" it is a science which relates to the intellectual and moral condition of nations, as well as to their physical enjoyments; to philosophy in general, as well as to the useful arts; to the state of literature as well as of manufactures; to the character of men and governments, as well as to objects of a purely material kind. This is the useful conclusion that may be drawn from the above enquiry; for if it were generally admitted to be true, the first chapter in the book of science would be given to political economy."

The writer next proceeds to consider several of the popular projects, or privaterotchets, which have been lately brought forward in various countries of Europe, and in our own more especially, for bettering the condition of the majority of the people—such as an agrarian law, spade husbandry, the allotment system, home colonies, and what he calls the very curious scheme of Mr Robert Owen." "Against all these proposals," he observes, "the principle of combination of labour furnishes a conclusive argument." We cannot, however, give his illustrations. For the other conclusions deduced from the principle, we must also refer our readers to the volume itself. They will find the discussion respecting the origin and progress of Slavery, and the conditions necessary for its abolition, especially curious and important.

THE LATE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

A History and Description of the late Houses of Parliament, and Ancient Palatial Edifices of Westminster. By John Britton and Edward W. Brayley. 8vo. London. 1835.

We have received six numbers of this interesting publication, which has been called forth by the fire that so lately reduced so large a portion of the ancient buildings it illustrates to ruins, and swept away the walls and towers on which hung so many historic recollections. The lovers of our national antiquities are indebted to the present writers for the promptitude with which they have come forward to supply, as far as it can be done, the loss thus sustained, by preserving accurate representations of the edifices and apartments that have been destroyed, both as they existed immediately before the conflagration, and in the state in which their remains now appear. This is the best thing that can be done in the case of that which it is not possible actually to restore. Where the thing lost, indeed, although substantial and palpable, was only inanimate, the effigy is no bad substitute for the reality. In one respect the former has greatly the advantage; inasmuch as the pleasure of contemplating what is beautiful or interesting, is, by means of the pencil and the graver, made common to an infinitely greater number of persons than could have had an opportunity of beholding the actual object. It is transferred to those living at ever so great a distance from the object, either in place or in time. No fire or other calamity can ever obliterate the Chapel of St Stephen, or the Painted Chamber, we have before us here. The printing press has placed these venerable halls, as it places everything else which it touches, beyond the reach of destruction or decay. In this new form of existence, the ancient palace of Westminster will be the same in all its parts a thousand years hence, as it is now.

The present work when completed is to contain forty plates, of which twenty-five are given in the six numbers already published. Of these the following is a list, in the order in which they have been published: 1. Title-page, being part of the 'Interior of St Stephen's Chapel.' 2. 'Niche from the Oratory in the Cloister,' and 'Effigies from the Hall.' 3. 'View in the Upper Cloister in St Stephen's Chapel.' 4. 'View in the Painted Chamber, looking West.' 5. 'Westminster Hall,' compartment at the S E angle. 6. 'Plan of the Palatial, Parliamentary, and other Public Buildings.' 7. 'Three Windows in the South end of the Court of Requests.' 8. 'View of East End of St Stephen's Chapel.' 9. 'View of Vestibule, West End of ditto.' 10. 'Section of St Stephen's Chapel,' and 'Crypt as fitted up for the House of Commons, 1834.' 11. 'Painted Chamber, looking East.' 12. 'Stairs at South East angle of ditto.' 13. 'Exterior of ditto,' and 'South side of St Stephen's Chapel.' 14. 'Plan of the South half of the Crypt,' and 'Plan of the Northern half of St Stephen's Chapel.' 15. 'View of the Long Gallery in ruins, looking North.' 16. 'View of the South Walk of the Cloisters.' 17. 'View of the Exterior of the House of Lords, &c., after the fire.' 18. 'Interior of St Stephen's Chapel, looking East.' 19. 'New House of Commons, March 1835.' 20. 'Ground Plan of Chantry Chapel,' and 'Part of Cloister, St Stephen's Chapel.' 21. 'Section of ditto from North to South.' 22. 'View of Buttress and part of East side of Westminster Hall.' 23. 'View in the Star Chamber.' 24. 'View of the Chantry Chapels, Cloister, &c., in St Stephen's Chapel.' 25. 'View of Cloister up-stairs to Speaker's apartments.'

All these engravings, we believe, are from original drawings, and they seem to us, as far as we have the means of judging, to be in general very faithful as well as spirited representations of their subjects. The authors have not announced what their remaining embellishments are to be; but both the Hall and the Courts of Law will, we suppose, easily furnish sufficient materials. As views have been given of the present Houses of Lords and Commons, the late Houses should also be introduced. And, if it be not too late, we would recommend, as essential to the understanding of much of the history, the insertion of a ground-plan of the palatial and legislative buildings as the apartments were distributed before the Lords were removed to their late place of meeting in the old Court of Requests. Such a plan, taken from Roque's 'Plan of London,' was published a few years ago in a little work, entitled 'A Faithful Account of the Coronation of the Kings and Queens of England, by Richard Thomson' (Major, 1820). The information contained in the letter-press of the present work appears to have been collected with very commendable industry, and a considerable portion of it is from unpublished documents. The history, however, which, according to the title-page, is to extend "from the Anglo-Saxon dynasty to the final arrangement of the National, Parliamentary, and Legal Courts, at the same place," has only as yet been brought down to the year 1341, the fifteenth of Edward III. This portion occupies 160 of the 400 pages, of which the whole is to consist. The volume, which will only cost twenty shillings when completed, deserves to be recommended for its cheapness, as well as for its other qualities.

The latter numbers of the work contain some very curious accounts and other details, now extracted for the first time from manuscripts in the office of the King's Remembrancer of the Exchequer and elsewhere. Such accounts, as illustrating the rates of wages in former times, are always acceptable contributions to a most interesting chapter in our social history. The following, being an account of the payments made during the week ending the 13th of August, 1307 (the first of Edward II.), for the works that were then carrying on at Westminster, is extracted from an ancient manuscript on vellum, now in the possession of Sir Thomas Phillipps, Bart., who purchased it in January, 1890, for seventy guineas, at the sale of the late Craven Ord, Esq., who had been first secondary in the King's Remembrancer's Office. There can scarcely be a doubt, the writer observes, that this manuscript had belonged to the Exchequer.

"To the Master Mason.—To Master Richard de Wightham, the mason assigned by the Treasurer to superintend and direct each of the works of building, and to be the master in the same office, in all the foregoing places; for his wages for the preceding week, receiving the money by his own hands - - - 7s.

"To the Stonecutters.—To William of Abydone, Adam of Pippinge, William of Banbury, Simon of Banbury, Robert of Tychemerche, John of Berkhamstede, Alexander of Hoghton, Milo of Stachese, and John of Coumbe, nine masons employed in cutting large Caen stones—'grossas petras de Cadamo'—for the said works, as task-work, taking for 100 feet 4s., for 480 feet thus cut, receiving the money by the hands of William of Abydone and Adam of Pippinge - - - 19s. 2½d.

"To the Master Workman.—To Master James de Leuesham, the workman appointed to oversee the several operations of workmanship in all the before-mentioned places. Mem. that nothing was paid to him here, but at the Exchequer, by the Chamberlain, by his writ of Liberate.

"To one Workman, 5d. a day.—To Alan of Leuesham, workman, for repairing the hearths or fireplaces [astras] in the structure of the Palace, and doing other things necessary; for four days and a half, receiving the money by his own hands - - - 22½d.

"To the inferior Labourers, 2½d. a day.—John de Tyngri, [and thirty-four other labourers, whose names are mentioned], for carrying timber, stones, plaster, boards, &c. from the King's Bridge to the Palace, and for divers other necessary kinds of work, for four days and a half, receiving the money by the hands of William de Laddrede and Nigel de Cornubis, to each 1½d. - - - 32s. 9½d.

"To the inferior Labourers, 2½d. a day.—To Adam Coleman and others, in all eleven inferior labourers, for cleansing divers houses and divers places in the Palace, and for carrying filth even to the Thames, receiving the money each by his own hands, for four days 10d. - - - 9s. 2d.

"For different purchases, chiefly of small articles, as keys, sieves, latches, and other things, in all 3s. 1½d.

"For Carriage.—To John Wisman, carrier, for the carriage of seven thousand of tiles, from East Smithfield, near the Tower of London, to the Palace, reckoning for the carriage of 1000, 6d., receiving the money by his own hands, 3s. 6d.—Item, to Henry de Schipman, lighterman, for seven boat-loads of sand, from the Thames, for making mortar, reckoning for a boat-load 6d., receiving the money by his own hands, 3s. 6d. - - - 7s.

"For Portage.—To Henry Godale, porter, and his associates, for the portage and carriage of two barge-loads of Caen freestone, from the King's Bridge to the Palace, receiving the money by his own hands - - - 14d.

"For the scaffolds 3d. a day.—To William de Laddrede and Richard de Blithelan, scaffold-makers, for work done about the scaffolds for the masons, for six days, to each 18d. - - - 3s.

"Sum total of the first payments for wages - - - 0 73 0½
Of the purchases - - - 0 3 11
For carriages and portage - - - 0 8 2

£4 5 2½"

* This sum exceeds the true amount by about two shillings, as may be seen on reckoning up the different totals.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.—(Concluded.)

CHARING CROSS AND WHITEHALL.

Contents:—Calves' Head Club, and the riot it occasioned.
—Scotland Yard.—Pleasant Advertisement.—Beau Fielding and his eccentricities.—Vanbrugh.—Desperate Adventure of Lord Herbert of Chisbury.

THE famous Calves' Head Chub (in ridicule of the memory of Charles I) was held at a tavern in Suffolk street; at least the assembly of it was held there which made so much noise a hundred years back, and produced a riot. At this meeting it was said that a bleeding calf's head had been thrown out of the window, wrapt up in a napkin, and that the members drank damnation to the race of the Stuarts. This was believed till the other day, and has often been lamented as a disgusting instance of party spirit. To say the truth, the very name of the club was disgusting, and a dishonour to the men who invented it. It was more befitting their own heads. But the particulars above mentioned are untrue. The letter has been set right by the publication of 'Spence's Anecdotes,' at the end of which are some letters to Mr Spence, including one from Lord Middlessex, giving the real account of the affair. By the style of the letter the reader may judge what sort of heads the members had, and what was reckoned the polite way of speaking to a waiter in those days:—

"Whitehall, Feb. 5th 9th, 1735.

"Dear Spanco,

"I don't in the least doubt but long before this time the noise of the riot on the 30 of Jan. has reached you at Oxford, and though there has been as many lies and false reports raised upon the occasion in this good city as any reasonable man could expect, yet I fancy even those may be improved or increased before they come to you. Now that you may be able to defend your friends (as I don't in the least doubt you have an inclination to do) I'll send you the matter of fact literally and truly as it happened, upon my honour. Eight of us happened to meet together the 30th of January, it might have been the 10th of June, or any other day in the year, but the mixture of the company has convinced most reasonable people by this time that it was not a designed or premeditated affair. We met, then, as I told you before, by chance upon this day, and after dinner, having drank very plentifully, especially some of the company, some of us going to the window unluckily saw a little nasty fire made by some boys in the street, of straw I think it was, and immediately cried out, 'damn it, why should not we have a fire as well as anybody else?' Up comes the drawer, 'damn you, you rascal, get us a bonfire.' Upon which the imprudent puppy runs down, and, without making any difficulty (which he might have done by a thousand excuses, and which if he had, in all probability, some of us would have come more to our senses), sends for the faggots, and in an instant behold a large fire blazing before the door. Upon which some of us, wiser, or rather soberer than the rest, bethinking themselves then, for the first time, what day it was, and fearing the consequences a bonfire on that day might have, proposed drinking loyal and popular healths to the mob (out of the window), which by this time was very great, in order to convince them we did not intend it as a ridicule upon that day. The healths that were drank out of the window were these, and these only:—The King, Queen, and Royal Family, the Protestant Succession, Liberty and Property, the present Administration. Upon which the first stone was flung, and then began our siege; which, for the time it lasted, was at least as furious as that of Philipsborough; it was more than an hour before we got any assistance; the more sober part of us, during this, had a fine time of it, fighting to prevent fighting; in danger of being knocked on the head by the stones that came in at the windows; in danger of being run through by our mad friends, who, sword in hand, swore they would go out, though they first made their way through us. At length the justice, attended by a strong body of guards, came and dispersed the populace. The person who first stirred up the mob is known; he first gave them money, and then harangued them in a most violent manner; I don't know if he did not fling the first stone himself. He is an Irishman and a priest, and belonging to Imberti, the Venetian Envoy. This is the whole story from which so many calves' heads, bloody napkins, and the lord knows what has been made; it has been the talk of the town and the country, and small beer and bread and cheese to my friends the Garretters in Grub street, for these few days past. I, as well as your friends, hope to see you soon in town. After so much prose, I can't help ending with a few verses:—

O had I lived in merry Charles's days,
When dull the wise were called, and wit had praise;
When deepest politics could never pass
For aught, but surer tokens of an ass;
When not the frolics of one drunken night
Could touch your honour, make your fame less bright, Tho' mob-form'd scandal rag'd, and Papal spight.

"MIDDLESSEX."

The author of a 'Secret History of the Calves' Head Club, or the Republicans unmasked,' (supposed to be Ned Ward, of ale-house memory,) attributes the origin to Milton and some other creatures of the Commonwealth, in opposition to Bishop Juxon, Dr Sanderson, and others, who met privately every 30th of January, and had compiled a private form of service for the day, not very different from that now in use. "After the Restoration," says the writer, "the eyes of the government being upon the whole party, they were obliged to meet with a great deal of precaution; but in the reign of King William they met almost in a public manner, apprehending no danger." The writer farther tells us, he was informed that it was kept in no fixed house, but that they moved as they thought convenient. The place where they met when his informant was with them was in a blind alley near Moorfields, where an axe hung up in the club-room, and was revered as a principal symbol in this diabolical sacrament. Their bill of fare was a large dish of calves' heads, dressed several ways, by which they represented the king and his friends who had suffered in his cause; a large pike, with a small one in his mouth, as an emblem of tyranny; a large cod's head, by which they intended to represent the person of the king singly; a boar's head with an apple in its mouth, to represent the king by this as bestial, as by their other hieroglyphics they had done foolish and tyrannical. After the repeat was over, one of their elders presented an Icon Basilike, which was with great solemnity burnt upon the table, whilst the other anthems were singing. After this, another produced Milton's Defensio Populi Anglicani, upon which all laid their hands, and made a protestation in form of an oath for ever to stand by and maintain the same. The company only consisted of Independents and Anabaptists, and the famous Jeremy White, formerly Chaplain to Oliver Cromwell, who no doubt came to sanctify with his pious exhortations the ribaldry of the day, said grace. After the table-cloth was removed, the anniversary anthem, as they impiously called it, was sung, and a calf's skull filled with wine, or other liquor, and then a brimmer went about to the pious memory of those worthy patriots who had killed the tyrant and relieved their country from his arbitrary sway: and, lastly, a collection was made for the mercenary scribbler, to which every man contributed according to his zeal for the cause and ability of his purse."

"Although no great reliance," says Mr Wilson, from whose life of De Foe this passage is extracted, "is to be placed upon the faithfulness of Ward's narrative, yet, in the frightened mind of a high-flying churchman, which was continually haunted by such scenes, the caricature would easily pass for a likeness." "It is probable," adds the honest biographer of De Foe,

"that the persons thus collected together to commemorate the triumph of their principles, although in a manner dictated by bad taste, and outrageous to humanity, would have confined themselves to the ordinary methods of eating and drinking, if it had not been for the ridiculous farce so generally acted by the royalists upon the same day. The trash that issued from the pulpit in this reign, upon the 30th of January, was such as to excite the worst passions in the breasts. Nothing can exceed the grossness of language employed upon these occasions. Forgetful even of common decorum, the speakers ransacked the vocabulary of the vulgar for terms of vituperation, and hurled their anathemas with wrath and fury against the objects of their hatred. The terms rebel and fanatic were so often upon their lips, that they became the reproach of honest men, who preferred the scandal to the slavery they attempted to establish. Those who could profane the pulpit with so much rancour, in the support of senseless theories, and deal it out to the people for religion, had little reason to complain of a few absurd men who mixed politics and calves' heads at a tavern; and still less, to brand a whole religious community with their actions."

Scotland Yard is so called from a palace built for the reception of the Kings of Scotland when they visited this country. Pennant tells us that it was originally given to King Edgar, by Kenneth, prince of that country, for the purpose of his coming to pay him annual homage, as Lord Paramount of Scotland. Margaret, widow of James V. and sister of Henry VIII., resided there a considerable time after the death of her husband, and was magnificently entertained by her brother on his becoming reconciled to her second marriage with the Earl of Angus. When the Crowns became united, James I. of course waived his right of abode in the homage-paying house, which was finally deserted as a royal residence. We know not when it was demolished. Probably it was devoted for some time to government offices. Scotland Yard was the place of one of Milton's abodes during the time he served the government of Cromwell. He lost an infant son there. The eccentric Beaumont Fielding died in it at the beginning of the last century, and Vanbrugh a little after him. There was a coffee-house in the yard, which seems by the following pleasant advertisement to have been frequented by good company:—

"Whereas, six gentlemen (all of the same honourable profession), having been more than ordinarily put to it for a little pocket-money, did, on the 14th instant, in the evening, near Kentish Town, borrow of two persons (in a coach) a certain sum of money, without staying to give bond for the repayment: And whereas, fancy was taken to the hat, peruke, cravat, sword, and cane, of one of the creditors, which were all lent as freely as the money: these are therefore to desire the said six worthies, how fond soever they may be of the other loans, to un-fancy the cane again and send it to Well's Coffee House in Scotland Yard; it being too short for any such proper gentlemen as they are to walk with, and too small for any of their important uses; and withal, only valuable as having been the gift of a friend."

Beau Fielding was thought worthy of record by Sir Richard Steele as an extraordinary instance of the effects of personal vanity upon a man not without wit. He was of the noble family of Fielding, and was remarkable for the beauty of his person, which was a mixture of the Hercules and the Adonis. It is described as having been a real model of perfection. He married to his first wife the dowager Cousins of Parbock; followed the fortunes of James II., who is supposed to have made him a major-general and perhaps a count; returned and married a woman of the name of Wadsworth, under the impression that she was a lady of fortune; and discovering his error, addressed or accepted the addresses of the notorious Duchess of Cleveland, and married her, when, on discovering her mistake in turn, indicted him for bigamy and obtained a divorce. Before he left England to follow James, "Handsome Fielding," as he was called, appears to have been insane with vanity. On his return, he had added, to the natural absurdities of that passion, the indecency of being old; but this only rendered him the more perverse in his folly. He always appeared in an extraordinary dress: sometimes rode in an open tumbril, of less size than ordinary, the better to display the nobleness of his person; and his footmen appeared in liveries of yellow, with black feathers in their hats, and black sashes. When people laughed at him, he refuted them, as Steele says, "by only moving." Sir Richard says he saw him one day stop and call the boys about him, to whom he spoke as follows:—

"Good youths—Go to school and do not lose your time in following my wheels: I am loth to hurt you, because I know not but you are all my own offspring: hark ye, you sirrah with the white hair, I am sure you are mine, there is half-a-crown for you. Tell your mother, this, with the other half-crown I gave her * * , comes to five shillings. Thou hast cost me all that, and yet thou art good for nothing. Why, you young dogs, did you never see a man before?" "Never such a one as you, noble general," replied a truant from Westminster. "Sirrah, I believe thee: there is a crown for thee. Drive on, coachman." Swift puts him in his list of Mean Figures, as one who at fifty years of age, when he was wounded in a quarrel upon the stage, opened his breast and shewed the wound to the ladies, that he might move their love and pity; but they all fell a laughing. "His vanity, which does not appear to have been assisted by courage, sometimes got him into danger. He is said to have been cained and wounded by a Welsh gentleman, in the theatre in Lincoln's Inn fields; and pressing forward once at a benefit of Mrs Oldfield's, 'to shew himself,' he trod on Mr Fulwood, a barrister, who gave him a wound twelve inches deep. His fortune, which he ruined by early extravagance, he thought to have repaired by his marriage with Mrs Wadsworth, and endeavoured to do so by gambling; but succeeded in neither attempt, and after the short-lived splendour with the Duchess of Cleveland, returned to his real wife, whom he pardoned, and died under her care. During the height of his magnificence, he carried his madness so far, according to Steele, as to call for his tea 'by beat of drum;' his valet got ready to shave him by a trumpet to horse; and water was brought for his teeth, when the sound was changed to boots and saddle." If this looks like a jest, there is no knowing how far vanity might be carried, especially when the patient may cloak it from himself under the guise of giving way to a humour.

* See 'State Trials,' et supra, 'Barton's Memoirs of Mrs Oldfield,' 'Swift's Great and Mean Figures,' vol. xvii. 1765; and the History of Orlando the Fair, in the 'Tatler,' as above, Nos. 50 and 51. "The author of Memoirs of Fielding in the Select Trials," says a note on the latter number, "admits, that for all the ludicrous air and pleasantry of this narration (Steele's), the truth of facts and character is in general fairly represented."

Vanbrugh, comic poet, architect, and herald, was comptroller of the royal works. His house in Whitehall, built by himself, was remarkable for its smallness. Swift compared it to a goose-pie. On the other hand, his Blenheim and public buildings are ridiculed for their ponderous hugeness. Dr Evans's epitaph upon him is well known:

Lie heavy on him, earth, for he Laid many a heavy load on thee.

When he was made Clarencieux king-at-arms, Swift said he might now "build houses." The secret of this ridicule was, that Vanbrugh was a Whig. Sir Joshua Reynolds has left the following high encomium on his merits as an architect. "In the buildings of Vanbrugh, who was a poet as well as an architect, there is a greater display of imagination than we shall find, perhaps, in any other; and this is the ground of the effect we feel in many of his works, notwithstanding the faults with which many of them are charged. For this purpose, Vanbrugh appears to have had recourse to some principles of the Gothic Architecture, which, though not so ancient as the Grecian, is more so to our imagination, with which the artist is more concerned than with absolute truth." "To speak of Vanbrugh (adds Sir Joshua) in the language of a painter, he had originality of invention; he understood light and shadow, and had great skill in composition. To support his principal object, he produced his second and third groups, or masses. He perfectly understood in his art, what is the most difficult in ours, the conduct of the back-ground, by which the design and invention are set off to the greatest advantage. What the back-ground is in painting, in architecture is the real ground on which the building is erected; and no architect took greater care that his work should not appear crude and hard, that is, that it did not abruptly start out of the ground without expectation or preparation. This is a tribute which a painter owes to an architect who composed like a painter, and was defrauded of the due reward of his merit by the wits of his time, who did not understand the principles of composition in poetry better than he, and who knew little or nothing of what he understood perfectly, the general ruling principles of architecture and painting. Vanbrugh's fate was that of the great Perrault. Both were the objects of the petulant sarcasms of factious men of letters, and both have left some of the fairest monuments which, to this day, decorate their several countries;—the façade of the Louvre; Blenheim, and Castle Howard." Perrault, however, had a worse fate than Vanbrugh, for the Frenchman was ridiculed not only as an architect but as a man of letters, whereas our author's pretensions that way were acknowledged.

In the front of Scotland Yard an extraordinary adventure befell Lord Herbert of Chisbury—(see Queen street, Lincoln's-inn-fields), who relates it in a strain of coxcombry (particularly about the ladies) which would have brought discredit upon such a story from any other pen. There is no doubt, however, that the story is true.

"There was a lady," says his Lordship, "wife to Sir John Ayres, knight, who finding some means to get a copy of my picture from Larkin, gave it to Mr Isaac, the painter, in Blackfriars, and desired him to draw it in little, after his manner; which being done, she caused it to be set in gold and enamelled, and so wore it about her neck so low that she hid it under her breasts, which I conceive, coming afterwards to the knowledge of Sir John Ayres, gave him more cause of jealousy than needed, had he known how innocent I was from pretending to anything that might wrong him or his lady, since I could not so much as imagine that either she had my picture, or that she bore more than ordinary affection to me; it is true that as she had a place in court, and attended Queen Anne, and was beside of an excellent wit and discourse; she had made herself a considerable person; howbeit, little more than a common civility ever passed betwixt us, though I confess I think no man was welcomer to her when I came, for which I shall allege this passage:—

“Coming one day into her chamber, I saw her through the curtains lying upon her bed with a wax candle in one hand, and the picture I formerly mentioned in the other. I coming thereupon somewhat boldly to her, she blew out the candle and hid the picture from me: myself thereupon being curious to know what that was she held in her hand, got the candle to be lighted again, by means whereof I found it was my picture she looked upon with more earnestness and passion than I could easily have believed, especially since myself was not engaged in any affection towards her. I could willingly have omitted this passage, but that it was the beginning of a bloody history which followed: howsoever, yet I must before the eternal God clear her honour. And now in court a great person sent for me divers times to attend her; which summons, though I obeyed, yet God knows I declined coming to her as much as conveniently I could without incurring her displeasure; and this I did not only for very honest reasons, but, to speak ingenuously, because that affection passed between me and another lady (who I believe was the fairest of her time) as nothing could divert it. I had not been long in London when a violent burning fever seized upon me, which brought me almost to my death, though at last I did by slow degrees recover my health; being thus upon my amendment, the Lord Lisle, afterwards Earl of Leicester, sent me word that Sir John Ayres intended to kill me in my bed, and wished me to keep guard upon my chamber and person; the same advertisement was confirmed by Lucy, Countess of Bedford, and the Lady Hobby, shortly after. Hereupon I thought fit to entreat Sir William Herbert, now Lord Powis, to go to Sir John Ayres and tell him that I marvelled much at the information given me by these great persons, and that I could not imagine any sufficient ground hereof; howbeit, if he had anything to say to me in a fair and noble way, I would give him the meeting as soon as I had got strength enough to stand on my legs; Sir William hereupon brought me so ambiguous and doubtful an answer from him, that, whatsoever he meant, he would not declare yet his intention, which was really, as I found afterwards, to kill me any way that he could.” The reason, Lord Herbert tells us, was, that Sir John, though falsely, accused him of having seduced his wife. “Finding no means thus to surprise me,” continued the noble lord, “he sent me a letter to this effect; that he desired to meet me somewhere, and that it might so fall out as I might return quietly again. To this I replied, that if he desired to fight with me on equal terms, I should, upon assurance of the field and fair play, give him meeting when he did any way specify the cause, and that I did not think fit to come to him upon any other terms, having been sufficiently informed of his plots to assassinate me.

“After this, finding he could take no advantage against me, then in a treacherous way he resolved to assassinate me in this manner:—hearing I was to come to Whitehall on horseback with two lacquies only, he attended my coming back in a place called Scotland Yard, at the hither end of Whitehall, as you come to it from the Strand, hiding himself here with four men armed to kill me. I took horse at Whitehall gate, and, passing by that place, he being armed with a sword and dagger, without giving me so much as the least warning, ran at me furiously, but instead of me, wounded my horse in the brisnet, as far as his sword could enter for the bone; my horse hereupon starting aside, he ran him again in the shoulder, which, though it made the horse more timorous, yet gave me time to draw my sword: his men thereupon encompassed me, and wounded my horse in three places more; this made my horse kick and fling in that manner, as his men durst not come near me, which advantage I took to strike at Sir John Ayres with all my force, but he warded the blow both with his sword and dagger; instead of doing him harm, I broke my sword within a foot of the hilt; hereupon, some passenger that knew me, and observing my horse wounded in so many places, and so many men assaulting me, and my sword broken, cried to me several times, ‘Ride away, ride away;’ but I scorned a base flight upon what terms soever, instead thereof alighted as well as I could from my horse; I had no sooner put one foot upon the ground than Sir John Ayres, pursuing me, made at my horse again, which the horse perceiving, pressed on me on the side I alighted, in that manner, that he threw me down, so that I remained flat upon the ground only one foot hanging in the stirrup, with that piece of a sword in my right hand. Sir John Ayres hereupon ran about the horse, and was thrusting his sword into me, when I, finding myself in this danger, did with both my arms reaching at his legs pull them towards me, till he fell down backwards on his head; one of my footmen hereupon, who was a little Shropshire boy, freed my foot out of the stirrup, the other, who was a great fellow, having run away as soon as he saw the first assault; this gave me time to get upon my legs and to put myself in the best posture I could with that poor remnant of a weapon; Sir John Ayres by this time likewise was got up, standing betwixt me and some part of Whitehall, with two men on each side of him, and his brother behind him, with at least twenty or thirty persons of his friends, or attendants on the Earl of Suffolk; observing thus a body of men standing in opposition against me, though to speak truly I saw no swords drawn but Sir John Ayres’ and his men, I ran violently against Sir John Ayres, but he, knowing my sword had no point, held his sword and dagger over his head, as believing I could strike rather than thrust, which I no sooner perceived but I put a home thrust to the middle of his breast, that I threw him down with so much force, that his head fell first to the ground and his heels upwards; his men hereupon assaulted me, when one Mr Mansel, a Glamorganshire gentleman, finding so many set against me alone, closed with one of them; a Scotch gentleman also, closing with another, took him off also: all I could well do to these that remained was to ward their thrusts, which I did with that resolution that I got ground upon them. Sir John Ayres was now got up a third time, when I making towards him with intention to close, thinking that there was otherwise no safety for me, put by a thrust of his with my left hand, and so coming within him, received a stab with his dagger on my right side, which ran down my ribs as far as my hips, which I feeling did with my right elbow force his hand, together with the hilt of the dagger so near the upper part of my right side, that I made him leave hold. The dagger now sticking in me, Sir Henry Carey, afterwards Lord of Falkland, and Lord Deputy of Ireland, finding the dagger thus in my body, snatcht it out; this while I, being closed with Sir John Ayres, hurt him on the head and threw him down a third time, when kneeling on the ground and bestriding him, I struck at him as hard as I could with my piece of a sword, and wounded him in four several places, and did almost cut off his left hand; his two men this while struck at me, but it pleased God even miraculously to defend me, for when I lifted up my sword to strike at Sir John Ayres, I bore off their blows half a dozen times; his friends now finding him in this danger, took him by the head and shoulders and drew him from betwixt my legs, and carrying him along with them through Whitehall, at the stairs whereof he took boat. Sir Herbert Croft (as he told me afterwards) met him upon the water vomiting all the way, which I believe was caused by the violence of the first thrust I gave him; his servants, brother, and friends, being now retired also, I remained master of the place and his weapons, having first wrested his dagger from him, and afterwards struck his sword out of his hand.

“This being done, I retired to a friend’s house in the Strand, where I sent for a surgeon, who, searching my wound on the right side, and finding it not to be mortal, cured me in the space of some ten days, during which time I received many noble visits and messages from some of the best in the kingdom. Being now fully recovered of my hurts, I desired Sir Robert Harley to go to Sir John Ayres, and tell him, that though I thought he had not so much honour left in him, that I could be in any way ambitious to get it, yet that I desired to see him in the field with his sword in his hand; the answer that he sent me was (repeating the charge above mentioned) ‘that he would kill me with a musket out of a window.’

“The Lords of the Privy Council, who had at first sent for my sword, that they might see the little fragment of a weapon with which I had so behaved myself, as perchance the like had not been heard in any credible way, did afterwards command both him and me to appear before them; but I, absenting myself on purpose, sent one Humphrey Hill with a challenge to him in an ordinary, which he refusing to receive, Humphrey Hill put it upon the point of his sword, and so let it fall before him and the company then present.

“The Lords of the Privy Council had now taken order to apprehend Sir John Ayres, when I, finding nothing else to be done, submitted myself likewise to them. Sir John Ayres had now published everywhere that the ground of his jealousy, and consequently of his assaulting me, was drawn from the confession of his wife, the Lady Ayres. She, to vindicate her honour, as well as free me from this accusation, sent a letter to her aunt, the Lady Crook, to this purpose:—that her husband, Sir John Ayres did lie falsely, * * * but most falsely of all did lie when he said he had it from her confession for she had never said any such thing.

“This letter the Lady Crook presented to me most opportunely, as I was going to the Council table before the Lords, who, having examined Sir John Ayres concerning the cause of his quarrel with me, found him still to persist on his wife’s confession of the fact; and now, he being withdrawn, I was sent for, when the Duke of Lennox, afterwards of Richmond, telling me that was the ground of his quarrel, and the only excuse he had for assaulting me in that manner, I desired his Lordship to peruse the letter, which I told him was given me as I came into the room; this letter being publicly read by a clerk of the Council, the Duke of Lennox then said, that he thought Sir John Ayres the most miserable man living, for his wife had not only given him the lie, as he found by the letter, but his father had disinherited him for attempting to kill me in that barbarous fashion, which was most true, as I found afterwards;—for the rest, that I might content myself with what I had done, it being more almost than could be believed, but that I had so many witnesses thereof; for all which reasons, he commanded me in the name of his majesty, and all their Lordships, not to send any more to Sir John Ayres, nor to receive any message from him, in the way of fighting, which commandment I observed: howbeit, I must not omit to tell, that some years afterwards Sir John Ayres, returning from Ireland by Banmaris, where I then was, some of my servants and followers broke open the doors of the house where he was, and would, I believe, have cut him into pieces, but that I hearing thereof came suddenly to the house and recalled them, sending him word also that I scorned to give him the usage he gave me, and that I would set him free of the town, which courtesy of mine (as I was told afterwards) he did thankfully acknowledge.”

OUTRE-MER.

Outre-Mer: or a Pilgrimage to the Old World—By an American. 2 vols. 8vo. London: Richard Bentley.

THIS is another choice, summer-holiday book, fit for the gay season, and full of light and delectable reading. The author of it, Professor Longfellow, is widely known and admired among his countrymen for the purity of his taste and the benevolence of his heart. Some few years ago, leaving his own magnificent native land, he crossed the Atlantic to our old world, and visited with the devout steps of a pilgrim some of the most interesting parts of France, Spain, and Italy. His recollections of these places, and the feelings and associations they called up in his young mind, are the main topics of the volume before us, for he has not attempted to write what is called a book of travels, and seldom describes the usual objects of art and antiquity, or dwells long either on scenery or national manners.

His impressions partake largely of that freshness, vivacity, and single-mindedness of youth, which few of us experience, save during one short period of our lives, while too many go through the world without ever being susceptible of it at all. There be some among us, of the earth earthy, who, properly speaking, are never young and never old—who never know the glowing aspirations, the heart and eye worship, the confiding hopes of youth, or the calm resignation, the expansive benevolence, and charitable moderation of age; who are morally fixed in "one eternal now," like Coleridge's ancient mariner—who are "cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd" in the statu-quoism of selfishness and worldly-mindedness—

"Getting and spending they lay waste their hours,
"They've given their hearts away—a sordid boon."

To such minds the feelings of the young American, when he first found himself at Granada, and within ken of the romantic ruins of the Alhambra, will be unintelligible, if not ridiculous—

"Is this reality, and not a dream? Am I, indeed, in Granada? Am I indeed within the walls of that earthly paradise of the Moorish Kings? How my spirit is stirred within me! How my heart is lifted up! How my thoughts are rapt away on the visions of other days!

"Ave Maria purissima! It is midnight. The bell has tolled the hour from the watch-tower of the Alhambra; and the silent street echoes only to the watchman's cry. Ave Maria purissima! I am alone in my chamber—sleepless—spell-bound by the genius of the place—entranced by the beauty of the star-lit night. As I gaze from my window, a sudden radiance brightens in the east. It is the moon rising behind the Alhambra. I can faintly discern the dusky and indistinct outline of a massive tower, standing amid the uncertain twilight, like a gigantic shadow. It changes with the rising moon, as a palace in the clouds, and other towers and battlements arise every moment more distinct—more palpable, till now they stand between me and the sky, with a sharp outline, distant, and yet so near, that I seem to sit within their shadow.

"Majestic spirit of the night, I recognize thee! Thou hast conjured up this glorious vision for thy votary. Thou hast baptized me with thy baptism. Thou hast nourished my soul with fervent thoughts and holy aspirations, and ardent longings after the beautiful and the true. Majestic spirit of the past, I recognize thee! Thou hast bid the shadow go back for me upon the dial-plate of time. Thou hast taught me to read in thee the present and the future—a revelation of man's destiny on earth. Thou hast taught me to see in thee the principle that unfolds itself from century to century in the progress of our race, the germ in whose bosom lie enfolded the bud, the leaf, the tree. Generations perish, like the leaves of the forest, passing away when their mission is completed; but at each succeeding spring, broader and higher spreads the human mind unto its perfect stature, unto the fulfilment of its destiny, unto the perfection of its nature. And in these high revelations, thou hast taught me more,—thou hast taught me to feel that I, too, weak, humble, and unknown—feeble of purpose and irresolute of good, have also my mission to accomplish upon earth—like the falling leaf, like the passing wind, like the drop of rain. O glorious thought! that lifts me above the power of time and chance, and tells me that I cannot pass away, and leave no mark of my existence. I may not know the purpose of my being—the end for which an all-wise

Providence created me as I am, and placed me where I am; but I do know—for in such things faith is knowledge—that my being has a purpose in the omniscience of my Creator, and that all my actions tend to the completion, to the full accomplishment of that purpose. Is this fatality? No. I feel that I am free, though an infinite and invisible power overrules me. Man proposes and God disposes. This is one of the many mysteries in our being which human reason cannot find out by searching.

"Yonder towers that stand so huge and massive in the midnight air, the work of human hands that have long since forgotten their cunning in the grave, and once the home of human beings immortal as ourselves, and filled, like us, with hopes and fears, and powers of good and ill,—are lasting memorials of their builders; inanimate material forms, yet living with the impress of a creative mind. These are land-marks of other times. Thus, from the distant past, the history of the human race is telegraphed from generation to generation, through the present to all succeeding ages. These are manifestations of the human mind at a remote period of its history, and among a people who came from another clime,—the children of the desert. Their mission is accomplished, and they are gone; yet leaving behind them a thousand records of themselves and of their ministry, not as yet fully manifest, but seen through a glass darkly, dimly shadowed forth in the language, and character, and manners, and history of the nation, that was by turns the conquered and the conquering. The Goth sat at the Arab's feet; and athwart the cloud and storm of war streamed the light of oriental learning upon the western world,

"As when the autumnal sun,
Through travelling rain and mist,
Shines on the evening hills."

It is a pleasant matter of reflection to consider how much admiration, how fervent a worship has been paid to these splendid Moorish remains by two Americans—by two citizens of a great and rising country which lay hid behind the waves of the west, when these piles first rose, and these stones and marbles were laid upon each other, and whose existence was a mystery and a problem in the mind of the great Columbus, even, when after long years of glory, the last dynasty of the Moors in Spain was driven back into Africa, and the Cross substituted for the Crescent on the walls of Alhambra.

These two Americans (long may they both live as honours and ornaments of their country!) are our friend Washington Irving, and the author of 'Outre-Mer,' whose musings will be read with pleasure even by those in whose recollection Mr Irving's descriptions are still fresh:—

"This morning I visited the Alhambra, an enchanted palace, whose exquisite beauty baffles the power of language to describe. Its outlines may be drawn,—its halls and galleries, its court-yards and its fountains numbered; but what skillful limner shall portray in words its curious architecture, the grotesque ornaments, the quaint devices, the rich tracery of the walls, the ceilings inlaid with pearl and tortoise-shell? What language paint the magic hues of light and shade, the shimmer of the sunbeam as it falls upon the marble pavement, and the brilliant panels inlaid with many-coloured stones? Vague recollections fill my mind,—images dazzling but undefined, like the memory of a gorgeous dream. They crowd my brain confusedly, but they will not stay; they change and mingle like the tremulous sunshine on the wave, till imagination itself is dazzled—bewildered—overpowered.

"What most arrests the stranger's foot within the walls of the Alhambra, is the refinement of luxury which he sees at every step. He lingers in the deserted bath,—he pauses to gaze upon the now vacant saloon, where, stretched upon his gilded couch, the effeminate monarch of the East was wooed to sleep by softly-breathing music. What more delightful than this secluded garden, green with the leaf of the myrtle and the orange, and freshened with the gush of fountains, beside whose basin the nightingale still woos the blushing rose? What more fanciful—more exquisite—more like a creation of oriental magic, than the lofty tower of the Tocaror,—its airy sculpture resembling the fretwork of wintry frost, and its windows overlooking the romantic valley of the Darro; and the city with its gardens, domes, and spires, far, far below? Cool through this lattice comes the summer wind, from the icy summits of the Sierra Nevada. Softly in yonder fountain falls the crystal water, dripping from its alabaster vase with never-ceasing sound! On every side comes up the fragrance of a thousand flowers, the murmur of innumerable leaves; and overhead is a sky where not a vapour floats—as soft, and blue, and radiant, as the eye of childhood!

"Such is the Alhambra of Granada; a fortress—a palace—an earthly paradise; a ruin, wonderful in its fallen greatness."

Our American traveller stopped at the eternal city long after the mighty reflux of fashionable visitors had swept through its gates, and left it to its natural solemnity and comparative solitude. In some parts of the town, there is to be sure, a risk of catching the malaria fever, but then is the time to see Rome to advantage, without the danger of being annoyed wherever you go by sneering, tittering fine people, and by staring, wondering, blundering, very fine coarse people. Then you shall not be made to shudder at hearing Lady Eleanor lip that Raphael's divine Transfiguration is "a very pretty sort of thing," or my Lord giggling at the horns on the head of Michael Angelo's sublime statue of Moses. Then you shall be spared the pang of meeting in the classical Villa Doria, nor shall you be driven mad, or into misanthropy, by hearing one fat man puffing and blowing, saying he has seen St Peter and thanking God that job's over, or another swearing that the Colosseum would look a precious sight better for a coat of whitewash! Then, too, you shall be saved the wear and tear of body and mind—the wasting away of all your better spirits—incidental to the late dinner parties, drums, and routes, of those who transfer the fashionable extravagances of St James's and May Fair to the banks of the Tiber and the foot of the Capitol, and persevere in keeping up their aristocratic distinctions, their conventional pomps and ceremonies, just as if they did not stand among the ruins of a glorious and mighty empire, and the tombs and the shades of a still more awful republic. Yes! with a good lodging, high up one of the "Seven immortal hills," and with a little quinine to drive away the fever, midsummer, or early autumn, is the time to enjoy Rome. The following choice extracts are from our author's section called "Rome in Midsummer:—"

"Shameless men who shuffle cards at noon"

"On the eastern slope of the Janiculum, now called, from its yellow sands, Montorio, or the Golden Mountain, stands the fountain of Acqua Paola, the largest and most abundant of the Roman fountains. It is a small Ionic temple, with six columns of reddish granite in front, a spacious hall and chambers within, and a garden with a terrace in the rear. Beneath the pavement, a torrent of water from the ancient aqueducts of Trajan, and from the lakes of Bracciano and Martignano, leaps forth in three beautiful cascades, and from the overflowing basin rushes down the hill-side to turn the busy wheels of a dozen mills.

"The key of this little fairy palace is in our hands, and as often as once a week we pass the day there amid the odour of its flowers, the rushing sound of its waters, and the enchantments of poetry and music. How pleasantly the sultry hours steal by! Cool comes the summer wind from the Tiber's mouth at Ostia. Above us is a sky without a cloud; beneath us the magnificent panorama of Rome and the Campagna, bounded by the Abrozzi and the sea. Glorious scene! one glance at thee would move the dullest soul,—one glance can melt the painter and the poet into tears!

"In the immediate neighbourhood of the fountain are many objects worthy of the stranger's notice. A bow-shot down the hill side towards the city, stands the convent of San Pietro in Montorio; and in the cloister of this convent is a small round Doric temple, built upon the spot which an ancient tradition points out as the scene of St Peter's martyrdom. In the opposite direction the road leads you over the shoulder of the hill, and out through the city-gate to gardens and villas beyond. Passing beneath a lofty arch of Trajan's aqueduct, an ornamented gateway on the left admits you to the villa Pamfili-Doria, built on the western declivity of the hill. This is the largest and most magnificent of the numerous villas that crowd the immediate environs of Rome. Its spacious terraces, its marble statues, its woodlands and green alleys, its lake and waterfalls and fountains, give it an air of courtly splendour and of rural beauty, which realizes the beau ideal of a suburban villa.

"This is our favourite resort when we have passed the day at the fountain, and the afternoon shadows begin to fall. There we sit on the broad marble steps of the terrace, gaze upon the varied landscape stretching to the misty sea, or ramble beneath the leafy dome of the woodland and along the margin of the lake,

"And drop a pebble to see it sink Down in those depths, so calm and cool."

"TORQUATO TASSO OSSA HIC JACENT—here lie the bones of Torquato Tasso—is the simple inscription upon the poet's tomb, in the church of St Onofrio. Many a pilgrimage is made to the grave. Many a bard from distant lands comes to visit the spot,—and as he passes the secluded cloisters of the convent where the poet died, and where his ashes rest, muses on the sad vicissitudes of his life, and breathes an orison for the peace of his soul. He sleeps midway between his cradle at Sorrento and his dungeon at Ferrara.

"The monastery of St Onofrio stands on the Janiculum, overlooking the Tiber and the city of Rome; and in the distance rise the towers of the Roman Capitol, where, after long years of sickness, sorrow, and imprisonment, the laurel crown was prepared for the epic poet of Italy. The chamber in which Tasso died is still shown to the curious traveller; and the tree in the garden under whose shade he loved to sit. The feelings of the dying man, as he reposed in his retirement, are not the vague conjectures of poetic revery. He has himself recorded them in a letter which he wrote to his friend Antonio Constantini, a few days only before his dissolution. These are his melancholy words:—

"What will my friend Antonio say when he hears of the death of Tasso? Ere long, I think, the news will reach him; for I feel that the end of my life is near; being able to find no remedy for this wearisome indisposition, which is superadded to my customary infirmities, and by which, as by a rapid torrent, I see myself swept away, without a hand to save. It is no longer time to speak of my unyielding destiny, not to say the ingratitude of the world, which has longed even for the victory of driving me a beggar to my grave: while I thought that the glory which, in spite of those that will it not, this age shall receive from my writings, was not to leave me thus without reward. I have come to this monastery of St Onofrio, not only because the air is commended by physicians, as more salubrious than any other part of Rome, but that I may, as it were, commence in this high place, and in the conversation of these devout fathers, my conversation in heaven. Pray God for me; and be assured that as I have loved and honoured you in this present life, so in that other and more real life will I do for you all that belongs to charity unfeigned and true. And to the Divine mercy I commend both you and myself."

If our readers fancy that all our author's book is made up of such sentimental and serious matter as we have just quoted, they are very much mistaken. Mr Longfellow has a great deal of the jolly fellow about him, and indulges in fun, story, and piquant remark. What sensible person, like ourselves, has ever travelled over the continent without meeting with specimens of both the following classes of tourists:—

"I met with an odd character at Florence,—a complete humourist. He was an Englishman of some forty years of age, with a round, good-humoured countenance, and a nose that wore the livery of good company. He was making the grand tour through France and Italy, and home again by the way of the Tyrol and the Rhine. He travelled post, with a double-barrelled gun, two pair of pistols, and a violin without a bow. He had been in Rome without seeing St Peter's,—he did not care about it; he had seen St Paul's in London. He had been in Naples without visiting Mount Vesuvius; and did not go to Pompeii, because "they told him it was hardly worth seeing—nothing but a parcel of dark streets and old walls." The principal object he seemed to have in view was to complete the grand tour.

"I afterwards met with his counterpart in a countryman of my own, who made it a point to see everything which was mentioned in the guide-books; and boasted how much he could accomplish in a day. He would dispatch a city in an incredibly short space of time. A Roman aqueduct, a Gothic cathedral, two or three modern churches, and an ancient ruin or so, were only a breakfast for him. Nothing came amiss; not a stone was left unturned. A city was like a Chinese picture to him—it had no perspective. Every object seemed of equal magnitude and importance. He saw them all; they were all wonderful.

"Life is short, and art is long; yet spare me from thus travelling with the speed of thought; and trotting from daylight until dark, at the heels of a cicerone, with an umbrella in one hand, and a guide-book and a plan of the city in the other."

Appertaining to the first of these classes, we once knew an Englishman who determined to go all the way from Naples, through the wild province of Apulia, as far as Gallipoli. He was told of the dangers of the journey by land, for, at that time the Vardarelli brigands were in their highest feather, and the plague was raging at the town of Noja. But he was not to be deterred, and he went. And why did he go? Was he curious to see a rarely visited country—was he anxious to stand on the plain of Cannæ, by the ancient port of Brundisium, or amidst the ruins of Tarentum? Was he moved by a laudable desire of investigating the pastoral and agricultural industry of Apulia, or the great oil trade of Gallipoli? No, not he! He neither knew nor cared about these things, and, according to his own confession, all that he wanted was to be able to say, when he got back to England, that he had been from one end of Italy to the other! The story of Tom Sheridan and the coal-pit occurred to us, and we could have repeated to him old Sheridan's remonstrance with his son—"Why couldn't you have said you had been there, without giving yourself the trouble of going?" The motive of our quondam acquaintance is a very common one. It is this feeling that leads wheezing cockney tourists to the top of Mont Blanc, and makes harum-scarum sailors drink punch on the giddy top of Pompey's Pillar. It is only in order to be able to say on their return home that they have done it. And talking of doing brings us to our second class of flying travellers.

We have met hundreds of Englishmen like Mr Longfellow's American, who made a point to see everything set down in the vulgar guide-books, and who would brag how much they could do in a day. At Rome we have heard unblushing fellows of this kidney boast, in the fashion we might expect from a mower talking of acres of grass, that he had done St Peter's, and the Vatican, and the Pantheon, and the Coliseum, all in one day. But at Naples, in a house of public refectory, hight a "trattoria," where these people did most consort, it was still more painful to hear them compare notes and propose running races with each other over some of the most beautiful and interesting spots upon earth. Sometimes dropping in in the evening to a late dinner, we have heard snatches of conversation like the following:—

"Well, Stokes, how much have you done to-day?"

"Oh! Nokes, I have done Mount Vesuvius, Herculaneum, Pompeii, and Stabia, and to-morrow I shall turn over to t'other side, and do Virgil's Tomb, Posilipo, the Grotta, the Grotta del Cane, Pozzuoli, Baia, Avernus, and the rest of the lakes and ruins, and then back to Rome!"

And lucky were we when the name of each of these places was not wofully barbarized, and Posilipo not converted into Paw'slip, and Pozzuoli into Pitt's-hole, and so on with the rest. On one occasion we remember meeting a party of this kind at Pæstum. They had come above sixty English miles to see the magnificent ancient temples, which are three in number, and only a few hundred yards from each other; but merely going up to the first of these, and measuring its columns with their Belcher pocket-handkerchiefs, they turned back, got into their carriage, and drove off, saying they supposed the other two temples were just like the first. These impious men had, however, gained their object: they could say they had been at Pæstum!

Here we stop; not for any lack of such anecdotes, but because we must have a few words of courteous leave-taking with the agreeable author of 'Outre-Mer.'

His volumes contain sundry other matters besides those we have alluded to; and in some of these essays he shows himself well versed in our old poets and the old English school of writers generally, as well as in the ancient Spanish ballads and romances. He is also a versifier of no mean merit himself, as the reader will find by looking over his translation of the 'Coplas de Don Jorge Manrique,' beginning—

"O, let the soul her slumbers break."

Both in the humorous and the pathetic stories he introduces, Mr Longfellow reminds us of Washington Irving; and, indeed, throughout his style bears a general resemblance to that of the author of 'The Sketch-Book,' without being, however, a servile imitation of it. Martin Franc, and the Monk of St Anthony, The Sexagenarian, and the Notary of Périgueux, are capital little stories.

We are always glad when we can recommend a work, and we can honestly do so by these pleasant, well-intentioned volumes

THE INTERIOR OF GUIANA.

AMONGST the smoke and troubled crowding of our cities and our house-pent fields, there is no reading more refreshing to the body, through the mind's refreshment, than to read of wild uninhabited lands, where the air is free and unburdened with strange, unnatural gases, where the waters run clear and fresh, unlike that squalid factory drudge, poor old Father Thames; where the land is broken and various, without walls or hedges, flower-beds or cabbage-beds; where all the riches of the earth are given in new and unexpected forms, and profuse commixture; where, unlike the close-roomed toil of the work-shop, the counting-house, or the study, labour is health, and industry riches fineless. But of all lands, America is the one that gives the most glorious contrast to our huddled condition here. There all nature seems new and untired, all its elements are large, lusty, and of a primeval grandeur. Wide are its open plains, pathless its far-stretched forests; its winds unpoisoned. Its mighty rivers baffle the notions of such poor Old-Wordly men as ourselves, who call by the same name such wriggling little creatures as our over-tasked old friend of London, the Seine and the Arno, that scarce can dribble down its summer course; and we think these great too, because we compare them with so-called rivers which we may leap across, even in flood-time,—such as the Fiesolaia, Africo, or "sullen Mole," or the Wandle, tributary to the mighty Thames.

Reading of such places as these the spirit seems to expand; the physical part of our imagination seems refreshed and invigorated, and we entertain with delight the idea of living always among its healthful pleasures, feeding on its varied, never-failing fruits, and labouring in its cultivation, our well-paid labour returning plenty, peace, and health. In the beautiful of such a scene we have lately been living by the help of Dr Hancock's highly interesting little book of Guiana.*

Hitherto, it should seem, that Guiana has suffered material injustice in the opinion formed of its salubrity and natural resources. The coast alone has been generally visited, the interior remaining almost unknown; and the unfavourable climate and soil of the smaller part of the country has been taken as a sample of the whole. Dr Hancock, who has lived long in the country, and travelled two thousand miles, backwards and forwards, in the interior, makes us think it a perfect paradise;—so pleasant and healthy is the climate, so abundant and so delicious its native food; and even its localities seem purposely to have arranged themselves for the convenience of traffic. The Doctor's account, though perhaps a little tinged with that bigotry to which men with a favorite object are liable, is vivid and clear-headed; and seems written with an enthusiasm equally inspired by admiration of the stupendous resources of the country, and the desire to benefit his fellow-creatures, by pointing out the abode of so much natural riches. The following is the most extractable portion of Doctor Hancock's work; but we can assure our readers that what remains is no less important or interesting. We might especially refer to the chapter on the nosology of the country, and the means of preserving the health of new comers.

"Guiana presents a great diversity of soil, but the following are the principal:—1st, the clayey or allu-

* Observations on the climate, soil, and productions of British Guiana, and on the advantages of Emigration to, and Colonizing the Interior of, that Country; together with incidental remarks on the diseases, their treatment and prevention; founded on a long experience within the tropics. vial marshy land of the coast, which extends usually some six or eight miles aback from the sea; 2dly, the hills of sand and gravel, with some intervening morasses, extending to the falls; and 3dly, the deep soil of the interior. Below the falls, indeed, are many fertile spots; but these are of limited extent. Unfortunately, both the Dutch and English planters have heretofore confounded this intermediate district with the primitive soil of the interior, or mountainous regions, and they continue to judge of the latter from what they observe below the falls, notwithstanding the great geological disparity.

"The coast lands, being an alluvial deposit from the sea and great rivers, have indeed, when rendered mellow by labour (the sea being kept out), been found rich and productive, and they are still so on the Essequibo coast, one of the richest slips of land on the earth. To windward of this, however, the soil is in a great measure exhausted, so that numerous plantations (hundreds probably) are abandoned in Demerara and Berbice, as giving no adequate return for the labour required to keep up the cultivation, especially since the slave trade was abolished.

"The mountainous country, on the contrary, presents to view divers coloured ochres, indurated clays, and volcanic products which repose on the granite, with various mixtures of loamy earth and vegetable mould to a vast extent. Beyond this we meet with extensive savannahs or prairies, chiefly clay and gravel, affording pasture for cattle.

"The seasons are divided into wet and dry, which, inland, are very regular, but less so on the coast; and there is a perpetual verdure throughout the year. In the intermediate levels between the ridges of the falls of Essequibo, the river annually overflows its banks: when this occurs, it never fails to leave a fertilizing deposit, such as gives a perennial verdure to the banks of the Nile, and like that of the intervals lands so termed, or fertile meadows of the river Connecticut in its course, especially between New Hampshire and Vermont.

"Most planters have considered the labour of slaves to be indispensable to successful cultivation on the coast; and with reason, perhaps, as heretofore conducted. It is certain, indeed, that the cultivation of the coast cannot be continued unless it be by the means suggested—by the introduction of emigrants, and the use of animal labour. In proof of this, we might instance the island of Hayti, where, notwithstanding the endeavours of despotic chiefs, the cultivation has so declined, that there is not now a sufficiency of sugar produced for the use of the inhabitants.

"None but Hollanders could ever, on such a continent, have thought of robbing the sea, or fencing it out from a swampy coast with such immense labour, as is found occasionally necessary to keep up the cultivation. The original Dutch colonists, indeed, seem to have sought, in this country, only another Holland, and they, in a district boundlessly rich and uncultivated, set, at an early period, about gaining land from the sea! They accordingly planted themselves on the muddy lands of the sea-shore, where they had the comforting reflection that they must necessarily be drowned by the sea on one side, or by the bush water on the other, unless they were protected by dykes.

"In some instances, however, the Dutch at first cultivated the lands up the rivers; but, in addition to their aquatic propensities, their attention was directed to the coast,—1st, by the facility then existing of procuring slaves in abundance, and at a very trifling expense, from the coast of Africa; 2dly, by the necessity of keeping a military force inland to overawe the Caribbees; and 3dly, by the immediate contiguity to the shipping.

"The first two motives have, by the course of events, since been removed, by the abolition of the slave trade, and by the conciliation of the native tribes, who are no longer to be dreaded. The third consideration is unworthy of regard in a country watered, as is Guiana, by numerous large rivers. But the planters, in the meantime, appear to be unaware of the advantages of the interior, and continue plodding on in the old system, not knowing how to avert that destruction which awaits them; notwithstanding there lies not far off a soil rich in fertility, boundless in extent, and requiring only some improvements as to water-carriage and roads, to render it more accessible and speedily productive.

"On the cultivation of the interior, what I am now about to state I vouch for from personal observation in various parts of Interior Guiana, on the Essequibo and Parime, as well as on the Orinoko, where I had the opportunity for more than three years of observing the avails of agriculture, and of seeing persons of no pecuniary funds becoming rich with very slight industry.

"It was also exemplified amongst those tribes who, as Mr Humboldt says, 'inhabit the country so little known between the sources of the Orinoko and those of the rivers Essequibo, Carony, and Parime,' of which we may say with the Abbé de Pradt, 'Let us not dispute the fact, but candidly confess that, as yet, America is only discovered in name, and geographically. The treasures it contains are still buried riches, which its freedom alone can discover to the Old World.'

"In further illustration of this, I may observe that there is, or was not long since existing, a coffee-field up the Essequibo (at Oroposary, about forty leagues inland), which has been planted at a period unknown, supposed to be about the first settlement of the Dutch, and this is found to continue bearing in abundance,—nature alone, on this fertile soil, keeping up a reproduction of the trees! It is a fact, that these interior lands will produce far more sugar, coffee, cocoa, &c., than the sea coast, and that with half the labour! Of this I have had the fullest demonstration up the Orinoko, where the most abundant crops of cocoa and coffee are produced, equal to those of Caracas.

"The planters are not aware of this; and when, in regard to sugar in particular, I remarked to them the size of the canes, and that they often exceeded thirty feet in length, it was thought quite impossible. On the coast they commonly grow upright, and to the height of six or eight feet; but inland their growth is so luxuriant, that they often fall and stretch to a great length on the ground. I may add too, that these enormous growths are found almost in a state of nature, or without any weeding, trenching, or labour of drainage; and besides, they contain a more pure saccharine juice, without that impregnation of sea-salt which, in new lands on the coast, impedes the granulation of the sugar.

"The inland tribes, moreover, are fond of agriculture, and there the plough would be used with vast advantages. The use of the plough was introduced with astonishing effect among the Cherokees, the Creek, and the Seminole Indians of North America.

"The lands alluded to are not only best adapted for the staple articles of sugar, coffee, cocoa,* cotton, and indigo, but equally so for numerous others, which will not thrive on the coast. No soil can be more congenial for the produce of dates, figs, olives, and grapes of superior quality, as proved by the Friars of Carony; as well as for the various aromatics and spices, such as the nutmeg, cloves, ginger, allspice, and cinnamon. From the illiberal policy of the Spanish Government, and Old Spain being the country of grapes and olives, the cultivation of these and various other products was prohibited in Spanish Guiana. This is the natural soil of the odoriferous vanilla, which has been taken to Martinique, and sold at from fourteen to twenty dollars per pound. Dyeing woods, cochineal, wild honey, gum copal, &c., abound in the forests, beside a multitude of treasures unknown to Europeans.

"Many of our most valuable and expensive medicines, moreover, could be cultivated here with facility; as opium and ipecacuanha, which would give a quick return. The more humid parts would likewise produce the invaluable Sarsa de Rio Negro (Smilax siphilitica), which doubtless, with a little research, might be found growing wild.

"It is not improbable that some of the more febrifuge species of cinchona (Peruvian bark tree) would be found on the mountain Mackerapan, or others of the elevated range of Parime. But whether found indigenous or not, this would afford a proper soil for its cultivation, which would be desirable, now that the cinchona forests on the declivity of the Andes are becoming exhausted.

"The Rubiceous plants are especially numerous in Guiana. There are several different species of coffee growing wild in the interior parts, as well as of the Cephalus genus, of which the true ipecacuanha is one; and there can be no doubt that the cinchona will likewise be found, all these being of the same natural family. Another tree (of a new genus perhaps) found in Pomeroun, and described by the writer, affords a tonic and febrifuge bark, not inferior to cinchona.—See Med. and Phys. Journal for January, 1833.

"Besides all this, no country in the world abounds more in valuable timber-trees for ship building, cabinet-work, &c. It is here worthy of remark, that the forest trees do not impede those of humbler growth. The coffee, vanilla, and various others, even require the shade of other trees. In this respect the tropical regions differ from those of higher latitudes, although this fact has hitherto scarcely been known or appreciated, and we see the most valuable timber and fruit trees wantonly sacrificed in clearing the lands in equinoctial America.

"The nutritive vegetables too, I must now observe, are grown in great abundance in the interior; as yams, cassada, plantains, sweet potatoes, Indian corn. Of the latter there is one sort called Maiz de dos Mies, which, as its name imports, yields in two months from the time it is committed to the ground. The return of Indian corn is often 2000 to one amongst the Macoosis.

"The domestic animals of the interior also are kept with extraordinary facility; as horses, mules, hogs, goats, fowls, &c., and horned cattle multiply so much as to run wild on the savannahs. Indeed, cattle were often killed for their hides and horns, and the flesh left to the vultures for want of salt; and, notwithstanding milk was rich and abundant no butter or cheese was made, whilst two or three shillings per pound were given for foreign butter: this marked the state of enterprise and industry amongst the Portuguese. Would British commerce and industry be thus effete in a country so

* It is strange, indeed, that this valuable production, requiring no little labour, should have been so neglected on a soil the most congenial to it, especially by those who are aware of the grateful and restorative properties of cacao or the chocolate nut, well named by the great Swedish naturalist, Theobroma—food of the gods.

unboundedly rich? On the Parime (beyond the western source of the Essequibo), the beef was one halfpenny per pound, whilst it cost in Demerara a guilder or eighteen pence the pound. Besides this, the interior abounds in wild animals, which afford the most delicate and wholesome nourishment; as bush hogs, deer, mypoories, lapas, the great river turtles, and their delicious eggs, as also the manatee, with fish and fowls innumerable. We experienced no want of fish and game in going up the falls, although our party numbered upwards of thirty people.

"The rocks afford in the dry season the means of drying and preserving fish, which are caught in vast abundance amongst the falls, especially the pacu, one of the most delicious articles of food, of which the teeth are formed like those of a sheep, and which feeds entirely on grass and vegetables. The lau-lau (Silurus sp.) also is amongst the finest as well as the largest of the freshwater fishes, which abound in these rivers: it grows to about ten feet in length, weighing upwards of two hundred pounds. Here is also another extraordinary fish, of very large size, scarcely known to naturalists, called arapaima, or warapaima, with scales as large as a half-crown piece, and beautifully striped with crimson."

"The grapes grown in the interior are most delicious, and as much sweeter than those of Europe as the seasons are warmer. Wheat, potatoes, and all the European fruits, no doubt, would flourish on the mountains of Mackerapan, where a cool climate might be attained in a few hours from the banks of Essequibo."

ANONYMOUS THEOLOGY FROM THE NORTH.

Letters on the Nature and Duration of Future Punishment. 12mo. London. Longman. 1835. Pp 482.

We transcribe the title of this book with no intention of entering upon the discussion of the high question with which it professes to be occupied. But independently of that matter altogether, it has about it certain features of singularity and attraction which induce us to notice it. Nothing can be more void of pretension than the appearance of the volume; the copy that has been sent to us—huddled up in the plainest and most primitive, not to say rudest, of whitely-brown pasteboards—looks rather like a bundle of unread proofs stitched together, than a book finished for publication or sale. Although the name of a London house appears on the title-page, the book is stated to have been printed at Aberdeen. The author, indeed, expresses himself as earing little, or not at all, whether it sell or not. "As he writes," he says, "solely to employ (if not to improve) the leisure hours of retirement, and invites none to purchase, he hopes he may without unpardonable presumption gratify the harmless (and not uncommon) weakness of giving his thoughts to the printer, albeit none may be found adventurous enough to disturb their repose on the shelves of the bookseller, or per-adventure, inconsiderate enough to risk a shilling, for a production of so dubious a character and so forbidding an aspect." Respecting the author, nothing more is intimated than that he is "a private gentleman, who has not always sauntered in the groves of Academus." In one place (p. 388) he speaks of having been in India, at Bombay. He also occasionally refers to a former work which he appears to have published, under the title of 'Notes on Religious, Moral, and Metaphysical Subjects.'

The present work displays rather an extensive range of reading, both in modern and ancient literature; and the style, betokening in its general character the scholar and the gentleman, occasionally rises to considerable fervour of eloquence. It is also full of peculiar and ingenious thoughts, and of speculations which, if not altogether new, are such at least as ordinary readers and thinkers are but little familiar with. To those, therefore, who are fond of metaphysical theology, it offers no common treat. But the charm of the book is the spirit in which it is written. The scrupulously orthodox will no doubt deem it too daring; but never certainly was fearlessness in pursuit of the truth united with more ardent or more humble piety, with greater simplicity of heart, with more perfect tolerance and candour. The convictions of the writer are those of a devoted believer in Christianity, but his belief, we may be certain, is not the worse for its having evolved itself out of a spirit of not indifferent, but meditative and anxious scepticism, and for its recognition of occasionally recurring doubts and fears as making a necessary part of the being of all mortal belief. Without presuming to pronounce any judgment upon his main argument—that the economy of the Deity will terminate in the production of a state not of partial, but of universal virtue and happiness—(a conclusion, however, which surely is not more daring than the doctrine inculcated in one of the popular Calvinistic manuals of Scotland (Brown's Catechism), in which to the question, "What shall the wicked for ever do in hell?" it is dauntlessly answered, "They shall roar, curse, and blaspheme God")—without, we say, expressing ourselves either opposed to or in favour of our author's views upon this subject, we recommend his work to all who love the qualities we have characterised it as possessing—and that the more strongly, seeing that from the manner of its publication it is not very likely of itself to attract the notice of the generality of the buyers or readers of new books. We add one or two extracts.

"I think it is Lord Shaftesbury and Beame Jenyns who argue that the generalities of scripture—the universal benevolence recommended—preclude the exercise of friendship, or rather tacitly destroy it, independently of the fact that nowhere is it enjoined in the gospel. And here we may again observe Scripture speaking to our reason, addressing us by generalities, yet exhibiting a specific and practical instance for our example, leaving us to draw and apply the inference to any particular occasion. The broad principle of Christianity on this point, as laid down by our Saviour, is to love one another—to love our neighbours as ourselves—whatever things, in short, we could reasonably wish to receive from others, the same ought we to do to them. But we must remember, at the same time, that our Saviour did not abrogate the original and moral law of our nature—that which knit the hearts of Damon and Pythias, before the gospel was heard of; and the general injunctions of universal charity and good-will are to be controlled in so far by the dictates of this original law, as evidenced in the striking instances afforded at the close of his life. It might, at first sight, unquestionably be argued, that these universal obligations, being apparently incompatible with the more concentrated nature of private friendship, so amiable and so beneficial in influence, so productive of human happiness, could not be claimed for Christianity; but the instance of our Saviour, who went about doing good to all, and who died for all, yet had a friend to whom, in the moment of dissolution, he recommended the dearest object of his affections, is in point to prove the contrary; and seems decisive in showing, by his example on earth, which he left for our imitation, that in the assembly of the spirits of men made perfect hereafter, and like to him in heaven, this sublime disposition (which otherwise he had not recommended in his practice on earth) shall be fully developed. Believing, as we do, that Almighty God is a Being of infinite goodness and uncontrolled mercy, we hold it to be unanswerable, that in no one stage of our progress here or hereafter, will any enjoyment be withheld that can be safely conceded or granted to augment our permanent happiness; and considering it equally certain that the tendencies of things observable now, and the character forming in us by the discipline of this life will be completed in the next, necessarily without prejudice to the identity and individuality of the creature, we find it impossible to separate this identity and individuality, which thus remain distinct as to ourselves, from the knowledge of a similar individuality, as it must exist in others. Since the affectionate remembrance of the dead continues with us in this life after the object is removed, we conclude that the friendships and attachments begun here are only suspended to be fully developed in a future state of being. Since we pass into futurity with the ever-aching memory of the dead whom we have loved warm upon us, can we imagine that this emotion is suffered to outlive its object here merely to delude us hereafter; or that, when by the dissolution of this corporal frame, we are prepared to grasp the reality, we are then, and not till then, to discover the mockery and illusion—to find that, although existing like ourselves, as we and the departed must do, in their and our proper identity, still the power of perception and the memory of that identity is destroyed? Living in the strength of our spiritual and individuating energy, can we be utterly unknown to each other, and utterly devoid of all sympathetic and intellectual communion? If the soul exists as an accountable entity hereafter, we cannot entertain this inference, or suppose, we conceive, that a benevolent Deity could suffer an affection to be continued after the object of it is removed, to no purpose, save to impose on us in this life the cruel memory of separation, and the pains of unceasing regrets.

'It must be so: 'tis not for self
That we so tremble on the brink;
And striving to o'erleap the gulph,
Yet cling to being's severing link.

Oh! in that future let us think
To hold each heart, the heart that shares,
With them the immortal waters drink,
And soul in soul grow deathless theirs."

The same subject is resumed in a note at the end of the volume.—

"It may be said this is all very pleasing, but very delusive. Perhaps not entirely so. Much has been said of the delights of friendship even in this life, and after all that can be said, still will it fall short of the reality. Who is not subject to moments of weakness—to hours of sorrow and of sadness—and where is the error we may have committed, or the sorrow we may have suffered, that might not have been, the former perhaps avoided, the latter certainly alleviated, by the sweet counsel of a friend. And are we to conclude that this most solid and substantial consciousness—this most intimate and affectionate knowledge—this essence and concentration of all the best affections of the soul, shall be dissolved and evaporated by the disruption of the body, in which it was not and the escape of the soul in which it was and had its being. If reality can be said to attach to anything, it is to that which is unseen; all external things are visibly shadowy. The paper now before me, and on which I write, is, in a popular sense, and I believe it is, because I see it, and can touch it, and can feel it—but I have only to satisfy myself that the form in which it appears to me, is an unreal mockery, by exposing it to the action of flame, when it will escape the cognizance of my senses. In short, all body is but optical illusion—unreal forms gliding before the mind's eye across the avenue of our senses, exhibiting the passing shape, yet temporary and evanescent appearance of a thing of permanence and reality. But mind rests on the evidence of its effects, and the intuitive consciousness of being; and, above all, the evidence of the existence of a God is clear to demonstration. We see in truth that body is only a sort of phantasmagoria, and the material world but a kind of kaleidoscope, perpetually amusing the eye with various and often beautiful changes and relations. We can apply no such palpable negation to mind. It assuredly exists here, why may it not exist hereafter? We see it not even changed or evaporated—nay, it seems to escape, while in this life, out of the body, can visit distant countries with the speed of its own thoughts, can penetrate distant bosoms, transact business in foreign lands, and communicate its wishes to absent friends, by embodying its invisible desires in palpable and significant figures. The soul can confine its energies within the compass of the frame which envelopes it, or it can concentrate them in the creation of power, and make itself be heard and felt through its inventions in the remotest corner of the earth: yet, when about to be relieved of the body by death, it seems to acquire a brilliancy hitherto unknown, and to bound with the elasticity of recovered and coming freedom from the flesh, in which through this life it had staggered on. And shall this immaterial principle, this unseen energy, this individuating power, which commingled with its kindred minds here, in all the most excellent offices of its nature—be deprived of this intercourse, and driven from this communion hereafter, and shut out from that knowledge of another's breast which is even here partially enjoyed? Shall the perfect identity in which we must exist, if we exist at all, assume another and an unknown shape not to be recognised? Can we be another and yet the same self—to receive the things done in the body; another, and yet the same self, and still utterly unknown to each other. We humbly conclude that if the soul is to exist at all after death, as an accountable being for the deeds of a previous state, it must be in its veriest identity—and if in its identity, it is utterly inconceivable that our knowledge of our individuality shall be lost."

The following is from another of the notes:—

"The reader will perhaps advert to one of the most specious arguments of Hume—that we can only judge of the future from the present, and that, since the distribution of happiness and misery is promiscuous here, it will be so hereafter—or the idea of futurity is a chimera. This reasoning is not overlooked in the Introduction to these pages—yet the inference of Hume is not deduced from the whole of the present state of things, but from a partial and confined view of it. And I need only remind the reader that happiness is not even in this life altogether promiscuous, although it appears to be so in degree, as this state is confessedly not one of retribution but of preparation. We touch each other on all sides in this world, and certainly the virtuous must often suffer for the wicked in a scene of preparatory discipline, where the general import must frequently interrupt individual happiness, and control the individual case. Still the effects are not promiscuous, but the result of specific causes; although we neither can ascertain nor separate them in their exact consequences, and the balance is yet largely on the side of virtue, on the whole account, even here. But it is not from this seeming confusion alone—this partial view of the present scene, that any sound inference can be adduced; without taking into calculation the positive bearing of the unseen faculties of the mind, which lead us out of, and beyond, this world, to eternity in truth, and enable us to ascend in our moral and longing advancement to a more perfect destiny. Were these faculties given us to no purpose, or rather to worse than none, only to render us dissatisfied with the present, if there be nothing beyond it; or can we imagine that a Deity, confessedly good, would have made of us a sort of malicious game here, to be terminated by a painful death, and a still more painful and eternal separation hereafter? With equal truth might we affirm that the human teeth, which lie within the gums of the infant until they are wanted—the eye which is buried until the rays of light have access to it—the lungs of the foetus which have no play in the womb—with equal truth might we, I say, conclude, that these are not prospective contrivances of intelligence, or that the human mind, gifted with the surpassing faculties it cannot fully develop here, shall find no sphere for their action hereafter; or that the happiness of the creation, which is certainly the end in view—the tendency of all preparatory discipline, and the uncontrollable intention, benevolence, justice, and mercy of the Deity, shall be displayed in their effects by their contraries—obduracy and misery. And are the laws of the physical creation of God to be remembered, as evidencing his power and goodness on earth, while the laws of our moral being, and of his unchangeable nature, are to be forgotten when they point to an hereafter for their exercise and display?"

EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.

National School Society.—The following is an abstract of some of the principal points in the twenty-fourth Annual Report of the National School Society, 1835.

The National School Society was established in the year 1811, and incorporated in the year 1817. It is patronized by his Majesty; the president is the Archbishop of Canterbury; and the committee comprises all the prelates of the English church, including also the Bishops of Nova Scotia and Quebec, and many noblemen and gentlemen. The Society is supported by voluntary subscriptions and donations, but its efforts have recently been greatly aided by sharing in the Parliamentary grants.

Of the first 20,000, granted by Parliament in 1833, for the purposes of education, this Society received, on application, the sum of 11,187. 14s.; and of the second grant, in 1834, the sum of 13,610. has been awarded. The details of the cases, the number of which in 1833 was 66, and in 1834, 122, in which these sums of money were granted, are given in the report.

The following statement exhibits what the Society assumes to have done in the work of education:—

"It is known that in 1833 circulars were issued from the office of the Secretary for the Home Department, to the overseers throughout the kingdom, in order to ascertain the actual amount of children under education. Two volumes of an abstract, formed out of the replies from thirty-three counties of England, containing a population of 10,117,800 souls, have just appeared. This is very little less than three-fourths of the kingdom; and, if an average be formed from this large proportion, it will appear that the total number of children (including the returns of endowed schools, infant schools, village and preparatory schools, and every kind of week-day schools) who are receiving daily instruction, is about 1,277,000, and the total number receiving Sunday instruction is about 1,548,000. But, unfortunately, the abstract does not enter sufficiently into particulars to make it appear to what extent duplicate entries have occurred, in regard to the daily and Sunday school returns; and all which can be stated on this matter amounts to this, viz. that in the returns of the thirty-three counties there are comprised 115,305 daily scholars, who are also Sunday scholars, and are known to create duplicate entries; and 34,051 Sunday scholars, in places which have no other school, and cannot produce duplicate entries. The Committee, therefore, have not any sufficient data for ascertaining the exact amount of children now under a course of instruction in England and Wales. The gross total of these scholars, according to the abstract, must be somewhere between the amount of Sunday scholars (1,548,000), and the joint amount of Sunday and daily scholars (2,825,000), diminished by the daily scholars who are known to be comprised and reported in the Sunday school returns. But the nearest approximation to this latter number will be obtained by taking the daily scholars, who are Sunday scholars also, from the National Society's report (for the children receiving Sunday and daily instruction in National schools are 824,305; whereas, in the returns from which the abstract is formed, they are only stated at 115,305); but, with the aid of this document, it can only be determined that the children receiving instruction are certainly more than 1,548,000 Sunday scholars, and less than 2,500,000 Sunday and daily scholars together.

"There do not appear to be any means of deciding how far the higher amount (2,500,000) may be occasioned by duplicate entries; though, on the other hand, it appears in the abstract, that daily schools, particularly those of a private description, are omitted to a considerable extent in many large and populous places. The circumstance, however, which must be chiefly gratifying to the friends of the National Society is this, viz. that whilst the abstract states the gross increase of schools between the years 1818, when the last Parliamentary inquiry was made, and 1835, to have been, in the thirty-three counties, 1,276,706 out of 2,014,144, or somewhat above 100 per cent., an examination of the accounts of the Society, at the same interval, shows that National schools have been advancing at the rate of above 300 per cent. In fact, that the work of education in the Society's hands has been carried forward with an acceleration three times greater than that which has been created by the exertions of the public at large.

"At the period of the Society's incorporation in 1817, the amount of children in national schools was 117,000; and allowing for the increase which was made in the subsequent year, and comparing these with the amount to which the society's scholars have now arrived, at the present time, viz. 516,181, the Committee feel no difficulty in establishing this fact.

"But great as the progress of schools has been, and much as the public have reason to be gratified with the result, a great deal more remains to be done. There are yet multitudes of populous and other places to be provided with schools, being utterly destitute of any means of instruction for the children of the poor; there are also many in which the means of education need greatly to be enlarged, and others again in which the character and description of the education given requires to be materially improved."

In March, 1835, the number of Sunday, and Sunday and daily schools, united either directly or indirectly with the National School Society, was as follows:—

Places containing schools	-	-	3,642
Sunday and daily schools	-	-	3,861
Sunday schools	-	-	1,698
Total number of schools	-	-	5,559
Sunday and daily scholars, viz.—
Boys	-	-	178,740
Girls	-	-	145,305
Sunday scholars, viz.—
Boys	-	-	93,929
Girls	-	-	98,207
Total number of scholars	-	-	516,181

Out of 424 places from which returns have been recently made, directly to the Society in London, upon the state of the schools situated in them, it appears that 381 have the benefit of regular visitors; in 238 cases the children make small weekly payments for their instruction; and in 116, the salaries of the masters and mistresses are variable according to the condition of the schools. Works of industry are introduced into twenty-eight boys' schools, and 241 girls' schools; and in 139 cases the children have the benefit of a leading library, the books of which they carry home for the information and improvement of their parents and friends.

Respecting teachers, it is stated, that "the difficulty always experienced by the Society has been that of providing salaries for teachers, not that of finding well-educated persons who were willing to enter into training, and devote their time to the education of the young. Such persons are never wanting where adequate salaries are provided. But if the qualifications and abilities of teachers were to be raised by means of any system of training, without at the same time raising the remuneration which they receive, it is not probable that the experiment would proportionably benefit the schools. The temptation to accept the same, or a better reward, for some other employment, at a more easy rate of exertion, would be constantly diminishing the numbers of those who had been prepared, with much expense and care, for the business of superintending schools. And this view of the subject is not merely theoretical, but it has been found to exist in practice; and within the last few years, persons who have been sent to London at the expense of the managers of country schools, have, after making considerable progress in the central schools, relinquished their situations for others of higher value, for which they had been rendered competent by the training and instruction they had there received."

Glasgow Mechanics' Institution.—The twelfth annual report of the Glasgow Mechanics' Institution gives a detail of the proceedings of the association for the late session, 1834-5. The lectures on botany were attended by 159 individuals, of whom a large proportion were ladies. A course on phrenology, which extended to twenty-two lectures, was attended by ninety-nine ladies and gentlemen, and seventy-eight occasional visitors. The principal courses, viz. Natural Philosophy and Chemistry, were continued for six months, and to these, and to the Library, twenty-three apprentices of good character, who were unable to purchase tickets, received gratuitous admissions. A course on Anatomy and Physiology was attended by sixty-eight students; it embraced a general view of the structure and functions of the human body, and the application of the principles of Physiology to the preservation of health.

The report further states, that "The opportunities which have been afforded by the Institution to the public, for procuring information on these interesting and important subjects from eminent and well qualified lecturers, are not its only means of disseminating knowledge. Its Library now exceeds 3,200 volumes, of which 360 have been added this year. That it is efficiently operative for that purpose is shown by the fact, that during the last six months, 7,778 volumes have been issued to 399 readers.

"The increase of the Library since the Institution moved to its present premises (800 vols.), having rendered the accommodation for the books inadequate, whilst a like inconvenience was felt from the insufficient size of the Apparatus room, the Committee, after mature deliberation, entered into a lease for additional accommodation. The Library has now been moved, and it is gratifying to the Committee to observe that, whilst securing the additional space it required, they have also secured additional comfort to the readers whilst receiving the books. The old Library and Apparatus rooms have been thrown into one apartment, which alteration affords, at the same time, the increased accommodation required and facility for its inspection."

The following extract speaks for itself; it is worthy of the attention of all who have any control over young men, and who feel interested in the cause of the education of the people:—

"Messrs W. Richmond and Co, and J. Richmond and Son, have, for some years, been in the habit of purchasing tickets for the young men in their employment. As attendance was necessary in the warehouse during the time of the lectures, a part of them attended the Natural Philosophy, and the others the Chemistry class,—thus, by mutually doing the work of each other, all have had an opportunity of improving themselves."

On the 22d of April last, a meeting was held, for the distribution of gold medals, and other prizes, to such of the students as had distinguished themselves, which rewards were offered by various gentlemen who are anxious for the prosperity of the institution, and its real usefulness. At this meeting the Lord Provost of Glasgow presided, and awarded the prizes to the successful competitors.

The following statement, though long, is exceedingly interesting:—

"There is another mode besides direct gifts by which the prosperity of the Institution may be advanced, and as it is one by which its aims can at the same time be accomplished, the committee hope the example will be extensively followed. Mr Murray, of the Caledonian Pottery, with a view of improving the character of his work-people, induced thirty-two of his workmen to contribute a certain proportion of the price of tickets for the mechanical and chemical classes, he himself making up the deficiency. Soon afterwards, at the expense of the workers, a reading-room was opened in the work, in which they spent part of their leisure hours. Then an evening school was opened for the benefit of those employed in the work, which has been in operation for four months, affording instruction, by two eminently qualified teachers, to ninety-seven pupils, who would not otherwise have enjoyed the benefits of instruction; and who are by these means not only kept from idleness and immorality, but are directed to, and led into the paths of knowledge and virtue. The advantages felt from the lectures and library of the institution, the reading-room and the school, suggested to the enterprising and zealous employer the formation of a library. In this scheme he has, as in the others, been heartily seconded by the employed, and a small library is now formed, which cannot fail to prove beneficial. Nor has the zeal of master and servants paused here. In the humble and ungarished cellar, where, during the week, the uninformed meet to receive instruction, and the more advanced read the news of the day, or the works of science or literature, is on the Sabbath a chapel, from which may be heard ascending the voice of praise and prayer to the great Creator; and there his word may be heard expounded and enforced by a chaplain, supported at their own cost. A result so gratifying to the philanthropist, taking its rise as it did from this Institution, speaks volumes in answer to the objections of those who, with assumed reverence for religion, raise the cry that its progress is endangered by the spread of knowledge."

Liverpool Mechanics' Institution.—The foundation stone of the new building in Mount street, Liverpool, for the purposes of the Mechanics' Institution, was laid by Lord Brougham on the 20th of July, in the presence of an immense assemblage. The building, when finished, will be the largest and most complete of its kind of any in the kingdom. This Institution affords a striking instance of what may be accomplished by individual energy and perseverance. A few years ago it was in a sinking state, the funds in an extremely low condition, and the whole affair seemed likely to expire from mere exhaustion. From this state it has been raised by the almost unaided exertions of two successive honorary secretaries, John Leyland and J. S. Radcliffe, Esqrs. The number of members now amounts to about 1200, and the Institution has attained a high degree of efficiency and usefulness. Amongst the donations to the building fund, have been two of 500l. each, from R. V.

Yates and James Mullenex, Esqrs., and also 100l. from an unknown friend.

London University.—On June 27, the distribution of the prizes to the students who have most distinguished themselves during the session of 1834-35, in the London University, took place, Lord Brougham presiding. The theatre was crowded in every part, a great number of ladies being present. After the business of the day was over, the chairman addressed the meeting, and, at the close of his speech, announced a donation of a thousand guineas by an individual whose name was concealed, and who, on a former occasion, had given a similar sum.

King's College, London.—On the same day a similar exhibition took place in King's College, London, the Bishop of London in the chair. It was announced at this meeting that a separate Professorship of English Literature and History was now established, its duties having been previously discharged by two of the other professors.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received the letter signed E. S. H., in reference to our review of Lord Brougham's 'Natural Theology,' and have to thank the writer both for the terms in which he expresses himself on the subject of the criticisms in the PRINTING MACHINE generally, and for the trouble he has taken in stating the points on which he differs from the writer of the particular article in question. We apprehend, however, that, even if we had space for the controversy into which his remarks would lead us, the discussion would not have much interest for the great mass of our readers. E. S. H.'s objections would, we conceive, be more fitly addressed to the author of the treatise, than urged in the form of a reply to the slight notice in the PRINTING MACHINE, which aimed chiefly at giving an account of the ground gone over in the work, and some specimens of its execution, and did not profess to enter into any elaborate examination of either the originality or the correctness of the opinions or arguments advanced in it.

The following letter, which refers to the article on WATT, in our last SUPPLEMENT, relates to a matter of fact, which we presume can be easily determined; and we therefore give the statement in the form in which it has come into our hands.

To the Editor of the PRINTING MACHINE.

SIR,—With every respect for the genius of the late Mr Watt, permit me to correct an error in your account of his achievements in your last number. His real merits are so great that he needs no praise but what is strictly his due. The real fact is, that Trevethick's engine, the immediate predecessor of Bolton and Watt's, has been applied to all those purposes, whose attainment you ascribe as the peculiar distinction of the other. Watt's grand improvement, where he substituted the pressure of the atmosphere for the pressure of steam, gave safety and convenience to what before was a dangerous machine; but the first steam carriages for rail-roads and the first steam-vessels were propelled by Trevethick's, or the high-pressure engine, and within a few years (if not at the present day) engines of this construction were used in Cornwall for pumping water from some of the deepest mines. Indeed this engine has some advantages, particularly for land carriages, where a stream for condensation is less conveniently procured; but the danger of getting hob-nob with an explosive power, acting on a surface of many feet with the force of from one to two hundred pounds on every square inch, would have always proved a pretty effectual bar to its general use. All of us of a certain age must remember the frequent explosions in the infancy of steam navigation, when these engines were very generally used.

I remain, Sir,
Your very obedient servant,
JUSTITIA.

A RAINY DAY.

"Pour! Pour! Pour! There is no hope of its leaving off;"—says a lady, turning away from the window; "you must make up your mind, Louisa, to stay at home, and lose your romps, and have a whole frock to sit in at dinner, and be very unhappy with mamma."

"No, mamma, not that; but don't you think it will hold up? Look—the kennels are not quite so bad; and those clouds—they are not so heavy as they were. It is getting quite light in the sky."

"I am afraid not," says the lady, at once grave and smiling; "but you are a good girl, Louisa; give me a kiss. We will make the day as happy as we can at home. I am not a very bad play-fellow, you know, for all I am so much bigger and older."

"Oh mamma, you know I never enjoy my cousin's company half so much, if you don't go with me; but (here two or three kisses are given and taken, the lady's hands holding the little girl's cheeks, and her eyes looking fondly into hers, which are a little wet)—but—don't you think we really shall be able to go—don't you think it will hold up?" And here the child returns to the window.

"No, my darling; it is set in for a rainy day. It has been raining all the morning; it is now afternoon, and we have, I fear, no chance whatever."

"The puddles don't dance quite as fast as they did," says the little girl.

"But hark!" says the lady; "there's a furious dash of water against the panes."

"T! t!" quoth the little girl against her teeth; "dear me! It's very bad indeed; I wonder what Charles and Mary are thinking of it."

"Why, they are thinking just as you are, I dare say; and doing just as you are, very likely,—making their noses flat and numb against the glass."

The little girl laughs, with a tear in her eye, and mamma laughs and kisses her, and says, "Come; as you cannot go to see your cousins, you shall have a visitor yourself. You shall invite me and Miss Naylor to dinner, and sit at the head of the table in the little room, and we will have your favourite pudding, and no servant to wait on us. We will wait on ourselves; and I will try to be a very great, good, big little child, and behave well; and you shall tell papa, when he comes home, what a nice girl I was."

"Oh dear mamma, that will be very pleasant—What a nice, kind mamma you are, and how afraid I am to vex you, though you do play and romp with me."

"Good girl! But—Ah, you need not look at the window any more, my poor Louisa. Go, and tell cook about the pudding, and we will get you to give us a glass of wine after it, and drink the health of your cousins, so as to fancy them partaking it with us; and Miss Naylor and I will make fine speeches, and return you their thanks; and then you can tell them about it, when you go next time."

"Oh dear, dear, dear mamma, so I can; and how very nice that will be; and I'll go this instant about the pudding; and I don't think we could go as far as Welland's now, if the rain did hold up; and the puddles are worse than ever."

And so, off runs little fond-heart and bright-eyes, happy at dining in fancy with her mother and cousins all at once, and almost feeling as if she had but exchanged one holiday for another.

The sight of mother and daughter has made us forget our rainy day.—Alas! the lady was right, and the little child wrong, for there is no chance of to-day's clearing up. The long-watched and interesting puddles are not indeed "worse than ever"—not suddenly hurried and exasperated, as if dancing with rage at the flogging given them: they are worse even than that, for they are everlastingly the same:—the same full, twittering, dancing, circle-making overflowings of gutter, which they have been ever since five in the morning, and which they mean to be, apparently, till five to-morrow.

Wash! wash! wash! The window-panes, weltering, and dreary, and rapid, and misty with the rain, are like the face of a crying child who is afraid to make a noise, but who is resolved to be as "aggravating" as possible with the piteous ostentation of his wet cheeks,—weeping with all his might, and breathing, with wide-open mouth, a sort of huge, wilful, everlasting sigh, by way of accompaniment. Occasionally, he puts his hand over to his ear,—hollow,—as though he feared to touch it, his master having given him a gentle pinch: and at the same moment, he stoops with bent head and shrugged shoulders, and one lifted knee, as if in the endurance of a writhing anguish.

You involuntarily rub one of the panes, thinking to see the better into the street, and forgetting that the mist is made by the rain on the other side.—On goes the wet as ever, rushing, streaming, running down, mingling its soft and washy channels; and now and then comes a clutter of drops against the glass, made by a gust of wind.

Clack, meantime, goes the sound of patters; and when you do see, you see the street almost deserted,—a sort of lay Sunday. The rare carriages drive as fast as they can; the hackney-coaches lumber along, glossy (on such occasions only) with the wet, and looking as old and rheumatic as the poor coachmen, whose hat and legs are bound with straw;—the rain-spouts are sputtering torrents; messengers dart along in oil-skin capes; the cry of the old shrimp-seller is hoarse; the postman's knock is ferocious.

If you are out of doors, woe betide you, should you have gone out unprepared, or relying on a coach. Your shoes and stockings are wet through, the latter almost as muddy as the dog that ran by just now without an owner; the rain washes your face, gets into the nape of your neck, makes a spout of your hat. Close by your ears comes roaring an umbrella, the face underneath it looking astonished at you. A butcher's boy dashes along, and contrives to come with his heel plump upon the exact spot of a loose piece of pavement, requisite for giving you a splash that shall embrace the whole of your left leg. To stand up under a gateway is impossible, because in the state you are in, you will catch your "death o' cold;" and the people underneath it look at you amazed, to think how you could have come out "such a day, in such a state." Many of those who are standing up, have umbrellas; but the very umbrellas are wet through. Those who pass by the spot, with their oil or silk-skirts roaring, as above (a sound particularly distressing to the non-possessors) show that they have not been out of doors so long. Nobody puts his hand out from under the gate-way, to feel whether it is still raining. There can be no question of it. The only voluntary person visible in the street is a little errand-boy, who, because his mother has told him to make great haste, and not get wet feet, is amusing himself with double rest, by kicking something along through the gutter.

In private streets the pavement is washed clean; and so it is, for the moment, in public: but horrible will be the mud to-morrow. Horses are splashed up to the mane; the legs of the rider's overalls are as if he had been sitting in a ditch; poor girls with handboxes trip patiently along, with their wet curls over their eyes, and a weight of skirt. A carriage is coming down a narrow street; there is a plenitude of mud between you and the wheels, not to be eschewed; on dash they, and give you three beauty spots, one right on the nose.

Swift has described such a day as this, in lines which first appeared in the 'Tatler,' and which hearty, unenvying Steele introduces as written by one, "who treats of every subject after a manner that no other author has done, and better than any other can do." [In transcribing such words, one's pen seems to partake the pleasure of the writer.] Swift availing himself of the license of a different age, is apt to bring less pleasant images among his pleasant ones, than suit every body now; but here follows the greater part of his verses:—

"Careful observers may foretell the hour,
By sure prognostics, when to dread a shower:
While rain depends, the pensive cat gives o'er
Her frolics, and pursues her tail no more.
If you be wise, then go not far to dine,
You'll spend in coach-hire more than save in wine,
A coming shower your shooting corns pressage,
Old aches will throb, your hollow tooth will rage.
Sauntering in coffee-house is Dulman seen;
He damps the climate, and complains of spleen.

"Meanwhile the south, rising with dabbled wings,
A sable cloud athwart the welkin flings.

Brisk Susan whips her linen from the rope,
While the first drizzling shower is borne aloope;
Such is that sprinkling which some careless quean
Flirts on you from her mop, but not so clean.
You fly, invoke the gods; then, turning, stop
To rail; she, singing, still whirls on her mop.
Not yet the dust had shunned the unequal strife,
But, aided by the wind, fought still for life;
And, wafted with its foe by violent gust,
'Twas doubtful which was rain and which was dust,
Ah! where must needy poet seek for aid,
When dust and rain at once his coat invade?—
His only coat,—where dust confused with rain,
Roughens the nap, and leaves a mingled stain?

"Now in contiguous drops the flood comes down,
Threatening with deluge this devoted town.
To shops in crowds the dragged females fly,
Pretend to cheapen goods, but nothing buy.
The Templar spruce, with every spout abroad
Stays till 'tis fair, yet seems to call a coach.
The tucked-up sempstress walks with hasty strides,
While streams run down her oil'd umbrella's sides.
There various kinds, by various fortunes led,
Commence acquaintance underneath a shed.
Triumphant Tories and desponding Whigs
Forget their feuds, and join to save their wigs.
Box'd in a chair, the bean impatient sits,
While spouts run clattering o'er the roof by fits;

• A sedan.

And ever-and-anon with frightful din,
The leather sounds; he trembles from within.

"So when Troy chairmen bore the wooden steed,
Pregnant with Greeks, impatient to be freed
(Those bully Greeks, who, as the moderns do, Instead of paying chairmen ran them through),
Laocoon struck the outside with his spear,
And each imprisoned hero quaked for fear."

The description concludes with a triumphant account of a gutter, more civic than urbane.

How to make the best of a bad day has been taught by implication in various pages throughout our Journal, especially in those where we have studied the art of making everything out of nothing, and have delivered immense observations on rain-drops. It may be learnt in the remarks which appeared a few weeks ago on a 'Dusty Day.' The secret is short and comprehensive, and fit for trying occasions of all sorts. Think of something superior to it;—make it yield entertaining and useful reflection, as the rain itself brings out the flowers. Think of it as a benignant enemy, who keeps you in-doors, or otherwise puts your philosophy to a trial, for the best of purposes,—to fertilize your fields, to purify your streets against contagion,—to freshen your air, and put sweets upon your table,—to furnish life with variety, your light with a shadow that sets it off, your poets with similes and descriptions. When the summer rains, Heaven is watering your plants. Fancy an insect growling at it under his umbrella of rose-leaf. No wiser is the man who grumbles under his gateway; much less over his port wine. Very high-bred ladies would be startled to learn that they are doing a very vulgar thing (and hurting their tempers to boot) when they stand at a window, peevishly objecting to the rain with such phrases as "Dear me! how tiresome!"—My lady's maid is not a bit less polite, when she vows and "purtests," that it is "quite contrary";—as if heaven had sent it on purpose to thwart her ladyship and her waiting-woman! By complaint we dwindle and subject ourselves, make ourselves little-minded, and the slaves of circumstance. By rising above an evil, we set it at a distance from us, render it a small object, and live in a nobler air.

A wit, not unworthy to be named in the same page with the Dean of St Patrick's, has given a good lesson on the subject,—Green, in his poem on the "Spleen,"—a teacher the fittest in the world to be heard upon it, because he was subject to what he writes about, and overcame it by the cultivation of sense and good-temper. Some bookseller with a taste,—Mr Pickering, or Mr Van-Voorst,—should give us a new edition of this poem, with engravings. Mr Wilkie, Mr Mulready, and others, might find subjects enough to furnish a design to every page.

"In rainy days keep double guard,
Or spleen will surely be too hard;
*Which, like those fish by sailors met,
Fly highest when their wings are wet,*
In such dull weather so unfit
To enterprize a work of wit,
When clouds one yard of azure sky
That's fit for simile deny,
I dress my face with studious looks,
And shorten tedious hours with books;
But if dull fogs invade the head,
That mem'ry minds not what is read,
I sit in windows dry as ark,
And on the drowning world remark:
Or to some coffee-house I stray
For news, the manna of the day,
And from the hipp'd discourses gather,
That politics go by the weather;
Then seek good-humoured tavern-chums,
And play at cards, but for small sums;
Or with the merry fellows quaff,
And laugh aloud with them that laugh;
Or drink a joco-serious cup
With souls who've took their freedom up,
And let my mind, beguiled by talk,
In Epicurus' garden walk,
Who thought it heaven to be serene;
Pain, hell; and purgatory, spleen."

BIRDS IN THE SPRING.

Full lusty was the weather and benign;

(What for the season and the youngé green)
Full loudé sungen their affection:
Them seeméd had gotten them protection
Against the sword of winter, keen and cold.

Squire's Tale.

PATIENCE AND EQUAL DEALING IN LOVE.

For one thing, Sirs, safely dare I say,
That friendes ever each other must obey,
If they will longé holden company:
Love will not be constrain'd by mastery:
When mastery cometh, the god of Love anon
BEATETH his wings, AND FAREWELL! HE IS GONE.

[Compare the ease, life, and gesticulation of this—the audible suddenness and farewell of it—with the balanced and formal imitation by Pope—

"Love, free as air, at sight of human ties, Spreads his light wings, and in a moment flies."]

Love is a thing, as any spirit, free.
Women of kind desiren liberty,
And not to be constrained as a thrall;
And so do men, if soothly I say shall.
Look, who that is most patient in love,
He is at his advantage all above.

(he has the advantage over others that are not so.)

Patience is a high virtue certain,
For it vanquisheth, as these clerkée sain,
Things that rigour never should attain;
For every word men should not chide or plain.
Learne to suffer—

(learn to suffer)

or, so may I gone,

(so may I prosper)

Ye shall it learn, whether ye will or non.

The Franklin's Tale.

INABILITY TO DIE.

Three drunken rioters go out to kill Death, who meets them in the likeness of a decrepid old man, and directs them to a treasure which brings them to their destruction. The old man only is given here.

When they had gone not fully half a mile,
Right as they would have trodden o'er a stile,
An old man and a pooré with them met:
This oldé man full meekely them gret,
And saide thus; "Now, Lordes, God you see!"
The proudest of these riotours three Answered again; "What? churl, with sorry grace,
Why art thou all forwrappéd save thy face?
Why livest thou so long in so great age?"
This oldé man 'gan look in his visage,
And saide thus; "For I ne cannot find
A man, though that I walkéd into Ind,
Neither in city nor in no village,
That wouldé change his youthe for mine age;
And therefore must I have mine agé still
As longé time as it is Goddés will.
Ne Death, alas! ne will not have my life:
Thus walk I, like a restéless caitiff,
And on the ground, which is my mother's gate,
I knocké with my staff early and late,
And say to her, 'Levé mother, let me in.
Lo, how I vanish, flesh, and blood, and skin.
Alas! when shall my bonés be at rest?
Mother, with you would I change my chest,
That in my chamber longé time hath be,
Yea, for a hairy clout to wrap in me.'"

(That is, for a coffin and a winding-sheet of hair-cloth.)

DESCRIPTION OF THE COCK,

(In the story of the "Cock and the Fox.")

*His comb was redder than the fine coral,
Embattled as it were a castle wall;
His bill was black, and as the jet it shone,
Like azure were his legges and his tone;*

(His toes)

*His nailés whiter than the lily flower,
And liké the burnéd gold was his colour,*

Compare the above verses (taking care of the accent) with the most popular harmonies of Pope, and see into what a flowing union of strength and sweetness the "old poet" could get, when he chose.

He flew down from his beam,
For it was day, and eke his hennés all;
And with a chuck he 'gan them for to call,
For he had found a coorn lay in the yard;
Royal he was, he was no more afraid.

(He had been frightened by a fox.)

He looketh, as it were a grim léoun,

(Lion)

*And on his toes he roameth up and down;
He deigneth not to set his foot to ground;
He shucketh when he hath a coorn yfound,
And to him runnen then his wivés all.*

PORTRAIT OF A FEMALE.

This is in the pure, unfaltering style of the old Italian painters. The simile in the third line is one of the quaintnesses of an age in which books were rare,—the key to almost all the quaintnesses of Chaucer. The rest of them are connected with his adherence to the originals from which he translated, and only appear strange from difference of time or national customs. A want of consideration to this effect led Mr Hazlitt into an error, when he instanced that pleasant, scornful admonition to the sun in Troilus and Creseida, (to go and sell his light to them that "engrave small seals") as an evidence of Chaucer's minuteness and particularity.

The original of Troilus and Creseida was by an Italian; and in Italy the seal-engravers of those times were famous, and in great employ; nor was anything more natural for a lover, angry with the day-time, than to tell the sun to go and give his light to those that so notoriously needed it.

Among those other folk was Creseida
In widow's habit black; but nathéless
Right as our first letter is now an A,
In beauty first so stood she makéless;

(Matchless)

*Her goodly looking gladdéd all the press;
N'as never seen thing to be praised so dear,
Nor under cloude black so bright a star,*

[What a pity this fine line did not terminate with a full stop! but he goes on—]

As was Creseid, they saiden evereach one
That her behelden in her blacké weed;
And yet she stood full low and still alone,
Behind all other folks in little brede,

(In small space)

And nigh the door, aye under shamés drede,

(that is, not shame-faced, but apprehensive of being put to shame,—put out of her self-possession)

*Simple of attire and debonnair of cheer;
With full-assured looking and mannere.*

Troilus thus seeing her for the first time, looks hard at her, like a town-gallant; and she, being town-bred herself, for all her unaffectedness, thinks it necessary to let him understand that he is not to stare at her.

She n'as not with the most of her stature,

(her stature was not of the tallest)

But all her limbés so well answering
Weren to womanhood, that creature
Was never lessé mannish in seeming,
And eke the puré wise of her meaning
She shewed well

(her manner was so correspondent with her meaning) — that man might in her guess

Honour, estate, and womanly nobles.
Then Troilus, right wonder well withal,
'Gan for to like her meaning and her cheer,
Which somedéal deignous was,

(was a little haughty)

— for she let fall
Her look a little aside, in such mannere
Accounes—"What! may I not standen here?"
And after that her looking 'gan she light;

(began to lighten—to restore to its former ease)

That never thought him see so good a sight.

Chaucer is very fond of painting these womanly portraits, especially the face. Here is—introduced to us with a piece of music. The succession of adverbs at the end of the first five lines, makes a beat upon the measure, analogous to the dance he is speaking of—

ANOTHER,

I saw her dance so comely,
Carol and sing so sweetly,
And laugh and play so womanly,
And looke so debonairely,
So goodly spea and so friendly,
That certés I trow that evermore
N'as seen so blisful a treasure.
For every hairé on her head,
Me soth to say it was not red,
Ne neither yellow, nor brown it n'as;
Methought most like to gold it was.
And which eyen my lady had,
Debonaire, good, and glad, and sad;

(sad is in earnest)

Simplé, of good muchel, not too wide;
Thereto her look was not asidé
Nor overhawl, but beset so well,
It drew and took up every deal,

(entirely)

All which that on her 'gan behold;
Her eyen seemed anon she would Have mercy. Folly weenden so,
But it was ne'er the rather do;

(She looked so good-natured, that folly itself thought she was at its service; though folly was much mistaken.)

It was no counterfeited thing;
IT WAS HER OWN PURE LOOKING.

A charming couplet! And he need not have said any more; but he was so fond of the face, he could not help going on:—

Were she ne'er so glad,
Her looking was not foolish spread.

Though dullness itself, he tells us, was absolutely "afraid of her style of life, it was so cheerful."

I have no wit that can suffice
To comprehend her beauty.

(To describe it comprehensively.)

But thus much I dare say, that she
Was white, ruddy, fresh, lively buéd,
And every day her beauty newéd.
* * * * * Be it ne'er so dark
Me thinketh I see her evermo;

(If all they, says the poet)

That ever lived were now alive,
Ne would they have found to describe
In all her face a wicked sign,
For it was sad, simple, and benign.
The Book of the Duchess.

And there is a great deal more of the description.

GOING TO SLEEP IN HEARING OF A NIGHTINGALE.

A nightingale upon a cedar green,
Under the chamber wall there as she lay,
Full lond ysung again the mooné sheen,
Par' venture, in his birdé wise, a lay
Of love, that made her hearté fresh and gay;
That hearkenéd she so long in good intent,
Till at the last the deadé sleep her hent.

EXQUISITE COMPARISON OF A NIGHTINGALE, WITH CONFIDENCE AFTER FEAR.

And as the new abashed nightingale,
That stineth first, when she beginneth sing,
When that she heareth any herdé take,

(herdsman counting his flock)

Or in the hedges any wight stirring;
And after, eikar both her voice out ring;

(Siker is securely)

Right so Cresidé, when that her aread stent,
Opened her heart, and told him her intent.

We conclude this long article very unwillingly (having to omit a hundred beautiful passages), with a specimen of Chaucer's philosophy, particularly fit to honour the pages of THE LONDON JOURNAL.

For thilké ground that beareth the weedés wick

(wicked or poisonous)

Bear'th eke these wholesome herbés as full oft;
And next to the foul nettle, rough and thick,
The rose ywaxeth softe, and smooth, and soft;
And next the valley is the hill aloft;
And next the darke night is the glad morrow,
And also joy is next the fine of sorrow.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXX.—TRAGICAL DEATH OF A TRAGICAL WRITER.—MEMOIR OF THE ABBÉ PREVOT.

It was curious that the Abbé Prevot, the gloomiest of romance writers, should accidentally have met with a death as strange and ghastly as any that he could have well conceived. Nor is it the only romance in the history of this singular genius. He was born at a town in Artois, in the year 1697, and he studied with the Jesuits, most probably for the church. The Jesuits he left to go into the army; then left the army to return to them; again left them to return to the army, in which he became a distinguished officer; left the army a third time, in consequence of an unhappy love-adventure, became a Benedictine monk, and finally broke his monastic vows and became a writer. This monk and gloomy novelist (who, under the circumstances of those times, could not well either appear to be liable to the charge with impunity, or even openly marry) was accused of being a favourite of the ladies, one of whom left the country to follow him to England during a temporary sojourn there. He defended himself from the charge in the following manner, more ingenious than candid:—

"This Medoro," says he, speaking of himself, "so favoured by the fair, is a man of thirty-seven, or thirty-eight, who bears in his countenance and in his humour the traces of his former chagrin; who passes whole weeks without going out of his closet; and who every day employs seven or eight hours in study; who seldom seeks occasion for enjoyments, who even rejects those that are offered, and prefers an hour's conversation with a sensible friend, to all those amusements which are called pleasures of the world and agreeable recreations. He is, indeed, civil, in consequence of a good education, but little addicted to gallantry; of a mild but melancholy temper; in fine, sober, and regular in his conduct."

The truth is, he was most likely really in love on this occasion, and not "in gallantry;" nor will any lady, in these more reasonable times, wonder that he should either love or be loved, when it is considered, not only that he was a man of intelligence and sensibility, but the author of one of the most striking stories of a devoted passion that ever was written,—the celebrated novel of 'Manon L' Escaut.' And the less such a man cared for gallantry, or the more he out-lived it, the more he would care for love. He was in the habit of being in earnest; which is half the secret of acceptability of any kind; and though gloomy in his books, he does not appear to have been so in his intercourse, but possessed only of that milder melancholy, which is even-tempered and easily runs into the pleasantness it stands in need of; and this willingness to please and be pleased is the other half.

On his return to Paris, our author assumed the habit of an Abbé, and lived tranquilly under the protection of the Prince of Conti, who gave him the title of his Almoner and Secretary, with an establishment that enabled him to pursue his studies. "By the desire of Chancellor d'Aguesseau, he undertook a general history of voyages, of which the first volume appeared in 1745. The success of his works, the favour of the great, the subsiding of the passions, a calm retreat, and literary leisure, seemed to promise a serene and peaceful old age. But a dreadful accident put an end to his tranquillity, and the fair prospect which had opened before him was closed by the hand of death. To pass the evening of his days in peace, and to finish in retirement three great works which he had undertaken, he had chosen and prepared an agreeable recess at Firmin near Chantilly. On the 23rd November, 1768, he was discovered by some peasants in an apoplectic fit, in the forest of Chantilly. A magistrate was called in, who unfortunately ordered a surgeon immediately to open the body, which was apparently dead. A loud shriek from the victim of their culpable precipitation, convinced the spectators of their error. The instrument was withdrawn, but not before it had touched the vital parts. The unfortunate Abbé opened his eyes and expired."

Prevot is accounted the second best of the French novelists, ranking next to Marivaux. He is known to the readers of our circulating libraries, not only for his 'Manon L' Escaut,' but as the author of the 'Dean of Coleraine,' of the 'History of Mr Cleveland,' and the 'History of Margaret of Anjou.' His countrymen are indebted to him also, among many other things, for translations of 'Sir Charles Grandison,' and 'Clarissa.'

Imagine him thinking of the fictitious catastrophes of his novels, while realizing so frightful a one in his own death! What a fate,—to open his eyes from an apoplexy, and feel himself slaughtered:—

"To wake and find those visions true!"

ENGLISH AND FRENCH FRUIT DESSERTS.

The more general use of dessert fruit among the middling classes is another requisite wanting for the improvement of horticulture in Scotland and Ireland. If fruit, physiologically considered, is less wholesome after dinner than before it (which is questionable), it is at least more so than where drinking is substituted in its place. To prolong the period of eating, and the conversation of female society, are not only objects which afford immediate satisfaction; but, by moderating the use of stimulating liquors, tend to insure future health. Even in England, where a dessert is universal among the independent classes, there is a great want of nicety of taste: fruit is valued by many only as a symptom of the presence of wine: others contentedly use pears and plums that would be rejected at the most common French déjeuné; and many rest satisfied with melons and grapes, who, at scarcely any additional expense, might have pine-apples. Wherever the litter of four horses is at command, pine-apples may be grown in pits with very little trouble to the gardener, and, indeed, at much less trouble than very early cucumbers or melons. But why speak of pines, when not one family in a hundred is properly supplied with mushrooms, which ought to be on the table, in some form, every day in the year? On a small scale, the grand secret is to employ a gardener who knows his business; and to direct his attention less to raising ordinary productions at extraordinary seasons, than to raising first-rate crops of every thing in due season. On a larger scale, all ordinary and extraordinary things should be attempted that art and wealth can accomplish.—London's Encyclopedia of Gardening.

ROMANTIC LEGEND OF HAROUN AL RESCHID.

We are told by Khondemir, that the Khaliph saw in a dream at Rakha, before he departed from that place, a hand over his head, full of red earth, and at the same time heard the voice of a person pronouncing these words, "See the earth in which Haroun is to be interred." Upon which he demanded where he was to be buried? and was instantly answered by the same voice, "at Tus." This warning greatly decomposing him, he communicated the dream to his chief physician Gabriel, the son of Bakhtishua, who told him that this ought to give him no manner of concern, as dreams were only phantoms produced by the fumes which the humours of the body sent into the brain; and that the expedition to Khorasan, in order to extinguish the rebellion of Rafé Ebu Al Seith, he was upon the point of undertaking, had given place to this imagination. He added, that no better remedy could be thought of to dissipate his melancholy, than to pursue some favourite diversion that might draw his attention another way. The Khalif, therefore, by his physician's advice, prepared a magnificent entertainment for his principal courtiers, which continued several days. He afterwards put himself at the head of his troops, and advanced to the confines of Jorjân, where he was attacked by the distemper; which increasing, he found himself obliged to leave the army and retire to Tus. He sent for his physician, Gabriel Ebu Bakhtishua, and said to him, "Do you remember, Gabriel, my dream at Rakha? We are now arrived at Tus, the place, according to what was predicted in that dream, of my interment. Send one of my eunuchs to fetch me a handful of the earth in the neighbourhood of the city." One of his favourite eunuchs, named Masrur, was immediately dispatched to bring a little of the soil of the place to the Khalif; who soon returned, and brought a handful of red earth, which he presented to Haroun with his arm half bare; at sight of which, the Khalif cried out, "In truth this is the earth, and that the very arm, that I saw in my dream." His spirits falling him, and his malady increasing, he died three days after this explanation, and was buried in the same place.—Universal History.

THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY IGERTON WERRE.

No. VI.

THE relative proportions of the letters of the alphabet, according to the general division of them into four sorts, which I have adopted, have so far been exhibited only in the Hebrew language; and if the conclusions which it is sought to establish from them, rested on no other evidence, they might be thought of doubtful authority. But when we find nearly the same scale of proportions resulting from every new experiment, whether we make an ancient or a modern, a northern or a southern language, the subject of analysis, it is impossible not to perceive that in so much uniformity there subsists a principle. That principle may not be one of much philological importance; but yet it is interesting, inasmuch as it shows us the materials or stuff of which languages have been made, in what quantities compounded, how combined; and so gives us, as it were, a receipt for languages; not failing to impress us, further, with that fact which is equally true in the culinary science and the science of speech,—that, with an infinite diversity of productions, the component parts are few and unaltered, and that the most striking differences often proceed from some very inconsiderable variation in the proportion of the same ingredients.

You can hardly bring under view four languages more differently characterized than the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English. Their united features may serve as a universal face, in which to peer for information as to the spirit, scope, end, and purpose of human speech. The thing in which they all consent may be safely pronounced law, and any facts to the contrary regarded as contumacious.* They represent all principal historical epochs, and a sufficient variety of geographical situations; connecting the East with the West, the South with the North, and the remotest antiquity with the "current month." Let us see, then, how they stand related to one another. The Hebrew has been considered. The following table shows the proportions of the letters as they appear in the Greek, Latin, and English. I believe that thirty lines of a language are as good as a thousand for exhibiting any general fact relative to its external structure; and I have seen printers make the nicest calculations, in questions not very dissimilar, on much smaller data. I have therefore been content to take this number of lines, from the beginning of the 'Iliad,' and again from the beginning of the 'Æneid,' for the Greek and Latin languages; and, for the English, the lines were picked at hazard, from the 'Paradise Lost,' and begin with which is in the middle of the eighth book. But as the English heroic line differs much as to length from the Greek and Latin, it was proper to make a corresponding addition to this portion. Our heroic line consists of ten syllables; in the hexameter the average is fifteen. The passage from the 'Paradise Lost' is therefore extended to forty-five lines, to equal the others of thirty each.

* Such is that fact related by Dr Jonathan Edwards respecting the language of the Muhhekaneen Indians, as quoted by Booth in his Dictionary (classification of letters) viz. that it does not contain a single labial, inasmuch that after the Lord's prayer, when they try to say Amen, the nearest they can come to it is Awen, "from an aversion to shutting the lips."

Relative proportions of the consonants in the Greek, Latin, and English languages* :—

	Greek.	Latin.	English.
Lingual .	263	263	347
Labial .	70	132	176
Sibilant .	76	81	98
Guttural .	63	69	86
Total . .	472	565	637

Some of these proportions, I think, will rather surprise the reader. He will not, for example, be prepared to find that our language—that same

"—harsh, northern, grunting, guttural, Which we're obliged to hiss, and spit, and sputter all,"—

is so far from possessing guttural consonants in excess, that these are both infinitely below the number of any other kind of letters in English, and in a proportion of nearly one to two to the gutturals in those dead languages, with which we are used to think English not worthy to be put in comparison, in any question relating to euphony. What then can be the reason that the Greek and Latin languages, with nearly double the number of this sort of letters, are yet more tuneful than our own; and that the latter, though not justifying, as we see, those opprobrious epithets of the poet, "grunting, guttural," is certainly of the "sputtering" kind, and rude of mouth? Our figures must explain it. It will be seen from these that, taking the consonants of all kinds, the total amount in the English language greatly exceeds the amount in the Latin and Greek, and it is therefore from this thick succession of consonants, which we are continually doubling, trebling, and quadrupling, and, in some words, even quintupling (as in the word songstress), and not from the peculiar preponderance of any of the harder sort, that our language exhibits those harsh features which have given it an ill name amongst the poets. The Latin contains a very large proportion of hard consonants, yet is far more musical than the English, being far more vocal; and in about the same degree in which the Latin surpasses the English for purity and vocality, the Greek surpasses the Latin; the proportion of consonants in the three languages respectively, being as nearly as possible represented by the figures 7, 6, and 5, as a division of the above amount by nine will show. It seems to be a truth almost universally attested, that the languages of cold countries are full of consonants, while those of warmer regions are progressively more vocal; and it is evident that the cause lies in the climate, because, under a warm sun and in a state of physical enjoyment, the mouth loves to have its liberty, and opens as naturally as a cottage window on a summer's morning, and so it forms a habit of spacious utterance, and a free and flowing enunciation, in which consonants are only keys on which to play all sorts of graceful and melodious variations of sound; they come of necessity at last, when the mouth closes. But, in a latitude where the fear may be lest in opening the lips the tongue should freeze, what is to be expected but that the mouth, like a besieged fortress, should economize all its resources, and hold out as long as possible against the enemy, never unfolding its obdurate gates but when it becomes necessary at last to gasp at some brief vowel? And it may be added, that the same cause which accounts for the thickness of northern languages explains to us also why those who speak them generally render them still more gross, by a lazy and slovenly manner of speaking,—and why they are monotonous,—and why they are unimpassioned; for all these sins proceed from "a climate too cold." Fancy a Laplander saying ελιου (e-el-i-oi-o!) Why, he would get his death of cold before he reached the third syllable! In this word we have seven letters, of which six are vowels, and only one a consonant; in our word strength there are eight letters, of which seven (to speak according to common acceptation) are consonants, and only one a vowel. What a contrast! Yet both are fine; for what other word in the English language is so strong as strength, which seems as if you must say it with a clenched fist? And, on the other hand, what can be more musical than ελιου, which Homer, by a happy licence draws out to this tuneful length from ελις (eliou), throwing in vowel after vowel, on one pretence or another, as the modern Italians in their poetry scruple not to do, led by the same fine ear and taste?

* These calculations must be taken with the same exceptions as the former. In our ignorance of a lost pronunciation, we must lay our account with many errors. Nevertheless, where each particular evidence is so striking and confirmatory, we need not scruple to form a few general inferences; more than this, it is true, would be presumptuous. I have sometimes thought that a good deal might be done towards rescuing ancient pronunciation from oblivion by any one with a Walkerly genius, who chose to read carefully through the classics with this view, sedulously considering the harmony of words and sentences, and noting all such passages—and they are not few, especially among the more artificial writers of the age of Nero and Domitian, the poetical declaimers and declaiming poets,—as furnish evidence of a particular intention in the arrangement of the words as to their result in sound, and so, in fact, weighing the language with all nicety of ear and with a constant reference to the probable designs of the writer. As an example of what I mean, I will add a sentence from Cicero, which, it seems to me, would prove quite satisfactorily, if we had no other evidence, that the C in the word dicere should sound hard like K: "Tum docere, tum dicere vellet, tum audire, tum dicere." (He would wish to be teaching something, and anon to be learning, at one time to listen, at another to speak.) Now if the C were soft (as we pronounce it) in these two words dicere and dicere, it is evident that they would both have sounded alike, as if written dicere; and though the vowel sound were long in one and short in the other, still the characteristic letter would be the same; and, in such case, nothing can be conceived more exquisitely clumsy and anti-Ciceronian than this sentence, in which the above words do not merely encounter but stand in direct antithesis to one another. It is, therefore, as certain as if Cicero himself had told us of it, that these two words were differently pronounced; and we cannot for a moment doubt [that the difference of pronunciation lay—where? id id in the spelling—in the S, which being prefixed to the C in one, and not in the other word, gave that necessary distinction in sound, without which the nice ear of Cicero could never have been satisfied with the sentence.—"Tum docere, tum dicere vellet, tum audire, tum dicere."

Another fact which the above table exhibits, will perhaps also take some people by surprise. This is the proportion of the sibilant, or hissing letters. It might be expected that the English, from its known peculiarity, would show a much greater force in this division; whereas of those three sorts which exceed in quantity the corresponding sorts in the other languages, this is precisely the lowest in its excess. The "language of serpents," therefore, if it merit this its bad distinction, which no doubt it does, suffers not from an over-proportion of the sibilant letters, as is universally imagined, but from the fact that the quality of those letters is so remarkable, that any, the slightest, addition to their number is felt at once as an annoyance, whether accompanied by others of a different kind or not. Our language, as we have seen, is altogether more densely populated with consonants; therefore the sibilant family, though in its proportion less, is in its actual number more numerous than in the Latin or the Greek; and therefore it is, that by its peculiar faculty of overpowering the other letters of the alphabet, and making itself heard wherever it comes, this serpent-voiced enemy of ours has got us our nickname. As for proportion, however, Greek just as much deserves to be called the "language of serpents" as English, measured in this way;—yes, even our adored Greek! How exceedingly—how troublesomely—abounding the letter S is in the Greek; that line in Euripides is a ludicrous instance—a line which was so much ridiculed by the comic poets, and which in the Athenian theatre was kissed for its hissing. This line is not to be considered as an example of intentional alliteration on the part of the poet, but as an unhappy accident, the consequence of the abundance of the letter S. Indeed, Caninius, who speaks especially with reference to the Greek language,* says, "E consonantibus nulla est crebrior" (none of the consonants is more frequent), and he instances this verse of Euripides.

"Ἰσασά σ' ὡς ἴσασιν ἑλλήνων ὄσοι," (Isosa s'hos issasin hellenon osoi.)

* Hellenism. Alphab.

Judging from the results of my own observation, however, I cannot agree with Caninius to this extent. But the frequency of the letter is unquestionable; and if, as we are told, Pindar wrote an ode in which he contrived not to have a single S, it must have been a triumph of ingenuity; perhaps he fixed on that letter indeed, because he knew that the omission of it would be the most difficult and surprising to accomplish.

The Latin is not a whit less beset with this hissing grievance, and thus we find the old Roman poets, in the golden age of the Latin language (that is to say, not the age of Augustus), and when poetry—as yet no science—took to itself every liberty of speech that seemed fitting to the purpose of the moment—we find them, I say, at this period, often throwing S overboard, when they thought some line carried too much weight; * and Quintilian tells us (Instit. Lib. ix. c. 4) that this licence was the subject of some dispute among the critical—"reprehendit Lauraninus, Messala defendit;" but why it should have been grudged, one cannot perceive, since the letter M—a most inoffensive letter in comparison—continued to be at all times liable to a virtual banishment, and from what Quintilian says, who abuses it most unmercifully, calling it magis litera (the loving letter), (Lib. xii. c. 10), &c., we may conclude that its supposed variance with harmonious composition had much to do with this banishment. It is certain that this letter was not subject to elision in the earlier periods of Roman literature;† and if that elision came afterwards in the shape of a refinement—an improvement in euphony—it is a proof that its former fulness of expression in the face of a vowel was deemed unpleasant, though no doubt a certain natural shortness and obscurity of sound which it had in that position, may have had a principal share in occasioning its expulsion from quantity.‡

[In my last chapter I remarked on the usual distribution of the consonants into dentals, and was rather wroth with our orthoepists for adopting a dis-

* Many of the fragments of the elder Roman poets contain examples of this practice. See Cic. Orat. Quintil. ubi supra. J. G. Vossii Proodia Latina. But various examples occur also in Lucretius, from whom Vossius gives the following:—

"Usque adeo largos haustus de fontibus magnis;"

and in the works of still later poets. Sometimes, however, the S was expressed, although followed by a consonant; as in this line of a fragment of Lucilius:—

"Ut nemo sit nostrum quin pater optumus divum."

(I don't know how it is that Vossius has not remarked this.) With respect to the elision of letters, by the way, we may be sure, from the writings of the comic poets, that the Romans greatly abbreviated their language in ordinary discourse (much more than our own practice in conversation can give us any idea of, and probably much more, in effect, than the written dialogue discovers to us.) It may be added that it stood greatly in need of such abbreviation.

† "M nunc ante vocalem eliditur," says Vossius, "sed olim corripiebant" (we cut off the m before a vowel now, but anciently it was made short) as in this line of Ennius which he quotes:—

"Insignita fere tum millia militum octo."

and Quintilian complains of superficial scholars in his time, that when they found an instance of this kind in the old books, they proceeded to alter it, supposing it to be a mistake; and so, says he, "while they think they expose the ignorance of the librarians, they only discover their own."

‡ The expressions of Quintilian in this place deserve particularly to be noted. It is evident from them that the letter M in this position was not wholly unpronounced, but what its actual value was is not so easily gathered. "Though it is written, it is but slightly expressed, in such wise as to yield the sound of a sort of new letter. Neither is it altogether lost, but obscured, and, as it were, is no more than a certain line of demarcation between the two vowels, to warn them not to join;"—what Dryden calls "keeping the peace." From these somewhat obscure hints (sufficiently definite, however, to render it wonderful how Vossius can have made such a mistake as to say "cum precedente vocali eliditur obsequentem vocalem") it would seem likely that the sound was a middle sound between, positive m and some cognate letter; indeed I believe some people have imagined from this, that it was nothing more nor less than a nasal—like m final in the French word nom! It is a pity that the great Roman critic should have been so mysterious on the matter as to have left the language of his country burdened with such a distressing suspicion!

tion which I conceived to be inappropriate and erroneous. I had not then seen 'A critical and facsimile, pronouncing and explanatory, Dictionary of the English Language, by James Knowles.' In this admirable and most complete work, a new analogical table of the consonants, from which this division is discarded, is not the only respect in which Mr Knowles has improved on the labours of Walker.]

TABLE TALK.

HOW TO WEIGH A LOAD ON ONE'S CONSCIENCE.

The hasty temper of the caliph (Alhakem) often involved him in disputes with the governors of his provinces, with his people, and even with individuals. Of the latter kind was that with a poor widow, who being required to sell her patrimony, that the caliph might erect a pavilion on the site of the cottage of her father, refused. The place was taken by force, and the pavilion erected. The poor woman complained to the cadi, who told her to have patience, and he would try to obtain justice. He accordingly went to the caliph on the first day when he was enjoying the garden and pavilion, driving an ass before him with an empty sack. On approaching Alhakem, he begged permission to fill the sack with earth at that spot. Leave being granted, he requested the caliph to help him to place the sack on the ass. Alhakem, willing to humour the cadi, tried, but found the load too heavy. "Oh, caliph!" then said the judge, "if thou canst not bear this load, how wilt thou endure the weight of the whole field at the day of judgment, when the poor widow thou hast robbed shall reclaim it of thee?" W., who, by a happy choice of characteristic features, and the dexterous use of intermediate ideas, possesses, beyond any man I know, the enchanting art of painting vividly to the imagination whatever he has seen, has been for some days delighting me with descriptions of what occurred during a voyage along the western coast of Italy, the town of Sicily, and a visit to Rome. The ample basin of the Bay of Naples, with its gay shores, surmounted by the awful form of Vesuvius; the Isles of Spargi, emitting flames and conurbations as he passed them in the dead stillness of night; the first distant view of Ætna, through the clear medium of an Italian atmosphere, tinged with ethereal blue, and lifting his snow-capt head in solitary majesty; the iron frontier of the coast of Scylla; the ascent of Ætna in the night, by a torrent of liquid lava, surcharged with scoria, reddening the air with its glow, and plunging with a tremendous crash over a precipice equal to the cliffs of Dover,—the pillar of smoke, slowly and steadily ascending through the vast concavity of the crater, till it caught the breeze upon the summit, and scudded horizontally away, coldly tinged by the morning twilight; the first sparkle of the long-expected sun, gilding, as he rose, the highest points of the eminence beneath, while all below was buried in a purple gloom. Sicily, through all its extent and waving shores, at length spread under the eye, like an illuminated map; and Calabria and Malta, in opposite directions, rising faintly in the distance; the approach to Rome on the south, descending through a thick forest on the flat and dreary expanse of the Campania; Claudius's aqueduct, while Rome was yet invisible, shooting athwart the level, in a long line and endless succession of arcades; the first aspect of the imperial city—the Coliseum, as he passed it, bleached to the north, and apparently fresh from the architect. The bare recital of such scenes fires the imagination, and kindles an eager curiosity to behold them; yet the perplexing difficulties, the vexatious delays, the misery of accommodation, the fatigue of body, and anxiety of mind, which would, in many cases, attend the actual inspection of these interesting objects, must considerably deduct from the delight they are calculated to afford; and it is, perhaps, only under the purifying process of recollection, that the luxury of having seen them can be fully enjoyed.—Diary of a Lover of Literature.

LUXURIES OF ARABIAN TALES REALIZED.

In the year 936, Abdulrahman finished the palace of Azahrâ, which he had built on a beautiful spot, where he was accustomed to pass the spring and autumn, on the banks of the Gandalguiver, five miles below Cordova. It was surrounded by pleasant meadows, enclosed by a thick wood, close to which the palace was erected. His friendly intercourse with the Greek emperors enabled him to command the marbles and the workmen of the East, and the architects of Cordova had long been famous for their taste and ingenuity. There were in the new building four thousand three hundred columns of precious marble, beautifully wrought; the pavements were of the same material, and the walls within were encrusted with it. The wood-work was of carved cedar. In the large rooms there were large fountains, where the waters played in basins and shells of porphyry or marble; and in the hall, called the caliph's, there was a jasper fountain, in the midst of which a golden swan of exquisite workmanship spouted water from its mouth; and from the marble dome of the canopy above it was suspended the extraordinary pearl which the Greek emperor had presented to the caliph. Contiguous to the palace were the gardens, where the fruit trees were divided by thickets of laurels, myrtles, and bays, with winding pools that reflected in their clear waters the beauties of the place. In the midst of the gardens, on a knoll, whence they might all be seen, was the caliph's pavilion, where, in a porphyry basin, a fountain of quicksilver played, and reflected the sunbeams in a surprising manner. In various parts of the garden there were baths of marble of great beauty, and all the curtains and screens were of tissue of gold and silk, wrought in natural figures of animals, fruits, and flowers. "In short, within and without the palace there were compressed all the riches and worldly delights which could flatter a powerful monarch." The place was named Azahrâ, after a beautiful slave whom the caliph loved, and for whose sake he broke the express command of the Koran, which forbids the making of any statue, lest it should lead the people to idolatry. He caused her statue in white marble to be placed over the gateway leading into the garden.—Mrs Calcott's 'History of Spain'.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We omitted to mention, in our last Number, that the Editor's first article, entitled 'Wit made Easy,' had appeared some years ago in the 'New Monthly Magazine.' The mention is of no consequence in one respect; but as it is understood that every article at the head of this Journal is original (such as it is), and hitherto unpublished, unless accompanied with an avowal to the contrary, the Editor does not like to break through a plan of sincerity, which serves to aid what little value his writings may possess. Besides, the acknowledgment is due to the liberality of the proprietor of the Magazine (Mr Colburn), who permits these republications under circumstances which give him a right to do otherwise.

Mr BARWARD's letter next week. And the one on 'Statues.'

We are obliged to CONSTANS. The error he notices shall be seen into and corrected. With regard to the writer he alludes to, we suppose he is jesting. The spirit of the remarks is surely very intelligible.

'On Reading Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy,' shall appear the first opportunity.

Our Lancashire friend SCRIBER attributes to us a great deal of merit which is not our own, in those articles he speaks of in various publications. The paper on 'Cavanagh' was by Mr Hazlitt; and the articles in the 'London Magazine' (we conclude) by the present editor of the Examiner. We heartily wish we had the metaphysical discernment of the one writer, or the overflowing wit of the other.—With respect to the good-natured pains which S. proposes to take for us, we are truly obliged to him; but we already abound in the same kind offers.

Circumstances render it inconvenient to say "Yes" to one part of Mr J. N.'s request; but the Editor hopes he may nevertheless be able to do what he wishes on the other, should he write to him on the subject.

THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY LEIGHTON WHEAT.

No. VI.

THE relative proportions of the letters of the alphabet, according to the general division of them into four sorts, which I have adopted, have so far been exhibited only in the Hebrew language; and if the conclusions which it is sought to establish from them, rested on no other evidence, they might be thought of doubtful authority. But when we find nearly the same scale of proportions resulting from every new experiment, whether we make an ancient or a modern, a northern or a southern language, the subject of analysis, it is impossible not to perceive that in so much uniformity there subsists a principle. That principle may not be one of much philological importance; but yet it is interesting, inasmuch as it shows us the materials or stuff of which languages have been made, in what quantities compounded, how combined; and so gives us, as it were, a receipt for languages; not failing to impress us, further, with that fact which is equally true in the culinary science and the science of speech,—that, with an infinite diversity of productions, the component parts are few and unaltered, and that the most striking differences often proceed from some very inconsiderable variation in the proportion of the same ingredients.

You can hardly bring under view four languages more differently characterized than the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English. Their united features may serve as a universal face, in which to peer for information as to the spirit, scope, end, and purpose of human speech. The thing in which they all consent may be safely pronounced law, and any facts to the contrary regarded as contumacious.* They represent all principal historical epochs, and a sufficient variety of geographical situations; connecting the East with the West, the South with the North, and the remotest antiquity with the "current month." Let us see, then, how they stand related to one another. The Hebrew has been considered. The following table shows the proportions of the letters as they appear in the Greek, Latin, and English. I believe that thirty lines of a language are as good as a thousand for exhibiting any general fact relative to its external structure; and I have seen printers make the nicest calculations, in questions not very dissimilar, on much smaller data. I have therefore been content to take this number of lines, from the beginning of the 'Iliad,' and again from the beginning of the 'Æneid,' for the Greek and Latin languages; and, for the English, the lines were picked at hazard, from the 'Paradise Lost,' and begin with which is in the middle of the eighth book. But as the English heroic line differs much as to length from the Greek and Latin, it was proper to make a corresponding addition to this portion. Our heroic line consists of ten syllables; in the hexameter the average is fifteen. The passage from the 'Paradise Lost' is therefore extended to forty-five lines, to equal the others of thirty each.

* Such is that fact related by Dr Jonathan Edwards respecting the language of the Muhhekaneen Indians, as quoted by Booth in his Dictionary (classification of letters) viz. that it does not contain a single labial, inasmuch that after the Lord's prayer, when they try to say Amen, the nearest they can come to it is Awen, "from an aversion to shutting the lips."

Relative proportions of the consonants in the Greek, Latin, and English languages* :—

	Greek.	Latin.	English.
Lingual .	263	283	347
Labial .	70	132	176
Sibilant .	76	81	98
Guttural .	63	69	36
Total .	472	565	657

Some of these proportions, I think, will rather surprise the reader. He will not, for example, be prepared to find that our language—that same

"—harsh, northern, grunting, guttural, Which we're obliged to hiss, and spit, and sputter all,"—

is so far from possessing guttural consonants in excess, that these are both infinitely below the number of any other kind of letters in English, and in a proportion of nearly one to two to the gutturals in those dead languages, with which we are used to think English not worthy to be put in comparison, in any question relating to euphony. What then can be the reason that the Greek and Latin languages, with nearly double the number of this sort of letters, are yet more tuneful than our own; and that the latter, though not justifying, as we see, those opprobrious epithets of the poet, "grunting, guttural," is certainly of the "sputtering" kind, and rude of mouth? Our figures must explain it. It will be seen from these that, taking the consonants of all kinds, the total amount in the English language greatly exceeds the amount in the Latin and Greek, and it is therefore from this thick succession of consonants, which we are continually doubling, trebling, and quadrupling, and, in some words, even quintrupling (as in the word songstress), and not from the peculiar preponderance of any of the harder sort, that our language exhibits those harsh features which have given it an ill name amongst the poets. The Latin contains a very large proportion of hard consonants, yet is far more musical than the English, being far more vocal; and in about the same degree in which the Latin surpasses the English for purity and vocality, the Greek surpasses the Latin; the proportion of consonants in the three languages respectively, being as nearly as possible represented by the figures 7, 6, and 5, as a division of the above amount by nine will show. It seems to be a truth almost universally attested, that the languages of cold countries are full of consonants, while those of warmer regions are progressively more vocal; and it is evident that the cause lies in the climate, because, under a warm sun and in a state of physical enjoyment, the mouth loves to have its liberty, and opens as naturally as a cottage window on a summer's morning, and so it forms a habit of spacious utterance, and a free and flowing enunciation, in which consonants are only keys on which to play all sorts of graceful and melodious variations of sound; they come of necessity at last, when the mouth closes. But, in a latitude where the fear may be lest in opening the lips the tongue should freeze, what is to be expected but that the mouth, like a besieged fortress, should economize all its resources, and hold out as long as possible against the enemy, never unfolding its obdurate gates but when it becomes necessary at last to gasp at some brief vowel? And it may be added, that the same cause which accounts for the thickness of northern languages explains to us also why those who speak them generally render them still more gross, by a lazy and slovenly manner of speaking,—and why they are monotonous,—and why they are unimpassioned; for all these sins proceed from "a climate too cold." Fancy a Laplander saying ἑλιου (e-el-i-oi-o!) Why, he would get his death of cold before he reached the third syllable! In this word we have seven letters, of which six are vowels, and only one a consonant; in our word strength there are eight letters, of which seven (to speak according to common acceptation) are consonants, and only one a vowel. What a contrast! Yet both are fine; for what other word in the English language is so strong as strength, which seems as if you must say it with a clenched fist? And, on the other hand, what can be more musical than ἑλιου, which Homer, by a happy licence draws out to this tuneful length from ἑλίε (eliou), throwing in vowel after vowel, on one pretence or another, as the modern Italians in their poetry scruple not to do, led by the same fine ear and taste?

* These calculations must be taken with the same exceptions as the former. In our ignorance of a lost pronunciation, we must lay our account with many errors. Nevertheless, where each particular evidence is so striking and confirmatory, we need not scruple to form a few general inferences; more than this, it is true, would be presumptuous. I have sometimes thought that a good deal might be done towards rescuing ancient pronunciation from oblivion by any one with a Walterly genius, who chose to read carefully through the classics with this view, sedulously considering the harmony of words and sentences, and noting all such passages—and they are not few, especially among the more artificial writers of the age of Nero and Domitian, the poetical declaimers and declaiming poets,—as furnish evidence of a particular intention in the arrangement of the words as to their result in sound, and so, in fact, weighing the language with all nicety of ear and with a constant reference to the probable designs of the writer. As an example of what I mean, I will add a sentence from Cicero, which, it seems to me, would prove quite satisfactorily, if we had no other evidence, that the C in the word dicere should sound hard like K: "Tum docere, tum discere vellet, tum audire, tum dicere." (He would wish to be teaching something, and anon to be learning, at one time to listen, at another to speak.) Now if the C were soft (as we pronounce it) in these two words discere and dicere, it is evident that they would both have sounded alike, as if written disere; and though the vowel sound were long in one and short in the other, still the characteristic letter would be the same; and, in such case, nothing can be conceived more exquisitely clumsy and anti-Ciceronian than this sentence, in which the above words do not merely encounter but stand in direct antithesis to one another. It is, therefore, as certain as if Cicero himself had told us of it, that these two words were differently pronounced; and we cannot for a moment doubt that the difference of pronunciation lay—where it lay—in the spelling—in the S, which being prefixed to the C in one, and not in the other word, gave that necessary distinction in sound, without which the nice ear of Cicero could never have been satisfied with the sentence.—"Tum docere, tum discere vellet, tum audire, tum dicere."

Another fact which the above table exhibits, will perhaps also take some people by surprise. This is the proportion of the sibilant, or hissing letters. It might be expected that the English, from its known peculiarity, would show a much greater force in this division; whereas of those three sorts which exceed in quantity the corresponding sorts in the other languages, this is precisely the lowest in its excess. The "language of serpents," therefore, if it merit this its bad distinction, which no doubt it does, suffers not from an over-proportion of the sibilant letters, as is universally imagined, but from the fact that the quality of those letters is so remarkable, that any, the slightest, addition to their number is felt at once as an annoyance, whether accompanied by others of a different kind or not. Our language, as we have seen, is altogether more densely populated with consonants; therefore the sibilant family, though in its proportion less, is in its actual number more numerous than in the Latin or the Greek; and therefore it is, that by its peculiar faculty of overpowering the other letters of the alphabet, and making itself heard wherever it comes, this serpent-voiced enemy of ours has got us our nickname. As for proportion, however, Greek just as much deserves to be called the "language of serpents" as English, measured in this way;—yes, even our adored Greek! How exceedingly—how troublesomely—abounding the letter S is in the Greek; that line in Euripides is a ludicrous instance—a line which was so much ridiculed by the comic poets, and which in the Athenian theatre was hissed for its hissing. This line is not to be considered as an example of intentional alliteration on the part of the poet, but as an unhappy accident, the consequence of the abundance of the letter S. Indeed, Caninius, who speaks especially with reference to the Greek language, says, "E consonantibus nulla est crebrior" (none of the consonants is more frequent), and he instances this verse of Euripides.

"Ἔσασθ' ὡς ἴσασιν ἑλλήνων ὄσοι," (Eosai s'hos issasin hellenon osoi.)

* Hellenism. Alphab.

Judging from the results of my own observation, however, I cannot agree with Caninius to this extent. But the frequency of the letter is unquestionable; and if, as we are told, Pindar wrote an ode in which he contrived not to have a single S, it must have been a triumph of ingenuity; perhaps he fixed on that letter indeed, because he knew that the omission of it would be the most difficult and surprising to accomplish.

The Latin is not a whit less beset with this hissing grievance, and thus we find the old Roman poets, in the golden age of the Latin language (that is to say, not the age of Augustus), and when poetry—as yet no science—took to itself every liberty of speech that seemed fitting to the purpose of the moment—we find them, I say, at this period, often throwing S overboard, when they thought some line carried too much weight; * and Quintilian tells us (Instit. Lib. ix. c. 4) that this licence was the subject of some dispute among the critical—"reprehendit Lauraninus, Messala defendit;" but why it should have been grudged, one cannot perceive, since the letter M—a most inoffensive letter in comparison—continued to be at all times liable to a virtual banishment, and from what Quintilian says, who abuses it most unmercifully, calling it magis litera (the lowing letter), (Lib. xii. c. 10), &c., we may conclude that its supposed variance with harmonious composition had much to do with this banishment. It is certain that this letter was not subject to elision in the earlier periods of Roman literature,† and if that elision came afterwards in the shape of a refinement—an improvement in euphony—it is a proof that its former fulness of expression in the face of a vowel was deemed unpleasant, though no doubt a certain natural shortness and obscurity of sound which it had in that position, may have had a principal share in occasioning its expulsion from quantity.‡

[In my last chapter I remarked on the usual distribution of the consonants into dentals, and was rather wroth with our orthoepists for adopting a dis-

* Many of the fragments of the elder Roman poets contain examples of this practice. See Cic. Orat. Quintil. ubi supra. J. G. Voësi Proædia Latina. But various examples occur also in Lucretius, from whom Voësius gives the following:—

"Usque adeo largos haustus de fontibus magni;"

and in the works of still later poets. Sometimes, however, the S was expressed, although followed by a consonant; as in this line of a fragment of Lucilius:—

"Ut nemo sit nostrum quia pater optumus divum."

(I don't know how it is that Voësius has not remarked this.) With respect to the elision of letters, by the way, we may be sure, from the writings of the comic poets, that the Romans greatly abbreviated their language in ordinary discourse (much more than our own practice in conversation can give us any idea of, and probably much more, in effect, than the written dialogue discovers to us.) It may be added that it stood greatly in need of such abbreviation.

† "M nunc ante vocalem eliditur," says Voësius, "sed olim corripiebant" (we cut off the m before a vowel now, but anciently it was made short) as in this line of Ennius which he quotes:—

"Insignita fere tum milia milium octo."

and Quintilian complains of superficial scholars in his time, that when they found an instance of this kind in the old books, they proceeded to alter it, supposing it to be a mistake; and so, says he, "while they think they expose the ignorance of the librarians, they only discover their own."

‡ The expressions of Quintilian in this place deserve particularly to be noted. It is evident from them that the letter M in this position was not wholly unpronounced, but what its actual value was is not so easily gathered. "Though it is written, it is but slightly expressed, in such wise as to yield the sound of a sort of new letter. Neither is it altogether lost, but obscured, and, as it were, is no more than a certain line of demarcation between the two vowels, to warn them not to join;"—what Dryden calls "keeping the peace." From these somewhat obscure hints (sufficiently definite, however, to render it wonderful how Voësius can have made such a mistake as to say "cum precedente vocali eliditur ob sequentem vocalem") it would seem likely that the sound was a middle sound between, positive m and some cognate letter; indeed I believe some people have imagined from this, that it was nothing more nor less than a nasal—like m final in the French word nom. It is a pity that the great Roman critic should have been so mysterious on the matter as to have left the language of his country burdened with such a distressing suspicion!

tion which I conceived to be inappropriate and erroneous. I had not then seen 'A critical and facsimile, pronouncing and explanatory, Dictionary of the English Language, by James Knowles.' In this admirable and most complete work, a new analogical table of the consonants, from which this division is discarded, is not the only respect in which Mr Knowles has improved on the labours of Walker.]

TABLE TALK.

HOW TO WEIGH A LOAD ON ONE'S CONSCIENCE.

The hasty temper of the caliph (Alhakem) often involved him in disputes with the governors of his provinces, with his people, and even with individuals. Of the latter kind was that with a poor widow, who being required to sell her patrimony, that the caliph might erect a pavilion on the site of the cottage of her father, refused. The place was taken by force, and the pavilion erected. The poor woman complained to the cadi, who told her to have patience, and he would try to obtain justice. He accordingly went to the caliph on the first day when he was enjoying the garden and pavilion, driving an ass before him with an empty sack. On approaching Alhakem, he begged permission to fill the sack with earth at that spot. Leave being granted, he requested the caliph to help him to place the sack on the ass. Alhakem, willing to humour the cadi, tried, but found the load too heavy. "Oh, caliph!" then said the judge, "if thou canst not bear this load, how wilt thou endure the weight of the whole field at the day of judgment, when the poor widow thou hast robbed shall reclaim it of thee?" The caliph instantly restored the land, and the widow was enriched by the magnificent pavilion and furniture which were given to her.—Universal History.

WELSH POETRY.

Translations into English Verse, from the Poems of Davyth Ap Gwilym. 12mo. London, 1834. pp. 171. 8s.

THESE specimens of the productions of a Welsh bard, who was a contemporary of Chaucer's, would be a curiosity, if they were nothing more. But even under the disguise of translation, Davyth Ap Gwilym is not to be mistaken for anything else than a true poet. After the lapse of nearly five hundred years, there is still in what he has written the freshness of immortal song.

Davyth Ap Gwilym's is not a heroic lay, like that of Taliesin and the other elder bards of his country. The conquest of Wales by Edward I. extinguished for ever the light of that first inspiration. But after some time the poetical genius of the land again broke forth, though in a different fashion. The age of this revival was that in which Davyth Ap Gwilym appeared,—about the middle of the fourteenth century. "The Welsh minstrel," says the present translator, "was now content to tune his harp to themes of love and social festivity, and sportive allusions to objects of nature, and to the picturesque manners of that interesting period, were made to supply the place of lays in celebration of martial achievements. Whatever may have been lost in fire and sublimity by this transition, was perhaps more than compensated by the superior polish, vivacity, and imaginativeness, which distinguish the bards of the new school."

It is wonderful what a resemblance there is in many points between the general character of this Welsh poetry and that of Chaucer. The spirit of the same age evidently animates both—the spirit of an age in which, while on the one hand the memory and the vestiges of a by-past state of society and manners were still rife, on the other the influx of a hitherto unknown wealth, luxury, and splendour, had come like a moral day-break upon men's minds, stirring them with new feelings, speculations, and hopes. Historically, there is a considerable general resemblance between the times of Edward III. and those of Elizabeth, or rather of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, which came two centuries later. In each the nation made a decided step in advance, and must have felt conscious of a progress. Hence, in both ages, a buoyancy and hilarity in the popular mind, favourable both to the enjoyment and the production of poetry, and of every other sunny influence. But we were not prepared to find that the intellectual renovation had spread itself to the extent it would appear from these poems to have done, over the outlying portions of the kingdom. The intellect of Wales, indeed, was fitted by peculiar advantages for being easily quickened by the touch of the new light. The poetry that now sprung out afresh there was only the re-opening of a fountain that had flowed abundantly some centuries before; and in this respect the Welsh bards were differently situated from their English contemporaries, who had no similar old native spring at which to drink inspiration. There was a good deal of poetry written in England, indeed, before the time of Chaucer, both in the Saxon language, and in the mongrel English that immediately succeeded it; but no connection, or hardly any, can be traced between that poetry and Chaucer's. Its authors lived and wrote in the same country with him; but that is all. He did not even write the same language with them; and in all other respects—in the style and spirit of his poetry—he is of altogether another blood and lineage. What lessons Chaucer took in the art of poetry, he received from his immediate predecessors and contemporaries in France and Italy; and perhaps he was also somewhat indebted to an acquaintance with a few of the ancient Latin writers. He certainly, at any rate, had more foreign learning than his Welsh contemporary. It is supposed from one passage in his writings, that Davyth Ap Gwilym was acquainted with Ovid; but there can be no doubt that the only literature with which he was generally familiar, was that of his native country. This circumstance establishes one important difference between the poetry of Chaucer and the much less enriched and varied minstrelsy of the Welsh bard; but (making allowance for great inferiority of genius, as well as of reading, knowledge, and industry on the part of the latter) most of the distinguishing poetical qualities of the one writer may be found in a degree in the other. The poetry of Davyth Ap Gwilym, as well as that of Chaucer, is remarkable for its truth, vigour, and animation; its simplicity and straightforwardness; the natural and healthy flow of feeling that runs through it; its festive good-humour and merriment; its keen satiric power; the picturesque fancy by which it is irradiated in its ordinary course; and the grander imaginative painting, and tone of deeper passion which it occasionally displays.

A summary of the life of the bard is prefixed to the present translation; but upon that we shall not spend our time. The following extract will convey a sufficient conception of what we suspect must be accounted Davyth's genuine character, although the writer attempts to make out that he was in reality a man of a very different stamp,—a personage, indeed, of high moral pretension. The general strain of the poetry, to our mind, far best accords with the traditional account.

"When Davyth Ap Gwilym grew up to manhood, his handsome person and accomplishments rendered him a great favourite with the fair, in every part of the country. According to traditional accounts, recorded in the age of Elizabeth, he was tall and of a slender make, with yellow hair flowing about his shoulders in beautiful ringlets; and he says himself that the girls, instead of attending to their devotion, used to whisper at church, that he had his sister's hair on his head. His dress was agreeable to the manner of the age, long trousers, close jacket, tied round with a sash, suspending a sword of no inconsiderable length, and over the whole a loose flowing gown trimmed with fur, with a round cap or bonnet on his head; these he took pains to make showy, for he was inclined to vie in that respect with the beaux of his time. Thus accomplished, he thought himself happier than the old Welsh princes, though they enjoyed the possession of a mansion in every district in Wales, as he fancied he might secure the affection of every beautiful maid. Everyone, says our bard, has his favourite toy; and on a whimsical occasion he tells us he was 'the toy of the fair,' and his temper, full of ardour and levity as it was, naturally disposed him to make an extravagant use of the high esteem in which he stood with his countrywomen. Tradition has preserved a ludicrous instance of his frolics in this respect, which, whether authentic or not, is perfectly consistent with the powerful but reckless vein of humour that pervades his poems. The following is a brief detail of this incident.

"Davyth Ap Gwilym—so runs the tale—paid his addresses to no fewer than twenty-four damsels at the same time. Having an inclination, on a particular occasion, to divert himself at their expense, he made an appointment with each, unknown to the rest, to meet him under a certain tree, at a specified hour, fixing the same time for all. Our poet himself took care to be on the spot before the period of meeting, and, having ascended the tree, he had the satisfaction of finding that not one of his faithful innamorates failed in her engagement. When they were all assembled, feelings of inquisitive wonder took the place of the gentler emotions, to which, it is probable, they had before yielded; and when at length the stratagem, of which they had been the dupes, became known, the only sentiment that inspired the group was that of indignant vengeance against the unfortunate bard, which they failed not to vent in reproaches loud and long. The author of the plot, who, from his ambuscade above, had perceived the gathering storm, had recourse to his muse for an expedient to allay it, or, at least, to divert its fury from the object to which it was at first directed. Emerging partially from the foliage in which he had been enveloped, he replied to the menaces of the disappointed fair ones—which even extended to his life—in an extemporary stanza, of which the following translation will convey some idea:—

'Oh, let the fair and gentle one I
Who oft by the summer sun,
To meet me in these shades was won—
Let her strike first, and she will find
The poet to his fate resigned!'

The effect was such as our poet had, perhaps, anticipated. Taunts and recriminations were bandied about by the exasperated assembly, who forgot their common resentment against the bard in this new cause for commotion. The tradition adds, that the contriver of the stratagem had the good fortune to escape unmolested in the confusion of the conflict, being thus indebted to his muse for his protection from a catastrophe of no very agreeable nature."

The first of the poems we shall transcribe is entitled a "Dialogue between the Bard and his shadow at sunset." It is full of force and archness, and contains, as the editor remarks, many sarcastic allusions to the religious orders—favourite objects of ridicule with the present writer, as they were with Chaucer. The curious way in which the lady mentioned at the beginning is distinguished, seems to indicate an extensive, as well as methodical admiration of the sex. The cool manner in which "the second Ellen" is spoken of, sounds as if we were to hear next of Ellen No. 5, or No. 6.

"As I lingered yesterday
Underneath the forest spray,
Waiting for the second Ellen,
Maid in loveliness excelling,
By the birch's verdant cowl
Shelter'd from the passing rain,
Lo! a phantom grim and fowl
(Bowing o'er and o'er again
Like a vastly courteous man)
Right across my pathway ran—
I with ague tremour faint,
With the name of ev'ry saint,
Crossed myself, and thus began
To accost the polished man:

BARD.

If thou art of mortal mould,
Tell me who thou art?

SHADOW.

Behold
In this spectre form thy shade—
Why then, gentle bard, afraid?

BARD.

By the Virgin, tell me true,
On what errand?

SHADOW.

To pursue!
Thus all nakedly to glide,
Lovely poet! by thy side,
Is my task—my heart's desire—
I have felt that never tire;
And am bound by secret spell,
All thy wanderings to tell;
To spy each wile and art,
Fairest jewel of my heart!

BARD.

Vagrant, without home and shelter,
Man of limbs all helter skelter!
Crooked, lank-shanked, luckless shade—
Shape of rainbow, hue of mire,
Art thou then a bailiff paid,
By the wolf-tongued Eithig's hire,
Into all my paths to pry?
Skulking mercenary spy!

SHADOW.

That, Sir Minstrel, I deny!

BARD.

Whence then art thou, giant's child?
Shape of darkness, huge and wild;
Bald of brow as aged bear,
Bloated uncouth form of air;
More like images that scud
Through our dreams, than flesh and blood;
Shaped like stork on frozen pool,
Thin as palmer, (wand'ring fool!)
Long-shanked as a crane that feeds
Greedily among the reeds;
Like a black and shaven monk
Is thy dark and spectral trunk,
Or a corpse in winding-sheet.—

SHADOW.

I have followed sure and fleet
On thy steps—were I to tell
But one half—thou knowest well—

BARD.

Thou may'st tell, and thou may'st scan,
Pitcher-necked censorious man!
Nought of me thou can'st disclose
More than ev'ry neighbour knows;
I have never falsely sworn
In the Cwmwd court, or torn
Lambs to death—have never thrown
At the hens with pebble-stone;

Never have the spectre play'd,
To make little babes afraid;
Never yet have terrified
Stranger maid, or stranger's bride!

SHADOW.

Gentle bard, were I to tell
Half thy tricks—thou knowest well,
Soon the dainty bard might be
Swinging from the gallows' tree!"

As a specimen of what the volume contains of poetry of a higher order, we add the piece which the translator has entitled "The Thrush and the Nightingale officiating as Priests." We may mention, by the bye, that at the poet's own marriage with the lady here alluded to, he was actually obliged to resort to the aid of one of these ministers. "The bard and Morvyth," says the life, "were united in a manner not uncommon in those days; they repaired to the grove with their friend Madog Benfras, an eminent bard, who exercised the sacred functions on this occasion, in the presence only of the winged choristers of the woods; one of which, the thrush,—the bridegroom says, 'was the clerk.'" "This poem," the translator observes, "contains many beautiful and fanciful allusions to the ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church. I have translated it into prose, and almost literally, as the best means of conveying the spirit of the original."

"In a place of ecstasy I was to-day,
Under the mantles of the splendid green hazels,
Where I listened, at the dawn of day,
To the song of the thrush, an adept in music,
From a distant country, without delay or weariness.
On a long journey my mottled love-messenger had come,
He had travelled here from the narrow county of Chester
At the request of my golden sister (i. e. Morvyth);
A noble bell (to those who love bells) was rung;
Its sound reached to the roof of the dingle.
His robe, from his slender waist, was
Of a thousand delicately branching flowers;
His cassock you might imagine to be
Of the wings of the ardent flapping wind.
The altar there was covered
With nothing but gold:
Morvyth had sent him,
(Metrical singer, foster-son of May!)
I heard him in brilliant language
Prophecy without ceasing,
And read to the parish
The gospel without stammering!
He raised for us on the hills there
The sacred wafer made of a fair leaf:
And the beautiful nightingale, slender and tall,
From the corner of the glen near him,
Priest of the dingle! sang to a thousand;
And the bells of the mass continually did ring,
And raised the host
To the sky, above the thicket,
And sang stanzas to our Lord and Creator,
With sylvan ecstasy and love!
I am enraptured with the song
Which was matured in the birchin grove of the woods."

We regret that we cannot extend our quotations. Of the translation we have only space to remark that it is manifestly executed with very considerable talent.

GOCHRAHE'S QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Gochrahe's Foreign Quarterly Review. No. II.
London. Whittaker and Co.

This is a very good number of a periodical, for which, as well as for its editor, whom we only know in his literary capacity, we entertain no common degree of respect. The articles are judiciously varied, and some of them exceedingly interesting and well written. The first of them, on the National System of Education in France, contains some striking facts, and is well calculated to draw attention to what must soon become the greatest of our own national questions. The second is the review of a new History of England, written by a learned German, Von J. M. Lappenberg; the third treats of a strange dramatic poem, called Ahasuerus, written by a Frenchman (M. Quinet), after the manner of Goethe's Faust; the fourth analyses the History of the Reformation, the League, and the Reign of Henry IV of France, by M. Capéfigue, and the History of the French, by Siemond; the fifth is amusingly learned and acute on the subject of Proverbs and Popular Sayings, playing vengeance with Mr Ballenden Ker's theory on popular phrases and nursery rhymes, and yet doing its spiriting gently; the sixth is an instructive analysis of an unpublished book on Madrid, and the state of Spain in 1834; the seventh takes up the curious topic of the Courts of Love in the Middle Ages; and the eighth and last is devoted to the recent books of travels in the East, by Messrs Michaud, Poujoulat, and De Lamartine, and Dr Hogg.—We trust this bill of fare will tempt our readers.

We are not quite sure that our own estimation of De Lamartine as a traveller differs very materially from his, but we think the reviewer has been rather too severe. Of Dr Hogg's book about the East, he speaks so very favourably, that we shall take an early opportunity of examining it; and this we shall do the more earnestly, as we have heard the same opinion expressed of it by persons whose lives have been nearly spent in the Levant.

ORNITHOLOGICAL PICTURES AND DIALOGUES.

The Boy and the Birds: By Emily Taylor, with Designs by Thomas Landseer. London. Darton and Harvey. 1835. Square 12mo, Pp. 194.

IN so far as the drawing of the birds is concerned, there is considerable spirit in most of the designs by which this little book is embellished. We cannot say as much, however, for the accessories of the principal figures. In the very first cut, for instance, that of the skylark, the bird soaring high in the air being drawn fully half as large as the boy looking up to it from the ground, we must suppose ourselves viewing the whole from the immediate neighbourhood of the former. Odd as such a point of view may be thought, something may perhaps be said in vindication of it in the present case, from the desirableness of exhibiting the bird in as ample dimensions as possible. But then the boy, so seen, ought not to be made to appear, as he is here, about twice or three times as tall as the trees and church towers which compose the rest of the scene that is looked down upon. Or, on the other hand, if the whole is to be conceived as seen from the neighbourhood of the boy, and not of the bird, the latter is at least a dozen or twenty times as large as it ought to be. In short, taking the boy, the bird, and the distant terrestrial scenery, as so many distinct portions of the representation, we submit that there is no point from which they can all three be seen as they are here drawn. A still more remarkable example of the same kind of absurdity is furnished by the last cut in the book,—that of the Gyr Falcon. Had the bird stood alone, this would have deserved the praise of being perhaps the most spirited design in the book. But here again the accompanying human figure spoils all. The latter, this time, is a boy dressed in a bonnet and philabeg, intimating that the scene is in the Highlands of Scotland; and from the story, which makes the two hold converse together, while standing on the ground,—the look and attitude of each—and above all, from the distinctness with which the features of the boy's face are given—the one must be understood to be very nearly as close to the spectator as the other. Now, the Gyr Falcon is, no doubt, rather a large bird, but we never heard of a specimen the mere body of which was twice the size of either a man or a boy, or whose entire figure, when the wings were expanded, would have screened from view above half a dozen of even the most minute of our species that ever stood upright either in kilt or in trowsers. Yet the creature we have here is of no less portentous dimensions. Making all allowance for a slight elevation upon which it is placed, the length of its body, if its head were raised, would be about twice that of the boy, upon whom it is represented as looking down as if it were about to pounce upon him and swallow him up. The size of the latter altogether is not much more than twice that of one of the bird's legs, which looks, indeed, as if it could sweep the puny piece of humanity away with a touch from the tip of its wing —of that immense wing, which sweeps over his head at nearly three times his own height from the ground.

As for the book itself, the plan of it is to make the birds one after another describe themselves in so many dialogues held with the boy. In vindication of this method, the authoress quotes Cowper's well-known lines, in which he contends that birds have always been able "to hold discourse at least in fable," whether they actually confabulate or no. But in dialogues in which birds take part, as well as in other dialogues, we are entitled to expect that some exhibition of character shall be attempted. This makes the distinction between a dialogue and a mere catechism. Miss Taylor's dialogues have certainly as little of the dramatic spirit as any we ever perused. But to do her justice, she shows no partiality in this respect; her boy is as unnatural as her birds. He makes his speeches as it were out of a book, just as they do. Indeed this is sometimes true in a more literal sense. Thus, Mr Mudie, in his 'Feathered Tribes of Britain,' having said of the lark, "It twines upwards like a vapour—its course is a spiral gradually enlarging—and seen on the side it is as if it were keeping the boundary of a pillar of ascending smoke," &c.,—Miss Taylor's boy commences his got-up recitation as follows:—"You merry, merry creature—you elegant creature! twining up to the sky, more like a curling wreath of smoke, or the mist from a mountain stream, than anything else," &c. One variation, indeed, is here introduced—the smile about the mist from the mountain stream—but, although the sound of the passage may be thereby improved, its sense certainly is not, for the ascent of the lark has about as much resemblance to mist rising from a stream as it has to the price of corn rising at Mark Lane. The boy addresses the lark, and the two hold a colloquy together; but most of the other birds discharge their histories upon him of their own accord, without ever being asked a question, or eliciting a remark from him any more than if he were dumb, or had fallen asleep under their prattle. Thus, the lark having withdrawn, the puffin comes forward, and immediately breaks out: "Well, I know I am an odd-looking-bird; you need not say anything about it. The puffin family has a character of its own. We are all respectable people—very:—there is something of the steady old housekeeper-look about us," and so forth, in a manner in which surely neither man nor beast ever went on, in the circumstances. This is the writer's familiar style; she has also, however, one of a grander and more poetical kind. The Golden Eagle is made to make itself ridiculous in the following fashion:—

"Must I come too? Must even the proud golden eagle stoop down from his eyrie on the ledge of the steep sea-cliff, and submit to be questioned by a child? You have been looking towards me, I know, good part of the day. I have seen your curious eye vainly trying to spy out my ways and my doings; but the sea blinded you, and the distance was too much for you; and though I have had you before me the whole time, you have scarcely been able to say you have seen me yet. Yes, I will come down; for what harm can you do me, poor little child; and why should not you learn what you desire? But the rushing of my wings, if I were to descend with all my force near you, would be a startling thing, and you shall first see me sail in my majesty over the valley.

"There! Am not I indeed a noble creature? How I ride in the high air, gliding in my might! I am not thinking of my prey now; I am only sailing idly along for your amusement and my own, enjoying the calm sky, and this bright sun, and caring nothing for what is doing upon earth. Must you see me in my terrible hour," &c. &c.

The book, however, is, we have no doubt, very well intended, and will be found amusing by young people, who will not read it through without gaining a considerable acquaintance with the ways of some of the most interesting of the winged tribes. The birds described are the Sky-lark, the Puffin-Auk, or Coulterneb, the Chimney Swallow, the Great Tit, the Little Blue Tit, the Long-tailed Tit, the Golden Eagle, the Fish-Hawk, or Osprey, the Rook, the Willow Wren, the Golden-crested Wren, the Woodpecker, the Robin Red Breast, the Cuckoo, the Little Brown Wren, the Fern Owl, the Eider Duck, and the Gyr-Falcon.

WELSH POETRY.

Translations into English Verse, from the Poems of Davyth Ap Gwilym. 12mo. London, 1834. pp. 171. 3s.

THESE specimens of the productions of a Welsh bard, who was a contemporary of Chaucer's, would be a curiosity, if they were nothing more. But even under the disguise of translation, Davyth Ap Gwilym is not to be mistaken for anything else than a true poet. After the lapse of nearly five hundred years, there is still in what he has written the freshness of immortal song.

Davyth Ap Gwilym's is not a heroic lay, like that of Taliesin and the other elder bards of his country. The conquest of Wales by Edward I. extinguished for ever the light of that first inspiration. But after some time the poetical genius of the land again broke forth, though in a different fashion. The age of this revival was that in which Davyth Ap Gwilym appeared,—about the middle of the fourteenth century. "The Welsh minstrel," says the present translator, "was now content to tune his harp to themes of love and social festivity, and sportive allusions to objects of nature, and to the picturesque manners of that interesting period, were made to supply the place of lays in celebration of martial achievements. Whatever may have been lost in fire and sublimity by this transition, was perhaps more than compensated by the superior polish, vivacity, and imaginativeness, which distinguish the bards of the new school."

It is wonderful what a resemblance there is in many points between the general character of this Welsh poetry and that of Chaucer. The spirit of the same age evidently animates both—the spirit of an age in which, while on the one hand the memory and the vestiges of a by-past state of society and manners were still rife, on the other the influx of a hitherto unknown wealth, luxury, and splendour, had come like a moral day-break upon men's minds, stirring them with new feelings, speculations, and hopes. In the Cwmwd court, or torn
Lambs to death—have never thrown
At the hens with pebble-stone;

Never have the spectre play'd,
To make little babes afraid;
Never yet have terrified
Stranger maid, or stranger's bride!

SHADOW.

Gentle bard, were I to tell
Half thy tricks—thou knowest well,
Soon the dainty bard might be
Swinging from the gallows' tree!"

As a specimen of what the volume contains of poetry of a higher order, we add the piece which the translator has entitled "The Thrush and the Nightingale officiating as Priests." We may mention, by the bye, that at the poet's own marriage with the lady here alluded to, he was actually obliged to resort to the aid of one of these ministers. "The bard and Morvyth," says the life, "were united in a manner not uncommon in those days; they repaired to the grove with their friend Madog Benfras, an eminent bard, who exercised the sacred functions on this occasion, in the presence only of the winged choristers of the woods; one of which, the thrush,—the bridegroom says, 'was the clerk.'" "This poem," the translator observes, "contains many beautiful and fanciful allusions to the ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church. I have translated it into prose, and almost literally, as the best means of conveying the spirit of the original."

"In a place of ecstasy I was to-day,
Under the mantles of the splendid green hazels,
Where I listened, at the dawn of day,
To the song of the thrush, an adept in music,
From a distant country, without delay or weariness.
On a long journey my mottled love-messenger had come,
He had travelled here from the narrow county of Chester
At the request of my golden sister (i. e. Morvyth);
A noble bell (to those who love bells) was rung:
Its sound reached to the roof of the dingle.
His robe, from his slender waist, was
Of a thousand delicately branching flowers;
His casock you might imagine to be
Of the wings of the ardent flapping wind.
The altar there was covered
With nothing but gold:
Morvyth had sent him,
(Metrical singer, foster-son of May!)
I heard him in brilliant language
Prophecy without ceasing,
And read to the parish
The gospel without stammering!
He raised for us on the hills there
The sacred wafer made of a fair leaf:
And the beautiful nightingale, slender and tall,
From the corner of the glen near him,
Priest of the dingle! sang to a thousand;
And the bells of the mass continually did ring,
And raised the host
To the sky, above the thicket,
And sang stanzas to our Lord and Creator,
With sylvan ecstasy and love!
I am enraptured with the song
Which was matured in the birchin grove of the woods."

We regret that we cannot extend our quotations. Of the translation we have only space to remark that it is manifestly executed with very considerable talent.

COCHRANE'S QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Cochrane's Foreign Quarterly Review. No. II.
London. Whittaker and Co.

THIS is a very good number of a periodical, for which, as well as for its editor, whom we only know in his literary capacity, we entertain no common degree of respect. The articles are judiciously varied, and some of them exceedingly interesting and well written. The first of them, on the National System of Education in France, contains some striking facts, and is well calculated to draw attention to what must soon become the greatest of our own national questions. The second is the review of a new History of England, written by a learned German, Von J. M. Lappenberg; the third treats of a strange dramatic poem, called Ahasuerus, written by a Frenchman (M. Quinet), after the manner of Goethe's Faust; the fourth analyses the History of the Reformation, the League, and the Reign of Henry IV of France, by M. Capefigue, and the History of the French, by Sismondi; the fifth is amusingly learned and acute on the subject of Proverbs and Popular Sayings, playing vengeance with Mr Bellenden Ker's theory on popular phrases and nursery rhymes, and yet doing its spiriting gently; the sixth is an instructive analysis of an unpublished book on Madrid, and the state of Spain in 1884; the seventh takes up the curious topic of the Courts of Love in the Middle Ages; and the eighth and last is devoted to the recent books of travels in the East, by Messrs Michaud, Poujoulat, and De Lamartine, and Dr Hogg.—We trust this bill of fare will tempt our readers.

We are not quite sure that our own estimation of De Lamartine as a traveller differs very materially from his, but we think the reviewer has been rather too severe. Of Dr Hogg's book about the East, he speaks so very favourably, that we shall take an early opportunity of examining it; and this we shall do the more earnestly, as we have heard the same opinion expressed of it by persons whose lives have been nearly spent in the Levant.

ORNITHOLOGICAL PICTURES AND DIALOGUES.

The Boy and the Birds: By Emily Taylor, with Designs by Thomas Landseer. London. Darton and Harvey. 1885. Square 12mo, Pp. 194.

IN so far as the drawing of the birds is concerned, there is considerable spirit in most of the designs by which this little book is embellished. We cannot say as much, however, for the accessories of the principal figures. In the very first cut, for instance, that of the skylark, the bird soaring high in the air being drawn fully half as large as the boy looking up to it from the ground, we must suppose ourselves viewing the whole from the immediate neighbourhood of the former. Odd as such a point of view may be thought, something may perhaps be said in vindication of it in the present case, from the desirableness of exhibiting the bird in as ample dimensions as possible. But then the boy, so seen, ought not to be made to appear, as he is here, about twice or three times as tall as the trees and church towers which compose the rest of the scene that is looked down upon. Or, on the other hand, if the whole is to be conceived as seen from the neighbourhood of the boy, and not of the bird, the latter is at least a dozen or twenty times as large as it ought to be. In short, taking the boy, the bird, and the distant terrestrial scenery, as so many distinct portions of the representation, we submit that there is no point from which they can all three be seen as they are here drawn. A still more remarkable example of the same kind of absurdity is furnished by the last cut in the book,—that of the Gyr Falcon. Had the bird stood alone, this would have deserved the praise of being perhaps the most spirited design in the book. But here again the accompanying human figure spoils all. The latter, this time, is a boy dressed in a bonnet and philabeg, intimating that the scene is in the Highlands of Scotland; and from the story, which makes the two hold converse together, while standing on the ground,—the look and attitude of each—and above all, from the distinctness with which the features of the boy's face are given—the one must be understood to be very nearly as close to the spectator as the other. Now, the Gyr Falcon is, no doubt, rather a large bird, but we never heard of a specimen the mere body of which was twice the size of either a man or a boy, or whose entire figure, when the wings were expanded, would have screened from view above half a dozen of even the most minute of our species that ever stood upright either in kilt or in trews. Yet the creature we have here is of no less portentous dimensions. Making all allowance for a slight elevation upon which it is placed, the length of its body, if its head were raised, would be about twice that of the boy, upon whom it is represented as looking down as if it were about to pounce upon him and swallow him up. The size of the latter altogether is not much more than twice that of one of the bird's legs, which looks, indeed, as if it could sweep the puny piece of humanity away with a touch from the tip of its wing —of that immense wing, which sweeps over his head at nearly three times his own height from the ground.

As for the book itself, the plan of it is to make the birds one after another describe themselves in so many dialogues held with the boy. In vindication of this method, the authoress quotes Cowper's well-known lines, in which he contends that birds have always been able "to hold discourse at least in fable," whether they actually confabulate or no. But in dialogues in which birds take part, as well as in other dialogues, we are entitled to expect that some exhibition of character shall be attempted. This makes the distinction between a dialogue and a mere catechism. Miss Taylor's dialogues have certainly as little of the dramatic spirit as any we ever perused. But to do her justice, she shows no partiality in this respect; her boy is as unnatural as her birds. He makes his speeches as it were out of a book, just as they do. Indeed this is sometimes true in a more literal sense. Thus, Mr Mudie, in his 'Feathered Tribes of Britain,' having said of the lark, "It twines upwards like a vapour—its course is a spiral gradually enlarging—and seen on the side it is as if it were keeping the boundary of a pillar of ascending smoke," &c.,—Miss Taylor's boy commences his got-up recitation as follows:—"You merry, merry creature—you elegant creature! twining up to the sky, more like a curling wreath of smoke, or the mist from a mountain stream, than anything else," &c. One variation, indeed, is here introduced—the smile about the mist from the mountain stream—but, although the sound of the passage may be thereby improved, its sense certainly is not, for the ascent of the lark has about as much resemblance to mist rising from a stream as it has to the price of corn rising at Mark lane. The boy addresses the lark, and the two hold a colloquy together; but most of the other birds discharge their histories upon him of their own accord, without ever being asked a question, or eliciting a remark from him any more than if he were dumb, or had fallen asleep under their prattle. Thus, the lark having withdrawn, the puffin comes forward, and immediately breaks out: "Well, I know I am an odd-looking bird; you need not say anything about it. The puffin family has a character of its own. We are all respectable people—very;—there is something of the steady old housekeeper-look about us," and so forth, in a manner in which surely neither man nor beast ever went on, in the circumstances. This is the writer's familiar style; she has also, however, one of a grander and more poetical kind. The Golden Eagle is made to make itself ridiculous in the following fashion:—

"Must I come too? Must even the proud golden eagle stoop down from his eyrie on the ledge of the steep sea-cliff, and submit to be questioned by a child? You have been looking towards me, I know, good part of the day. I have seen your curious eye vainly trying to spy out my ways and my doings; but the sun blinded you, and the distance was too much for you; and though I have had you before me the whole time, you have scarcely been able to say you have seen me yet. Yes, I will come down; for what harm can you do me, poor little child; and why should not you learn what you desire? But the rushing of my wings, if I were to descend with all my force near you, would be a startling thing, and you shall first see me sail in my majesty over the valley.

"There! Am not I indeed a noble creature? How I ride in the high air, glorying in my might! I am not thinking of my prey now; I am only sailing idly along for your amusement and my own, enjoying the calm sky, and this bright sun, and caring nothing for what is doing upon earth. Must you see me in my terrible hour," &c. &c.

The book, however, is, we have no doubt, very well intended, and will be found amusing by young people, who will not read it through without gaining a considerable acquaintance with the ways of some of the most interesting of the winged tribes. The birds described are the Sky-lark, the Puffin-Auk, or Coulterneb, the Chimney Swallow, the Great Tit, the Little Blue Tit, the Long-tailed Tit, the Golden Eagle, the Fish-Hawk, or Osprey, the Rook, the Willow Wren, the Golden-crested Wren, the Woodpecker, the Robin Red Breast, the Cuckoo, the Little Brown Wren, the Fern Owl, the Eider Duck, and the Gyr-Falcon.

LONDON WATER.

THE four elements are attainable in very different degrees of excellence in this great city of London. Earth, as much as is wanted, may be procured in Covent-garden market, in choice condition, for the purpose of drawing-room agriculture. Air is not to be had at all in its best state for the oxygenation of our bloods, and is but indifferent for anything. Fire, the best of all kinds (excepting, perhaps, the volcanic, and the Greek, which we have lost,) is to be bought in various shapes and vehicles. But water! alas! water, though there is plenty, yet is there much difficulty in getting it good.

Water, water every where,
Yet not one drop to drink!

We are not, indeed, forbidden to drink. On the contrary, the bibbing of bad water rather meets with encouragement; but he who swallows water in this curious city,—this strange muddle of the worst and the best—must be content to engulph with the entering stream, the most horrible concourse of monsters and monstrosities, dead and living. The dead most shocking, inasmuch as they are dead; the living most horrible, because most opposed to our nature and propensities. To swallow a motley troop of microscopic jack-asses, horses, cows, dogs, cats, goats, sheep, deer, rats, mice, moles, badgers, foxes, weasels, polecats, hedgehogs, pigs, buffaloes, and the like, would be evil bad enough; but these, though a quaint sustenance, would be but little odious, in comparison with the monsters of the fourth element.

For all that here on earth we dreadful hold,
Be but as bags to scareen babes withal,
Compared to the creatures in the seas' entrail.

And 'like master, like man,'—like sea, like river,—the creatures of the liquid world, seem all the farthest remove from our own nature, the most repulsive and loathsome, be they great or small. Even our old acquaintance, that singular fellow whom we occasionally see, when the water has just been turned on, or the pump just repaired,—that semi-transparent, many-legged, restless individual, the whale of a glass of water, preying upon invisible shoals,—active though he be, industrious, independent, and in some sort beautiful withal,—even this respectable fisher we cannot think of between our jaws without a shudder, and a convulsive pressure of the tongue against the palate, as though we could not swallow even the thought of him. And yet these people, and even more loathsome still, not to mention exuviae and animal remains still more wretched to think of, thicken the water we daily drink, in our tea, in our soup, our beer, and in the simple draught; calling it to the sight, perverting its taste, making stale what should be fresh, lading it with a faint and disgusting scent, and poisoning what should be sweet and most wholesome.

Such is the water that haunts us in all parts of this most famous, most rich, most magnificent, and most noble city; where we may have anything for money; where pleasure and convenience start up at the touch of the golden talisman! Such is the water from which we must turn our thoughts if we would drink; or clean our teeth; or even wash. Did you ever, reader, meet with the water in which a leech had died? We have; and going to wash, or rinse our mouth, the identical and most hideous scent has often turned us with an unspeakable revulsion from the water.

Some years back, we saw a pamphlet entitled "The Dolphins," which exhibited, clearly enough, the evils of the Thames water, from which London is greatly supplied. We have been favoured lately with another called a "Prospectus of the Metropolis Pure Soft Spring-Water Company," which exhibits still more generally the unsuitness for all purposes, not merely, though principally of the Thames water, but also of all the water at present supplied to the public; excepting, of course, certain private wells and springs, which afford but a small fraction of the whole supply. The evidence against the water now in use, appears to be most clear and conclusive; and the only wonder is, that mere habit, and an ignorance of the importance of the subject, have allowed the inhabitants of a place like London, to remain contented for so long a period with the vilest water. There are other places where the water is vitiated more obviously to our senses; but we do not remember ever to have heard of a city whose general supply is more polluted in fact. For the details of these evils we must refer the reader who consults the safety and well-being of his bodily tenement, to the pages of the prospectus.

But the pamphlet does not alone expose the ill; it proposes the remedy; and of all the projects for affording a better supply to the metropolis, their's appears to us the most ingenious, the most practicable, and the most complete in every way. Nor is the interest of the property already vested in other companies unconsidered; but things are to be so arranged that the new company will be able to supply them at a less expense than they now lay out on collecting the wretched stuff we use. And, last, and not least, we, the consumers, are to pay less for this excellent article, than we now expend on the poison for which we are at present so heavily taxed. We can only say, that if the committee succeed in realizing their expectations, they will deserve the thanks of the whole metropolis, as its best of benefactors.

We shall give an extract or two, to convey some idea of the plan proposed by the pamphlet; but we heartily recommend our readers to possess themselves of the whole at once.

"The Metropolis Pure Spring Water Company have reason to conclude, that every impediment will be removed, and water, free from animal and vegetable impurities, be obtained in any desirable quantity, without being liable to any of the causes of contamination to which water, as it is at present supplied, is and must continue to be liable.

"There will be no means of contamination from the action of the sun and air, nor from water drawn from under ice and snow, in which all sorts of deleterious substances are concentrated. The pure water may at once be served to the inhabitants, without the necessity of costly reservoirs, to produce partial subsidence of impurities, mechanically mixed with the water; the yet more costly filtering ponds, which leave all the noxious matters held in chemical solution, just as they were when the water was taken from its impure sources; nor the still greater expense of pumping the water into reservoirs, to be again pumped into mains for the use of the inhabitants.

"Respecting the quality of the soft spring water, there is no dispute. Its goodness is admitted by all who are acquainted with it, and its fame has led to the sinking of an immense number of wells, to obtain it for special uses, for which the river waters have been found too impure.

"Whenever the water has been mentioned by witnesses before the Commissioners and Parliamentary Committees, its superior qualities have, without a single exception, been admitted, and some direct and conclusive evidence of those qualities has been given.

"The question respecting quantity, alone remains to be decided; and this the Company will set at rest by experiment.

"It is well known, that whenever the bed of clay which overlays the chalk, which by geologists is termed the London clay, has been pierced or bored through, a bed of fine sand has been discovered, which separates the clay from the chalk beneath it. With this sand there is abundance of very pure soft water, suitable to all the purposes of life.

"Very extensive and valuable information respecting this water is given in the 'Outlines of Geology,' by Messrs Conybear and Phillips, among which it is observed, 'that the water afforded by the wells, which rises from the sands of the plastic clay formation, underlaying it, is very limpid and free from salts; it is, therefore, what is termed soft in a remarkable degree; is adapted to every domestic purpose, and never fails.'

"From the same authority, as well as from numerous observations and inquiries carefully made, it appears that the water referred to rises to considerable heights, the least of which that has hitherto been examined, is the level of high water mark in the river Thames; while in some places it rises to between 300 and 400 feet above that level.

"The general distribution of this water over an immense space, is proved by the invariable success of the many attempts made to obtain it, whenever the operations have been properly conducted.

"The quantity appears to be unlimited, as is shown by the very great number of wells sunk by private individuals for their own use, by hotel and tavern keepers, by brewers, distillers, dyers, sugar refiners, and for the use of steam-engines, and other purposes in many manufactories and trade concerns, without any diminution of the supply.

"Deficiencies have, however, occurred, but when the causes have been sought, they have been found to have been occasioned by the choking of the orifices through which the water has been received into the wells, the orifices being usually of very small diameters: such, however, is the quantity, and such the force with which the water rises, that upwards of three hundred gallons per minute have been obtained, continuously through one of these orifices, the diameter of which was only nine inches.

"From a very great number of facts which have been noticed and recorded, it appears that generally throughout the district in which the water is found, upwards of one hundred gallons of water per minute, from a pipe of five inches diameter, may be taken as the minimum.

"The quantity obtained at any one place seems to be limited only by the size of the orifice through which it comes. If then this be taken as a rule, and there seems to be no reason why it should not be taken as a rule, one orifice, about six feet in diameter, will afford a supply equal to the whole quantity supplied to the Metropolis by all the Water Companies on both sides of the river, that quantity being estimated in excess at 38,000,000 of gallons daily.

"It follows, then, that to obtain a supply of this excellent water with the greatest certainty, and in the same state at all times, and in all seasons, it is not necessary to incur any very heavy comparative expense with the great object so desirable to be accomplished.

"The quantity daily supplied by the Water Companies is in itself an immense quantity; and it may be asked, are the operations of nature such as will continually enable you to draw so large a quantity from the sand beneath the London clay? A little consideration will entirely dispel the doubt. Great as is the quantity to our senses, it is perfectly insignificant in comparison with the processes which nature is continually carrying on. This insignificance is at once manifested by the fact, that if, as there seems to be no doubt, the water be distributed under the whole surface of the London clay, the daily quantity of 38,000,000 of gallons taken from it would make scarcely the least appreciable difference, it being less than the diameter of a film from a spider's web."

Thornton Mechanics' Institution.—The first annual meeting of this Institution was held on the 2nd of July last, the Rev. J. Gregory, President of the Society, in the chair. It appeared, from the secretary's report, that twenty-six lectures on scientific, geographical, literary, and other subjects, had been delivered during the year, all of which, except three on chemistry and electricity, and one on the manners and customs of the Jews, have been given by the members of the Institute. The librarian's report stated that reading prevails to a considerable extent, 750 deliveries of books having been made during the year, and that there is a valuable and select, though not extensive, collection of books for the use of the members. The Institution having only finished the first year of its existence, much cannot be said of what has been done; but the prospects of the society are fair, and, from the unanimity of the members, considerable good may be expected to result from future efforts.

BRICKLAYERS, AND AN OLD BOOK.

It is a very hot day and a "dusty day;" you are passing through a street in which there is no shade,—a new street, only half-built and half-paved—the areas unfinished as you advance (it is to be hoped no drunken man will stray there)—the floors of the houses only rafted (you can't go in and sit down)—broken glass, at the turnings, on the bits of garden wall—the time, noon—the month, August—the whole place glaring with the sun, and coloured with yellow brick, chalk, and lime. Occasionally you stumble upon the bottom of an old saucepan, or kick a baked shoe.

In this very hot passage through life, you are longing for soda-water, or for the sound of a pump, when suddenly you "Hear a trowel tick against a brick," and down a ladder by your side, which bends at every step, comes dancing, with hod on shoulder, a bricklayer, who looks as dry as his vocation,—his eyes winking, his mouth gaping, his beard grim with a week's growth, the rest of his hair like a badger's. You then for the first time see a little water by the way-side, thick and white with chalk; and are doubting whether to admire it as a liquid or detest it for its colour, when a quantity of lime is dashed against the sieve, and you receive in your eyes and mouth a taste of the dry and burning elements of mortar, without the refreshment of the wet. Finally, your shoe is burnt; and as the bricklayer says something to his fellow in Irish, who laughs, you fancy that he is witty at your expence, and has made some ingenious bull.

"A pretty picture, Mr London-Journalist! and very refreshing, this hot weather!"

Oh, but you are only a chance-acquaintance of us, my dear Sir; you don't know what philosophies we writers and readers of the LONDON JOURNAL possess, which render us "lords of ourselves," unencumbered even with the mighty misery of a hot day, and the hod on another man's shoulder. You, unfortunate easy man, have been thinking of nothing but the "aggravations" of the street all this while, and are ready to enter your house after the walk, in a temper to kick off your shoes into the servant's face. We, besides being in the street, have been in all sorts of pleasant and remote places; have been at Babylon; have been at Bagdad; have bathed in the river Tigris, the river of that city of the 'Arabian Nights'; nay, have been in Paradise itself! led by old Bochart and his undeniable maps, where you see the place as "graphically set forth" as though it had never vanished, and Adam and Eve walking in it, taller than the trees. We are writing upon the very book this moment instead of a desk, a fond custom of ours; though, for dignity's sake, we beg to say we have a desk; but we like an old folio to write upon, written by some happy believing hand, no matter whether we go all lengths or not with his sort of proof, provided he be in earnest and a good fellow.*

Let us indulge ourselves a moment, during this hot subject, with the map in question. It is now before us, the river Euphrates running up through it in dark fulness, and appearing through the paper on which we are writing like rich veins. Occasionally we take up the paper to see it better; the garden of Eden, however, always remaining visible below, and the mountains of Armenia at top. The map is a small folio size, darkly printed, with thick letters; a good stout sprinkle of mountains; a great tower to mark the site of Babylon; trees, as formal as a park in those days, to shadow forth the terrestrial paradise, with Adam and Eve, as before mentioned; Greek and Hebrew names here and there mingled with the Latin; a lion, towards the north-west, sitting in Armenia, and bigger than a mountain; some other beast, "stepping west" from the Caspian sea; and a great tablet in the south-west corner, presenting the title of the map, the site of Eden, or the Terrestrial Paradise (Edenis, seu Paradisi Terrestris Situs), surmounted with a tree, and formidable with the Serpent; who, suddenly appearing from one side of it with the apple in his mouth, is startling a traveller on the other. These old maps are as good to study as pictures and books; and the region before us is specially rich—reverend with memories of scripture, pompous with Alexander's cities, and delightful with the 'Arabian Nights.' You go up from the Persian Gulf at the foot, passing (like Sindbad) the city of Caiphath, where "bdellium" is to be had, and the island of Bahrim, famous for its pearl fishery (Bahrim Insula Margaritarum piscat. Celebris); then penetrate the garden of Eden, with the river Euphrates, as strait as a canal; pass the Cypress-grove, which furnished the wood of which the ark was made; Mousal, one of our old friends in the 'Arabian Nights'; Babylon, famous for a hundred fables, the sublime of brick-building; בְּרִיכָה

the "Naarda of Ptolemy," a "celebrated school of the Jews;" Ur (of the Chaldees), the country of Abraham; Noah's city, Χαμὴν Θαμμαν, the city of Eight, so called from the eight persons that came out of the ark; Omar's Island, where there is a mosque (says the map) made out of the relics of the ark; Mount Ararat, on the top of which it rested; and thence you pass the springs of the Tigris and the Euphrates into Colchis with its Golden Fleece, leaving the Caspian sea on one side, and the Euxine on the other, with Phasis the country of pheasants, and Cappadocia, where you see the mild light shining on the early Christian church; and you have come all this way through the famous names of Persia, and Arabia, and Armenia, and Mesopotamia, and Syria, and Assyria, with Arbela on the right hand, where Darius was overthrown, and Damascus on the left, rich, from time immemorial to this day, with almost every Eastern association of ideas, sacred and profane.

In regions of this nature, did sincere, book-loving, scholarly Bochart spend the days of his mind,—by far the greater portion of the actual days of such a man's life; and for that reason we, who, though not so scholarly, love books as well as he did, love to have the folio of such a man under our paper for a desk,—making his venerable mixture of truth and fiction a foundation, as it were, for our own love of both, and rendering the dream of his existence, in some measure, as tangible to us as it was to himself, in the shape of one of his works of love.—Do people now-a-days,—do even we ourselves,—love books as they did in those times? It is hardly possible, seeing how the volumes have multiplied, to distract choice and passion, and also how small in size they have become,—octavos and duodecimos. A little book is indeed "a love," (to use a modern phrase,)—and fitted to carry about with us in our walks and pockets: but then a great book,—a folio,—was a thing to look up to,—to build,—a new and lawful Babel,—and therefore it had an aspect more like a religion.—Well; love is religion too, and of the best; and so we will return to our common task.

Now observe, O casual reader of the LONDON JOURNAL, what such of us as are habituated to it, found in our half-built street. You take a brick perhaps for an ordinary bit of burnt clay, fit only to build No. 9, Golf street, Little Meadows; and to become a brick-hat, and be kicked to pieces in an old alley. O, thou of little bookstall! Why, the very manufacture is illustrious with antiquity,—with the morning beams that touched the house-tops of Shinar;—there is a clatter of brick-making in the fields of Accad; and the work looks almost as ancient to this day, with its straw-built tents and its earthy landscape. Not desolate therefore, or unrefreshed, were we in our new and hot street; for the first brick, like a talisman, transported us into old Babylon, with its tower and its gardens; and there we drove our chariot on the walls, and conversed with Herodotus, and got out of the way of Semiramis, and read, as men try to read at this day, the arrow-headed letters on the bricks,—as easy to us at that time as A. B. C.; though what they mean now, neither we nor Mr Rich can tell. The said brick, as our readers have seen, thence took us into paradise, and so through all the regions of Mesopotamia and the Arabian Nights, with our friends Bochart and Bedreddin Hassan; and returning home, what do we descry? The street itself alone! No: Ben Jonson, the most illustrious of bricklayers, handling his trowel on the walls of Chancery lane (see the SUPPLEMENT to the LONDON JOURNAL, Vol. I, p. xxxv.), the obstinate remnants of Roman brick and mortar lurking still about London (ditto—p. iii.). Spenser's celebration of—

"Those bricky towers,
The which on Themmes brode aged backe doe ride,
Where now the studious lawyers have their bowres;"

to wit, the Temple; and then we think of our old and picture-learned friend, our lamented Haslitt who first taught us not to think white cottages better than red, especially among trees, noting to us the finer harmony of the contrast—to which we can bear instant and curious testimony; for passing the other day through the gate that leads from St James's park into the old court, betwixt Sutherland and Marlborough Houses, we marvelled at what seemed to our near-sighted eyes a shower of red colours in a tree to the right of us, at the corner; which colours, upon inspection, proved to be nothing better than those of the very red bricks, that bordered the windows of the building behind the trees. We smiled at the mistake; but it was with pleasure; for it reminded us that even defects of vision may have their compensations; and it looked like a symbol of the pleasures with which fancy, and common-place, may conspire to enrich an observer willing to be pleased.

The most elegant houses in the world, generally speaking, are built of clay. You have riches inside,—costliness and beauty on the internal walls,—paintings, papers, fine draperies,—themselves compounded of the homeliest growths of the earth; but pierce an inch or two outwards, and you come to the stuff of which the hovel is made. It is nothing but mind at last which throws elegance upon the richest as well as the poorest materials. Let a rich man give a hundred guineas for a daub, and people laugh at him and his daub together. The inside of his wall is no better than his out. But let him put Titian or Correggio upon it, and he puts mind there,—visible mind, and therefore the most precious to all; his own mind too, as well as the painter's, for love partakes of what it loves; and yet the painter's visible mind is not a bit different, except in degree, from the mind with which every lover of the graceful and the possible may adorn whatsoever it looks upon. The object will be perhaps rich in itself, but if not, it will be rich, somehow or other, in association; and it can only be too often repeated, as a truth in strictest logic, that every impression is real which is actually made upon us, whether by fact or fancy. No minds entirely divorce the two, or can divorce them, even if they evince the spiritual part of their faculties in doing nothing better than taking a fancy to a tea-cup or a hat; and Nature, we may be assured, intended that we should receive pleasure from the associations of ideas, as well as from images tangible; for all mankind, more or less, do so. The great art is to cultivate impressions of the pleasant sort, just as a man will raise wholesome plants in his garden and not poisonous ones.

A bricklayer's tools may illustrate a passage in Shakespeare. One of them is called a bevel, and is used to cut the under-side of bricks to a required angle. "Bevel" is a sort of irregular square.

"They that level

At my abuses, reckon up their own.

I may be straight, though they themselves be bevel." Sonnet 121.

We shall conclude this paper with two bricklaying anecdotes, one of which has more manner than matter; but there is an ease in it, very comforting, when we reflect upon the laboriousness of the occupation in a hot day. And this reminds us, that in considering the bricklayer, we must not forget how many of his hours he passes in a world of his own, though in the streets,—pacing on scaffolding, descending and ascending ladders, living on the outsides of houses, betwixt ground-floors and garrets, or overlooking us from the top—now burning in the sun, now catching a breeze unknown to us prisoners of the pavement. We have heard of a bricklayer who was a somnambulist by day-time, and used to go on with his work in that state, along the precipices of parapet walls, and the nice points of tops of ladders. But to our anecdotes:—

An acquaintance of ours was passing a street in which Irish bricklayers were at work, when he heard one of them address, from below, another who was sending him baskets down by a rope. "Lower ay, wou'd you?" said he; meaning that his friend was to lower the baskets in a style less hasty and inconvenient. "Lower ay!" exclaimed the other, in a tone indignant at having the quiet perfection of his movements called in question, and in the very phraseology of which we seem to hear the Hibernian elevation of his eyebrows, as well as the rough lightness of his voice, "I lower so ay, I dont know how I lower."

The other story appears to us to exhibit the very prince of bulls—the prize animal in that species of cattle:—An Irish labourer laid a wager with another, that the latter could not carry him up the ladder to the top of a house in his hod, without letting him fall. Agreed. The hod is occupied, the ladder ascended, there is peril at every step. Above all, there is life and the loss of the wager at the top of the ladder. death and success below! The house-top is reached in safety; the wagerer looks humbled and disappointed. "Well," said he, "you have won; there is no doubt of that; worse luck to you another time; but at the third story I had hoped."

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN. GAINSBOROUGH THE PAINTER.

[This is one of the liveliest and most amusing biographical sketches we are acquainted with. It is not a full length; but the head, heart, and manner of the man are exceedingly well given. It is by Jackson of Exeter; who, besides being an excellent and affecting musician, (witness, if he had left nothing else, his "Encompassed in an angel's frame," was an ingenious writer of essays and criticism. He is said also to have been a "no mean proficient" in his friend's principal walk of art,—landscape-painting.)

In the early part of my life I became acquainted with Thomas Gainsborough, the painter; and as his character was, perhaps, better known to me than to any other person, I will endeavour to divest myself of every partiality, and speak of him as he really was. I am the rather induced to this, by seeing accounts of him and his works by people who were unacquainted with either, and, consequently, have been mistaken in both.

Gainsborough's profession was painting, and music was his amusement—yet there were times when music seemed to be his employment, and painting his diversion. As his skill in music has been celebrated, I will, before I speak of him as a painter, mention what degree of merit he possessed as a musician.

When I first knew him he lived at Bath, where Giardini had been exhibiting his then unrivalled powers on the violin. His excellent performance made Gainsborough enamoured of that instrument; and conceiving, like the servant-maid in the Spectator, that the music lay in the fiddle, he was frantic until he possessed the very instrument which had given him so much pleasure—but seemed much surprised, that the music of it remained behind with Giardini!

He had scarcely recovered this shock (for it was a great one to him) when he heard Abel on the viol-di-gamba. The violin was hung on the willow—Abel's viol-di-gamba was purchased, and the house resounded with melodious thirds and fifths from "morn to dewy eve!" Many an adagio and many a minuet were begu'd, but none completed—this was wonderful, as it was Abel's own instrument, and therefore ought to have produced Abel's own music!

Fortunately my friend's passion had now a fresh object—Fischer's hautboy; but I do not recollect that he deprived Fischer of his instrument: and though he procured a hautboy, I never heard him make the least attempt on it. Probably his ear was too delicate to bear the disagreeable sounds which necessarily attend the first beginnings on a wind instrument. He seemed to content himself with what he heard in public, and getting Fischer to play to him in private—not on the hautboy, but the violin. But this was a profound secret, for Fischer knew that his reputation was in danger if he pretended to excel on two instruments.*

The next time I saw Gainsborough it was in the character of King David. He had heard a harper at Bath—the performer was soon left harpless; and now Fischer, Abel, and Giardini were all forgotten—there was nothing like chords and arpeggios! He really stuck to the harp long enough to play several airs with variations, and, in a little time, would nearly have exhausted all the pieces usually performed on an instrument incapable of modulation, (this was not a pedal-harp) when another visit from Abel brought him back to the viol-di-gamba.

He now saw the imperfection of sudden sounds that instantly die away. If you wanted a staccato, it was to be had by a proper management of the bow, and you might also have notes as long as you please. The viol-di-gamba is the only instrument, and Abel the prince of musicians!

* It was at this time I heard Fischer play a solo on the violin, and accompany himself on the same instrument. The air of the solo was executed with the bow, and the accompaniment pizzicato with the unemployed fingers of his left hand.—[This is what Paganini has since done so wonderfully.]

This, and occasionally a little flirtation with the fiddle, continued some years; when, as ill-luck would have it, he heard Crossdill—but, by some irregularity of conduct, for which I cannot account, he neither took up, nor bought the violincello. All his passion for the bass was vented in descriptions of Crossdill's tone and bowing, which was rapturous and enthusiastic to the last degree.

More years now passed away, when upon seeing a theorbo in a picture of Vandyke's, he concluded (perhaps it was finely painted) that the theorbo must be a fine instrument. He recollected to have heard of a German professor, whom, though no more, I shall forbear to name—ascended per varios gradus to his garret, where he found him at dinner upon a roasted apple, and smoking a pipe. "•••" says he, "I am come to buy your lute!"

"To pay my lute!"

"Yes—come, name your price, and here is your money."

"I cannot sell my lute!"

"No, not for a guinea or two!—but by God you must sell it."

"May lute is wert much monnay! it is wert ten guinea."

"That it is—see, here is the money."

"Well—if I must—but you will not take it away yourself?"

"Yes, yes—good bye •••"

(After he had gone down he came up again.)

"••• I have done but half my errand—what is your lute worth, if I have not your book?"

"What poog, Maister Gainsborough?"

"Why, the book of airs you have composed for the lute."

"Ah, py cot, I can never part wid my poog!"

"Poh! you can make another at any time—this is the book I mean" (putting it in his pocket).

"Ah, py cot I cannot!"

"Come, come, here's another ten guineas for your book—so, once more, good day t'ye—(descends again, and again comes up.)—But what use is your book to me, if I don't understand it?—and your lute, you— you may take it again if you won't teach me to play on it. Come home with me, and give me my first lesson."

"I will come to-morrow."

"You must come now."

"I must treat myself."

"For what?—you are the best figure I have seen to day!"

"Ay must be shave!"

"I honour your beard!"

"Ay must bed on my wick!"

"D—n your wig! your cap and beard become you! Do you think if Vandyke was to paint you, he'd let you be shaved?"

In this manner he frittered away his musical talents; and though possessed of ear, taste, and genius, he never had application enough to learn his notes. He scorned to take the first step, the second was of course out of his reach; and the summit became unattainable.

As a painter, his abilities may be considered in three different departments—

Portrait,

Landscape, and

Groups of Figures—to which must be added his Drawings.

To take these in the above-mentioned order—

The first consideration in a portrait, especially to the purchaser, is, that it be a perfect likeness of the sitter—in this respect his skill was unrivalled. The next point is, that it is a good picture—here, he has as often failed as succeeded. He failed by affecting a thin washy colouring, and a patching style of pencilling. But when, from accident or choice, he painted in the manly substantial style of Vandyke, he was very little, if at all, his inferior. It shows a great defect in judgment, to be from choice wrong, when we know what is right. Perhaps his best portrait is that known among the painters by the name of Blue-boy—it was in the possession of Mr. Battal, near Newport-market.

There are three different eras in his landscapes. His first manner was an imitation of Ruysdael, with more various colouring—the second was an extravagant looseness of pencilling, which, though reprehensible, none but a great master can possess—his third manner was a solid firm style of touch.

At this last period he possessed his greatest powers, and was, (what every painter is at some time or other) fond of varnish. This produced the usual effects—improved the picture for two or three months; then ruined it for ever! With all his excellences in this branch of the art, he was a great mannerist—but the worst of his pictures have a value, from the facility of execution, which excellence I shall again mention:

His groupings of figures are, for the most part, very pleasing, though unnatural—for a town-girl, with her clothes in rags, is not a ragged country-girl. Notwithstanding this remark, there are numberless instances of his groupings at the door of a cottage, or by a fire in a wood, &c., that are so pleasing as to disarm criticism. He sometimes (like Murillo) gave interest to a single figure—his 'Shepherd's Boy,' 'Woodman,' 'Girl and Pigs,' are equal to the best pictures on such subjects. His 'Fighting Dogs,' 'Girl warming herself,' and some others, shew his great powers in this style of painting. The very distinguished rank the 'Girl and Pigs' held at Mr Calonne's sale, in company with some of the best pictures of the best masters, will fully justify a commendation which might else seem extravagant.

If I were to rest his reputation on one point, it would be on his Drawings. No man ever possessed methods so various in producing effect, and all excellent;—his washy, patching style, was here in its proper element. The subject which is scarce enough for a picture, is sufficient for a drawing; and the hasty, loose handling, which in painting is poor, is rich in a transparent work of bistre and Indian ink. Perhaps the quickest effects ever produced, were in some of his drawings—and this leads me to take up again his facility of execution.

Many of his pictures have no other merit than this facility; and yet, having it, are undoubtedly valuable. His drawings almost rest on this quality alone for their value; but possessing it in an eminent degree (and as no drawing can have any merit where it is wanting), his works, therefore, in this branch of the art, approach nearer to perfection than his paintings.

If the term facility explain not itself, instead of a definition, I will illustrate it.

Should a performer of middling execution on the violin, contrive to get through his piece, the most that can be said is, that he has not failed in his attempt. Should Cramer perform the same music, it would be so much within his powers, that it would be executed with ease. Now, the superiority of pleasure which arises from the execution of a Cramer, is enjoyed from the facility of a Gaimborough. A poor piece performed by one, or a poor subject taken by the other, give more pleasure by the manner in which they are treated, than a good piece of music, and a sublime subject, in the hands of artists that have not the means by which effects are produced, in subjection to them. To a good painter or musician, this illustration was needless, and yet, by them only, perhaps, it will be felt and understood.

By way of addition to this sketch of Gaimborough, let me mention a few miscellaneous particulars.

He had no relish for historical painting; he never sold, but always gave away his drawings—commonly to persons who were perfectly ignorant of their value.*

He hated the harpsichord and the piano-forte. He disliked singing, particularly in parts. He detested reading; but was so like Sterne in his Letters, that if it were not for an originality that could be copied from no one, it might be supposed that he formed his style upon a close imitation of that author. He had as much pleasure in looking at a violin as in hearing it. I have seen him for many minutes surveying, in silence, the perfections of an instrument, from the just proportion of the model, and beauty of the workmanship.

His conversation was sprightly, but licentious; his favourite subjects were music and painting, which he treated in a manner peculiarly his own. The common topics, or any of a superior cast, he thoroughly hated, and always interrupted by some stroke of wit or humour.

The indiscriminate admirers of my late friend will consider this sketch of his character as far beneath his merit; but it must be remembered that my wish was not to make it perfect, but just. The same principle obliges me to add, that as to his common acquaintance he was sprightly and agreeable, so to his intimate friends he was sincere and honest, and that his heart was always alive to every feeling of honour and generosity.

He died with this expression—"We are all going to Heaven, and Vandyke is of the party"—strongly expressive of a good heart, a quiet conscience, and a love for his profession, which only left him with his life.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XXI.—RICHARD III.

'RICHARD III' may be considered as properly a stage-play: it belongs to the theatre, rather than to the closet. We shall therefore criticise it chiefly with a reference to the manner in which we have seen it performed. It is the character in which Garrick came out: it was the second character in which Mr Kean appeared, and in which he acquired his fame. Shakspeare we have always with us: actors we have only for a few seasons; and therefore some account of them may be acceptable, if not to our contemporaries, to those who come after us, if "that rich and idle personage, Posterity," should deign to look into our writings.

It is possible to form a higher conception of the character of Richard than that given by Mr Kean: but we cannot imagine any character represented with greater distinctness and precision, more perfectly articulated in every part. Perhaps indeed there is too much of what is technically called execution. When we first saw this celebrated actor in the part, we thought he sometimes failed from an exuberance of manner, and dissipated the impression of the general character by the variety of his resources. To be complete, his delineation of it should have more solidity, depth, sustained and impassioned feeling, with somewhat less brilliancy, with fewer glancing lights, pointed transitions, and pantomimic evolutions.

The Richard of Shakspeare is towering and lofty; equally impetuous and commanding; haughty, violent, and subtle; bold and treacherous; confident in his strength as well as in his cunning; raised high by his birth, and higher by his talents and his crimes; a royal usurper, a princely hypocrite, a tyrant and a murderer of the house of Plantagenet.

"But I was born so high:
Our airy buildeth in the cedar's top,
And dallies with the wind, and scorns the sun."

The idea conveyed in these lines (which are indeed omitted in the miserable medley acted for 'Richard III') is never lost sight of by Shakspeare, and should not be out of the actor's mind for a moment. The restless and sanguinary Richard is not a man striving to be great, but to be greater than he is; conscious of his strength of will, his power of intellect, his daring courage, his elevated station; and making use of these advantages to commit unheard-of crimes, and to shield himself from remorse and infamy.

If Mr Kean does not entirely succeed in concentrating all the lines of the character, as drawn by Shakspeare, he gives an animation, vigour, and relief to the part, which we have not seen equalled. He is more refined than Cooke; more bold, varied, and original than Kemble in the same character. In some parts he is deficient in dignity, and particularly in the scenes of state business, he has by no means an air of artificial authority. There is at times an aspiring elevation, an enthusiastic rapture in his expectations of attaining the crown, and at others a gloating expression of sullen delight, as if he already clenched the bauble, and held it in his grasp. The courtship scene with Lady Anne is an admirable exhibition of smooth and smiling villainy. The progress of wily adulation, of encroaching humility, is finely marked by his action, voice and eye. He seems, like the first Tempter, to approach his prey, secure of the event, and as if success had smoothed his way before him. The late Mr Cooke's manner of representing this scene was more vehement, hurried, and full of anxious uncertainty. This, though more natural in general, was less in character in this particular instance. Richard should woo less as a lover than as an actor—to show his mental superiority, and power of making others the play-things of his purposes. Mr Kean's attitude in leaning against the side of the stage before he comes forward to address Lady Anne, is one of the most graceful and striking ever witnessed on the stage. It would do for Titian to paint. The frequent and rapid transition of his voice from the expression of the fiercest passion to the most familiar tones of conversation, was that which gave a peculiar grace of novelty to his acting on his first appearance. This has been since imitated and caricatured by others, and he himself uses the artifice more sparingly than he did. His bye-play is excellent. His manner of bidding his friends "Good night," after pausing with the point of his sword, drawn slowly backward and forward on the ground, as if considering the plan of the battle next day, is a particularly happy and natural thought. He gives to the two last acts of the play the greatest animation and effect. He fills every part of the stage; and makes up for the deficiency of his person by what has been sometimes objected to as an excess of action. The concluding scene in which he is killed by Richmond is the most brilliant of the whole. He fights at last like one drunk with wounds; and the attitude in which he stands with his hands stretched out, after his sword is wrested from him, has a preternatural and terrific grandeur, as if his will could not be disarmed, and the very phantoms of his despair had power to kill.—Mr Kean has since in a great measure effaced the impression of his Richard III by the superior efforts of his genius in Othello (his master-piece), in the murder-scene in Macbeth, in Richard II, in Sir Giles Overreach, and lastly in Oronoko; but we still like to look back to his first performance of this part, both because it first assured his admirers of his future success, and because we bore our feeble but, at that time, not useless testimony to the merits of this very original actor, on which the town was very considerably divided for no other reason than because they were original.

The manner in which Shakspeare's plays have been generally altered or rather mangled by modern mechanists, is a disgrace to the English stage. The patch-work 'Richard III,' which is acted under the sanction of his name, and which was manufactured by Cibber, is a striking example of this remark.

The play itself is undoubtedly a very powerful effusion of Shakspeare's genius. The ground-work of the character of Richard, that mixture of intellectual vigour with moral depravity, in which Shakspeare delighted to show his strength—gave full scope as well as temptation to the exercise of his imagination. The character of his hero is almost every where predominant, and marks his lurid track throughout. The original play is however too long for representation, and there are some few scenes which might be better spared than preserved, and by omitting which it would remain a complete whole. The only rule, indeed, for altering Shakspeare is to retrench certain passages which may be considered either as superfluous or obsolete, but not to add or transpose any thing. The arrangement and development of the story, and the mutual contrast and combination of the dramatis personæ, are in general as finely managed as the development of the characters or the expression of the passions.

This rule has not been adhered to in the present instance. Some of the most important and striking

* He presented twenty drawings to a lady, who pasted them to the waistcoat of her dressing-room. Sometime after she left the house; the drawings, of course, became the temporary property of every tenant.

passages in the principal character have been omitted, to make room for idle and misplaced extracts from other plays; the only intention of which seems to have been to make the character of Richard as odious and disgusting as possible. It is apparently for no other purpose than to make Gloucester stab King Henry on the stage, that the fine abrupt introduction of the character in the opening of the play is lost in the tedious whining morality of the luxurious king (taken from another play);—we say tedious, because it interrupts the business of the scene, and loses its beauty and effect by having no intelligible connection with the previous character of the mild, well-meaning monarch. The passages which the unfortunate Henry has to recite are beautiful and pathetic in themselves, but they have nothing to do with the world that Richard has to "bustle in." In the same spirit of vulgar caricature is the scene between Richard and Lady Anne (when his wife) interpolated without any authority, merely to gratify this favourite propensity to disgust and loathing. With the same perverse consistency, Richard, after his last fatal struggle, is raised up by some Galvanic process, to utter the imprecation, without any motive but pure malignity, which Shakespeare has so properly put into the mouth of Northumberland on hearing of Percy's death. To make room for these worse than needless additions, many of the most striking passages in the real play have been omitted by the foppery and ignorance of the prompt-book critics. We do not mean to insist merely on passages which are fine as poetry and to the reader, such as Clarence's dream, &c., but on those which are important to the understanding of the character, and peculiarly adapted for stage-effect. We will give the following as instances among several others. The first is the scene where Richard enters abruptly to the queen and her friends to defend himself:—

"GLOUCESTER. They do me wrong, and I will not endure it.

Who are they that complain unto the king,
That I forsooth am stern, and love them not?
By holy Paul, they love his grace but lightly,
That fill his ears with such dissentious rumours:
Because I cannot flatter and look fair,
Smile in men's faces, smooth, deceive, and cog,
Duck with French nod, and speish courtesies,
I must be held a raucous enemy.
Cannot a plain man live, and think no harm,
But thus his simple truth must be abused
With silken, sly, insinuating Jacks?

GRAY. To whom in all this presence speaks your grace?

GLOUCESTER. To thee, that hast nor honesty nor grace;

When have I injured thee, when done thee wrong?
Or thee? or thee? or any of your faction?
A plague upon you all!"

Nothing can be more characteristic than the turbulent pretensions to meekness and simplicity in this address. Again, the versatility and adroitness of Richard is admirably described in the following ironical conversation with Brakenbury:—

"BRAKENBURY. I beseech your graces both to pardon me.

His majesty hath straitly given in charge,
That no man shall have private conference,
Of what degree soever, with your brother.

GLOUCESTER. E'en so, and please your worship, Brakenbury,

You may partake of any thing we say:
We speak no treason, man—we say the king
Is wise and virtuous, and his noble queen
Well strook in years, fair, and not jealous.
We say that Shore's wife hath a pretty foot,
A cherry lip, a passing pleasing tongue;
That the queen's kindred are made gentlefolks.
How say you, sir? Can you deny a' this?

BRAKENBURY. With this, my lord, myself have naught to do.

GLOUCESTER. What, fellow, naught to do with mistress Shore?

I tell you, sir, he that doth naught with her,
Excepting one, were best to do it secretly alone.

BRAKENBURY. What one, my lord?

GLOUCESTER. Her husband, knave—would'st thou betray me?"

The feigned reconciliation of Gloucester with the queen's kinsmen is also a master-piece. One of the finest strokes in the play, and which serves to show as much as any thing the deep, plausible manners of Richard, is the unsuspecting security of Hastings, at the very time when the former is plotting his death, and when that very appearance of cordiality and good-humour on which Hastings builds his confidence, arises from Richard's consciousness of having betrayed him to his ruin. This, with the whole character of Hastings, is omitted.

Perhaps the two most beautiful passages in the original play are the farewell apostrophe of the queen to the Tower, where her children are shut up from her, and Tyrrel's description of their death. We will finish our quotations with them.

"QUEEN. Stay, yet look back with me unto the Tower;

Pity, you ancient stones, those tender babes,
Whom envy hath immured within your walls;
Rough cradle for such little pretty ones,
Rude, rugged nurse, old sullen play-fellow,
For tender princes!"

The other passage is the account of their death by Tyrrel:—

"Dighton and Forrest, whom I did suborn
To do this piece of ruthless butchery,
Albeit they were flesh'd villains, bloody dogs,
Wept like to children in their death's sad story:
O thus! quoth Dighton, lay the gentle babes;
Thus, thus, quoth Forrest, girdling one another
Within their innocent alabaster arms;
Their lips were four red roses on a stalk,
And in that summer beauty kissed each other;
A book of prayers on their pillow lay,
Which once, quoth Forrest, almost changed my mind:

But oh the devil!—there the villain stopped;
When Dighton thus told on—we smothered
The most replenished sweet work of nature,
That from the prime creation ere she framed."

These are some of those wonderful bursts of feeling, done to the life, to the very height of fancy and nature, which our Shakespeare alone could give. We do not insist on the repetition of these last passages as proper for the stage: we should indeed be loth to trust them in the mouth of any actor; but we should wish them to be retained in preference at least to the fantoccini exhibition of the young princes, Edward and York, bandying childish wit with their uncle.

FINE ARTS.

Attack of a Baggage Wagon at Naseby Field, 1645.
Painted and Etched by Henry Melling. Hodgson, Boys, and Graves.

This design is a companion to the 'Retreat of a Baggage Wagon at the Battle of Naseby,' published by Mr Melling some time back, of which we elsewhere recorded our admiration. The plate before us is in the same style, roughly, but vigorously and effectively etched. It is perhaps less complete as a whole than the other print—the action is not so unfailingly preserved in all parts, and to the same end; but the pictorial effect is excellent. The figures to the left are a little stiff, especially the man on the ground; he does not seem in earnest in the death struggle. The white horse, however, and his rider, the man striking at him, and all the picture to the right, is full of life and right stalwart activity. There seems a want of study in the drawing of one or two parts, a defect which the rest proves to be quite in Mr Melling's power to avoid; and certainly he is bound to give his natural genius all the advantages of the power which is to be acquired from study and self-criticism.

A History and Description of the Houses of Parliament, and Ancient Palatial Edifices of Westminster, &c.
By J. Britton and Edward Brayley. Nos. IV, V, VI. John Weale.

We have now reached the sixth No. of this work, which improves in its progress. The engravings in the numbers before us seem generally softer, but not less clear than the earlier ones. The first engraving in No. VI, by J. Le Keux, is the best that has been executed for the work. When complete the book will certainly contain a very full and particular picture of the venerable buildings of the ancient city.

Arboretum Britannicum. Parts VI, VII. By J. C. Loudon.

As copious, clear, and exact as ever. The sight of it from time to time quite makes us long for a bit of land of our own, whereon to group the forms which are here so enticingly displayed. We would suggest that a few of the trees would be improved by being a little darker. The yew, for instance, conveys the idea of a lighter coloured tree than we ever remember to have seen it.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXXI.—AN UNDENIABLE APPARITION.

(From the volume by Jackson, of Exeter, mentioned in our last.)

At a town in the west of England was held a club of twenty-four people, which assembled once a week to drink punch, smoke tobacco, and talk politics. Like Rubens' academy at Antwerp, each member had his peculiar chair, and the President's was more exalted than the rest. One of the members had been in a dying state for some time; of course, his chair, while he was absent, remained vacant.

The club being met on their usual night, inquiries were naturally made after their associate. As he lived in the adjoining house, a particular friend went himself to inquire for him, and returned with the dismal tidings that he could not possibly survive the night. This threw a gloom on the company, and all efforts to turn the conversation from the sad subject before them were ineffectual.

About midnight (the time, by long prescription, appropriated for the walking of spectres) the door opened, and the form, in white, of the dying, or rather of the dead, man, walked into the room, and took his seat in the accustomed chair; there he remained in silence, and in silence was he gazed at. The apparition continued a sufficient time in the chair to assure all present of the reality of the vision; at length he rose and stalked towards the door, which he opened as if living, went out, and then shut the door after him.

After a long pause, some one at last had the resolution to say, "If only one of us had seen this he would not have been believed, but it is impossible that so many persons can be deceived."

The company, by degrees, recovered their speech, and the whole conversation, as may be imagined, was upon the dreadful object which had engaged their attention. They broke up, and went home.

In the morning inquiry was made after their sick friend—it was answered by an account of his death, which happened nearly at the time of his appearing in the club. There could be little doubt before, but now nothing could be more certain than the reality of the apparition, which had been seen by so many persons together.

It is needless to say, that such a story spread over the country, and found credit even from infidels: for in this case all reasoning became superfluous, when opposed to a plain fact asserted by three-and-twenty witnesses. To assert the doctrine of the fixed laws of nature was ridiculous, when there were so many people of credit to prove that they might be unfixed.

Years rolled on—the story ceased to engage attention, and it was forgotten, unless when occasionally produced to silence an unbeliever.

One of the club was an apothecary. In the course of his practice he was called to an old woman, whose profession was attending on sick persons. She told him, that she could leave the world with a quiet conscience but for one thing which lay on her mind—"Do you not remember Mr . . . whose ghost has been so much talked of? I was his nurse. The night he died I left the room for something I wanted—I am sure I had not been absent long; but at my return I found the bed without my patient. He was delirious, and I feared that he had thrown himself out of the window. I was so frightened that I had no power to stir; but after some time, to my great astonishment, he entered the room shivering, and his teeth chattering—laid down on the bed, and died. Considering myself as the cause of his death, I kept this a secret, for fear of what might be done to me. Though I could contradict all the story of the ghost, I dared not do it. I knew by what had happened that it was he himself who had been in the club-room (perhaps recollecting that it was the night of meeting) but I hope God and the poor gentleman's friends will forgive me, and I shall die contented!"

TABLE TALK.

POSITION OF PREPOSITIONS.

The preposition is generally placed immediately before its object; but it is also not unfrequently placed after it, and even a considerable distance from it; thus, we may either say, "For such conduct I am at a loss to account," or "Such conduct I am at a loss to account for." The practice of separating the preposition from its object is condemned by some critics, but obviously on insufficient grounds. Not only is this practice more accordant than the opposite with the original idiom of our language, as appears from its prevailing more in colloquial discourse, but it is defensible on general principles. The preposition, being expressive of the relation between a verb or a noun as its subject, and a noun or a pronoun as its object, is as closely connected with the former as with the latter by intervening words; as often happens, the speaker or writer is reduced to the alternative either of making the preposition follow its subject, in which case it must be detached from its object, or of making it precede its object, in which case it must be detached from its subject. The choice, in itself arbitrary, can only be determined, in the instance of any particular language, by custom.—Vide 'Campbell's Philosophy of Rhetoric,' book iii, chap. iv, for a full and satisfactory discussion of the point.—McCulloch's Manual of English Grammar.

OXFORD.

Nothing can be more majestic, I had almost said awful, than the aspect of those grey buildings which have thrown their shadow over the last innocent hours of so many lives. The dreary barrenness of asceticism, which might seem to be imaged in the weather-beaten stones, is softened and beautified by the living and joyous freshness of the groves that surround those echoing cloisters. The greatness of many of the men who had here been educated presented itself to me as animating and crowning the city of colleges, before I had become acquainted with the characters of the actual inhabitants.—I dreamed of Hooker, sitting with his book on some shaded knoll in the outskirts of the gardens; and Taylor in some dim library sending abroad the glances of his dark and glowing eyes to plunder from all the world and entombed antiquity, their innermost hoards of wisdom and loveliness. I thought of Sydney and Raleigh, the choice gentlemen of England, here conversing in the gaiety of a boyhood, afterwards so fruitful for both of stately honour. Even then I remembered Vane, perhaps the most profound and vigorous spirit of the most memorable generation, and Locke and Somers, the skilful and temperate, but how far too timorous reformers of our government.—Arthur Coningsby.

INDIAN FESTIVAL OF THE BRACELET.

The Festival of the Bracelet (Rakhi) is in spring, and whatever its origin, it is one of the few when an intercourse of gallantry of the most delicate nature is established between the fair sex and the cavaliers of Rajasthan. Though the bracelet may be sent by maidens, it is only on occasions of urgent necessity, or danger. The Rajpoot dame bestows with the Rakhi the title of adopted brother; and while its acceptance secures to her all the protection of a cavaliere servente, scandal itself never suggests any other tie to his devotion. He may hazard his life in her cause, and yet never receive a smile in reward; for he cannot even see the fair object who, as brother of her adoption, has constituted him her defender. But there is a charm in the mystery of such connexion, never endangered by close observation, and the loyal to the fair may well attach a value to the public recognition of being the Rakhi-bund Bhāe (the Bracelet-bound Brother) of a princess. The intrinsic value of such pledge is never looked to, nor is it requisite it should be costly, though it varies with the means and rank of the donor, and may be of flock silk and spangles, or gold chains and gems. The acceptance of the pledge and its return—by the Katchli, or corslet of simple silk or satin, or gold brocade and pearls. In shape or application there is nothing similar in Europe, and as defending the most delicate part of the structure of the fair, it is peculiarly appropriate as an emblem of devotion. A whole province has often accompanied the Katchli, and the monarch of India was so pleased with the courteous delicacy in the customs of Rajasthan, on receiving the bracelet of the princess Kurueuati, which invested him with the title of her brother, and uncle and protector to her infant Oody Sing, that he pledged himself to her service, "even if her demand were the castle of Rinthumbor." Hem-poon proved himself a true knight, and even abandoned his conquests in Bengal when called on to redeem his pledge, and succour Cheetore, and the widows and minor sons of Sanga Rana.

Many romantic tales are founded on the gift of the Rakhi. The author, who was placed in the enviable situation of being able to do good, and on the most extensive scale, was the means of restoring many of these ancient families from degradation to affluence. The greatest reward he could, and the only one he would receive, was the courteous civility displayed in many of these interesting customs. He was the 'Rakhi-bund Bhāe' of, and received the bracelet from, three queens of Oodipoor, Boondi, and Kotah, besides Chund Bae, the maiden sister of the Rana; as well as many ladies of the chieftains of rank, with whom he interchanged letters. The sole articles of "barbaric pearl and gold" which he conveyed from a country where he was many years supreme, are these testimonies of friendly regard. Intrinsically of no great value, they were presented and accepted in the ancient spirit, and he retains them with a sentiment the more powerful, because he can no longer render them any service.—Tol's Antiquities of Rajasthan.

THE MOTHER-EAGLE AND THE PEASANT-BOY.

A curious instance of the ferocity of the eagle occurred lately at a solitary chalet on a pasture mountain: a peasant boy, eight years of age, was engaged in looking after some cattle, and he was the sole tenant of the cottage, as the Swiss train up their children very early to this occupation. He perceived two young eagles at no great distance, on the ledge of a low rock; tempted by the prize, he drew silently close behind the rock, and suddenly grasping them in his arms, took possession of both birds, in spite of the most determined resistance. He was yet struggling with his prey, when hearing a great noise, he saw, to his no little terror, the two old birds flying rapidly towards him. He ran with all his speed to the chalet, and closed the door just in time to shut out his pursuers. The boy afterward spoke of the terror he suffered during the whole day in his lonely chalet, lest the old eagles should force an entrance; as, being powerful birds, they would soon in their fury have ended his life. They kept up the most frightful cries, and strove with all their might to break down the barriers of the frail chalet, loosely built of single logs, and find some avenue by which to rescue their offspring. But the young peasant kept his prey, well aware of its value—a louis d'or being given by the government of Berne for every eagle killed. As night approached, he saw his pursuers, tired with their useless efforts, leave the chalet, and watched their flight to the lofty, though not distant precipice: and as soon as the darkness had set in, he again grasped the two eagles in his arms, and ran as fast as his legs could carry him down the mountain to the nearest village, often looking back, lest the parent birds should have descried him, and fancying he heard their cries at every interval. He arrived in safety, however, at the hamlet, not a little proud of his prize.—Carné's Letters from Switzerland and Italy, p. 89.

[This is interesting; but we do not exactly see the "ferocity" evinced by the eagle. The gentlest of women would, perhaps, have been equally ferocious in similar circumstances. Indeed there is a fact recorded of a mother who was ferocious enough to pursue an eagle to his nest to recover her infant, stolen by the bird. The most remarkable thing in the story is the courageous perseverance of the boy. One would like to know whether he ventured to shew himself on the spot the next day; and whether the birds repeated their visit to the chalet.]

THE MORALITY OF THE OLD DRAMATISTS.

The insipid levelling morality to which the modern stage is tied down, would not admit of such admirable passions as these scenes are filled with. A puritanical obtuseness of sentiment, a stupid infantile goodness, is creeping among us, instead of the vigorous passions, and virtues clad in flesh and blood, with which the old dramatists present us. Those noble and liberal casuists could discern in the differences, the quarrels, the animosities of man, a beauty and truth of moral feeling, no less than in the iterately inculcated duties of forgiveness and atonement. With us all is hypocritical meekness. A reconciliation scene (let the occasion be never so absurd or unnatural) is always sure of applause. Our audiences come to the theatre to be complimented on their goodness. They compare notes with the amiable characters in the play, and find a wonderful similarity of disposition between them. We have a common stock of dramatic morality, out of which a writer may be supplied without the trouble of copying it from originals within his own breast. To know the boundaries of honour, to be judiciously valiant, to have a temperance which shall beget a smoothness in the angry swellings of youth, to esteem life as nothing when the sacred reputation of a parent is to be defended, yet to shake and tremble under a pious cowardice when that ark of an honest confidence is found to be frail and tottering, to feel the true blows of a real disgrace blunting that sword which the imaginary strokes of a supposed false imputation had put so keen an edge upon but lately: to do, or to imagine this done in a feigned story, asks something more of a moral sense, somewhat a greater delicacy of perception in questions of right and wrong, than goes to the writing of two or three hackneyed sentences about the laws of honour as opposed to the laws of the land, or a common place against duelling. Yet such things would stand a writer now-a-days in far better stead than Captain Ager and his conscientious honour; and he would be considered as a far better teacher of morality than old Rowley or Middleton if they were living.—Lamb's Specimens.

VEGETABLE MARKETS OF DUBLIN, EDINBURGH, LONDON, BRUSSELS, AND GLASGOW.

Improvement is the characteristic of civilized man, and implies progressive advances. Men rest satisfied with what they have, when they know of nothing better; and, therefore, one of the first sources of improvement in the taste of the patrons of gardening, whether of the tradesman who has recourse to the public market, or the private gentleman who is in possession of a garden, is the increase of knowledge. The wealthy tradesmen of Dublin and Edinburgh should look into Covent Garden market in London; and, not to mention fruits, and forced or exotic productions, let them compare the cauliflowers and salading of the three markets. Those who have once acquired a taste for such salads of endive and lettuce as are afforded in the London markets, and still more in those of Brussels, throughout the winter, would not very readily reconcile themselves to the acetarious productions of Dublin and Glasgow during that season.—London's Encyclopædia of Gardening.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH CHEAP COOKERY.

The ignorance of the proper mode of cooking vegetables, and especially of dressing salads, which exists among the middling classes, is another retarding cause. A French labourer, out of a few leaves of dandelion and wild sorrel, which may be gathered by the hedge sides anywhere, and almost at any time, will produce, merely by the aid of the common condiments, what the wives of the greater number of respectable British tradesmen have no idea of. There can be no great demand for a thing, of which the use is not thoroughly understood; and, therefore, an improvement in the knowledge and practice of cooking must take place among a certain class before much can be expected in the quantity, kind, or quality of the gardening articles which they commonly consume.—Ibid.

A Picture of the New Town of Herne Bay; its Beauties, History, and Curiosities in its Vicinity; including some particulars of the Roman town called Reculver. By a Lady. With a Map and many Engravings. John Macrone.—As the season is now approaching, and apparently so auspiciously, when all parties will be rushing to refresh their smoke-dried faculties in the sea, we have much pleasure in expressing our approbation of the little volume whose title is set forth above. It is written in a manner of a higher order than such works can usually boast—although boasting be commonly their forte. According to its showing, Herne Bay is one of the most convenient and pleasant of watering-places; albeit, its portrait in the frontispiece is not particularly attractive, from a want of foliage;—for, alas! oh Kent, thy beauties lie mostly inward, showing but a chalky outside. But it should appear, that in common with the rest of the coast, Herne Bay enjoys an especially wholesome atmosphere; an unusual assemblage of convenience in a place so new; and is virtually in the immediate neighbourhood of town; so well ordered, rapid, and reasonably charged are the modes of conveyance; while the walks round about and inland are both interesting and beautiful. We doubt not that a sight of the "Picture" would send many a visitor to the place; still less do we doubt that every visitor should exchange his half-crown for this really graphic and amusing guide. We shall give an extract or two from it in our next.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are obliged for the suggestion of T.

Also to a COCKNEY AT WIMBLEDON, whose information will be acceptable. The errors which he and other readers notice respecting the girth of the horse's statue at Charing Cross, will be corrected in the SUPPLEMENT.

Thanks to R. S. D.; but there are more difficulties in the point in questions, than readers in general can be aware of.

A letter reached us while addressing this notice to Correspondents, dated June 9th, and speaking of a poem, the writer of which, whose initials are S. C., had just arrived in London. The poem has not yet reached us.

The article on 'Modern Sculpture,' and Mr BARNARD's letter next week.

THE PRINTING MACHINE.

THE UNITED STATES.

Journal of a Residence and Tour in the United States of North America, from April 1833 to October 1834. By E. S. Abdy, Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge. 3 vols. 8vo. London. Murray.

A Twelvemonth's Residence in the West Indies, during the Transition from Slavery to Apprenticeship, with Incidental Notices of the State of Society, Prospects, and Natural Resources, of Jamaica and other Islands. By R. R. Madden, M.D., Author of 'Travels in the East,' &c. 2 vols 8vo. London. Cochrane and Co.

NEGROES, mulattoes, and half-castes, with long dissertations on slavery and its abolition, form the main topic of both these works; and we cannot help thinking, that after the interminable details, both official and private, we have had on these subjects, five additional volumes will be found rather too much for the general reader, and that the patience even of the most earnest philanthropist and abolitionist will tire in the perusal of them. For ourselves, we are rather inclined to take a more serious objection, as it does appear to us, after a sober consideration, that both Mr Abdy and Dr Madden have let their zeal outrun their discretion, and that the causticity of their remarks on the planters, and the sweeping nature of their assertions, are likely to do more harm than good to the coloured population of the Western world. We should also object to the styles in which these works are written; but we cannot say which is the more tedious and oppressive,—the sesquipedalianisms—the pomposity and rumble of Mr Abdy, or the Doctor's perpetual straining at wit and smartness and vivacity. As, however, there is proverbially nothing so dull as the wit of a heavy man, and nothing more deadly-lively than the vivacity of a man of a saturnine temperament, we believe we must give the palm to the Doctor, who reminds us at every step of the obese, phlegmatic German at Paris, qui se faisait vif, &c.

We must say, now that we have had our revanche for the unnecessary tedium we have endured in reading them, that each of the works contains some few things worthy of attention; and we will proceed, according to our usual practice, to give some notion of the contents of the volumes.

Mr Abdy, sparing us the details of his voyage across the Atlantic, lands us at New York, on the 11th of April 1833, whither he went with Mr William Crawford, who was sent out by our Government to inspect the prisons of the United States. After spending some three months in New York, and visiting the prisons, schools, hospitals, and other establishments in or near to that city, he went on by New Haven to Hartford, in Connecticut, whence, in a day or two, he proceeded to the pretty town of Northampton, which he describes as being "an excellent place of residence for a man with a large family and small fortune;—a sort of domestic antithesis too common with us." From Northampton he went to Boston, finding (as he had given negro-slavery a respite) nothing more interesting to tell during a journey of ninety-four miles, than the following jokes, which prove he is no joker.

"I sat on the box most part of the time, and had a good deal of conversation with my companion (the coachman). He was a very pleasant, merry fellow. As he at first objected to admit a third to the honour of sitting by his side, I endeavoured to joke him into good humour, and very soon succeeded by laughing at his fun. When I asked him, for instance, whether he was full inside? he replied with a knowing look:—"I guess I am,—for I have just had a good dinner." We all laughed heartily.—The joke was new to me; and the others were not in a vein to be nice about novelty. Three young men, who were inside, amused themselves by bowing very gravely and with profound respect to the old folks who were sitting at their doors, or looking out at the windows, as we passed; and who were puzzling their brains, long after we were out of sight, in try-

As he tells it so particularly, we suppose this joke also was new to him, though we can hardly understand how it should be so, considering its hoary antiquity in England, and seeing that Mr Abdy is a Cambridge man. When we were young people the fun of the thing used generally to be increased by those who made the salutations crying out at the same time, "Your friend, Mrs Smith, at London, is quite well, and sends her love!" We have sometimes seen a whole village powerfully excited in this manner, but your towns'-folk were mostly up to the trick. During his very short stay at Boston, he visited, among other places, the Père-la-Chaise, or new Cemetery, which is in possession of the "Horticultural Society," and is much visited by pleasure-parties. And here he lets us into the secret that body-snatchers are as common in America as they used to be in England, a "good subject" being worth as much as 100 dollars. From Boston, Mr Abdy went to Providence, in Rhode Island; from Providence back to Hartford, where he introduces an interesting account of the Asylum and schools for the deaf and dumb; and then went on rather hastily by Albany, Saratoga, Utica, Auburn, Geneseo, and Buffalo to the falls of Niagara and Canada. The following fact ought to claim the attention of the tariff-makers and anti-free-trade-men in the States:—

"As there is but a very small duty in Canada on English manufactures, clothing is cheaper there by one-third, if not by one-half, than it is in the United States. It is a common thing for the citizens of the latter, who reside near the frontier, to cross it for the purpose of purchasing whatever they can take back with them as articles of personal consumption. I was told at New York of a person going into Canada to furnish his winter wardrobe, and finding on his return to that city, that the difference of prices between the two countries just covered his travelling expenses going and returning."

We suspect, however, this is almost the only advantage enjoyed by the people of Canada over those of the States. Otherwise, why should a stream of migration flow so constantly from the former into the latter, or why should disappointed British emigrants to Canada so generally "clear out" (as they call it) for the United States? We have been informed that most of our mechanics who went to Montreal in the spring of last year have already left it for the more thriving territory of the republic. There is, indeed, another advantage of a moral character—no slavery is allowed in British Canada, and the absurd prejudices against African blood are much less violent there than across the republican frontier. But little or nothing is seen of slavery in the northern States of the Union, where our emigrants settle themselves; and as for the red men—the native Indians, we are afraid they are the same irreclaimable race everywhere, and that civilization has done just as little for them in Canada as in the States.

After a very short trip in Canada, Mr Abdy returned to New York, where he made himself acquainted with the forms and ceremonies of an American election, with the vote by ballot, and other important political matters. In reference to the ballot he says:—

"We visited at least a dozen of the polling booths; and I found at every one the same sentiment in favour of the ballot—a mode of voting very general, if not universal, throughout the middle and eastern States. . . . This way of exercising the elective franchise is considered a very simple thing. No one thinks it more unmanly to vote in secrecy than to be shut up in a jury-room; or that open voting would add to his consequence what it would take from his independence. There must have been a time when the ballot was un-American, as it was not long ago un-French, and as it is still un-English; but that was no more admitted as a valid objection to its adoption in either country, than an opposite epithet would save it from abolition, if it proved injurious. John Bull is more easily duped. He votes uniformly with his landlord:—but then he votes like a man, openly and fearlessly. He is not allowed to have an opinion: but then he has a voice; and while he bawls out for the squire, he may boast that he does not sneak, like a Yankee or a Frenchman, to the ballot-box."

On the 4th of April, 1834, after passing the winter there, Mr Abdy left New York and travelled to Philadelphia and Baltimore, and then on to Washington, where he gives an unfavourable, and we think a strongly prejudiced, portrait of President Jackson. After staying twenty days at Washington he proceeded to Virginia and the Southern Slave States, and then, indeed, his strictures on slave-holders are poured forth with an absolute furor of thought and language. But from his first arrival in America Mr Abdy makes himself the knight-errant of all men, women, and children, with black skins: he gives himself up to the pursuit of oppressed negroes, freed negroes, and half-castes; he asks every one of them he chances to meet for his story: and, strange to say, there is not one of them in the predicament of Mr Canning's knife-grinder who had no story to tell; but on the contrary, every mother's son and daughter among them has a long narrative, fit to make one's hair stand on end, about the craft and cruelty, the torments and oppression, which he or she and all of them have suffered at the white men's hands. According to this showing, the white men in America are a set of ignorant brutes and monsters, and most of the talent and all the virtues and the sweet charities of humanity, are monopolized by the negroes. But unfortunately for Mr Abdy's consistency, he draws, in other parts of his work, such a character of the American people as renders the large amount of his negro narratives altogether incredible—inasmuch as it seems impossible that such general atrocities as he describes, could be perpetrated by, or in the midst of, such a people. Oliver Goldsmith, in one of his essays, speaks of persons whose compassion could be moved by nothing less than a wooden leg, a maimed arm, or a case of total blindness, in the petitioner; but Mr Abdy's charity is awakened by a dark skin, and by nothing else—a fair complexion stands no chance with him, nor does he, in the whole course of the three volumes, ever kindle into benevolence, unless it be for an African or the dependant of an African. We might let this peculiarity of humour pass, were it not for the rather important fact, that his charity for the blacks is, in numerous instances, uncharitableness and downright malice to the whites. If the negroes have been treated in the horrible manner related, how is it that they have such large families, and have increased so prodigiously? For, according to Mr Abdy, they are far more numerous than the whites in the Southern States; and the ratio of their increase and multiplication is such, that at no very distant time they must swallow up all other classes, and become the lords of the soil.

The whole system of negro-slavery is bad; and the power that a planter has over a slave is a power that no man ought to have over a fellow being, let his colour or his intellect be what it may; and where such a power exists there must be occasional acts of cruelty and oppression. But Mr Abdy complains of the manner in which the white Americans treat the emancipated and free people of colour, even more bitterly than he complains of their harshness towards their slaves, and nothing less will satisfy him than intermarriage and a thorough social and political intermingling of blacks with whites;—and this, in spite of the slowly changing nature of human prejudices and antipathies, ought, according to him, to be effected immediately! He is in a paroxysm of rage when an American citizen dares to intimate that the good blood they brought from Britain would scarcely be improved by mixing it with the blood of the negroes from Africa. But, to be entitled to talk as he does on these matters, Mr Abdy, (and such proceedings would be less obnoxious to English than to American society), ought to marry a negress and affiancé his sister to a negro,—he ought (supposing he have the power) to put a negro in the parish pulpit, a negro on the bench of magistrates, and a negro at the head of the district school; and then he would show, in his own person, that he had overcome a few of those "narrow prejudices" for the entertaining of which he anathematizes our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic.

We cannot go at length into these great and most difficult matters; but it must be evident to every cool, considerate man, that no good progress is to be made in them by hasty, sudden measures, by invective, violence, and reproach, or by dealing "damnation round the land," and imprecating the vengeance of the Almighty on the Americans in the fashion of Mr Abdy. Should these volumes ever find their way to America they will exasperate both parties; and, though the author may not have so intended it, they are calculated to encourage the coloured population to an immediate recourse to arms.

From his own admission, or rather boasting, (for he boasts of his own rudeness and want of tact and good humour), Mr Abdy could never keep his temper with any white American who differed with him in opinion about the blacks.

He made a journey of thirty miles or more to discuss the subject with the celebrated orator and unitarian preacher, Dr Channing, who received him kindly, and attentively listened to his representations and arguments, which occupied nearly all the time of the visit, but did not convince the philanthropic Doctor that any other than a gradual change was practicable, or that the immediate amalgamation of the blacks with the whites was either possible or desirable. On this Mr Abdy refused to partake of the refreshments which were politely offered him; and quitting the house in high dudgeon, he set down Doctor Channing as a cold-blooded, reserved man, (he had scarcely allowed him time to speak) as a mere declaimer in print, and no philanthropist at all.

From Virginia Mr Abdy went through Kentucky, &c., to New Orleans, whence he repaired to Cincinnati, where Mrs Trollope built an unsuccessful bazaar; and from Cincinnati he found his way back to Philadelphia, where he takes occasion to describe the magnificent water-works that Captain Hamilton disdained to cast his lordly eyes upon.

Mr Abdy afterwards went again to Boston, and then back to New York, which last beautiful city he left in October, 1834, for Britain, having indisputably seen a great deal of the United States. Although the sense is occasionally obscured by a multiplicity of words and unnecessary dissertations, we can recommend to notice his remarks on American schools, prisons, and penitentiaries. In describing a school at Boston, where the processes for moral tuition are precisely the same as those adopted by Messrs Hill, at Hazelwood and Bruce Castle, he says that Mr Welles (the Bostonian master) knew nothing of their system, and had never even heard the name of Messrs Hill. It may be so, but it appears rather difficult to believe that this should be the fact, as the outlines of Messrs Hill's system have long been printed and before the world, and the Americans have shown a laudable industry in collecting all such things. We thought of giving some extracts to justify what we have said touching Mr Abdy's mouthy style, but the following brief specimen, which may be called "how to describe a drunken Irishman," will do.

The journeymen carpenters of New York had "turned out" for an increase of wages, but though they were committing a great deal of folly, they were sober and respectable in their appearance. Now for Mr Abdy's Irishman!

"Not far off, as if in contrast, lay an Irish labourer, contented with his wages and his whiskey, prostrate like his unfortunate country, and surrounded by commiserating friends;—not that it was not his own will and deed that had brought him down, or that those who were so busy about him, were either accessory to his debasement, or interested in its continuance."

We now come to Dr Madden.

"In October, 1833," to use the Doctor's own words, "six gentlemen, holding special appointments as stipendiary magistrates, were sent out to Jamaica—I was one of that number. We had nine months' observation of the state of the country, and experience as general magistrates, to prepare us for our new duties."

These duties appear to have been to administer the laws on the plantations and elsewhere, and to see justice done between the planters and whites generally, and the negroes who, on the 1st of August 1834, passed from the condition of slavery to that of apprenticeship, it being provided by our legislature that by the year 1840 they should be wholly free, and allowed to dispose of their labour as they may think proper.

Touching at Barbadoes, St Vincent's, and Grenada, the Doctor arrived safely at Jamaica towards the end of November 1833, and there he remained until the end of November 1834, when, in consequence of quarrels with the mayor and municipality of Kingston, and of what he calls an organized opposition to the new laws in favour of the slaves, he threw up his place in disgust and quitted the island. The Doctor says very confidently that the British government ought to have voted an additional five millions as compensation—that the slaves ought to have been made free at once, without going through the transition state of apprenticeship—that the tranquillity that now exists in Jamaica is of a very precarious sort, and that the plan adopted by our ministers after the maturest deliberation will not and cannot succeed. But, with all consideration, and not to speak to the other points, we think the Doctor's opinion on this head is not worth the squeezing of a single sugar-cane, for he did not allow himself time to watch the gradual workings of this plan. The system did not come into active operation until August 1834, and in little more than three months after the Doctor had abandoned his post and was on his way back to England. One thing is certainly clear enough, i. e., that to secure the success of the system, government must employ "special stipendiary magistrates" with more temper, patience, and steadiness of purpose than the Doctor possesses. But we repeat, that as to the speculation whether the system will succeed or fail, the opinion of Doctor Madden is of an infinitely small value. The subject is one of vital consequence—many weighty considerations ought to have prevented his hazarding a rash, premature opinion; but, unfortunately, disappointed men are seldom very chary of their condemnation.

In the beginning of our article we complained of the Doctor's constant straining at wit and liveliness. The first, which is about the best specimen we can find, may do very well for the fore-castle of a West-Indian, and were it but put into a comic song, it might possibly suit the "Coal-hole" or the "Cyder Cellar," but we confess that on the important "First of August"—at the opening day of a great experiment, we should have expected something more serious from an M.D. and a "special magistrate."

"The 1st of August passed over without the slightest disorder. I did not see a single drunken negro, nor any great appearance of exultation, except that which, in the subdued form of grateful piety, I witnessed in the churches.

"In fact, for a great festival, it was as quiet a day as can be well imagined. The only symptom I saw of turbulent joy was on the part of some negro urchins, who were throwing stones at a drunken sailor, and who, whenever poor Jack made a reel after them, scampered away, shouting most lustily to each other, 'What for you run away? we all free now! buckra can't catch we! hurra for fuss of August! hi, hi, fuss of August! hurra for fuss of August!' Then the young élite of the liberated blacks would courageously wheel round and give poor Jack another volley of pebbles, and cut all manner of ridiculous capers before him. This was the only emanation of the great spirit that had just walked abroad, that I happened to get a glimpse of.

"There was a large dinner, however, of negroes and of free-coloured people in Kingston, at which there was no dearth of negro eloquence after the removal of the cloth.

On the whole, there never was such a twinkling of black feet in Jamaica as the night of the 1st of August in Montego Bay: it seemed as if the Abolition Bill had made the limbs of the dark-complexioned ladies and gentlemen as lively as their hearts; and there was no end to the pleasure and perspiration of the evening, till the head of the gombah was fairly beaten in, and the last string of the bonjoo was scraped to pieces."

CHARLES LAMB AND THE OLD DRAMATISTS.

Specimens of English Dramatic Poets. With Notes by Charles Lamb. A new Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. Pp. 379 and 385. London. Moxon. 1835.

WHAT an extraordinary, what a noble book is this! A selection of some of the most wonderful passages of human writ, illustrated by a commentary altogether worthy of such a text, like precious jewellery set in hardly less precious and beautiful gold. Never was there a happier choice even of a labour of love. It was a work which Charles Lamb was born and predestined to perform. He and the Old Dramatists, as we say of married persons happy with each other, were made to come together. If he had never lived, they would, for aught that can be called wide and enduring fame, have written in vain; if they had never written, his fine genius would have wanted its most congenial theme and most potent excitement. It would have been as if Nature had been spread out, all varied, rich, and magnificent as it is, and there had been no human mind to look upon and appreciate it;—or as if Art had existed, with its capacities of admiration, and its powers of imitating, of transforming, and even of ennobling what it admires, without that Nature which is at once its material and its inspiration.

Upon the minds of most of those who peruse them for the first time, these volumes will come like a revelation, like the uncovering of a new world. With Shakspeare we all become familiar so early, and so gradually, that although he is the most wonderful of all writers, the emotion of mere wonder is yet not perhaps one which in ordinary circumstances he excites so strongly as some other writers. And it is better that it should be so. It is better that the divine beauty and passion of his poetry should have become as it were part of our being, by having been the daily food of the heart and the imagination from their first awakening to a sense of the beautiful, and indeed by having themselves largely helped to awaken that sense as well as to expand and refine it, than that we should lose this good, which is a possession for life, for the sake of having once experience of being more strongly startled and amazed. But these selections from the dramas of the contemporaries of Shakspeare are not likely to come into the hands of readers in general, until a comparatively late period, and they therefore, as we have observed, will, along with other feelings, excite the sensation of astonishment in all its freshness and force. It is like visiting for the first time a foreign country, where whatever is beautiful or splendid is also novel and strange, and thus has in one respect an advantage for the purpose of immediate impressiveness over the familiar face of our native land, although it will hardly, even after the longest acquaintance, sink into the heart as that does. For, all that is really our being is born within us in our earliest years; no seed draws out the whole nourishment and strength of the soil that is not sown there, and watered by the heart's first affections, and quickened by that celestial light which never comes again.

In themselves, however, and without reference to the consideration we have just mentioned, the present writers, presented at least as they are here, in their most striking passages, are perhaps better fitted than Shakspeare to fill the mind with surprise on a first perusal, even were he and they to be read in the same circumstances. His magnificence is

THE PRINTING MACHINE.

THE UNITED STATES.

Journal of a Residence and Tour in the United States of North America, from April 1833 to October 1834.

By E. S. Abdy, Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge. 3 vols. 8vo. London. Murray.

A Twelvemonth's Residence in the West Indies, during the Transition from Slavery to Apprenticeship, with Incidental Notices of the State of Society, Prospects, and Natural Resources, of Jamaica and other Islands. By R. R. Madden, M.D., Author of 'Travels in the East,' &c. 2 vols 8vo. London. Cochrane and Co.

NEGROES, mulattoes, and half-castes, with long dissertations on slavery and its abolition, form the main topic of both these works; and we cannot help thinking, that after the interminable details, both official and private, we have had on these subjects, five additional volumes will be found rather too much for the general reader, and that the patience even of the most earnest philanthropist and abolitionist will tire in the perusal of them. For ourselves, we are rather inclined to take a more serious objection, as it does appear to us, after a sober consideration, that both Mr Abdy and Dr Madden have let their zeal outrun their discretion, and that the causticity of their remarks on the planters, and the sweeping nature of their assertions, are likely to do more harm than good to the coloured population of the Western world. We should also object to the styles in which these works are written; but we cannot say which is the more tedious and oppressive,—the sesquipedalianisms—the pomposity and rumble of Mr Abdy, or the Doctor's perpetual straining at wit and smartness and vivacity. As, however, there is proverbially nothing so dull as the wit of a heavy man, and nothing more deadly-lively than the vivacity of a man of a saturnine temperament, we believe we must give the palm to the Doctor, who reminds us at every step of the obese, phlegmatic German at Paris, qui se faisait vite, &c.

We must say, now that we have had our revanche for the unnecessary tedium we have endured in reading them, that each of the works contains some few things worthy of attention; and we will proceed, according to our usual practice, to give some notion of the contents of the volumes.

Mr Abdy, sparing us the details of his voyage across the Atlantic, lands us at New York, on the 11th of April 1833, whither he went with Mr William Crawford, who was sent out by our Government to inspect the prisons of the United States. After spending some three months in New York, and visiting the prisons, schools, hospitals, and other establishments in or near to that city, he went on by New Haven to Hartford, in Connecticut, whence, in a day or two, he proceeded to the pretty town of Northampton, which he describes as being "an excellent place of residence for a man with a large family and small fortune;—a sort of domestic antithesis too common with us." From Northampton he went to Boston, finding (as he had given negro-slavery a respite) nothing more interesting to tell during a journey of ninety-four miles, than the following jokes, which prove he is no joker.

"I sat on the box most part of the time, and had a good deal of conversation with my companion (the coachman). He was a very pleasant, merry fellow. As he at first objected to admit a third to the honour of sitting by his side, I endeavoured to joke him into good humour, and very soon succeeded by laughing at his fun. When I asked him, for instance, whether he was full inside? he replied with a knowing look:—"I guess I am,—for I have just had a good dinner." We all laughed heartily.—The joke was new to me; and the others were not in a vein to be nice about novelty. Three young men, who were inside, amused themselves by bowing very gravely and with profound respect to the old folks who were sitting at their doors, or looking out at the windows, as we passed; and who were puzzling their brains, long after we were out of sight, in try-

As he tells it so particularly, we suppose this joke also was new to him, though we can hardly understand how it should be so, considering its hoary antiquity in England, and seeing that Mr Abdy is a Cambridge man. When we were young people the fun of the thing used generally to be increased by those who made the salutations crying out at the same time, "Your friend, Mrs Smith, at London, is quite well, and sends her love!" We have sometimes seen a whole village powerfully excited in this manner, but your towns'-folk were mostly up to the trick. During his very short stay at Boston, he visited, among other places, the Père-la-Chaise, or new Cemetery, which is in possession of the "Horticultural Society," and is much visited by pleasure-parties. And here he lets us into the secret that body-snatchers are as common in America as they used to be in England, a "good subject" being worth as much as 100 dollars. From Boston, Mr Abdy went to Providence, in Rhode Island; from Providence back to Hartford, where he introduces an interesting account of the Asylum and schools for the deaf and dumb; and then went on rather hastily by Albany, Saratoga, Utica, Auburn, Geneseo, and Buffalo to the falls of Niagara and Canada. The following fact ought to claim the attention of the tariff-makers and anti-free-trade-men in the States:—

"As there is but a very small duty in Canada on English manufactures, clothing is cheaper there by one-third, if not by one-half, than it is in the United States. It is a common thing for the citizens of the latter, who reside near the frontier, to cross it for the purpose of purchasing whatever they can take back with them as articles of personal consumption. I was told at New York of a person going into Canada to furnish his winter wardrobe, and finding on his return to that city, that the difference of prices between the two countries just covered his travelling expenses going and returning."

We suspect, however, this is almost the only advantage enjoyed by the people of Canada over those of the States. Otherwise, why should a stream of migration flow so constantly from the former into the latter, or why should disappointed British emigrants to Canada so generally "clear out" (as they call it) for the United States? We have been informed that most of our mechanics who went to Montreal in the spring of last year have already left it for the more thriving territory of the republic. There is, indeed, another advantage of a moral character—no slavery is allowed in British Canada, and the absurd prejudices against African blood are much less violent there than across the republican frontier. But little or nothing is seen of slavery in the northern States of the Union, where our emigrants settle themselves; and as for the red men—the native Indians, we are afraid they are the same irrelaisable race everywhere, and that civilization has done just as little for them in Canada as in the States.

After a very short trip in Canada, Mr Abdy returned to New York, where he made himself acquainted with the forms and ceremonies of an American election, with the vote by ballot, and other important political matters. In reference to the ballot he says:—

"We visited at least a dozen of the polling booths; and I found at every one the same sentiment in favour of the ballot—a mode of voting very general, if not universal, throughout the middle and eastern States. * * * This way of exercising the elective franchise is considered a very simple thing. No one thinks it more unmanly to vote in secrecy than to be shut up in a jury-room; or that open voting would add to his consequence what it would take from his independence. There must have been a time when the ballot was un-American, as it was not long ago un-French, and as it is still un-English; but that was no more admitted as a valid objection to its adoption in either country, than an opposite epithet would save it from abolition, if it proved injurious. John Bull is more easily duped. He votes uniformly with his landlord:—but then he votes like a man, openly and fearlessly. He is not allowed to have an opinion: but then he has a voice; and while he bawls out for the squire, he may boast that he does not sneak, like a Yankee or a Frenchman, to the ballot-box."

On the 4th of April, 1834, after passing the winter there, Mr Abdy left New York and travelled to Philadelphia and Baltimore, and then on to Washington, where he gives an unfavourable, and we think a strongly prejudiced, portrait of President Jackson. After staying twenty days at Washington he proceeded to Virginia and the Southern Slave States, and then, indeed, his strictures on slave-holders are poured forth with an absolute furor of thought and language. But from his first arrival in America Mr Abdy makes himself the knight-errant of all men, women, and children, with black skins: he gives himself up to the pursuit of oppressed negroes, freed negroes, and half-castes; he asks every one of them he chances to meet for his story: and, strange to say, there is not one of them in the predicament of Mr Canning's knife-grinder who had no story to tell; but on the contrary, every mother's son and daughter among them has a long narrative, fit to make one's hair stand on end, about the craft and cruelty, the torments and oppression, which he or she and all of them have suffered at the white men's hands. According to this showing, the white men in America are a set of ignorant brutes and monsters, and most of the talent and all the virtues and the sweet charities of humanity, are monopolized by the negroes. But unfortunately for Mr Abdy's consistency, he draws, in other parts of his work, such a character of the American people as renders the large amount of his negro narratives altogether incredible—inasmuch as it seems impossible that such general atrocities as he describes, could be perpetrated by, or in the midst of, such a people. Oliver Goldsmith, in one of his essays, speaks of persons whose compassion could be moved by nothing less than a wooden leg, a maimed arm, or a case of total blindness, in the petitioner; but Mr Abdy's charity is awakened by a dark skin, and by nothing else—a fair complexion stands no chance with him, nor does he, in the whole course of the three volumes, ever kindle into benevolence, unless it be for an African or the dependant of an African. We might let this peculiarity of humour pass, were it not for the rather important fact, that his charity for the blacks is, in numerous instances, uncharitableness and downright malice to the whites. If the negroes have been treated in the horrible manner related, how is it that they have such large families, and have increased so prodigiously? For, according to Mr Abdy, they are far more numerous than the whites in the Southern States; and the ratio of their increase and multiplication is such, that at no very distant time they must swallow up all other classes, and become the lords of the soil.

The whole system of negro-slavery is bad; and the power that a planter has over a slave is a power that no man ought to have over a fellow being, let his colour or his intellect be what it may; and where such a power exists there must be occasional acts of cruelty and oppression. But Mr Abdy complains of the manner in which the white Americans treat the emancipated and free people of colour, even more bitterly than he complains of their harshness towards their slaves, and nothing less will satisfy him than intermarriage and a thorough social and political intermingling of blacks with whites;—and this, in spite of the slowly changing nature of human prejudices and antipathies, ought, according to him, to be effected immediately! He is in a paroxysm of rage when an American citizen dares to intimate that the good blood they brought from Britain would scarcely be improved by mixing it with the blood of the negroes from Africa. But, to be entitled to talk as he does on these matters, Mr Abdy, (and such proceedings would be less obnoxious to English than to American society), ought to marry a negress and affianc his sister to a negro,—he ought (supposing he have the power) to put a negro in the parish pulpit, a negro on the bench of magistrates, and a negro at the head of the district school; and then he would show, in his own person, that he had overcome a few of those “narrow prejudices” for the entertaining of which he anathematizes our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic.

We cannot go at length into these great and most difficult matters; but it must be evident to every cool, considerate man, that no good progress is to be made in them by hasty, sudden measures, by invective, violence, and reproach, or by dealing “damnation round the land,” and imprecating the vengeance of the Almighty on the Americans in the fashion of Mr Abdy. Should these volumes ever find their way to America they will exasperate both parties; and, though the author may not have so intended it, they are calculated to encourage the coloured population to an immediate recourse to arms.

From his own admission, or rather boasting, (for he boasts of his own rudeness and want of tact and good humour), Mr Abdy could never keep his temper with any white American who differed with him in opinion about the blacks.

He made a journey of thirty miles or more to discuss the subject with the celebrated orator and unitarian preacher, Dr Channing, who received him kindly, and attentively listened to his representations and arguments, which occupied nearly all the time of the visit, but did not convince the philanthropic Doctor that any other than a gradual change was practicable, or that the immediate amalgamation of the blacks with the whites was either possible or desirable. On this Mr Abdy refused to partake of the refreshments which were politely offered him; and quitting the house in high dudgeon, he set down Doctor Channing as a cold-blooded, reserved man, (he had scarcely allowed him time to speak) as a mere declaimer in print, and no philanthropist at all.

From Virginia Mr Abdy went through Kentucky, &c., to New Orleans, whence he repaired to Cincinnati, where Mrs Trollope built an unsuccessful bazaar; and from Cincinnati he found his way back to Philadelphia, where he takes occasion to describe the magnificent water-works that Captain Hamilton disdained to cast his lordly eyes upon.

Mr Abdy afterwards went again to Boston, and then back to New York, which last beautiful city he left in October, 1834, for Britain, having indisputably seen a great deal of the United States. Although the sense is occasionally obscured by a multiplicity of words and unnecessary dissertations, we can recommend to notice his remarks on American schools, prisons, and penitentiaries. In describing a school at Boston, where the processes for moral tuition are precisely the same as those adopted by Messrs Hill, at Hazelwood and Bruce Castle, he says that Mr Welles (the Bostonian master) knew nothing of their system, and had never even heard the name of Messrs Hill. It may be so, but it appears rather difficult to believe that this should be the fact, as the outlines of Messrs Hill's system have long been printed and before the world, and the Americans have shown a laudable industry in collecting all such things. We thought of giving some extracts to justify what we have said touching Mr Abdy's mouthy style, but the following brief specimen, which may be called “how to describe a drunken Irishman,” will do.

The journeymen carpenters of New York had “turned out” for an increase of wages, but though they were committing a great deal of folly, they were sober and respectable in their appearance. Now for Mr Abdy's Irishman!

“Not far off, as if in contrast, lay an Irish labourer, contented with his wages and his whiskey, prostrate like his unfortunate country, and surrounded by commiserating friends;—not that it was not his own will and deed that had brought him down, or that those who were so busy about him, were either accessory to his debasement, or interested in its continuance.”

We now come to Dr Madden.

“In October, 1833,” to use the Doctor's own words, “six gentlemen, holding special appointments

as stipendiary magistrates, were sent out to Jamaica—I was one of that number. We had nine months' observation of the state of the country, and experience as general magistrates, to prepare us for our new duties.”

These duties appear to have been to administer the laws on the plantations and elsewhere, and to see justice done between the planters and whites generally, and the negroes who, on the 1st of August 1834, passed from the condition of slavery to that of apprenticeship, it being provided by our legislature that by the year 1840 they should be wholly free, and allowed to dispose of their labour as they may think proper.

Touching at Barbadoes, St Vincent's, and Grenada, the Doctor arrived safely at Jamaica towards the end of November 1833, and there he remained until the end of November 1834, when, in consequence of quarrels with the mayor and municipality of Kingston, and of what he calls an organized opposition to the new laws in favour of the slaves, he threw up his place in disgust and quitted the island. The Doctor says very confidently that the British government ought to have voted an additional five millions as compensation—that the slaves ought to have been made free at once, without going through the transition state of apprenticeship—that the tranquillity that now exists in Jamaica is of a very precarious sort, and that the plan adopted by our ministers after the maturest deliberation will not and cannot succeed. But, with all consideration, and not to speak to the other points, we think the Doctor's opinion on this head is not worth the squeezing of a single sugar-cane, for he did not allow himself time to watch the gradual workings of this plan. The system did not come into active operation until August 1834, and in little more than three months after the Doctor had abandoned his post and was on his way back to England. One thing is certainly clear enough, i. e., that to secure the success of the system, government must employ “special stipendiary magistrates” with more temper, patience, and steadiness of purpose than the Doctor possesses. But we repeat, that as to the speculation whether the system will succeed or fail, the opinion of Doctor Madden is of an infinitely small value. The subject is one of vital consequence—many weighty considerations ought to have prevented his hazarding a rash, premature opinion; but, unfortunately, disappointed men are seldom very chary of their condemnation.

In the beginning of our article we complained of the Doctor's constant straining at wit and liveliness. The first, which is about the best specimen we can find, may do very well for the fore-castle of a West-Indiaman, and were it but put into a comic song, it might possibly suit the “Coal-hole” or the “Cyder Cellar,” but we confess that on the important “First of August”—at the opening day of a great experiment, we should have expected something more serious from an M.D. and a “special magistrate.”

“The 1st of August passed over without the slightest disorder. I did not see a single drunken negro, nor any great appearance of exultation, except that which, in the subdued form of grateful piety, I witnessed in the churches.

“In fact, for a great festival, it was as quiet a day as can be well imagined. The only symptom I saw of turbulent joy was on the part of some negro urchins, who were throwing stones at a drunken sailor, and who, whenever poor Jack made a reel after them, scampered away, shouting most lustily to each other, ‘What for you run away? we all free now! buckra can't catch you! hurra for fuss of August! hi, hi, fuss of August! hurra for fuss of August!’ Then the young élite of the liberated blacks would courageously wheel round and give poor Jack another volley of pebbles, and cut all manner of ridiculous capers before him. This was the only emanation of the great spirit that had just walked abroad, that I happened to get a glimpse of.

“There was a large dinner, however, of negroes and of free-coloured people in Kingston, at which there was no dearth of negro eloquence after the removal of the cloth.

“But on the north side of the island the sable exclusives got up some dignity balls on an extensive scale, to one of which the lady patronesses invited Sir Ames Norcott and the officers of his staff; and the worthy general, who has no need of brightness for the maintenance of that respect which his character commands, I am told attended one of the Almack's that is really in the west.

CHARLES LAMB AND THE OLD DRAMATISTS.

Specimens of English Dramatic Poets. With Notes by Charles Lamb. A new Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. Pp. 379 and 385. London. Moxon. 1835.

WHAT an extraordinary, what a noble book is this! A selection of some of the most wonderful passages of human writ, illustrated by a commentary altogether worthy of such a text, like precious jewellery set in hardly less precious and beautiful gold. Never was there a happier choice even of a labour of love. It was a work which Charles Lamb was born and predestined to perform. He and the Old Dramatists, as we say of married persons happy with each other, were made to come together. If he had never lived, they would, for aught that can be called wide and enduring fame, have written in vain; if they had never written, his fine genius would have wanted its most congenial theme and most potent excitement. It would have been as if Nature had been spread out, all varied, rich, and magnificent as it is, and there had been no human mind to look upon and appreciate it;—or as if Art had existed, with its capacities of admiration, and its powers of imitating, of transforming, and even of ennobling what it admires, without that Nature which is at once its material and its inspiration.

Upon the minds of most of those who peruse them for the first time, these volumes will come like a revelation, like the uncovering of a new world. With Shakspeare we all become familiar so early, and so gradually, that although he is the most wonderful of all writers, the emotion of mere wonder is yet not perhaps one which in ordinary circumstances he excites so strongly as some other writers. And it is better that it should be so. It is better that the divine beauty and passion of his poetry should have become as it were part of our being, by having been the daily food of the heart and the imagination from their first awakening to a sense of the beautiful, and indeed by having themselves largely helped to awaken that sense as well as to expand and refine it, than that we should lose this good, which is a possession for life, for the sake of having once experience of being more strongly startled and amazed. But these selections from the dramas of the contemporaries of Shakspeare are not likely to come into the hands of readers in general, until a comparatively late period, and they therefore, as we have observed, will, along with other feelings, excite the sensation of astonishment in all its freshness and force. It is like visiting for the first time a foreign country, where whatever is beautiful or splendid is also novel and strange, and thus has in one respect an advantage for the purpose of immediate impressiveness over the familiar face of our native land, although it will hardly, even after the longest acquaintance, sink into the heart as that does. For, all that is really our being is born within us in our earliest years; no seed draws out the whole nourishment and strength of the soil that is not sown there, and watered by the heart's first affections, and quickened by that celestial light which never comes again.

In themselves, however, and without reference to the consideration we have just mentioned, the present writers, presented at least as they are here, in their most striking passages, are perhaps better fitted than Shakspeare to fill the mind with surprise on a first perusal, even were he and they to be read in the same circumstances. His magnificence is most frequently of a kind that does not begin by dazzling us, but overpowers and masters us before we are aware of its presence; as in the case of the great influences of external nature, by which we are always surrounded, we feel the effect, but see not and think not of the cause. The one follows the other so immediately and so certainly, that we do not distinguish the power working on us from the feeling wrought in us. The simplicity and purity of his art, its natural and unexaggerated character, are adverse to the employment of those means in general by which what are called striking effects are produced. The contrast between Shakespeare and even the greatest of his contemporaries in this respect is remarkably perceptible in the different and almost opposite characters of the plots and situations in his plays and in theirs. With all the grand poetry he has given us, how little a way has he gone for it out of the track of common life! Not so with the masters of strong feeling and strong expression whom we have now before us. They have availed themselves to the utmost of all the possibilities of human fortune—of all the extraordinary positions in which a daring invention could conceive human beings to be placed, in acting or suffering. The following, for example, are a few of the singular situations out of which they have formed their scenes. In the Spanish tragedy, by Thomas Ryd, "Horatio, the son of Hieronimo, is murdered while he is sitting with his mistress Belimperia by night in an arbour in his father's garden. The murderers (Balthazar, his rival, and Lorenzo, the brother of Belimperia,) hang his body on a tree. Hieronimo is awakened by the cries of Belimperia, and coming out into his garden, discovers by the light of a torch, that the murdered man is his son. Upon this, he goes distracted." In "The Insatiate Countess," by John Marston, "Isabella (the Countess) after a long series of crimes of infidelity to her husband and of murder, is brought to suffer on a scaffold. Roberto, her husband, arrives to take a last leave of her." In Heywood's "English Traveller," "Young Geraldine comes home from his travels, and finds his play-fellow, that should have been his wife, married to old Wincott. The old gentleman receives him hospitably, as a friend of his father's, takes delight to hear him tell of his travels, and treats him in all respects as a second father, his house being always open to him. Young Geraldine and the wife agree not to wrong the old gentleman." In Rowley's "New Wonder, a Woman never Vexed," "The woman never vexed states her case to a divine," which turns out to be as follows:—

"How think you, then, is not this a Wonder,
That a woman lives full seven and thirty years,
Maid to a wife, and wife unto a widow,
Now widow'd, and mine own, yet all this while,
From the extremest verge of my remembrance,
Even from my weaning hour unto this minute,
Did never taste what was calamity.
I know not yet what grief is, yet have sought
A hundred ways for his acquaintance: with me
Prosperity hath kept so close a watch,
That even those things that I have meant a cross,
Have that way turned a blessing. Is it not strange?"

In Ford's "Love's Sacrifice," "Biancha, wife to Caraffa, Duke of Pavia, loves and is loved by Fernando, the Duke's favourite. She long resists his importunate suit; at length she enters the room where he is sleeping, and awakens him to hear her confession of her love for him." And many others of the same kind might be quoted.

It must be admitted that extraordinary as such situations are, the conception of many of them displays great powers of imagination, and that of the true dramatic kind. Nobly, also, in many instances—in almost all indeed that are here selected—have the subjects been treated. These scenes are full both of nature and of poetry—of nature living, free, and delicate; of poetry always stirring, and often glowing and beautiful in the highest degree. But our readers will be better pleased with one of the scenes themselves than with our criticism. It is difficult to choose, but we may take the following from Rowley's "New Wonder," as being of a convenient length:—

Foster, a wealthy Merchant, has a profligate Brother, Stephen, whom Robert, Son to Foster, relieves out of Prison with some of his Father's money entrusted to him. For this, his Father turns him out of doors, and disinherits him. Meantime, by a reverse of fortune, Stephen becomes rich; and Foster, by losses in Trade, is thrown into the same Prison (Ludgate) from which his Brother had been relieved. Stephen adopts his Nephew, on the condition that he shall not assist, or go near his Father: but filial piety prevails above the consideration either of his Uncle's displeasure, or of his Father's late unkindness; and he visits his Father in Prison.

FOSTER. ROBERT.

Fos. O torment to my soul, what mak'st thou here?
Cannot the picture of my misery

I've drawn, and hung out to the eyes of men,
But thou must come to scorn and laugh at it?

Ros. Dear Sir, I come to thrust my back under your load,
To make the burthen lighter.

Fos. Hence from my sight, dissembling villain, go;
Thine uncle sends defiance to my woe,
And thou must bring it; hence, thou Basilisk.
Thou kill'st me with thine eyes. Nay, never kneel,
These scornful mocks more than my woes I feel.

Ros. Alas, I mock ye not, but come in love
And natural duty, Sir, to beg your blessing;
And for mine uncle—

Fos. Him and thee I curse.
I'll starve ere I eat bread from his purse,
Or from thy hand: out, villain; tell that cur,
Thy barking uncle, that I lie not here
Upon my bed of riot, as he did,
Covered with all the villainies which man
Had ever woven; tell him I lie not so;
It was the hand of Heaven struck me thus low,
And I do thank it. Get thee gone, I say,
Or I shall curse thee, strike thee; prithee away:
Or if thou'lt laugh thy fill at my poor state,
Then stay, and listen to the prison grate.
And hear thy father, an old wretched man,
That yesterday had thousands, beg and cry
To get a penny: oh, my misery.

Ros. Dear Sir, for pity hear me.

Fos. Upon my curse I charge no nearer come;
I'll be no father to so vile a son.

Ros. O my abortive fate,
Why for my good am I thus paid with hate?
From this sad place of Ludgate here I freed
An uncle, and I lost a father for it;
Now is my father here, whom if I succour,
I then must lose my uncle's love and favour.
My father once being rich, and uncle poor,
I him relieving was thrust forth of doors,
Baffled, reviled, and disinherited.
Now my own father here must beg for bread,
My uncle being rich; and yet, if I
Feed him, myself must beg. Oh misery!
How bitter is thy taste; yet I will drink
Thy strongest poison; fret what mischief can,
I'll feed my father; though like the pelican,
I peck my own breast for him.

(His Father appears above at the Grate, a Box hanging down.)

Fos. Bread, bread, one penny to buy a loaf of bread, for the tender mercy.

Ros. O me, my shame! I know that voice full well;
I'll help thy wants, although thou curse me still.

(He stands where he is unseen by his Father.)

Fos. Bread, bread, some Christian man send back
Your charity to a number of poor prisoners.
One penny for the tender mercy—

[Robert puts in Money.]

The hand of Heaven reward you, gentle Sir,
Never may you want, never feel misery;
Let blessings in unnumber'd measure grow,
And fall upon your head, where'er you go.

Ros. O, happy comfort: curses to the ground
First struck me: now with blessings I am crown'd.

Fos. Bread, bread, for the tender mercy, one penny for a loaf of bread.

Ros. I'll buy more blessings: take thou all my store;

I'll keep no coin, and see my father poor.

Fos. Good angels guard you, Sir, my prayers shall be

That Heaven may bless you for this charity.

Ros. If he knew me, sure he would not say so:

Yet I have comfort, if by any means

I get a blessing from my father's hands.

How cheap are good prayers! a poor penny buys

That by which man up in a minute flies

And mounts to Heaven.

Enter STEPHEN.

Oh, me, my uncle sees me.

STEP. Now, Sir, what makes you here

So near the prison?

Ros. I was going, Sir,

To buy meat for a poor bird I have,

That sits so sadly in the cage of late,

I think he'll die for sorrow.

STEP. So, Sir:

Your pity will not quit your pains, I fear me.

I shall find that bird (I think) to be that churlish wretch

Your father, that now has taken

Shelter here in Ludgate. Go to, Sir; urge me not,

You'd best; I have given you warning; fawn not on him,

Nor come not near him if you'll have my love.

Ros. 'Las, Sir, that lamb

Were most unnatural that should hate the dam.

STEP. Lamb me no lambs, Sir.

Ros. Good uncle, 'las, you know, when you lay here,

I succoured you: so let me now help him.

• A blessing stolen at least as fairly as Jacob's was.

STEP. Yes, as he did me;
To laugh and triumph at my misery.
You freed me with his gold, but 'gainst his will:
For him I might have rotted, and lain still;
So shall he now.

Ros. Alack the day!

STEP. If him thou pity, 'tis thine own decay.

Fos. Bread, bread, some charitable man remember the poor

Prisoners; bread, for the tender mercy, one penny.

Ros. O listen, uncle, that's my poor father's voice.

STEP. There let him howl. Get you gone, and come not near him.

Ros. O my soul,

What tortures dost thou feel! earth ne'er shall find

A son so true, yet forced to be unkind.

(Robert disobeys his Uncle's injunctions, and again visits his Father.)

FOSTER. WIFE. ROBERT.

Fos. II! what art thou? Call for the keeper

there,

And thrust him out of doors, or lock me up.

WIFE. O 'tis your son.

Fos. I know him not.

I am no king, unless of scorn and woe,

Why kneel'st thou, then, why dost thou mock me so?

Ros. O my dear father, hither am I come,

Not like a threatening storm to increase your wrack,

For I would take all sorrows from your back,

To lay them all on my own.

Fos. Rise, mischief, rise; away, and get thee gone.

Ros. O if I be thus hateful to your eye,

I will depart, and wish I soon may die;

Yet let your blessing, Sir, but fall on me.

Fos. My heart still hates thee.

WIFE. Sweet husband.

Fos. Get you both gone;

That misery takes some rest that dwells alone.

Away, thou villain.

Ros. Heaven can tell;

Ach but your finger, I to make it well

Would cut my hand off.

Fos. Hang thee, hang thee.

WIFE. Husband.

Fos. Destruction meet thee. Turn the key there, ho!

Ros. Good Sir, I'm gone, I will not stay to grieve you.

Oh, knew you, for your woes what pains I feel,

You would not scorn me so. See, Sir, to cool

Your heat of burning sorrow, I have got

Two hundred pounds, and glad it is my lot

To lay it down with reverence at your feet;

No comfort in the world is sweet,

Whilst thus you live in moan.

Fos. Stay.

Ros. Good truth, Sir, I'll have none of it back,

Could but one penny of it save my life.

WIFE. Yet stay, and hear him: oh unnatural strife

In a hard father's bosom.

Fos. I see mine error now: oh can there grow

A rose upon a bramble? Did there e'er flow

Poison and health together in one tide?

I'm born a man: reason may step aside,

And lead a father's love out of the way:

Forgive me, my good boy. I went astray;

Look, on my knees I beg it: not for joy,

Thou bring'st this golden rubbish, which I spurn:

But glad in this, the heavens mine eye-balls turn,

And fix their right to look upon that face,

Whose love remains with pity, duty, grace.

Oh my dear wronged boy.

Ros. Gladness overwhelms

My heart with joy: I cannot speak.

WIFE. Crosses of this foolish world

Did never grieve my heart with torments more

Than it is now grown light

With joy and comfort of this happy sight.

The present edition of this delightful book is enlarged by the addition of the further specimens which Lamb published a few years ago in Hone's "Table Book." These make about half of the second volume, and are quite equal in interest to those forming the original collection. Among them is that wonderful performance of Sir Richard Fanshawe's, in a scene from the Spanish play of "Querer pro Solo Querer" (to Love for Love's Sake), which he has turned into the sweetest English verse that was ever written. The annotations interspersed among these later specimens also, are inferior only in quantity to those in the first collection. There is the same depth and subtlety of thought, the same exquisite delicacy of perception, and, in as high perfection as ever, that style at once so racy in its spirit, and so translucent in its material, like the richest wine foaming in the clearest crystal.

A MAN INTRODUCED TO HIS ANCESTORS.

[REPRINTED, by leave of the Proprietor, from articles contributed some years ago to the 'New Monthly Magazine,' by the Editor of this Journal.]

QUEVEDO tells a story of an old Spanish nobleman, who meeting his coachman in the place unmentionable to polite ears, and being respectfully asked how he came there, said it was on account of the fatal indulgence he had shown to his wicked son. "But," said he, "Peter," wiping his eyes, "how came you here?"—"Ah, my lord," replied Peter, "it was for being the father of that wicked son of yours."

It is frightful to hear the comments people will make on a story of this sort. Some go so far as to pretend that there is no reckoning on a legitimate family in Europe. An Ogleby, say they, for aught we know, reigns in France; and a Sawney Beane at Madrid. A corporal may be half-brother to the King of Prussia. Some prig of a fellow is perhaps the precursor, at no great distance, of the illustrious Alexander of the North; and the Emperor of Austria may be the exalted result of a parish beadle. In the old story-book which represents Virgil as a magician, the poet is said to have pronounced Augustus to be the son of a baker. The reason assigned for the discovery was, that the emperor had ordered the poet so many loaves a week, instead of money, to do what he liked with. By this rule, the holy allies might be all made out the descendants of parish officers; for there is nothing that occupies them so much as keeping a sharp eye upon vagrants, waging war with surreptitious munched apples, and the reading of books in church time, and wearing their respective cocked-hats with a solemn propriety. The Emperor of Austria, when shown a manuscript Ariosto in Italy, is recorded to have said that he had no countenance for authors of that sort: (which every body will readily believe, who has seen his Majesty's face.)

However, the famous Austrian lip has been long in the family. There is no denying that. Whatever its origin, it is of old standing. I have heard the same thing of slanting foreheads in other families. Dryden tells us of a recipe, by which to ascertain the legitimacy of certain royal families famous for intermarrying with their aunts and uncles,

"Who by their common ugliness are known."

Thinking of these matters, and happening to fall upon the geometrical ratio of descent, by which it appears that a man has, at the twentieth remove, one million forty-eight thousand five hundred and seventy-six ancestors in the lineal degree—grandfathers and grandmothers,—I dropped the other evening into a reverie, during which I thought I stood by myself at one end of an immense public place, the other being occupied with a huge motley assembly, whose faces were all turned towards me. At this multitudinous gaze, I felt the sort of confusion which is natural to a modest man, and which almost makes us believe that we have been guilty of some crime without knowing it. But what was my astonishment, when a master of the ceremonies issued forth, and saluting me by the title of his great-grandson, introduced me to the assembly in the manner and form following:—

May it please your Majesties and his holiness the Pope;

My Lord Cardinals, may it please your most reverend and illustrious eminences;

May it please your graces, my lord dukes;

My lords, and ladies, and lady abbesses;

Sir Charles, give me leave; Sir Thomas also, Sir John, Sir Nicholas, Sir William, Sir Owen, Sir Hugh, &c.

Right worshipful the several courts of aldermen;

Mesdames, the married ladies;

Mesdames the nuns and other maiden ladies;—Messieurs Manson, Womanson, Jones, Hervey, Smith, Merryweather, Hipkins, Jackson, Johnson, Jephson, Damant, Delavigne, De la Bletterie, Maapherson, Scott, O'Bryan, O'Shaughnessy, O'Halloran, Clutterbuck, Brown, White, Black, Lindygren, Southey, Pip, Trip, Chedorloamer (who the devil, thought I, is he?) Morandi, Moroni, Ventura, Mazarin, D'Orset, Puckering, Pickering, Haddon, Somerset, Kent, Franklin, Hunter, Le Fevre, Le Roi (more French!) Du Val (oh, ho! a highwayman, by all that's gentlemanly!) Howard, Churchill, Burdett, Argentine, Gustafson, Olafson, Bras-de-feu, Sweyn, Hacho and Tycho, Price, Lloyd, Llewellyn, Hanno, Hiram, &c. and all you intermediate gentlemen, reverend and otherwise—with your infinite sons, nephews, uncles, grandfathers, and all kinds of relations.

Then, you, sergeants and corporals, and other pretty fellows,—

You footmen there, and coachmen younger than your wigs,

You gypsies, pedlars, criminals, Botany-Bay men, old Romans, informers, critics, and other vagabonds,—

Gentlemen and ladies, one and all,—

Allow me to introduce to you, your descendant, Mr Manson.

Mr Manson, your ANCESTORS.

What a sensation!

I made the most innumerable kind of bow I could think of, and was saluted with a noise like that of a hundred oceans. Presently I was in the midst of the uproar, which became like a fair of the human race.

Dreams pay as little attention to ceremony, as the world of which they are supposed to form a part. The gentleman usher was the only person who retained a regard for it. Pope Innocent himself was but one of the crowd. I saw him elbowed and laughing among a parcel of lawyers. It was the same with the dukes and the princes. One of the kings was familiarly addressed by a lord of the bedchamber, as Tom Wildman; and a little French page had a queen much older than himself by the arm, whom he introduced to me as his daughter. I discerned very plainly my immediate ancestors the Mansons, but could not get near enough to speak to every one of them, by reason of a motley crowd, who, with all imaginable kindness, seemed as if they would have torn me to pieces. "This is my arm," said one, "as sure as fate," at the same time seizing me by the wrist. "The Franklin shoulder," cried another. A gay fellow, pushing up to me, and giving me a lively shake, exclaimed, "The family mouth, by the Lord Harry! and the eye—there's a bit of my father in the eye."—"A very little bit, please your honour," said a gypsy, a real gypsy, thrusting in her brown face: "all the rest's mine, Kitty Lee's, and the eyebrows are Johnny Faw's to a hair."—"The right leg is my property, however," returned the beau: "I'll swear to the calf."—"Mais—but—notta to de autre calf," added a ludicrous voice, half gruff and half polite, belonging to a fantastic-looking person, whom I found to be a dancing-master. I did not care for the gypsy; but to own my left leg to a dancing-master was not quite so pleasant, especially as, like Mr Brummel, it happens to be my favourite leg. Besides, I cannot dance. However, the truth must out. My left leg is more of a man's than my right, and yet it certainly originated with Mons. Fauxpas. He came over from France in the train of the famous Duke of Buckingham. The rest of me went in the same manner. A Catholic priest was rejoiced at the sight of my head of hair, though by no means remarkable but for quantity; but it seems he never expected to see it again since he received the tonsure. A little coquette of quality laid claim to my nose, and a more romantic young lady to my chin. I could not say my soul was my own. I was claimed not only by the Mansons, but by a little timid boy, a bold patriot, a moper, a merry-andrew, a coxcomb, a hermit, a voluptuary, a water-drinker, a Greek of the name of Pythias, a freethinker, a religionist, a bookworm, a simpleton, a beggar, a trembling father, a hack-author, an old soldier dying with harness on his back.

"Well," said I, looking at this agreeable mixture of claimants, "at any rate my vices are not my own."

"And how many virtues?" cried they in a stern voice.

"Gentlemen," said I "if you had waited, you would have seen that I could give up one as well as the other, as far as either can be given up by a nature that partakes of ye all. I see very plainly that all which a descendant no better than myself, has to do, is neither to boast of his virtues, nor pretend exemption from his vices, nor be overcome with his misfortunes; but solely to regard the great mixture of all as gathered together in his person, and to try what he can do with it for the honour of those who preceded him, and the good of those who come after."

At this I thought the whole enormous assembly put on a very earnest but affectionate face; which was a fine sight. A noble humility was in the looks of the best. Tears, not without dignity, stood in the eyes of the very worst.

"It is late for me," added I; "I can do little. But I will tell this vision to the younger and stouter; they perhaps may do more."

"Go and tell it," answered the multitude. But the noise was so loud, that I awoke, and found my little child crowing in my ear.

FRANCONIAN TALES,

No. II.

THE NIGHT-DOG.

It was new-year's day, and merry doings were going on in the castle of Rudeman. Of those who came to pay the compliments of the season some had taken their leave, but many were still sitting with my Lord the Count at the dinner-table, where the great silver goblet was making its joyous rounds. But the fun and frolic were more free and unrestrained at the second table. The company here was very lively indeed. Kees, the plump little man-cook, Deinhard, the waggish huntsman, and Sybella Frischin, the free and easy housekeeper, were striving who should be first, in jests, jokes, and monstrous good stories. "Just hear," said Deinhard, "what my Lord asked me to-day, and what I answered. They were talking at table of portrait-painting. 'Did you ever have your picture taken, Deinhard?' said the Count in jest. 'Indeed, my Lord,' I replied, 'I wanted to have it done, and so looked out for a painter at Bamberg; but the churl, after eying my visnomy, which, as your Lordship knows, is rather long, yellow, and pitted, yet not so bad after all, sent me off in a hurry, saying that he had no colours ugly enough for my face.' All the company laughed till they were ready to burst at this sally."

"That's nothing to what I'm going to tell you," interrupted the cook. "You must know that yesterday I very snugly roasted the owl that was found dead on the barn-floor, and served it up as a partridge to Hahneberg, the hungry chancery clerk, who comes spunging and smelling about the kitchen every day. He thought it was very nice, and stopped his jaw-work more than once to say that he had never in all his life eaten a bit of game with such a fine haut goût about it."

"You are mere ignoramuses," screamed out the housekeeper, "Do but listen to the trick I played yesterday. You know fat, comfortable, greedy Dr Hammer, and that when he comes into the castle, one can never make a bed to his liking. Well, this time I lodged him in the back red room, that is so far from the rest, for I knew the prank that the old bedstead would most likely play him. No sooner said than done. For a little before midnight, when our heavy friend the Doctor, whose head was just then none of the lightest, had found his way to his bed with no small difficulty, and thrown his huge masses of flesh upon it, down comes a great bit of the bedstead near the head, and as he was in no condition to help himself, or call for assistance, he was obliged to pass the night in the most uncomfortable way in the world, with his legs up and his head down. In the morning he wanted to give me a good scolding, but I recalled him at such a rate, which you know he likes excessively, that he thought no more of his mischance."

Lindermann, the gardener, must now needs put in his case, and told once more, not in the briefest style, how long he had been in Constantinople and Moscow, (an immense town, fifty miles behind Moscow) and at Jerusalem and Madrid, Buda and Mexico, and how he had been employed by gentlemen, grand viziers, interpreters, bishops, margraves, and professors; nay, more, how his father, (now in heaven) had a fish-pond four miles round, in his garden, and many other credible matters of a like nature. But Deinhard, the huntsman, soon stopped the current of his talk, by reckoning up that he must at least be 120 years old, if he had staid at every place as long as he had asserted. Now, though Mr Lindermann was gifted with most excellent digestion, he was not able to stomach and make meat of this calculation. Hence he opened his mouth no more, except to swallow the noble juice of the grape that stood before him.

But none of these gibes and jests was relished by the virtuous lady's maid, Wilhelmina Sellin, nor by Shenk, who held the honourable office of footman, and was born in the imperial town of Goplar: and even Franz Braunwauld, the Count's saddler, sat quite grave and silent, contrary to his usual custom; though he had lately finished a capital job in the harness room, and was placed, on that account, at the second table. He seemed to be sunk in deep thought, and was neither cheered by the raillery of the frolicksome Sybella, nor by the jests of the huntsman; and, as at last they became very hard upon him, he took up his hat and stick, and silently went away. He went home and entered his room with the same silence and reserve. At length his young wife addressed him with these words:—"Tell me, dear Franz, what is the matter with you? Ever since yesterday you have been looking dull and gloomy, which is quite unusual with you. I thought to have seen you return to-day in good spirits from your merry party; but you are not. Perhaps the last work you did for the Count is not quite to your liking? Or has anything unpleasant happened?"

"Dear wife," answered the saddler, "I would have told you yesterday what it was that troubled me, had I not been afraid of disquieting your kind heart. But since you press me, I can no longer conceal it. You know the little garret in the old part of the castle, where I work for his Lordship. You know, too, that in order to finish the handsome new harness with which the count drove to church to-day, I worked the night before last till near midnight, and came home very late. I was sitting there very busy, my solitary lamp was burning before me, a snow storm was beating at the rattling old windows, and the watchman was crying eleven o'clock,—when suddenly there was a push at my door. Supposing that the porter had come to tell me to leave off work, I laid the harness down; when, behold! there came in a mouse-coloured dog of immense size, who looked upon me quite calmly with his bright, shining eyes, and poked his muzzle upon the table. You know that I am not fearful, but a feeling of horror came upon me, on beholding this apparition. However, I plucked up courage, and stared the beast in the face: he then opened his wide jaws, and uttered strange hollow sounds out of his deep throat. It seemed as if I half heard the words—Follow me!—Follow me!—Follow me! I was silent, and did not stir. But I heard these words for the second and third time. Now, thought I, you won't eat me after all, so I will follow the creature, and see what it wants, and where it will take me. Catching hold of my lamp, I followed the dog, who trotted before me, wagging his tail. The wind whistled through the old roof, the frightened owls flitted round me, and the rats skipped about, as I walked shivering along the cold stone floor, and at last reached a black door, which I had never before observed. The dog reared up against it, and it suddenly opened with a creaking noise. I went in, looked about me with the help of the lamp, and saw nothing but a large, empty, desolate chamber. But the dog seized my coat with his teeth, and drew me to a corner behind the door. My lamp shone upon it, and I saw a tall figure in a bright white dress, leaning against the wall. It looked to me like a stately lady in a silk dress of the old German fashion, with an open countenance, and long golden hair hanging down upon her shoulders. By the doubtful light of the lamp she seemed to be lifting her right arm towards me, holding a small black cross before me with a supplicating countenance. I had hardly raised my hand to touch the cross that was offered me, when my lamp was extinguished by a dreadful blast of wind; a fearful rattling sounded through the whole building, and a stifling sulphureous smell surrounded me. It was pitch-dark, and I stood trembling, without knowing or seeing where I should put my foot. However, I recovered myself a little, left the chamber, whose door shut to after me with a threatening crash, and groped along the rafters of the roof, followed by the dismal howlings of the dog, until I reached the well-known neighbourhood of my room. I soon found the stairs, got into the lower passage, which is lighted, and hastened home, where I found you already asleep. I could not sleep—my mind was too violently agitated by this night-adventure. I often tried to consider the whole as a vision, but the large gray dog, and the lady dressed in silk, with her melancholy yet cheerful face, stand before me too plain at this very moment. I suppose that both are accursed spirits, who are waiting for their release. But it makes me so sorry, when I think that this release ought, perhaps, to have come to pass through me, had it not been frustrated by some other evil spirit. Now, dear wife, you know the cause of my sadness and my serious meditation."

"Do not let this disturb you," replied his wife; "this is an old story, which I was told when a child by my grandmother. You know that after she was a widow, she was nurse in the castle for ten years, and learned a great deal of what had happened there from the most remote period, which she was very fond of relating when she grew old, as grandmother's generally are. Among other stories was the following one:—"

"In the time of Count Gottfried, before the 30 years' war, there was in his court, a noble maiden called Esther von Rinkenberg, whose extraordinary beauty and virtue were celebrated long afterwards. At the same time the Count had a chamberlain named Milk, who was born at Schweinfurt. He liked to look upon the maid, and shewed her a great deal of attention, in hopes of winning her affections. But though he was a fine young fellow, she coldly kept him at a distance, and gave him to understand pretty plainly, that he was not of noble birth, and must fix his attentions elsewhere. This contempt sunk deep into the heart of the chamberlain, but, far from dismaying him, only inflamed him with a still more violent love for the court lady. But since he could not obtain his object by all his suing and pressing, he endeavoured to effect it by secret means. An old, wandering, and experienced woodman, who occasionally came to the castle and received alms from the Count, was entrusted by him with his situation; he advised him to get some of the hair of his beloved one, to burn and powder it, and then swallow it early in the morning, and fasting, in water drawn before the break of day. If he did this, he would soon have proof of the maiden's love. The chamberlain followed his advice. He obtained a large lock of Esther's beautiful light hair, from her chambermaid, who was far from disliking him, and did what the old woodman had directed. After some time the courtiers thought they observed that the beautiful maiden looked more kindly on the chamberlain than before. And when three-quarters of the year were over, it was suddenly reported that Esther was extremely ill, beyond all hope of recovery. At the same time they learned that Milk, the chamberlain, was kept in close custody in his apartment, and that a judge, attended by his clerk, was examining him daily. Very strange and bad things were whispered from one to another, but nothing certain was known, as the whole affair was managed very secretly. The end of the story was, that the young lady died suddenly, and was privately buried, but the chamberlain disappeared, and nobody could learn what had become of him. But all was not fairly done; for ever afterwards, about the turn of the year, a noise, and a rattling, and a hubbub is heard on the floor of the old castle, and sighing, and weeping, and trotting and howling, like a dog's. This clatter comes again every year. Every one thinks that these are the departed and accursed spirits of the court lady, who did not die innocent, and of the chamberlain, who was privately executed for seduction and witchcraft. Many years afterwards, a servant who was looking one night for something in a distant room, saw a woman in an ancient German dress, and a large dog lying before her. But suddenly his light was extinguished, and his fear and horror drove him away. The female figure is taken to be the lady, and the dog the transformed chamberlain. Both of them, they say, long for their release, but will find it very hard to obtain, as 'an evil spirit prevents it.'"

"This is the story," continued the saddler's wife, "which I heard from my grandmother, and the truth of which you have now experienced yourself. Drive it out of your head, as it is not your fault that you were not able to effect the release of these condemned spirits."

"But," replied Franz Braunwauld, "I have often worked in my room in the castle till late at night, and yet never heard or saw any thing horrid."

"You forget," replied his wife, "that the apparition is seen only at the turn of the year,—that is to say, in the twelve nights from Christmas to the feast of Epiphany, and never at any other time."

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

DR. HORNE, BISHOP OF NORWICH, THE COMMENTATOR ON THE PSALMS.

(From 'Personal and Literary Memorials' by the Author of 'Four Years in France'; 'Italy as it is,' &c.—a learned, entertaining, and conscientious man.)

DR. GEORGE HORNE was a man of unaffected piety, cheerful temper, great learning, and, notwithstanding his propensity to jesting, dignified manners. He was much beloved in Magdalen College, of which he was president; the chief complaint against him being, that he did not reside the whole of the time in every year that the statutes required. He resigned his headship on being promoted from the deanery of Canterbury to the see of Norwich: the alleged reason was the incompatibility of the duties; though other heads of houses, when made bishops, have retained their academical situations.

He never manifested the least ill-humour himself, and repressed it, but with gentleness, in others. Having engaged in a party at whist, merely because he was wanted to make up the number, and playing indifferently ill, as he forewarned his partner would be the case, he replied to the angry question, "What reason could you possibly have, Mr. President, for playing that card?"—"None upon earth, I assure you."

On the morning when news was received in college of the death of one of the fellows, a good companion, a bon vivant, Horne met with another fellow, an especial friend of the defunct, and began to condole with him: "We have lost poor L——."—"Ah! Mr. President, I may well say, I could have better spared a better man."—"Meaning me, I suppose?" said Horne, with an air that, by its pleasantry, put to flight the other's grief.

I was talking with Henry James Pye, late poet laureat, when he happened to mention the name of Mr P., a gentleman of Berkshire, and M.P., I think, for Reading: "That is the man," said I, "who damned the King's wig in the very presence of his Majesty, with great credit, however, to his own loyalty, and very much to the amusement of the King."—"I do not well see how that could be."—"You shall hear a story which our President (Pye had been a gentleman commoner of Magdalen College) told at his own table. The King out a hunting, P—— was in, and of the field: the King's horse fell: the King was thrown from the saddle, and his hat and wig were thrown to a little distance from him; he got on his feet again immediately, and began to look about for the hat and wig, which he did not readily see, being, as we all know, short-sighted. P——, very much alarmed by the accident, rides up in great haste, and arriving at the moment the King is peering about and saying to the attendants, 'Where's my wig? where's my wig?' P—— cries out, 'D—n your wig, is your Majesty safe?' Mr Pye observed, "That's just like P——; he is just the man to have done so." Horne seemed to think that no accusing spirit would cavil at the oath; for he gave it forth ave rotundo, not "in good sooth," swearing like a comest-maker's wife.

Horne sometimes condescended to a jocularity which others, as highly placed, but of minds not so playful and good-natured, would have thought beneath them. An under-graduate waited on him, according to rule, to ask leave out of College, saying he was going to Coventry: "Better to go than be sent," said the President.

"I have heard him preach at St Mary's, before the University, and it was amusing to see how he employed himself during the psalms usually sung before the sermon; beating time with his open hand upon the cushion, ever and anon joining in the chant; then arranging his notes, or wiping his spectacles. His delivery on these occasions was somewhat too familiar, approaching, if the term may be permitted, to the lack-a-daisical: yet he was at once convinced and convincing; it seemed as if he was free and easy in his exterior, because religion was to him interiorly a source of ease, and freedom, and comfort.

One of Horne's sermons, before the University, was on the doctrine of the trinity. . . . "In this faith," he said, "I have been brought up, and for this faith, I trust when called upon, I shall be ready to die." His chance of obtaining the crown of martyrdom seemed so very remote, that this declaration of his willingness to accept it could but provoke a smile. That this oblation of himself might not be entirely without consequence, my friend Richard Paget drew a caricature, now in my possession, representing the very reverend the Dean of Canterbury, with his placid smile on his face, and his spectacles on his nose,—both of which he bore as attributes,—chained to a stake, the faggots heaped around him, and the flames ascending to his wig. The design is inscribed "The Martyrdom of Saint Horne."

For one thing he wrote he did deserve to have his wig singed. In a sixpenny pamphlet, in defence of the Corporation and Test Acts, now happily repealed, and of which the repeal was sought at the time of his writing, he answers the argument that the test leads to hypocrisy, the profanation of a sacred rite, and aggravated perjury, by the remark, "What is this to the dissenters? they are honest men!" This is the insolence of domination, which even this mild and good man could not avoid.

He wrote some numbers of the 'Olla Podrida,' in one of which he recommended the study of the newspapers by the examples of the Athenians, who passed their time in nothing else but in hearing and telling some new thing:—"Would any man wish to pass his time better than the Athenians did? Indeed we may expect that ere long nothing but newspapers will be read; since it seems to be agreed on by all men of the ton, that is, by all men of sense, that religion is a hum, virtue a twaddle, and learning a bore."

In 1791 he went to take possession of his episcopal palace at Norwich. When on the steps, he looked around, and said, "Bless us! Bless us! what a multitude of people!" Some one near, not out of malice, but because his head was filled with Norfolk dumplings, said, "O! my Lord, this is nothing to the crowd on Friday last to see the man hanged."

THE SCHOLAR'S ALE-JUG TO —,

ON HIS FAILING TO COME TO SUPPER.

Won't you come and converse with us?
Master's so dull and I'm so dry,
With dust and cobwebs choked well nigh,
That nothing's more stupid than he and I,—
Stupid, and dull, and dumb;
But we should not be so if you were by,— Priethee, then, won't you come?

Won't you come and accept his fare?
His banquet, indeed, I can't exalt,
It's little they get that eat his salt,
He fills me with nothing but vulgar malt,—
No brandy, or wine, or rum;
But I've heard him say it was not his fault,
And he'd tell you when you come.

Won't you come and accept his plea?
With Apollo and you he'll be more grand
Than the wealthiest noble in the land;
Few things indeed are at his command,
But still, you know, there's some;—
There's the cup of kindness, and the hand
That he gives you when you come.

Won't you come and accept that hand?
I heard him last night; he was very sad;
He was counting the friends that he had had,
How many were fled since times grew bad;
Then sudden he snapped his thumb,
And exclaimed aloud with a face all glad—
But I'll tell you when you come.

MODERN SCULPTURE.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN A CUSTOMER (A) AND A SCULPTOR (B.)

A.—Mr B. I want a full length statue made of myself, at your own price.

B.—If you please, Sir. Would you like to be taken naturally, in the dress you usually wear, as portrait painters take their likenesses?

A.—No; that would be common, and therefore vulgar. What think you of my being stark naked, except a small towel in front, like General Wolfe, in Westminster Abbey? or totally naked, like Lord Nelson in the Exchange-square in Liverpool?

B.—The objection is, that Englishmen neither live, fight, nor die, stark naked; and that the uniform they quarrelled in, ought not to be despised, particularly by their own countrymen. Bonaparte instantly rejected Canova's colossal naked statue of him with a great truncheon in his hand.

A.—Then why are artists guilty of such absurdities?

B.—They don't mind violating any proprieties in life whatever, provided they can seize an opportunity to display their own skill in drawing the figure. Witness the monstrous absurdity on the crown-pieces, of making a naked St George fighting a dragon, with nothing on but a little cloth cloak, that, it is said, his wife lent him to prevent his catching cold.

A.—Then what think you of representing me in a Roman dress, as Marcus Aurelius on horseback, like George the Third, at Liverpool.

B.—Such notions might do very well for a fancy ball. Sir Peter Lely, in his portraits, got very much laughed at for drawing fat ladies in the characters of Dianas, Floras, &c.; because what is absurd will always be ridiculous.

A.—You appear to me to be too fastidious, and to have too much common sense. As the apothecary in Mrs Radoliff's novel says, 'where is the use of art if we are to follow nature?' We stop to admire something out of the common way, and it is the province of art to cause admiration and wonder. How do you account for people liking what is strange and monstrous?

B.—There is an uninformed taste in the public that leads them to run after the quack more than the true physician. We must leave it to time and general education to refine and correct their errors.

A.—I am partly convinced, but then it's against my will. I must own I still like the monstrous—from the Ajax in the park, down to the dragons and griffins in heraldry. And there must be multitudes of my opinion, or else the artists would not venture upon courting their admiration.

B.—It should be the province of artists to lead, and not mislead, the public taste. What is unnatural is in general disgusting. That very clever artist, Harlow, went often to dinner parties in a Field Marshal's uniform, and got very much laughed at, merely because he had no right to wear it. And for the same reason, no statue ought to be dressed in what it never wore. Harlow had as much right to wear his uniform, as George the Third has to be dressed as Marcus Aurelius.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XXII.—HENRY VIII.

This play contains little action or violence of passion, yet it has considerable interest of a more mild and thoughtful cast, and some of the most striking passages in the author's works. The character of Queen Katherine is the most perfect delineation of matronly dignity, sweetness, and resignation, that can be conceived. Her appeals to the protection of the king, her remonstrances to the cardinals, her conversations with her women, show a noble and generous spirit, accompanied with the utmost gentleness of nature. What can be more affecting than her answer to Campelus and Wolsey, who come to visit her as pretended friends:

"Nay, forsooth, my friends,
They that my trust must grow to, live not here;
They are, as all my comforts are, far hence,
In mine own country, lords."

Dr Johnson observes of this play, that "the meek sorrows and virtuous distress of Katherine have furnished some scenes, which may be justly numbered among the greatest efforts of tragedy. But the genius of Shakspeare comes in and goes out with Katherine. Every other part may be easily conceived and easily written." This is easily said; but with all due deference to so great a reputed authority as that of Johnson, it is not true. For instance, the scene of Buckingham led to execution is one of the most affecting and natural in Shakspeare, and one to which there is hardly an approach in any other author. Again, the character of Wolsey, the description of his pride and of his fall, are inimitable, and have, besides their gorgeousness of effect, a pathos, which only the genius of Shakspeare could lend to the distresses of a proud, bad man, like Wolsey. There is a sort of child-like simplicity in the very helplessness of his situation, arising from the recollection of his past overbearing ambition. After the cutting sarcasms of his enemies on his disgrace, against which he bears up with a spirit conscious of his own superiority, he breaks out into that fine apostrophe—

"Farewell, a long farewell, to all my greatness!
This is the state of man; to-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope, to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honours thick upon him;
The third day, comes a frost, a killing frost;
And—when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a ripening—nips his root,
And then he falls, as I do. I have ventur'd,
Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
These many summers in a sea of glory;
But far beyond my depth: my high-blown pride
At length broke under me; and now has left me,
Weary and old with service, to the mercy
Of a rude stream, that must for ever hide me.
Vain pomp and glory of the world, I hate ye!
I feel my heart new open'd: O how wretched
Is that poor man, that hangs on princes' favours!
There is betwixt that smile we would aspire to,
That sweet aspect of princes, and our ruin,
More pangs and fears than war and women have;
And when he falls, he falls like Lucifer,
Never to hope again!"

There is in this passage, as well as in the well-known dialogue with Cromwell which follows, something which stretches beyond common-place; nor is the account which Griffiths gives of Wolsey's death less Shakspearean; and the candour with which Queen Katherine listens to the praise of "him whom of all men while living she hated most," adds the last graceful finishing to her character.

Among other images of great individual beauty might be mentioned the description of the effect of Ann Boleyn's presenting herself to the crowd at her coronation.

"While her grace sat down
To rest awhile, some half an hour or so,
In a rich chair of state, opposing freely
The beauty of her person to the people.
Believe me, sir, she is the goodliest woman
That ever lay by man. Which when the people
Had the full view of, such a noise arose
As the shrouds make at sea in a stiff tempest,
As loud and to as many tunes."

The character of Henry VIII is drawn with great truth and spirit. It is like a very disagreeable portrait sketched by the hand of a master. His gross appearance, his blustering demeanour, his vulgarity, his arrogance, his sensuality, his cruelty, his hypocrisy, his want of common decency and common humanity, are marked in strong lines. His traditional peculiarities of expression complete the reality of the picture. The authoritative expletive, "Ha!" with which he intimates his indignation or surprise, has an effect like the first startling sound that breaks from a thunder-cloud. He is of all the monarchs in our history the most disgusting: for he unites in himself all the vices of barbarism and refinement, without their virtues. Other kings before him (such as Richard III) were tyrants and murderers out of ambition or necessity: they gained or established unjust power by violent means: they destroyed their enemies or those who barred their access to the throne, or made its tenure insecure. But Henry VIII's power is most fatal to those whom he loves: he is cruel and remorseless to pamper his luxurious appetites: bloody and voluptuous; an amorous murderer; an uxorious debauchee. His hardened insensibility to the feelings of others is strengthened by the most profligate self-indulgence. The religious hypocrisy, under which he marks his cruelty and his lust, is admirably displayed in the speech in which he describes the first misgivings of his conscience and its increasing throes and terrors, which have induced him to divorce his queen. The only thing in his favour in this play is his treatment of Cranmer: there is also another circumstance in his favour, which is his patronage of Hans Holbein.—It has been said of Shakspeare—"No maid could live near such a man." It might with as good reason be said—"No king could live near such a man." His eye would have penetrated through the pomp of circumstance and the veil of opinion. As it is, he has represented such persons to the life—his plays are in this respect the glass of history—he has done them the same justice as if he had been a privy counsellor all his life, and in each successive reign. Kings ought never to be seen upon the stage. In the abstract, they are very disagreeable characters: it is only while living that they are "the best of kings." It is their power, their splendour, it is the apprehension of the personal consequences of their favour or their hatred, that dazzles the imagination and suspends the judgment of their favourites or their vassals; but death cancels the bond of allegiance and of interest; and seen as they were, their power and their pretensions look monstrous and ridiculous. The charge brought against modern philosophy as inimical to loyalty is unjust, because it might as well be brought against other things. No reader of history can be a lover of kings. We have often wondered that Henry VIII as he is drawn by Shakspeare, and as we have seen him represented in all the bloated deformity of mind and person, is not hooted from the English stage.

CHARACTERISTIC SPECIMENS OF THE ENGLISH POETS.

FAVOURITE SPECIMEN OF CHAUCER'S DESCRIPTION OF EXTERNAL NATURE.

(Omitted by mistake in the preceding article.)

Upon a certain night
As I lay in my bed, sleep full unmeet (1)
Was unto me, but why that I ne might Rest I ne wist, for there n'as (2) earthly wight
(As I suppose) had more of heart's ease
Than I, for I n'ad (3) sickness nor disease;

Wherefore I marvel greatly of myself
That I so long withouten sleep lay,
And up I rose three hours after twelfe,
About the springing of the gladsome day,
And on I put my gear and mine array,
And to a pleasant grove I 'gan to pass
Long ere the brighte sun uprisen was;

In which were oaks great, straight as a line,
Under the which the grass so fresh of hue
Was newly sprung, and an eight foot or nine
Every tree well from his fellow grew.
With branches broad laden with leaves new,
That sprungen out against the sonnè sheen, (4)
Some very red, and some a glad light green,

And at the last a path of little brede (5)
I found, that greatly had not used be,
For it forgrowen was with grass and weed,
That well unnethes (6) a wight might it see.
Thought I, this path some whither goth pardie;
And so I followed till it me brought
To a right pleasant arbour well ywrought,

Which that benched was, and with turves new Freshly turved, whereof the greené gras
So small, so thick, so short, so fresh of hue,
That most like to green wool wot I it was;
The hedge also, that yeden (7) in compass,
And closed in allé the green arbore, (8)
With sycamore was set and eglantere

And shapen was this arbour roof and all
As is a pretty parlour, and also
The hedge as thick as is a castle wall,
That who that list without to stand or go,
Though he would all day pryen to and fro,
He should not see if there were any wight
Within or no, but one within well might

Perceive all those that yeden (9) there without
Into the field, that was on every side
Cover'd with corn and grass, that out of doubt,
Though one would seeken all the worldé wide,
So rich a fieldé could not be espied
Upon no cost, as of the quantity,
For of allé good thing there was plenty.

And I, that all these pleasant sightes see,
Thought suddenly I felt so sweet an air
Of the eglantere, that certainly
There is no heart I deem in such despair,
Ne yet with thoughtes froward and contraire
So overlaid, but it should soon have bote (10)
If it had onés felt this savour sote. (11)

- (1) Unmeet—unfitting, unwelcome.
- (2) N'as—ne was, was not.
- (3) N'ad—ne had, had not.
- (4) Sheen—shining.
- (5) Brede—breadth.
- (6) Unnethes—scarcely.
- (7) Yeden—went.
- (8) Arbore—arbour.
- (9) Yeden—went.
- (10) Bote—help, remedy.
- (11) Sote—sweet.

And as I stood and cast aside mine eye,
I was 'ware of the fairest medlar tree
That ever yet in all my life I see,
As full of blossomés as it might be,
Therein a goldfinch leaping prettily
From bough to bough, and as him list he eat
Here and there of buddés and flow'rs sweet.

And to the arbour side was adjoining
This fairest tree of which I have you told,
And at the last the bird began to sing,
When he had eaten what he eaten would,
So passing sweetly that by many fold
It was more pleasant than I could devise.
And when his song was ended in this wise,

The nightingale with so merry a note
Answered him, that all the wood yung
So suddenly, that as it were a sot (12)
I stood astonished, and was with the song
Thorough ravishéd, that till late and long
I ne wist in what place I was, ne where,
Again methought she sung, e'en by mine ear.

Wherefore I waited (13) about busily
On every side if I her might see,
And at the last I 'gan full well espy
Where she sat in a fresh green laurel tree,
On the farther side even right by me,
That gave so passing a delicious smell,
According to the eglantere full well:

Whereof I had so inly great pleasure,
As methought I surely ravishéd was Into Paradise, wherein my desire
Was for to be, and no farther to pass
As for that day, and on the soté (14) grass
I sat me down, for as for mine intent
The bird's song was more convenient,

And more pleasant to me by many fold
Than meat or drink, or any other thing;
Thereto the arbour was so fresh and cold,
The wholesome savours eke so comforting,
That, as I deeméd, with the beginning
Of the world was never seen ere then
So pleasant a ground of none earthly man.

FINE ARTS AND LITERATURE.

Two Journeys through Italy and Switzerland, by William Thompson, Assistant Commissary General to the Forces. J. Macrone.

MR THOMPSON is an intelligent and agreeable person, who appears to have enjoyed his two hasty journeys considerably. He writes on account of his pleasures and sensations on visiting the garden of Europe, and the favourite seat of art to his friends at home; and no doubt they derived much pleasure in the perusal. Accordingly they press him to publish, and Mr Thompson complies; this part of the transaction we cannot but think indiscreet. The roads Mr Thompson travelled are well beaten, the cities he visited are as familiar to us as Oxford street; nor does he meet with any notable adventures. From our personal friends we hear with delight when they treat of the oldest subjects; we receive a note after a first visit to Richmond with something like anticipation. We join the interest we take in our friend to the interest we mutually feel in the scene, and each augments the other; we feel the same kind of gratification that we do when two of our old friends meet each other for the first time. One ingredient, and it is the principal one, is wanting to the satisfaction of the general reader if such communications be made public. The only exceptions are in favour of old and favourite writers, who stand somewhat in the light of personal friends to the world at large.

Mr Thompson appears to have a genuine taste for works of art; but there is nothing to show that it is so much more exalted or acute than is common to cultivated and tasteful minds in general, as to qualify him for a critic. His decisions are mostly correct, but amount to no more than all the world are agreed upon already; if he deviates from the beaten track of criticism, he loses his way.

For the purposes of a road-book, the work is far too scanty and loose, and not always quite correct. Ex. gr. as where he mentions that the two halves of Florence are joined by two "fine stone bridges;" while, in fact, there are four;—one very ugly one,

- (12) Sot, Fr.—a stupefied person, a fool.
- (13) Waited—watched.
- (14) Soté—sweet.

two indifferently good, and one extremely beautiful; as many visitors to the very admirable panorama of that city, exhibited a short time back in Leicester Fields, probably observed. In fact, Mr Thompson's visits to the different places were too hasty to enable him to have a very full or exact idea of any of them; and thus, although a pleasing specimen of general-post letter-writing, there is not stuff in the work enough to make a satisfactory volume. Upon reading it we have a better opinion of the writer than of his work—a better opinion of what he might do than of what is done.

A History of British Fishes. By William Yarrell, F.L.S. Part VI. John Van Voorst.

BEAUTIFUL as usual. The Fishing Frog is the most monstrous living absurdity we ever saw. Is it possible that such individuals can consider themselves beautiful? If they do, what a hideous creature an intelligent Fishing Frog would think the Venus de Medici. The little vignette of horses going to be bathed in the sea is hardly so happily drawn as usual; but it is true to the fact, and a pretty bit of colour.

Colburn's Modern Novelists, Vol. VIII.—The Disowned. By Edward Lytton Bulwer. Revised edition. In 2 vols. Vol. I. Colburn.

'The Disowned' it appears, from the introductory essay to the present edition, of all Mr Bulwer's novels, is the one most congenial to the writer's own feelings; and it is certainly altogether, to our mind, the most agreeable. There are a couple of engravings at the commencement of the volume. The group of lovers is pleasing, particularly the girl. Her face wants passion; but it has feeling, gentleness, and beauty. The gentleman is rather tame. The vignette is not destitute of a certain nice feeling; but it is stiff and artificial in the drawing and grouping.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

No. LXXXII.—FATAL MISTAKE OF MORBID EGOTISM FOR LOVE.

THE frequency of strange cases of this kind during the transition of mind in France from one state of opinion to another, induces us to copy it from the newspapers. It is not love which these unfortunate persons feel; at least, not love of any high order—certainly not of a lasting or healthy sort. It is a morbid, melancholy impatience, generally allied to a character of a very wilful description, which probably would as soon have quarrelled as loved in the course of another twelvemonth, and meeting with an egotism resembling its own, and prepared to jump all extremities for the sake of indulging its spleen, and getting a sensation. We do not say this, of course, out of any want of charity towards the unhappy victims of such mistakes, but as a warning towards sensitive people of melancholy fancies, not to copy these very serious levities of our neighbours, (for such, after all, they must be called, and the result of half thoughts mistaking themselves for whole ones), but to cultivate their faculties, animal and intellectual, to better advantage,—and to believe that real love would rather continue to exist with the beloved object in the same wide world, if it could not do it in the same house, than hazard the loss of its company in another by such perilous conclusions—much less selfishly invite it to partake them, and thus quit all chance of earthly happiness from the more cheerful companionship of other friends.

THE following extraordinary case, the details of which are given by one of the actors in the tragedy, came on before the Court of Assize in Paris, on Saturday. In 1826, Posper Bancal, accompanied by his sister, went on a visit to the family of M. Troussett, a merchant of Angoulême, when he, for the first time, saw Madame Priolland, who was then twenty years of age. Although he only remained there eight days, so great an intimacy had sprung up between Madame Priolland and himself, that after his departure they corresponded for five months, when, at the request of her husband, the correspondence ceased. From that period until 1831, when Bancal left France for Senegal, he and Madame Priolland met but twice, and both times in the pretence of her husband. Towards the close of 1834, Bancal returned from Senegal, and went to Montpellier to take out a doctor's diploma. In going and returning he called on Madame Priolland, and it was in one of those interviews, he states, that she proposed to him the project of putting themselves to death—a proposal which he looked upon at first as mere badinage, but which soon took irresistible possession of his mind. Resolutions were finally made to accomplish this object, and they parted in the end of February. They met on the 14th of March at Poitiers, and the 23rd of March was the day fixed for the execution of their project. On the 17th of March they arrived in Paris, and went to lodge at an hotel as man and wife. On the evening fixed for the accomplishment of their horrible plan, Madame Priolland ordered a foot bath to be brought into her chamber, and at eleven o'clock, every thing being ready, the horrible tragedy began. Bancal states that she then asked him to put an end to her life; upon which he bled her twice in her legs. She lost a great deal of blood, and would have fallen from the chair, had he not supported her. After some time his strength failed, and she fell upon the floor, but he subsequently succeeded in placing her upon the bed, and they laid there side by side. The hours wore away, and she still lived. He asked her if she wished to live; she said "No." He then asked her if she would wish him to use the bistouri; but she said she objected to the iron entering her heart. She had chosen bleeding as the means to be used to deprive her of life, because she said she would wish to see herself dying. After some further delay, he with her own consent, gave her some acetate of morphine, which he had provided, and then took a dose himself. They both suffered nausea and vertigo, in consequence of taking the morphine, but its effects were not sufficiently powerful, and the bistouri was at length resorted to. He stabbed her once without effect; but on his inflicting a second and deeper wound, she pressed his hand, and never moved afterwards. He then stabbed himself three times, but the wounds did not prove fatal. A friend of Bancal's, named Cassemacasse, next morning received a letter which had been written by the former, who, in the anticipation of death, had requested that he would see Madame Priolland and himself buried in the same coffin. When Cassemacasse went to the room and had the door forced open, Bancal and his victim were both stretched on the bed, the latter quite dead, but the former still living, though a stream of blood was issuing from a large wound in his left breast. Bancal having recovered from his wound, was on Saturday last brought to trial for the murder of Madame Priolland. Great interest was excited in the court, which was crowded to excess by ladies anxious to hear the result of this romantic affair. After a long investigation, of which we regret that our limits will not permit us to give the details, the jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty. Bancal is described as being a young man, small in stature, with black hair and eyes, and of a pale countenance, expressive of a deep and settled melancholy.

TABLE TALK.

ORIGIN OF ONE OF GOETHE'S PLAYS.—LESSON TO TYRANNICAL EXPERIMENTERS UPON A GOOD TEMPER.

The attachment I had felt for Margaret, I transferred to the daughter of our host, named Annette. I have nothing to say of her but that she was young, pretty, lively, and affectionate. Her disposition was so sweet, her mind so pure, that she deserved the love and veneration due to a saint. I saw her uninterruptedly every day. Our company at the table d'hôte was confined to a few persons known to the master of the house, whose wife was a Frankfort woman. They received very few people except during the fair. Annette and I had many opportunities of conversing with each other, of which we took advantage with mutual pleasure. As she was not permitted to go out, her diversions and amusements were very few: we used to sing some of Zachary's songs together; we played Kronger's Duke Michael; and thus our time glided on. But the more innocent connexions of this kind are, the less variety of impressions is there to prolong their duration. I accordingly fell into that evil disposition of mind which often misleads us so far as to make us find a pleasure in tormenting those whom we love; and I abused the fondness of a young female by tyrannical and arbitrary caprices. Secure of the affection of Annette, and of her anxiety to please me, I vented on her all the ill-humour that the failure of my poetical essays, the apparent impossibility of my doing myself honour by them, and everything else that occurred to vex me, excited. I poisoned our best days by groundless and unworthy jealousies. She long endured all these follies with angelic patience; but I had the cruelty to tire it out. To my shame and despair I at length perceived that her heart was alienated from me, and that I had now real cause for all the extravagances I had been guilty of without reason. This discovery gave rise to terrible scenes between us; but all that I gained by them was to learn, for the fourth time, how much I loved, and how necessary her affection was to me. My passion, however, increased,—assuming all the forms which such situations produce. It was now my turn to act the part of this amiable girl: I used all my endeavours to gain her by agreeable diversions. I could not bear to relinquish all hopes of her return to me; but it was too late. Struck with remorse for my conduct towards her, I avenged her by torturing myself with my own follies. The furious despair by which I thought to awake her compassion, overcame her physical strength. These extravagances greatly contributed to the bodily anguish by which I lost some of the best years of my life; and, perhaps, these complaints would speedily have terminated my existence, had not my poetical vein come to my assistance, and restored my enfeebled health. Already, during several intervals, I had perceived my folly. When restored to myself, I deplored my injustice towards Annette, and the sufferings I had caused her. So often, and in so lively a manner, did I represent to myself all the circumstances of her situation and my own, comparing them with the peace and happiness enjoyed by another couple in our society, that at length I could not resist the desire to make this contrast the subject of a drama, for the instruction of lovers, and in expiation of my folly. This was the origin of the oldest of my dramatic works that have been preserved; the title of which is,—'The Caprices of a Lover.'

YOUTH AND AGE. (ACCORDING TO LORD BACON.)

I remember when I was a young man at Poitiers in France, I conversed familiarly with a certain Frenchman, a witty young man, but something talkative, who afterwards grew to be a very eminent man. He was wont to inveigh against the manners of old men; and would say, that if there minds could be seene as their bodies are, they would appear no less deformed. Besides, being in love with his own wit, he would maintaine that the vices of old men's minds had some correspondence, and were parallel, with the imperfections of their bodies. For the dryness of their skin, he would bring in impudence; for the hardness of their bowels, unmercifulness; for the lippitude (blearedness) of their eyes, an Evil Eye and Envy; for the casting down of their eyes and bowing their bodies towards the earth, Atheisme; (For, saith hee, they look no more up to heaven, as they were wont;) for the trembling of their members, irresolution of their decrees and light inconstance; for the bending of their fingers as it were to catch, rapacitie and covetousness; for the rustling their knees, fearfulness; for their wrinkles, craftiness and obliquity; and other things which I have forgotten. But to be serious. A young man is modest and shamefaced; an old man's forehead is hardened. A young man is full of bounty and mercies; an old man's heart is brawnne. A young man is affected with a laudible emulation; an old man with a malignant envie. A young man is inclined to religion; an old man loses in piety, through the coldness of his charity and long conversation in evil, and likewise through the difficulties of his belief. A young man's desires are pleasant; an old man's moderate. A young man is light and moveable; an old man more grave and constant. A young man is given to liberality and beneficence, and humanity; an old man to covetousness, wisdom for his own self, and seeking his own ends. A young man is confident and full of hope; an old man different, and given to suspect most things. A young man is gentle and obsequious; an old man forward and disdainful. A young man is sincere and open-hearted; an old man cantelous and close. A young man is given to a desire to great things; an old man to regard things mercenary. A young man thinks well of the present times; an old man prefereth times past before them. A young man reverenceth his superiors; an old man is more forward to tax them.

TUSCAN FRASANTRY.

I have found at the distance of ten miles from Florence the best people I have ever yet conversed with. The country people are frank, hospitable, courteous, laborious, and disinterested; eager to assist one another, and offended at nothing but the offer of a reward. I have sat amongst them by the hour, almost the only company I could ever endure half so long; and, at the same time of seeing me, the whole family has told me its most intimate concerns. The mother has enlarged on the virtues, and excused the faults of her husband. The daughter has asked me whether I was married, and whether I liked it, as she intended to take a husband in the beginning of the Carnival . . . Stefano . . . I must know him . . . and had bought the bed, and hemmed the sheets, and folded and packed up the corredo; telling me that there is nothing in the world so pleasant as the beginning of the Carnival . . . Such fun! "Matta!" cries the mother, and smiles at me.—Landor.

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

A Treatise on Pulmonary Consumption, comprehending an Inquiry into the Causes, Nature, Prevention, and Treatment of Tuberculous and Scrofulous Diseases in general. By James Clark, M.D., F.R.S. 1 vol. post 8vo. London. Gilbert and Co.

THE subject of this volume is so universally important that it calls for our notice, while the manner in which it is treated by Dr Clark, who has divested his language as much as possible of technical terms, is so comprehensive, clear, and simple, as to embolden us to venture an opinion on some of his suggestions, and to speak, in part, of his treatise as of something we understand. Indeed, one of the great merits of the work is, that nearly every part of it may be understood by any person of common education and intellect—by any respectable father of a family, by any industrious mechanic, to whose particular case, as affected by the nature of his trade or employment, a considerable and valuable part of the treatise is especially addressed. It is for these reasons that we wish to see the book widely diffused; and we think we are performing a philanthropic office and a duty in doing what lies in our power to make its existence known.

If the utter incurableness of consumption in its advanced stages be a matter calculated to depress and sadden the heart, the sure means by which in a vast majority of cases it may be prevented from declaring itself, and the comparative ease by which it may be cured in its earliest stages, are favourable to hope, and to those tender cares and assiduous exertions which most honour our nature. It was only by placing the awful results of the malady full before us—by laying open the valley of death at our very feet, that Dr Clark could hope to arouse the attention of the generality of mankind. No decorous veil, or silken curtain ought to be drawn here. There yawns the horrid gulf in which the fond hopes of half the world go down—here is the broad path that leads straight to it, and on the opposite side the path that leads directly from it.

A physician is perhaps the best of all moral teachers, for his daily practice furnishes him with tangible illustrations of the intimate connexion between vice and disease, between disorderly passions and a disordered frame of body, between inordinate sensual indulgences and that contamination of the system which descends from father to son, until the whole infected race is utterly extinguished by it. There is an awful solemnity in the passage where our author shows how frequently the gout, contracted by intemperance in this generation, becomes scrofula in the next, consumption or madness in the third, and how often, in this sense, the sins of the father are visited upon an innocent, a helpless, and a hopeless posterity.

Whilst other diseases are giving way to improved modes of life and the progress of the medical science, or, after having had their rise, their meridian height, and their decline, are passing away of themselves (for certain maladies seem to have their cycles—their final limits of extent and duration), Dr Clark is of opinion that consumption, or a disposition to tuberculous diseases, is on the increase among us. "By diminishing the disposition to this most destructive of all maladies," he says in his preface, "we shall not only reduce the sum of its daily victims, but we shall raise the standard of public health, and at the same time advance the moral excellence of man, augment his capabilities, and increase the sphere of his usefulness; for it need not be stated, that without sound bodily health, the intellectual powers languish and decay. Our subject, therefore, is one which not only concerns personal feelings and social happiness, but involves the well-being of society at large, and the intellectual as well as the physical character of nations."

He shows the same enlargement of view and of object throughout the volume, which becomes the more interesting from his constant allusion to the mental as well as to the corporeal faculties,—to the intellectual education of man, as well as to the proper nurture and care of his body. In his chapter on the means of preventing consumption, after copious remarks on the proper manner of treating infants and very young children—particularly such as are delicate—he devotes a section to the subject of the education of youths of both sexes, wherein he "speaks out" (and it is only by speaking out frankly and fearlessly, and often, that we can hope to correct the evils) concerning the mismanagement and abominations that still disgrace so many of our schools. There is scarcely a class of people among whom the presence and tuition of the real schoolmaster is more required than the pseudo-schoolmasters and schoolmistresses—the masters and matrons of your "boarding-schools," "fashionable establishments," "academies," "seminaries," (or by whatever name they may delight to honour their concerns;) and we apprehend that in too many instances these persons superadd to gross ignorance and a blind adhesion to routine, an unscrupulous disregard of the important and solemn charge confided to them. The boys' schools are bad enough, but those for girls are infinitely worse. Before any parent entrusts his children to such nurseries of disease, let him carefully attend to the following observations.

"No subject, I am persuaded, calls more urgently for the attention of parents than the education of their children, both intellectual and physical. However laudable may be their desire to see the minds of their offspring early and highly cultivated, it should be checked by the knowledge that this object can in many cases be attained only by the sacrifice of health, and too often not without the loss of life. 'The time,' says Dr Beddoes, 'is not perhaps far distant when parents will discover that the best method of cultivating the understanding, provides at the same time most effectually for robustness of constitution; and that the means of securing both parts of the comprehensive prayer of the satirist,—at sit mens sana in corpore sano—are identical.'

"The consequences just noticed as arising from the erroneous system of education in the schools for boys, prevail in a greater degree, and are productive of more injury, in female boarding-schools. If the plans pursued at many of these establishments were intended to injure the health of the pupils, they could scarcely be better contrived to effect that purpose. The prevailing system of female education is, indeed, fraught with the most pernicious consequences. At a period of life when the development of the system demands the most judicious management, young girls are sent to schools where almost the only object which appears to claim consideration, is the amount of mental improvement, or rather the variety of accomplishments with which they can be stored. At an early hour in the morning the pupil is set down to music or the drawing-table, where she remains, often in a constrained position, in a cold room, till the whole frame, and more especially the lower extremities, become chilled:—the brief relaxation during the short space allowed for meals and the formal walk, is insufficient to restore the natural warmth of the extremities; and it often happens that girls are allowed to retire to bed with their feet so cold as frequently to prevent sleep for hours. Those who are acquainted with the general system of the boarding schools of this country will allow that this is no exaggerated picture.* A delicate girl, submitted to such a discipline, cannot escape disease. While school-boys have the advantage of a play-ground, or enjoy their recreation at pleasure in the open fields, the unfortunate inmates of a female boarding-school are only permitted to walk along the foot-paths in pairs, in stiff and monotonous formality, resembling, as Dr Beddoes justly remarks, a funeral procession. The consequence is, that the muscles of the upper extremities and those which are chiefly concerned in the support of the trunk are rarely called into active play; they do not acquire strength as the body increases in stature,—they remain weak and unequal to the task of supporting the trunk in the erect posture. A curved state of the spine is generally the consequence; and this, by altering the natural position and form of the trunk, renders the respiratory movements imperfect; the capacity of the chest is diminished, and the lungs are consequently more liable to congestion, and the diseases which are its consequences.

"While the natural form and proportions of the body are thus destroyed, the health generally suffers in a remarkable manner. This is generally manifested by the paleness of the countenance, by a deranged state of the digestive organs, by a dry coarse skin, cutaneous eruptions, and other indications of deteriorated health. In short, almost all the requisites for the production of scrofula may be found in female boarding-schools, where the system I have described is pursued.

"There are many exceptions to this system of boarding-school discipline, and the number would no doubt be greatly increased if the conductors were aware of one-half of the extent of the injurious effects it produces. In the establishments to which I allude, as being conducted on more rational principles, the cultivation of the mind and the acquirement of the various female accomplishments are not the only objects aimed at; the health of the girls forms, as it ought, the first and paramount consideration. The time devoted to daily study, by the present system, should be greatly abridged, and that allowed for exercise augmented in proportion; the exercise should also be such as to call into action every muscle of the body.

"The clothing during winter ought to be warm, and every means should be adopted to guard against coldness of the extremities. The pupils should not be allowed to sit so long at one time as to induce this state, nor to go to bed with chilled feet. Were I to select any one circumstance more injurious than another to the health of young girls, it would be cold extremities, the consequence of want of active exercise, and the prevailing and most pernicious habit of wearing thin shoes while in the house.

"A warm bath ought to form an appendage to every boarding-school, and every girl should occasionally enjoy the benefit of it. A large, lofty, and well-ventilated room should be set apart for the express purpose of exercise, when the weather is such as to prevent it in the open air. A system of gymnastics is quite as necessary for girls as for boys. They should be sufficiently varied to give free play to all the muscles, and more especially to those of the trunk and upper extremities. If the girl has any tendency to curvature of the spine, those exercises which are most effectual in correcting this deformity should constitute a part of the daily exercise. To the room devoted to these exercises, the younger girls should be allowed to retire for a short time, during the usual hours of school, to amuse themselves at pleasure. This recreation I consider of the utmost importance: it must, nevertheless, be understood that no exercise is to be considered a substitute for that in the open air; and for this reason every female boarding-school ought to have a play-ground, where the pupils may choose their own amusements, and play without restraint.

"Were a judicious system of management pursued in boarding-schools, the opprobrium which has so long attached to them, would not only be removed, but they might be made the means of improving the general health of the pupils, and of correcting even the scrofulous constitution; they would thus become the source of much future benefit to the children, and of happiness to their parents."

Dr Clark, in common with Dr Barlow, Dr Combe, and the other excellent men and able physicians, who have lately written on the subject of Physical Education, most strenuously recommends the frequent use of the bath, not only as a means of promoting the health and cleanliness, but the morality of the people. Dr Clark says:—

"While on the subject of cold bathing, I must not omit to notice the beneficial effects of swimming. With this invigorating exercise, the cold-bath is doubly serviceable. Swimming, as Locke recommends, ought to form a part of every boy's education."

But here, as regards the mass of our poor and busy population, the question will occur—"Where are people to swim in this immense metropolis of ours?" In many places the Thames is not proper to the purpose, and to many of the inhabitants of London it is too far off. Besides, the working-classes in London have been so long unaccustomed to such enjoyments, that they almost require to be tempted into the use, and due appreciation of them. It was therefore with very great pleasure that we visited a few days ago that convenient and in every way excellent establishment, called the Metropolitan Baths, which have been opened within the last twelvemonth, a few hundred yards north-east of the City Road, in a spot called the Shepherd and Shepherdess Fields. We here found, in a well-aired and lofty-roofed apartment, a basin of pure tepid water, one hundred feet long, thirty or forty feet broad, and varying in depth, by means of the bottom or flooring of the basin, which is an inclined plane, from three feet to five feet three or four inches. Here, then is space and verge enough for plunging and swimming; and we found a number of men, who seemed to be respectable mechanics, enjoying that exercise, and (in two or three instances), teaching their little boys to swim. At the upper end of this extensive tank, there is a small basin for those who prefer cold water; but we should observe that the water in the large basin is not debilitating or too warm,—the chill being merely taken off the water, which is scarcely above the temperature of the sea on our coasts on a fine summer's day. Along the sides of the tank are ranged little chambers or cabins, in which to dress and undress, and for the use of one of these, and of two clean towels, a small looking-glass, &c., together with an hour's use of the bath, the charge is only one shilling. Although the proprietors, carrying, as we think, a feeling of delicacy too far, have not only eschewed puffing, but have even avoided advertising, they have found the number of their customers to be constantly on the increase, and this circumstance has encouraged them to erect another bath of still nobler dimensions, to be had at a still cheaper rate.

The second tank, which is now nearly finished, is one hundred and eighty feet long, and forty feet broad. The admission, without the use of towels, is to be sixpence. Thus, for less money than they pay for the pot of ale which often hurts them, hundreds of people daily, in that vast and populous neighbourhood, may command the luxury of a bath, which will always do them much good—and that, too, from the local facilities of obtaining copious supplies of hot water, in winter as well as in summer. We should mention, moreover, that as the saloons are illuminated with gas, those who are engaged all day can bathe in the evening when their business is over; and that, from there being a constant supply of fresh water at one end, and a sluice or outlet at the other, and from the care taken from time to time entirely to empty the tank or basin, the water in use is always sweet and clean.

We consider the gentleman whose ingenuity devised, and whose spirit and enterprise executed these baths, as a benefactor to his country; and, without knowing him, we honour him for this. There is a somewhat similar, but much more limited establishment, on the Surrey side of Westminster bridge; and we hope the day is not distant when we shall see such baths made cheap and accessible to the great body of the people in every quarter of London. It has hitherto been an opprobrium to the greatest, and in many respects the most civilized capital in the world, to be almost wholly unprovided with public establishments of the sort. This is not the first time that we have endeavoured to draw the attention of our countrymen to the subject, and we trust, that in so doing, we do not depart from our proper office. We pity, if we do not despise, the heart and intellect of the man who can call such details as we have given trivial and vulgar. Is the health of hundreds of thousands of our fellow-creatures—our countrymen—a trivial subject? Is it vulgar to point out and advocate what may extensively promote their comforts, their morality, and general well-being?

We have done our humble duty to Dr Clark's volume in recommending it to notice, and in giving a specimen of the plain, earnest manner in which it is written. We cannot go into the pathology, or the treatment of consumption, or examine the statistical tables of the disease, which are very curious; but we will give one more extract, having relation to a cause by which consumption is frequently induced, and to a subject (the choice of a house in the country) on which most people entertain vague or incorrect notions.

In close and populous towns one naturally hankers after the freshness, verdure, and open air of the country; and, in cases of sickness, an opportune change of air will frequently do what medicine cannot. Only, it unfortunately happens, that through ignorance and inadvertence, and the very mistaken idea that whatever is in the country is salubrious, places are chosen that are infinitely more unhealthy than almost any part of London, and which often prove fatal to the patient before the mistake is discovered. Again: in England, where our great wants are warmth, dryness, and sunshine, many people have a perverse habit of burying their houses among trees and shrubs, and ornamenting their lawns and grounds with ponds and pools of stagnant water. Too many of our honest citizens, when they can compass the dignity of a "rus in urbe,"—a suburban villa, are deluded into these bad practices. They cannot have too many trees,—they are so romantic and unlike the city; and they must have water—a pond for gold and silver fishes in front of the house, because it is so elegant; and a huge duck-pond in the rear, because it is so rural! We occasionally pass pretty enough looking places of this sort in the neighbourhood of London, that make us shudder—places compared with which Shoe lane and Mutton hill are wholesome, and Cheapside and Fleet street the abode and very temple of health. But let us hear the Doctor:—

"There is no circumstance connected with health, concerning which the public are, in my opinion, so ill-informed, as the requisites of a healthy residence, both as regards local position and internal construction. In this island we have chiefly to guard against humidity, on which account our houses should not be built in low, confined situations, nor too near water, especially when stagnant, and, still less, near marshes. Neither should a house be too closely surrounded by trees or shrubs. Trees at some distance from a house are both an ornament and advantage, but become injurious when so near as to overshadow it, or prevent the air from circulating freely around it, and through its various apartments. The atmosphere of a building overhung by trees, or surrounded by a thick shrubbery, is kept in a state of constant humidity, except in the driest weather; and the health of the inmates rarely fails to suffer in consequence. The natural moisture of the country arising from the humid state of the soil and luxuriant vegetation, is greatly increased by such an injudicious mode of planting; an artificial atmosphere being created, which renders a situation of this kind less healthy than the more open parts of large towns. It is not generally known how limited may be the range of a damp, unhealthy atmosphere; a low shaded situation may be capable of inducing tuberculous disease in an infant, while a rising ground a few hundred yards distant, may afford a healthy site for his residence. The dryness of the air in towns, which is the consequence of good drainage and an artificial soil, is at once the safeguard of the inhabitants, and a compensation, in some measure, for the want of that unimpeded circulation, and renewal of good air which the country alone affords.

"I have been led to make these remarks while treating of infants, because, from being necessarily much confined to the house, they suffer more from the causes which have been noticed. The health of females, also, and for the same reason, is more injured than that of the male inhabitants, who pass much of their time in the open air."

VOYAGES OF THE ZENI.

The Journal of the Royal Geographical Society of London. Vol. V. Part I. 8vo. London. 1835. Pp. 128. 2s. 6d.

We notice this Number for the sake of a paper which it contains on that curious geographical puzzle, and, we may add, interesting romance, the story of the brothers Antonio and Nicolo Zeni, and their alleged voyages and adventures in the Northern seas, in the fourteenth century. The author of the present paper is Captain C. C. Zahrtmann, R.N., Hydrographer to the Royal Danish Navy; and its object is to prove that the story of the voyages in question is altogether a fable. Having stated that the reflections he here gives to the world have led him to the firm conviction that the voyages of the Zeni, at least in all the main points, are mere fabrications, he says, "I feel perfectly convinced that there must exist still more complete proofs leading to the same conviction, but the literary resources of this place (Copenhagen), as well as my own intimacy with this branch of literature, are too limited to enable me to bring more to light. I have been induced to publish my views from this consideration, that while much industry and ingenuity have been exerted in the attempt to prove the genuineness of the voyages, only the most superficial efforts have been made to combat an opinion which, it appears to me, is erroneous."

The first account of the adventures of the Zeni appeared in Italian at Venice, in a small octavo volume, in the year 1558. It was accompanied by another tract, professing to contain a narrative of a journey to Persia made by Caterino Zeno, a grandson of Antonio the voyager, in 1472. The volume was edited and published by another Nicolo Zeno, the great-grandson of Caterino, who states himself to have compiled both histories from the family papers which were in his possession, or in that of some of his relations. It does not appear that any of the charts, letters, or other documents which are asserted to have been thus made use of have been preserved till now, or indeed that, important as they would have been to the verification of the extraordinary statements contained in the printed book, they have ever been seen or heard of since its appearance.

The story of the voyagers, as told in this publication, is shortly as follows:—In the year 1380 Nicolo, the elder brother, being desirous of seeing foreign parts, and ambitious of performing something which might do honour to his country, fitted out a vessel at his own expense; and setting out in it from his native city of Venice, passed through the Straits of Gibraltar, with the intention of visiting England and Flanders. Nothing more was heard of him for some years, until at length a letter was received from him by his brother Antonio, containing an account of his having been cast by a storm upon an island of considerable size, called Frislanda, in the North seas, where he had enlisted in the service of a neighbouring prince named Zichmni, then engaged in an attempt to conquer the island from the King of Norway,—an object which was soon accomplished by the assistance of Zeno, who in return was dubbed a Knight by Zichmni, and appointed to the high place of Admiral of the Fleet in his service. Having acquainted his brother with all this, Nicolo added a pressing invitation to him to come out to Frislanda immediately, with as many ships as he could procure, that they might share their good fortune together. Antonio immediately closed with this proposal, and, following the directions he had received, was lucky enough to make his way to Frislanda, though not without encountering many difficulties and dangers. Here the two brothers lived together, enjoying the highest favour with Zichmni, for four years, when Nicolo died; but Antonio remained in Frislanda for ten years longer, at the end of which period, with much difficulty, he obtained leave from Zichmni to return to his native country. He accordingly made his reappearance in Italy, bringing with him great riches, two sons left by his brother, named John and Thomas, and an account of his adventures written by himself, together with a chart of Frislanda and the neighbouring countries.

Of all this, however, nobody seems ever to have heard anything till the publication of Nicolo Zeno the younger, already mentioned, about a century and a half after the events are stated to have taken place. No writer during the interval makes any mention of the voyage of the Zeni.

On the other hand, that such persons as Nicolo and Antonio Zeni existed in Venice at the date assigned to their adventures and discoveries, there is no doubt. They were the brothers of the celebrated Grand Admiral Carlo Zeno, on one occasion, when it was on the point of being taken by the Genevese, the saviour of the city—and they were themselves two of the wealthiest and most distinguished citizens of Venice. It is true, indeed, that Nicolo appears not to have left Venice till 1388, instead of in 1380, the year assigned by the narrative to the commencement of his adventures; but the error in the date may have been a transcriber's or a printer's blunder. Nicolo does not profess to publish the actual narrative drawn up and left by his ancestor, which he says he had himself, when a boy, in great part destroyed, in ignorance of its value—but only such an account as he could collect from the loose papers that had escaped, one of the most important of which was a letter written by Antonio to his brother Carlo, from Frislanda, in answer to inquiries which the latter had made respecting the new found country. If the requisite correction be made on the date of the commencement of Nicolo's voyage, the circumstances of the story agree sufficiently with the known facts in the history of the two brothers. If the elder, for instance, set out from Italy in 1388, and the younger followed him in 1391, the former will have died in 1395, and in the family registers he is spoken of as dead in 1398. So, Antonio would, upon this supposition, have returned to Italy in 1405, and may have died soon after, as he appears in fact to have done in the year 1406. The descendants of Nicolo, the elder, through his son Thomas, the grandfather of Cardinal Zeno, survived till 1756; and the posterity of his brother Antonio is still, or was very lately, in existence. It is also of importance to mention that Nicolo, the younger, the publisher of the narrative, appears to have been a person held by his contemporaries in the highest estimation for his cultivation and patronage of science and literature, and especially for his mathematical and historical knowledge.

THE FORTUNES OF GENIUS.

IN the 'Atlas,' the other day, was an article, under the above title, the following passages of which induce us to make some remarks upon them. We regret we cannot copy the whole,—it is so well written, and shows such a relish of pleasure, and sympathy with pain. But our limits forbid.

"An acquaintance," says the writer, "with the biography of illustrious musicians proves that they reason incorrectly, and with a short sight, who eternally talk of having the path of genius smoothed, and of setting it above circumstances; for the lives of eminent men of this class display the most admirable energies developed, and the most enthusiastic projects brought to bear, purely by the pressure of the very annoyances sought to be removed. Possession of the creative faculty presupposes a superiority to adverse circumstances and 'low-thoughted care;' and Goldsmith's poet, sitting in his garret with a worsted stocking on his head,

'Where the Red Lion staring o'er the way
Invites each passing stranger that can pay,' in spite of bailiffs, writs, debts, duns, and milk-scores, the most horrible that even Hogarth imagined, was still a happy fellow. The individual, Mr Jones, seated before a delicate leg of lamb and a bottle of sherry, is an abstraction of the Mr Jones who owes 284*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*, and has, as the Dutchmen say, nix to pay. Satisfied that he would pay if he could, which is all that is necessary to place the morale of his character upon high ground, he leaves the affairs of the world to right themselves, and enjoys the everlasting day rule of the imagination. [How well said is this!]

—So it was with Fielding, with Goldsmith, with Steele, and others honourable in literature, and so also with Handel, with Mozart, and Weber in music; and it is one of the kindly recompenses of nature by which she contrives, on the whole, to adjust so equitably the good and the evil in this life, that where injury to the individual arises from an excess of sympathy with the mass, that injury is commonly but lightly felt."

We were not aware that the trials of these musicians in pecuniary affairs were so great. The following information respecting Mozart is as startling as it is affecting:—"Who thinks, when he looks over the six great operas of Mozart, and admires the Shakspearian knowledge of character, and the thoughtful discrimination appearing in every movement of them, that those master-pieces were produced amidst a tumult of arrests, and of the lowest annoyances that ever embroiled a life? Nay, it is even said that the family of Mozart at times wanted common necessities. Adversity may have been a sharp thorn in the side of so gentle and enjoying a spirit as Mozart; but it would be affectation to deplore the circumstances that have put the musical world in possession of their most valued treasures."—And here follows something awful respecting Handel,—an awful man. The hurried dashes and dative cases of the writer ("to his quarrel with Senesino"—"to his madness and rage"—"to his palsy"—) are like an agitated accompaniment to the facts: "The twenty or thirty folio volumes bearing the names of Handel's oratorios which alone transmit his name to posterity, when we contemplate them in some well ordered library, carry no thought of their having been produced after the composer had received the first signal of death in a stroke of palsy which disabled his arm. Ruin and disease, that fill the minds of men of more feeble powers with thoughts of the narrow coffin and the shroud, made Handel immortal. We owe the 'Messiah' and 'Israel in Egypt' to the composer's obstinate temper—to his quarrel with Senesino and the nobility—to his making rash engagements with singers that compelled him to withdraw his last guinea from the funds to satisfy them—to his madness and rage—to his palsy—to his proceeding to the vapour baths of Aix-la-Chapelle, whence, with the purgation of his humours, reason and religion returned, and persuaded him that there was another style of music yet untried, more likely than operas to suit the grave character of the English. Then followed in rapid succession his immortal oratorios, works in which the pure flame of his genius never shone more brightly, though produced at a late period of life, commenced after the attack of a threatening and fatal disorder, and ended in total blindness."

The question thus opened by the writer in the 'Atlas' is a great puzzle. We confess that in many respects we take the same view of it as himself; for we reverence the past; we are inclined to think best of whatever has taken place, since it has taken place,—to conclude that good and evil somehow have adjusted themselves in the best manner; and we have such belief in the predominance of happy over unhappy feelings in the minds of men of genius, that we sometimes think they would have had an unfair portion of joy in their life, had their lot been less counterbalanced by difficulties, ill-health, or whatsoever their troubles may have been.

But the question branches off into some others, which it may not be well for society to lose sight of; especially as by the efforts which Providence incites them to make for the common good, it would seem, that however necessary some portion of evil may always be for the proper relish of good, there may not always exist a necessity for it to an amount so large. One of these collateral questions we shall put.

Is it certain that the men of genius above-mentioned would not have written as much, or as finely, under happier circumstances?

It is natural enough to conclude, that men so careless in worldly matters as Steele and Fielding, and with such a relish of the moment before them, when it contained the least drop of sweet, would perhaps have written nothing at all. Frightful supposition! And yet is the supposition likely, considering that very relish? Is it natural for people to be delighted, and hold their tongue? To have fame at their command, and not command it? Or was it necessary for Handel to be so extremely pained, before he could give us his sense of the passionate and the sublime? Was there not suffering enough for him, short of rage and madness? No firmament over his head, nor graves under his feet? Perhaps he yet needed his afflictions:—be it so, since they have happened;—but might it not be perilous in future, seeing that we have become alive to such questions, to run the risk of steeling the hearts of people against the struggles of genius, if not for the latter's sake, yet for their own, and ultimately, by that process, for both? Whatsoever happens in the world without our being aware of it, we take to be one thing; what otherwise, to be another; and fate and consequence become modified accordingly. If the pain should remain the same after all, we still cannot be certain that it is necessary, however it will become us to hope so when it be past. The peril, meanwhile, is, that we shall be blunting our own feelings, and those of genius too.

Beaumont was of opinion that a man of genius could no more help putting his thoughts on paper, than a man in a burning desert can help drinking when he sees water.

"I know too well, that, no more than the man That travels through the burning deserts, can When he is beaten with the raging sun, Half smother'd in the dust, have power to run From a cool river, which himself doth find, E'er he be slak'd; no more can he whose mind Joys in the Muses, hold from that delight, When Nature, and his full thoughts bid him write."

Could Fielding have helped writing 'Tom Jones' (the perfectest prose-fiction in the language) whether he had been in trouble or not? Could Steele have helped throwing his lighter, happier graces, round the muse of his friend Addison? Would Goldsmith's craving for reputation have allowed him to be silent with his pen (which was admirable), when he could not even refrain in company with his tongue (which was nothing)? Or does the enjoying critic of the 'Atlas,' whose articles are like variations upon the musical beauties they criticise, dwelling upon them, and winding them in congenial tones round his heart, really think it would have been possible for Mozart to possess all that abundance of the soul of love and pleasure, and not cry aloud?—not burst forth and blossom like the peach trees in spring? not come pouring down from a hundred fountains of song into the surging sea of the orchestra, like the summer clouds from the mountains?

We grant that certain noble kinds of pain may be necessary to produce certain sublimities of composition, whether in musical or other writing: but need the composer be stimulated with the lowest and most humiliating cares, to induce him to write at all, supposing him to be a real genius? Perhaps he would not write so much; but are we sure even of that, supposing him to be put into a condition quite suitable to his nature? Steele and Fielding and Mozart would not have written all the identical same works which they produced; but are we sure that they would not have produced as many, or even better? Well fed birds sing in cages; but the more philosophic of their jailors (strange people!) discern something in the best of their imprisoned songs, inferior to their "wood-notes wild." Does the throble on the bough, in order to pour gushes of melody from his heart, require a string to his leg, or a blink from some bailiff snake?

Walter Scott assuredly would not have written all his novels, had he not thought circumstances required it; but we should most likely have had his best. 'Waverley' he wrote for love, when he did not dream that he should get a sixpence by it; and 'Old Mortality' and 'The Antiquary' soon followed the publication of that novel—partly, no doubt, for profit, but much also by reason of love encouraged, and out of a love of the sense of power. These, his best, we should have had; and he would not have been killed by writing his worst.—Oh, Scotland! Oh, England! Oh, Europe! we might say, for he belonged to all,—how could you suffer him to die?

And Burns—that other “glory and shame” of this island—he did not get (so to speak) a penny for his writings; for though, no doubt, he did get a good deal more, yet that was not the reason why he produced them; and numbers of his songs he gave away. Yes; he, the glorious ploughman, and born gentleman, gave his songs away, free as the bird that he took for his crest. Now Burns, if any man ever did, wrote for love, and not for money. Yet his life was full of pecuniary distress.

And observe how many men of genius have written abundantly, who have had no sordid cares,—certainly none that writing settled for them, in a pecuniary sense. Chaucer is an illustrious instance. Spenser another—Milton (though poor) another—Beaumont and Fletcher, Pope, Swift, Addison, Gibbon, Hume, Hooker, Sterne, Lamb, Wordsworth, Jeremy Taylor, in short, almost all our best,—and all the Greek, Roman, and Italian men of genius (for nobody ever got obolus or cracia for his writings in the classical countries, ancient or modern). In Italy there is no payment of authors, any more than there was among the countrymen of Anacreon and Ovid; yet we have had, nevertheless, the Dantes, Petrarchs, and Ariostos. The Homers, to be sure, got their “feed,” in the minstrel times of Greece; but nobody supposes that those amazing rhapsodists would never have opened their mouths, but for King Alcinous’s pork-chops.

Then, among musicians—Haydn, we believe, was not distressed; nor the Corellis and Paeziellos. Gluck was rich. Nor have the best of the painters been poor,—the Raphaels, Michael Angelos, and Titians. On the contrary, with the exception of Rembrandt, those who have been best off in wordly affairs, have generally been most abundant in pictorial produce,—sometimes, it is true, by help of the influx of wealth, as in Titian’s case; but, at any rate, necessity was not the stimulant. Nor did patronage make them idle. No; because it was true, and lit on true men. The watered tree bore, because it possessed the seed. Do not Hummel, Spohr, and others, write, and write well, though made as comfortable as church-canonists in those little snug chapel-masterships of theirs, of which we are told so delightfully in the ‘Ramble among the Musicians in Germany’?

Often and often, we doubt not—perhaps in all instances—has inconsistency of position in men of genius been mistaken for idleness. It may be possible, in many cases, that temperament, or even too much thought, or other conflicting impulses, may produce something, in the appearance, which “the world calls idle;” but the true conflicting impulses, in perhaps all instances, have arisen from incompatibility of calls upon the attention. He who is forced to do incompatible or uncongenial things, does them badly; or he sings, perhaps, at all events, and sings well; but sometimes he cannot sing at all,—the wires of the cage of his necessity press too hard upon him—he wants breathing-room, nature, comfort; he sings at last, partly because he is forced, partly because it solaces him. But try the humane expedient of rescuing him from his worst cares, and see how he would sing then;—if not his most, yet surely his best. At least, so it appears to us.

Blessings, nevertheless, say we, with the genial philosopher of the ‘Atlas,’ upon the trouble and sorrow even of a sordid kind, if we could not have had certain men of genius without them; and blessings, at all events, upon the beauty into which they are converted, and the divine way which Nature has of making bitterness itself blossom and become medicinal. But let us take care how we sow opinions, unqualified, the fruits of which may intoxicate weak heads in after times—with careless assumption, if writers—with selfish references to Providence and necessity, if the arbiters of the fate of writers. Writers of any ability are pretty well off in these times, and have a good patron in the public. But a time may come, when, by the very process of the abundance of writings, genius may want support; and let us not prepare our children’s children to refuse it.

The absurdity of a tragedy, unfortunately, is not always an argument against its chances; but to show how very absurd this principle of leaving men of genius to their fate might become, if driven to all its consequences, let our contemporary, who understands and loves a joke run to seed (no man better), take the following scene between the future patron of a musical genius, and an emissary he has despatched to inquire into his circumstances.

Patron.—Well, Dick, and how did you find him? Will the composition of the new opera go on swimmingly?

Emissary.—According to your Grace, it will, for he is horribly off.

P.—Good. What, in pressing want, eh? Can’t afford to be idle?

E.—If he did, he could not eat. The butcher would not trust him. The butcher says he is too honest a man to be trusted; he is such a child.

P.—Excellent! just like your man of genius. And the butcher is a shrewd dog. But our new Mozart must not starve quite; we’ll take care of that. Then he has finished, I presume, that capital scene of the feast, with that wonderful joyous dance? and that droll chorus, with the corpulent man in it?

E.—He has; with a lawyer’s letter on each side of him, and a face haggard with head-ache.

P. (rubbing his hands).—Capital! We are sure then, you think, of the whole opera?

E.—There is no doubt of it. His five children were looking out of the window, wondering whether the baker would come.

P.—You rejoice me. We shall have a brilliant audience. And what did he say to you?

E.—Oh! he smiled, as usual, and laughed, and said he wondered at his spirits, considering his head-ache; but I thought I almost saw the tears in his eyes, as he said it.

P.—A true genius! That’s the way he gets his pathos, Dick. The man is all fire and feeling.

E.—I suspect he would have been glad of a little more “fire” yesterday, for his servant told me he had no coals.

P.—Bravo! Poor fellow! Oh, it’s clear we shall do capitally. We must not let his fingers be cold, however, nor the baker fail his children.

E.—Did your Grace ever think of trying what a course of comfort would do for him?

P.—A course of what? Ruin, Dick, ruin. I never did, of course; but who’d write if they could help it?

E. (aside).—Not you, God knows; for it’s as much as you can do to spell. Yet this is the great opera patron whom our “new Mozart” calls a “good kind of man, not over imaginative!”

THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY EGBERTON WEBBE.

No. VII.

ALTHOUGH the whole extent and variety of human speech is usually considered as lying within the compass of twenty-four or six letters, the fact, strictly speaking, is far otherwise. In all his affairs man is a creature of shifts and expedients, never quite accomplishing anything, but only devising appearances, and fortunate rather in the amount of his escape from failure, than of success attained; and the scheme of language, with all its appurtenances, exhibits this truth in as striking a manner as the highest moral instance. As language itself is but the weak and erring representative of thought, so are letters the faulty and ambiguous representatives of language. Instead of twenty-four letters, fifty letters would not be sufficient to express all the variations of the voice, if we would consider these with a fastidious ear. The alphabet of a language is like the octave in music; both are, for convenience, divided into a certain limited number of parts, while all intermediate intervals go unnamed. But the speaking voice is no more restricted in nature to a diatonic process than the singing voice; an attentive consideration of the matter will convince us that there is not any middle point which the voice does not traverse in its rounds, though written language offers no account of it. The letters of the alphabet are therefore no more than the prominences—the conspicuous resting-places—of the voice, which, like the steeples and towers of a country, may always be discerned, while many a tract lies between, unspecified in the map of literature. If the pronunciation of all times and nations could be brought under one review, we should behold a scale divided with the utmost chromatic minuteness. The S of one country is not the S of another; ancient Y is not modern Y; French J is not English J; Spanish V not English V; English V not old Roman V; the B of the age of Bion and Bacchylides is not the B wherewith Mr Haines Bailey spells his name; Amphion and Philips rejoice not in the same consonant; neither is Timotheus identical with Thompson. Who can say where F ceases to be F and begins to be V? where D strings itself up into T?—where S relapses into Z? All these are connected by a passage of communication; nor is anyone to imagine that such passage is in its nature a mere thoroughfare; there is no point of it where the voice may not rest, just as well as at either of the extremities, usage alone determining its practice in that respect. In one country a particular vowel will be especially shortened, so that we should hardly know what to call it if it were not for the written character accompanying it; in another, some consonant will be made more sharp, more dense, more lax, than accords with our own practice—it will be altogether another letter in fact, yet the same title must be given to it by courtesy. We find it difficult, perhaps impossible, to produce the new sound, and we accordingly set it down as one of those chromatic intervals with which we need have no concern; but a foreigner will probably think the same of different parts of our pronunciation, and with as much justice; for all these varieties are equally component parts of the general scale, and the facility with which we accommodate ourselves to particular notes of it depends entirely on the original key—if I may say so—in which our voice has been cast, and this again on climate, on usage, on education. Thus then, with differences endless, and distinctions few, how defective an instrument writing is needs not further to be insisted upon.

The transmutation of letters is so extraordinary a principle in language, that to the eye of an etymologist, wearied in some recent pursuit after a lost syllable, vowels and consonants must seem like one of those swarms of flies that buzz and flit about one’s head in a summer evening’s walk; it is one eternal dance and comminglement. It is, perhaps, quite safe to say, that there is not in the alphabet a single letter which has not changed places with every other letter, at one time or another. In the first place, the cognate letters.—These are sworn fellows of one lodge, that are bound by oath to be ready at any moment to do duty one for another. Accordingly, no measures can be kept with them; you call on P, and B opens the door—you inquire for M, and behold W—while conversing with W you suddenly perceive him to be V—but you have no sooner addressed him as V than he becomes F! Then as all the individual letters in one class are united by different degrees of affinity, so are the various classes themselves linked together by some common bond. Thus the labial marries into the lingual family, the lingual into the guttural; M having an affection for N, R seeking an alliance with the throat. Without the recommendation, however, of any apparent sympathy, a continual interchange goes on among letters of every conceivable difference of quality. And that nothing may be wanting to the whimsicality of these changes—to the fantastic freaks of language—we often find a derivative word literally thrown upside down in its appropriation from the parent tongue,—as if a son should take an old coat of his father’s and have it turned. Thus the Latin adopts the Greek word morphe (μορφή shape), but first gets it turned round into forma (form)—so delo (δῆλον) turned into endo-epo (ἐπὶ εἰς) into repo,—and many others in the same manner.* Indeed, if any one will examine the different dialects of his own mother tongue, he will not have occasion to go further for specimens of this sort of perversion. The dialects of the Greek, however, will undoubtedly be the most fruitful source of illustration, and perhaps the best worth considering; because these, with all their strong distinctive features, have been fixed, and endowed with virtue, by writings of excellence, and they were not, like our provincial brogues, something to be suppressed and kept out of view, as disgraceful to good speakers, but were recognised forms of speech, that had their literature, and their readers among the educated and polite. These, then, to any one who finds pleasure in this subject, and likes to indulge his speculation as to the causes of fluctuation in speech, and the many curious matters connected with pronunciation, are wide and tempting fields of inquiry, and capable perhaps of being made more productive than they have yet been for purposes of this nature. For me, I feel the necessity of urging forward to other questions, or I shall not be able to maintain the intended proportions of this essay. I must, therefore, endeavour not to give way to any digressions that may extend unnecessarily what further observations I have to make on this part of my subject.

Words undergo four principal kinds of changes; these are by the addition—the omission—the substitution—and the transposition of letters. In these changes there are three principal moving causes,—facility of utterance—euphony—analogy. In deriving a word from another language it may happen that there is some letter in it to which we have none corresponding. In this case two results may follow,—either some character in our own system may express the same sound according to our particular usage—and if so, it is substituted for the foreign character; or, having neither the letter nor the sound of it, we employ one which seems the most nearly to resemble it, or, occasionally, a union of two. Words derived from foreign sources come to us first in proprâ personâ; we write them with scrupulous exactitude, we print them in italics, and we are ambitious of pronouncing them with their native accent; but familiarity begets indifference; we find them useful, and often repeat them; a more rapid utterance soon forces them into an assimilation with other words; a different pronunciation begins to demand a different spelling, and soon obtains it, especially assisted by the fact, that the word, no longer confined to the few critical writers—its first patrons—is now circulating at large, among people whose acquaintance with it has only commenced since its corruption took place, and who have, therefore, no notion why they should hesitate to write it down according to the pronunciation they hear. Such word is then said to be naturalised, it is no longer to be seen adorned with marks of quotation, nor is the elegant tribute of italics print any more awarded to it; but it fares like the multitude, and is presently hurried into a dictionary, looking horribly altered, where indignant, analysing lexicographers howl over it through six successive editions.

Sometimes a foreign sound will be imitated by the

* See numerous examples in Caninius, in his chapter on the letter R (Hellenism p. 97.)—who, however, carries his ingenuity rather too far when he comes to propose such derivations as quello from illic!

The topsy-turvy work above-mentioned, seems to belong to an inherent propensity in us. If the ear misses the true procession of the sounds which compose a word, it seems most naturally to fall upon a reversion of them; as if the word being disturbed from its position, and not being able to rest on edge, fell altogether on the opposite side. This is very observable in children, as when, missing to say umbrella, they make rumbella of it, and the like. A ludicrous instance of the kind occurs to me—A little girl who could not pronounce the word Williams, which was the name of a gentleman and lady whom she used often to see, always called it Millions. One day, not having seen either of them for some time, suddenly Mr W. enters,—“Oh! see,—Millions!”—says she to her mamma; immediately after this Mrs W. comes into the room—upon which, with increased surprise, she adds—“Two Millions!”

Sometimes the transposition will take place in the vowel sounds. I remember an old Scotch woman who had never heard of such an article as nutmeg, till having frequent occasion to procure it for one whom she was nursing in illness, she invariably introduced it by the name of netmug, nor—having once so fixed it in her ear—could she ever after reverse it, though she often tried.

union of two letters, as the Romans rendered the Greek ϕ by P and H;

— “Nos siquando Græcum ϕ necesse est exprimi,

P et H simul solemus — ponere.”

Terentianus Maurus.

Then it will happen that this expedient, itself a departure from true expression, will give rise to a further corruption, by the suppression of one of these two sounds in pronunciation; and, finally, this omission in speech will lead to the omission in writing; nay, further, the only remaining letter may subsequently undergo one of those metamorphoses from which, as we have seen, no word is secure any day in the year. Thus, for example, $\kappa\epsilon\phi\alpha\lambda\eta$ (kephale) gives the Latin caput, ph being turned into p; from caput (Italian, capo) comes Spanish cabo; from Spanish cabo (or again from the Italian) French chef, (observe the ch too), and from chef (English, chief) the further variety of achever, and achieve. The Romans generally dropped the aspirate, in these cases, after the word had become familiar, as charus, afterwards carus, litus from λιθος, pulex from φυλλος (these being also probably, at first, written litus and pulex, or spulex, agreeably to the analogy of the reputed parent Æolic,) purpura from πορφυρα, &c. Sometimes, on the contrary, the aspirate seems to have been retained, and its yoke-fellow dropped, as in Hæu from $\phi\upsilon$.

With us Ph and F are identical in pronunciation, but the ϕ of the Greeks was unquestionably an aspirate. It is related by Quintilian that when Cicero pleaded for Fundanius, a Greek witness being examined excited the orator's merriment by his mode of pronouncing his client's name, which he could only call Phundanius. I am inclined to think that the Roman F, however, was a very different F from ours—a sharper, more aspirated consonant. I cannot otherwise account for all that Quintilian says of it, who speaks of it as a sort of monster infesting the language, a letter “hardly human,”—a description which our present acquaintance with F will not justify.

That acute scholar, Dawes, has an ingenious piece of criticism on the above passage in Quintilian, the justness of which it is perhaps my own fault that I do not perceive. He is of opinion that the error of the Greek witness must have consisted in substituting a V for F in the word Fundanius, from which he draws conclusions in confirmation of his views respecting the double power of the Fau. If the Greek had formed his acquaintance with this word from seeing it in writing, it is possible he might have pronounced it as Dawes imagines, being misled by the appearance of the F, which resembled the Æolic Digamma; but it is more fair to suppose that the man—probably ignorant of the Latin language—had nothing but his ear for his guide, and imitated the sound of F in the Roman name, as he heard it bandied about the court, with as near an approach to it as his own pronunciation furnished; and that was ϕ . Dawes was, however, very ignorant of the principles of pronunciation, and his profound learning and great critical ingenuity did not prevent his sometimes running headlong into error. In one place he fiercely objurates Dionysius of Halicarnassus for holding the very opinion for which he himself at the time is strenuously contending, and which he quotes other authorities to establish;—not perceiving that that which he impugns is in fact his most decisive witness. We all know that W is nothing more than the vowel sound oo quickly united to the next letter, as oo-ight—wight. This, our present sound of W, is proved very satisfactorily to have been the Digamma of the Æolians, expressed by a character which has the appearance of a mutilated F. The other authorities which Dawes cites satisfy him because they represent this by the letter V, which among the Romans had also the power of a W; but Dionysius represents it by the diphthong

* Terentianus speaks here, however, of the practice which obtained in the more critical age of the Roman language, and not of the ancient period, when this union of P and H for ϕ was unknown, and F alone used.

Ou,—“the like of which,” says Dawes, “never occurred to any other waking man.” (“Quod nemini unquam alii uδ'εν ονσις in mentem venit.”*) Now this is precisely what he wanted!—Ou (i.e. the vowel sound in the word poor, the French ou in court) being prefixed to any of his Greek examples, just gives him the result he would have—Αναξ, Ουαναξ, αλας, ουαλας, &c.; In the matter of the Digamma, much of the dubiety which has been felt among grammarians seems to have resulted from an ignorance or uncertainty respecting the power of the Roman V. The affinity of the two appeared probable enough from the course of etymology; but many, mistaking the Roman V for a consonant equivalent to the modern V, would very naturally be led from that first error into the other of deeming the Æolic letter identical with Roman F, with which V, the labial consonant, is so closely allied in sound as to render frequent substitution no matter of surprise. Now the fact is, that but for the striking confirmation which this very place in Dionysius, on which Dawes vents his indignation throughout several pages, incidentally affords, the whole question would be one much more open to cavil than it is. By introducing these two vowels to describe the power of the Digamma, he enables us to see, clearly and satisfactorily, what we before beheld in a glimmering light only—viz., that that power was, in good earnest, modern W (and so therefore the Roman V)—since of this letter those two vowels, joined as a diphthong, represent, as has been seen, the true elementary character.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXXXIII. — LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF MULL'D SACK.

[MULL'D SACK was a highwayman in the time of the Stuarts, who obtained his name from being addicted to the beverage of Falstaff. We are not disposed lightly to admit heroes of his profession into the lists of Romance; but a man who, besides his ambitious larcenies upon ladies and colonels, has picked the pocket, first of Oliver Cromwell, and afterwards of Charles the IInd, thus performing the part of a sort of retributive justice on behalf of the people, has claims upon our amazement, which may reasonably give him a lift with the impartial historian.]

THIS most notorious fellow (says our authority Granger) was the son of one Cottington, a haberdasher of small wares in Cheapside; but his father being a boon companion, so wasted his substance, that he died so poor as to be buried by the pariah. He left fifteen daughters and four sons, the youngest of whom was this Mull'd Sack. At eight years of age he was, by the overseers of the parish, put out apprentice to a chimney-sweeper of St Mary-le-Bow, to whom he served about five years; and having then entered his teens, he thought himself as good a man as his master; whereupon he ran away, as thinking he had learnt so much of his trade as was sufficient for him to live upon, and his heirs for ever.

He had no sooner quitted his master, than he was called by the name of Mull'd Sack (though his real name was John Cottington), from his usually drinking sack mul'd, morning, noon, and night. To support this extravagant way of living he took to picking pockets, and carried on this profession with great success; and among others he robbed was the Lady Fairfax, from whom he got a rich gold watch, set with diamonds, in the following manner:—“This lady used to go to a lecture, on a week-day, to Ludgate church, where one Mr Jacob preached, being much followed by the precisians. Mull'd Sack observing this, and that she constantly wore her watch hanging by a chain from her waist, against the next time she came there he dressed himself like an officer in the army; and having his comrades attending him like troopers, one of them takes off the pin of a coach-wheel that was going upwards through the gate, by which means it falling off, the passage was obstructed, so that the lady could not alight at the church-door, but was forced to leave her coach without, which Mull'd Sack taking advantage of, readily presented himself to her ladyship, and having the impudence to take her from her gentleman-usher, who attended her alighting, led her by the arm into the church; and by the way, with a pair of keen or sharp scissors for the purpose, cut the chain in two, and got the watch clean away, she not missing it till sermon was done, when she was going to see the time of the day.

After many narrow escapes from being taken in the act of plundering, Mull'd Sack was at length detected in the act of picking the pocket of Oliver Cromwell, as he came out of the Parliament-house, and had like to have been hanged for the fact; but the storm blowing over, he was so much out of conceit with picking pockets, that he took up another trade, which was robbing on the highway; and following this practice with one Tom Chenney, they were audacious enough to rob Colonel Hewson, at the head of his regiment, when marching into Hounslow; but being quickly pursued by some troopers which lay in that town, Chenney's horse falling him, he was taken, while Mull'd Sack got clear off. Chenney, desperately wounded, was brought prisoner to Newgate; and shortly after, when the sessions came on at the Old Bailey, he would have avoided his trial by pleading weakness, and the soreness of his wounds; but this had no effect upon the court, for they caused him to be brought down in a chair; from whence, as soon as he had received sentence of death, which was about two o'clock in the afternoon, he was carried in a cart to Tyburn, and there executed.

Mull'd Sack, having thus lost his companion, was resolved in future to rob on the highway himself alone, though he kept company with the greatest highwaymen that were ever known in any age; and such was his genius, that by their conversation he became as expert a robber on the road as any man whatever; for, whilst he followed that profession, he got as much money as all the thieves then in England. He always went habited like, and was reputed a merchant, for he constantly wore a watchmaker's and jeweller's shop in his pocket, and could at any time command 1000*l*.

Having notice by his spies that the general-receiver at Reading was to send 6000*l*. to London by an ammunition-waggon and convoy, he prevented that way of carriage by conveying it up himself on horseback, breaking into the receiver's house at night-time, and carried off the booty undiscovered. The loss being so great, strict inquiry was set on foot, when it was discovered that Mull'd Sack was the principal in the robbery; whereupon he was watched, waylaid, apprehended, and sent down prisoner to Reading, and from thence, at the assizes, conveyed to Abingdon, where, not wanting money, he procured such a jury to be empannelled, that though Judge Jermy did what he could to hang him, there being very good circumstantial proof, as that he was seen in the town the very night when the robbery was committed, yet he so balked the evidence, and so affronted the Judge, by bidding him come off the bench, and swear what he said, as judge, witness, and prosecutor too, for so perhaps he might murder him by presumption of evidence, as he termed it, that the jury brought him in guiltless.

He had, however, not been long at liberty before he killed one John Bridges, to have the more free egress and regress with his wife, who had kept him company for above four years; but the deceased's friends resolved to prosecute the murderer to the uttermost. He fled beyond sea; and at Cologne he robbed King Charles II, then in his exile, of as much plate as was valued at 1,500*l*; then flying into England again, he promised to give Oliver Cromwell some of his Majesty's papers, which he had taken with his plate, and discover his correspondents here; but not making good his promise, he was sent to Newgate, and receiving sentence of death, was hanged in Smithfield-grounds, in April 1659, aged fifty-five years.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

PALEY.

[FROM the 'Personal and Literary Memorials' mentioned in our last. The new edition of Paley's 'Natural Theology,' introduced by the Discourse of Lord Brougham, has given a fresh interest to the character of this celebrated divine; who besides the curiosity he excites by his talents, begets more sympathy in the minds of society in general than they choose to acknowledge, by his extraordinary mixture of candour and expediency.]

ACCORDING to the author of the 'Memorials' (and therefore we have no doubt of the statement) Paley, who presents such a swag aspect in the engravings of him, was a coarse, vulgar-looking man, who neither was, nor pretended to be very refined, in other respects. He wore silver buckles at his knees and in his shoes.

He was talking as I entered; and I perceived, with much surprise, that he spoke a very broad northern dialect. He had passed, indeed, great part of his life in the north of England; but he had been educated and lived long at Cambridge, and had seen a good deal of the world. Perhaps he was vain of this singularity: perhaps he would not seem to wish to correct what he found he could not cure without difficulty, and so gave up the attempt. I heard him repeat three or four times the word "noodge," pushing his elbows at the same time towards the sides of those who stood nearest to him: this motion explains the meaning of a word not very generally in use among scholars, nor in good company. But Paley's merits, though they might have been recommended by polished manners, were superior to them, and wanted them not; and his learning was the more agreeable by being entirely free from formality, pedantry, or assumption of literary importance. I could not learn to what all this "noodging" referred, as the story was finished; and, soon after, dinner was announced.

When we were seated at table, the mistress of the house said, "Mr Subdean, what will you be pleased to eat?"—"Eat, madam? eat everything, from the top of the table to the bottom—from the beginning of the first course to the end of the second." Then, putting on an air of grave doubt and deliberation:—"There are those pork stakkes: I had intended to proceed, regularly and systematically, through the ham and fowls to the beef; but those pork stakkes stagger my system." I sat next to him: he turned suddenly upon me:—"Mr —, what would you do in such a case?" As I had to answer the first question proposed to me by the great Dr Paley, I endeavoured to do so in choice and correct phraseology. I said that when the end was the same, and the means equally innocent and indifferent. Paley had a quick and nice tact on all occasions: whether he understood the preciseness of my sentence as in jest or in earnest I know not; but, not allowing me to finish it, he cried out—"Ay, I see you are for the pork stakkes. Give me some of that dish;"—naming neither pork steaks nor ham and fowl.

Every one who has heard Paley converse must be aware how much his talk loses by being written down: no speech of the greatest orator,—not even that to which was applied "quid si ipsum vidisses?" could lose by transcription more of its force and effect. Paley's eloquence, however, did not, like that orator's, consist in his action: that was by no means graceful. His utterance was at times indistinct; and when the persons to whom he talked were near him, he talked between his teeth; but there was a variety and propriety of inflexion in the tones of his voice—an emphasis so pronounced, and so clearly conveying his meaning and feeling, assisted too by an intelligent smile or an arch leer,—that not only what was really witty appeared doubly clever, but his ordinary remarks seemed ingenious.

A party was assembled in the subscription news-room. Some one came up to him and made an excuse for a friend, who was obliged to defer an intended visit to the subdeanery, because a man who had promised to pay him some money in April, could not pay it till May. "A common case," said Paley.—We all laughed. Paley, by way of rewarding us for our complaisance in being pleased with what was recommended chiefly by the quaintness of his manner, went on:—"A man should never pay money till he can't help it; something may happen." These last three words were pronounced slowly, and with much affected seriousness.

At an other time he said—"I always desire my wife and daughters to pay ready money. It is of no use to desire them to buy only what they want; they will always imagine they want what they wish to buy: but that paying ready money is such a check upon their imagination."

We, that is the society of the place, dined at the subdeanery. The weather was excessively cold; the fire in the room in which we dined had been lighted but just before dinner; we were all chilled. Paley felt it to be useless to make apologies for what might have been so easily prevented; he talked of a dinner-party, "an improvement upon this room, for they dined out of doors." To one of the company who was helping to the trifle, as it is here called—"Captain —, you seem to be up to the elbows in suds; send me some of that; dig deep." I observed, that immediately after dinner he sent for his tooth-pick case, and was impatient till it was brought; that he drank very sparingly, of white wine chiefly; and that some gingerbread was served, not as part of the dessert, but to him alone.

After dinner, one of the party said, "Mr Subdean, if you will give me leave, I'll stir the fire." Paley rushed from his end of the table: "I understand your trick! you want to have an opportunity of warming yourself. 'These are reflections of a mind at ease.' I have been farther from the fire than any of you: give me the poker." When we were seated round the fire, he gave me a letter: "It relates to the hare we had at dinner. It is written by a farmer, a tenant to the Dean and Chapter. Nay, read it aloud." I read:—"Reverend Sir, I request your honour's acceptance of a hare, as I mean to ask a favour in a short time. I am, &c., &c." Paley said, "As the Dean remarked, so many thousand presents have been made with the same intention, yet the motive was never so honestly avowed before."

I said, "I hope the farmer will obtain the favour."—"Very likely he will."

His education had been sufficiently hardy. "My Father rode to Peterborough, and I rode after him, on a horse I could not manage. I tumbled off. My father, without looking back, cried out, 'Get up again, Will!'"

"When I set up a carriage, it was thought right that my armorial bearings should appear on the panels. Now, we had none of us ever heard of the Paley arms; none of us had ever dreamed that such things existed, or ever had been. All the old folks of the family were consulted; they knew nothing about it. Great search was made, however, and at last we found a silver tankard, on which was engraved a coat of arms. It was carried by common consent that these must be the Paley arms; they were painted on the carriage, and looked very handsome. The carriage went on very well with them; and it was not till six months afterwards that we found out that the tankard had been bought at a sale!" His looks and manner were an admirable running commentary on this story, and rendered it superfluous for him to make, and he did not make, any remark upon it.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XXIII.—KING JOHN.

'KING JOHN' is the last of the historical plays we shall have to speak of; and we are not sorry that it is. If we are to indulge our imagination, we had rather do it upon an imaginary theme; if we are to find subjects for the exercise of our pity and terror, we prefer seeking them in fictitious danger and fictitious distress. It gives a soreness to our feelings of indignation or sympathy, when we know that in tracing the progress of sufferings and crimes, we are treading upon real ground, and recollect that the poet's "dream" denoted a foregone conclusion—irrevocable ill, not conjured up by fancy, but placed beyond the reach of poetical justice. That the treachery of King John, the death of Arthur, the grief of Constance, had a real truth in history, sharpens the sense of pain, while it hangs a leaden weight on the heart and the imagination. Something whispers us that we have no right to make a mock of calamities like these, or to turn the truth of things into the puppet and play-thing of our fancies. "To consider thus" may be "to consider too curiously;" but still we think that the actual truth of the particular events, in proportion as we are conscious of it, is a drawback on the pleasure as well as the dignity of tragedy.

'King John' has all the beauties of language and all the richness of the imagination to relieve the painfulness of the subject. The character of King John himself is kept pretty much in the back-ground; it is only marked in by comparatively slight indications. The crimes he is tempted to commit are such as are thrust upon him rather by circumstances and opportunity than of his own seeking: he is here represented as more cowardly than cruel, and as more contemptible than odious. The play embraces only a part of his history. There are however few characters on the stage that excite more disgust and loathing. He has no intellectual grandeur or strength of character to shield him from the indignation which his immediate conduct provokes: he stands naked and defenceless, in that respect, to the worst we can think of him: and besides, we are impelled to put the very worst construction on his meanness and cruelty by the tender picture of the beauty and helplessness of the object of it, as well as by the frantic and heart-rending pleadings of maternal despair. We do not forgive him the death of Arthur because he had too late revoked his doom and tried to prevent it, and perhaps because he has himself repented of his black design, our moral sense gains courage to hate him the more for it. We take him at his word, and think his purposes must be odious indeed, when he himself shrinks back from them. The scene in which King John suggests to Hubert the design of murdering his nephew is a master-piece of dramatic skill, but it is still inferior, very inferior to the scene between Hubert and Arthur, when the latter learns the orders to put out his eyes. If anything ever was penned, heart-piercing, mixing the extremes of terror and pity, of that which shocks and that which soothes the mind, it is this scene. We will give it entire, though perhaps it is tasking the reader's sympathy too much.

Enter Hubert and Executioner.

HUBERT. Heat me these irons hot, and look you stand

Within the arras; when I strike my foot
Upon the bosom of the ground, rush forth
And bind the boy, which you shall find with me,
Fast to the chair: be heedful: hence, and watch.

EXECUTIONER. I hope your warrant will bear out the deed.

HUBERT. Uncleanly scruples! fear not you; look to't.—

Young lad, come forth; I have to say with you.

Enter Arthur.

ARTHUR. Good morrow, Hubert.

HUBERT. Morrow, little Prince.

ARTHUR. As little prince (having so great a title To be more prince) as may be. You are sad.

HUBERT. Indeed I have been merrier.

ARTHUR. Mercy on me!

Methinks nobody should be sad but I;
Yet I remember when I was in France,
Young gentlemen would be as sad as night,
Only for wantonness. By my Christendom,
So were I out of prison, and kept sheep,
I should be merry as the day is long.
And so I would be here, but that I doubt
My uncle practices more harm to me.
He is afraid of me, and I of him.

Is it my fault that I was Geoffrey's son?

Indeed it is not, and I would to heav'n

I were your son, so you would love me, Hubert.

HUBERT. If I talk to him, with his innocent prate

He will awake my mercy, which lies dead;

Therefore I will be sudden, and dispatch. [Aside.

ARTHUR. Are you sick, Hubert? you look pale to-day?

In sooth, I would you were a little sick,

That I might sit all night and watch with you.

Alas, I love you more than you do me.

HUBERT. His words do take possession of my bosom.

Read here, young Arthur— [Shewing a paper.

How now, foolish rheum, [Aside.

Turning dis-piteous torture out of door!

I must be brief, lest resolution drop

Out at mine eyes in tender womanish tears.—

Can you not read it? Is it not fair writ?

ARTHUR. Too fairly, Hubert, for so foul effect.

Must you with irons burn out both mine eyes?

HUBERT. Young boy, I must.

ARTHUR. And will you?

HUBERT. And I will.

ARTHUR. Have you the heart? When your head did but ache,

I knit my handkerchief about your brows,

(The best I had, a princess wrought it me)

And I did never ask it you again;

And with my hand at midnight held your head;

And, like the watchful minutes to the hour,

Still and anon chear'd up the heavy time,

Saying, what lack you? and where lies your grief?

Or, what good love may I perform for you?

Many a poor man's son would have lain still,

And ne'er have spoke a loving word to you;

But you at your sick service had a prince.

Nay, you may think my love was crafty love,

And call it cunning. Do, and if you will:

If heav'n be pleas'd that you must use me ill,

Why then you must.—Will you put out mine eyes?

These eyes, that never did, and never shall,

So much as frown on you?

HUBERT. I've sworn to do it;

And with hot irons must I burn them out.

ARTHUR. Oh, if an angel should have come to me,

And told me Hubert should put out mine eyes,

I would not have believ'd a tongue but Hubert's.

HUBERT. Come forth; do as I bid you.

[Stamps, and the men enter.

ARTHUR. O save me, Hubert, save me! my eyes are out

Ev'n with the fierce looks of these bloody men.

HUBERT. Give me the iron, I say, and bind him here.

ARTHUR. Alas, what need you be so boist'rous rough?

I will not struggle, I will stand stone-still.

For heav'n's sake, Hubert, let me not be bound.

Nay, hear me, Hubert, drive these men away,

And I will sit as quiet as a lamb.

I will not stir, nor wince, nor speak a word,

Nor look upon the iron angrily:

Thrust but these men away, and I'll forgive you,

Whatever torment you do put me to.

HUBERT. Go, stand within; let me alone with him.

EXECUTIONER. I am best pleas'd to be from such a deed. [Exit.

ARTHUR. Alas, I then have chid away my friend.

He hath a stern look, but a gentle heart;

Let him come back, that his compassion may

Give life to yours.

HUBERT. Come boy, prepare yourself.

ARTHUR. Is there no remedy?

HUBERT. None, but to lose your eyes.

ARTHUR. O heav'n! that there were but a moth in yours,

A grain, a dust, a gnat, a wand'ring hair,
Any annoyance in that precious sense:
Then feeling what small things are boist'rous there,
Your vile intent must needs seem horrible.

HUBERT. Is this your promise? go to, hold your tongue.

ARTHUR. Let me not hold my tongue; let me not, Hubert;

Or, Hubert, if you will, cut out my tongue,
So I may keep mine eyes. O spare mine eyes!
Though to no use, but still to look on you.

Lo, by my troth, the instrument is cold,

And would not harm me.

HUBERT. I can heat it, boy.

ARTHUR. No, in good sooth, the fire is dead with grief.

Being create for comfort, to be us'd

In undeserv'd extremes; see else yourself.

There is no malice in this burning coal;

The breath of heav'n hath blown its spirit out,

And strew'd repentant ashes on its head.

HUBERT. But with my breath I can revive it, boy.

ARTHUR. All things that you shall use to do me wrong,

Deny their office; only you do lack

That mercy which fierce fire and iron extend,

Creatures of note for mercy-lacking uses.

HUBERT. Well, see to live; I will not touch thine eyes

For all the treasure that thine uncle owns:

Yet I am sworn, and I did purpose, boy,

With this same very iron to burn them out.

ARTHUR. O, now you look like Hubert. All this while

You were disguised.

HUBERT. Peace, no more. Adieu,

Your uncle must not know but you are dead.

I'll fill these dogged spies with false reports.

And, pretty child, sleep doubtless and secure,

That Hubert, for the wealth of all the world,

Will not offend thee.

ARTHUR. O heav'n! I thank you, Hubert.

HUBERT. Silence, no more; go closely in with me;

Much danger do I undergo for thee. [Exeunt.

His death afterwards, when he throws himself from his prison-walls, excites the utmost pity for his innocence and friendless situation, and well justifies the exaggerated denunciations of Falconbridge to Hubert whom he suspects wrongfully of the deed.

"There is not yet so ugly a fiend of hell
As thou shalt be, if thou did'st kill this child.
—If thou did'st but consent
To this most cruel act, do but despair:
And if thou want'st a cord, the smallest thread
That ever spider twisted from her womb
Will strangle thee; a rush will be a beam
To hang thee on: or would'st thou drown thyself,
Put but a little water in a spoon,
And it shall be as all the ocean,
Enough to stifle such a villain up."

FINE ARTS AND LITERATURE.

The Mining Review, and Journal of Geology, Mineralogy, and Metallurgy. Conducted by H. English, Esq. No. VII. Simpkin and Marshall.

THE Mining Review! What, then, have the deep recesses of the earth come forward in these publishing days, to contribute their quota to the periodical literature! Truly they have. Mother earth has raised her hollow voice, and tells us of things old and wonderful, new and strange.

The volume before us is, as its title purports, a journal of mining transactions. From the tone of the writing it appears too exclusively devoted to the interests of certain Cornish establishments, which we hold to be an objection, inasmuch as it is likely to limit its sale. Exclusiveness begets exclusion. The account, however, of the consolidated mines in Cornwall is one of the most interesting papers we have ever perused; so potent and artful is the mechanism employed, so vast and grand the scenery it describes within the gloomy earth. The sinking of the new shaft is one of the most amazing triumphs of modern practical science.

"The new shaft was called Francis's shaft, in compliment to the late Captain William Francis, then principal agent of the concern; and, from the precision and dispatch with which it was executed, may be considered as one of the most remarkable performances which the art of mining has afforded.

"The situation chosen was north of the other shafts, and on the line of the old lode, which it was to intersect in depth, the underlie being about eighteen inches per fathom. Cross cuts were driven under this point from the adit, the 40, 70, 100, 120, 135 fathom levels; and while the upper portion of the shaft was sinking below the surface, the operation of sinking and raising were carried on from each of the cross cuts above mentioned, and also from the 150 and 160 fathom levels, which were already in the proper line, the ground thus being opened in fifteen different points at once. The total depth of the shaft was about 205 fathoms, and on the 31st of December, 1829 (in the March of which year it had been begun), the anxiety of the agents was relieved by correctly holding through the last bar of ground, which intervened between the surface and the bottom. Thus in about nine months and a half a perfect shaft, exceeding 200 fathoms in depth, was sunk from the surface; a work which, but for the skill and boldness with which geometry has lately been applied to the art of mining, would have taken years to complete, as well as requiring a much greater expense than it actually occasioned. Indeed, it is more than probable that, if attended by the same drawbacks, this and many similar works, whose value is in a great measure owing to the economy and expedition with which they can be effected, would never have been executed.

"So great was the accuracy and skill with which the dialings and measurements for this work were conducted, by the agents who had charge of these important operations, that, after the necessary squaring, Francis's shaft was as perfect as if sunk from the surface only, nor could any irregularity be observed at the junction of different portions."

AN INESTIMABLE PIECE OF ADVICE.

Rousseau :—My mind has certain moments of repose, or rather of oscillation, which I would not for the world disturb.—Music, eloquence, friendship, bring and prolong them. Malesherbes :—Enjoy them, my dear friend, and convert them, if possible, to months and years. It is as much at your arbitration on what theme you shall meditate, as on what field you shall botanise; and you have as much at your option the choice of your thoughts, as of the keys of your harpsichord. Rousseau :—If this were true, who could be unhappy? Malesherbes :—Those of whom it is not true; those who from want of practice cannot manage their thoughts, and who have few to select from, and who, because of their sloth or of their weakness, do not roll away the heaviest from before them.—Landon's Imaginary Conversations.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN MORALITY AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

The old play-writers are distinguished by an honest boldness of exhibition, they show everything without being ashamed. If a reverse in fortune be the thing to be personified, they fairly bring us to the prison-grate and the alms basket. A poor man on our stage is always a gentleman; he may be known by a peculiar neatness of apparel, and by wearing black. Our delicacy, in fact, forbids the dramatizing of distress at all. It is never shown in its essential properties; it appears but as the adjunct to some virtue, as something which is to be relieved, from the approbation of which relief the spectators are to derive a certain soothing of self-referred satisfaction. We turn away from the real essences of things to hunt after their relative shadows, moral duties; whereas, if the truth of things were fairly represented, the relative duties might be safely trusted to themselves, and moral philosophy lose the name of a science.—Lamb's Specimens.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE tone of CANTAB's letter has highly obliged us. We have prepared some remarks on the subject in question, which have been delayed; but they will appear. The same cause of delay has postponed Mr BARNARD's letter to another week.

The friendly remarks and suggestions of D. G., whether he agrees with or differs from us, are always welcome. We have never given up our intention of resuming the subject he speaks of; but none but an Editor can tell the perplexities that beset a Journal on all sides, with regard to what is thought most advisable.

Best thanks to Mr R. C.

THE PRINTING MACHINE.

SIR STAMFORD RAFFLES.

Memoir of the Life and Public Services of Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles, F.R.S., &c. &c. By his Widow. A new edition. 2 vols. post 8vo. London: James Duncan.

THIS is a new, and cheap, and convenient edition of a work of singular interest; and Lady Raffles, by omitting the many official documents and statements which, though perhaps necessary in the first instance, to do full justice to the public character of her husband, certainly encumbered the quarto volumes, has greatly improved the work, or at least rendered it far more attractive to the general reader—and this from her own account is what she proposed to herself. Indeed the mere change of form from the quarto to the commodious octavo is in itself an immense advantage, to say nothing of the great difference of price. The main materials of the book are so excellent, so admirably adapted to stand as bright examples and encouragements to those who have to make their way to knowledge, honour, and competence by their own exertions, and against a head stream of seemingly insurmountable difficulties and most discouraging reverses, that we hope the volumes will be universally read by the young, and find a place in every library in the kingdom. We are the more earnest in this hope, as in all this gifted man's notes and letters (which constitute the greater part of the work) there breathe the most noble spirit of patriotism and independence, the most expansive benevolence, the most generous aspirations for the improvement, and moral and physical elevation of all mankind; and in everyone of his actions (for his deeds kept pace with his thoughts and words) there is a high-mindedness, a total absence of sordidness or selfishness of any kind, and occasionally an heroism, a sublimity of motive and object that cannot be too frequently made subjects of contemplation and reverence. When conflicting interests are no longer heard of, and present or recent disputes utterly forgotten, the East India Company will claim no slight degree of admiration from the single circumstance of having fostered so many youths, who in her employment became most able and distinguished men, and who were not less distinguished by their virtues than by their abilities. Among these much honoured Britons who have laboured in the East, though there are high names among the living, as also among the recently dead, we do not believe there is one superior to Thomas Stamford Raffles.

If his memoirs had not been before the world for some time, we certainly should give as copious an analysis, with extracts from them, as the limits of our journal permit; but even as it is, and at the risk of repeating what some of our readers may already know, we will allude to a few incidents of this remarkable life. So excellent an example cannot well be too frequently presented to the world.

Raffles was essentially a man of the people, inheriting no honours except those of an honest name, and no estates or wealth of any kind. His father was the skipper or commander of a West Indiaman, and he was born at sea, on board his father's ship, on the 5th of July 1781, off the island of Jamaica. After passing two years at a boarding-school at Hammersmith, he was removed from his studies and placed, when only fourteen years of age, as an extra clerk in the East India House. "I was thus," he says himself in a modest and truly touching manner, "forced to enter on the busy scenes of public life as a mere boy. My leisure hours, however, still continued to be devoted to favourite studies; and with the little aid my allowance afforded, I contrived to make myself master of the French language, and to prosecute inquiries into some of the branches of literature and science. This was, however, in stolen moments, either before the office hours in the morning, or after them in the evening. I look back to these days of difficulty and application with some degree of pleasure." "I feel that I did all that I could to improve myself, and I have nothing to reproach myself with."

These words, so encouraging to others, were written many years afterwards, when, by force of his steady application, he had risen to posts of high honour and power, and made himself an accomplished scholar and excellent naturalist, notwithstanding the almost incessant labours that attended the various offices he had held in India. He continued all through life to regret the deficiencies of his early education; but we are not quite sure that his self-tuition was not as good as the education he would have got at schools and colleges, and his early initiation into business certainly better fitted him for the avocations that afterwards fell to him than years spent at Oxford or Cambridge would have done. A person who, besides learning the Malay, the Javanese, and other Eastern living languages, made himself sufficiently master of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, to be able to read them currently, and for his amusement and private instruction, had surely no reason to complain of a neglected education; and, in addition to these acquirements, and to law and the rules of administration, and the many things he had to learn for the proper discharge of his duties, Raffles amassed much knowledge in botany, mineralogy, and more especially in zoology. He had probably more general information than half the professors going. But so it is;—there is a sort of superstition attached to colleges, and to what is called a learned education, and while those who can command the advantages too commonly neglect them, those who have not had the opportunity are too apt to regret them, and attach more importance to them than they deserve.

While young Raffles, though chained to a desk in Leadenhall street, was still struggling after intellectual wealth, his father fell into pecuniary difficulties. On this the noble-hearted boy shortened his hours of study, and lengthened those of his merely mechanical labours. His widow says:—

"By his extra work at his office he obtained an addition to his salary, which was not appropriated to any selfish purpose, but all he earned was carried home to his parents. His affection to his mother was always one of the strongest feelings of his heart. At this time, with that self-denying devotion to the happiness of others, which was his distinguishing quality through life, he deprived himself of every indulgence, that he might devote to her his hard-earned pittance; and in after days of comparative affluence he delighted in surrounding her with every comfort."

The blessing of heaven, the esteem and favour of the world, could hardly fail to attend such conduct! This is like reading some of Crabbe's most touching domestic poetry, or, better still, the real story of Crabbe's own early struggles. We love the memory of Raffles for this, among many other reasons—he never attempted to conceal the poverty and obscurity of his early life; and we most highly esteem Lady Raffles, because she is capable of the same frankness, and can thus speak of her husband. It is strange, and almost unaccountable, how it should be so, but owing to the empty pride, the upstart arrogance, the contempt for what is called low birth, the horror of homely industry and usefulness, the sneering, tittering superciliousness that pervade and disgrace a large portion of our aristocratic society, people who get up to its level by their own merits are too frequently ashamed of what does them most honour, and nervously draw a veil over all their natural connexions, and all the difficulties that have attended the days of their youth. And yet to us it only seems to require a little bold sincerity to check this insolence, and emancipate from the dread of it the men who have been the architects of their own fortunes. "His father was a common shoe-maker," said one of this coterie, in speaking of an individual who had risen high in the world—"That's very true; but if your father had been a shoe-maker, you would never have been anything but a cobbler yourself," was the retort of the gentleman it was intended to insult.

Raffles appears never to have had a strong constitution, and his long confinement to his desk, with his severe application to his studies after his office hours, seriously threatened his health. "He was ordered to relax his exertions, and to leave his office for a time; he obeyed, and obtained a fortnight's leave of absence. The use which he made of this short period of recreation is very characteristic: he seized on the moment to indulge that love of mountain scenery, so strong in most youthful minds, so happily undying and unfading in its exciting, joyous feeling. He resolved to go into Wales,—set off on foot, and walked at the rate of thirty and forty miles a day,—accomplished his object, and returned to his desk with restored health."

His absolute passion for picturesque scenery, his perseverance in travelling, and ready and cheerful submission to difficulties and privations, accompanied him through life, as did also a charming simplicity of tastes and feelings. The things that pleased him as a humble extra clerk in the India House, continued to delight him when he was Lieutenant-Governor at Java or Sumatra. Plants, flowers, and animals, were never-failing sources of enjoyment to him; and his widow informs us that he would spend hours in fondling and domesticating the curious animals that were brought to him in India.

"He entered with the most child-like simplicity into occupations and pleasures which many would consider beneath their notice; a mountain scene would bring tears into his eyes; a flower would call forth a burst of favourite poetry; it was, perhaps, peculiar to himself, to be able to remark on his last return to England, that he had never seen a horse-race,—never fired a gun."

In 1805 Raffles, who though poor and unprotected had made himself known in his office and to the Secretary of the Court of Directors by his industry and abilities,—was sent out to Penang as Assistant Secretary to a new establishment the Company had formed there. This, in itself, was high promotion for a young man of twenty-four; but being once placed in situations of great difficulty and responsibility, he soon proved to the Company that he was capable of discharging the duties of the very highest offices.

The information he obtained about the Malay nation, the Moluccas, and all the islands of the Indian Archipelago, appears to have been most complete; and he himself not only suggested the reduction of Java, but arranged almost everything connected with the expedition that conquered that island. His amiability worked in favour of his policy. Unlike most of our Nabobs, who considered it degrading to associate with the blacks and half-castes, Raffles always courted the society of the natives, inviting them to his house, and treating them with consideration, kindness, and confidence. Hence, wherever he went he obtained the best local information from the best sources, and there was nothing these people would not do for him. At the same time it should be mentioned, that he entered heart and soul into whatever he considered likely to advance the civilization of the natives, and never considered his own success or the prosperity of the establishment entrusted to his management, apart from the prosperity of the people. Several of his notions in administration and practical political economy which may look like truisms now, could scarcely be called truisms a quarter of a century ago; and then Raffles, when not hampered by instructions from Leadenhall street, applied his liberal theory, and acted up to it. The onerous monopolies, the short-sighted restrictions on trade, the system of slavery, received many a shake at his hands, though the time had not yet come for their full or entire abolition.

In 1811 Raffles was appointed Governor of the great and magnificent island of Java, where about six millions of inhabitants were benefitted by his wise and liberal rule. In 1816 he returned to England, and shortly after Java was restored to its former masters and oppressors the Dutch, whose illiberal policy soon undid all the good he had done. It is very interesting to see with what earnestness he pleaded the cause of the Javanese as long as there was any hope of being of service to them, and how deeply and constantly he regretted their condition when that hope was gone. He generally looked on the bright side of human nature, and he saw in those poor heathens the germ of many virtues, and the fair promise of an intellectual development. In 1817 he was named Governor of Bencoolen, in Sumatra, at which island he arrived in the spring of the following year. With his characteristic energy and activity he immediately began to explore the island. On his arrival he was told by every body that it was impossible to penetrate into the interior. "We will try," said Sir Stamford; and in a few months he penetrated everywhere, crossing that large island in several directions. Much to her credit, Lady Raffles accompanied him on these expeditions, which were fatiguing, difficult, and dangerous. They had to go through forests swarming with elephants, rhinoceroses, tigers, and other wild beasts, to cross tremendous mountains, and descend rapid rivers on weak bamboo rafts.

In a few months more, they knew more about Sumatra than had ever been known by an European, with the exception, perhaps, of Mr Marsden. At the same time Sir Stamford turned his attention to the erecting of schools for the natives, and to the devising such laws and regulations as might extend their trade, give security to their property, suppress piracy, and induce habits of industry and social order.

In 1818, when the Dutch were really threatening to shut us out of those Eastern seas, Sir Stamford, after many obstacles on the part of the Governor-General, the Marquis of Hastings, was authorized to form a new establishment at Singapore, an admirable spot of his own choosing, which has risen most rapidly in commercial importance, and is now (since the opening of the China trade) rising faster than ever. Lady Raffles says—

"Independently of the tribes of the Archipelago, the situation of Singapore (close to the Malay peninsula) is peculiarly favourable for its becoming the entrepot to which the native mariners of Siam, Cambodia, Chiampa, Cochin China, and China itself, may annually resort. It is to the straits of Singapore that their merchants are always bound in the first instance; and if, on their arrival in them, they find a market for their goods, and the means of supplying their wants, they have no inducement to proceed to the more distant, unhealthy, and expensive Dutch fort of Batavia. The passage from China can be made in less than six days."

In a letter to Mr Marsden, Sir Stamford says,—

"Singapore is every thing we could desire, it will soon rise into importance; and with this single station I would undertake to counteract all the plans of Mynheer; it breaks the spell; and they are no longer the exclusive sovereigns of the Eastern seas. This place possesses an excellent harbour, and every thing that can be desired for a British port in the island of St John's, which forms the South-Western point of the harbour. We have commenced an intercourse with all ships passing through the straits of Singapore."

Sir Stamford was accustomed to call Singapore his political child—a child of his own—his darling child; and he informs us that, but for his Malay studies, and his intercourse with Malay people, he should hardly have known such a place existed; not only the European, but the Indian world also being ignorant of it. Six hundred years before, it had been the flourishing capital of the Malays, but it had fallen into ruin.

In 1822 Sir Stamford was again at Singapore, busily engaged in establishing a constitution for that prosperous settlement.

"The utmost possible freedom of trade and equal rights to all, with protection of property and person, are the objects to be attained, and I shall spare no pains to establish such laws and regulations as may be most conducive to them. In Java I had to remodel, and in doing so, to remove the rubbish and encumbrances of two centuries of Dutch mal-administration—here I have an easier task, and the task is new."

On the unhealthy coast of Sumatra death had been in his house.—He had recently lost children and friends, but his ardent soul revived and bounded again as he looked around him at Singapore, though with the timidity or misgiving that follows on long borrow and misfortune, he exclaimed, "May this child, at least live,—Oh! rob me not of this my political child."

"Here," he says, "all is life and activity; and it would be difficult to name a place on the face of the globe with brighter prospects or more present satisfaction. In little more than three years it has risen from an insignificant fishing-village to a large and prosperous town, containing at least 10,000 inhabitants of all nations, actively engaged in commercial pursuits, which afford to each and all a handsome livelihood and abundant profit. There are no complaints here of want of employment, no deficiency of rents, or dissatisfaction at taxes. Land is rapidly rising in value, and instead of the present number of inhabitants, we have reason to expect that we shall have at least ten times as many before many years have passed. This may be considered as the simple but almost magical result of that perfect freedom of trade which it has been my good fortune to establish."

We cannot lengthen our extracts, but most earnestly do we recommend all this part of the Memoirs to the attention and study of our readers.

In the month of February 1824, after a service of many years, and with a worn-out constitution, Sir Stamford quitted Sumatra, and sailed for England. On the first night he was at sea the ship caught fire, when she was about fifty miles from land. Though they had a very narrow escape, no lives were lost, and passengers and crew got safely back to Bencoolen; but everything on board perished, the flames devouring Sir Stamford's magnificent collections in natural history, his splendid collection of drawings, his numerous and rare Oriental books and manuscripts, and all his valuable papers, notes, and observations. This was a great, a cruel, and irremediable loss; but he seems to have supported it with admirable equanimity. At last, in August 1824, Sir Stamford reached his native land, where he fondly promised himself a long enjoyment of competence and literary leisure. At the recommendation of the late Mr Wilberforce, who, a short time before, had purchased an adjoining estate, Sir Stamford bought a pretty house with a park and pleasant gardens, at Highwood Hill, a little to the west of the great Northern road, between Hendon, Totteridge, and Barnet. He took possession of that place in July 1825, and there he expired on the 5th of July 1826. He was only forty-five years old; but such a life is not to be counted by common days, weeks, months, and years. From his boyhood upwards he crowded small spaces of time with large and honourable actions. He did more work, he thought more, and (as we are disposed to believe, in spite of many crosses), enjoyed more in one day than the large majority of even active intellectual men do in three days. In this sense he was an old man; his life far exceeded the Scriptural allotment of threescore years and ten; and if we take into account the sum of happiness he conferred on his too long oppressed and abused fellow men, and let good deeds stand for years, he was as old as any of the antediluvian patriarchs.

His History of Java will preserve his name in the literature of his country. All that he did for natural history, and for the encouragement and generous assistance of those who gave themselves up to the study of it, are things well known to the large and constantly increasing class of naturalists. But, we believe, the public in general does not sufficiently bear in mind that to his active exertions in 1824, 5, and 6, we are mainly indebted for the establishment of the Zoological Society, and that admirable exhibition, the Zoological Gardens. When he was in Europe in 1816, on passing through Paris, he was struck with the Jardin des Plantes, the Zoological Gardens of that capital, and was anxious to see something of the same sort in London; and when he returned to England for good, in 1824, he took up the subject with his usual activity—an activity that neither time nor declining health could check or discourage. He had only been a few months in London when he suggested the plan to the late Sir Humphrey Davy, and owing to the influence, the representations, and correspondence of these two remarkable men, a subscription list was soon filled, and the plan carried into effect. Our readers are not the good people we delight to fancy them, if they do not feel the pleasures of a stroll in the Zoological Gardens enhanced by associating with that beautiful place the beautiful memory of a man like Thomas Stamford Raffles.

WALLACE'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

The History of England, continued from the late Right Hon. Sir James Mackintosh. Vol. V. (Dr Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia, Vol. 69). 12mo. London. 1835. Pp. 369. 6s.

THIS second volume of the continuation of the late Sir James Mackintosh's History commences with the accession of Charles I, in 1625, and brings down the narrative of events to the fatal fight of Naseby in 1645. These twenty years form unquestionably the most stirring portion of the history of England: the heroic tale is here at its highest swell. It was then that were really undergone the heavings and throes of the mighty struggle which issued in the establishment of the ascendancy of the popular principle in the constitution, over the power of old prerogative; that great revolution was only brought to rest in 1688, its strain and consummating crash, which shook the kingdom to the centre, took place forty years before. What was done in 1688 is properly called a settlement; the true Revolution had been already effected. Even the great example of a King dethroned—that triumphal monument of the victory of the new principle—had been already set up, and that too, it must be confessed, whatever we may think of the matter in other points of view, in a style as much bolder and more imposing than that adopted on the second occasion, as the spirit of original genius is loftier and more daring than that of the mere imitative faculty. And such was really the difference between the men. Those of each period were perhaps best fitted for the work they had to perform; but undoubtedly there can be no comparison made, in respect either of intellectual height and capacity, or of moral grandeur of purpose and of action, between the expediency politicians who managed the arrangement of 1688, and the leaders of the national cause—many of them, like the Agamemnons and the Achilles of old, equally ready for the council and the battle—in that modern heroic age, the era of the Great Rebellion.

Mr Wallace, the author of the present History, is not exactly what was called the other night in the House of Lords "a Whig and something more," but rather the "something more" of that phrase, without the "Whig." In his treatment of the momentous transactions which come under his review, he takes a side, and a strong one; but his work is written throughout in a generous spirit, and displays none of the narrow-mindedness, the intolerance, the unfairness, and the other hateful qualities that belong to the mere party-man. His mode of maintaining his principles may by some be deemed stern, and his condemnation of the conduct of which he disapproves occasionally harsh, and evidencing less allowance than a philosopher would make for the force of circumstances bearing upon the common weakness of humanity; but he does not, like the mere party hack, either enviously and spitefully toil to dim all lustre of character or of conduct that does not adorn his own side of the question, or as blindly and foolishly pass over, or try to hide from view, the faults of those with whom he goes along in their leading spirit and objects. Thus, although he carries his admiration of the founders of the Commonwealth farther than a Tory or even than most Whigs would, he expresses without scruple and without ceremony his want of sympathy with the theological bigotry which mixed so largely in their motives and proceedings, and while it no doubt contributed powerfully to sustain their ardour and fortitude, so often made men act tyrannically or ridiculously. On the whole, however to the lover of liberty this will be an inspiring book. It is, perhaps, the most effectual exposition that has yet been given of that course of insolence, perfidy, tyranny, and folly, on the part of Charles, which drove the parliament and the nation into resistance, and rendered everything that followed inevitable. The statement is chiefly one of facts, and these, to a great extent, delivered in the words of the original witnesses or documents; but they are arranged and disposed with very considerable art, and the few reflections which the severe fashion of the narrative admits, are in general remarkably pertinent, and introduced and expressed in a manner that makes them strike home with their whole force. The style of the work is rather vigorous than very elegant or tasteful; but it is a sufficiently expressive vehicle of the author's spirit and sentiments. Altogether, looking both to this point and to the reading and research displayed in it, the literary merits of the performance are of a very superior order.

The following passage, which is the only extract for which we have room, will convey a very good idea of the author's manner of narration;—

"On the 25th of February (1649), a sub-committee of religion presented a long and elaborate report of 'heads of articles to be insisted on by the house.' Charles, to ward off this terrible array of charges, chiefly aimed at the Arminian system, so called, of Laud, sent a command to both houses to adjourn to the 28th of March. This command had the effect of drawing from Sir John Elliot a denunciation of Weston, lord treasurer, as the enemy of the commonwealth, following in the footsteps of his master, the great duke, and the author of this interruption to the proceedings of the house. 'They go about,' said he, 'to break parliaments, but parliament will break them.' The speaker delivered the king's command to adjourn. Several declared that it was not the speaker's business to deliver such a message, and that adjournment was a matter for the house only. Sir John Elliot produced a remonstrance to the king against tonnage and poundage, and desired it should be read by the speaker. The speaker refused. He then desired it should be read by the clerk at the table. The clerk also refused. This fearless champion of the public liberty then read it himself, and demanded of the speaker to put it to the vote. The speaker said, 'he was commanded otherwise by the king.' Selden reminded him of his paramount duty to the house by his office. He replied that he had an express command from the king that upon delivering the message of adjournment he should rise; and he accordingly was about to leave the chair. Several members, among whom were Holles and Valentine, forced him back into the chair, whilst Sir Thomas Edmonds and other courtiers endeavoured to release him. Holles swore the speaker should sit still until it pleased them to rise. He wept and entreated; said he would sacrifice his life for his country, but durst not sin against the command of his sovereign. Sir Peter Hayman renounced him for his kinsman, as a blot to his family. Neither advice nor threats could prevail, and Holles read and put to the vote the following protest:—'1st. Whoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favour seek to extend or introduce popery or Arminianism, or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. 2nd. Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. 3rd. If any merchant, or other person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberty of England, and an enemy to the same.'

"Whilst this protest was pending, a message from the king commanded the sergeant to bring away his mace, as the means of putting a stop to all proceedings. The house not only prevented his going, but deprived him of the key of the door, which was locked. Upon this the usher of the black rod knocked at the door in the king's name, and was refused entrance. Charles, in a transport of rage, sent for the guard to force open the door; but the commons, meanwhile, having voted their protest, adjourned to the following 10th of March.

"On that day the king came to the house of lords, and after a speech in which he called the patriot members of the house of commons vipers, who should have their rewards, commanded the lord keeper to declare the parliament dissolved. Several of the commons were present, but the house had not received the usual command to attend.

"The members thus termed vipers, and threatened with his vengeance by the king, were already in his grasp. The proclamation for the dissolution of parliament was signed on the 3rd, but kept back to the 10th of March. Meanwhile Elliot, Holles, Selden, Valentine, Coryton, Hobart, Hayman, Long, and Stroud, who had been active in the scene of the protest, were commanded, by warrant, to appear before the privy council. All except the two last presented themselves, but refused to answer out of the house what they had said in it, and were committed to the Tower. Stroud and Long also came in upon the issue of a proclamation for apprehending them, and were committed, like the former. The studies of Holles, Elliot, Selden, Long, and Valentine were entered, and their papers seized by the king's warrant.

"The king issued a long declaration of his reasons for the dissolution. It rather exasperated than assuaged the public discontent. The people threatened his advisers, and clamoured for a parliament. Charles, with his obstinate and despotic infatuation, issued a proclamation announcing his present disuse of parliaments, and forbidding, as a presumption, the mention of them.

"It is astonishing that this prince, after the experience of his father's reign and his own, should hope to eradicate from the very heart of the English people their attachment to a parliamentary government as their birthright. Never was there an occasion less favourable for his purpose. He had, it is true, the patriot chiefs caged in the Tower; but it was too late. They had already launched the petition of rights upon the great ocean of the popular mind. Tyranny might imprison or slay them; or they might be tortured into a recantation, and prove recreant to their principles; but the petition of rights was irrevocable.

"Those champions of liberty whom Charles sent to the Tower were no less heroes than the patriots of Marathon and Thermopylae. Their position, viewed without reference to the event, was, perhaps, a more trying test of courage and character than the most fearful odds in battle, or the most forlorn defence of a pass. The terrors of the star-chamber, with its iniquitous judgments and atrocious punishments, were uncertain and prolonged. To face them demanded resolution the most sustained and fearless, a tone of mind the most firm, and elastic courage of the highest order, physical and moral. It is to these brave and virtuous patriots, whose names were long covered with obloquy or oblivion, that the English nation owes the preservation of its liberty."

COMMERCIAL POCKET GUIDE.

The Merchant's and Banker's Pocket Guide. 16mo. Glasgow: M'Phun. 1835. pp. 124.

This little manual, or waistcoat-pocket compendium, is as intelligently compiled, as it is neatly and attractively printed and got up. It is calculated to be of great and general utility, not only in the mercantile world, but as an elementary exposition of the principles and the practice of commerce for readers of all classes.

The first chapter contains within the space of eighteen pages definitions of all the more important technical terms of commerce, such as Agio, Assignee, Auction, Average, Balance of Accounts and of Trade, Barratry, Bill, Broker, Charter-party, Cheek, Consul, Customs, Discount, Drawback, Excise, Freight, Manifest, Money, Partnership, Pawn-broker, Quarantine, Receipt, Sample, &c. &c. These short articles are written with much precision and clearness, and under many of the heads a great deal of information is given respecting both the law and the political economy of the subject treated of. The second chapter is on Bankruptcy, the laws in regard to which, both in England and Scotland, are explained. In chapter third, on the Banking System, after a short introductory notice of early Banks, the writer proceeds to consider in succession the subjects of the general principles of Banking—the Bank of England—English Private and Provincial Banks—Banking in Scotland—Banking in Ireland—and Foreign Banks. The fourth chapter is devoted to an account of the origin, history, and present state of the East India Company, and of the trade with China. Chapter fifth is on the important subject of Exchange—and after an explanation of Bills of Exchange, and of the variations in foreign Exchanges, concludes with a table of the value of the most important foreign coins, extracted from Dr Kelly's 'Cambist.' The sixth chapter explains the general principles affecting prices, and presents a table of the rise or fall per cent, from 1826 to 1833 inclusive, on the prices of the chief British staple commodities, and articles of East and West India produce. The seventh chapter contains a short account of the principal English and Continental fairs and markets. The eighth chapter is on the Funds, and explains the principles of the Funding System, the progress and present state of the National Debt, the mode of transferring Stock, and the practice of business at the Stock Exchange. The subject of Insurance, including Fire Insurance, Life Insurance, and Marine Insurance, is discussed in the ninth chapter; and the tenth and last consists of a collection of useful tables, of the values of foreign coins, of annuities, of interest, of wages, of foreign linen measures, of the monies, weights, and measures of India and China, &c.

The opinions of the writer upon the various subjects on which he touches are in general sound and liberal, and in conformity with those that have been advocated by the ablest recent authorities, Adam Smith, Mr Macculloch, Mr Senior, Dr Hamilton, Ricardo, &c. The following short extract may serve as a specimen of the manner in which the work is executed:—

EXCHANGE.

"Suppose D of Glasgow owes X of Bourdeaux 1000*l*. It will of course be more convenient for D to pay X in this country, if the thing be possible, than to run the risk and incur the expense of transmitting so large a sum of money by post. Now if X of Bourdeaux should at this time be indebted in the same amount of 1000*l*. to A of Glasgow, or in the sum of 500*l*. to A of Glasgow, and another sum of 500*l*. to B of Edinburgh, the transaction betwixt D and X can be cheaply and expeditiously settled by the former procuring X's letter authorizing him to pay A 1000*l*, or A and B 500*l*. each. Or supposing that X has no debts in this country, but that another merchant of Bourdeaux has occasion to pay 1000*l*. in Scotland, in such a case it is also obvious that the transaction betwixt D and X could be settled without the transmission of money from one country to another. Hence the origin of foreign bills of exchange. D of Glasgow having a payment to make in Bourdeaux, does not remit the money, but buys a bill upon Bourdeaux, that is, an order from some one having a debt due to him in Bourdeaux, to pay the amount of it to D of Glasgow, or his order. D then indorses this bill, and sends it to his creditor X in Bourdeaux, who receives payment from his neighbour merchant. All parties are benefited by this transaction: two debts are discharged in two different countries, without the risk of transmitting money, and one stamp and a few postages are the only expenses incurred.

"A bill of exchange then is 'an order addressed to some person residing at a distance, directing him to pay a certain specified sum to the person in whose favour the bill is drawn, or his order.'"

The information in the following table may be new to some of our readers, and will be found useful in reading historical works and old documents relating to Scotland:—

"Scottish money was abolished, as a circulating medium, by the Articles of Union; but the 'valued rent' of lands, and in many places of the feu-duties, minister's stipends, schoolmasters' salaries, and other parochial burdens, are still reckoned by the pound, or merk Scots, though paid in Sterling money.

1 penny, or doyt	=	$\frac{1}{12}$ d.
2 pennies	1 bodle,	$\frac{1}{6}$ d.
2 bodles	1 plack, or groat	$\frac{1}{4}$ d.
3 placks	1 bawbee,	$\frac{1}{2}$ d.
12 pennies	1 shilling,	1d.
20 shillings	1 pound,	20d.
13 shillings and 4 pennies	1 merk,	13 d.
18 merks, or 12 pounds	1 pound Sterling."

THE STREETS OF THE METROPOLIS.

THEIR MEMORIES AND GREAT MEN.

INTRODUCTION.

CONTENTS:

Peculiar fitness of this subject for the London Journal. Interestingness of local histories. London before the deluge! Its origin according to the fabulous writers and poets. First historical mention of it. Its names. British, Roman, Saxon, and Norman London. General progress of the city and of civilization. Range of the Metropolis as it existed in the time of Shakspeare and Bacon. Growth of the streets during the later reigns. "Merry London" and "Merry England." Curious assertion respecting trees in the city.

NAMES, whether of men or journals, have often little reference to qualities. Many a brisk gentleman pushes forward in spite of his cautious appellation of Onslow, perhaps to the astonishment of a stout and suffering person behind him, whose name is Gollightly; and newspapers, magazines, pocket-books, &c. are famous for their wrong christenings. Suns begin to rise towards evening. New Monthlies are old; Journals (our own among them) come out weekly, though their name implies daily. There is a worthy publication, which with an intensity of inadvertence, calls itself the Daily Journal; that is to say, the Daily Daily. The truth is, that expediency, rather than fitness, has the settlement of these matters. Our ancestors are responsible for the names of their posterity; but those of periodicals are generally given with reference to something which is to disrepute them from their contemporaries, or to set them in some immediate light of contrast, friendly or otherwise as it may happen. The London Journal was so named from its proposing to be an English counterpart to the Edinburgh Journal of our Scottish friends; but the designation, otherwise, is as bad as need be. It is not a Journal, as we have just shewn; and all which it has to do with London, consists in a certain liberality and looking-forth upon the world in general, as from a vantage-ground, which is shared in common, or ought to be so, by every observer who lives in a great city.

We have often wished, however, that without compromising its acceptability in the country, our Journal contained something more directly linking it with the metropolis. We endeavoured, at one time, that it should do so, but not to our convenience or satisfaction. We shall probably endeavour again, and in different ways; but meantime it has struck us, that we could not do better than equalize the size and price of our monthly sets (otherwise disproportioned on account of the irregular number of weeks in each month) by giving a Supplement whenever it was required, and making this Supplement consist of a familiar and companionable survey of the STREETS OF THE METROPOLIS,—their MEMORIES and GREAT MEN.

The country is glad to hear of the town: the intellectual portion of the country will be more especially glad to hear of what has rendered the metropolis truly famous, and makes its old streets ever new in interest to the reader and the humanist. Let a young artist come, for the first time, to London, and if he has any enthusiasm, he goes and seeks out the places where Sir Joshua Reynolds lived, and Hogarth. Let a poet come, and he is for standing under the sacred porticoes of Milton and Shakspeare, (perhaps in some now wretched lane,) and wondering how any body can pass without stopping —"to look up and wonder."

And so the young philosophers and men of science find out the houses of the Bentham and Newtons; and the musicians those of Purcell and Handel,—hardly sure, if they hear a piano-forte strike up out of a window, that the immortal voice itself is not speaking to them. They shall have them all here, with hundreds of others, all interesting in some way or other. We shall be most happy to accompany the stranger in his rounds, and to tell him all we know, to "do the honours," (truly so called) of the place we live in, just as he would shew us those of Edinburgh, or Dublin, or of Paris or Madrid, and bring us acquainted with the localities of Hume and Swift, of Moliere and Cervantes. We regard it as a fortunate thing for ourselves (and hope it will not prove otherwise to the reader) that our enthusiasm is local as well as general, and that we can look upon no place in which any tribe of men, especially if they numbered excellent men among them, have lived, and died, and loved, and struggled, and made a habit of the objects around them, without feeling a strong interest in these objects. We never meet with a local history, however small or remote the spot, without taking a lodging in it, as it were, for the time: exploring the neighbourhood; and making ourselves familiar with this corner and that, those trees down by the river, that path up the hill side, and above all, with the pleasant people we fancy in it, and the ever-living genius whose image may still walk there. Thomson lives for us, this moment, at Richmond; Sidney at Penshurst; Burns in Dumfries; and Shakspeare, Chaucer and Spenser, are mingled in the streets of London with a thousand illustrious pedestrians. We see Johnson turning a corner, like a whale in a great wig; and Bacon going to court with his eyes turned towards the ground, thinking.

We propose to take the whole circuit of the metropolis, including such of the suburbs as have become a constituent part of the mighty mass of houses, not omitting, if possible, the newest streets, and by no means despising the allies. We gave the reason just now, when speaking of Shakspeare and Milton. In a court in the Old Bailey lived Goldsmith; and in one of the squalidest corners of Whitechapel was the stately palace of Count Gondamar, who was a wit as well as an ambassador, and the delight of the court of James the First.

We shall divide our work into sections or neighbourhoods, in order that the reader, if he pleases, may turn to the spot he is most interested in, at once; and a copious index will be furnished with the concluding number, for the facility of general reference. It is not too much perhaps to say, that a work of this nature is a desideratum. Occasional sketches towards it, in periodical works, have been eagerly received; and without meaning to undervalue the labours of those who have written best upon the metropolis, the venerable Stow in particular, and the lively Pennant, it is conceived that the mass of information to be found in a variety of books, many of them mere booksellers' jobs, may not only furnish a compact and concentrated miscellany, the selectness of which shall contain all that is necessary and graceful, while the rubbish is thrown aside, but receive additions from the stores of anecdote and biography, which shall greatly increase the list of intellectual inhabitants, and stock our spirit of a city with wit and amusement. Nothing, at all events, will be omitted which shall be thought conducive to the interests of humanity, and the progress of knowledge. Memorable events, as well as men, will, of course, meet with due notice. Martyrdoms will not be omitted in Smithfield; nor tilts and tournaments; nor the deaths of Raleigh, Russell, and King Charles; nor plagues and fires; nor daring villainies; nor old prejudice; nor modern improvement. But care will be taken to add as much as possible (consistent with a due brevity) of the interior of life, of wits, and clubs, and theatres, and the manners of interesting women; and we shall specially endeavour to avoid everything dull and superfluous, so that if the reader pitch upon a chapter at random, he may be pretty sure to find something amusing in its nature, whatever may be the mode of handling it. In fact, we are so interested in the work ourselves, that we conceive it difficult not to find enough topics of entertainment, to the exclusion of all others. If we are mistaken, the fault will lie in our fondness for the subject.

We think, however, that it is natural to every body to take a considerable interest in the subject; and that nothing but accident hinders it, where it is not taken. In one of those children's books which contain reading fit for the manliest, and which we have known accordingly to interest very grave and even great men, there is a pleasant chapter entitled Eyes and no Eyes, or the Art of Seeing.^{*} The two heroes of it come, home successively from a walk in the same road, one of them having seen only a heath and a hill, and the meadows by the water-side, and therefore having seen nothing,—the other expatiating on his delightful ramble, because the heath presented him with curious birds, and the hill with the remains of a camp, and the meadows with reeds, and rats, and herons, and king-fishers, and sea-shells, and a man catching eels, and a glorious sunset.

In like manner people may walk through a crowded city, and see nothing but the crowd. A man may go from Bond-street to Blackwall, and unless he has the luck to witness an accident, or get a knock from a porter's burthen, may be conscious, when he has returned, of nothing but the names of those two places, and of the mud through which he has passed. Nor is this to be attributed to dullness. He may, indeed, be dull. The eyes of his understanding may be like bad spectacles, which no brightening would enable to see much. But he may be only inattentive. Circumstances may have induced a want of curiosity, to which imagination itself shall contribute, if not taught to use its eyes. This is particularly observable in childhood, when the love of novelty is strongest. A boy at the Charter-House, or Christ-Hospital, probably cares nothing for his neighbourhood, though stocked with a great deal that might entertain him. He has been too much accustomed to identify it with his school-room. We remember the time ourselves when the only thought we had in going through the metropolis was how to get out of it; how to arrive, with our best speed, at the beautiful vista of home and a pudding, which awaited us in the distance. And long after this we saw nothing in London, but the book-shops which have taught us better.

"I have often," says Boswell, with the inspiration of his great London-loving friend upon him, "amused myself with thinking how different a place London is to different people. They whose narrow minds are contracted to the consideration of some one particular pursuit, view it only through that medium. A politician thinks of it merely as the seat of government in its different departments; a grazier as a vast market for cattle; a mercantile man as a place where a prodigious deal of business is done upon 'Change; a dramatic enthusiast as the grand scene of theatrical entertainments; a man of pleasure as an assemblage of taverns, &c. &c.; but the intellectual man is struck with it as comprehending the whole of human life in all its variety, the contemplation of which is inexhaustible."

It does not follow that the other persons whom Boswell speaks of are not, by nature, intelligent. The want of curiosity, in some, may be owing even to their affections and anxiety. They may think themselves bound to be occupied solely in what they are about. They have not been taught how to invigorate as well as divert the mind, by taking a reasonable interest in the varieties of this astonishing world, of which the most artificial portions are still works of nature as well as art, and evidences of the hand of Him that made the soul and its endeavours. The lively biographer himself, with all his friend's assistance, and that of the tavern to boot, probably saw nothing in London of the times gone by; of all that rich aggregate of the past, which is assuredly one of the great treasures of knowledge, considered only with reference to its memorials; and yet, by the same principle on which Boswell admired Dr. Johnson, he might have delighted in calling to mind the metropolis of the wits of Queen Anne's time, and of the poets of Elizabeth; might have longed to sit over their canary in Cornhill with Beaumont and Ben Jonson, and have thought that Surrey-Street and Shire-Lane had their merits, as well as the illustrious obscurity of Bolt-court. In Surrey-Street lived Congreve; and Shire-Lane, though nobody would think so to see it now, is eminent for the origin of the

It may be said that the past is not in our possession; that we are sure only of what we can realize, and that the present and future afford enough contemplation for any man. But those who argue thus, argue against their better instinct. We take an interest in all that we understand; and in proportion as we enlarge our knowledge, enlarge, ad infinitum, the sphere of our sympathies. Tell the grazier, whom Boswell mentions, of a great grazer who lived before him,—of Bakewell, who had an animal that produced him in one season the sum of eight hundred guineas; or Fowler, whose horned cattle sold for a value equal to that of the fee-simple of his farm; or Elwes the miser, who, after spending thousands at the gaming-table, would haggle for a shilling at Smithfield; and he will be curious to hear as much as you have to relate. Tell the mercantile man, in like manner, of Gresham, or Crisp, or the foundation of the Charter-House by a merchant, and he will be equally attentive. And tell the man, par excellence, of any thing that concerns humanity, and he will be pleased to hear of Bakewell, or Crisp, or Boswell, or Boswell's ancestor. Bakewell himself was a man of this sort. Boswell was proud of his ancestors, like most men that know who they were, whether their ancestors were persons to be proud of or not. The mere length of line flatters the brevity of existence. We must take care how we are proud of those who may not be fit to render us so; but we may be allowed to be anxious to live as long as we can, whether in prospect or retrospect. Besides, the human mind, being a thing infinitely greater than the circumstances which confine and cabin it in its present mode of existence, seeks to extend itself on all sides, past, present, and to come. If it puts on wings angelical, and pitches itself into the grand obscurity of the future, it runs back also on the more visible line of the past. Even the present, which is the great business of life, is chiefly great, inasmuch as it regards the interests of the many who are to come, and is built up of the experiences of those who have gone by. The past is the heir-loom of the world.

Now in no shape is any part of this treasure more visible to us, or more striking, than in that of a great metropolis. The present is no where so present: we see the latest marks of its hand. The past is no where so traceable: we discover, step by step, the successive abodes of its generations. The links that are wanting are supplied by history; nor perhaps is there a single spot in London in which the past is not visibly present to us in the shape of some old buildings, or at least in the names of the streets; or in which the absence of more tangible memorials may not be supplied by the antiquary. In some parts of it we may go back through the whole English history, perhaps through the history of man, as we shall see presently when we speak of St. Paul's Churchyard, where you may get the last new novel, and find remains of the ancient Britons and of the sea. There, also, in the cathedral, lie painters, patriots, humanists, the greatest warriors and some of the best men; and there, in St. Paul's School, was educated England's epic poet, who hoped that his native country would never forget her privilege of "teaching the nations how to live." Surely a man is more of a man and does more justice to the faculties of which he is composed, whether for knowledge or entertainment, who thinks of all these things in crossing St. Paul's Churchyard, than if he saw nothing but the church itself, or the clock, or confined his admiration to the abundance of Brentford stages.

Milton, who began a history of England, very properly touches upon the fabulous part of it; not, as Dr. Johnson thought (who did not take the trouble of reading the second page), because he confounded it with the true, but, as he himself states, for the benefit of those who would know how to make use of it—the poets. In the same passage he alludes to those traces of a deluge of which we have just spoken, and to the enormous bones occasionally dug up, which with the natural inclination of a poet, he was willing to look upon as relics of a gigantic race of men. Both of these evidences of a remote period have been discovered in London earth, and might be turned to grand account by a writer like himself. It is curious to see the grounds on which truth and fiction so often meet, without knowing one another. The oriental writers have an account of a race of pre-Adamite kings, not entirely human. It is supposed by some geologists, that there was a period before the creation of man, when creatures vaster than any now on dry land, trampled the earth at will; perhaps had faculties no longer to be found in connexion with brute forms, and effaced, together with themselves, for a nobler experiment. We may indulge our fancy with supposing that, in those times, light itself, and the revolution of the seasons, may not have been exactly as they are now; that some unknown monster, mammoth or behemoth, howled in the twilight over the ocean solitude now called London; or (not to fancy him monstrous in nature as in form, for the hugest creatures of the geologist appear to have been mild and graminivorous), that the site of our metropolis was occupied with the gigantic herd of some more gigantic spirit, all good of their kind, but not capable of enough ultimate good to be permitted to last. However, we only glance at these speculative matters, and leave them. Neither shall we say anything of the more modern elephant, who may have recreated himself some thousands of years ago, on the site of the Chapter Coffee-house; or of the crocodile, who may have snapped at some remote ancestor of a fishmonger in the valley of Dowgate.

By the fabulous writers, London was called Troynovant or New Troy, and was said to have been founded by Brutus, great-grandson of Æneas, from whom the country was called Britain, or Britain.

For noble Britons sprang from Trojans bold,
And Troynovant was built of old Troye's ashes cold.

(This is one of Spenser's fine old lingering lines, in which he seems to dwell on a fable till he believes it.) Brutus, having the misfortune to kill his father, fled from his native country into Greece, where he set free a multitude of Trojans, captives to King Pandrasus, whose daughter he espoused. He left Greece with a numerous flotilla, and came to an island called Legrecia, where there was a temple of Diana. To Diana he offered sacrifice, and prayed her to direct his course. The prayer, and the goddess's reply, as told in Latin by Gildas, have received a lustre from the hand of Milton. He gives us the following translation of them in his historical fragment.

"Diva potens nemorum," &c.

"Goddess of Shades, and Huntress, who at will Walk'st on the rolling sphere, and through the deep,
On thy third reign, the earth, look now; and tell
What land, what seat of rest, thou bidst me seek;
What certain seat, where I may worship thee,
For aye, with temples vowed, and virgin quires."

"To whom, sleeping before the altar," says the poet,
"Diana, in a vision that night, thus answered:

"Brute, sub occasum solis," &c.

"Brutus, far to the west, in th' ocean wide,
Beyond the realm of Gaul, a land there lies,
Sea-girt it lies, where giants dwell of old:
Now void, it fits thy people. Thither bend
Thy course: there shalt thou find a lasting seat;
There to thy sons another Troy shall raise,
And kings be born of thee, whose dreaded reign
Shall awe the world, and conquer nations bold."

According to Spenser, Brutus did not find England cleared of the giants. He had to conquer them. But we shall speak of those personages when we come before their illustrious representatives in Guildhall.

This fiction of Troynovant, or New Troy, appears to have arisen from the word Trinobantes in Cæsar, a name given by the historian to the inhabitants of a district, including the London banks of the Thames. The oldest mention of the metropolis is supposed to be found in that writer, under the appellation of Civitas Trinobantum, the city of the Trinobantes; though some are of opinion that by civitas he only meant their government or community. Be this as it may, a city of the Britons, in Cæsar's time, was nothing either for truth or fiction to boast of, having been, as he describes it, a mere spot hollowed out of the woods, and defended by a ditch and a rampart.

We have no reason to believe that the first germ of London was anything greater than this. Milton supposes that so many traditions of old British kings could not have been handed down without a foundation in truth; and the classical origin of London, though rejected by himself, was not only firmly believed by people in general as late as the reign of Henry the Sixth (to whom it was quoted in a public document), but was maintained by professed antiquaries,—Leland among them.† It is probable enough, that, before Cæsar's time, the affairs of the country may have been in a better situation than he found them; and it is possible that something may have once stood on the site of London, which stood there no longer. But this may be said of every other place on the globe; and as there is nothing authentic to shew for it, we must be content to take our ancestors as we find them. The safest thing is to confess that nothing whatever is known with certainty of the origin of London, not even of its name. The first time we hear either of the city or its appellation is in Tacitus, who calls it Londinium. The following list, taken principally from Camden, comprises, we believe, all the names by which it has been called. We dwell somewhat on this point, because we conclude the reader will be pleased to see by how many aliases his old acquaintance has been known.

Troja Nova, Troynovant, or New Troy.

Tre-novant, or the New City, (a mixture of Latin and Cornish).

Dian Belin, or the City of Diana.

Caer Ludd, or the City of Lud.—These are the names given by the fabulous writers, chiefly Welsh.

Londinium.—Tacitus, Ptolemy, Antoninus.

Lundinium.—Ammianus Marcellinus.

† We learn this from Selden's notes to the Polyglotton of Drayton.

Longidinium.

Lindonium, (Andover).—Stephanus in his Dicti- onary.

Lundonia.—Bede.

Augusta,—the complimentary title granted to 'it under Valentinian; as was customary with flourishing foreign establishments.

Lundenbyrig.

Lundenberig.

Lundenberc.

Lundenburg.

Lundenwic, or wyc.

Lundenceastre.

Lundunes.

Lundene, or Lundenne.

Lundone.—Saxon names. Lundenceastre is Alfred the Great's translation of the Lundonia of Bede.

Luddestun.

Ludastoun.—Saxon translations of the Caer Ludd of the Welsh.

Londres.—French.

Londra.—Italian. The letter r in these words is curious. It seems to represent the berig or burgh of the Saxons; quasi Londrig, from Londenberig; in which case Londres would mean London-borough.

The disputes upon the derivation of the word London have been numerous. In the present day, the question seems to be, whether it originated in Celtic British, that is, in Welsh, and signified "a city on a lake," or in Belgic British (old German), and meant "a city in a grove." The latest author who has handled the subject inclines to the latter opinion.* Mr. Pennant being a Celt, was for the "city on a lake," the Thames in the early periods of British history having formed a considerable expanse of water near the site of the present metropolis. Llyn-Din is Lake-City, and Lan-Den Grove-City. Erasmus, on the strength of those affinities between Greek and Welsh, which can be found between most languages, fetched the word from Lindus, a city of Rhodes; Sommer the antiquary from Llawn, full, and Dyn, man, implying a great concourse of people; another antiquary, from Lugdus, a Celtic prince; Maitland from Lon, a plain, and Dun or Don, a hill; another, we know not who, referred to by the same author, from a word signifying a ship and a hill;† Camden from Llong-Dinas, a City of Ships; and Selden, "seeing conjecture is free,"‡ was for deriving it from Llan-Dien, or the Temple of Diana, for reasons which will appear presently. Pennant thinks that London might have been called Lake-City first, and Ship-City afterwards. The opinion of the editor of the Picture of London seems most plausible—that Lun-den, or Grove-City, was the name, because it is compounded of Belgic British, which, according to Cæsar, must have been the language of the district; and he adds, that the name is still common in Scandinavia.§ It may be argued, that London might have existed as a fortress on a lake before the arrival of settlers from Belgium; and that Grove-City could not have been so distinguishing a characteristic of the place as Lake-City, because wood was infinitely more abundant than water. On the other hand, all the rivers at that time were probably more or less given to overflowing. Grove-City might have been the final name, though Lake City was the first; and the propensity to name places from trees, is still evident in our numerous Wood-tons, or Wood-towns, Wood-fords, Woodlands, &c. But of all disputes, those upon etymology appear the most hopeless. Perhaps the word itself was not originally what we take it to be. Who would suspect the word wig to come from peruke; jour from dies; uncle from arvus; or that Kennington should have been corrupted by the despairing organs of a foreigner, into Inhimthorp?||

Whether London commenced with a spot cleared out in the woods by settlers from Holland, (Gallic Belgium,) as conjecture might imply from Cæsar, or whether the germ of it arose with the aboriginal inhabitants, we may conclude safely enough with Mr. Pennant, that it existed in some shape or other in Cæsar's time. "It stood," says he, "in such a situation as the Britains would select, according to the rule they established. An immense forest originally extended to the river side, and even as late as the reign of Henry II. covered the northern neighbourhood of the city, and was filled with various species of beasts of chase. It was defended naturally by fosses, one formed by the creek which ran along Fleet Ditch; the other, afterwards known by that of Walbrook. The south side was guarded by the Thames; the north they might think sufficiently protected by the adjacent forest."¶

The French word jour (day) comes from dies, though diurnus, diurno, giorno; so giornale journal." Uncle is from arvus through arunculus. † In this place, then, seated on their hill, (probably that on which St. Paul's Cathedral stands, as it is the highest in London,) and gradually exchanging their burrows in the ground for huts of wicker and clay, we are to picture to ourselves our metropolitan ancestors, half-naked, rude in their manners, ignorant, violent, vindictive, subject to all the half-reasoning impulses,—their bodies tattooed like South Sea Islanders,—but brave, hospitable, patriotic, anxious for esteem,—in short, like other semi-barbarians, exhibiting energies which they did not yet know how to turn to account, but possessing, like all human beings, the germs of the noblest capabilities. The accounts given of them by Cæsar, and other ancient writers, appear to be inconsistent, perhaps because we do not enough consider the inconsistencies of our own manners. According to their statements, the Britons had found out the art of making chariots of war, and yet had not learnt how to convert grain into flour, or to make a solid substance of milk. They rode, as it were, in their coaches, and yet had not arrived at the dignity of bread and cheese. Probably their chariots were magnified both in number and construction. The scythes which modern fancy has turned into proper haymaking sabres, and which some antiquaries have found so convenient for cutting through "a woody country," (a strange way of keeping them sharp,) may have been nothing but spikes. We know not so easily what to say to the bread and cheese, except that in more knowing times people are not always found very ready to improve upon old habits, even with reasons staring them in the face; though, on the other hand, lest habits should be thought older than they are, and reformers be too impatient, it is worth while to consider, not how long, but how short, a period has elapsed (considering what a little thing a few centuries are in the progress of time) since in the very spot where a Briton sat half-naked and savage, unpossessed of a loaf or a piece of cheese, are to be found gathered together all the luxuries of the globe. Fancy the soul of an ancient Briton visiting his old ground in St. Paul's Churchyard, and hardly staring more at the church and houses, than at the bread in the baker's window, and the magic leaves in that of the bookseller. In one respect, an ancient City-Briton differed totò cœlo with a modern. He would not eat goose. He had a superstition against it.

London, in Cæsar's time, was most probably a City of Ships; that is to say, it traded with Gaul, and had a number of boats on its marshy river. Cæsar's pretence for invading England was that it was too good a provider for Gaul, and rendered his conquest of that country difficult. But it is doubtful whether he ever beheld or even alludes to the infant metropolis. His countrymen are supposed to have first taken possession of it about a hundred years afterwards, in the reign of Claudius. They had heard of a pearl-fishery, says Gibbon. At all events they found oysters; for Sandwich (Rutupium) became famous with them for that luxury.

It is not our design, in this Introduction, to give anything more than a sketch of the rise and growth of the metropolis; we shall leave the rest to be gathered as we proceed. Our intention is to go through it quarter by quarter, and to notice the memorials as they arise; a plan, which, compared with others, (at least if we are to judge of the effect which it has had on ourselves,) seems to possess something of the superiority of sight over hearsay. When we read of events in their ordinary train, we pitch ourselves with difficulty into the scenes of action,—sometimes wholly omit to do so; and there is a want of life and presence in them accordingly. When we are placed in the scenes themselves, and told to look about us,—such and such a thing having happened in that house,—this street being one in which another famous adventure took place, and that old mansion having been the dwelling of wit or beauty, we find ourselves comparatively at home, and enjoy the probability and the spectacle twice as much. We feel (especially if we are personally conversant with the spot) as if Shakspeare and Milton, Pope, Gay, and Arbuthnot, the club at the Mermaid, and the beauties at the court of White-Hall, were our next-door neighbours.

We shall take the reader, then, as speedily as possible among the quarters alluded to, and trouble him very little beforehand with dry abstracts and chronologies, or with races of men almost as uninteresting. The most patriotic reader of our history feels that he cares very little for his ancestors the ancient Britons; of whom almost all he knows is, that they painted their skins, and made war in chariots. Nor do the Romans in England interest us more. They are men in helmets and short skirts, who have left us no memorial but a road or two, and an iron name. That is all that we know of them, and we care accordingly. Perhaps the Saxons, after having destroyed the Roman architecture as much as possible, and repented of it, took their own from what had survived. The greatest relic of Cæsar's countrymen in the metropolis was the piece of wall which ran lately south of Moorfields, in a street still designated as London Wall. The Romans had a vast material genius, not so intellectual as that of the Greeks, nor so calculated to move the world ultimately, but highly fitted to prepare the way for better impressions, by shewing what the hand could perform; and as they built their wall in their usual giant style of solidity, it remained a long while to testify their magnificence. Small relics of it are yet to be seen in Little Bridge Street, behind Ludgate Hill; on the north of Bull-and-Mouth Street, between that street and St. Botolph's Churchyard; and on the south side of the Churchyard of Cripplegate. There was another in the garden of Stationer's Hall, but it has been blocked up.

ANCIENT BRITISH LONDON was a mere space in the woods, opened towards the river, and presenting circular cottages on the hill and slope, and a few boats on the water. As it increased, the cottages grew more numerous, and commerce increased the number of sails.

ROMAN LONDON was British London, interspersed with the better dwellings of the conquerors, and surrounded by a wall. It extended from Ludgate to the Tower, and from the river to the back of Cheapside.

SAXON LONDON was Roman London, despoiled, but retaining the wall, and ultimately growing civilized with Christianity, and richer in commerce. The first humble cathedral church then arose, where the present one now stands.

NORMAN LONDON was Saxon and Roman London, greatly improved, thickened with many houses, adorned with palaces of princes and princely bishops, sounding with minstrelsy, and glittering with the gorgeous pastimes of knighthood. This was its state through the Anglo-Norman and Plantagenet reigns. The friar then walked the streets in his cowl (Chaucer is said to have beaten one in Fleet Street,) and the knights rode with trappings and gaudy colours, to their tournaments in Smithfield.

In the time of Edward the First, houses were still built of wood, and roofed with straw, sometimes even with reeds, which gave rise to numerous fires. The fires brought the brooks in request; and an importance, which has since been swallowed up in the advancement of science, was then given to the River of Wells (Bagnigge, Sadler's, and Clerkenwell,) to the Oldbourne, (the origin of the name of Holborn,) to the Fleet, the Wall brook, and the brook Langbourne, still giving its name to a ward. The conduits, which were large leaden cisterns, twenty in number, were under the special care of the lord mayor and aldermen, who, after visiting them on horseback on the eighteenth of September, "hurled a hare before dinner, and a fox after it, in the Fields near St. Giles's." Hours, and after-dinner pursuits, must have altered marvellously since those days, and the body of aldermen with them.

It was not till the reign of Henry the Fifth that the city was lighted at night. The illumination was with lanterns, slung over the street with wisps of rope or hay. Under Edward the Fourth we first hear of brick houses; and in Henry the Eighth's time of pavement in the middle of the streets. The general aspect of London then experienced a remarkable change, in consequence of the dissolution of religious houses; the city, from the great number of them, having hitherto had the appearance "of a monastic, rather than a commercial metropolis."† The monk then ceased to walk, and the gallant London apprentice became more riotous. London, however, was still in a wretched condition, compared with what it is now. The streets, which had been impassable with mud, were often rendered so with filth and effluvia; and its homeliest wants being neglected, and the houses almost meeting at top, with heavy signs lumbering and filling up the inferior spaces, the metropolis was subject to plagues as well as fires. Nor was the interior of the houses better regarded. The people seemed to cultivate the plague. "The floors," says Erasmus, "are commonly of clay, strewed with rushes, which are occasionally renewed; but underneath lies unviolated an ancient collection of beer, grease, fragments of fish, &c. &c. and every thing that is nasty." The modern Englishman piques himself on his cleanliness, and justly; but he should do it modestly, considering what his ancestors could do. Time and circumstance teach all the world. It was the plague and fire of London that taught us.

Erasmus wrote in the time of Henry the Eighth, when the civil wars had terminated in a voluptuous security, and when the pride of the court and nobility was at its height. Knighthood was becoming rather a show than a substance; and the changes in religion, the dissolution of the monasteries, and above all, the permission to read the Bible, set men thinking, and identified history in future with the progress of the general mind. Opinion, accidentally set free by a tyrant, was never to be put down, though tyranny tried never so hard. Poetry revived in the person of Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey; and, by a maturity natural to the first unsophisticated efforts of imagination, came to its height in the next age with Shakspeare. The monasteries being dissolved, London was become entirely the commercial city it has remained ever since, though it still abounded with noblemen's mansions, and did so till a much later period. There were some in the time of Charles the Second. The manners of the citizens under Henry the Eighth were still rude and riotous, but cheerful; and manly exercises were much cultivated. Henry was so pleased with one of the city archers, that he mock-heroically created him Duke of Shoreditch; upon which there arose a whole suburb peerage, of Marquises of Hogsdon and Islington, Pancras, &c.

In Elizabeth's time the London houses were still mostly of wood. We see remains of them in the Strand and Fleet Street, and in various parts of the city. They are like houses built of cards, one story projecting over the other; but unless there is something in the art of building, which may in future dispense with solidity, the modern houses will hardly be as lasting. People in the old ones could at least dance and make merry. Builders in former times did not spare their materials, nor introduce clauses in their leases against a jig. We fancy Elizabeth hearing of a builder who should introduce such a proviso against the health and merriment of her buxom subjects, and sending to him with a good round oath, to take a little less care of his purse, and more of his own neck.

In this age, ever worthy of honour and gratitude, the illustrious Bacon set free the hands of knowledge, which Aristotle had chained up, and put into them the touchstone of experiment, the mighty mover of the ages to come. This was the great age also of English poetry and the drama. Former manners and opinions now began to be seen only on the stage; intellect silently gave a man a rank in society he never enjoyed before; and nobles and men of letters mixed together in clubs. People now also began to speculate on government as well as religion; and the first evidences of that unsatisfied reasoning spirit appeared, which produced the downfall of the succeeding dynasty, and ultimately the Revolution and all that we now enjoy.

The governments of Elizabeth and James, fearing that the greater the concourse the worse would be the consequences of sickness, and secretly apprehensive, no doubt, of the growth of large and intellectual bodies of men near their head-quarters, did all in their power to confine the metropolis, to its shewn limits but in vain. Despotism itself, even in its mildest shape, cannot prevail against the spirit of an age; and Bacon was at that minute fore-seeing the knowledge that was to quicken, increase, and elevate human intercourse, by means of the growth of commerce. Houses and streets grew then as they do now, not so quickly indeed, but equally to the astonishment of their inhabitants; and the latter had reason to congratulate themselves on a pavement to walk upon; a luxury for which a lively Parisian, not half a century ago, is said to have gone down on his knees when he came into England, thanking God that there was a country in which some regard was shewn to foot-passengers. In Charles the First's reign the suburbs of Westminster and Spitalfields were greatly enlarged, and the foundation of Covent Garden was commenced as it now stands. Symptoms of a future neighbourhood appeared also in Leicester Fields, though the place continued to be what the name imports, so late as the beginning of the last century. The progress of building received a check from the Civil Wars, but only to revive with new spirit; and the Great Fire, which was a great blessing, swallowed up at once both the deformity and the disease of old times, by widening the streets, and putting an end to the liability to pestilence. London has not had a plague since, unless it be indigestion; which, however, is the great disease of modern sedentary times, and will never be got rid of, till we grow mental enough to have more respect for our bodies.

Towards the end of the reign of Charles the Second the metropolis began to increase in the direction of Holborn. Hatton Garden, Brook and Greville Streets were built; and Ormond Street ran towards the fields. In this and the following reigns the mansion houses of the nobility on the river side began to give way to the private houses and streets, still retaining the name of the Strand. Pall Mall and St. James's, increased also; and Soho Square, on its first building, received the name of the Duke of Monmouth. But particulars of that nature will be better noticed in the body of our work. The nobility, gentry, and the wits, were now mixed up together. City taverns were still frequented by them; and city marriages began to be sought after, to mend the fortunes of the poor and debauched cavaliers. Elizabeth's successor, James, was the first king who entered into anything like domestic familiarity with the monied men of the city. Charles the Second took "t'other bottle" with them, (see the Spectator); and Lord Rochester played the buffoon on Tower Hill as a quack doctor.

borough Street Soho, &c., successively arose in the time of Queen Ann, as well as a good portion of Holborn, beginning from Brook Street and including the neighbourhood of Bedford Street, and Red-Lion Square. St. Paul's, too, was completed, as it now stands. This, and the succeeding times of the Hanover succession, were the times of Whig and Tory, of the principal wit-poets, of writers upon domestic manners, and of what may be called an ambition of good sense and reason,—“sense” being the favourite term in books, as “wit” had been in the age of Charles. Clubs were multiplied ad infinitum by the more harmless civil wars between Whig and Tory; and ale and beer brought the middle classes together, as wine did the rich. Mug-house clubs abounded in Long-Acre, Chopsale, &c., “where gentlemen, lawyers, and tradesmen, used to meet in a great room, seldom under a hundred,” if we are to believe the Journey through England in the year 1724.

At the commencement of the last century the village of St. Mary-le-bone was almost a mile distant from any part of London, the nearest street being Old Bond Street, which scarcely extended to the present Clifford Street. Soon after the accession of George the First, New Bond Street arose, with others in the immediate neighbourhood, and the houses in Berkeley Square and its vicinity. Hanover Square and Cavendish Square were open fields in the year 1716. They were built about the beginning of the reign of George the Second, at which time the houses arose on the north side of Oxford Street, which then first took the name. The neighbourhood of Cavendish Square, and Oxford Market, Holles Street, Margaret Street, Vere Street, &c., are of the same date; and the grounds for Harley, Wigmore, and Mortimer Streets were laid out, the village and church of Mary-le-bone being still separated from them all by fields. At the same period the legislature ordered the erection of the three parishes of St. George's Bloomsbury, St. Anne's Limehouse, and St. Paul's Deptford, London having at that time extended further in the last quarter than in any other, by reason of the trade on the river.

So late, nevertheless, as this period, Fleet Ditch was a sluggish foul stream, open as far as Holborn Bridge, and admitting small vessels for trade, coal-barges, &c. It had become such a nuisance, that it was now arched over, and the late Fleet Market soon appeared on the covering. About the year 1737, the west end of the town was improved by the addition of Grosvenor Square and its neighbourhood.

The increase of the metropolis on all sides was in proportion to the length of the reign of George the Third. The space between Mary-le-bone was filled in; Southwark became a mass of houses united with Westminster; and new towns, rather than suburbs, appeared in all quarters, some with the names of towns, as Camden and Somers Town; to which have been added, since the death of that prince, Portland Town, and a good half of Paddington, now almost joined with Kilburn. Indeed, every village which was in the immediate neighbourhood of London, and was quite distinct from it in the beginning of the late reign, is now almost, if not quite joined with it, including Paddington, Kensington, Camberwell, Bow, Islington, and hardly excepting Highgate, and Hampstead. The whole of this enormous mass of houses now presents us, more or less, in all quarters, with handsome streets, and even with squares; and the two sides of the river are united by a series of noble bridges. New churches also have risen in every direction; and though the architecture is none of the best, they contribute to a general air of neatness and freshness, which the increase of education and politeness promises to keep up. There is an old prophecy that Hampstead is to be in the middle of London; a phenomenon that London would really seem inclined to bring about. But a metropolis must stop somewhere; and the very causes of its growth (we mean the facilities of carriage, &c.) will ultimately, perhaps sooner than is looked for, prevent it.

Ancient British London is conjectured to have been about a mile long, and half a mile wide. Modern London occupies an area of above eighteen square miles; and all this space, deducting not quite two miles for the river, is filled up with houses and public buildings, with a population of a million and a half of souls, and with riches from all parts of the world. In this respect, and in the lead it takes in the Reformations and Revolutions of Europe, London may justly be said to be “the metropolis of the world.”

During the reign of George the Third, the whole mind of Europe was shaken up more vehemently than ever by the French Revolution; and, as the consequence is after such tempestuous innovations, men began to look about them, to see what had stood the test of it, and how they might improve their condition still farther. After a great many disputes, natural on all sides, and a singular proof of the omnipotence of public opinion over the most extraordinary military power, it may be safely asserted, that the essence of that opinion, or the intellectual part of it, is secretly acknowledged as the great regulator of society, even by those who appear to regulate it themselves, and who never shew their sense to more advantage than when they lead where they must have followed. This is the most remarkable era, perhaps, in the history of mankind; and experiment, and promise, are of a piece with it. [Everybody is now more or less educated; the extension of the graces of life does away with sordidness, and teaches people that men do not live by “bread alone;” there is a Reading Public, let the jealousies of secluded scholarship say what they will; the mighty hands which Bacon set free, are in full action; the Press reports and assists them, and utters a thousand voices daily, not to be put an end to by anything short of a convulsion of the globe; and improvements may be looked for in society, so much to the benefit of all, that the most reasonable observer will decline stating the amount of his expectations, lest they should be thought as extravagant, as old times would have thought the steam-engine, or the publication of those thousands of volumes a day, called Newspapers.]

A word or two more on health and our modes of living. London was once called “Merry London,” the metropolis of “Merry England.” The word did not imply exclusively what it does now. Chaucer talks of the “merry organ at the mass.” But it appears to have had a signification still more desirable,—to have meant the best condition in which anything could be found, with cheerfulness for the result. Gallant soldiers were “merry men.” Favourable weather was “merry.” And London was “merry,” because its inhabitants were not only rich, but healthy and robust. They had sports infinite, up to the time of the Commonwealth,—races, and wrestlings, archery, quoits, tennis, foot-ball, hurling, &c.; their May-day was worthy of the burst of the seasons; not a man was left behind out of the fields, if he could help it; their apprentices piqued themselves on their stout arms, and not on their milliners' faces; their nobility, shook off the gout in tilts and tournaments; and their Christmas closed the year with a joviality which brought the very trees indoors, to crown their cups with, and promised admirably for the year that was to come. In every thing they did there was a reference to Nature and her works, as if nothing should make them forget her; and a gallant recognition of the duties of health and strength, as the foundation of their very right to be fathers.

We are aware of the drawbacks that accompanied this physical wisdom; of the comparative ignorance of the people, and the abuses they suffered accordingly; of slaveries and star-chambers; of plagues, fires, and civil wars; of the burnings in Smithfield; of the murderings of wretched old women supposed to be witches, and of other domestic superstitions, of which we are, perhaps, now-a-days unable to calculate the mischief. Surely we desire to see no more of them; and we are heartily willing that the same progress of thought which has swept them away, should have done us a diservice meanwhile, which more thinking shall put an end to. Far are we from desiring to go back; but we would hasten the time when reflection shall recover the good for us, without bringing back the evil. And this surely it may. This it must—for real knowledge could not make its progress without it. The labour would not end in the reward. It has been supposed, that the poorer orders cannot have their enjoyments again,—cannot have their old Christmas, for example, unless the rich supply them with the means of enjoyment, and so renew their charter of dependence. But this is to suppose that times are not changing in other respects, and that knowledge is not spreading. Riches and poverty themselves are modified by the progress of society; means are increased, however to their apparent detriment at first, among the poor; and the knowledge of enjoyment becomes no longer confined to the rich, any more than the enjoyment of knowledge. Men may surely learn how to stouten their legs, as well as to improve their stockings. Now of all pleasures, those are the cheapest which are bought of nature, such as air, and exercise, and manly sports; and though we allow that the poor, in order to relish them, must be free from the melancholier states of poverty, it is desirable meanwhile that the dispensers of knowledge should assist in hastening more cheerful times by preparing for them, and that all classes should be told how much the cultivation of their bodily health increases the ability both of rich and poor to get out of their troubles. You may steep a gipse in trouble, and he shall issue out of it laughing. It would not be easy to do this with an epicurean, or a fund-holder, or with one of the parish poor; but neither need any one despair; for neither can the might of mechanical inventions, nor the greater might of opinion, be put down, whether in their first awful issuing forth, or their final beneficence. And he that shall keep this oftenest in his mind, and be among the first to prepare for their enjoyment by administering what helps he can to the encouragement of manly exercises among us, will assist in reviving the good old epithets of “merry England,” and “merry London,” in a sense they never have had yet. The progress of society has put an end to the melancholy of inquisitions, and star-chambers, and civil wars. The ground, therefore, is more clear for us to make England merrier in all respects than she was before.

These things, we are aware, must result from other changes; but the changes themselves are in the reasonable and inevitable course of events.

As a link of a very pleasing description between old times and new, not unconnected with what we have been speaking of, we shall conclude our introduction by observing, that there is scarcely a street in the city of London, perhaps not one, nor many out of the pale of it, from some part of which the passenger may not discern a tree. Most persons to whom this has been mentioned have doubted the accuracy of our information, nor do we profess hitherto to have ascertained it; though since we heard the assertion, we have made a point of endeavouring to do so, whenever we could, and have not been disappointed. The mention of the circumstance generally creates a laughing astonishment, and a cry of “impossible!” Two persons, who successively heard of it the other day, not only thought it impossible as a general fact, but doubted whether half a dozen streets could be found with a twig in them; and they triumphantly instanced “Cheapside” as a place in which it was “quite out of the question.” Yet there is a tree, occupying the space of a house in that most civic and populous thoroughfare. It stands at the corner of Wood Street. A little child was shewn us a few years back, who was said never to have beheld a tree but the one in St. Paul's Churchyard. Whenever a tree was mentioned, she thought it was this one, and had no conception of any other, not even of the remote tree in Cheapside! This appears incredible; but there would seem to be no bounds, either to imagination, or to the want of it. We were told the other day, on good authority, of a man who had actually resided six and thirty years in the square of St. Peter's at Rome, and then for the first time went inside the Cathedral.

There is a little garden in Walling Street! It lies completely open to the eye, being divided from the footway by a railing only.

In the body of our work will be found notices of other trees and green spots, that surprise the observer in the very thick of the noise and smoke. Many of them are in churchyards. Others have disappeared during the progress of building. Many courts and passages are named from trees that once stood in them, as Vine and Elm Court, Fig-tree Court, Green-arbour Court, &c. It is not surprising that garden-houses, as they were called, should have formerly abounded in Holborn, in Bunhill Row, and other (at that time) suburban places. We notice the fact, in order to observe how fond the poets were of occupying houses of this description. Milton seems to have made a point of having one. The only London residence of Chapman which is known was in Old Street Road, doubtless at that time a rural suburb. Beaumont and Fletcher's house, on the Surrey side of the Thames (for they lived as well as wrote together,) most probably had a garden: and Dryden's house in Gerard Street looked into the garden of the mansion built by the Earls of Leicester. A tree, or even a flower, put in a window in the streets of a great city (and the London citizens, to their credit, are generally fond of flowers,) affects the eye something in the same way as the hand-organs, which bring unexpected music to the ear. They refresh the common-places of life, shed a harmony through the busy discord, and appeal to those first sources of emotion which are associated with the remembrance of all that is young and innocent. They seem also to present to us a portion of the tranquillity we think we are labouring for, and the desire of which is felt as an earnest that we shall realize it somewhere, either in this world or in the next. Above all, they render us more cheerful for the performance of present duties; and the smallest seed of this kind, dropt into the heart of man, is worth more, and may terminate in better fruits, than any body but a great poet could tell us.

As St. Paul's Churchyard is perhaps the oldest ground built upon in London, we may as well begin our perambulations in that quarter. The cross which formerly stood north of the cathedral, and of which Stowe could not tell the antiquity, is supposed by some to have originated in one of those sacred stones which the Druids made use of in worship; but at least it is more than probable that here was a burial-ground of the ancient Britons; because when Sir Christopher Wren dug for a foundation to his cathedral, he discovered abundance of ivory and wooden pins, apparently of box, which are supposed to have fastened their winding sheets. The graves of the Saxons lay above them, lined with chalk-stones, or consisting of stones hollowed out; and in the same row with the pins, but deeper, lay Roman horns, lamps, lachrymatories, and all the elegancies of classic sculpture. Sir Christopher dug till he came to sand and sea-shells, and to the London clay, which has since become famous in geology; so that the single history of St Paul's Churchyard carries us back to the remotest periods of tradition; and we commence our book in the proper style of the old chroniclers, who were not content, unless they began with the history of the world.

The Romans were thought to have built a Temple to Diana on the site of the modern cathedral, by reason of a number of relics of horned animals reported to have been dug up there. Sir Christopher Wren asserts that there was no ground for the supposition. There was a similar story of a temple of Apollo at Westminster, built on the site of the present Abbey, and said to have been destroyed by an earthquake. "Earthquakes," observed Sir Christopher, "break not stones to pieces; nor would the Picts be at that pains; but I imagine that the monks, finding the Londoners pretending to a Temple of Diana where now St. Paul's stands (horns of stags and tusks of boars having been dug up in former times, and it is said also in later years), would not be behind-hand in antiquity; but I must assert, that having changed all the foundations of old St. Paul's, and upon that occasion rummaged all the ground thereabouts, and being very desirous to find some footsteps of such a temple, I could not discover any, and therefore can give no more credit to Diana than to Apollo*.

Woodward, on the other hand, insisted on the Temple of Diana, and asserted that a variety of the relics alluded to, in his own possession, were actually dug up on the spot, together with sacrificing vessels sculptured with beasts of chase, and figures of Diana. In digging between the Deanery and Blackfriars a small brass figure of the goddess had also been found†.

Woodward was an enthusiast, eager to find what he fancied. Wren was willing to find also, but with cooler eyes. It is at the same time worth observing, that though Sir Christopher appears to have rejected the Pagan story with good reason, he could not find it in his heart to refuse credit to the gratuitous traditions of old writers in favour of a Christian church "planted here by the Apostles themselves." He calls the traditions "authentic testimony."

It is barely possible that the relics mentioned by Woodward might have been all dug up, by the time Sir Christopher set about his inquiry; but let them have been what they might, they would have proved nothing in favour of a Roman Temple, because the Romans never buried under their temples; and their legions did not remain long enough in this country to see the character of the place altered. It was remarkable enough, that proofs had been discovered even of their burying there at all; for, at Rome, none but very extraordinary persons were suffered to be buried within the walls; and the Roman cemeteries in England are proved to have been without them. It can only be accounted for on the supposition that as no great men are so great as the great men of colonies, the Prefects and their officers at London decreed themselves an honour, which was to be attained at Rome by nothing short of the merits of a Fabricius or a Publicola.

The first authentic account of the existence of a Christian church on this spot is that of Bede, who attributes the erection of it to king Ethelbert about the year 610, soon after his conversion by St. Augustine. The building, which was probably of wood, was burned down in 961, but was restored the same year,—a proof that, notwithstanding the lofty terms in which it is spoken of by the old historian, it could not have been of any great extent. This second church lasted till the time of William the Conqueror, when it too was destroyed by a conflagration, which burned the greater part of the city. Bishop Maurice, who had just been appointed to the see, now resolved to rebuild the cathedra, on a much grander scale than before, at his own expense. To assist him in accomplishing this object, the King granted him the stones of an old castle, called the Palatine Tower, which stood at the mouth of the Fleet River, and which had been reduced to ruins in the same conflagration. The Bishop's design, was looked upon as so vast, that "men at that time," says Stowe, "judged wold never have bin finished, it was then so wonderful for length and breadth." This was in the year 1087; and the people had some reason for their astonishment, for the building was not completed till the year 1240, in the reign of Henry the Third. Some even extend the date to 1315, which is two hundred and twenty-eight years after its foundation; but this was owing rather to repairs and additions, than to any thing wanting in the original edifice. The cathedral, thus patched, altered, and added to, over and over again, with different orders and no orders of architecture, and partially burnt oftener than once, remained till the Great Fire of London, when it was luckily rendered incapable of further deformity, and gave way to the present.

It was, indeed, a singular structure, and used for very singular purposes. "The exterior of the building," says an intelligent writer, himself an architect, "presented a curious medley of the architectural style of different ages. At the western front Inigo Jones had erected a portico of the Corinthian order; thus displaying a singular example of that bigotry of taste, which, only admitting one mode of beauty, is insensible to the superior claims of congruity. This portico, however, singly considered, was a grand and beautiful composition, and not inferior to any thing of the kind which modern times have produced: fourteen columns, each rising to the lofty height of forty-six feet were so disposed, that eight, with two pilasters placed in front, and three on each flank, formed a square (oblong) peristyle, and supported an entablature and balustrade, which was crowned with statues of kings, predecessors of Charles the First, who claimed the honour of this fabric. Had the whole front been accommodated to Roman architecture, it might have deserved praise as a detached composition; but though cased with rustic work, and decorated with regular cornices, the pediment retained the original Gothic character in its equilateral proportions, and it was flanked by barbarous obelisks and ill-designed turrets*.

"The whole of the exterior body of the church had been cased and reformed in a similar manner, through which every detail of antiquity was obliterated, and the general forms and proportions only left. The buttresses were converted into regular piers, and a complete cornice crowned the whole: of the windows, some were barely ornamented apertures, whilst others were decorated in a heavy Italian manner, with architrave dressings, brackets, and cherubic heads. The transepts presented fronts of the same incongruous style as the western elevation, and without any of its beauties."†

In its original state, however, Old St. Paul's must have been an imposing building. Its extent at least was very great. The entire mass measured 690 feet in length by 130 in breadth, and surmounted by a spire 520 feet high. The spire was of timber, and borne upon its summit not only a ball and cross, but a large gilded eagle, which served as a weather-cock. But the church having been burned nearly to the ground in June 1561 owing to the carelessness of a plumber, who left a pan of coals burning near some wood-work, while he went to dinner, it was hastily restored without the lofty spire; so that in Hollar's engraving, given by Dugdale, of the building as it appeared in 1656, it stands curtailed of this ornament. Only the square tower, from which the spire sprang up, remains. "The old cathedral," says Mr. Malcolm, on the authority of a note with which he was furnished by the Rev. Mr. Watts of Sion College, "did not stand in the same direction with the new, the latter inclining rather to the south-west and north-east, and the west front of the Old Church came much farther towards Ludgate than the present.‡

It is of the Cathedral as thus renovated that Sir John Denham speaks in the following passage of his Cooper's Hill:

"—That sacred pile, so vast so high,
That whether it's a part of earth or sky,
Uncertain seems, and may be thought a proud
Aspiring mountain, or descending cloud;
Paul's, the late name of such a muse whose flight
Has bravely reached and soared above thy height;
Now shalt thou stand, though sword, or time, or fire,
Or zeal, more fierce than they, thy fall conspire,
Secure, whilst thee the best of poets sing,
Preserved from ruin by the best of kings.

"The best of poets" is his brother courtier Waller, who had some time before written his verses "Upon his Majesty's repairing of St. Paul's," in which he compares King Charles, for his regeneration of the Cathedral, to Amphion, and the other "antique minstrels" asserted to have achieved architectural feats by the power of music, who, he says,

"—Sure were Charles-like kings,
Cities their lutes, and subjects' hearts their strings;
On which with so divine a hand they strook, Consent of motion from their breath they took."

Jones's first labour, the removal of the various foreign encumbrances that had so long oppressed and deformed the venerable edifice, Waller commemorates by a pair of references to St. Paul's history, not un-happily applied: he says the whole nation had combined with his majesty

"—to grace
The Gentiles' great Apostle, and deface
Those state-obscuring sheds, that like a chain
Seemed to confine and fetter him again;
Which the glad Saint shakes off at his command,
As once the viper from his sacred hand."

Denham's prediction did no credit to the prophetic reputation of poetry. Of the fabric which was to be unassailable by either zeal or fire the poet himself lived to see the ruin, begun by the one and completed by the other; and he himself, curiously enough, a short time before his death, was actually engaged as the King's surveyor-general in (nominally at least) presiding over the erection of the new Cathedral—the successor of the "sacred pile" of which he had thus sung the immortality.

When Jones began the repairs and additions of which his portico formed a part, in 1633, the rubbish that was removed, was carried, Mr. Malcolm informs us, to Clerkenwell fields, where, he suggests, "some curious fragments of antiquity may still remain."* The very beauty of this portico, surmounted with its strange pediment and figures, and dragging at its back that heap of deformity, completed the monstrous look of the whole building, like a human countenance backed by some horned lump. But all this was nothing to the moral deformities of the interior. Old St. Paul's, throughout almost the whole period of its existence, at least from the reign of Henry the Third, was a thoroughfare, and a "den of thieves." The thoroughfare was occasioned probably by the great circuit which people had been compelled to make by the extent of the wall of the old churchyard, a circumference a great deal larger than it is at present. There is a principle of familiarity in the Catholic worship, which, while it excites the devotional tenderness of more refined believers, is apt to produce the consequence, though not the feelings, of contempt, among the vulgar. Fear hinders contempt; but when license is mixed with it, and the fear is not in action, the liberties taken are apt to be in proportion. We have seen, in a Catholic chapel in London, a milk-maid come into the passage, dash down her pails, and having crossed herself and applied the holy water with reverence, depart with the same air with which she came in. The next thing to setting down the pails, under the circumstances above mentioned, would have been to creep with them through the church. Porters and loiterers would have followed; and by degrees the place of worship would become a place of lounging and marketing, and intrigue, and all sorts of disorder. In the reign of Edward the Third the king complains to the bishop, that the "eating-room of the canons," had "become the office and work-place of artisans," and the resort of shameless women." The complaint turned out to be of no avail; nor had the mandate of the bishop a better result in the time of Richard the Third, though it was accompanied with the penalty of excommunication. An act was passed to as little purpose in the reign of Philip and Mary; and in the time of Elizabeth the new opinions in religion seem to have left the place fairly in possession of its chaos, as if in derision of the old. The toleration of the abuse thus became a matter of habit and indifference; and a young theologian, afterwards one of the witty prelates of Charles the Second (Bishop Earle), did not scruple to make it the subject of what we should now call a "pleasant article."

"It must appear strange," says a note in Brayley's London and Middlesex, (vol. ii. p. 219,) "to those who are acquainted with the decent order and propriety of regulation now observed in our cathedral churches, and other places of divine worship, that ever such an extended catalogue of improper customs and disgusting usages as are noticed in various works, should have been formerly admitted to be practised in St. Paul's church, and more especially that they should have been so long habitually exercised as to be defended on the plea of prescription.

"These nuisances had become so great, that in the time of Philip and Mary, the Common Council found it necessary to pass an act, subjecting all future offenders to pains and penalties. From that act, the church seems to have been not only made a common passage-way for all—beer, bread, fish, flesh, fardels of stuffs, &c., but also for mules, horses, and other beasts. This statute, however, must have proved only a temporary restraint (excepting, probably, as to the leading of animals through the church); for in the reign of Elizabeth, we learn from Londinium Redivivum, (vol. iii. p. 71,) that idlers and drunkards were indulged in lying and sleeping on the benches at the choir door; and that other usages, too nauseous for description, were also frequent."

"Among the curious notices relating to the irreverend practices pursued in this church in the time of Elizabeth, collected by Mr. Malcolm from the manuscript presentments on visitations preserved at St. Paul's, are the following:—

"In the upper quier wher the comon [communion] table dothe stande, there is such unreverente people, walking with their hatts on their heddes, comonly all the service tyme, no man reproving them for yt."

"It is a grate disorder in the church, that porters, butchers, and water-bearers, and who not, be suffered (in special tyme of service) to carrie and recarrye whatsoever, no man withstandinge them or gainsaying them." &c.

"The notices of encroachments on St. Paul's, in the same reign, are equally curious. The chantry and other chapels were completely diverted from their ancient purposes; some were used as receptacles for stores and lumber, another was a school, another a glazier's shop; and the windows of all were, in general, broken. Part of the vaults beneath the church was occupied by a carpenter, the remainder was held by the bishop, the dean and chapter, and the minor canons. One vault, thought to have been used for a burial-place, was converted into a wine-cellar, and a way had been cut into it through the wall of the building itself. (This practice of converting church vaults into wine-cellars, it may be remarked, is not yet worn out. Some of the vaults of Winchester Cathedral are now, or were lately, used for that purpose). The show-rooms and cloisters under the convocation house, 'where not long since the sermons in foul weather were wont to be preached,' were made 'a common lay-stall for boards, trunks, and chests, being lett oute unto trunk-makers, where, by means of their daily knocking and noyse, the church is greatly disturbed.' More than twenty houses also had been built against the outer walls of the cathedral; and part of the very foundations was cut away to make offices. One of those houses had literally a closet dug in the wall; from another was a way through a window into a ware-room in the steeple; a third, partly formed by St. Paul's, was lately used as a play-house; and the owner of the fourth baked his bread and pies in an oven excavated within a buttress." See Mal. Lon. Red. vol. iii. p. 71-73.

The middle of St. Paul's was also the Bond-Street of that period, and remained so till the time of the commonwealth. The loungers were called Paul's Walkers. "The young gallants from the Inns of Court, the western and the northern parts of the metropolis, and those that had spirit enough," says our author, "to detach themselves from the counting-houses in the east, used to meet at the central point, St. Paul's; and from this circumstance obtained the appellations of Paul's Walkers, as we now say Bond-street Loungers. However strange it may seem, tradition says, that the great Lord Bacon used in his youth to cry, Eastward ho! and was literally a Paul's Walker." Moser, in the European Magazine, July, 1807.

Lord Bacon had a taste for display, which was afterwards exhibited in a magnificent manner, worthy of the grandeur of his philosophy; but this, when he was young, might probably enough have been vented in the shape of an exuberance, which did not yet know what to do with itself. Who would think that the late Mr. Fox ever wore red-heeled shoes, and was a "back about town?"

But to conclude with these curious passages:—"The Walkers in Paul's," continues our author "during this and the following reigns, were composed of a motley assemblage of the gay, the vain, the dissolute, the idle, the knavish, and the lewd; and various notices of this fashionable resort may be found in the old plays and other writings of the time. Ben Jonson, in his Every Man out of his Humour, has given a series of scenes in the interior of St. Paul's, and an assemblage of a great variety of characters; in the course of which the curious piece of information occurs, that it was common to affix bills, in the form of advertisements, upon the columns in the aisles of the church, in a similar manner to what is now done in the Royal Exchange: those bills he ridicules in two affected specimens, the satire of which is admirable. Shakespeare also makes Falstaff say, in speaking of Bardolph, 'I bought him in Paul's, and he'll buy me a horse in Smithfield: if I could get me but a wife in the stewes, I were mann'd, hors'd, and wiv'd.'"

To complete these urbanities, the church was the resort of pickpockets. Bishop Corbet, a poetical wit of the time of Charles the First, sums up its character, as the "walke

"Where all our Brittain sinners swear and talk." *

Only one reformation had taken place in it since the complaint made by Edward the Third: no woman, at the time of Earle's writing, was to be found there; at least not in the crowd. "The visitants," he says, "are all men, without exceptions."† A common-wealth writer insinuates otherwise; but the visitation was not public. The practice of "walking and talking" in St. Paul's appears to have revived under James the Second, probably in connexion with Catholic wishes; for there was an act of the first of William and Mary, by which transgressors forfeited twenty pounds for every offence; and what is remarkable, the bishop threatened to enforce this act so late as the year 1725, "the custom," says Mr. Malcolm, "had become so very prevalent."‡

A proverb of "dining with Duke Humphrey," has survived to the present day, owing to a supposed tomb of Humphrey, the good Duke of Gloucester, which was popular with the poorer frequenters of the place. They had a custom of strewing herbs before it, and sprinkling it with water. The tomb, according to Stow, was not Humphrey's, but that of Sir John Beauchamp, one of the house of Warwick. Men who strolled about for want of a dinner were familiar enough with this tomb; and were therefore said to dine with Duke Humphrey.

While some of the extraordinary operations above-mentioned were going on, (the intriguing, picking of pockets, &c.) the sermon was very likely proceeding. It is but fair, however, to conclude that, in the Catholic times, during the elevation of the host, there was a show of respect. We have heard a gentleman say, who visited Spain in his childhood, that he remembered being at the theatre during a fandango, when a loud voice cried out "Dios (God); and all the people in the house, including the dancers, fell on their knees. A profound silence ensued. After a pause of a few seconds, the people rose, and the fandango went on as before. The little boy could not think what had happened, but was told that the host had gone by. The Deity (for so it was thought) had been sent for to the house of a sick man; and it was to honour him in passing, that the theatre had gone down on their knees. Catholics reform as well as other people, with the growth of knowledge, especially when restrictions no longer make their prejudices appear a matter of duty. We know not how it is in Spain at this moment, with regard to the devout interval of the fandango; but we know what would be thought of it by thousands of the offspring of those who witnessed it on this occasion; and certainly in no Catholic church now-a-days can be seen the abominations of old St. Paul's.

The passenger who now goes by the cathedral and associates the idea of the inside with that of respectful silence, and the simplicity of Protestant worship, little thinks what a noise has been in that spot, and what gorgeous processions have issued out of it.

Old St. Paul's was famous for the splendour of its shrine, and for its priestly wealth. The list of its copes, vestments, jewels, gold, and silver cups, candlesticks, &c. occupies thirteen folio pages of the Monasticon. The side aisles were filled with chapels to different saints and the Virgin; that is to say, with nooks partitioned off one from another, and enriched with separate altars; and it is calculated that, taking the whole establishment, there could hardly be fewer than two hundred priests. On certain holidays, this sacred multitude, in their richest copes, together with the lord mayor, aldermen, and city companies, and all the other parish priests of London, who carried a rich silver cross for every church, issued forth from the cathedral door in procession, lifting up a hymn, and so went through Cheapside and Cornhill to Leadenhall, and back again. The last of these spectacles was for the peace of Guineas, in 1546; shortly after which Henry the Eighth swept into his treasury the whole glories of Catholic worship, copes, crosses, jewels, church-plate, &c.—himself being the most bloated enormity that had ever mis-used them.

Among other retainers to the establishment, Henry suppressed a singular little personage, entitled the Boy-Bishop. The Boy-bishop (Episcopus Puerorum) was a chorister, annually elected by his fellows to imitate the state and attire of a bishop, which he assumed on St. Nicholas's day, the sixth of December, and retained till that of the Innocents, December the twenty-eighth. "This was done," says Brayley, "in commemoration of St. Nicholas, who, according to the Romish church, was so piously fashioned, that even when a babe in his cradle, he would fast both on Wednesdays and Fridays, and at those times was 'well pleased' to suck but once a day. However ridiculous it may now seem, the boy-bishop is stated to have possessed episcopal authority during the above term; and the other children were his prebendaries. He was not permitted to celebrate mass, but he had full liberty to preach; and however puerile his discourses might have been, we find they were regarded with so much attention, that the learned Dean Colet, in his statutes for St. Paul's school, expressly ordains that the scholars shall, on 'every Childermas daye, come to Paule's Church, and hear the Chylde Bishop's sermon, and after be at the hygh masse, and each of them offer a penny to the chylde bishop; and with them the maisters and surveyors of the scole.' "Probably," continues Mr. Brayley, "these orations though affectingly childish, were composed by the more aged members of the church. If the boy-bishop died within the time of his prelacy, he was interred in pontificalibus, with the same ceremonies as the real diocesan; and the tomb of a child bishop in Salisbury cathedral, may be referred to as an instance of such interment."*

"From a printed church-book," says Mr. Hone, "containing the service of the boy-bishop set to music, we learn that, on the eve of Innocent's-day, the boy-bishop, and his youthful clergy, in their copes, and with burning tapers in their hands, went in solemn procession, chanting and singing versicles, as they walked into the choir by the west door, in such order that the dean and canons went foremost, the chaplains next, and the boy-bishop with his priests in the last and highest place. He then took his seat, and the rest of the children disposed themselves on each side of the choir, upon the uppermost ascent, the canons resident bearing the incense and the book, and the petit-canons the tapers, according to the rubrick. Afterwards he proceeded to the altar of the Holy Trinity, and All Saints, which he first censed, and next the image of the Holy Trinity, his priests all the while singing. Then they all chaunted a service with prayers and responses, and, in the like manner taking his seat, the boy-bishop repeated salutations, prayers, and versicles; and in conclusion gave his benediction to the people, the chorus answering Deo Gratias."

The origin of customs is often as obscure as that of words, and may be traced with probability to many sources. Perhaps the boy-bishop had a reference, not only to St. Nicholas, but to Christ preaching when a boy among the doctors, and to the divine wisdom of his recommendations of a childlike simplicity. The school afterwards founded by Dean Colet was in honour of "the child Jesus." There was a school attached to the cathedral, of which Colet's was, perhaps, a revival, as far as scholarship was concerned. The boys in the older school were not only taught singing, but acting, and for a long period were the most popular performers of stage-plays. In the time of Richard the Second, these Boy-Actors petitioned the king to prohibit certain ignorant and "inexpert people from presenting the History of the Old Testament." They began with sacred plays, but afterwards acted profane; so that St. Paul's singing-school was numbered among the play-houses. This custom, as well as that of the boy-bishop, appears to have been common wherever there were choir-boys; and doubtless originated, partly in the theatrical nature of the catholic ceremonies at which they assisted, and partly in the delight which the more scholarly of their masters took in teaching the plays of Terence and Seneca. The annual performance of a play of Terence, still kept up at Westminster school, is supposed by Warton to be a remnant of it. The choristers of Westminster Abbey, and of the chapel of Queen Elizabeth, (who took great pleasure in their performances,) were celebrated as actors, though not so much so as those of St. Paul's. A set of them were incorporated under the title of Children of the Revels, among whom are to be found names that have since become celebrated as the fellow-actors of Shakespeare,—Field, Underwood, and others. It was the same with Hart, Mohun, and others, who were players in the time of Cibber. It appears that children with good voices were sometimes kidnapped for a supply.† Tusser, who wrote the Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, is thought to have been thus pressed into the service; and a relic of the custom is supposed to have existed in that of pressing drummers for the army, which survived so late as the accession of Charles the First. The exercise of the right of might over children, and by people who wanted singers,—an effeminate press-gang,—would seem an intolerable nuisance; but the children were probably glad enough to be complimented by the violence, and to go to sing and play before a court.

Ben Jonson has some pretty verses on one of these idle actors:—

Weep with me, all you that read
This little story;
And know, for whom a tear you shed
Death's self is sorry.

'Twas a child that so did thrive
In grace and feature,
As heaven and nature seemed to strive
Which owned the creature.

Years he numbered, scarce thirteen,
When fates turned cruel;
Yet three filled zodiacs had he been
The stage's jewel;

And did act (what now we moan)
Old men so dully,
As, soothe, the Parce thought him one,
He played so truly.

Till, by error of his fate,
They all consented;
But viewing him since (alas, too late)
They have repented;

And have sought (to give new birth)
In baths to steep him!
But being so much too good for earth,
Heaven vows to keep him.

This child, we see, was celebrated for acting old men. It is well known, that up to the Restoration, and sometimes afterwards, boys performed the parts of women. Kynaston, when a boy, used to be taken out by the ladies an airing, in his female dress, after the play. This custom of males appearing as females, † Parrey's is the word of Mr. Chalmers; who says, however, that he knows not on what principle the right of "pressing such children" was justified, "except by the maxim that the king had a right to the services of all his subjects." gave rise, in Shakspeare's time, to the frequent introduction of female characters disguised; thus presenting a singular anomaly, and a specimen of the gratuitous imagination of the spectators in those days; who, besides being contented with taking the bare stage for a wood, a rock, or a garden, as it happened, were to suppose a boy on the stage to pretend to be himself.

One of the strangest of the old ceremonies in which the clergy of the cathedral used to figure, was that which was performed twice a year, namely, on the day of the Commemoration and on that of the Conversion of St. Paul. On the former of these festivals, a fat doe, and on the latter, a fat buck, was presented to the Church by the family of Baud, in consideration of some land which they held of the Dean and Chapter at West Lee in Essex. The original agreement made with Sir William Le Baud in 1274, was, that he himself should attend in person with the animals; but some years afterwards it was arranged that the presentation should be made by a servant, accompanied by a deputation of part of the family. The priests, however, continued to perform their part in the show themselves. When the deer was brought to the foot of the steps leading to the choir, the reverend brethren appeared in a body to receive it, dressed in their full pontifical robes, and having their heads decorated with garlands of flowers. From thence they accompanied it as the servant led it forward to the high altar, where having been solemnly offered and slain, it was divided among the residentiaries. The horns were then fastened to the top of a spear, and carried in procession by the whole company around the inside of the church, a noisy concert of horns regulating their march. This ridiculous exhibition, which looks like a parody on the pagan ceremonies of their predecessors the priests of Diana, was continued by the cathedral clergy down to the time of Elizabeth.

The modern passenger through St. Paul's Churchyard has not only the last home of Nelson and others to venerate, as he goes by. In the ground of the old church were buried, and here, therefore, remains whatever dust may survive them, the gallant Sir Philip Sidney (the beau ideal of the age of Elizabeth), and Vandyke, who immortalised the youth and beauty of the court of Charles the First. One of Elizabeth's great statesmen also lay there,—Walsingham,—who died so poor, that he was buried by stealth, to prevent his body from being arrested. Another, Sir Christopher Hatton, who is supposed to have danced himself into the office of her Majesty's Chancellor,† had a tomb which his contemporaries thought too magnificent, and which was accused of "shouldering" the altar. There was an absurd epitaph upon it, by which he would seem to have been a dandy to the last.

Stay and behold the mirror of a dead man's house,
Whose lively person would have made thee stay and wonder.

When Nature moulded him, her thoughts were most on Mars;

And all the heavens to make him goodly were agreeing;

Thence he was valiant, active, strong, and passing comely;

And God did grace his mind and spirit with gifts excelling.

Nature commends her workmanship to Fortune's charge,

Fortune presents him to the court and queen,
Queen Eliz. (O God's dear handmaid) his most miracle.

Now hearken, reader, rarities not heard or seen;
This blessed Queen, mirror of all that Albion rul'd,
Gave favour to his faith, and precepts to his hopeful time;

First trained him in the stately band of pensioners

And for her safety made him Captain of the Guard.
Now doth she prune this vine, and from her sacred breast

Lessons his life, makes wise his heart for her great counsellors,

And so, Vice-Chamberlain, where foreign princes eyes
Might well admire her choicest, wherein she most excels.

He then aspires, says the writer, to "the highest subject's seat," and becomes

Lord Chancellor (measure and conscience of a holy king):

Robe, Collar, Garter, dead figures of great honour,
Alms-deeds with faith, honest in word, frank in dispen-

The poor's friend, not popular, the church's pillar.
This tombe sheweth one, the heaven's shrine the other.†

The first line in italics, and the poetry throughout, are only to be equalled by a passage in an epitaph

we have met with on a lady of the name of Greenwood, of whom her husband says,

"Her graces and her qualities were such
That she might have married a bishop or a judge;
But so extreme was her condescension and humility,
That she married me, a poor doctor of divinity;
By which heroic deed, she stands confest,
Of all other women, the phoenix of her sex."

Sir Christopher is said to have died of a broken heart, because his once loving mistress exacted a debt of him, which he found it difficult to pay. It was common to talk of courtiers dying of broken hearts at that time; which gives one an equal notion of the queen's power, and the servility of those gentlemen. Fletcher, bishop of London, father of the great poet, was another who had a tomb in the old church, and is said to have undergone the same fate. It was he that did a thing very unlike a poet's father. He attended the execution of Mary Queen of Scots, and said aloud, when her head was held up by the executioner, "So perish all Queen Elizabeth's enemies!" He was then Dean of Peterborough. The queen made him a bishop, but suspended him for marrying a second wife, which so preyed upon his feelings, that it is thought, by the help of an immoderate love of smoking, to have hastened his end—a catastrophe worthy of a mean courtier. He was well, sick, and dead, says Fuller, in a quarter of an hour. Most probably he died of apoplexy, the tobacco giving him the coup de grace.* Dr. Donne, the head of the metaphysical poets, so well criticised by Johnson, was Dean of St. Paul's, and had a grave here, of which he has left an extraordinary memorial. It is a wooden image of himself, made to his order, and representing him as he was to appear in his shroud. This, for some time before he died, he kept by his bed-side in an open coffin, thus endeavouring to reconcile an uneasy imagination to the fate he could not avoid. It is still preserved in the vaults under the church, and is to be seen with the other curiosities of the cathedral. We will not do a great man such a disservice as to dig him up for a spectacle. A man should be judged of at the time when he is most himself, and not when he is about to consign his weak body to its elements.

Of the events that have taken place connected with St. Paul's, one of the most curious was a scene that passed in the old cathedral between John of Gaunt and the Anti-Wickliffites. It made him very unpopular at the time. Probably, if he had died just after it, his coffin would have been torn to pieces; but subsequently he had a magnificent tomb in the church, on which hung his crest and cap of state, together with his lance and target. Perhaps the merits of the friend of Wickliff and Chaucer are now as much overvalued. The scene is taken as follows, by Mr. Brayley, out of Fox's Acts and Monuments:—

"One of the most remarkable occurrences that ever took place within the old cathedral was the attempt made in 1376 by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, under the commands of Pope Gregory the Eleventh, to compel Wickliff, the father of the English Reformation, to subscribe to the condemnation of some of his own tenets, which had been recently promulgated in the eight articles that have been termed the Lollards' Creed. The Pope had ordered the above prelates to apprehend and examine Wickliff; but they thought it most expedient to summon him to St. Paul's, as he was openly protected by the famous John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster; and that nobleman accompanied him to the examination, together with the Lord Percy, Marshall of England. The proceedings were soon interrupted by a dispute as to whether Wickliff should sit or stand; and the following curious dialogue arose on the Lord Percy desiring him to be seated:—

Bishop of London. "If I could have guessed, Lord Percy, that you would have played the master here, I would have prevented your coming."

Duke of Lancaster. "Yes, he shall play the master here, for all you."

Lord Percy. "Wickliff, sit down! You have need of a seat, for you have many things to say."

Bishop of London. "It is unreasonable that a clergyman, cited before his ordinary, should sit during his answer. He shall stand!"

Duke of Lancaster. "My Lord Percy, you are in the right! And for you, my Lord Bishop, you are grown so proud and arrogant, I will take care to humble your pride; and not only yours, my lord, but that of all the prelates in England. Thou dependest upon the credit of thy relations; but so far from being able to help thee, they shall have enough to do to support themselves."

Bishop of London. "I place no confidence in my relations, but in God alone, who will give me the boldness to speak the truth."

Duke of Lancaster (speaking softly to Lord Percy). "Rather than take this at the Bishop's hands, I

* The Bishop's second wife was a Lady Baker, who is said, by Mr. Brayley, to have been young as well as beautiful, and probably did not add to the prelate's repose. In the mention of her in Mr. Brayley's table of contents, is a ludicrous mistake of the index-maker. Taking a hasty glance at the text, and overlooking a parenthesis, he has recorded her thus:—
"Baker, Lady, her immoderate love of tobacco."

will drag him by the hair of the head out of the court!"

Old St. Paul's was much larger than new; and the churchyard was of proportionate dimensions. The wall by which it was bounded ran along by the present Streets of Ave Mary Lane, Paternoster Row, Old Change, Carter Lane, and Creed Lane; and therefore included a large space and many buildings, which are not now considered to be within the precincts of the cathedral. This spacious area had grass inside, and contained a variety of appendages to the establishment. One of these was the cross, which we have alluded to at the beginning of this chapter, and of which Stow did not know the antiquity. It was called PAUL'S CROSS, and stood on the north side of the church, a little to the east of the entrance to Canon Alley. It was around Paul's Cross, or rather in the space to the east of it, that the citizens were wont anciently to assemble in Folk-mote, or general convention—not only to elect their magistrates and to deliberate on public affairs, but also, as it would appear, to try offenders and award punishments. We read of meetings of the Folk-mote in the thirteenth century; but the custom was discontinued, as the increasing number of the inhabitants, and the mixture of strangers, were found to lead to confusion and tumult. In after times the cross appears to have been used chiefly for proclamations, and other public proceedings, civil as well as ecclesiastical, such as the swearing of the citizens to allegiance, the emission of papal bulls, the exposing of penitents, &c., "and for the defaming of those," says Pennant, "who had incurred the displeasure of crowned heads." A pulpit was attached to it, it is not known when, in which sermons were preached, called Paul's Cross Sermons, a name by which they continued to be known when they ceased in the open air. Many benefactors contributed to support these sermons. In Stow's time the pulpit was an hexagonal piece of wood, "covered with lead, elevated upon a flight of stone steps, and surmounted by a large cross." During rainy weather the poorer part of the audience retreated to a covered place called the shrowds, which are supposed to have abutted on the church wall. The rest, including the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, most probably had shelter at all times; and the King and his train (for they attended also), had covered galleries.† Popular preachers were invited to hold forth in this pulpit, but the Bishop was the inviter. In the reign of James the First, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen ordered, that every one who should preach there, "considering the journeys some of them might take from the Universities, or elsewhere, should, at his pleasure, be freely entertained for five days' space, with sweet and convenient lodging, fire, candle, and all other necessities, viz., from Thursday before their day of preaching, to Thursday morning following."‡ "This good custom," says Maitland, "continued for some time. And the Bishop of London, or his chaplain, when he sent to any one to preach, did actually signify the place where he might repair at his coming up, and be entertained freely." In earlier times a kind of inn seems to have been kept for the entertainment of the preachers at Paul's Cross, which went by the name of the Shunamites' House.

"Before this cross," says Pennant, "in 1463, was brought, divested of all splendour, Jane Shore, the charitable, the merry concubine of Edward the Fourth, and, after his death, of his favourite, the unfortunate Lord Hastings. After the loss of her protectors, she fell a victim to the malice of crook-backed Richard. He was disappointed (by her excellent defence) of convicting her of witchcraft, and confederating with her lover to destroy him. He then attacked her on the weak side of frailty. This was undeniable. He consigned her to the severity of the church: she was carried to the Bishop's palace, clothed in a white sheet, with a taper in her hand, and from thence conducted to the cathedral, and the cross, before which she made a confession of her only fault. Every other virtue bloomed in this ill-fated fair with the fullest vigour. She could not resist the solicitations of a youthful monarch, the handsomest man of his time. On his death she was reduced to necessity, scorned by the world, and cast off by her husband, with whom she was paired in her childish years, and forced to fling herself into the arms of Hastings." "In her penance she went," says Holinshed, "in countenance and pace demure, so wamant, that albeit she were out of all arrie,

† The active habits of our ancestors enabled them to bear these out-of-doors sermons better than their posterity could; yet, as times grew less hardy, they began to have consequences, which Bishop Latimer attributes to another cause. "The citizens of Reims," said he, in a sermon preached in Lincolnshire in the year 1552, "had their burying-place without the city, which, no doubt, is a laudable thing; and I do marvel, that London, being so great a city, hath not a burial place without, for no doubt it is an unwholesome thing to bury within the city, especially at such a time, when there be great sickness, and many die together. I think verily that many a man taketh his death in Paul's churchyard, and this I speak of experience; for I myself, when I have been there on some mornings to hear the sermons, have felt such an ill savoured unwholesome savour, that I was the worse for it a great while after: and I think no less, but it is the occasion of great sickness and disease."—Brayley, vol. ii. p. 315.

save her kertie onlie, yet went she so faire and lovelie, namelie, while the wondering of the people cast a comlie rud in her cheeks, (of which she before had most misse,) that hir great shame wan hir much praise among those that were more amorous of hir bodie, than curious of hir soule. And manie good folkes that hated her living, (and glad were to see sin corrected,) yet pitied they more hir penance, than rejoiced therein, when they considered that the Protector procured it more of a corrupt intent than any virtuous affection."

"Rowe," continues Pennant, "has flung this part of her sad story into the following poetical dress; but it is far from possessing the moving simplicity of the old historian."

Submissive, sad, and lowly was her look;
A burning taper in her hand she bore;
And on her shoulders, carelessly confused,
With loose neglect, her lovely tresses hung;
Upon her cheek a faintish flush was spread;
Feeble she seemed, and sorely smit with pain;
While, barefoot as she trod the flinty pavement,
Her footsteps all along were marked with blood;
Yet silent still she passed, and unrepining;
Her streaming eyes bent over on the earth;
Except when, in some bitter pang of sorrow,
To heaven she seemed in fervent zeal to raise,
And beg that mercy man denied her here.

"The poet has adopted the fable of her being denied all sustenance, and of her perishing with hunger, but that was not fact. She lived to a great age, but in great distress and miserable poverty; deserted even by those to whom she had, during prosperity, done the most essential services. She dragged a wretched life even to the time of Sir Thomas More, who introduces her story into his Life of Edward the Fifth. The beauty of her person is spoken of in high terms: "Proper she was, and faire: nothing in her bodie that you would have changed: but you would have wished her somewhat higher. Thus sai they that knew hir in hir youth. Now is she old, leane, withered, and dried up: nothing left but rivelled skin and hard bone; and yet, being even such, who so well advise her visage, might gesse and devise, which parts how filled, would make it a faire face."†

To these pictures, which are all drawn with spirit, may be added a portrait in the notes to Drayton's Heroical Epistles, referring to the one by Sir Thomas More. "Her stature," says the comment, "was mean, her hair of a dark yellow, her face round and full, her eye gray, delicate harmony being betwixt each part's proportion, and each proportion's colour; her body, fat, white, and smooth; her countenance cheerful, and like to her condition. That picture which I have seen of hers, was such as she rose out of her bed in the morning, having nothing on but a rich mantle, cast under her arm, over her shoulder, and sitting in a chair on which her naked arm did lie. What her father's name was, or where she was born, is not certainly known: but Shore, a young man of right goodly person, wealth, and behaviour, abandoned her bed, after the king had made her his concubine."‡

Richard, in the extreme consciousness of his being in the wrong, made a sad bungling business of his first attempts on the throne. The penance of Jane Shore was followed by Dr. Shaw's sermon at the same cross, in which the servile preacher attempted to bastardize the children of Edward, and to recommend the "legitimate" Richard as the express image of his father. Richard made his appearance, only to witness the sullen silence of the spectators; and the Doctor, with a sensibility arguing more weakness than wickedness, took to his house, and soon after died.§

In the reign of the Tudors, Paul's cross was the scene of a very remarkable series of contradictions. The government under Henry the Eighth preached for and against the same doctrines in religion. Mary furiously attempted to revive them; and they were finally denounced by Elizabeth. Wolsey began in 1521, with fulminating, by command of the Pope, against "one Martin Eleutherius," (Luther). The denouncement was made by Fisher, (afterwards beheaded for denying the king's supremacy); but Wolsey sat by, in his usual state, censed and canopied, with the Pope's ambassador on one side of him, and the Emperor's on the other. During the sermon a collection of Luther's books was burnt in the churchyard; "which ended, my lord Cardinal went home to dinner with all the other prelates." About ten years afterwards the preachers at Paul's Cross received an order from the king to "teach and declare to the people, that neither the Pope, nor any of his predecessors, were anything more than the simple Bishops of Rome." On the accession of Mary, the discourses were ordered to veer directly round, which produced two attempts to assassinate the preachers in sermon-time; and the moment Elizabeth came to the throne, the divines began recommending the very opposite tenets, and the Pope was finally rejected. At this Cross Elizabeth afterwards attended to hear a thanksgiving sermon for the defeat of the Invincible Armada; on which occasion a coach was first seen in England,—the one she came in. The last sermon attended there by the sovereign, was during the reign of her successor; but discourses continued to be delivered up to the time of the Civil Wars, when, after being turned to account by the Puritans for about a year, the pulpit was demolished by order of Parliament. The "willing instrument" of the overthrow was Pennington, the Lord Mayor. The inhabitants who look out of their windows now-a-days on the northern side of St. Paul's, may thus have a succession of pictures before their mind's eye, as curious and inconsistent as those of a dream,—princes, queens, lord-mayors, and aldermen,

A mob of coblers, and a court of kings,

Jane's penance, Richard's chagrin, Wolsey's exaltation; clergymen preaching for and against the Pope; a coach coming as a wonder, where coaches now throng at every one's service; and finally a puritanical Lord Mayor, who "blasphemed custard," laying the axe to the tree, and cutting down the pulpit and all its works.

The next appendage to the old church, in point of importance, was the Bishop's or London House, the name of which survives in that of London House Yard. This, with other buildings, perished in the Great Fire; and on the site of it were built the houses now standing between the yard just mentioned and the present Chapter House. The latter was built by Wren. The old one stood on the other side of the cathedral, where the modern deanery is to be found, only more eastward. The bishop's house was often used for the reception of princes. Edward the Third and his Queen were entertained there after a great tournament in Smithfield; and there poor little Edward the Fifth was lodged, previously to his appointed coronation. To the east of the bishop's house, stretching towards Cheapside, was a chapel, erected by the father of Thomas Becket, called Pardon-Church-Haugh, which was surrounded by a cloister, presenting a painting of the Dance of Death on the walls, a subject rendered famous by Holbein.†

Another chapel called the Charnel, a proper neighbour to this frisco, stood at the back of the two buildings just mentioned. It received its name from the quantity of human bones collected from St. Paul's Churchyard, and deposited in a vault beneath. The Charnel was taken down by the Protector Somerset about 1549, and the stones used to help in the building of the new palace of Somerset House. On this occasion it is stated that more than a thousand cart-loads of bones were removed to Finsbury Fields, where they formed a large mound, on which three windmills were erected. From these Windmill Street in that neighbourhood derives its name. The ground on which the chapel stood was afterwards built over with dwellings and warehouses, having sheds before them for the use of Stationers. Immediately to the north of St. Paul's School, and towards the spot where the churchyard looks into Cheapside, was a campanile, or bell-house; that is to say, a belfry, forming a distinct building from the Cathedral, such as it is accustomed to be in Italy. It was by the ringing of this bell that the people were anciently called together to the general assemblage called the Folk-mote, mentioned above. The campanile was very high, and was won at dice from King Henry the Eighth by Sir Miles Partridge, who took it down and sold the materials. On the side of the cathedral directly the reverse of this (the south-west), and forming a part of the great pile of building, was the parish church of St. Gregory, over which was the Lollard's Tower, or prison, infamous, like its namesake at Lambeth, for the ill-treatment of heretics. "This," says Brayley, on the authority of Fox's Martyrology, "was the scene of at least one 'foul and midnight murder,' perpetrated in 1514, on a respectable citizen, named Richard Hunne, by Dr. Horsey, chancellor of the diocese, with the assistance of a bell-ringer; and afterwards defended by the Bishop Fitz-James, and the whole body of prelates, who protected the murderers from punishment, lest the clergy should become amenable to civil jurisdiction. Though the villains, through this interference, escaped without corporal suffering, the king ordered them to pay 1,500*l.* to the children of the deceased, in restitution of what he himself styles the 'cruel murder.'""

The clergy, with almost incredible audacity, afterwards commenced a process against the dead body of Hunne for Heresy; and, having obtained its condemnation on that score, they actually burned it in Smithfield. The Lollard's Tower continued to be used as a prison for heretics for some time after the Reformation. Stowe tells us that he recollected of one Peter Burchett, a gentleman of the Middle Temple, being committed to this prison, on suspicion of holding certain erroneous opinions, in 1573. This, however, is, we believe, the last case of the kind that is recorded.

It remains to say a word of St. Paul's School, founded, as we have already mentioned, by Dean Colet; and destined to become the most illustrious of all the buildings on the spot, in giving education to Milton. We have dwelt more upon the localities of St. Paul's Churchyard than it is our intention to do on others. The dignity of the birth-place of the metropolis beguiled us; and the events recorded to have taken place in it are of real interest.—Milton was not the only person of celebrity educated at this school. Bentley, his critic, was probably induced by the like circumstance to turn his unfortunate attention to the poet's epic in after life, and make those gratuitous massacres of the text, which gave a profound scholar the air of the most presumptuous of cockcombs. Here also Camden received part of his education; and here were brought up, Leland, his brother antiquary; the Gales (Charles, Roger, and Samuel), all celebrated antiquaries; Sir Anthony Deane, the only man who had the courage and honesty to tell Henry the Eighth, that he was dying; Halley, the astronomer; Bishop Cumberland, the great grandfather of the dramatist; Pepys, who has lately obtained so curious a celebrity, as an annalist of the court of Charles the Second: and last, not least, one in whom a learned education would be as little looked for as in Pepys, if we are to trust the stories of the times; to wit, John Duke of Marlborough. Barnes was laughed at for dedicating his Anacreon to the Duke, as one to whom Greek was unheard of; and it has been related as a slur on the great general (though assuredly it is not so), that having alluded on some occasion to a passage in history, and being asked where he found it, he confessed that his authority was the only historian he was acquainted with; namely, William Shakespeare.

Less is known of Milton during the time he passed at St. Paul's School, than of any other period of his life. It is ascertained, however, that he cultivated the writing of Greek verses, and was a great favourite with the usher, afterwards master, Alexander Gill, himself a Latin poet of celebrity. At the back of the old church was an enormous rose-window, which we may imagine the young poet to have contemplated with delight, in his fondness for ornaments of that cast; and the whole building was calculated to impress a mind, more disposed, at that time of life, to admire as a poet, than to quarrel as a critic or a sectary. Gill, unluckily for himself, was not so catholic. Some say he was suspended from his mastership for severity; a quality which he must have carried to a great pitch, for that age to find fault with it; but from an answer written by Ben Jonson to a fragment of a satire of his, it is more likely he got into trouble for libels against the court. Aubrey says, that the old doctor, his father, was once obliged to go on his knees to get the young doctor pardoned, and that the offence consisted in his having written a letter, in which he designated King James and his son, as the "old foole and the young one." There are letters written in early life from Milton to Gill, full of regard and esteem; nor is it likely that the regard was diminished by Gill's petulance against the court. In one of the letters, it is pleasant to hear the poet saying, "Farewell, and on Tuesday next expect me in London among the booksellers."†

† See Todd's Milton, vol. vii.; Aubrey's Letters and Lives, and Ben Jonson's Poems. Gill's specimen of a satire is very bad, and the great laureate's answer is not much better. The first couplet of the latter, however, is to the purpose:—

"Shall the prosperity of a pardon still Secure thy railing rhymes, infamous Gill?"

(To be Continued.)

• The reader, perhaps, will agree with us in thinking, that the last three lines of this poetry are unworthy of the rest, and put Jane in a theatrical attitude which she would not have affected.

§ "Having once ended," says Stow, "the preacher gat him home, and never after durst look out for shame, but kept him out of sight like an owie; and when he once asked one that had been his olde friende, what the people talked of him, all were it that his owne conscience well shewed him, that they talked no good, yet when the other answered him, that there was in every man's mouth spoken of him such shame, it so strake him to the hart, that in a few daies after, he withered, and consumed away."—Brayley, vol. i. p. 312.

† A Dance of Death (for the subject was often repeated) is a procession of the various ranks of life, from the pope to the peasant, each led by a skeleton for his partner. Holbein enlarged it by the addition of a series of visits privately paid by Death to the individuals. The figurantes, in his work, by no means go down the dance "with an air of despondency." The human beings are unconscious of their partners (which is fine); and the Deaths are as jolly as skeletons well can be.

THEIR MEMORIES AND GREAT MEN.

CHAPTER THE FIRST. (Continued)

Dedication of St. Paul's Cathedral during the Commonwealth.—The present Cathedral.—Sir Christopher Wren.—Statute of Queen Anne.

THE parliamentary soldiers annoyed the inhabitants of the churchyard, by playing at nine-pins at unreasonable hours, — a strange misdemeanour for that "church militant." They hastened also the destruction of the cathedral. Some scaffolding, set up for repairs, had been given them for arrears of pay. They dug pits in the body of the church to saw the timber in; and they removed the scaffolding with so little caution, that great part of the vaulting fell in, and lay a heap of ruins. The east end only and a part of the choir continued to be used for public worship, a brick wall being raised to separate this portion from the rest of the building, and the congregation entering and getting out through one of the north windows. Another part of the church was converted into barracks and stables for the dragoons. As for Inigo Jones's lofty and beautiful portico, it was turned into "shops," says Maitland, "for milliners and others, with rooms over them for the convenience of lodging; at the erecting of which, the magnificent columns were piteously mangled, being obliged to make way for the ends of beams, which penetrated their centers." The statues on the top were thrown down and broken to pieces.

We have already noticed the lucky necessity for a new church, occasioned by the great fire. An attempt was at first made to repair the old building—the work, as we have already mentioned, being committed to the charge of Sir John Denham (the poet), his Majesty's Surveyor General. But it was eventually found necessary to commence a new edifice from the foundation. Sir Christopher Wren, who accomplished this task, had been before employed in superintending the repairs—and was appointed head surveyor of the works in 1669, on the demise of Denham. It is not our intention to enlarge on the present state of places and public buildings in London, especially as a volume, we understand, may shortly be laid before the public, which shall take a particular survey of the two great cathedrals of London and Westminster, their architecture and monuments. We shall content ourselves therefore with stating, in reference to times gone by, that Sir Christopher Wren had very great and ungenerous trouble given him, in the erection of the new structure; and after all, did not build it as he wished. His taste was not understood, either by court or clergy; he was envied (and, towards the close of his life, ousted) by inferior workmen; was forced to make use of two orders instead of one, that is to say, to divide the sides and front into two separate elevations, instead of running them up and dignifying them with pillars of the whole height; and during the whole work, which occupied a great many years, and took up a considerable and anxious portion of his time, not unattended with personal hazard, all the pay which he was then, or ever, to expect, was a pittance of two hundred a-year. A moiety of this dribble was for some time actually suspended, till the building should be finished; and for the arrears of it he was forced to petition the government of Queen Anne, and then only obtained them under circumstances of the most unhandsome delay. Wren, however, was a philosopher and a patriot; and if he underwent the mortification attendant on philosophers and patriots, for offending the self-love of the shallow, he knew how to act up to the spirit of those venerable names, in the interior of a mind as elevated and well composed as his own architecture. Some pangs he felt, because he was a man of humanity, and could not disdain his fellow-creatures; but he was more troubled for the losses of the art than his own. He is said actually to have shed tears when compelled to deform his cathedral with the side aisles,—some say in compliance with the will of the Duke of York, afterwards James the Second, who anticipated the use of them for the restoration of the old Catholic chapels. Money he despised, except for the demands of his family, consenting to receive a hundred a-year for rebuilding such of the city churches (a considerable number) as were destroyed by the fire! And when finally ousted from his office of surveyor-general, he said with the ancient, "Well, I must philosophize a little sooner than I intended." (Nunc me jubet fortuna expeditus philosophari). The Duchess of Marlborough, in resisting the claims of one of her Blenheim surveyors, said "that Sir C. Wren was content to be dragged up in a basket three times a week to the top of St. Paul's, and at great hazard, for 200*l.* a-year." But, as a writer of his life has remarked, she was perhaps "little capable of drawing any nice distinction between the feelings of the hired surveyor of Blenheim, and those of our architect, in the contemplation of the raising of the fabric which his vast genius was calling into existence:

her notions led her to estimate the matter by the simple process of the rule of three direct, and on this principle she had good reason to complain of the surveyor." The same writer tells us, that Wren's principal enjoyment during the remainder of his life, consisted in his being "carried once a year to see his great work;" "the beginning and completion of which," observes Walpole, "was an event which, one could not wonder, left such an impression of content on the mind of the good old man, that it seemed to recall a memory almost deadened to every other use." The epitaph upon him by his son, which Mr. Mylne, the architect of Blackfriars' bridge, caused to be rescued from the vaults underneath the church, where it was ludicrously inapplicable, and placed in gold letters over the choir, has a real sublimity in it, though defaced by one of those plays upon words, which were the taste of the times in the architect's youth, and which his family perhaps had learnt to admire.

Subtus et dicitur
Hujus ecclesie et urbis conditor
Ch. Wren,
Qui vixit annos ultra nonaginta
Non sibi sed bono publico.
Lector, si monumentum requiris, Circumspice.

We cannot preserve the pun in English, unless perhaps by some such rendering as, "Here found a grave, the founder of this church;" or "Underneath is founded the tomb," &c. The rest is admirable:

Who lived to the age of upwards of ninety years,
Not for himself, but for the public good.
Reader, if thou seekest his monument,
Look around.

The reader does look around, and the whole interior of the cathedral, which is finer than the outside, seems like a magnificent vault over his single body. The effect is very grand, especially if the organ is playing. A similar one, as far as the music is concerned, is observable when we contemplate the statues of Nelson and others. The grand repose of the church, in the first instance, gives them a mortal dignity, which the organ seems to waken up and revive, as if, in the midst of the

"Pomp and threatening harmony,"†

their spirits almost looked out of their stony and sightless eye-balls. Johnson's ponderous figure looks down upon us, with something of sourness in the expression; and in the presence of Howard, we feel as if pomp itself were in attendance on humanity. It is a pity that the sculpture of the monuments in general is not worthy of these emotions, and tends to undo them.

A poor statue of Queen Anne, in whose reign the church was finished, stands in the middle of the front area, with the figures of Britain, France, Ireland, and America, round the base. Garth, who was a whig, and angry with the councils which had dismissed his hero Marlborough, wrote some bitter lines upon it, which must have had double effect, coming from so goodnatured a man.

Near the vast bulk of that stupendous frame,
Known by the Gentiles' great apostle's name,
With grace divine, great Anna's seen to rise,
An awful form that glads a nation's eyes:
Beneath her feet four mighty realms appear,
And with due reverence pay their homage there.
Britain and Ireland seem to own her grace,
And e'en wild India wears a smiling face.
But France alone with downcast eyes is seen,
The sad attendant on so good a queen.
Ungrateful country! to forget so soon
All that great Anna for thy sake has done,
When sworn the kind defender of thy cause,
Spite of her dear religion, spite of laws,
For thee she sheathed the terrors of her sword,
For thee she broke her gen'ral—and her word:
For thee her mind in doubtful terms she told,
And learned to speak like oracles of old:
For thee, for thee alone, what could she more?
She lost the honour she had gained before;
Lost all the trophies which her arms had won,
(Such Cæsar never knew, nor Philip's son.)
Resigned the glories of a ten year's reign,
And such as none but Marlborough's arm could gain:
For thee in annals she's content to shine,
Like other monarchs of the Stuart line.

Many irreverent remarks were also made by the coarser wits of the day, in reference to the position of her Majesty, with her back to the church and her face to a brandy-shop, which was then kept in that part of the church-yard. The calumny was worthy of the coarseness. Anne, who was not a very clever woman, had a difficult task to perform; and though we differ with her politics, we cannot, even at this distance of time, help expressing our disgust at personalities like these, especially against a female.

We remember, in our childhood, a romantic story at school, of a church that stood under St. Paul's. We conceived of it, as of a real good-sized church, actually standing under the other; but how it came there, nobody could imagine. It was some ghostly edification of providence, not lightly to be inquired into; but as its name was St. Faith's, we conjectured that the mystery had something to do with religious belief. The mysteries of art do not remain with us for life, like those of nature. Our phenomenon amounted to this. "The church of St. Faith," says Brayley, "was originally a distinct building, standing near the east end of St. Paul's; but when the old cathedral was enlarged, between the years 1256 and 1312, it was taken down, and an extensive part of the vaults was appropriated to the use of the parishioners of St. Faith's, in lieu of the demolished fabric. This was afterwards called (the church of St. Faith in the Crypts,) Ecclesia Sanctæ Fidei in Cryptis; and, according to a representation made to the Dean and Chapter, in the year 1735, measured 180 feet in length, and 80 in breadth. After the fire of London, the parish of St. Faith was joined to that of St. Augustine; and, on the rebuilding of the cathedral, a portion of the churchyard belonging to the former was taken to enlarge the avenue round the east end of St. Paul's, and the remainder was inclosed within the cathedral railing."

The parishioners of St. Faith have still liberty to bury their dead in certain parts of the churchyard and the crypts. Other portions of the latter have been used as a store-house for wine, stationery, &c. The stationers and booksellers of London, during the fire, thought they had secured a great quantity of their stock in this place; but on the air being admitted, when they went to take them out, the goods had been so heated by the conflagration of the church overhead, that they took fire at last, and the whole property was destroyed. Clarendon says it amounted to the value of two hundred thousand pounds.†

One of the houses on the site of the old episcopal mansion, now occupied by his successor, Mr. Hunter, was Mr. Johnson's, the bookseller, a man who deserves mention for his liberality to Cowper, and for the remarkable circumstance of his never having seen the poet, though his intercourse with him was long and cordial. Mr. Johnson was in connexion with a circle of men of letters, some of whom were in the habit of dining with him once a week, and who comprised the leading polite writers of the last generation,—Cowper, Darwin, Hayley, Dr. Aikin, Mrs. Barbauld, &c. Fuseli must not be omitted, who was at least as good a writer as a painter; and others of celebrity are still living, who have been among the instructors of their time, and will be known to posterity. Here Bonnycastle hung his long face over his plate, as glad to escape from arithmetic into his jokes and his social dinner, as a great boy; and here the first of our living poets (Wordsworth) published his earliest performance.

But the most illustrious of all booksellers in our boyish days, not for his great names, not for his dinners, not for his riches that we know of, nor for any other full-grown celebrity, but for certain little penny books, radiant with gold, and rich with bad pictures, was Mr. Newberry, the famous children's bookseller, "at the corner of St. Paul's church-yard," next Ludgate Street. The house is still occupied by a successor, and children may have books there as formerly,—but not the same. The gilding we confess, we regret: gold, somehow, never looked so well as in adorning literature. The pictures also,—may we own that we preferred the uncouth coats, the staring blotted eyes, and round pieces of rope for hats, of our very badly-drawn contemporaries, to all the proprieties of modern embellishment? We own the superiority of the latter, and would have it proceed and prosper, but a boy of our own time was much, though his coat looked very like his grandfather's. The engravings, probably, were of that date. Enormous, however, is the improvement upon the morals of these little books; and there we give them up, and with unmitigated delight. The good little boy, the hero of the infant literature in those days, stood, it must be acknowledged, the chance of being a very selfish man. His great virtue consisted in being different from some other little boy, perhaps his brother; and his reward was having a fine coach to ride in, and being a king Pepin. Now-a-days, since the world has had a great moral earthquake that set it thinking, the little boy promises to be much more of a man; thinks of others, as well as works for himself; and looks for his reward to a character for good sense and beneficence. In no respect is the progress of the age more visible, or more importantly so, than in this apparently trifling matter. The most bigoted opponents of a rational education are obliged to adopt a portion of its spirit, in order to retain a hold, which their own teaching must accordingly undo: and if the times were not full of hopes in other respects, we should point to this evidence of their advancement, and be content with it.

One of the most pernicious mistakes of the old children's books, was the inculcation of a spirit of revenge and cruelty, in the tragic examples which were intended to deter their little readers from idleness and disobedience. One, if he did not behave himself, was to be shipwrecked and eaten by lions; another to become a criminal, who was not to be taught better, but rendered a mere wicked contrast to the luckier virtue; and above all, none were to be poor but the vicious, and none to ride in their coaches but little Sir Charles Grandisons, and all-perfect Sheriffs. We need not say how contrary this was to the real spirit of Christianity, which at the same time they so much insisted on. The perplexity in after life, when reading of poor philosophers and rich vicious men, was in proportion; or rather, virtue and mere worldly success became confounded. In the present day, the profitableness of good conduct is still inculcated, but in a sounder spirit. Charity makes the proper allowance for all; and none are excluded from the hope of being wiser and happier. Men, in short, are not taught to love and labour for themselves alone, or for their little dark corners of egotism; but to take the world along with them into a brighter sky of improvement; and to discern the want of success in success itself, if not accompanied by a liberal knowledge.

The Seven Champions of Christendom, Valentine and Orson, and other books of the fictitious class, which have survived their more rational brethren (as they thought themselves,) are of a much better order, and, indeed, survive by a natural instinct in society to that effect. With many absurdities they have a general tone of manly and social virtue, which may be safely left to itself. The absurdities wear out, and the good remains. Nobody in these times will think of meeting giants and dragons; of giving blows that confound an army, or tearing the hearts out of two lions on each side of him, as easily as if he were dipping his hands into a lottery. But there are still giants and wild beasts to encounter, of another sort, the conquest of which requires the old enthusiasm and disinterestedness; arms and war are to be checked in their career, and have been so, by that new might of opinion to which everybody may contribute much in his single voice; and wild men, or those who would become so, are tamed by education and brotherly kindness, into ornaments of civil life.

The neighbourhood of St. Paul's retains a variety of appellations, indicative of its former connexion with the church. There is Creed Lane, Ave-Maria Lane, Sermon Lane,* Canon Alley, Pater-Noster Row, Holiday Court, Amen Corner, &c. Members of the cathedral establishment still have abodes in some of these places, particularly in Amen Corner, which is inclosed with gates, and appropriated to the houses of prebendaries and canons. Close to Sermon Lane is Do-little Lane; a vicinity which must have furnished jokes to the Puritans. Addle Street is an ungrateful corruption of Athelstan Street, so called from one of the most respectable of the Saxon kings, who had a palace in it.

We have omitted to notice a curious passage in Swift, in which he abuses himself for going to the top of St. Paul's. "To day," says he, writing to Stella, "I was all about St. Paul's, and up at the top like a fool, with Sir Andrew Fountain, and two more; and spent seven shillings for my dinner, like a puppy." "This," adds the doctor, "is the second time he has served me so: but I will never do it again, though all mankind should persuade me, unconsidering puppies!†" The being forced by richer people than one's self to spend money at a tavern, might reasonably be lamented; but from the top of St. Paul's, Swift beheld a spectacle, which surely was not unworthy of his attention; perhaps it affected him too much. The author of Gulliver might have taken from it his notions of little bustling human-kind.

Dr. Johnson frequently attended public worship

* Unless, indeed, we are to suppose, as has been suggested, that Sermon Lane is a corruption of Sheremontiers Lane, that is the lane of the money clippers, or such as cut and rounded the metal which was to be coined or stamped into money. There was anciently a place in this lane for melting silver, called the Blackfist—and the Mint was in the street now called Old Change, in the immediate neighbourhood. See Maitland, ii. 680 (Edit. of 1746).

in St. Paul's. Very different must his look have been, in turning into the chancel, from the threatening and trampling aspect they have given him in his statue. We do not quarrel with this aspect; there is a great deal of character in it. But the contrast, considering the place, is curious. A little before his death, when bodily decay made him less patient than ever of contradiction, he instituted a club at the Queen's Arms, in St. Paul's Churchyard. "He told Mr. Hook," says Boswell, "that he wished to have a City Club, and asked him to collect one; but, said he, don't let them be patriots."* (This was an allusion to the friends of his acquaintance, Wilkes). Boswell accompanied him one day to the club, and found the members "very sensible, well-behaved men:" that is to say, Hook had collected a body of decent listeners. This, however, is melancholy. In the next chapter we shall see Johnson in all his glory.

St. Paul's Churchyard appears as if it were only a great commercial thoroughfare, but if all the clergy could be seen at once, who have abodes in the neighbourhood, they would be found to constitute a numerous body. If to the sable coats of these gentlemen, be added those of the practisers of the civil law, who were formerly allied to them, and who live in Doctor's Commons, the churchyard increases the clerical part of its aspect. It resumes, to the imagination, something of the learned and collegiate look it had of old. Paternoster Row is said to have been so called on account of the number of Stationers or Text-writers that dwelt there, who dealt much in religious books, and sold horn-books or A B C's, with the Paternoster, Ave-Maria, Creed, Graces, &c. And so of the other places above-named. But it is more likely that this particular street (as, indeed, we are told also) was named from the rosary or paternoster-makers; for so they were called; as appears by a record of "one Robert Nikke, a paternoster-maker and citizen, in the reign of Henry the Fourth."

It is curious to reflect what a change has taken place in this celebrated book street, since nothing was sold there but rosaries. It is but rarely the word Paternoster-Row strikes us as having a reference to the Latin prayer. We think of booksellers' shops, and of all the learning and knowledge they have sent forth. The books of Luther, which Henry the Eighth burnt in the neighbouring churchyard, were turned into millions of volumes, (partly by reason of that burning,) and have put an end to their predecessors for ever.

Paternoster-Row, however, has not been exclusively in possession of the booksellers, since it lost its original tenants, the rosary-makers. Indeed it would appear to have been only in comparatively recent time, that the booksellers fixed themselves there. They had for a long while been established in St. Paul's Churchyard, but scarcely in the Row, till after the commencement of the last century. "This street," says Maitland, writing in 1720, "before the fire of London, was taken up by eminent mercers, silkmen, and lacemen; and their shops were so resorted unto by the nobility and gentry, in their coaches, that oftentimes the street was so stopped up, that there was no passage for foot passengers. But since the said fire, those eminent tradesmen have settled themselves in several other parts; especially in Ludgate Street, and in Bedford Street, Henrietta Street, and King Street, Covent Garden. And the inhabitants in this street are now a mixture of tradespeople, such as tire-women, or milliners, for the sale of top-knots, and the like dressings for the females." In a subsequent edition of his history, published in 1755; it is added, "There are now many shops of mercers, silkmen, eminent printers, booksellers, and publishers."† The most easterly of the narrow and partly covered passages between Newgate Street and Paternoster Row, is that called Panyer's Alley, remarkable for a stone built into the wall of one of the houses on the east side, supporting the figures of a panner or wicker basket, surmounted by a boy, and exhibiting the following inscription:—

"When you have sought the city round,
Yet still this is the highest ground."

We cannot say if absolute faith is to be put in this asseveration; but it is possible. It has been said, that the top of St. Paul's is on a level with that of Hampstead.

We look back a moment between Paternoster Row and the churchyard, to observe, that the only memorial remaining of the residence of the Bishop of London, is a tablet in London-House Yard, let into the wall of the public house called the Goose and Gridiron. The Goose and Gridiron is said by tradition to have been what was called in the last century a "music house;" that is to say, a place of entertainment with music. When it ceased to be musical, a landlord, in ridicule of its former pretensions, chose for his sign "a goose stroking the bars of a gridiron with his foot," and called it the Swan and Harp.‡

Between Amen Corner, and Ludgate Street, at the end of a passage from Ave-Maria Lane, "stood" a great house of stone and wood, belonging in old time to John, Duke of Bretagne, and Earl of Richmond, cotemporary with Edward II. and III. After him it was possessed by the Earls of Pembroke, in the time of Richard II. and Henry IV., and was called Pembroke's Inn, near Ludgate. It then fell into the possession of the title of Abergavenny, and was called Burgavenny House, under which circumstances it remained in the time of Elizabeth. "To finish the anti-climax," says Pennant, "it was finally possessed by the company of Stationers, who rebuilt it of wood, and made it their Hall. It was destroyed by the Great Fire, and was succeeded by the present plain building."* Of the once powerful possessors of the old mansion nothing now is remembered, or cared for; but in the interior of the modern building are to be seen, looking almost as if they were alive, and as if we knew them personally, the immortal faces of Steele and Richardson, Prior in his cap, and Dr. Hoadley, a liberal bishop. There is also Mrs. Richardson, the wife of the novelist, looking as prim and particular as if she had been just chucked under the chin; and Robert Nelson, Esq., supposed author of the Whole Duty of Man, and prototype of Sir Charles Grandison, as regular and passionless in his face as if he had been made only to wear his wig. The same is not to be said of the face of Steele, with his black eyes and social aspect; and still less of Richardson, who, instead of being the smooth, satisfied-looking personage he is represented in some engravings of him (which makes his heart-rending romance appear unaccountable and cruel), has a face as uneasy as can well be conceived,—flushed and shattered with emotion. We recognise the sensitive, enduring man, such as he really was,—a heap of bad nerves. It is worth any body's while to go to Stationers' Hall, on purpose to see these portraits. They are not of the first order as portraits, but evident likenesses. Hoadley looks at once jovial and decided, like a good-natured controversialist. Prior is not so pleasant as in his prints; his nose is a little aquiline, instead of turned up; and his features, though delicate, not so liberal. But if he has not the best look of his poetry, he has the worst. He seems as if he had been sitting up all night; his eyelids droop; and his whole face is used with rakery.

It is impossible to see Prior and Steele together, without regretting that they quarrelled: but as they did quarrel, it was fit that Prior should be in the wrong. From a Whig he had become a Tory, and shewed that his change was not quite what it ought to have been, by avoiding the men with whom he had associated, and writing contemptuously of his fellow wits. All the men of letters, whose portraits are in this hall, were, doubtless, intimate with the premises, and partakers of Stationers' dinners. Richardson, was Master of the Company. Morpew, a bookseller in the neighbourhood, was one of the publishers of the Tatler; and concerts as well as festive dinners used to take place in the great room, of both of which entertainments Steele was fond. It was here, if we mistake not, that one of the inferior officers of the company, a humourist on sufferance, came in, one day, on his knees, at an anniversary dinner, when Bishop Hoadley was present, in order to drink to the "Glorious Memory."† The company, Steele included, were pretty far gone; Hoadley had remained as long as he well could; and the genuflector was drunk. Steele, seeing the bishop a little disconcerted, whispered him, "Do laugh, my lord; pray laugh:—'tis humanity to laugh." The good-natured prelate acquiesced. Next day, Steele sent him a penitential letter, with the following couplet:—

Virtue with so much ease on Bangor sits,
All faults he pardons, though he none commits.

The most illustrious musical performance that ever took place in the hall, was that of Dryden's Ode. A society for the annual commemoration of St. Cecilia, the patroness of music, was instituted in the year 1680, not without an eye perhaps to the religious opinions of the heir presumptive, who was shortly to ascend the throne as James the Second. An ode was written every year for the occasion, and set to music by some eminent composer; and the performance of it was followed by a grand dinner. In 1687, Dryden contributed his first ode, entitled, "A Song for Saint Cecilia's Day," in which there are finer things than in any part of the other, though as a whole it is not so striking. Ten years afterwards it was followed by "Alexander's Feast," the dinner perhaps being a part of the inspiration. Poor Jeremiah Clarke, who shot himself for love, was the composer.‡ This is the ode,

† Of William III.

‡ The genius of Clarke, which, agreeably to his unhappy end, was tender and melancholy, was unsuited to the livelier intoxication of Dryden's Feast, afterwards gloriously set by Handel. Clarke has been styled the musical Otraw of his time. He was organist at St. Paul's, and shot himself at his house in St. Paul's Churchyard. Mr. John Reading, organist of St. Dunstan's, who was intimately acquainted with him, was going by at the moment the pistol went off, and upon entering the house "found his friend and fellow student in the agonies of with the composition of which Bolingbroke is said to have found Dryden in a state of emotion one morning, the whole night having been passed, agitatione deo, under the fever of inspiration.

From Stationer's Hall once issued all the almanacks that were published, with all the trash and superstition they kept alive. Francis Moore is still among their "living dead men." Francis must now be a posthumous old gentleman, of at least one hundred and forty years of age. The first blunder the writers of these books committed, in their cunning, was the having to do with the state of the weather; their next was to think that the grandmothers of the last century were as immortal as their title-pages, and that nobody was getting wiser than themselves. The mysterious solemnity of their hieroglyphics, bringing heaven and earth together like a vision in the Apocalypse, was imposing to the nurse and the child; and the bashfulness of their bodily sympathies, no less attractive. We remember the astonishment of a worthy seaman, some years ago, at the claim which they had put into the mouth of the sign Virgo. The monopoly is now gone; almanacks have been forced into improvement by emulation; and the Stationers (naturally enough at the moment) are angry about it. This fit of ill humour will pass; and a body of men, interested by their very trade in the progress of liberal knowledge, will by and bye, join the laugh at the tenderness they evinced in behalf of old wives' fables. It is observable, that their friend Bickerstaff (Steele's assumed name in the Tatler) was the first to begin the joke against them.

Knight Riders Street (Great and Little) on the south side of St. Paul's Churchyard, is said to have been named from the processions of Knights from the Tower, to their place of tournament in Smithfield. It must have been a round-about way. Probably the name originated in nothing more than a sign, or from some reference to the Herald's College in the neighbourhood. The open space, we may here notice, around the western extremity of the Cathedral was anciently used by the Citizens for assembling together "to make shew of their arms," or to hold what was called among the Scotch "a weapon shaw." A complaint was made by the Lord Mayor and the Ward in the reign of Edward I. against the Dean and Chapter for having inclosed this ground, which they insisted was "the soil and lay-fee of our lord the king," by a mud wall, and covered part of it with buildings.* The houses immediately to the west of Creed Lane and Ave-Maria Lane probably occupy part of the space in question.

Behind Great Knight Rider's Street, is Doctor's Commons, so called from the Doctors of Civil Law, who dine together four days in each term. The Court of Admiralty is also there. The Admiralty judge is preceded by an officer with a silver oar.† There is something pleasing in the parade of a civil officer, thus announced by a symbol representing the regulation of the most turbulent of elements.

The civil and ecclesiastical lawyers, who connect the law with the church, had formerly much more to do than they have at present. The proctors (or attorneys) are said to have been so numerous and so noisy, in the time of Henry VII., that the judge sometimes could not be heard for them. They thrust themselves into causes without the parties' consent, and shouldered the advocates out of their business. The diminution of their body was owing to Crammer. At present, no lawyers of their class are accounted more respectable. It is a pity as much cannot be said of the causes brought into this court. Doctor's Commons are of painful celebrity in the annals of domestic trouble. We have hardly perhaps among us a remnant of greater barbarism, than "an action for damages," whether considered with a view to recompense or prevention. But the question is one of too great delicacy to be discussed in these pages. Doctor's Commons bind, as well as set loose. "Hence originates," says the facetious Mr. Malcolm, "the awful scrap of parchment, bearing the talismanic mark of John Cantuar (the Archbishop of Canterbury), which constitutes thousands of benedicts the happiest or most miserable of married men: in short, it is the grand lottery of life, in which, fortunately, there are far more prizes than blanks."‡ The community ought to be thankful to Mr. Malcolm for this last piece of information, as there is a splenetic notion among them to the contrary.

A history deeply interesting to human nature might be drawn up from the documents preserved in this place; for besides cases of personal infidelity, here are to be found others of infidelity religious, of blasphemy, simony, &c., together with romantic questions relative to kindred and succession; and here are deposited those last specimens of human strength or weakness, last wills and testaments, together with cases in which they have been contested. It was these records that furnished us with accounts of the latest days of Milton (see Bunhill Row); and that set the readers of Shakespeare speculating why he should make no mention of his wife, except to leave her his "second best bed." They also perplexed for ever the question as to how he spelt his name, by leaving it doubtful whether he had not written it three different ways in the signatures to one paper. Of the practisers in the civil courts we can call to mind nothing more worthy of recollection than the strange name of one of them, Sir Julius Cæsar (see Great St. Helens, Bishopsgate), and the ruinous volatility of poor Dr. King, the Tory wit, who is conjectured to have been the only civilian that ever went to reside in Ireland, "after having experienced the emoluments of a settlement in Doctor's Commons." The doctor unfortunately practised too much with the bottle, which hindered him from adhering long to anything.

Behind Little Knight Rider's Street, to the east of Doctor's Commons, is the Herald's College. A gorgeous idea of colours falls on the mind in passing it, as from a cathedral window,

"And shielded scutcheons blush with blood of queens and kings."—Keats.

The passenger, if he is a reader conversant with old times, thinks also of bannered halls, of processions of chivalry, and of the fields of Cressy and Poitiers, with their vizzed knights, distinguished by their coats and crests; for a coat of arms is nothing but a representation of the knight himself, from whom the bearer is descended. The shield supposes his body; there is the helmet for his head, with the crest upon it; the flourish is his mantle; and he stands upon the ground of his motto, or moral pretension. The supporters, if he is noble, or of a particular class of knighthood, are thought to be the pages that waited upon him, designated by the fantastic dresses of bear, lion, &c., which they sometimes wore. Heraldry is full of colour and imagery, and attracts the fancy like a "book of pictures." The Kings at Arms are romantic personages, really crowned, and have as mystic appellations as the kings of an old tale,—Garter, Clarencieux, and Norroy. Norroy is King of the North, and Clarencieux (a title of Norman origin) of the South. The heralds, Lancaster, Somerset, &c., have simpler names, indicative of the counties over which they preside; but are only less gorgeously dressed than the kings, in emblazonment and satin; and then there are the four pursuivants, Rouge Croix, Rouge Dragon, Portcullis, and Blue Mantle, with hues as lively, and appellations as quaint, as the attendants on a fairy court. For gorgeousness of attire, mysteriousness of origin, and in fact for similarity of origin (a knave being a squire), a knave of cards is not unlike a herald. A story is told of an Irish King at Arms*, who, waiting upon the Bishop of Killaloe to summon him to Parliament, and being dressed, as the ceremony required, in his heraldic attire, so mystified the bishop's servant with his appearance, that not knowing what to make of it, and carrying off but a confused notion of his title, he announced him thus: "My lord, here is the King of Trumps."

Mr. Pennant says, that the Herald's College, "is a foundation of great antiquity, in which the records are kept of all the old blood in the kingdom." But this is a mistake. Heraldry, indeed, is of great antiquity, in the sense of messengers of peace and war; but in the modern sense, they are no older than the reign of Edward III., and were not incorporated before that of the usurper Richard. The house which they formerly occupied was a mansion of the Earls of Derby. It was burnt in the Great Fire, and succeeded by the present building, part of which was raised at the expense of some of their officers. As to their keeping records of "all the old blood in the kingdom," they may keep them, or not, as they have the luck to find them; but the blood was old, before they had anything to do with it. Men bore arms and crests, when there were no officers to register them. This, as a writer in the Censura Literaria observes, justly diminishes the pretension they set up, that no arms are of authority which have not been registered among their archives. "If this doctrine," says he, "were just, the consequence would be, that arms of comparatively modern invention are of better authority than those which a man and his ancestors have borne from times before the existence of the College of Arms, and for time immemorial, supported by the evidence of ancient seals, funeral monuments, and other authentic documents. Surely this is grossly absurd; and the more absurd, if we consider, that the heralds seem originally not to have been instituted for the manufacturing of armorial ensigns, but for the recording those ensigns, which had been borne by men of honourable lineage, and which might, therefore, be borne by their posterity. Perhaps it would not be too much to presume, that it will be found, on inquiry, that there are no grants of arms by the English Heralds, of any very high antiquity; and that the most ancient which can be produced, either in the original or in well authenticated copies, are of a date when the general use of seals of arms, circumscribed with the names and titles of the bearers, was wearing away."*

We learn from the same writer, that the value of "a painted shield of parchment" is fifty pounds. Of the spirit in which these things have been done, the reader may judge from a letter written by an applicant to one of the most respectable names in the college list. His object was to get the illegitimate coat of a female friend of his, changed to one by which it was to appear she was not illegitimate. He offers five pounds for it; and adds, that there is another friend of his, "an Alderman's son, in Chester, whose great-grandfather was baseborn, whom I have bine treating with sev'all tymes about the alteration of his coat, telling him for 10^l and not under, it may be accomplished; five he is willing to give, but not above; if you please to accept of that sume, you may writt me a line or two. I desire that you will send the scroll down again, as soon as you can.†"

The truth is, that except as far as their records go, and as they can be turned to account in questions of kindred and inheritance, the heralds are of no importance in modern times. Nor have they anything to do with the spirit and first principles of the devices, of which they assume the direction. We think it is worth notice, because heraldry itself, or at least the discussion of coats of arms, of which most people are observed to be fonder than they choose to confess, might be reconciled to the progress of knowledge, or made, at any rate, the ground of a pleasing and not ungraceful novelty. To a coat of arms, no man, literally speaking, has pretensions, who is not the representative of somebody that bore arms in the old English wars; but when the necessity for military virtue decreased, arms gave way to the gown; and shields had honourable, but fantastic augmentations, for the peaceful triumphs of lawyers and statesmen. Meanwhile, commerce was on the increase, and there came up a new power in the shape of pounds, shillings and pence, which was to be represented also by its coat of arms; how absurdly, need not be added; though the individuals, who got their lions and their shields behind the counter, were often excellent men, who might have cut as great a figure in battle as the best, had they lived in other times. At length, not to have a military coat was to be no gentleman; and then the heralds fairly sold achievements at so much the head. They received their fees, put on their spectacles, turned over their books like an astrologer, and found that you were deserving of a bear's paw, or might clap three puppies on your coach. "Congreve," says Swift, in one of his letters to Stella, "gave me a Tatler he had written out, as blind as he is, for little Harrison. 'Tis about a scoundrel that was grown rich, and went and bought a coat of arms at the herald's, and a set of ancestors at Fleet Ditch."‡ And this is the case at present. Numbers of persons do not, however, stand on this ceremony with the heralds. Many are content to receive their exploits at half-a-guinea the set, from pretenders who undertake to "procure arms;" and many more assume the arms nearest to their name and family, or invent them at once; naturally enough concluding, that they might as well achieve their own glories, as buy them of an old gentleman or a pedlar.

Now arms were not originally given; they were assumed. Men in battle, when armies fought pell-mell, and bodily prowess was more in request than it is now, wished to have their persons distinguished; and accordingly they put a device on their shield, or some towering symbol on their helmet. This at once served to mark out the bearer, and to express the particular sentiment or alliance, upon which he was to be understood as priding himself. The real spirit of heraldry consisted therefore, and must always consist, in distinguishing one person from another, and in expressing his individual sentiments; and as the adoption of some device is both an elegant exercise of the fancy, and acts as a kind of memento to the conscience, tending to keep us to what we profess, people who have no certain arms of their own, or who do not care for them if they have, might not ungracefully, or even uselessly entertain themselves, with doing, in their own persons, what the old assumers of arms did in theirs; that is to say, invent their own distinctions. The emblazonment might amuse their fancies, and be put in books, or elsewhere, like other coats of arms; and a little difference in the mode of it could easily set aside the pretensions of the heralds to interfere. People might thus express their views in life, or their particular tastes and opinions; and the "science of heraldry," which has been so much laughed at, not always with justice, be made to accord with the progress of knowledge,—or, at all events, with the entertaining part of it.

death." Another friend of his, one of the lay vicars of the cathedral, relates of him, that a few weeks before the catastrophe, Clarke had alighted from his horse in a sequestered spot in the country, where there was a pond surrounded by trees, and not knowing whether to hang or drown himself, tossed up a piece of money to see which. The money stuck in the earth edgeways. Of this new chance for life, poor Clarke, we see, was unable to avail himself.

cans, in which parliaments were sometimes held. The Emperor Charles V. was lodged in it when he visited Henry VIII. in 1522; and in a hall of the same building seven years after, the cause was tried between Henry and his Queen Catherine. Shakespeare has given us the opening scene. In Elizabeth's time, the desecrated tenements and neighbourhood of Blackfriars became the resort of the world of fashion, — a court end of the city; and close at hand, most probably on the spot retaining the name of Play-house Yard, was the famous Theatre in Blackfriars, where Shakespeare's, Ben Jonson's, and Beaumont and Fletcher's plays were performed, and where many of them came out. It was what they called at that time a "private" theatre, the peculiarity of which is not exactly understood. All that is known of it is, that it was smaller than the public ones; but it was open to public admission. Perhaps a private theatre meant a theatre more select than the others, and frequented by politer company; for such, at all events, the present one appears to have been. It is conjectured also to have been a winter theatre, and its performances took place by candle-light. The gallants and ladies of the courts of Elizabeth and James took their dinner at noon, and after riding or lute-playing till evening, went to their snug little theatre in the neighbourhood, to laugh or weep over the divine fancies of Shakespeare. Shakespeare himself must often have been on the spot; a certainty, which an intellectual inhabitant will be glad to possess. The theatre, at one time, was partly his property.

A part of the monastery of the Blackfriars was, in 1623, the scene of a frightful accident, which made a great noise at the time. Mr. Malcolm has enumerated several of the publications recording it; and from these it appears, that on Sunday, the 5th of November in that year, a congregation of about three hundred individuals had assembled in a small gallery over the gateway of the lodgings of the French Ambassador in this building, in order to hear a sermon from a Jesuit named Father Drury, who enjoyed considerable reputation as a popular preacher. Under the floor of the chamber where they were assembled was an empty apartment, and under that another, making together a height of twenty-two feet from the ground, and the floor itself, as it afterwards turned out, was mainly supported by a single beam, which in the centre was not more than three inches thick. The people had been in their seats for about half-an-hour, when this beam suddenly gave way, and the whole of them were instantly precipitated, mixed with the timber, plaster, and rubbish of the floors, into the vacant depth below. Drury and another priest, named Redgate, were both killed, as were also a Lady Webbe, and the daughter of a Lady Blackstone, together with, it is supposed, between ninety and a hundred persons. Many more were seriously injured. "Several people," says Mr. Malcolm, "escaped in a very extraordinary manner, particularly Mrs. Lucy Penruddock, who was preserved by a chair falling hollow over her; and a young man, who lay on the floor, overwhelmed by people and rubbish, yet untouched by them, through the resting of fragments on each other, and thus leaving a space round him. In this horrible situation he had the presence of mind to force his way through a piece of the ceiling, and he shortly after had the indescribable happiness of assisting in the liberation of others."* There were many persons, it would appear, foolish and wicked enough to represent this calamity as a token of the displeasure of heaven against the Roman Catholic faith; and the pamphlets noticed by Mr. Malcolm, are some of those that were published by the parties in a violent controversy which raged for some time on the subject. The day on which this accident happened was long popularly remembered under the name of the Fatal Vespers, and the circumstance that it was also the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot, was not forgotten by the judgment-mongers. Most of the bodies of those who were killed on this occasion, were buried without either the ceremony of a funeral service, or the decency of a coffin or a winding-sheet, in two large pits or trenches, dug, the one in the court before, and the other in the garden behind the house in which the accident had taken place.

Printing-house Square, close to Playhouse-yard, marks out the site of the ancient King's Printing-House, whence bibles, prayer-books, and proclamations were issued. It was rebuilt in the middle of the last century, and became, according to Maitland, "the completest printing-house in the world." The king's printer now lives elsewhere; but in the same spot is a house, which may be called the world's printing-house, seeing the enormous multitude of newspapers which the mighty giant of steam daily throws forth out of his iron lap, full of interest to all quarters of the globe. We allude to the Times newspaper. There is no knowing, in this and other instances, what bounds to put to human expectation, when mechanical and intellectual force are thus joined in a common object.

On the other side of the way in Bridge Street, stood and stands now, though hidden by the new houses, and much altered, the former palace of Bridewell, now well known as a house of industry and correction. In ancient times the king used frequently to reside here—and when such was the case the courts of law sometimes attended him. The building having fallen into decay, was restored about the year 1522, by Henry VIII.—and here the attendants of the Emperor Charles V. were lodged while he himself occupied the Blackfriars, a communication being formed between the two palaces by a gallery carried over the Fleet ditch, and through the old city wall. Both Henry and Catherine, also, were lodged here while the cause between them, was proceeding at Blackfriars. In 1553 Edward VI. granted this palace, on the solicitation of Bishop Ridley, for the purposes to which it has been since applied; an act of benevolence which was recorded, with more precision than elegance, in the following lines under a portrait of his majesty that used to hang near the pulpit in the old chapel:

"This Edward of fair memory the sixth,
In whom with greatness, goodness was commixt,
Gave this Bridewell, a Palace in old times,
For a chastising house of vagrant crimes."

Bridewell having been burnt down in the great fire was rebuilt immediately after that calamity—and it has since been frequently repaired and partially renovated. Henry the Eighth, ("sturdy rogue!") would have been a fit personage to lodge into it still though under somewhat different circumstances.

One of the steep and gloomy descents from Thames Street still preserves the name of Castle Street, and immediately to the west of this stood in ancient times, on the banks of the river, a large building called Baynard's Castle. Baynard, by whom it was originally erected in the eleventh century, was one of the Conqueror's Norman followers. His descendant, William Baynard, however, soon after the commencement of the next century, forfeited his inheritance to the crown, by which it was bestowed upon the family of Clare. The representative of this family, and the possessor of Baynard's Castle, in the reign of King John, was the Baron Robert Fitzwalter, a portion of whose history, as related by some of our old chroniclers, gives an interest to the spot. Among the beauties of the time, one of the fairest was Matilda, the daughter of Fitzwalter. The licentious monarch, who may probably have seen her at some high festival held in this very castle, was smitten, after his fashion, by her charms; but his suit was rejected with indignation both by herself and her father. His "love" now turned into hatred and thirst of revenge; he soon after resorted to open force, and having first driven Fitzwalter to seek refuge in France, easily got the unhappy girl into his custody, and, if we are to believe the story, despatched her by poison. He at the same time ordered Castle Baynard to be demolished. The next year the armies of the English and French kings lay encamped during a truce on the opposite sides of a river in France, when an English knight, impatient, as it would seem, of the bloodless inactivity that prevailed, thought fit to challenge any one of the enemy who chose to come forth and break a lance with him. It was not long before a champion appeared making his way across the water, who, unattended as he was, had no sooner reached the land than he mounted a horse and rode up to meet his challenger. The duel took place in the sight of King John and his troops, but it did not last long; for both the English knight and his horse were thrown to the ground by the first thrust of his antagonist's spear, which was also broken to shivers in the shock. "By God's troth," exclaimed John, as he beheld this heroic exploit, "he were a king indeed who had such a knight." The words were caught by some of the bystanders, who had observed more narrowly than the monarch the figure of the unknown victor, and who suspected him to be no other than their old acquaintance the Baron Fitzwalter. It was in fact no other. The next day, the praise which the king had bestowed upon his prowess being reported to him, he returned to the English camp, and throwing himself at the feet of his sovereign, was re-admitted to favour and restored to all his former possessions and honours. We may observe, however, that this narrative is scarcely detailed with sufficient precision to entitle it to be received as a piece of authentic history, and that especially it does not seem to be very easy to reconcile some parts of it as commonly given with the ascertained dates and course of the events of King John's reign. This Robert Fitzwalter is placed by Matthew Paris at the head of his list of the Barons, who, in 1215, came armed in a body to the King at the Temple, and made those demands which led to the concession of the Great Charter at Runnymede. Indeed in the short military contest which preceded the King's submission, Fitzwalter was appointed by his brother barons the commander-in-chief of their forces, and dignified in that capacity with the title of Marshal of the Army of God and of Holy Church. On his return to England he is said to have rebuilt or repaired his castle in London which the King had thrown down, and the edifice continued for a long time to be the principal fortress within the city. The family of Fitzwalter in consequence of their possession of Baynard Castle held the office of Chastillans and Bannerets, or Banner-bearers, of London,—and the reader who is curious upon such matters may consult Stow, or those who have copied him, for an account of the rights, services, and ceremonial customs appertaining to that dignity. The punishment of a person found guilty of treason within the banneret's jurisdiction is worth noticing: he was to be tied to a post in the Thames at one of the wharfs, and left there for two ebbs and two flowings of the tide. After this, there was certainly little chance of his committing any more treason.

It is not known how Baynard's Castle, and the privileges belonging to the lordship, got out of the hands of this family; but in 1428, in the reign of Henry the Sixth, the building having been burned down, is stated to have been restored by Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester. After the duke's death it came once more into the possession of the crown; and here it was that the great council assembled in the beginning of March, 1461, which proclaimed the Earl of March king by the title of Edward IV. It was here also, twenty-two years after, that the solemn farce was enacted in which Richard III. assumed the royal dignity on the invitation of Buckingham and in obedience to the pretended wishes of the citizens. Shakespeare has given this scene with an exact conformity, in all the matters of fact, to the narratives of the old chroniclers, the crafty Protector, it will be remembered, being made to present himself in the gallery above, supported by a bishop on each side, while Buckingham, the Lord Mayor, the Aldermen, and the Citizens, occupy the court of the castle below. Baynard's Castle was once more rebuilt in 1487, by Henry VII. with a view to its answering better the purpose of a royal palace; and the king occasionally lodged there. Some time after this we find the place in possession of the Earls of Pembroke, who made it their common residence; and it was here that the Earl of that name, on the 19th of July, 1553, about a fortnight after the death of Edward VI., assembled the council of the nobility and clergy at which the determination was taken, on the motion of Lord Arundel, to abandon the cause of Lady Jane Grey, and to proclaim Queen Mary, which accordingly was instantly done in different parts of the city. This is supposed to have been the building which was destroyed in the great fire of 1666. It is represented in an old print of London as a square pile surrounding a court, and surmounted with numerous towers. A large gateway in the middle of the south side led to the river by a bridge of two arches and stairs. This ancient fortress was never rebuilt after the fire; and its site has been since occupied by wharfs, timber-yards, workshops, and common dwelling-houses. The ward, however, in which it was situated, and which embraces also St. Paul's Churchyard, and nearly all the localities we have as yet noticed, still retains the name of the Ward of Baynard's Castle.

Upon Paul's Wharf Hill, to the north east of Baynard's Castle, were a number of houses within a great gate, which are said by Maitland to have been designated in their leases granted by the Dean and Chapter as the Camera Diana, or Diana's Chamber, and to have been so denominated from a spacious building in the form of a labyrinth constructed here by Henry II. for the concealment of the fair Rosamond Clifford. We need scarcely say that this tradition has all the air of a fable. The author we have just named, however, assures us that "for a long time there remained some evident testifications of tedious turnings and windings, as also of a passage under ground from his house to Castle Baynard; which was no doubt the King's way from thence to the Camera Diana, or the chamber of his "brightest Diana." What the "testifications" in question may really have amounted to we cannot pretend to say; but Diana, not being a family name, as in the case of another royal favourite, Diana of Poitiers, seems a strange one to have been given to the lady already christened by so poetical an appellation as Rosamond, and so different in her reputation from the chaste goddess. We should, for our parts, rather suppose that the Dean and Chapter had been moved to call the place Diana's Chamber by some tradition, or a conceit of their own, connecting it with the temple of that goddess, said to have formerly stood on the site of the neighbouring cathedral; or, if the name was really a very ancient one, and in popular use, it may perhaps be taken as lending some slight confirmation to the notion of the actual existence of that heathen edifice, and may "help," as Iago phrases it, "to thicken other proofs, that also demonstrate thinly." Inigo Jones, by the bye, is said by Lord Orford, to be buried in the church of St. Bennet, Paul's Wharf, which stands immediately to the south of the spot where we now are, at the corner formed by the meeting of Thames Street and St. Bennet's Hill.

Another building which formerly existed in this neighbourhood, was the Royal Wardrobe. It occupied the site of the present Wardrobe Court, immediately to the north of the church of St. Andrew's—and gave to the parish the name of St. Andrew's Wardrobe, by which it is still known. This building was erected about the middle of the 14th century, by Sir John Beauchamp, Knight of the Garter, a son of Guido Earl of Warwick, by whose heirs it was sold to Edward III. Mr. Malcolm has printed some extracts from the Manuscript Account Book, since preserved in the Harleian collection, of a keeper of this Wardrobe, from the middle of April to Michaelmas, 1481, (towards the close of the reign of Edward IV.) which are interesting and valuable as memorials, both of the prices and of the fashions of that time. During the period, of less than six months, over which the accounts extend, the sum of £1174. 5s. 2d. appears to have been received by the keeper, for the use of his office. Of this the most considerable portion seems to have been expended in the purchase of velvets and silks from Montpellier. The velvets cost from 8s. to 16s. per yard; black cloths of gold 40s.; what is called velvet upon velvet, the same; damask 8s.; satins 6s., 10s., and 12s.; camlets 30s. a piece; and saracnets from 4s. to 4s. 2d. Feather beds, with bolsters, "for our sovereign lord the king," are charged 16s. 8d. each. A pair of shoes of Spanish leather, double soled, and not lined, cost sixteen-pence; a pair of black leather boots 6s. 8d.; hats, a shilling a piece; and ostrich feathers, each 10s. The keeper's salary appears to have been £100. per annum—that of his clerk, a shilling a day; and the wages of the tailors sixpence a day each. The king sometimes lodged at the wardrobe; on one of which occasions the washing of the sheets which had been used, is charged at the rate of three-pence a pair. Candles cost a penny a pound. All the money disbursed by the keeper of the wardrobe, however, was not expended in decorating the persons of his majesty and the royal household. Among other items we find 20s. paid to Piers Bauduyn (or, Peter Baldwin, as we should now call him), stationer, "for binding, gilding, and dressing, of a book called Titus Livius;" for performing the same offices to a Bible, a Froisard, a Holy Trinity, and the Government of Kings and Princes, 16s. each; for three small French books, 6s. 8d.; for the Fortress of Faith, and Josephus, 3s. 4d.; and for what is designated "the Bible Historical," 20s. So that in those days, we see, the binding a book was conceived to be a putting of it into breeches, and the artist employed for that purpose looked upon as a sort of literary tailor.

How impossible it would now be, in a neighbourhood like this, for such nuisances to exist, as a fetid public ditch, and the scouts of degraded clergymen asking people to "walk in and be married!" Yet such was the case a century ago. At the bottom of Ludgate Hill the little river Fleet formerly ran, and was rendered navigable. In Fleet market is Sea-coal Lane, so called from the barges that landed coal there; and Turn-again Lane, at the bottom of which the unadvised passenger found himself compelled by the water to retrace his steps. The water gradually got clogged and foul; and the channel was built over, and made a street, as we have noticed in our introduction. But even in the time we speak of, this had not been entirely done. The ditch was open from Fleet Market to the river, occupying the site of the modern Bridge Street; and in the market, before the door of the Fleet prison, men plied in behalf of a clergyman, literally inviting people to walk in and be married. They performed the ceremony inside the prison, to sailors and others, for what they could get. It was the most squalid of Gretnas, bearding the decency and common sense of a whole metropolis. The parties retired to a gin-shop to treat the clergyman, and there, and in similar houses, the register was kept of the marriages. Not far from the Fleet is Newgate; so that the victims had their succession of nooses prepared, in case, as no doubt it often happened, one tie should be followed by the others. Pennant speaks of this nuisance from personal knowledge. "In walking along the streets in my youth," he tells us, "on the side next this prison, I have often been tempted by the question, Sir, will you be pleased to walk in and be married? Along this most lawless space was frequently hung up the sign of a male and female hand conjoined, with Marriages performed within, written beneath. A dirty fellow invited you in. The parson was seen walking before his shop; a squalid, profligate figure, clad in a tattered plaid night-gown, with a fiery face, and ready to couple you for a dram of gin or roll of tobacco. Our great chancellor, Lord Hardwick, put these demons to flight, and saved thousands from the misery and disgrace which would be entailed by these extemporary thoughtless unions."

This extraordinary disgrace to the city, which arose most likely from the permission to marry prisoners, and one great secret of which was the advantage taken of it by wretched women to get rid of their debts, was maintained by a collusion between the warden of the Fleet and the disreputable clergymen he became acquainted with. "To such an extent," says Malcolm, "were the proceedings carried, that twenty and thirty couples were joined in one day, at from ten to twenty shillings each;" and "between the 19th Oct. 1704, and the 12th Feb. 1705, 2,954 marriages were celebrated (by evidence), besides others known to have been omitted. To these neither license nor certificate of banns were required, and they concealed by private marks the names of those who chose to pay them for it."* The neighbourhood at length complained; and the abuse was put an end to by the marriage act, to which it gave rise.

Ludgate and Fleet ditch are among the scenes of the Dunciad. It is near Bridewell, on the site of the modern Bridge Street, that the venal and scurrilous heroes of that poem emulate one another, at the call of Dullness, in seeing who can plunge deepest into the mud and dirt.

"This labour past, by Bridewell all descend,
(As morning prayer and flagellation end*)
To where Fleet ditch, with disembodying streams,
Rolls the large tribute of dead dogs to Thames;
The king of dykes! than whom no sluice of mud
With deeper sable blots the silver flood.
Here strip, my children! here at once leap in;
Here prove who best can dash through thick and thin;
And who the most in love of dirt excel,
And dark dexterity of groping well!"†

This part of the games being over,

"Through Lud's famed gates, along the well-known Fleet,
Rolls the black troop, and overshadows the street;
Till showers of sermons, characters, essays,
In circling fences whiten all the ways:
So clouds replenished from some bog below,
Mount in dark volumes, and descend in snow."

The "well-known Fleet" is the prison just mentioned, the side of which appears to have been visible at that time in Ludgate-hill, and where it was a joke (too often founded in truth) to suppose authors incarcerated.

"Few sons of Phœbus in the courts we meet;
But fifty sons of Phœbus in the Fleet," says a prologue of Sheridan's. The Fleet having "rules," like the King's Bench, authors were found in the neighbourhood also. Arthur Murphy, provoked by the attacks of Churchill and Lloyd, describes them as among the poor hacks.

"On Ludgate hill who bloody murders write,
Or pass in Fleet Street supperless the night."

Booksellers' shops were then common as now in Fleet Street and the Strand, in Paternoster Row and Saint Paul's Churchyard. This is pleasant to think of; for change is not desirable without improvement. One feels gratified, where difference is not demanded of us, in being able to have the same association of ideas with such men as Pope and Dryden, even if it be upon no higher ground than the quantity of books in Paternoster Row, or that Ludgate Hill still leads into Fleet Street.

We are now in Fleet Street, and pleasant memories thicken upon us. To the left is the renowned realm of Alsatia, the Temple, the Mitre, and the abode of Richardson: to the right, divers abodes of Johnson; Chancery Lane, with Cowley's birth-place at the corner; Fetter Lane, where Dryden once lived; and Shire or Sheer Lane, immortal for the Tatler.

Fleet Street was, for a good period, perhaps for a longer one than can now be ascertained, the great place for shows and spectacles. Wild beasts, monsters, and other marvels, used to be exhibited there, as the wax-work is now; and here took place the famous ceremony of burning the Pope, with its long procession, and bigoted anti-bigotries. However, the lesser bigotry was useful, at that time, in keeping out the greater. Roger North has left us a lively account of one of these processions, in his Examen. It took place towards the close of the reign of Charles the Second, when just fears were entertained of his successor's design to bring in Popery. The day of the ceremony was the birth-day of Queen Elizabeth, the 17th March.

"When we had posted 'ourselves,' says North, 'at windows, expecting the play to begin' (he had taken his stand in the Green Dragon Tavern), 'it was very dark; but we could perceive the street to fill, and the hum o' the crowd grew louder and louder; and at length, with help of some lights below, we could discern, not only upwards towards the bar, where the aquib-war was maintained, but downwards towards Fleet Bridge, the whole street was crowded with people, which made that which followed seem very strange; for, about eight at night, we heard a din from below, which came up the street, continually increasing, till we could perceive a motion; and that was a row of stout fellows, that came, shouldered together, cross the street, from wall to wall, on each side. How the people melted away, I cannot tell; but it was plain those fellows made clear board, as if they had swept the street for what was to come after. They went along like a wave; and it was wonderful to see how the crowd made way: I suppose the good people were willing to give obedience to lawful authority. Behind this wave (which, as all the rest, had many lights attending), there was a vacancy, but it filled apace, till another like wave came up; and so four or five of these waves passed, one after another; and then we discerned more numerous lights, and throats were opened with hoarse and tremendous noise; and with that advanced a pageant, borne along above the heads of the crowd, and upon it sat an huge Pope, in pontificalibus, in his chair, with a seasonable attendance for state; but his premier minister, that shared most of his ear, was Il Signior Diavolo, a nimble little fellow, in a proper dress, that had a strange dexterity in climbing and winding about the chair, from one of the Pope's ears to the other.

"The next pageant was a parcel of Jesuits; and after that (for there was always a decent space between them) came another, with some ordinary persons with halters, as I took it, about their necks; and one, with a stenterophonic tube, sounded, 'Abhorrrers! Abhorrrers!' most infernally; and, lastly, came one, with a single person upon it, which, some said, was the pamphleteer, Sir Roger L'Estrange, some the King of France, some the Duke of York; but, certainly, it was a very complaisant, civil gentleman, like the former, that was doing what every body pleased to have him; and taking all in good part, went on his way to the fire."—The description concludes with a brief mention of burning the effigies, which, on these occasions, appear to have been of pasteboard.*

One of the great figures in this ceremony was the doleful image of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, a magistrate supposed to have been killed by the papists during the question of the Plot. Dryden has a fine contemptuous couplet upon it, in one of his prologues:—

"Sir Edmondbury first, in woful wise, Leads up the show, and milks their maudlin eyes."

We will begin with the left side, as we are there already; and first let us express our thanks for the neat opening by which St. Bride's church has been rendered an ornament to this populous thoroughfare. The steeple is one of the most beautiful of Wren's productions, though diminished in consequence of its having been found to be too severely tried by the wind. But a beam now comes out of this opening as we pass the street, better even than that of the illuminated clock at night time; for there, in a lodging in the churchyard, lived Milton, at the time that he undertook the education of his sister's children. He was then young and unmarried. He is said to have rendered his young scholars in the course of a year, able to read Latin at sight, though they were but nine and ten years of age. As to the clock, which serves to remind the jovial that they ought to be at home, we are loth to object to any thing useful; and in fact we admit its pretensions; and yet, as there is a time for all things, there would seem to be a time for time itself; and we doubt whether those who do not care to ascertain the hour beforehand, will derive much benefit from this glaring piece of advice.

"At the west end of St. Bride's church," according to Wood, was buried Richard Lovelace, Esq., one of the most elegant of the cavaliers of Charles the First, and author of the exquisite ballad beginning,

When Love with unconfined wings
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at my grates;

* The whipping of the criminals in Bridewell took place after the church service.

† Dunciad, book ii. v. 269.

* See Walter Scott's edition of Dryden, vol. x. p. 873. "Abhorrrers," were addressors on the side of the court, who had avowed "abhorrence" of the proceedings of the Whigs. The word was a capital one to sound through a trumpet.

When I lie tangled in her hair,
And fettered in her eye,
The birds that wanton in the air,
Know no such liberty.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage,
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage.

This accomplished man, who is said by Wood to have been in his youth "the most amiable and beautiful person that eye ever beheld," and who was lamented by Charles Cotton as an epitome of manly virtue, died at a poor lodging in Gunpowder Alley, near Shoe Lane, an object of charity.* He had been imprisoned by the Parliament and lived during his imprisonment beyond his income. Wood thinks that he did so in order to support the royal cause, and out of generosity to deserving men, and to his brothers. He then went into the service of the French king, returned to England, after being wounded, and was again committed to prison, where he remained till the king's death, when he was set at liberty "Having then," says his biographer, "consumed all his estate, he grew very melancholy, (which brought him at length into a consumption), became very poor in body and purse, and was the object of charity, went in ragged clothes, (whereas, when he was in his glory, he wore cloth of gold and silver,) and mostly lodged in obscure and dirty places, more befitting the worst of beggars than poorest of servants, &c."† "Geo. Petty, haberdasher in Fleet street," says Aubrey, "carried 20 shillings to him every Monday Morning from Sir Many, and Charles Cotton, Esq., for months: but was never repaid." As if it was their intention he should be! Poor Cotton, in the excess of his relish of life, lived himself to be in want; perhaps wanted the ten shillings that he sent. The mistress of Lovelace is reported to have married another man, supposing him to have died of his wounds in France. Perhaps this helped to make him careless of his fortune: but it is probable that his habits were naturally shrewd and expensive. Aubrey says he was proud. He was accounted a sort of minor Sir Philip Sydney. We speak the more of him, not only on account of his poetry, (which, for the most part, displays much fancy, injured by want of selectness,) but because his connexion with the neighbourhood probably suggested to Richardson the name of his hero in Clarissa. Grandison is another cavalier name in the history of those times. It was the title of the Duchess of Cleveland's father. Richardson himself was buried in St. Bride's. He was laid, according to his wish, with his first wife, in the middle aisle, near the pulpit. Where he lived, we shall see presently.

Not far from Gunpowder Alley, in the burying ground of the workhouse in Shoe Lane, lies a greater and more unfortunate name than Lovelace,—Chatterton. But we shall say more of him when we come to Brook Street, Holborn. We have been perplexed to decide, whether to say all we have got to say upon anybody, when we come to the first place with which he is connected, or divide our memorials of him according to the several places. Circumstances will guide us; but upon the whole it seems best to let the places themselves decide. If the spot is rendered particularly interesting by the division, we may act accordingly, as in the present instance. If not, all the anecdotes may be given at once.

On the same side of the way as Shoe Lane, but nearer Fleet Market, was Hardham's, a celebrated snuff shop, the founder of which deserves mention for a very delicate generosity. He was numberer at Drury Lane Theatre, that is to say, the person who counted the number of people in the house, from a hole over the top of the stage; a practice now discontinued. Whether this employment led him to number snuffs, as well as men, we cannot say, but he was the first who gave them their distinctions that way. Lovers of are indebted to him for the famous compound entitled "37." Being passionately fond of theatrical entertainments, he was seldom," says his biographer, "without embryo Richards and Hotspurs strutting and bellowing in his dining-room, or in the parlour behind his shop. The latter of these apartments was adorned with heads of most of the persons celebrated for dramatic excellence; and to these he frequently referred, in the course of his instructions.

"There is one circumstance, however, in his private character," continues our authority, "which deserves a more honourable rescue from oblivion. His charity was extensive in an uncommon degree, and was conveyed to many of its objects in the most delicate manner. On account of his known integrity (for he once failed in business, more creditably than he could have made a fortune by it), he was often entrusted with the care of paying little annual stipends to unfortunate women, and others who were in equal want of relief; and he has been known, with a generosity almost unexampled, to continue these annuities, long after the sources of them had been stopped by the deaths or caprices of the persons who at first supplied them. At the same time he persuaded the receivers that their money was remitted to them as usual, through its former channel. Indeed his purse was never shut even to those who were casually recommended by his common acquaintance."‡ Mr. Hardham died in 1772; and by his will bequeathed the interest of £20,000 to a female acquaintance, and at her decease the principal, &c., to the poor of his native city, Chichester.

Returning over the way we come to Dorset Street, and Salisbury Court, names originating in a palace of the Bishop of Salisbury, which he parted with to the Sackvilles. Clarendon lived in it a short time after the Restoration. At the bottom of Salisbury Court, facing the river, was the celebrated play-house, one of the earliest in which theatrical entertainments were resumed at that period. The first mention we find of it is in the following curious memorandum in the manuscript book of Sir Henry Herbert, master of the revels to King Charles the First. "I committed Cromes, a broker in Longe Lane, the 16th of Febr. 1634, to the Marsalsey, for lending a church robe with the name of Jesus upon it to the players in Salisbury Court, to present a Flamen, a priest of the heathens. Upon his petition of submission, and acknowledgement of his fault, I released him, the 17 Febr. 1634."†

It is not certain, however, whether the old theatre in Salisbury Court, and that in Dorset Garden, were one and the same; though they are conjectured to have been so. The names of both places seem to have been indiscriminately applied. However this may be, the house became famous under the Davenants for the introduction of operas, and of a more splendid exhibition of scenery; but in consequence of the growth of theatres in the more western parts of the town, it was occasionally quitted by the proprietors, and about the beginning of the last century finally abandoned. This theatre was the last to which people went in boats.

In a house, "in the centre of Salisbury Square or Salisbury Court, as it was then called," Richardson spent the greater part of his town life, and wrote his earliest work, Pamela. Probably a good part of all his works were composed there, as well as at Fulham, for the pen was never out of his hand. He removed from this house in 1755, after he had written all his works; and taking eight old tenements in the same quarter, pulled them down, and built a large and commodious range of warehouses and printing offices. "The dwelling house," says Mrs. Barbauld, "was neither so large nor so airy as the one he quitted, and therefore the reader will not be so ready, probably, as Mr. Richardson seems to have been, in accusing his wife of perverseness in not liking the new habitation as well as the old."‡ This was the second Mrs. Richardson. He calls her, in other places his "worthy-hearted wife;" but complains that she used to get her way by seeming to submit, and then returning to the point, when his heat of objection was over. She was a formal woman. His own manners were strict and formal with regard to his family, probably because he had formed his notions of life from old books, and also because he did not well know how to begin to do otherwise (for he was naturally bashful), and so the habit continued through life. His daughters addressed him in their letters by the title of "Honoured Sir," and are always designating themselves as "ever dutiful." Sedentary living, eternal writing, and perhaps that indulgence in the table, which, however moderate, affects a sedentary man twenty times as much as an active one, conspired to hurt his temper, (for we may see by his picture that he grew fat, and his philosophy was in no respect as profound as he thought it); but he was a most kind-hearted generous man; kept his pocket full of plums for children, like another Mr. Burchell; gave a great deal of money away in charity, very handsomely too; and was so fond of inviting friends to stay with him, that when they were ill, he and his family must needs have them to be nursed; and several actually died at his house at Fulham, as at a hospital for sick friends.

It is a fact not generally known (none of his biographers seem to have known it) that Richardson, who was the son of a joiner, received what education he had (which was very little, and did not go beyond English), at Christ-Hospital. § It may be wondered how he could come no better taught from a school, which had sent forth so many good scholars; but in his time, and indeed till very lately, that foundation was divided into several schools, none of which partook of the lessons of the others; and Richardson, agreeably to his father's intention of bringing him up to trade, was most probably confined to the writing-school, where all that was taught was writing and arithmetic. It was most likely here that he intimated his future career, first by writing a letter, at eleven years of age, to a censorious woman of fifty, who pretended a zeal for religion; and afterwards, at thirteen, by composing love-letters to their sweethearts for three young women in the neighbourhood, who made him their confidant. To these and others he also used to read books, their mothers being of the party; and they encouraged him to make remarks; which is exactly the sort of life he led with Mrs. Chapone, Miss Fielding, and others, when in the height of his celebrity. "One of the young women," he informs us, "highly gratified with her lover's fervour, and vows of everlasting love, has said, when I have asked her direction, 'I cannot tell you what to write, but (her heart on her lips) you cannot write too kindly;' all her fear was only that she should incur a slight for her kindness." This passage, with its pretty breathless parenthesis, is in the style of his books. If the writers among his female coterie in after-life owed their inspiration to him, he only returned to them what they had done for himself. Women seem to have been always about him, both in town and country; which made Mrs. Barbauld say, very agreeably, that he "lived in a kind of flower-garden of ladies." This has been grudged him, and thought effeminate; but we must make allowance for early circumstances, and recollect what the garden produced for us. Richardson did not pretend to be able to do without female society. Perhaps, however, they did not quiet his sensibility so much as they charmed it. We think, in his Correspondence, a tendency is observable to indulge in fancies, not always so paternal as they agree to call them; though doubtless all was said in honour, and the ladies never found reason to diminish their reverence. A great deal has been said of his vanity and the weakness of it. Vain he undoubtedly was, and vanity is no strength; but it is worth while bearing in mind, that a man is often saved from vanity, not because he is stronger than another, but because he is less amiable, and did not begin, as Richardson did, with being a favourite so early. Few men are surrounded, as he was, from his very childhood, with females, and few people think so well of their species or with so much reason. In all probability, too, he was handsome when young, which is another excuse for him. His vanity is more easily excused, than his genius accounted for, considering the way in which he lived. The tone of Lovelace's manners and language, which has created so much surprise in an author who was a city printer, and passed his life among a few friends between Fleet Street and a suburb, was caught, probably, not merely from Cibber, but from the famous profligate Duke of Wharton, with whom he became acquainted in the course of his business. But the unwearied vivacity with which he has supported it, is still wonderful. His pathos is more easily accounted for by his nerves, which for many years were in a constant state of excitement, particularly towards the close of his life; which terminated in 1761, at the age of seventy-two, with the death most common to sedentary men of letters, a stroke of apoplexy.* He was latterly unable to lift a glass of wine to his mouth without assistance.

At Fulham and Parson's Green (at which latter place he lived for the last five or six years), Richardson used to sit with his guests about him, in a parlour or summer-house, reading, or communicating his manuscripts as he wrote them. The ladies made their re-

* — Apoplexy cramped intemperance knocks Down to the ground at once, as butcher felleth ox;

says Thomson in his Castle of Indolence. It was the death the good-natured, indolent poet probably expected for himself, and would have had, if a cold and fever had not interfered. For there is an apoplexy of the head alone, as well as of the whole body; and men of letters, who either exercise little, or work overmuch, seem almost sure to die of it, or of palsy; which is a disease analogous. It is the last stroke, given in the kind resentment of nature, to the brains, which should have known better than bring themselves to such a pass. In the biography of Italian literati, "Mori d'apoplezia"—(he died of apoplexy)—is a common verdict.

* Aubrey says that his death took place in a cellar in Long Acre; and adds, "Mr. Edm. Wyld, &c., had made a collection for him, and given him money." But Aubrey's authority is not valid against Wood's. He is to be read like a proper gossip, whose accounts we may pretty safely reject or believe, as it suits other testimony.

marks; and alterations or vindications ensued. His characters, agreeably to what we feel when we read of them (for we know them all as intimately as if we occupied a room in their house), interested his acquaintances so far, that they sympathised with them as if they were real; and it is well known that one of his correspondents, Lady Bradshaigh, implored him to reform Lovelace in order "to save a soul." In Salisbury Court, Richardson of course had the same visitors about him, but the "flower-garden" is not talked of so much there, as at Fulham. In the evening the ladies read and worked by themselves, and Richardson retired to his study; a most pernicious habit for a man of his bad nerves. He should have written early in the morning, taken good exercise in the day, and amused himself in the evening. When he walked in town, it was in the park, where he describes himself (to a fair correspondent who wished to have an interview with him, and who recognized him from the description) as "short, rather plump, about five feet five inches, fair wig, one hand generally in his bosom, the other a cane in it, which he leans upon under the skirts of his coat, that it may imperceptibly serve him as a support, when attacked by sudden tremors or dizziness; of a light brown complexion, teeth not yet falling." "What follows," observes Mrs. Barbauld, "is very descriptive of the struggle in his character, between innate bashfulness and a turn for observation:—" "Looking directly forwards, as passengers would imagine, but observing all that stirs on either hand of him, without moving his short neck; a regular even pace, stealing away ground rather than seeming to rid it; a grey-eye, too often overclouded by mistiness from the head, by chance lively, very lively if he sees any he loves; if he approaches a lady, his eye is never fixed first on her face, but on her feet, and rears it up by degrees, seeming to set her down as so and so."*

Latterly Richardson attended little to business. He used even to give his orders to his workmen in writing; a practice which Sir John Hawkins is inclined to attribute to stateliness and bad temper, but for which Mrs. Barbauld finds a better reason in his bad nerves. His principal foreman also was deaf, as the knight himself acknowledges. Richardson encouraged his men to be industrious, sometimes by putting half-a-crown among the types as a prize to him who came first in the morning, at others by sending fruit for the same purpose from the country. Agreeably to his natural bashfulness, he was apt to be reserved with strangers. Sir John Hawkins tells us, that he once happened to get into the Fulham stage, when Richardson was in it (most likely he got in on purpose); and he endeavoured to bring the novelist into conversation, but could not succeed, and was vexed at it. But Sir John was one of that numerous class of persons, who, for reasons better known to others than to themselves,

Deemen gladly to the badder end, as the old poet says; and Richardson probably knew this pragmatical person, and did not want his acquaintance.

Johnson was among the visitors of Richardson in Salisbury Court. He confessed to Boswell, that although he had never much sought after anybody, Richardson was an exception. He had so much respect for him, that he took part with him in a preposterous undervaluing of Fielding, whom he described in the comparison as a mere writer of manners, and sometimes as hardly any writer at all. And yet he told Boswell that he had read his Amelia through "without stopping;" and according to Mrs. Piozzi she was his favourite heroine. In the comparison of Richardson with Fielding, he was in the habit of opposing the nature of one to the manners of the other; but Fielding's manners are only superadded to his nature, not opposed to it, which makes all the difference. As to Richardson, he was so far gone upon this point, in a mixture of pique and want of sympathy, that he said, if he had not known who Fielding was, "he should have taken him for an otter." Fielding, it is true, must have vexed him greatly by detecting the pettiness in the character of Pamela. Richardson, as a romancer, did not like to have the truth forced upon him, and thus was inclined to see nothing but vulgarity in the novelist. This must have been unpleasant to the Miss Fieldings, the sisters, who were among the most intimate of Richardson's friends. Another of our author's visitors was Hogarth. It must not be forgotten that Richardson was kind to Johnson in money matters; and to use Mrs. Barbauld's phrase, had once "the honour" to be bail for him.

We conclude our notice, which, on the subject of so original a man, has naturally beguiled us into some length, with an interesting account of his manners and way of life, communicated by one of his female friends to Mrs. Barbauld. "My first recollection of him," says she, "was in his house in the centre of Salisbury Square, or Salisbury Court, as it was then called; and of being admitted as a playful child into his study, where I have often seen Dr. Young and others; and where I was generally caressed, and rewarded with biscuits or bonbons of some kind or other, and sometimes with books, for which he, and some more of my friends, kindly encouraged a taste, even at that early age, which has adhered to me all my long life, and continues to be the solace of many a painful hour. I recollect that he used to drop in at my father's, for we lived nearly opposite, late in the evening to supper; when, as he would say, he had worked as long as his eyes and nerves would let him, and was come to relax with a little friendly and domestic chat. I even then used to creep to his knee, and hang upon his words, for my whole family doated on him; and once, I recollect, that at one of these evening visits, probably about the year 1753, I was standing by his knee, when my mother's maid came to summon me to bed; upon which, being unwilling to part from him, and manifesting some reluctance, he begged I might be permitted to stay a little longer; and, on my mother's objecting that the servant would be wanted to wait at supper, (for, in those days of friendly intercourse and real hospitality, a decent maid-servant was the only attendant at his own and many creditable tables, where, nevertheless, much company was received) Mr. Richardson said, 'I am sure Miss P. is now so much a woman, that she does not want any one to attend her to bed, but will conduct herself with so much propriety, and put out her own candle so carefully, that she may henceforward be indulged with remaining with us till supper is served.' This hint, and the confidence it implied, had such a good effect upon me, that I believe I never required the attendance of a servant afterwards while my mother lived; and by such sort of ingenious and gentle devices did he use to encourage and draw in young people to do what was right. I also well remember the happy days I passed at his house at North End; sometimes with my mother, but often for weeks, without her, domesticated as one of his own children. He used to pass the greatest part of the week in town; but when he came down, he used to like to have his family flock around him, when we all first asked and received his blessing, together with some small boon from his paternal kindness and attention; for he seldom met us empty-handed, and was by nature most generous and liberal.

"The piety, order, decorum, and strict regularity that prevailed in his family were of infinite use to train the mind to good habits, and to depend upon its own resources. It has been one of the means which, under the blessing of God, has enabled me to dispense with the enjoyment of what the world calls pleasures, such as are found in crowds, and actually to relish and prefer the calm delights of retirement and books. As soon as Mrs. Richardson arose, the beautiful psalms in Smith's Devotions were read responsively in the nursery, by herself and daughters, standing in a circle: only the two eldest were allowed to breakfast with her and whatever company happened to be in the house, for they were seldom without. After breakfast, we younger ones read to her in turns the Psalms and lessons for the day. We were then permitted to pursue our childish sports, or to walk in the garden, which I was allowed to do at pleasure; for, when my father hesitated upon granting that privilege, for fear I should help myself to the fruit, Mrs. Richardson said, 'No, I have so much confidence in her, that, if she is put upon honour, I am certain that she will not touch so much as a gooseberry.' A confidence, I dare safely aver, that I never forfeited, and which has given me the power of walking in any garden ever since without the smallest desire to touch any fruit, and taught me a lesson upon the restraint of appetite, which has been useful to me all my life. We all dined at one table, and generally drank tea and spent the evening in Mrs. Richardson's parlour, where the practice was for one of the young ladies to read, while the rest sat with mute attention round a large table, and employed themselves in some kind of needle-work. Mr. Richardson generally retired to his study, unless there was particular company.

"These are trifling and childish anecdotes, and savour perhaps, you may think, too much of egotism. They certainly can be of no further use to you, than as they mark the extreme benevolence, condescension, and kindness of this exalted genius towards young people; for, in general society, I know he has been accused as being of few words, and of a particularly reserved turn. He was, however, all his lifetime, the patron and protector of the female sex. Miss M. (afterwards Lady G.) passed many years in his family. She was the bosom friend and contemporary of my mother; and was so much considered as enfant de famille in Mr. Richardson's house, that her portrait is introduced into a family piece.

"He had many protégés:—a Miss Rosine, from Portugal, was consigned to his care; but of her, being then at school, I never saw much. Most of the ladies that resided much at his house acquired a certain degree of fastidiousness and delicate refinement, which, though amiable in itself, rather disqualified them from appearing in general society to the advantage that might have been expected, and rendered an intercourse with the world uneasy to themselves, giving a peculiar air of shyness and reserve to their whole address; of which habits his own daughters partook, in a degree that has been thought by some a little to obscure those really valuable qualifications and talents they undoubtedly possessed. Yet this was supposed to be owing more to Mrs. Richardson than to him; who, though a truly good woman, had high and Harlowean notions of parental authority, and kept the ladies in such order, and at such a distance, that he often lamented, as I have been told by my mother, that they were not more open and conversable with him.

"Besides those I have already named, I well remember a Mrs. Donellan, a venerable old lady, with sharp, piercing eyes; Miss Mulso, &c. &c.; Secker, Archbishop of Canterbury; Sir Thomas Robinson (Lord Grantham), &c. &c., who were frequent visitors at his house in town and country. The ladies I have named were often staying at North End, at the period of his highest glory and reputation; and in their company and conversation his genius was matured. His benevolence was unbounded, as his manner of diffusing it was delicate and refined.*"

Richardson was buried in the nave of St. Bride's Church, and a stone placed over his remains merely recording his name, the year of his death, and his age. In this church also were interred Wynken de Worde, the famous printer; the bowels of Sackville, the poet, whom we shall presently have occasion to mention again; and Sir Richard Baker, the author of the well known book of English Chronicles. De Worde resided in Fleet Street.

THE STREETS OF THE METROPOLIS.

THEIR MEMORIES AND GREAT MEN.

White-friars, or Alsatia.—Admirable living description of its old state from Sir Walter Scott.—The Temple.—Its monuments, garden, &c.—Eminent names connected with it.—Goldsmith dies there.—Boswell's first visit there to Johnson.—Johnson and Madame de Boufflers.—Bernard Lintot.—Ben Johnson's Devil Tavern.—Other Coffee-houses and shops.—Goldsmith and Temple-bar.—Shire Lane, Bickerstaff, and the deputation from the country.—The Kit Kat Club.—Mrs. Salmon.—Isaac Walton.—Cowley.—Chancery Lane, Lord Strafford and Ben Jonson.—Serjeant's Inn.—Clifford's Inn.—The Rolls.—Sir Joseph Jekyll.—Church of St. Dunstan in the West.—Dryden's house in Rotten Lane.—Johnson, the Genius Loci of Fleet Street.—His way of life.—His residence in Gough Square, Johnson's Court, and Bolt Court.—Various anecdotes of him connected with Fleet Street and with his favourite tavern, the Mitre.

Between Water lane and the Temple, and leading out of Fleet Street by a street formerly called White Friars, which has been rebuilt and christened Bouverie Street, is one of those precincts which long retained the immunities derived from their being conventual sanctuaries, and which naturally enough became as profane as they had been religious. The one before us originated in a monastery of White Friars, an order of Carmelites, which formerly stood in Water lane, and it acquired an infamous celebrity under the slang title of Alsatia. The claims, however, which the inhabitants set up to protect debtors from arrest seems to have originated in a charter granted to them by James I. in 1608. For some time after the Reformation and the demolition of the old monastery, Whitefriars was not only a sufficiently orderly district, but one of the most fashionable parts of the city. Among others of the gentry, for instance, who had houses here at this period, was Sir John Cheke, King Edward VI.'s tutor, and afterwards Secretary of State. The reader of our great modern novelist has been made almost as well acquainted with the place in its subsequent state of degradation and lawlessness, as if he had walked through it, when its bullies were in full blow.¹ The rags of their Dulcineas hang out to dry, as if you saw them in a Dutch picture; and the passages are redolent of beer and tobacco. The sanctuary of Whitefriars is now extremely shrunk in its dimensions; and the inhabitants retain but a shadow of their privileges. The nuisance, however, existed as late as the time of William the Third, who put an end to it; and the neighbourhood is still of more than doubtful virtue. One alley, dignified by the title of Lombard Street, is of an infamy of such long standing, that it is said to have begun its evil courses long before the privilege of sanctuary existed, and to have maintained them up to the present moment. The Carmelites complained of it, and the neighbours complain still. In the Dramatis Personæ to Shadwell's play called the Squire of Alsatia, we have a set of characters so described as to bring us, one would think, sufficiently acquainted with the leading gentry of the neighbourhood; such as Cheatley. A rascal, who by reason of debts dares not stir out of White-fryers, but there inveigles young heirs in tail, and helps them to goods and money upon great disadvantages; is bound for them, and shares for them till he undoes them. A lewd, impudent, debauch'd fellow, very expert in the cant about the town.

→ Shamwell. Cousin to the Belfonds; an heir, who being ruined by Cheatley, is made a decoy-duck for others: not daring to stir out of Alsatia, where he lives: is bound with Cheatley for heirs, and lives upon 'em a dissolute, debauched life.

Capt. Hackman. A block-head bully of Alsatia; a cowardly, impudent, blustering fellow, formerly a sergeant in Flanders, run from his colours, retreated into White-fryers for a very small debt, where by the Alsatians he is dubbed a Captain, marries one that lets lodgings, sells cherry-brandy, &c.

Scrapeall. A hypocritical, repeating, praying, psalm-singing, precise fellow, pretending to great piety, a godly knave, who joins with Cheatley, and supplies young heirs with goods and money.

But Sir Walter, besides painting the place itself as if he had lived in it, puts these people in action, with a spirit beyond anything that Shadwell could have done, even though the dramatist had a bit of the Alsatian in himself; at least, as far as drinking could go, and a flood of gross conversation. In commencing the perusal of the following extracts the reader may fancy himself really turning out of Fleet Street in the time of King James the First, into this domain of infamy. We need scarcely remind him, that the two heroes whom he is following into the "sanctuary," are a young lord, who has been forced to take refuge there for striking a man within the verge of the court, and his acquaintance, a young Templar, who has undertaken to be his guide into these infernal regions. They descend, accordingly, but with very different sensations. "The Templar," says our author, "was bustling, officious, and good-natured; but used to live a scrambling rakish course of life himself, he had not the least idea of Lord Glenvarloch's mental sufferings, and thought of his temporary concealment as if it were the trick of a wanton boy, who plays at hide-and-seek with his tutor. With the appearance of the place, too, he was familiar; but on his companion it produced a deep sensation.

"The ancient sanctuary of White-Friars lay considerably lower than the elevated terraces and gardens of the Temple, and was therefore generally involved in the damps and fogs arising from the Thames. The brick buildings by which it was occupied, crowded closely on each other; for in a place so rarely privileged, every foot of ground was valuable, but, erected, in many cases, by persons whose funds were inadequate to their speculations, the houses were generally insufficient, and exhibited the lamentable signs of having become ruinous, while they were yet new.

"The wailing of children, the scolding of their mothers, the miserable exhibitions of ragged linens hung from the windows to dry, spoke the wants and distresses of the wretched inhabitants; while the sounds of complaint were mocked and overwhelmed in the riotous shouts, oaths, profane songs, and boisterous laughter, that issued from the ale-houses and taverns, which, as the signs indicated, were equal in number to all the other houses. And, that the full character of the place might be evident, several faded, tinselled, and painted females looked boldly at the strangers from their open lattices, or more modestly seemed busied with the cracked flower pots, filled with mignonette and rosemary, which were disposed in front of the windows, to the great risk of the passengers."

"Semi-reducta Venus," said the Templar, pointing to one of these nymphs, who seemed afraid of observation, and partly concealed herself behind the casement, as she chirped to a miserable blackbird, the tenant of a wicker prison, which hung outside on the black brick wall. "I know the face of yonder waist-coateer," continued the guide, "and I could wager a rose-noble, from the posture she stands in, that she has clean head-gear, and a soiled night-rail. But here come two of the male inhabitants, smoking like moving volcanoes! These are roaring blades, whom Nicotia and Trinidad serve, I dare swear, in lieu of beef and pudding; for, be it known to you, my Lord, that the king's counter-blast against the Indian weed, will no more pass current in Alsatia, than will his writ of capias."

"As he spoke, the two smokers approached; shaggy, uncombed ruffians, whose enormous mustachios were turned back over their ears, and mingled with the wild elf locks of their hair, much of which was seen under the old beavers, which they wore aside upon their heads, while some straggling portion escaped through the rents of the hats aforesaid. Their tarnished plush jerkins, large slops, or trunk breeches, their broad greasy shoulder-belts, and discoloured scarfs, and above all, the ostentatious manner in which the one wore a broad sword, and the other an extravagantly long rapier and poinard, marked the true Alsatian bully, then, and for a hundred years afterwards, a well-known character.

"Tour out," said the one ruffian to the other, "tout the bien mort twirling at the gentry cove!"

"I smell a spy," replied the other, looking at Nigel; "chalk him across the peepers with your cheery."†

"Bing avast, bing avast!" replied his companion, "yon other is rattling Reginald Lowestoffe of the Temple; I know him, he is a good boy, and free of the province."

"So saying, and enveloping themselves in another thick cloud of smoke, they went on without further greeting.

"Crasso in aere!"—said the Templar; "you hear what a character the impudent knaves give me—but so it serves your lordship's turn, I care not. And now, let me ask your lordship what name you will assume, for we are near the ducal palace of Duke Hildebrod."

"I will be called Grahame," said Nigel; "it was my mother's name."

"Grime," repeated the Templar, "will suit Alsatia well enough; both a grim and grimy place of refuge."

"I said Grahame, Sir, not Grime," said Nigel, something shortly, and laying an emphasis on the vowel; for few Scotsmen understand rallery on the subject of their names."

"I beg pardon, my lord," answered the undisconcerted punster, "but Graam will suit the circumstance too—it signifies tribulation in the High Dutch, and your lordship may be considered as a man under trouble."

Nigel laughed at the pertinacity of the Templar, who proceeding to point out a sign representing, or believed to represent, a dog attacking a bull, and running at his head in the true scientific style of onset,—"There," said he, "doth faithful Duke Hildebrod deal forth laws, as well as ale and strong waters, to his faithful Alsatians. Being a determined champion of Paris Garden, he has chosen a sign corresponding to his habits, and he deals in giving drink to the thirsty, that he himself may drink without paying, and receive pay for what is drunken by others. Let us enter the ever open gate of this second Axylium."

"As he spoke, they entered the dilapidated tavern, which was, nevertheless, more ample in dimensions, and less ruinous than many houses in the same evil neighbourhood. Two or three haggard, ragged drawers ran to and fro, whose looks, like those of owls, seemed only adapted for midnight, when other creatures sleep, and who, by day, seemed bleered, stupid, and only half awake. Guided by one of these blinking Ganymedes, they entered a room, where the feeble rays of the sun were almost wholly eclipsed by volumes of tobacco-smoke rolled from the tubes of the company, while out of the cloudy sanctuary arose the old chaunt of

"Old Sir Simon the king,
And old Sir Simon the king,
With his malmsey nose,
And his ale-dropped hose,
And sing hey ding-a-ding ding."

"Duke Hildebrod, who himself condescended to chaunt this ditty to his loving subjects, was a monstrously fat old man, with only one eye; and a nose which bore evidence to the frequency, strength, and depth of his potations. He wore a murrey-coloured plush jerkin, stained with the overflowings of the tankard, and much the worse for wear, and unbuttoned at bottom for the ease of his enormous paunch. Behind him lay a favourite bull-dog, whose round head, and single black glancing eye, as well the creature's great corpulence, gave it a burlesque resemblance to its master.

"The well-beloved counsellors, who surrounded the ducal throne, incensed it with tobacco, pledged its occupier in thick, clammy ale, and echoed back his choral songs, were satraps worthy of such a Soldan. The buff jerkin, broad belt, and long sword of one, showed him to be a low country soldier, whose look of scowling importance, and drunken impudence, were designed to sustain his title to call himself a roving blade. It seemed to Nigel that he had seen this fellow somewhere or other. A hedge-parson, or buckle-beggar, as that order of priesthood has been irreverently termed, sate on the Duke's left, and was easily distinguished by his torn band, flapped hat, and the remnants of a rusty cassock. Beside the parson sat a most wretched and meagre-looking old man, with a thread-bare hood of coarse kersey upon his head, and buttoned about his neck, while his pinched features, like those of old Daniel, were illuminated by —an eye,

Through the last look of dotage both cunning and sly.

On his left was placed a broken attorney, who, for some mal-practices, had been struck from the roll of practitioners, and who had nothing left of his profession but its roguery. One or two persons of less figure, amongst whom there was one face, which like that of the soldier, seemed not unknown to Nigel, though he could not recollect where he had seen it, completed the council board of Jacob Duke of Hildebrod.

"The strangers had full time to observe all this; for his grace the Duke, whether irresistibly carried on by the full tide of harmony, or whether to impress the strangers with a proper idea of his consequence, chose to sing his ditty to an end before addressing them, though, during the whole time, he closely scrutinized them with his single optic.

"When Duke Hildebrod had ended his song, he informed his peers that a worthy officer of the Temple attended them, and commanded the captain and parson to abandon their easy chairs in behalf of the two strangers, whom he placed on his right and left hand. The worthy representatives of the army and the church of Alsatia, went to place themselves on a crazy form at the bottom of the table, which, ill calculated to sustain men of such weight, gave way under them, and the man of the sword and the man of the gown were rolled over each other on the floor, amidst the exulting shouts of the company. They arose in wrath, contending which should vent his displeasure in the loudest and deepest oaths, a strife in which the parson's superior acquaintance with theology enabled him greatly to excel the captain, and were at length with difficulty tranquillized by the arrival of the alarmed waiters with more stable chairs, and by a long draught of the cooling tankard. When this commotion was appeased, and the strangers courteously accommodated with flagons, after the fashion of the others present, the Duke drank prosperity to the Temple in the most gracious manner, together with a cup of welcome to Master Reginald Lowestoffe; and this courtesy having been thankfully accepted, the party honoured prayed permission to call for a gallon of Rhenish, over which he proposed to open his business.

"The mention of a liquor so superior to their usual potations, had an instant and most favourable effect upon the little senate; and its immediate appearance might be said to secure a favourable reception of

* "Look sharp. See how the girl is coquetting with the strange gallants."

† "Slash him over the eyes with your dagger."

Master Lowestoffe's proposition, which, after a round or two had circulated, he explained to be the admission of his friend, Master Nigel Grahame, to the benefit of the sanctuary and other immunities of Alsatia, in the character of a grand compounder.*

Infamous as this precinct was, there were some good houses in it, and some respectable inhabitants. The first Lord Backville lived there; another inhabitant was Ogilby, who was a decent man, though a bad poet, and taught dancing; and Shirley another. It appears also to have been a resort of fencing-masters, which probably helped to bring worse company. They themselves indeed were in no good repute. One of them, a man of the name of Turner, living in Whitefriars, gave rise to a singular instance of revenge recorded in the State Trials. Lord Sanquaire, a Scotch nobleman, in the time of James I., playing with Turner at fells, and making too great a show of his wish to put down a master of the art, (probably with the insolence common to the nobility of that period), was pressed upon so hard by the man, that he received a thrust which put out one of his eyes. "This mischief," says Wilson, "was much regretted by Turner; and the baron, being conscious to himself that he meant his adversary no good, took the accident with as much patience as men that lose one eye by their own default, use to do for the preservation of the other." "Some time after," continues this writer, "being in the court of the late great Henry of France, and the king (court-teous to strangers), entertaining discourse with him, asked him, 'How he lost his eye?' He (clothing his answer in a better shroud than a plain fencer's) told him, 'It was done with a sword.' The king replies, 'Both the man live!' and that question gave an end to the discourse, but was the beginner of a strange confusion in his working fancy, which neither time nor distance could compose, carrying it in his breast some years after, till he came into England, where he hired two of his countrymen, Gray and Carliel, men of low and mercenary spirits, to murder him; which they did with a case of pistols in his house in Whitefriars, many years after."† For many years read five,—enough, however, to make such a piece of revenge extraordinary. Gray and Carliel were among his followers. Gray, however, did not assist in the murder. He repented; and Carliel got another accomplice named Irweng. "These two, about seven o'clock in the evening, (to proceed in the words of Coke's report,) came to a house in the Friars, which Turner used to frequent, as he came to his school, which was near that place; and finding Turner there, they saluted one another; and Turner with one of his friends sat at the door asking them to drink; but Carliel and Irweng turning about to cock the pistol, came back immediately, and Carliel drawing it from under his coat, discharged it upon Turner, and gave him a mortal wound near the left pap; so that Turner, after having said these words, 'Lord, have mercy upon me! I am killed,' immediately fell down. Whereupon Carliel and Irweng fled, Carliel to the town, and Irweng towards the river; but mistaking his way and entering into a court where they sold wood, which was no thoroughfare, he was taken. Carliel likewise fled, and so did also the baron of Sanchar. The ordinary officers of justice did their utmost, but could not take them; for, in fact, as appeared afterwards, Carliel fled into Scotland, and Gray towards the sea, thinking to go to Sweden, and Sanchar hid himself in England."‡

James, who had shewn such favour to the Scotch as to make the English jealous, and who also hated an ill-natured action, when it was not to do good to any of his favourites, thought himself bound to issue a promise of reward for the arrest of Sanquaire and the others. It was successful; and all three were hung. Carliel and Irweng in Fleet Street, opposite the great gate of Whitefriars (the entrance of the present Bouverie Street), and Sanquaire in Palace Yard, before Westminster Hall. He made a singular defence, very good and penitent, and yet remarkably illustrative of the cheap rate at which plebeian blood was held in those times; and no doubt his death was a great surprise to him. The people, not yet enlightened on these points, took his demeanour in such good part, that they expressed great pity for him, till they perceived that he died a Catholic!

This and other pretended sanctuaries were at length put down by an act of parliament passed about the beginning of the last century. It is curious that the once lawless domain of Alsatia should have had the law itself for its neighbour; but Sir Walter has shewn us, that they had more sympathies than might be expected. It was a local realization of the old proverb of extremes meeting. We now step out of this old chaos into its quieter vicinity, which, however, was not always as quiet as it is now. The Temple as its name imports, was once the seat of the Knights Templars, an order at once priestly and military, originating in the crusades, and whose business it was to defend the Temple at Jerusalem. How they degenerated, and what sort of vows they were in the habit of making, instead of those of chastity and humility, the modern reader need not be told, after the masterly pictures of them in the writer from whom we have just taken another set of ruffians. The Templars were dissolved in the reign of Edward II., and their house occupied by successive nobles, till it came into the possession of the law, in whose hands it was confirmed "for ever" by James I. We need not enter into the origin of its division into two parts, the Inner and Middle Temple. Suffice to say, that the word Middle, which implies a third Temple, refers to an outer one, or third portion of the old buildings, which does not appear to have been ever occupied by lawyers, but came into possession of the celebrated Essex family, whose name is retained in the street where it was situated, on the other side of Temple Bar. There is nothing remaining of the ancient buildings, but the church built in 1185, which is a curiosity justly admired, particularly for the monuments of some knights, whose crossed legs indicate that they had either been to the Holy Land as crusaders, or vowed to proceed thither. One of them is ascertained to have been Geoffrey de Magnaville, Earl of Essex, who was killed at Benwell in Cambridgeshire, in 1148. Among the other effigies are supposed to be those of the Marshals, first, second, and third Earls of Pembroke, who all died in the early part of the thirteenth century. But even these have not been identified upon any satisfactory grounds, and with regard to some of the rest, not so much as a probable conjecture has been offered.

As it is an opinion still prevailing, that these cross-legged knights are Knights Templars, we have copied below the most complete information respecting them which we have hitherto met with. And the passage is otherwise curious.*

The two Temples, or law colleges, occupy a large space of ground between White Friars and Essex Street; Fleet Street bounding them on the north, and the river on the south. They compass an irregular mass of good substantial houses, in lanes and open places, the houses being divided into chambers, or floors for separate occupants, some of which are let to persons not in the profession. The garden about thirty years ago was enlarged, and a muddy track under it, on the side of the Thames, converted into a pleasant walk. This garden is still not very large, but it deserves its name both for trees and flowers. There is a descent into it, after the Italian fashion, from a court with a fountain in it, surrounded with trees, through which the view of the old walls and buttresses of the Middle Temple Hall is much admired. But a poet's hand has touched the garden, and made it bloom with roses above the real. It is the scene, in Shakespeare, of the origin of the factions of York and Lancaster.

PLANTAGENET.

Since you are tongue-ty'd, and so loth to speak,
In dumb significants proclaim your thoughts:
Let him that is a true-born gentleman,
And stands upon the honour of his birth,
If he suppose that I have pleaded truth,
From off this briar pluck a white rose with me.

SOMERSET.

Let him that is no coward nor no flatterer,
But dare maintain the party of the truth,
Pluck a red rose from off this thorn with me.

WARWICK.

I love no colours; and, without all colours

* "It is an opinion which universally prevails with regard to those cross-legged monuments," says Dr. Nash, "that they were all erected to the memory of Knights Templars. Now to me it is very evident, that not one of them belonged to that order; but, as Mr. Habington, in describing this at Alve church, hath justly expressed it, to Knights of the Holy Voyage. For the order of Knights Templars followed the rule of the Canons regular of St. Austin, and, as such, were under a vow of celibacy. Now there is scarcely one of these monuments, which is certainly known for whom it is erected; but it is as certain, that the person it represented was a married man. The Knights Templars always wore a white habit, with a red cross on the left shoulder. I believe, not a single instance can be produced, of either the mantle or cross being carved on any of these monuments, which surely would not have been omitted, as by it they were distinguished from all other orders, had these been really designed to represent Knights Templars. Lastly, this order was not confined to England only, but dispersed itself all over Europe: yet it will be very difficult to find one cross-legged monument any where out of England: whereas they would have abounded in France, Italy; and elsewhere, had it been a fashion peculiar to that famous order. But though, for these reasons, I cannot allow the cross-legged monuments to have been for Knights Templars, yet they had some relation to them, being the memorials of those zealous devotees, who had either been in Palestine, personally engaged in what was called the Holy War, or had laid themselves under a vow to go thither, though perhaps they were prevented from it by death. Some few, indeed, might possibly be erected to the memory of persons who had made pilgrimages there merely out of private devotion. Among the latter, probably, was that of the lady of the family of Mepham, of Mepham, in Yorkshire, to whose memory a cross-legged monument was placed in a chapel adjoining to the once collegiate church of Howden, in Yorkshire, and is at this day remaining, together with that of her husband, on the same tomb. As this religious madness lasted no longer than the reign of Henry III. (the tenth and last crusade being published in the year 1268,) and the whole order of Knights Templars was dissolved by Edward I., military expeditions to the Holy Land, as well as devout pilgrimages there, had their period by the year 1213; consequently none of those cross-legged monuments are of a later date than the reign of Edward I., or beginning of Edward III. nor of an earlier than that of King Stephen, when these expeditions first took place in this kingdom."—History and Antiquities of Wiltshire, &c. vol. i. p. 31.

Of base insinuating flattery,
I pluck this white rose with Plantagenet.

SUFFOLK.

I pluck this red rose with young Somerset;
And say withal I think he held the right.

There were formerly rooks in the Temple trees, a colony brought by Sir Edward Northey, a well-known lawyer in Queen Anne's time, from his grounds at Epsom. It was a pleasant thought, supposing that the colonists had no objection. The rook is a grave legal bird, both in his coat and habits; living in communities, yet to himself; and strongly addicted to discussions of meum and tuum. The neighbourhood, however, appears to have been too much for him; for upon inquiring on the spot, we are told that there have been no rooks for many years.

The oldest mention of the Temple as a place for lawyers, has been commonly said to be found in a passage of Chaucer, who is reported to have been of the Temple himself. It is in his character of the Manciple, or Steward, whom he pleasantly pits against his learned employers, as outwitting even themselves:—

A gentle manciple was there of a temple,
Of which achatours (purchasers) mighten take enexemple,
For to ben wise in buying of vitaille.
For whether that be paid, or took by taille,
Algate he waited so in his achate,
That he was ay before in good estate.
Now is not that of God a full fair grace,
That such a lewed (ignorant) mannes wit shall passe
The wisdom of a heap of learned men?‡

Spenser, in his epic way, not disdaining to bring the homeliest images into his verse, for the sake of the truth in them, speaks of

— those bricky towers

The which on Thames' broad aged back do ride,
Where now the studious lawyers have their bowens.
There whilom wont the Templar Knights to bide,
Till they decayed through pride.†

The "studious lawyers," in their towers by the water side, present a quiet picture. Yet in those times, it seems, they were apt to break into overt actions of vivacity, a little excessive, and such as the habit of restraint inclines people to before they have arrived at years of discretion. In Henry the Eighth's time, the gentlemen of the Temple were addicted to "above and slip-groats,"‡ which became forbidden them under a penalty; and in the age in which Spenser wrote, so many encounters had taken place, of a dangerous description, that they were prohibited from carrying any other weapon into the hall (the dining room), "than a dagger or knife,"—"as if," says Mr. Malcolm, "those were not more than sufficient to accomplish unpremeditated deaths."§ We are to suppose, however, that gentlemen would not kill each other, except with swords. The dagger, or carving knife, which it was customary to carry about the person in those days, was for the mutton.||

A better mode of recreating and giving vent to their animal spirits, was the custom prevalent among the lawyers at that period of presenting masques and pageants. They were great players, with a scholarly taste for classical subjects; and the gravest of them did not disdain to cater in this way for the amusement of their fellows, sometimes for that of crowned heads. The name of Bacon is to be found among the "getters up" of a shew at Gray's Inn, for the entertainment of the sovereign; and that of Hyde, on a similar occasion, in the reign of King Charles the First.

A masque has come down to us written by William Browne, a disciple of Spenser, expressly for the society of which he was a member, and entitled the Inner Temple Masque. It is upon the story of Circe and Ulysses, and is worthy of the school of poetry out of which he came. Beaumont wrote another, called the Masque of the Inner Temple and Gray's Inn. A strong union has always existed between the law and the belles-lettres, highly creditable to the former, or rather

* Prologue to the Canterbury Tales. We quote no edition, because, where we could, we have modernised the spelling; which is a justice to this fine old author in a quotation, that nobody may pass it over. With regard to Chaucer's being of the Temple, and to his beating the Franciscans in Fleet Street, all that is known depends upon the testimony of a Mr. Buckley, who, according to Speght, had seen a Temple record to that effect.

|| Sir John Davies, who was afterwards Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and wrote a poem on the Art of Dancing (so lively was the gravity of those days!) bestowed a man at dinner in the Temple Hall, for which he was expelled. The man probably deserved it, for Davies had a fine nature; and he went back again by favour of the excellent Lord Ellesmere.

naturally to be expected from the mode in which lawyers begin their education, and the diversity of knowledge which no men are more in the way of acquiring afterwards. Blackstone need not have written his farewell to the Muses. If he had been destined to be a poet, he could not have taken his leave; and as an accomplished lawyer, he was always within the pale of the littera humaniores. The greatest practical lawyers, such as Coke and Plowden, may not have been the most literary, but those who have understood the law in the greatest and best spirit have; and the former, great as they may be, are yet but as servants and secretaries to the rest. They know where to find, but the others know best how to apply. Bacon, Clarendon, Selden, Somers, Cowper, Mansfield, were all men of letters. So is the illustrious person who now presides in the court of Chancery. Pope says, that Mansfield would have been another Ovid. This may be doubted; but nobody should doubt that the better he understood a poet, the fitter he was for universality of judgment. The greatest lawyer is the greatest legislator.

The "pert Templar," of whom we hear so much, between the reigns of the Stuarts and the late king, came up with the growth of literature and the coffee-houses. Every body then began to write or to criticise; and young men, brought up in the mootings of points, and in the confidence of public speaking, naturally pressed among the foremost. Besides, a variety of wits had issued from the Temple in the reign of Charles and his brother, and their successors in lodging took themselves for their heirs in genius. The coffee-houses by this time had become cheap places to talk in. They were the regular morning lounge and evening resource; and every lad who had dipped his finger and thumb into Dryden's snuff-box, thought himself qualified to dictate for life. In Pope's time these pretensions came to be angrily rejected, partly perhaps, because none of the reigning wits, with the exception of Congreve, had had a Temple education.

Three college sophs, and three pert Templars came,
The same their talents, and their tastes the same;
Each prompt to query, answer, and debate,
And smit with love of poetry and prate.*

We could quote many other passages to the same purpose, but we shall come to one presently which will suffice for all, and exhibit the young Templar of those days in all the glory of his impertinence. At present the Templars make no more pretensions than other well educated men. Many of them are still connected with the literature of the day, but in the best manner and with the soundest views; and if there is no pretension to wit, there is the thing itself. It would be endless to name all the celebrated lawyers who have had to do with the Temple. Besides, we shall have to notice the most eminent of them in other places, where they passed a greater portion of their lives. We shall therefore confine ourselves to the mention of such as have lived in it without being lawyers, or thrown a grace over it in connexion with wit and literature.

Chaucer, as we have just observed, is thought, upon slight evidence, to have been of the Temple. We know not who the Mr. Buckley was, that says he saw his name in the record; and the name, if there, might have been that of some other Chaucer. The name is said to be not unfrequent in records under the Norman dynasty. It is remarked by Thynne, in his "Animadversions" on Speght's edition of the poet's works (published a few years ago from the manuscript, by Mr. Todd, in his "Illustrations of Chaucer and Gower"), that "it is most certain to be gathered by circumstances of records that the lawyers were not in the Temple until towards the latter part of the reign of King Edward III., at which time Chaucer was a grave man, holden in great credit, and employed in embassy." "So that methinketh," adds the writer, "he should not be of that house; and yet, if he then were, I should judge it strange that he should violate the rules of peace and gravity in those years."

The first English tragedy of any merit, Gorbuduc, was written in the Temple by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville, afterwards the celebrated statesman, and founder of the title of Dorset. He was author of a noble performance, the Induction for the Mirror of Magistrates, in which there is a foretaste of the picturesque gusto of Spenser. Raleigh was of the Temple; Selden, who died in White Friars; Lord Clarendon; Beaumont; two other of our old dramatists, Ford and Marston, (the latter of whom was lecturer of the Middle Temple); Wycherly, whom it is said the Duchess of Cleveland used to visit, in the habit of a milliner; Congreve, Rowe, Fielding, Burke, and Cowper. Goldsmith was not of the Temple, but he had chambers in it, died there, and was buried in the Temple church. He resided, first on the Library Staircase, afterwards in King's Bench Walk, and finally at No. 2, Brick Court, where he had a first floor elegantly furnished. It was in one of the former lodgings that, being visited by Dr. Johnson, and expressing something like a shamefaced hope that he should soon be in lodgings better furnished, Johnson, says Boswell, "at the same time checked him, and paid him a handsome compliment, implying that a man of talents should be above attention to such distinctions."—"Nay, sir, never mind that: Nil te quæsiveris extra." (It is only yourself that need be looked for). He died in Brick Court. It is said that when he was on his death-bed, the landing-place was filled with enquirers, not of the most mentionable description, who lamented him heartily, for he was lavish of his money as he went along Fleet Street. We are told by one of the writers of the life prefixed to his works, (probably Bishop Percy, who contributed the greater part of it,) that "he was generous in the extreme, and so strongly affected by compassion, that he has been known at midnight to abandon his rest in order to procure relief and an asylum for a poor dying object who was left destitute in the streets." This, surely, ought to be praise to no man, however benevolent; but it is, in the present state of society. However, the offices of the good Samaritan are now reckoned among the things that may be practised as well as preached, without diminution of a man's reputation for common sense; and this is a great step. We will here mention, that Goldsmith had another residence in Fleet Street. He wrote his Vicar of Wakefield in Wine-Office Court. Of the curious circumstances under which this delightful novel was sold, various inaccurate accounts have been given. The following is Boswell's account, taken from Dr. Johnson's own mouth.

"I received one morning," said Johnson, "a message from poor Goldsmith, that he was in great distress, and as it was not in his power to come to me, begging that I would come to him as soon as possible. I sent him a guinea, and promised to come to him directly. I accordingly went to him as soon as I was dressed, and found that his landlady had arrested him for his rent, at which he was in a violent passion. I perceived that he had already changed my guinea, and had a bottle of madeira and a glass before him. I put the cork into the bottle, desired he would be calm, and began to talk to him of the means by which he might be extricated. He then told me that he had a novel ready for the press, which he produced to me. I looked into it, and saw its merit; told the landlady I should soon return, and having gone to a bookseller, sold it for sixty pounds. I brought Goldsmith the money, and he discharged his rent, not without rating his landlady in a high tone for having used him so ill."

Johnson himself lived for some time in the Temple. It was there that he was first visited by his biographer, who took rooms in Farrar's Buildings to be near him. His appearance and manners on this occasion, especially as our readers are now of the party, are too characteristic to be omitted. "His chambers," says Boswell, "were on the first floor of No. 1, Middle Temple Lane, and I entered them with an impression given me by the Rev. Dr. Blair, of Edinburgh, who had been introduced to him not long before, and described his having 'found the giant in his den,' an expression which, when I came to be pretty well acquainted with Johnson, I repeated to him, and he was diverted at this picturesque account of himself.

"He received me very courteously; but it must be confessed that his apartment, and furniture, and morning dress were sufficiently uncouth. His brown suit of clothes looked very rusty; he had on a little shrivelled unpowdered wig, which was too small for his head; his shirt-neck and knees of his breeches were loose; his black worsted stockings ill-drawn up; and he had a pair of unbuckled shoes by way of slippers. But all these slovenly particularities were forgotten the moment he began to talk. Some gentlemen, whom I do not recollect, were sitting with him; and when they went away, I also rose; but he said to me, 'Nay, don't go.'—'Sir,' said I, 'I am afraid that I intrude upon you.' It is benevolent to allow me to sit and hear you.' He seemed pleased with this compliment which I sincerely paid him, and answered, 'Sir, I am obliged to any man who visits me.' (He meant that it relieved his melancholy).

It was in a dress of this sort and without his hat that he was seen rushing one day after two of the highest-bred visitors conceivable, in order to hand one of them to her coach. These were his friend Beauclerc, of the St. Albans family, and Madame de Boufflers, mother (if we mistake not) of the Chevalier de Boufflers, the celebrated French wit. Her report, when she got home, must have been overwhelming; but she was clever and amiable, like her son, and is said to have appreciated the talents of the great uncouth. Beauclerc, however, must repeat the story.—"When Madame de Boufflers," says he, "was first in England, she was desirous to see Johnson. I accordingly went with her to his chambers in the Temple, where she was entertained with his conversation for some time. When our visit was over, she and I left him, and were got into Inner Temple Lane, when all at once I heard a noise like thunder. This was occasioned by Johnson, who, it seems, on a little recollection, had taken it into his head that he ought to have done the honours of his literary residence to a foreign lady of quality; and eager to shew himself a man of gallantry, was hurrying down the stairs in violent agitation. He overtook us before we reached the Temple-gate, and brushing in between me and Madame de Boufflers, seized her hand and conducted her to the coach. His dress was a rusty-brown morning suit, a pair of old shoes by way of slippers, a little shrivelled wig sticking on the top of his head, and the sleeves of his shirt and the knees of his breeches hanging loose. A considerable crowd of people gathered round, and were not a little struck by his singular appearance."

It was in the Inner Temple Lane one night, being seized with a fit of merriment at something that touched his fancy, not without the astonishment of his companions, who could not see the joke, that he went roaring all the way to the Temple-gate; where, being arrived, he burst into such a convulsive laugh, says Boswell, that in order to support himself he "laid hold of one of the posts at the side of the foot-pavement, and sent forth peals so loud, that in the silence of the night, his voice seemed to resound from Temple-bar to Fleet-ditch. This most ludicrous exhibition," continues his follower, "of the awful, melancholy, and venerable Johnson, happened well to counteract the feelings of sadness which I used to experience when parting from him for a considerable time. I accompanied him to his door, where he gave me his blessing."

Between the Temple-gates, at one time, lived Bernard Lintot, who was in no better esteem with authors than the other great bookseller of those times, Jacob Tonson. There is a pleasant anecdote of Dr. Young's addressing him a letter by mistake, which Bernard opened, and found it begin thus:—"That Bernard Lintot is so great a scoundrel."—"It must have been very amusing," said Young, "to have seen him in his rage: he was a great sputtering fellow."

Between the gates and Temple-bar, but nearer to the latter, was the famous Devil Tavern, where Ben Johnson held his club. Messrs. Child, the bankers, bought it in 1787, and the present houses were erected on its site. We believe that the truly elegant house of Messrs. Hoare, their successors, does not interfere with the place on which it stood. We rather think it was very near to Temple-bar, perhaps within a house or two. The club-room, which was afterwards frequently used for balls, was called the Apollo, and was large and handsome, with a gallery for music. Probably the house had originally been a private abode, of some consequence. The Leges Convivales, which Jonson wrote for his club, and which are to be found in his works, are composed in his usual style of elaborate and compiled learning, not without a taste of that dictatorial self-sufficiency, which, notwithstanding all that has been said by his advocates, and the good qualities he undoubtedly possessed, forms an indelible part of his character. "Inspida poemata," says he, "nulla recitantur." (Let nobody repeat to us insipid poetry); as if all that he should read of his own must infallibly be otherwise. The club at the Devil does not appear to have resembled the higher one at the Mermaid, where Shakespeare and Beaumont used to meet him. He most probably had it all to himself. This is the Tavern mentioned by Pope:

And each true Briton is to Ben so civil,
He swears the Muses met him at the Devil.

It was in good repute at the beginning of the last century. "I dined to-day," says Swift, in one of his letters to Stella, "with Dr. Garth and Mr. Addison at the Devil Tavern, near Temple-bar, and Garth treated: and it is well I dine every day, else I should be longer making out my letters: for we are yet in a very dull state, only enquiring every day after new elections, where the Tories carry it among the new members six to one. Mr. Addison's election has passed easy and undisputed; and, I believe, if he had a mind to be chosen king, he would hardly be refused." Yet Addison was a Whig. Addison had not then had his disputes with Pope, and others; and his intercourse, till his sincerity became doubted, was very delightful. It is impossible to read of these famous wits dining together, and not lingering upon the occasion a little, and wishing we could have heard them talk. Yet wits have their uneasiness, because of their wit. Swift was probably not very comfortable at this dinner. He was then beginning to feel awkward with his Whig friends; and Garth, in the previous month of September, had written a defence of Godolphin, the ousted minister, which was unhandsonely attacked in the Examiner, by their common acquaintance Prior, himself formerly a Whig.

There was a multitude of famous shops and coffee-houses in this quarter, all of which make a figure in the Tatler, and other works. Nando's coffee-house, Dick's, (still extant as Richard's): the Rainbow, (which is said to have been indicted in former times for the nuisance of selling coffee); Ben Tooke's (the bookseller); Lintot's; and Charles Mather's, alias Bubble-boy, the Toyman, who, when Sir Timothy Shallow accuses him of selling him a cane "for ten pieces, while Tom Empty had as good a one for five," exclaims, "Lord! Sir Timothy, I am concerned that you, whom I took to understand canes better than any body in town, should be so overseen! Why, Sir Timothy, yours is a true jambée, and esquire Empty's only a plain dragon."

The fire of London stopped at the Temple Exchange coffee-house; a circumstance which is recorded in an inscription, stating the house to have been the last of the houses burnt, and the first restored. The old front of this house was taken down about a century ago; but on its being rebuilt, the stone with the inscription was replaced in its former position.

But we must now cross over the way to Shire Lane, which is close to Temple Bar on the opposite side.

Here "in ancient times," says Maitland; writing in the middle of the last century, "were only posts, rails, and a chain, such as are now at Holborn, Smithfield, and Whitechapel bars. Afterwards there was a house of timber erected across the street, with a narrow gateway, and an entry on the south side of it under the house." The present gate was built by Wren after the great fire, but, although the work of so great a master, is hardly worth notice as a piece of architecture. It must be allowed that Wren could do poor things as well as good, even when not compelled by a vestry. As the last of the city gates, however, we confess we should be sorry to see it pulled down, though we believe there is a general sense that it is in the way. If it were handsome, or venerable, we should plead hard for it, because it would then be a better thing than a mere convenience. The best thing we know of it is a jest of Goldsmith's; and the worst, the point on which the jest turned. Goldsmith was coming from Westminster Abbey, with Dr. Johnson, where they had been looking at the tombs in Poet's Corner, and Johnson had quoted a line from Ovid,—

Forsitan et nostrum nomen miscebitur istis.
(Perhaps, some day, our names may mix with theirs).

"When we got to Temple Bar," says Johnson, "Goldsmith stopped me, pointed to the heads upon it, and alily whispered to me, ('in allusion,' says Boswell, 'to Dr. Johnson's supposed political opinions, and perhaps to his own,')

"Forsitan et nostrum nomen miscebitur istis.
Perhaps, some day, our names may mix with theirs."

These heads belonged to the rebels who were executed for rising in favour of the Pretender. The brutality of such spectacles, which outrage the last feelings of mortality, and as often punish honest mistakes as anything else, is not likely to be repeated. Yet such an effect has habit in reconciling men's minds to the most revolting, and sometimes the most dangerous customs, that here were two Jacobites, one of whom made a jest of what we should now regard with horror. However, Johnson must often have felt bitterly as he passed there; and the jesting of such men is frequently nothing but salve for a wound.

Shire Lane still keeps its name, and we hope, however altered and improved, it will never have any other; for here, at the upper end, is described as residing, old Isaac Bickerstaff, the Tatler, the more venerable but not the more delightful double of Richard Steele, the founder of English periodical literature. The public-house called the Trumpet, at which the Tatler met his club, is still remaining under the same title. At his house in the lane, he dates a great number of his papers, and receives many interesting visitors; and hence it was that he led down into Fleet Street that immortal deputation of "twaddlers" from the country, who, as a celebrated writer has observed, hardly seem to have settled their question of precedence to this hour. As characters in books, if well drawn and rendered lasting, have a great deal to shew for their actual existence, (more, certainly, than real people who die off,) the reader will probably think it an indulgence on his part as well as our own, if we stand aside with him a little, while the procession issues from Shire Lane, and crosses the way to Dick's coffee-house. We see them at this moment, their hats hardly resumed, and their persons keeping aloof from one another, with a jealous courtesy.

The Tatler receives a letter from Mr. John Thrifty, informing him, in consequence of orders from Sir Henry Quickset, of Staffordshire, baronet, that "his honour Sir Harry himself, Sir Giles Wheelbarrow, knight, Thomas Rentfree, esq., Justice of the quorum, Andrew Windmill, esquire, and Mr. Nicholas Doubt, of the Inner Temple, Sir Harry's grandson, would wait upon him at the hour of nine to-morrow morning, being Tuesday the twenty-fifth of October, upon business which Sir Harry would impart to him by word of mouth. I thought it proper," says the writer, "to acquaint you beforehand so many persons of quality came, that you might not be surprised therewith. Which concludes, though by many years absence since I saw you at Stafford, unknown, Sir,

Your most humble Servant,
John Thrifty."

"I received this message," says Mr. Bickerstaff, "with less surprise than, I believe, Mr. Thrifty imagined; for I knew the good company too well to feel any palpitations at their approach: but I was in very great concern how I should adjust the ceremonial, and demean myself to all these great men, who perhaps had not seen anything above themselves for these twenty years last past. I am sure that is the case of Sir Harry. Besides which, I was sensible that there was a great point in adjusting my behaviour to the simple squire, so as to give him satisfaction, and not disoblige the justice of the quorum."

"The hour of nine was come this morning, and I had no sooner set chairs, by the steward's letter, and fixed my tea equipage, but I heard a knock at my door, which was opened, but no one entered; after which followed a long silence, which was broke at last by, 'Sir, I beg your pardon; I think I know better,' and another voice, 'Nay, good Sir Giles—' I looked out from my window, and saw the good company, all with their hats off, and arms spread, offering the door to each other. After many offers, they entered with much solemnity, in the order Mr. Thrifty was so kind as to name them to me. But they are now got to my chamber-door, and I saw my old friend Sir Harry enter. I met him with all the respect due to so reverend a vegetable; for you are to know, that is my sense of a person who remains idle in the same place for half a century. I got him with great success into his chair by the fire without throwing down any of my cups. The knight-bachelor told me, 'he had a great respect for my whole family, and would, with my leave, place himself next to Sir Harry, at whose right hand he had sat at every quarter-sessions these thirty years, unless he was sick. The steward in the rear whispered the young Templar, 'That is true, to my knowledge.' I had the misfortune, as they stood cheek by jowl, to desire the squire to sit down before the justice of the quorum, to the no small satisfaction of the former, and resentment of the latter. But I saw my error too late, and got them as soon as I could into their seats. 'Well,' said I, 'gentlemen, after I have told you how glad I am of this honour, I am to desire you to drink a dish of tea.' They answered one and all, 'that they never drank tea in a morning.' 'Not in a morning!' said I, staring around me. Upon which the pert jackanapes, Nic Doubt, tipped me the wink, and put out his tongue at his grandfather. Here followed a profound silence, when the steward, in his boots and whip, proposed, 'that we should adjourn to some public-house, where everybody might call for what they pleased, and enter upon the business.' We all stood up in an instant, and Sir Harry filed off from the left, very discreetly countermarching behind the chairs towards the door. After him Sir Giles in the same manner. The simple squire made a sudden start to follow, but the justice of the quorum whipped between upon the stand of the stairs. A maid going up with coals made us halt, and put us into such confusion that we stood all in a heap, without any visible possibility of recovering our order: for the young jackanapes seemed to make a jest of this matter, and had so contrived, by pressing amongst us, under pretence of making way, that his grandfather was got into the middle, and he knew nobody was of quality to stir a step until Sir Harry moved first. We were fixed in this perplexity for some time, until we heard a very loud noise in the street; and Sir Harry asking what it was, I, to make them move, said 'it was fire.' Upon this, all ran down as fast as they could, without order or ceremony, until we got into the street, where we drew up in very good order, and filed off down Sheer Lane; the impertinent Templar driving us before him, as in a string, and pointing to his acquaintance who passed by.

"I must confess, I love to use people according to their own sense of good breeding, and therefore whipped in between the justice and the simple squire. He could not properly take this ill, but I overheard him whisper the steward, 'that he thought it hard that a common conjurer should take place of him, though an elder squire.' In this order we marched down Sheer Lane, at the upper end of which I lodge. When we came to Temple-bar, Sir Harry and Sir Giles got over; but a run of the coaches kept the rest of us on this side the street; however, we all at last landed, and drew up in very good order before Ben Tooke's shop, who favoured our rallying with great humanity; from whence we proceeded again till we came to Dick's Coffee-house, where I designed to carry them. Here we were at our old difficulty, and took up the street upon the same ceremony. We proceeded through the entry, and were so necessarily kept in order by the situation, that we were now got into the coffee-house itself, where, as soon as we arrived, we repeated our civilities to each other; after which, we marched up to the high table, which has an ascent to it inclosed in the middle of the room. The whole house was alarmed at this entry, made up of so much state and rusticity. Sir Harry called for a mug of ale, and Dyer's Letter. The boy brought in the ale in an instant, but said, 'they did not take in the Letter.' 'No!' says Sir Harry, 'then take back your mug; we are like indeed to have good liquor at this house!' Here the Templar tipped me a second wink, and, if I had not looked very grave upon him, I found he was disposed to be very familiar with me. In short I observed, after a long pause, that the gentlemen did not care to enter on business till after their morning draught, for which reason I called for a bottle of mum, and finding that had no effect upon them, I ordered a second and a third; after which Sir Harry reached over to me, and told me in a low voice, 'that the place was too public for business: but he would call upon me again to-morrow morning at my own lodgings, and bring some friends with him.'"

In Shire Lane is said to have originated the famous Kit-Kat Club, which consisted of "thirty-nine distinguished noblemen and gentlemen, zealously attached to the Protestant succession of the house of Hanover." "The club," continues a note in Spence by the editor, "is supposed to have derived its name from Christopher Katt, a pastry-cook, who kept the house where they dined, and excelled in making mutton-pies, which always formed a part of their bill of fare; these pies, on account of their excellence, were called Kit-Kats. The summer meetings were sometimes held at the Upper Flask on Hampstead Heath."

"You have heard of the Kit-Kat Club," says Pope to Spence. "The master of the house where the club met was Christopher Katt; Tonson was secretary. The day Lord Mohun and the Earl of Berwick were entered of it, Jacob said he saw they were just going to be ruined. When Lord Mohun broke down the gilded emblem on the top of his chair, Jacob complained to his friends, and said a man who would do that, would cut a man's throat. So that he had the good and the forms of the society much at heart. The paper was all in Lord Halifax's hand-writing of a subscription of four hundred guineas for the encouragement of good comedies, and was dated 1709, soon after they broke up. Steele, Addison, Congreve, Garth, Vanbrugh, Manwaring, Stepney, Walpole, and Pultney were of it; so was Lord Dorset and the present Duke. Manwaring, whom we hear nothing of now, was the ruling man in all conversations; indeed what he wrote had very little merit in it. Lord Stanhope and the Earl of Essex were also members. Jacob has his own, and all their pictures, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. Each member gave his, and he is going to build a room for them at Barn Elms."

It is from the size at which these portraits were taken (a three-quarter length), that the word Kit-Kat came to be applied to pictures. The society afterwards met elsewhere, as we shall see; but locality is nothing in these matters. The refinement consists in the company, and in whatever they choose to throw a grace over, whether a carp or a mutton pie. The great thing is, not the bill of fare, but, as Swift called it, the "bill of company."

We cross to the south side of the street again, and come to Mrs. Salmon's. It is a curious evidence of the fluctuation of the great tide in commercial and growing cities, that a century ago, this immortal old gentlewoman, renowned for her wax-work, gives as a reason for removing from St. Martin's Le Grand to Fleet Street, where she is still dead-alive (like her figures), that it was "a more convenient place for the coaches of the quality to stand unmolested." Some of the houses in this quarter are of the Elizabethan age, with floors projecting over the others, and looking pressed together like burrows. The inmates of these humbler tenements (unlike those of great halls and mansions) seem as if they must have had their heights taken, and the ceiling made to fit. Yet the builders were liberal of their materials. Over the way, near the west corner of Chancery Lane, stood an interesting specimen of this style of building, in the house of the famous old angler, Isaac Walton.

Walton's was the second house from the Lane, the corner house being an inn, long distinguished by the

"My uncle," says he, "was universally allowed to be as deeply skilled in caneology, as any one, Dr. Arbuthnot not excepted, whose science on important questions was quoted even after his death; for his collection of the various headed sticks and canes, from the time of the first Charles, taken together, was unrivalled."—Wine and Walnuts, vol. i. p. 242.

sign of the Harrow. He appears to have long lived here, carrying on the business of a linen-draper, about the year 1624. Another person, John Mason, a hosier, occupied one-half of the tenement. Walton afterwards removed to another house in Chancery Lane, a few doors up from Fleet Street, on the west side, where he kept a sempster's, or milliner's shop.

A great deal has been said lately of the merits and demerits of angling, and Isaac has suffered in the discussion, beyond what is agreeable to the lovers of that gentle system. Unfortunately the brothers of the angle do not argue ingeniously. They always omit the tortures suffered by the principal party, and affect to think you affected if you urge them; whereas their only reason for avoiding the point is, that is not to be defended. If it is, we may defend, by an equal abuse of reason any amusement which is to be obtained at another being's expense; and an evil genius might angle for us, and twitch us up, bleeding and roaring, into an atmosphere that would stifle us. But fishes do not roar; they cannot express any sound of suffering; and therefore the angler chooses to think they do not suffer, more than it is convenient to him to fancy. Now it is a poor sport, that depends for its existence on the want of a voice in the sufferer, and of imagination in the sportsman. Angling, in short, is not to be defended on any ground of reflection; and this is the worst thing to say of Isaac; for he was not unaware of the objections to his amusement, and he piqued himself upon being contemplative.

Anglers have been defended upon the ground of their having had among them so many pious men; but unfortunately men may be selfish as well as nobly pious; and even charity itself may be practised, as well as cruelty deprecated, upon principles which have a much greater regard to a man's own safety and future comfort, than anything which concerns real Christian beneficence. Doubtless there have been many good and humane men anglers, as well as many pleasant men. There have also been some very unpleasant ones,—Sir John Hawkins among them. They make a well-founded pretension to a love of nature and her scenery; but it is a pity they cannot relish it without this pepper to the poor fish. Walton's book contains many passages in praise of rural enjoyment, which affect us almost like the fields and fresh air themselves; though his brethren have exalted it beyond its value; and his lives of his angling friends, the Divines, have been preposterously over-rated. If angling is to be defended upon good and manly grounds, let it; it is no longer to be defended on any other. The best thing to be said for it (and the instance is worthy of reflection) is, that anglers have been brought up in the belief of its innocence, and that an inhuman custom is too powerful for the most humane. The inconsistency is to be accounted for on no other grounds; nor is it necessary or desirable that it should be so. It is a remarkable illustration of what Plato said, when something was defended on the ground of its being a trifle, because it was a custom. "But custom," said he, "is no trifle." Here, among persons of a more equivocal description, are some of the humanest men in the world, who will commit what other humane men reckon among the most inhuman actions, and make an absolute pastime of it. Let one of their grandchildren be brought up in the reverse opinion, and see what he will think of it. This, to be sure, might be said to be only another instance of the effect of education; but nobody, the most unprejudiced, thinks it a bigotry in Shakespeare and Steele to have brought us to feel for the brute creation in general; and whatever we may incline to think, for the accommodation of our propensities, there will still remain the unanswered and always avoided argument, of the dumb and torn fish themselves, who die agonised, in the midst of our tranquil looking on, and for no necessity.

John Whitney, author of the "Gentle Recreation, or the Pleasures of Angling," a poem printed in the year 1700, recommends the lovers of the art to bait with the eyes of fish, in order to decoy others of the same species. A writer in the Censura Literaria exclaims, "What a Nero of Anglers doth this proclaim John Whitney to have been! and how unworthy, to be ranked as a lover of the same pastime, which had been so interestingly recommended by Isaac Walton in his Contemplative Man's Recreation."

But Isaac's contemplative man can content himself with impaling live worms, and jesting about the tenderness with which he treats them,—using the worm, quoth Isaac, "as if you loved him." Doubtless John thought himself as good a man as Isaac. He poetizes, and is innocent with the best of them, and probably would not have hurt a dog. However, it must be allowed that he had less imagination than Walton, and was more cruel, inasmuch as he could commit a cruelty that was not the custom. Observe, nevertheless, that it was the customary cruelty which led to the new one. Why must these contemplative men commit any cruelty at all. The writer of the article in the Censura was, if we mistake not, one of the kindest of human beings, and yet he could see nothing erroneous in torturing a worm. "A good man," says the Scripture, "is merciful to his beast."

Therefore "holy Mr. Herbert" very properly helps a horse out of a ditch, and is the better for it all the rest of the day. Are we not to be merciful to fish as well as beasts, merely because the Scripture does not expressly state it? Such are the inconsistencies of mankind, during their very acquirement of beneficence.

On the other side of the corner of Chancery Lane, was born a man of real genius and benevolence, who would not have hurt a fly,—Abraham Cowley. His father was a grocer; himself, one of the kindest, wisest, and truest gentlemen that ever graced humanity. He has been pronounced by one, competent to judge, to have been, "if not a great poet, a great man." But his poetry is what every other man's poetry is, the flower of what was in him; and is at least so far good poetry, as it is the quintessence of amiable and deep reflection, not without a more festive strain, the result of his sociality. Pope says of him

Forgot his epic, nay pindaric art,
Yet still we love the language of his heart.*

His prose is admirable, and his character of Cromwell a masterpiece of honest enmity, more creditable to both parties than the zealous Royalist was aware. Cowley, notwithstanding the active part he took in politics, never ceased to be a child at heart. His mind lived in books and bowers,—in the sequestered "places of thought;" and he wondered and lamented to the last, that he had not realised the people he found there. His consolation should have been, that what he found in himself, was an evidence that the people exist.

Chancery Lane, "the most ancient of any to the west," having been built in the time of Henry III., when it was called New Lane, which was afterwards altered to Chancellor's Lane, is the greatest legal thoroughfare in England. It leads from the Temple, passes by Sergeant's Inn, Clifford's Inn, Lincoln's Inn, and the Rolls, and conducts to Gray's Inn. Of the world of vice and virtue, of pain and triumph, of learning and ignorance, truth and chicanery, of impudence, violence, and tranquil wisdom, that must have passed through this spot, the reader may judge accordingly. There all the great and eloquent lawyers of the metropolis must have been, at some time or other, from Fortescue and Littleton, to Coke, Ellesmere, and Erskine. Sir Thomas More must have been seen going down with his weighty aspect; Bacon with his eye of intuition; the coarse Thurlow; and the reverend elegance of Mansfield. But we shall anticipate our visions of Westminster Hall. In Chancery Lane was born the celebrated Lord Strafford, who was sent to the block by the party he had deserted, the victim of his own false strength and his master's weakness. It is a curious evidence of the secret manners of those times, which are so often contrasted with the license of the next reign, that Clarendon, in speaking of some love letters of this lord, a married man, which transpired during his trial, calls them "things of levity." What would he have said had he found any love-letters between Lady Carlisle and Pym? Of Southampton Buildings, on the site of which lived Shakespeare's friend, Lord Southampton, we shall speak immediately; and we shall notice Lincoln's Inn when we come to the western portion of Holborn. But we may here observe, that on the wall of the Inn, which is in Chancery Lane, Ben Jonson is said to have worked, at the time he was compelled to assist his father-in-law at his trade of bricklaying. In the intervals of his trowel, he is said to have handled his Horace and Virgil. It is only a tradition, which Fuller has handed down to us in his Worthies; but tradition is valuable when it helps to make such a flower grow upon an old wall.

Sergeant's Inn, the first leading out of Chancery Lane, near Fleet Street, has been what its name implies for many generations. It was occasionally occupied by the sergeants as early as the time of Henry IV., when it was called Farrington's Inn, though they have never, we believe, held possession of the place but under tenure to the bishops of Ely, or their lessees. Pennant confounds this Inn with another of the same name, now no longer devoted to the same purpose, in Fleet Street†. Sergeant's Inn in Fleet Street was reduced to ruins in the great fire, but was soon after rebuilt in a much more uniform style than before. It continued after this to be occupied by the lawyers in 1730, when the whole was taken down, and the present court erected. The office of the Amicable Annuitant Society on the east side of the court, occupies the site of the ancient Hall and Chapel. All the judges, as having been sergeants at law before their elevation to the bench, have still chambers in the Inn in Chancery Lane. The windows of this house are filled with the armorial bearings of the members, who, when they are knighted, are emphatically equites aurati, at least as far as rings are concerned, for they give rings on the occasion with mottoes expressive of their sentiments upon law and justice. As to the equites, learned "knights" or horsemen (till "knight" be restored to its original meaning,—servant) will never be anything but an anomaly, especially since the learned brothers no longer even ride to the hall as they used. The arms of the body of sergeants are a golden shield, with an Ibis upon it; or to speak scientifically, "Or, an Ibis Proper;" to which Mr. Jekyll might have added, for motto, "In medio tutissimus." The same learned punster made an epigram upon the oratory and scarlet robes of his brethren, which may be here repeated without offence, as the sergeants have had among them some of the best as well as most tiresome of speakers:

The sergeants are a grateful race;
Their dress and language shew it;
Their purple robes from Tyre we trace,
Their arguments go to it.

One of the customs, which used to be observed so late as the reign of Charles I. in the creation of Sergeants, was for the new made dignitary to go in solemn procession to St. Paul's and there to choose his pillar, as it was expressed. This ceremony is supposed to have originated in the ancient practice of the lawyers taking each his station at one of the pillars in the Cathedral, and there waiting for clients. The legal sage stood, it is said, with pen in hand, and dexterously noted down the particulars of every man's case on his knee.

Clifford's Inn, leading out of Sergeant's Inn into Fleet Street and Fetter Lane, is so called from the noble family of De Clifford, who granted it the students-at-law in the reign of Edward III. The word inn, (Saxon, chamber), though now applied only to law places and the better sort of public-houses in which travellers are entertained, formerly signified a great house, mansion, or family palace. So Lincoln's Inn, the mansion of the Earls of Lincoln; Gray's Inn, of the Lords Gray, &c. The French still use the word hotel in the same sense. Inn once made as splendid a figure in our poetry, as the palaces of Milton:

Now whenas Phœbus, with his fiery waine
Unto his inne began to draw apace;*

says Spenser:—and his disciple Browne after him,

Now had the glorious sun tane up his inne.†

There is nothing to notice in Clifford's Inn, except that it has some trees in it, and is quiet; two circumstances which create a double pleasure in passing from the noise of the London streets. It is curious what a little remove produces this quiet. Even in the back room of a shop in the main street, the sound of the carts and carriages becomes wonderfully deadened to the ear, and a remove, like Clifford's Inn, makes it remote, or nothing.

The garden of Clifford's Inn forms part of the area of the Rolls, so called from the records kept there, in rolls of parchment. It is said to have been the house of an eminent Jew, forfeited to the crown, that is to say, most probably taken from him with all that it contained, by Henry III., who made it a house for converts from the owner's religion. These converted Jews, most likely none of the best of their race, (for board and lodging are not arguments to the scrupulous,) appear to have been so neglected, that the number of them gradually came to nothing, and Edward the Third gave the place to the Court of Chancery, to keep its records in. There is a fine monument in the chapel to Dr. Young, one of the masters, which, according to Vertue, was executed by Torregiano, who built the splendid tomb in Henry VII.'s chapel. Sir John Trevor, infamous for bribery and corruption, also lies here. "Wisely," says Pennant, "his epitaph is thus confined, Sir J. T. M. R. 1717." Some other masters, he adds, rest within the walls; "among them Sir John Strange, but without the quibbling line,

'Here lies an honest lawyer, that is Strange.'

Another Master of the Rolls, who did honour to the profession, was Sir Joseph Jekyll, recorded by Pope as an

"—odd old Whig,
Who never changed his principles or wig."

When he came into the office, many of the houses were rebuilt, and to the expense of ten of them he added, out of his own purse, as much as 350*l.* each house; observing, that "he would have them built as strong and as well as if they were his own inheritance."‡ The Master of the Rolls is a great law dignitary, a sort of under-judge in Chancery, presiding in a court by himself, though his most ostensible office is to take care of the records in question. He has a house and garden on the spot, the latter secluded from public view. The house, however, has not been used as a residence by the present holder of the office or his predecessor.

Between Chancery and Fetter Lane is the new church of St. Dunstan's in the West,—a great improvement upon the old one, though a little too plain below for the handsome fret-work of its steeple. The old building was eminent for the two wooden figures of wild men, who, with a gentleness not to be expected of them, struck the hour with a little tap of their clubs. At the same time they moved their arms and heads, with a like avoidance of superfluous action. These figures were put up in the time of Charles II., and were thought not to confer much honour on the passengers who stood "gaping" to see them strike. But the passengers might surely be as alive to the puerility as any one else. An absurdity is not the least attractive thing in this world. They who objected to the gapers probably admired more things than they laughed at. It must be remembered also, that when the images were set up, mechanical contrivances were much rarer than they are now. Two centuries ago St. Dunstan's Church-yard, as it was called, being the portion of Fleet Street in front of the church, was famous for its booksellers' shops. The church escaped the Great Fire, which stopped within three houses of it, and consequently, was one of the most ancient sacred edifices in London. It was supposed to have been built about the end of the fourteenth century—but had subsequently undergone extensive repairs. Besides the clock with the figures, it was adorned by a statue of Queen Elizabeth which stood in a niche, over the east end, and had been transferred thither about the middle of last century from the west side of old Ludgate, which was then removed.

The only repute of Fetter Lane in the present days, is, or was, for sausages. But at one time it is said to have had the honor of Dryden's presence. The famous Praise God Barebones also, it seems, lived here, in a house for which he paid forty pounds a year, as he stated in his examination on a trial in the reign of Charles II.* He paid the above rent, he says, "except during the war"—that is, we suppose, during the confusion of the contest between the King and the Parliament, when probably this worthy contrived to live rent free. In this neighbourhood also dwelt the infamous Elizabeth Brownrigg, who was executed in 1767 for the murder of one of her apprentices. Her house, with the cellar in which she used to confine her starved and tortured victims, and from the grating of which their cries of distress were heard, was one of those on the east side of the lane, looking into the long and narrow alley behind, called Flower-de-Luce Court. It was some years ago in the occupation of a fishing-tackle maker.

Johnson once lived in Fetter Lane, but the circumstances of his abode there have not transpired. We now, however, come to a cluster of his residences in Fleet Street, of which place he is certainly the great presiding spirit, the Genius Loci. He was conversant for the greater part of his life with this street, was fond of it, frequented its Mitre Tavern above any other in London, and has identified its name and places with the best things he ever said and did. It was in Fleet Street, we believe, that he took the poor girl up in his arms, put her to bed in his own house, and restored her to health and her friends; an action sufficient to redeem a million of the asperities of temper occasioned by disease, and to stamp him, in spite of his bigotry, a good Christian. Here at all events he walked, and talked, and shouldered wondering porters out of the way, and mourned, and philosophized, and was "a goodnatured fellow," (as he called himself,) and roared with peals of laughter till midnight echoed to his roar.

"We walked in the evening," says Boswell, "in Greenwich Park. He asked me, I suppose by way of trying my disposition, 'Is not this very fine?' Having no exquisite relish of the beauties of nature, and being more delighted with the busy hum of men," I answered, "Yes, sir; but not equal to Fleet Street." Johnson. "You are right, sir."†

Boswell vindicates the taste here expressed by the example of a "very fashionable baronet," who on his attention being called to the fragrance of a May evening in the country, observed, "This may be very well, but I prefer the smell of a flambeau at the playhouse." The Baronet here alluded to was Sir Michael Le Fleming, who, by way of comment on his indifference to fresh air, died of an apoplectic fit while conversing with Lord Howick (the present Earl Grey), at the Admiralty.‡ However, Johnson's ipse dixit was enough. He wanted neither Boswell's vindication, nor any other. He was melancholy, and glad to be taken from his thoughts; and London furnished him with an endless flow of society.

Johnson's abodes in Fleet Street were in the following order:—First, in Fetter Lane, then in Boswell Court, then in Gough Square, in the Inner Temple Lane, in Johnson's Court, and, finally, and for the longest period, in Bolt Court, where he died. His mode of life, during a considerable portion of his residence in these places, is described in a communication to Boswell by the Rev. Dr. Maxwell, assistant preacher at the Temple, who was intimate with Johnson for many years, and spoke of his memory with affection.

"About twelve o'clock," says the Doctor, "I commonly visited him, and found him in bed, or declaiming over his tea, which he drank very plentifully. He generally had a levee of morning visitors, chiefly men of letters; Hawkesworth, Goldsmith, Murphy, Langton, Steevens, Beauclerk, &c. &c., and sometimes learned ladies; particularly I remember a French lady of wit and fashion doing him the honour of a visit. He seemed to me to be considered as a kind of public oracle, whom every body thought they had a right to visit and consult; and, doubtless, they were well rewarded. I never could discover how he found time for his compositions. He declaimed all the morning, then went to dinner at a tavern, where he commonly staid late, and then drank his tea at some friend's house, over which he loitered a great while, but seldom took supper. I fancy he must have read and wrote chiefly in the night; for I can scarcely recollect that he ever refused going with me to a tavern; and he often went to Ranelagh, which he deemed a place of innocent recreation.

"He frequently gave all the silver in his pocket to the poor, who watched him between his house and the tavern where he dined. He walked the streets at all hours, and said he was never robbed, for the rogues knew he had little money, nor had the appearance of having much.

"Though the most accessible and communicative man alive, yet when he suspected that he was invited to be exhibited, he constantly spurned the invitation.

"Two young women from Staffordshire visited him when I was present, to consult him on the subject of Methodism, to which they were inclined. 'Come (said he), you pretty fools, dine with Maxwell and me at the Mitre, and we will talk over that subject;' which they did; and after dinner he took one of them on his knees, and fondled them for half an hour together."§

This anecdote is exquisite. It shows, that however impatient he was of having his own superstitious canvassed, he was loth to see them inflicted on others. He is here a harmless Falstaff, with two innocent damsels on his knees, in the room of Mesdames Ford and Page.

In Gough Square Johnson wrote part of his Dictionary. He had written the Rambler, and taken his high stand with the public before. "At this time," says Barber, his servant, "he had little for himself, but frequently sent money to Mr. Shiels when in distress." (Shiels was one of his amanuenses in the Dictionary). His friends and visitors in Gough Square are a good specimen of what they always were,—a miscellany creditable to the largeness of his humanity. There was Cave, Dr. Hawkesworth, Miss Carter, Mrs. Macauley, (who was must have looked strangely at one another), Mr. (afterwards Sir Joshua) Reynolds, Langton, Mrs. Williams, (a poor poetess whom he maintained in his house), Mr. Levett (an apothecary, on the same footing), Garrick, Lord Orrery, Lord Southwell, and Mrs. Gardiner, wife of a tallow-chandler on Snow-hill,—"not in the learned way," says Mr. Barber, "but a worthy good woman." With all his respect for rank, which doubtless he regarded as a special dispensation of Providence, his friend Beauclerk's notwithstanding,† Johnson never lost sight of the dignity of goodness. He did not, however, confine his attentions to those who were noble or amiable; though we are to suppose, that every body with whom he chose to be particularly conversant had some good quality or other; unless, indeed, he patronized them as the Duke of Montague did his ugly dogs, because nobody would if he did not. The great secret, no doubt, was, that he was glad of the company of any of his fellow-creatures, who would bear and forbear with him, and for whose tempers he did not care as much as he did for their welfare. And he was giving alms; which was a Catholic part of religion, in the proper sense of the word. "He nursed," says Mrs. Thrale, in her superfluous style, "whole nests of people in his house, where the lame, the blind, the sick and the sorrowful, found a sure retreat from all the evils whence his little income could secure them: and commonly spending the middle of the week at our house, he kept his numerous family in Fleet Street upon a settled allowance; but returned to them every Saturday to give them three good dinners and his company, before he came back to us on the Monday night, treating them with the same, or perhaps more ceremonious civility, than he would have done by as many people of fashion, making the Holy Scripture thus the rule of his conduct, and only expecting salvation, as he was able to obey its precepts."‡ Johnson's female inmates were not like the romantic ones of Richardson. "We surely cannot but admire," says Boswell, "the benevolent exertions of this great and good man, especially when we consider how grievously he was afflicted with bad health, and how uncomfortable his home was made by the perpetual jarring of those whom he charitably accommodated under his roof. He has sometimes suffered me to talk jocularly of his group of families, and call them his seraglio. He thus mentions them, together with honest Levett, in one of his letters to Mrs. Thrale: 'Williams hates every body; Levett hates Desmoulins, and does not love Williams; Desmoulins hates them both; Poll loves none of them.'"

Of his residence in Inner Temple Lane we have spoken before. He lived there six or seven years, and then removed to Johnson's Court, No. 7, where he resided for ten. Johnson's Court is in the neighbourhood of Gough Square. It was during this period that he accompanied his friend Boswell to Scotland where he sometimes humourously styled himself "Johnson of that ilk" (that same, or Johnson of Johnson), in imitation of the local designations of the Scottish chiefs. In 1776, in his sixty-seventh year, still adhering to the neighbourhood, he removed into Bolt Court, No. 8, where he died eight years after, on the 19th December, 1784. In Bolt Court he had a garden, and perhaps in Johnson's Court and Gough Square: which we mention to shew how tranquil and removed these places were, and convenient for a student who wished, nevertheless, to have the bustle of London at hand. Maitland (one of the compilers upon Stow), who published his history of London in 1739, describes Johnson and Bolt Courts as having "good houses, well inhabited;" and Gough Square he calls fashionable.†

Johnson was probably in every tavern and coffee-house in Fleet Street. There is one which has taken his name, being styled, par excellence, "Dr. Johnson's Coffee-house." But the house he most frequented was the Mitre tavern, on the other side of the street, in a passage leading to the Temple. It was here, as we have seen, that he took his two innocent theologians, and paternally dandled them out of their misgivings on his knee. The same place was the first of the kind in which Boswell met him. "We had a good supper," says the happy biographer, "and port wine, of which he then sometimes drank a bottle." (At intervals he abstained from all fermented liquors for a long time). "The orthodox, high-church sound of the Mitre, the figure and manner of the celebrated SAMUEL JOHNSON, the extraordinary power and precision of his conversation, and the pride arising from finding myself admitted as his companion, produced a variety of sensations, and a pleasing elevation of mind beyond what I had before experienced."‡ They sat till between one and two in the morning. He told Boswell at that period that "he generally went abroad at about four in the afternoon, and seldom came home till two in the morning. I took the liberty to ask if he did not think it wrong to live thus, and not to make more use of his great talents. He owned it was a bad habit."

The next time Goldsmith was with them, when Johnson made a remark very fit to be repeated in this journal; namely, that granting knowledge in some cases to produce unhappiness, "knowledge per se was an object which every one would wish to attain, though, perhaps, he might not take the trouble necessary for attaining it." One of his most curious remarks followed, occasioned by the mention of Campbell, the author of the Hermippus Redivivus, on which Boswell makes a no less curious comment. "Campbell," said Johnson, "is a good man, a pious man. I am afraid he has not been in the inside of a church for many years; but he never passes a church without pulling off his hat. This shews that he has good principles." On which, says Boswell in a note, "I am inclined to think he was misinformed as to this circumstance. I own I am jealous for my worthy friend Dr. John Campbell. For though Milton could without remorse absent himself from public worship, I cannot."§

¶ It was at their next sitting in this house, at which the Rev. Dr. Ogilvie, a Scotch writer, was present, that Johnson made his famous joke, in answer to that gentleman's remark, that Scotland has a great many "noble, wild prospects." Johnson, "I believe, sir, you have a great many. Norway, too, has noble, wild prospects; and Lapland is remarkable for prodigious noble, wild prospects. But, sir, let me tell you, the noblest prospect which a Scotchman ever sees, is the high road that leads him to England!" "This unexpected and pointed sally," says Boswell, "produced a roar of applause. After all, however (he adds), those who admire the rude grandeur of nature, cannot deny it to Caledonia."||

Johnson had the highest opinion of a tavern, as a place in which a man might be comfortable, if he could anywhere. Indeed, he said that the man who could not enjoy himself in a tavern, could be comfortable nowhere. This, however, is not to be taken to the letter. Extremes meet; and Johnson's uneasiness of temper led him into the gayer necessities of Falstaff. However, it is assuredly no honour to a man, not to be able to "take his ease at his inn."

‡ Malone, in the passage in Boswell, ibid.

"There is no private house," said Johnson, talking on this subject, "in which people can enjoy themselves so well as at a capital tavern. Let there be ever so great plenty of good things, ever so much goodness, ever so much elegance, ever so much desire that every body should be easy, in the nature of things it cannot be: there must always be some degree of care and anxiety. The master of the house is anxious to entertain his guests; the guests are anxious to be agreeable to him; and no man, but a very impudent dog indeed, can as freely command what is in another man's house as if it were his own. Whereas, at a tavern, there is a general freedom from anxiety. You are sure you are welcome: and the more noise you make, the more trouble you give, the more good things you call for, the welcome you are. No servants will attend you with the alacrity which waiters do, who are incited by the prospect of an immediate reward in proportion as they please. No sir, there is nothing which has yet been contrived by man, by which so much happiness is produced, as by a good tavern or inn." He then repeated with great emotion Shenstone's lines:

"Whoe'er has travelled life's dull round,
Where'er his stages may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found
The warmest welcome at an inn."^{*}

"Sir John Hawkins," says Boswell, in a note on this passage, "has preserved very few memorabilia of Johnson." There is, however, to be found in his bulky tome, a very excellent one upon this subject. "In contradiction to those who, having a wife and children, prefer domestic enjoyments to those which a tavern affords, I have heard him assert, that a tavern chair was the throne of human felicity. 'As soon (said he) as I enter the door of a tavern, I experience an oblivion of care, and a freedom from solicitude: when I am seated, I find the master courteous, and the servants obsequious to my call; anxious to know and ready to supply my wants: wine there exhilarates my spirits and prompts me to free conversation and an interchange of discourse with those whom I most love; I dogmatise, and am contradicted; and in this conflict of opinion and sentiments I find delight.'"

The following anecdote is highly to Johnson's credit, and equally worthy every one's attention. "Johnson was known to be so rigidly attentive to the truth," says Boswell, "that even in his common conversation the slightest circumstance was mentioned with exact precision. The knowledge of his having such a principle and habit made his friends have a perfect reliance on the truth of every thing that he told, however it might have been doubted if told by many others. As an instance of this I may mention an odd incident, which he related as having happened to him one night in Fleet Street. 'A gentleman (said he) begged I would give her my arm to assist her in crossing the street, which I accordingly did; upon which she offered me a shilling, supposing me to be the watchman. I perceived that she was somewhat in liquor.' This, if told by most people, would have been thought an invention; when told by Johnson, it was believed by his friends, as much as if they had seen what passed."[†]

The gentleman, however, might have taken him for the watchman without being in liquor, if she had no eye to discern a great man through his uncouthness. Davies, the bookseller, said, that he "laughed like a rhinoceros." It may be added he walked like a whale; for it was rolling rather than walking. "I met him in Fleet Street," says Boswell, "walking, or rather, indeed, moving along; for his peculiar march is thus described in a very just and picturesque manner, in a short life of him published very soon after his death:—'When he walked the streets, what with the constant roll of his head, and the concomitant motion of his body, he appeared to make his way by that motion independent of his feet.' That he was often much stared at," continues Boswell, "while he advanced in this manner, may be easily believed; but it was not safe to make sport of one so robust as he was. Mr. Langton saw him one day, in a fit of absence, by a sudden start, drive the load off a porter's back, and walk forwards briskly, without being conscious of what he had done. The porter was very angry, but stood still, and eyed the huge figure with much earnestness, till he was satisfied that his wisest course was to be satisfied, and take up his burthen again."[‡]

There is another remark on Fleet Street and its superiority to the country, which must not be passed over. Boswell, not having Johnson's reasons for wanting society, was a little overweening and gratuitous on this subject; and on such occasions the Doctor would give him a knock. "It was a delightful day," says the biographer;—"as we walked to St. Clement's church, I again remarked that Fleet Street was the most cheerful scene in the world; 'Fleet Street,' said I, 'is in my mind more delightful than Temple.' Johnson. 'Ay, sir, but let it be compared with Mull.'"[§]

The progress of knowledge, even since Johnson's time, has enabled us to say, without presumption, that we differ with this extraordinary person on many important points, without ceasing to have the highest regard for his character. His faults were the result of temperament; perhaps his good qualities and his powers of reflection were, in some measure, so too; but this must be the case with all men. Intellect and beneficence, from whatever causes, will always command respect; and we may gladly compound, for their sakes, with foibles which belong to the common chances of humanity. If Johnson has added nothing very new to the general stock, he has contributed (especially by the help of his biographer) a great deal that is striking and entertaining. He was an admirable critic, if not of the highest things, yet of such as could be determined by the exercise of a masculine good sense; and one thing he did, perhaps beyond any man in England, before or since;—he advanced, by the powers of his conversation, the strictness of his veracity, and the respect he exacted towards his presence, what may be called the personal dignity of literature. The consequence has been, not exactly what he expected, but certainly what the great interests of knowledge require; and Johnson has assisted men, with whom he little thought of co-operating, in setting the claims of truth and beneficence above all others.

East from Fetter Lane, on the same side of the street, is Crane Court—the principal house in which, facing the entry, was that in which the Royal Society used to meet, and where they kept their museum and library, before they removed to their present apartments in Somerset House. The Society met in Crane Court up to a period late enough to allow us to present to our imaginations Boyle and his contemporaries prosecuting their eager inquiries and curious experiments in the early dawn of physical science, and afterwards Newton presiding in the noontide glory of the light which he had shed over nature.

In going through Fleet Street and the Strand, we seldom think that the one is named after a rivulet, now running under ground, and the other from its being on the banks of the river Thames. As little do most of us fancy that there was once a line of noblemen's houses on the one side, and that at the same time, all beyond the other side, to Hampstead or Highgate, was open country, with the little hamlet of St. Giles's in a cove. So late as the reign of Henry VIII. we have a print containing the village of Charing. Citizens used to take an evening stroll to the well now in St. Clement's Inn.

In the reign of Edward III. the Strand was an open country road, with a mansion here and there, on the banks of the river Thames, most probably a castle or strong hold. In this state it no doubt remained during the greater part of the York and Lancaster period. From Henry VIII's time the castles most likely began to be exchanged for mansions of a more peaceful character. These gradually increased; and in the reign of Edward VI. the Strand consisted, on the south side, of a line of mansions with garden walls; and on the north, of a single row of houses, behind which all was field. The reader is to imagine wall all the way from Temple Bar to Whitehall, on his left hand, like that of Kew Palace, or a succession of Burlington Gardens; while the line of humbler habitations stood on the other side, like a row of servants in waiting.

As wealth increased, not only the importance of rank diminished, and the nobles were more content to recollect James's advice of living in the country, (where he said, they looked like ships in a river, instead of ships at sea), but the value of ground about London, especially on the river side, was so much augmented, that the proprietors of these princely mansions were not unwilling to turn the premises into money. The civil wars had given another jar to the stability of their abodes in the metropolis; and in Charles the Second's time the great houses finally gave way, and were exchanged for streets and wharfs. An agreeable poet of the last century lets us know that he used to think of this great change in going up the Strand.

"Come, Fortescue, sincere, experience'd friend,
Thy briefs, thy deeds, and e'en thy fees suspend;
Come, let us leave the Temple's silent walls;
Me, business to my distant lodging calls;
Through the long Strand together let us stray;
With thee conversing, I forget the way.
Behold that narrow street which steep descends,
Whose building to the slimy shore extends;
Here Arundel's fam'd structure rear'd its fame:
The street alone retains the empty name.
Where Titian's glowing paint the canvas warmed,
And Raphael's fair design with judgment charmed,
Now hangs the Bellman's song; and pasted here,
The coloured prints of Overton appear.
Where statues breathed, the works of Phidias' hands,
A wooden pump, or lonely watch-house, stands.
There Essex' stately pile adorned the shore,
There Cecil's, Bedford's, Villiers',—now no more."[¶]

As the aspect in this quarter is so different from what it was, and the Strand is one of the most important in the metropolis, we may add what Pennant has written on the same subject:—

"In the year 1353, that fine street the Strand was an open high-way, with here and there a great man's house, with gardens to the water's side. In that year it was so ruinous, that Edward III., by an ordinance, directed a tax to be raised upon wool, leather, wine, and all goods carried to the staple at Westminster, from Temple Bar to Westminster Abbey, for the repair of the road; and that all owners of houses adjacent to the highway, should repair as much as lay before their doors. Mention is also made of a bridge to be erected near the royal palace at Westminster, for the convenience of the said staple; but the last probably meant no more than stairs for the landing of the goods, which I find sometimes went by the name of a bridge.

"There was no continued street here till about the year 1583; before that it entirely cut off Westminster from London, and nothing intervened except the scattered houses, and a village, which afterwards gave name to the whole. St. Martin's stood literally in the fields. But about the year 1566 a street was formed, loosely built, for all the houses on the south side had great gardens to the river, were called by their owners' names, and in after times gave name to the several streets that succeeded them, pointing down to the Thames; each of them had stairs for the convenience of taking boat, of which many to this day bear the names of the houses. As the court was for centuries either at the palace at Westminster, or Whitehall, a boat was the customary conveyance of the great to the presence of their sovereign. The north side was a mere line of houses from Charing-cross to Temple Bar; all beyond was country. The gardens which occupied part of the site of Covent Garden were bounded by fields, and St. Giles was a distant country village. These are circumstances proper to point out, to shew the vast increase of our capital in little more than two centuries."[†]

The aspect of the Strand, on emerging through Temple-Bar, is very different from what it was forty years ago. "A stranger who had visited London in 1790, would on his return in 1804," says Mr. Malcolm, "be astonished to find a spacious area (with the church nearly in the centre) on the site of Butcher Row, and some other passages undeserving of the name of streets, which were composed of those wretched fabrics, overhanging their foundations, the receptacles of dirt in every corner of their projecting stories, the bane of ancient London, where the plague, with all its attendant horrors, frowned destruction on the miserable inhabitants, reserving its forces for the attacks of each returning summer."[‡] thrown open, is called Pickett Street, after the Alderman who projected the improvements. Unfortunately, they turned out to be on too large a scale; that is to say, the houses were found to be too large and expensive for the right side of the Strand in this quarter, the tide of traffic between the city and Westminster flowing the other side of the way. The consequence is, that the houses are under-let, and that something of the old squalid look remains in the turning towards Clement's Inn, in spite of the huge pillared entrance.

Butcher Row, however squalid, contained houses worth eating and drinking in. Johnson frequented an eating-house there; and according to Oldys, it was "in returning from the Bear and Harrow in Butcher Row through Clare Market, to his lodgings in Duke Street, that Lee, the dramatic poet, overladen with wine, fell down, (on the ground, as some say,—according to others, on a bulk,) and was killed or stifled in the snow. He was buried in the parish church of St. Clement Danes, aged about thirty-five years."¹ "He was a very handsome as well as ingenious man," says Oldys, "but given to debauchery, which necessitated a milk diet. When some of his university comrades visited him, he fell to drinking out of all measure, which flying up into his head caused his face to break out into those carbuncles which were afterwards observed there; and also touched his brain, occasioning that madness so much lamented in so rare a genius. Tom Brown says he wrote, while he was in Bedlam, a play of twenty-five acts; and Mr. Bowman tells me that going once to visit him there, Lee shewed him a scene, 'in which,' says he, 'I have done a miracle for you.' 'What's that?' said Bowman. 'I have made you a good priest.'"

Oldys mentions another of his mad sayings, but does not tell us with whom it passed.

"I've seen an uncrewed spider spin a thought,"
And walk away upon the wings of angels!"

"What say you to that, Doctor?" "Ah, marry, Mr. Lee, that's superfine indeed. The thought of a winged spider may catch sublime readers of poetry sooner than his web, but it will need a commentary in prose to render it intelligible to the vulgar."²

Lee's madness does not appear to have been melancholy, otherwise these anecdotes would not bear repeating. There are various stories of the origin of it; but, most probably, he had an over-sanguine constitution, which he exasperated by intemperance. Though he died so young, the author of a satyr on the Poets gives us to understand that he was corpulent.

"Pembroke loved tragedy, and did provide
For the butchers' dogs, and for the whole Bank-side;
The bear was fed; but dedicating Lee
Was thought to have a greater paunch than he."³

This Pembroke, who loved a bear-garden, was the seventh earl of that title. His daughter married the son of Jefferies. Lee, on a visit to the earl at Wilton, is said to have drunk so hard, that "the butler feared he would empty the cellar." The madness of Lee is almost visible in his swelling and overlaiden dramas; in which, however, there is a great deal of true poetic fire, and a vein of tenderness that makes us heartily pity the author.

The social Boswell, in speaking of Johnson's eating-house in Butcher Row, does not approve of establishments of that sort. We shall see, by-and-bye, that he was wrong. "Happening to dine," says he, "at Clifton's eating-house in Butcher Row, I was surprised to see Johnson come in and take his seat at another table. The mode of dining, or rather being fed, at such houses in London, is well known to many, to be peculiarly unsocial, as there is no ordinary or united company, but each person has his own mess, and is under no obligation to hold any intercourse with any one. A liberal and full-minded man, however, who loves to talk, will break through this churlish and unsocial restraint. Johnson and an Irish gentleman got into a dispute concerning the cause of some part of mankind being black. 'Why, sir, (said Johnson,) it has been accounted for in three ways; either by supposing that they are the posterity of Ham, who was cursed; or that God at first created two kinds of men, one black and another white; or that by the heat of the sun the skin is scorched, and so acquires a sooty hue. This matter has been much canvassed among naturalists, but has never been brought to any certain issue.' What the Irishman said, is totally obliterated from my mind; but I remember that he became very warm and intemperate in his expressions; upon which Johnson rose, and quietly walked away. When he had retired, his antagonist took his revenge, as he thought, by saying, 'He has a most ungainly figure, and an affectation of pomposity, unworthy of a man of genius.'"

The ungainly figure might have been pardoned by the Irishman; who, we suppose, was equally fiery and elegant. As to Johnson's pompous manner, the most excusable part of it originated, doubtless, in his having decided opinions. The rest may have been an instinct of self-defence, arising from the "ungainly figure," not without a sense of the dignity of his calling. He certainly lost nothing by it, upon the whole. At all events, one is willing to think the best of what is accompanied by so much excellence. Affectation it was not; for nobody despised pretension of any kind more than he did. Johnson was a sort of born bishop in his way, with high judgments and cathedral notions lordling it in his mind; and, ex cathedra, he accordingly spoke.

In Butcher Row, one day, Johnson met, in advanced life, a fellow-collegian, of the name of Edwards, whom he had not seen since they were at the university. Edwards annoyed him by talking of their age. "Don't let us discourage one another," said Johnson. It was this Edwards, a dull but good man, who made that naive remark, which was pronounced by Burke and others to be an excellent trait of character. "You are a philosopher, Dr. Johnson," said he: "I have tried in my time to be a philosopher; but, I don't know how, cheerfulness was always breaking in."†

Before we come to St. Clement's, we arrive, on the left-hand side of the way, at Essex Street; a spot once famous for the residence of the favourite Earl of Essex. We have mentioned an Outer Temple, which originally formed a companion to the Inner and Middle Temples, the whole constituting the tenements of the knights. This Outer Temple stretched beyond Temple Bar into the ground now occupied by Essex Street and Devereux Court; and after being possessed (Dugdale supposes) by the Prior and Canons of the Holy Sepulchre, was transferred by them, in the time of Edward III., to the Bishops of Exeter, who occupied it till the reign of Henry VI., and called it Exeter House. Sir William Paget (afterwards Lord Paget) then had it, and did "re-edify the same," calling it Paget Place. After this it was occupied by the Duke of Norfolk, who was executed for his dealings with Mary, Queen of Scots; then by Dudley, Earl of Leicester, the favourite, who called it Leicester House, and bequeathed it to his "son, Sir Robert," and then by the other favourite, Leicester's son-in-law, Essex, from whom it retained the name of Essex House. It was occasionally tenanted by men of rank till some time after the restoration, when it was pulled down, and the site converted into the present street and court. The only remnant of it supposed to exist is the present Unitarian chapel, which, before it became such, was called Essex House, and latterly contained an auction room.‡

The repose enjoyed in this precinct since the restoration has been like silence after a succession of storms, for the house was of a turbulent reputation. The first bishop who had it after the Templars, being a favourite of Edward II., was seized by the mob, hurried to Cheapside, where they beheaded him, and then carried back a corpse, and buried in a heap of sand at his door. Lord Paget got into trouble, together with his friend the Duke of Somerset, who was accused of intending to assassinate Northumberland and others at this house. Norfolk possessed it

We have been thus minute in tracing the occupancies of this house, from the interest excited by some of the members connected with it. Pennant says, upon the authority of the Sydney Papers, that Leicester bequeathed it to his son-in-law, which appears probable, since the latter possessed it. Perhaps the Herald was confused by the name of Robert, which belonged both to son and son-in-law.

while he formed his designs on Mary, Queen of Scots, for which he was brought to the scaffold; Leicester was always having some ill design or other; perhaps poisoned a visitor or so occasionally (for he thought nothing of that gentle expediency); and Essex made the house famous by standing a siege in it against the troops of his mistress. The siege was not long, nor any of his actions in the business very wise; though he was unquestionably a man of an exalted nature. Essex got into his troubles partly from heat and ambition, partly from the inferior and more cunning nature of some of his rivals at court. There is no doubt that all these causes, together with his confidence in Elizabeth's inability to proceed to extremities, conspired to lead him into rebellion. His first offence, that we hear of, next to a general petulance of manner, which the Queen's own mixture of fondness and petulance was calculated enough to provoke, was a quarrel with some young lords for her favour; the second, his joining the expedition to Cadiz without leave; and the third, his marriage with the daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham; for Elizabeth never thought it proper that her favourites should be married to any thing but her "fair idea."

His next dispute with her, which was on the subject of an assistant in the affairs of Ireland, to which he was going as Lord Deputy, terminated in the singular catastrophe of his receiving from her a box on the ear; with the encouraging addition of bidding him "Go and be hanged." It is said to have been occasioned by his turning his back upon her. He clapped his hand to his sword, and swore he would not have put up with such an insult from Henry VIII. His fall is generally dated from this circumstance, and it is thought he never forgave it. But surely this is not a correct judgment: for the blow which might have been intolerable from the hand of a king, implied, in its very extravagance, something not without flattery and self-abasement from that of a princess. It was as if Elizabeth had put herself into the situation of a termagant wife. The quarrel preceded the violence. Essex went to Ireland against the rebels, but apparently with great unwillingness, calling it in a letter to the queen the "cursest of all islands," and insinuating that the best thing that could happen both to please her and himself was the loss of his life in battle. The conclusion of this letter is a remarkable instance of the mixture of romance with real life in those days. It is in verse, terminating with the following pastoral sentiment. Essex wishes he could live like a hermit "in some unhaunted desert most obscure"

From all society, from love and hate

Of worldly folk; then should he sleep secure.

Then wake again, and yield God every praise,

Content with hips and haws, and bramble-berry;
In contemplation parting out his days,

Aid change of holy thoughts to make him merry.

Who when he dies, his tomb may be a bush,

Where harmless robin dwells with gentle thrush.

Your Majesty's exiled servant,

ROBERT ESSEX.

Think of this, being a letter from a Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to his sovereign! Warton says from the evidence of some sonnets preserved in the British Museum, that although Essex was "an ingenious and elegant writer of prose," he was no poet. There is an ungainliness in the lines we have just quoted, and he was probably too much given to action to be a poet, but there is something in him that relished of the truth and directness of poetry when he had to touch upon any actual emotion. Poetry is nothing but the voluntary power to get at the inner spirit of what is felt, with imagination to embody it. It was supposed that Essex's enemies first got him into the office of Lord Lieutenant, and then took advantage of his impatience under it to ruin him.

HE was accused of tampering with the rebels, and meditating his return into England with the troops under his charge; with a view to which object he is said to have described his army as a force with which he "would make the earth to tremble as he went." He came over, with the passion of an injured man, and presented himself before the queen, who gave him a tolerable reception, but afterwards confined him to the house of the Lord Keeper. It was then, according to his confession before his death, that he first contemplated violent measures, though always short of treason, against the throne. Before his liberation, he was greatly soured by his ineffectual attempts to renew his facility of admission to the presence chamber; and he let fall an expression which his enemies greedily seized at; to wit, that the "Queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was become as crooked as her carcase." This was exactly in his style, which was off-hand and energetic, with a gusto of truth in it. Meantime he began to have his friends about him more than ever, and to affect a necessity for it; and a summons being sent him to attend the council, he was driven by anger and fear to decline it, and to fortify himself in his house. His chief and most generous companion on this occasion was Henry, Earl of Southampton, the friend of Shakspeare. There was some little resistance, and the Lord Keeper, with the Lord Chief Justice and the Earl of Worcester, coming to summon him to his allegiance, he locked them up in a room, on pretence of taking care of their persons, and then sallied through Fleet Street into the city, where he expected a rising in his favour; for he was the most popular noble, perhaps, that England had ever seen; and the city had been disgusted by repeated levies on its purse, under pretence of invasions from Spain; though, according to Essex, Spain had never been so much in favour. The levies, in truth, were made against himself. He was disappointed; heard himself proclaimed a traitor by sound of trumpet in Gracechurch Street, and after a little more scuffling on the part of his adherents, returned by water from Queenhithe, and surrendered himself; being partly moved, he said, by the "cries of ladies." It is clear that he did not know what to be at. He expected, most likely, every moment, that the queen's tenderness would interfere, fearful of seeing her once-beloved favourite in danger. But the Cecils and others aided her good sense in keeping her quiet. Essex had certainly acted in a way incompatible with the duty of a subject, and such as no sovereign could tolerate. He was tried in Westminster Hall, and convicted of an intention to seize the court and the tower, and to surprise the queen in her apartments, and then to summon a parliament for a "redress of grievances;" which, he said, should give his enemies "a fair trial." Southampton was acquitted, no doubt from a sense that he intended nothing but a romantic adherence to his friend.

How a man of Essex's understanding could give into these preposterous attempts, it would be difficult to conceive, if every day's experience did not shew, how powerful a succession of little circumstances is to bring people into situations which themselves might have least looked for. Essex evidently expected pardon to the last. When Lord Grey's name was read over among the peers who were to try him, he smiled and jogged the elbow of Southampton, for offending whom Grey had been punished. He was at his ease throughout the trial. He said to the Attorney General (Coke,) who had told him, in the course of his speech, that he should be "Robert the Last" of an earldom, instead of "Robert the First" of a kingdom,—"Well, Mr. Attorney, I thank God you are not my judge this day, you are so uncharitable."

Coke. "Well, my lord, we shall prove you anon, what you are; which your pride of heart, and aspiring mind, hath brought you unto."

Essex. "Ah, Mr. Attorney, lay your hand upon your heart, and pray to God to forgive us both."

And when sentence was passed, though it is not true that he refused to ask for mercy, for he did it after the best fashion of his style, "kneeling (he said), upon the very knee of his heart," yet he seemed to threaten her, in a tender way, with his resolution to die. She left him, like a politic sovereign, to his fate; but is thought never to have recovered it, as a friend. The romantic story of her visiting the Countess of Nottingham, who had kept back a ring which Essex sent her after his condemnation, of her shaking her on her death-bed, and crying out that "God might forgive, but she could not," is more and more credited as documents transpire. In fact we believe there is no longer any doubt of it. The ring, it is said, had been given to Essex, with a promise that it should serve him in need under any circumstances, if he did but send it. It is supposed that the non-appearance of it hurt the proud heart of Elizabeth, and finally allowed her to let him die. Yet she was a great sovereign, and might have suffered the law to take its course, with whatever sorrow. She was jealous of her reputation with the old and cool-headed lords about her. When the death, however, had taken place, she might have fancied otherwise. Something preyed strongly on her mind towards her decease, which happened within two years after his execution. She refused to go to bed for ten days and nights before her death, lying upon the carpet with cushions about her, and absorbed in the profoundest melancholy. (To be sure, this may have been disease. A princess like Elizabeth, possessed of sovereign power, which had been sharply exercised on some doubtful occasions, might have had misgivings when going to die. Two certain causes of regret she must have had for Essex. She must have been well aware that she had alternately encouraged and irritated him over much; and she must have known, too, that he was a better man than many who assisted in his overthrow, and that if he had been less worthy of regard, he probably would have survived her, as they did.)

It may easily be imagined that Essex was a man for whom a strong affection might be entertained. He excited interest by his character, and could maintain it by his language. In every thing he did there was a certain excess, but on the liberal side. When a youth, he plunged into the depths of rural pleasures and books: he was lavish of his money and good word for his friends: he said every thing that came uppermost, but then it was worth saying, only his enemies were not as well pleased with it as his friends, and they never forgot it: in fine, he was romantic, brave, and impassioned. He is so like a preux chevalier, that till we call to mind other gallant knights who have not been handsome, we are somewhat surprised to hear that he was not well made, and that nothing is said of his face but that it looked reserved,—a seeming anomaly, which deep thought sometimes produces in the countenances or open-hearted men. These were no hindrances, however, to the admiration entertained of him by the ladies; and he was so popular with authors and with the public, that Warton says he could bring evidence of his scarcely ever quitting England or even the metropolis, on the most frivolous enterprise, without a pastoral or other poetical praise of him, which was sold and sung in the streets. He was the friend of Spenser, most likely of Shakspeare too, being the friend of Southampton. Spenser was well acquainted with Essex House. In his 'Prothalamion,' published in 1596, he has left interesting evidence of his having visited Leicester there; and he follows up the record with a panegyric on Leicester's successor, which was probably his first hint to Essex, that he was still in want of such assistance as he had received from his father-in-law. The two passages taken together render the hint rather broad, and such as would make one a little jealous for the dignity of the great poet, were not the manners of that time different in this respect from what they are now. Speaking of the Temple in the lines quoted in our last chapter, he goes on to say,

Next whereunto there stands a stately place,
Where oft I gayned gifts and goodly grace
Of that great lord, which therein wont to dwell.
Whose want too well now feels my friendless case:
But, ah! here fits not well
Olde woes, but ioyes, to tell
Against the bridale daye, which is not long:
Sweet Themmes! runne softly till I end my song.

Yet therein now doth lodge a noble peer,
Great England's glory, and the world's wide wonder,
Whose dreadfull name late through all Spaine did thunder,
And Hercules' two pillars standing near
Did make to quake and feare:
Faire branch of honor, flower of chevalrie!
That fillest England with thy triumph's fame,
Joy have thou of thy noble victorie.

Essex no doubt took the poet at his word, both for his panegyric and his hint: for it was he that gave Spenser his funeral in Westminster, and he was not of a spirit to treat a great poet, as poets have sometimes been treated since,—with neglect in their lifetime, and self-complacent monuments to them after their death.

We shall close this notice (in which we have endeavoured to concentrate all the interest we could), of the once great and applauded Essex, whose memory long retained its popularity, and gave rise to several tragedies, with a letter of his to the Lord Keeper Egerton, in which there is one of his finest sentiments, expressed with his most passionate felicity. Egerton's eldest son had accompanied Essex into Ireland, and died there, which is the subject of the letter. As Spenser's death also happened just before the Earl set out for that country, at a moment when he might have been of political as well as poetical use to him (for Spenser was a politician, and had been employed in the affairs of Ireland), Mr. Todd thinks, that among the friends alluded to, part of the regret may have been for him.

"Whatt can you receive from a cursed country

"Little,"* says Mr. Todd, "did the generous but unfortunate Essex then imagine, that the learned statesman, to whom this letter of condolence was addressed, would be directed very soon afterwards to issue an order for his execution. The original warrant, to which the name of Elizabeth is prefixed, is now in the possession of the Marquis of Stafford; and the queen has written her name, not with the firmness observable in numerous documents existing in the same and other collections, but with apparent tremor and hesitation."

In Essex House was born another Robert, Earl of Essex, son of the preceding, well known in history as general of the Parliament. He was a child when his father died; and was in the hands, first, of his grandmother, Lady Walsingham, and, secondly, of Henry Savile (afterwards Sir Henry), under whose severe discipline he was educated at Eton. We mention these circumstances, because they tended to keep him in that Presbyterian interest, which his father patronised out of a love of toleration and popularity. Perhaps also they did him no good with his wives; for he married two, and was singularly unfortunate in both. To the first, Lady Frances Howard, he was betrothed when a boy. He travelled, returned and married her, with little love on his own side, and none on hers. Her connexion with Car, Earl of Somerset, and all the infamy, crime, and wretchedness it brought upon her, are well known. Her best excuse, which is the ordinary one in cases of great wickedness (and it is a comfort to human nature that it is so) is, that she was a great fool. Her dislike of her first husband was not, perhaps, the least excusable part of her conduct, first, because she was a child like himself when they were betrothed; and secondly, because his second wife appears to have liked him no better. The latter was divorced also. After this, the Earl took to a country retirement, and subsequently to an active part in the Civil Wars, during which, his love of justice, and affability to his inferiors, rendered him extremely popular. He was of equivocal service, however, to the Parliament. He was a better general than a politician, not of a commanding genius in any respect, and was suspected, not without reason, of an overweening desire to accommodate matters too much, partly out of ignorance of what the nature of the quarrel demanded, and partly from an affectation of playing the part of an amicable dictator for his own aggrandizement. So the parliament got rid of him by the famous self-denying ordinance. Clarendon says, that when he resigned his commission, the whole parliament went the day following to Essex House, to return him thanks for his great services; but the latest historian of the Commonwealth, says there is no trace of this compliment on the journals.* Next year they attended him to his grave. Essex's character was a prose-copy of his father's, with the love and romance left out.

Dr. Johnson, the year before he died, founded in Essex Street one of his minor clubs. The Literary Club did not meet often enough for his want of society, was too distant, and perhaps had now become too much for his conversational ambition. He wanted a mixture of inferior intellects to be at ease with. Accordingly, this club, which was held at the Essex Head, then kept by a servant of Mr. Thrale, was of a more miscellaneous nature than the other, and made no pretension to expense. One cannot help smiling at the modest and pensive tone of the letter which Johnson sent to Sir Joshua, inviting him to join it. "The terms are lax, and the expenses light. We meet thrice a-week; and he who misses, forfeits two-pence."† This stretch of philosophy seems to have startled the fashionable painter, who declined to become a member. When we find, however, in the list the names of Brocklesby, Horeley, Daines Barrington, and Windham, Boswell has reason to say that Sir John Hawkins's charge of its being a "low ale-house association," is sufficiently obviated. The club was in existence when Boswell wrote, and went on, he says, happily. Johnson said of him, when he was proposed, "Boswell is a very clubbable man."

In Devereux Court, through which there is a passage round into the Temple, is the Grecian Coffee-house, supposed to be the oldest in London. We should rather say the revival of the oldest, for the premises were burnt down and rebuilt. The Grecian was the house from which Steele proposed to date his learned articles in the Tatler.

In this court are the premises of the eminent tea-dealers, Messrs. Twining, the front of which, surmounted with its stone figures of Chinese, has an elegant appearance in the Strand. We notice the house, not only on this account, but because the family have to boast of a very accomplished scholar, the translator of the Poetics of Aristotle. Mr. Twining was contemporary with Gray and Mason at Cambridge; and besides his acquirements as a linguist (for, in addition to his knowledge of Greek and Latin, he wrote French and Italian with idiomatic accuracy), was a musician so accomplished as to lead the concerts and oratorios that were performed during term time, when Bate played the organ and harpsichord. He was also a lively companion, full of wit and playfulness, yet so able to content himself with country privacy, and so exemplary a clergyman, that for the last forty years of his life he scarcely allowed himself to be absent from his parishioners more than a fortnight in a year.

The church of St. Clement Danes, which unworthily occupies the open part of the Strand, to the west of Essex Street, was the one most frequented by Dr. Johnson. It is not known why this church was called St. Clement Danes. Some think because there was a massacre of the Danes thereabouts; others, because Harold Harefoot was buried there; and others, because the Danes had the quarter given them to live in, when Alfred the Great drove them out of London, the monarch at the same time building the church, in order to assist their conversion to Christianity. The name St. Clement has been derived with probability from the patron saint of Pope Clement III., a great friend of the Templars, to whom the church at one time belonged. St. Clement's was rebuilt towards the end of the century before last, by Edward Pierce, under the direction of Sir Christopher Wren, but is a very incongruous, ungainly edifice. Its best aspect is at night-time in winter, when the deformities of its body are not seen, and the pale steeple rises with a sort of ghastliness of grandeur through the cloudy atmosphere. The chimes may still be heard at midnight, as Falstaff describes having heard them with Justice Shallow. If they did not execute one of Handel's psalm-tunes, we should take them to be the very same he speaks of, and conclude that they had grown hoarse with age and sitting-up; for to our knowledge they have lost some of their notes these twenty years, and the rest are falling away. A steeple should set a better example.

A few years back, when the improvements on the north side, in this quarter, had not been followed by those on the south, Gay's picture of the avenue between the church and the houses was true in all its parts. We remember the "combs dangling in our faces," and almost mourned their loss for the sake of the poet.

"Where the fair columns of St. Clement stand,
Whose straitened bounds encroach upon the Strand;
Where the low penthouse bows the walker's head,
And the rough pavement wounds the yielding tread;
Where not a post protects the narrow space,
And, strung in twines, combs dangle in thy face;
Summon at once thy courage, rouse thy care,
Stand firm, look back, be resolute, beware.
Forth issuing from steep lanes, the collier's steeds
Drag the black load; another cart succeeds;
Team follows team, crowds heaped on crowds appear,
And wait impatient till the road grow clear."

Every body can testify to the truth of this description. A little patience, however, is well repaid by the sight of the noble creatures dragging up the loads. The horses of the colliers and brewers of London are worth notice at all times for the magnificence of their build. Gay proceeds to other particulars, now no longer to be encountered. He cautions you how you lose your sword, and adds a pleasant mode of theft, practised in those times.

"Nor is the flaxen wig with safety worn;
High on the shoulder, in a basket borne,
Lurks the sly boy, whose hands, to rapine bred,
Plucks off the curling honours of thy head."

* Trivia; or the Art of Walking the Streets of London, book iii. Of a similar, and more perplexing facetiousness, was the trick of extracting wigs out of hackney coaches. "The thieves," says the Weekly Journal (March 30, 1717), Clement's Inn is named from the church. The device over the gate, of an anchor and the letter C, is supposed to allude to the martyrdom of St. Clement, who is said to have been tied to an anchor and thrown into the sea, by order of the Emperor Trajan. "The hall is situated on the south side of a neat but small quadrangle. It is a Tuscan diminutive building, with a very large Corinthian door, and arched windows, erected in 1715. Another irregular area is surrounded by convenient houses, in which are the possessor's chambers. Part of this is a pretty garden, with a kneeling African, of considerable merit, supporting a dial, on the eastern side."

In Knox's 'Elegant Extracts' are some lines on this negro, which have often been repeated:

"In vain, poor sable son of woe,
Thou seek'st the tender tear;
For thee in vain with pangs they flow;
For mercy dwells not here.
From cannibals thou fledst in vain;
Lawyers less quarter give;
The first won't eat you till you're slain,
The last will do't alive."

This inn, like all the other inns of court, is of great antiquity. Dugdale states it to have been an inn of Chancery in the reign of Edward II. Some have conjectured, according to Mr. Mosen, "that near this spot stood an inn, as far back as the time of King Ethelred, for the reception of penitents who came to St. Clement's well; that a religious house was in process of time established, and that the church rose in consequence." Be this as it may, the holy brotherhood was probably removed to some other institution; the Holy Lamb, an inn on the west side of the lane, received the guests; and the monastery was converted, or rather perverted, from the purposes of the Gospel to those of the law, and was probably, in this profession, considered as a house of very considerable antiquity in the days of Shakspeare; for he, who with respect to this kind of chronology may be safely quoted, makes, in the second act of Henry IV., one of his justices a member of that society:

"He must to the Inns of Court. I was of Clement's once myself, where they talk of Mad Shallow still."

A pump now covers St. Clement's well. Fitzstephen, in his description of London, in the reign of Henry II., speaks of certain "excellent springs at a small distance" from the city, "whose waters are sweet, salubrious and clear, and whose runnels murmur o'er the shining stones: among these," he continues, "Holywell, Clerkenwell, and St. Clement's well, may be esteemed the principal, as being much the most frequented, both by the scholars from the school (Westminster), and the youth from the city, when on a summer's evening they are disposed to take an airing."

Six hundred years and upwards have elapsed since Fitzstephen wrote. It is pleasant to think that the well has lasted so long, and that the place is still quiet.

The Clare family, who have left their name to Clare Market, appear to have occupied Clement's Inn during part of the reign of the Tudors. From their hands it reverted to those of the law. It is an appendage to the Inner Temple. We are not aware of any greater legal personage having been bred there, than the one just mentioned. Shallow takes delight in his local recollections, particularly of this inn. In one of the masterly scenes of this kind, Falstaff's corroboration of a less pleasant recollection, and Shallow's anger against the cause of it, after such a lapse of time, are very ludicrous.

Shallow. "Oh, Sir John, do you remember since we lay all night in the windmill, in St. George's Fields?"

Fals. "No more of that, good Master Shallow, no more of that."

Shal. "Ha, it was a merry night. And is Jane Nightwork alive?"

"have got such a villainous way now of robbing gentlemen, that they cut holes through the backs of hackney coaches, and take away their wigs, or fine head-dresses of gentlemen; so a gentleman was served last Sunday in Topley Street, and another but last Tuesday in Fenchurch Street; wherefore this may serve as a caution to gentlemen and gentlewomen that ride single in the night-time, to sit on the fore-seat, which will prevent that way of robbing."—Malcolm's Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London during the Eighteenth Century. The sites of Arundel, Norfolk, Surrey, and Howard Streets (the last of which crosses the others), were formerly occupied by the house and grounds originally constituting the town residence of the Bishop of Bath and Wells, then of the Lord High Admiral Seymour, and afterwards of the Howards, Earls of Arundel, from whom it came into possession of the Duke of Norfolk. It was successively called Bath's Inn (Hampton Place, according to some, but we know not why), Seymour Place, Arundel House, and Norfolk House. It was a wide, low house, but, according to Sully, who lodged in it when he was ambassador to James I., very convenient, on account of the multitude of rooms on the same floor.

In this house the Lord High Admiral, Thomas Seymour, brother of the Protector Somerset, in the reign of Edward VI., contrived to place the Princess (afterwards Queen) Elizabeth, with a design of possessing her person, and sharing her succession to the crown. No doubt is entertained of these views by the historians. Elizabeth was not averse to him, though he had lately married the Queen Dowager (Catherine Parr); and some gossiping stories transpired of the evidences of their good will. Catherine's death increased the suspicion, and she herself expressed it on her death-bed. Seymour's ambition, however, shortly brought him to the scaffold, and saved us from a King Thomas I., who would probably, as Pennant thinks, have been a very bad one.

† We have mentioned the Countess of Nottingham who withheld from Elizabeth the ring sent her by Essex. It was in this house she died. Her husband was a Howard, and, probably, she was on a visit there. We take an opportunity therefore of relating the particulars of that romantic story, as collected by the accurate Dr. Birch, and repeated in the Memoirs of the Peers of England during the reign of James I. "The following curious story," says the compiler of this work, "was frequently told by Lady Elizabeth Spelman, great grand-daughter of Sir Robert Carey, brother of Lady Nottingham, and afterwards Earl of Monmouth, whose curious memoirs of himself were published a few years ago by Lord Corke:

"When Catherine, Countess of Nottingham, was dying (as she did according to his lordship's own account, about a fortnight before Queen Elizabeth), she sent to her Majesty to desire that she might see her, in order to reveal something to her Majesty without the discovery of which she could not die in peace. Upon the Queen's coming, Lady Nottingham told her, that, while the Earl of Essex lay under sentence of death, he was desirous of asking her Majesty's mercy, in the manner prescribed by herself, during the height of his favour; the Queen having given him a ring, which being sent to her as a token of his distress, might entitle him to her protection. But the Earl, jealous of those about him, and not caring to trust any of them with it, as he was looking out of his window, one morning, saw a boy, with whose appearance he was pleased; and engaging him by money and promises, directed him to carry the ring, which he took from his finger and threw down, to Lady Scrope, a sister of the Countess of Nottingham, and a friend of his lordship, who attended upon the Queen; and to beg of her that she would present it to her Majesty. The boy, by mistake, carried it to Lady Nottingham, who showed it to her husband, the admiral, an enemy of Lord Essex, in order to take his advice. The admiral forbid her to carry it, or return any answer to the message; but insisted upon her keeping the ring.

"The Countess of Nottingham, having made this discovery, begged the Queen's forgiveness; but her Majesty answered, "God may forgive you, but I never can," and left the room with great emotion. Her mind was so struck with the story that she never went into bed, nor took any sustenance from that instant, for Camden is of opinion, that her chief reason for suffering the Earl to be executed, was his supposed obstinacy in not applying to her for mercy."

In confirmation of the time of the Countess's death," continues the compiler, "it now appears from the parish register of Chelsea, extracted by Mr. Lysons ('Environs of London,' ii. 120), that she died at Arundel House, London, Feb. 25, and was buried the 28th, 1603. Her funeral was kept at Chelsea, March 21; and Queen Elizabeth died three days afterwards."

Clarendon gives a singular character of this house and its master when it was in possession of Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel. He says that the Earl "seemed to live, as it were, in another nation, his house being a place to which all people resorted, who resorted to no other place; strangers, or such as affected to look like strangers, and dressed themselves accordingly. He was willing to be thought a scholar, and to understand the most mysterious parts of antiquity, because he made a wonderful and costly purchase of excellent statues whilst in Italy and in Rome (some whereof he could never obtain permission to remove out of Rome, though he had paid for them), and had a rare collection of medals. As to all parts of learning, he was almost illiterate, and thought 'no other part of history so considerable as what related to his own family, in which, no doubt, there had been some very memorable persons. It cannot be denied that he had in his own person, in his aspect, and countenance, the appearance of a great man, which he preserved in his gait and motion. He wore and affected a habit very different from that of the time, such as men had only beheld in pictures of the most considerable men; all which drew the eyes of most, and the reverence of many, towards him, as the image and representative of the ancient nobility, and native gravity of the nobles, when they had been most venerable; but this was only his outside, his nature and true humour being much disposed to levity and delights, which indeed were very despicable and childish." The marbles here mentioned, now at Oxford, were collected at Arundel House. This character from the pen of Clarendon has been thought too severe. Perhaps the Earl had given the noble historian a repulse when he was nothing but plain Mr. Hyde; for personal jealousies of this sort are apparent in his writings. The last Duke of Norfolk but one, who wrote anecdotes of the Howard family, asks how the man who collected the Oxford marbles could be the slave of such family self-love as Clarendon describes, and how it was that he held the first places in the state, and the most important commissions abroad. It is well known, however, that a man may do all this, and yet be more fortunate than wise. Arundel was certainly proud, if not dull; and the proudest men are not apt to be the brightest. It was he that, in a dispute with Lord Spenser, in the Upper House, when the latter spoke of the treason of the Earl's ancestors, said "My lord, my lord, while my ancestors were plotting treason, yours were keeping sheep." He little thought that his marbles would help to bring about a time, when an historian, by no means indifferent to rank and title, should regard a romantic poem as the "brightest jewel" in the crown of the Spencers, —one certainly that the Howards never could boast.†

At the south-west corner of Norfolk Street lived at one time the famous Penn, who from being a coxcomb in his youth, became a quaker and a founder of a state. However, his coxcombry was a falling off from early seriousness. We shall have a capital story to tell of him when we come to Gracechurch Street. His father was a rough admiral, who could not for the life of him conceive why his son should relapse into a preciseness so unlike the rest of the world, and so unfitted to succeed at court. Voltaire says: that young Penn (for he was little more than twenty years of age) appeared suddenly before his father, in a quaker dress, and, to the old man's astonishment and indignation, said, without moving his hat, "Friend Penn, how dost thee do?" But according to more serious biographers, the change was not so sudden. The hat, however, was a great matter of contention between them, the admiral wishing to stipulate that his son should uncover to the king (Charles II.), the king's brother, and himself; but Penn having recourse to "fasting and supplication," found that his hat was not to be moved. These were the weaknesses of a young enthusiast. His enthusiasm remained for greater purposes; but he is understood to have grown wiser with regard to the rest, though he continued a quaker for life. Penn, though a legislator, never seems to have given up a taste for good living. His appearance in the portraits of him, notwithstanding his garb, is fat and festive; and he died of apoplexy.

Whenever we quote from any authorities but the original, we beg the reader to bear in mind, first, that we always notice our having done so; and secondly, that we make a point of comparing the originals with the report. Both Monmouth and Birch, for example, have been consulted in the present instance.

‡ In the same house, we believe, that had been occupied by Penn,* resided an author who must not be passed over in a work of this kind; to wit, the indefatigable and honest antiquary, Dr. Birch. He came of a Quaker stock. Birch astonished his friends by going a great deal into company; but the secret of his uniting sociality with labour, was his early rising. This, which appears to be one of the main secrets of longevity, ought to have kept him older, for he died at the age of sixty-one: but he was probably festive as well as social, and should have taken more exercise. Being a bad horseman, he was thrown on the Hampstead road, and killed on the spot; but the doctors were uncertain whether apoplexy had not a hand in the disaster. In speaking of Birch, nobody should omit a charming billet, written to him by his first wife, almost in the article of death. The death took place within a year after their marriage, and was accelerated by childbed.

"This day I return you, my dearest life, my sincere hearty thanks for every favour bestowed on your most faithful and obedient wife,

"July 31, 1729.

HANNAH BIRCH."†

In Norfolk Street, for upwards of thirty years, lived Dr. Brocklesby, the friend and physician of Dr. Johnson. Physicians of his class may, par excellence, be styled the friends of men of letters. They partake of their accomplishments, understand their infirmities, sympathize with their zeal to do good, and prolong their lives by the most delicate and disinterested attentions. Between no two professions has a more liberal and cordial intimacy been maintained, than between literature and medicine. Brocklesby was an honour to the highest of his calling. "In the course of his practice," we are told, that "his advice, as well as his purse, was ever accessible to the poor, as well as to men of merit who stood in need of either. Besides giving his advice to the poor of all descriptions, which he did with an active and unwearied benevolence, he had always upon his list two or three poor widows, to whom he granted small annuities; and who, on the quarter-day of receiving their stipends, always partook of the hospitalities of his table. To his relations, who wanted his assistance in their business or professions, he was not only liberal, but so judicious in his liberalities as to supersede the necessity of a repetition of them. To his friend Dr. Johnson (when it was in agitation amongst his friends to procure an enlargement of his pension, the better to enable him to travel for the benefit of his health), he offered an establishment of one hundred pounds per year during his life; and upon Dr. Johnson's declining it (which he did in the most affectionate terms of gratitude and friendship), he made him a second offer of apartments in his own house, for the more immediate benefit of medical advice. To his old and intimate friend Edmund Burke, he had many years back bequeathed by will the sum of one thousand pounds; but recollecting that this event might take place (which it afterwards did) when such a legacy could be of no service to him, he with that judicious liberality for which he was always distinguished, gave it to him in advance, 'ut pignus amicitie:' it was accepted as such by Mr. Burke, accompanied with a letter, which none but a man feeling the grandeur and purity of friendship like him could dictate."‡

If it be dangerous in the present condition of society, to incur pecuniary obligations, particularly for those who are more qualified to think than to act, and who may ultimately startle to find themselves in positions in which they can neither prove the benefit done them, nor the good feelings which allowed them to receive it, nobody can doubt the generosity of such a man as Brocklesby; who, so far from being a mere patron, jealous of being obliged himself, was equally prepared to receive kindness as to shew it. Proposing, just before he died, to go down to Mr. Burke's house at Beaconsfield, and somebody hinting to him the danger of being fatigued, and of lying out of his own bed, he replied with his usual calmness, "My good friend, I perfectly understand your hint, and am thankful to you for it; but where's the difference whether I die at a friend's house, at an inn, or in a postchaise? I hope I am every way prepared for such an event, and perhaps it is as well to elude the expectation of it." This was said like a man, and a friend. Brocklesby was not one who would cumber about giving trouble at such a moment,—the screen of those who hate to be troubled; neither would he grudge a friend the melancholy satisfaction of giving him a bed to die in. He better understood the first principles which give light and life to the world, and left jealousy and misgiving to the vulgar.

Dr. Brocklesby died at his house in the street above mentioned, and was buried in the churchyard Lee was buried, "at St. Clement Danes; probably therefore in the church-yard also. There are now in that spot some trees, by far the best things about the church. The reader may imagine them to shade the places where the poet and the physician lie.

Arundel or Norfolk House, after the great fire, became the temporary place of meeting for the Royal Society, previously to its return to Gresham College. It was pulled down on their leaving it, the century before last, and the streets before mentioned built in its room. They appear to have been favourite places of residence with persons connected with the drama. Congreve lived in Surrey Street, Mountford the player in Norfolk Street, Mrs. Bracegirdle in Howard Street, and Mrs. Barry somewhere near her.

Congreve died where he had lived (Jan. 29, 1728-9), after having been for several years afflicted with blindness and gout; of which, however, he seems to have made the best he could, by the help of good sense and naturally good spirits. If his wits ever failed him, it was in the propensity to a love of rank and fashion, which, in spite of all that he had seen in the world, never forsook him. It originated probably in the need he thought he had of them, when he first set out in life. The finest sense of men of his cast does not rise above a graceful selfishness. It was most probably in Surrey Street (for he had come to the "verge of life"), that he had a visit paid him by Voltaire, who has recorded the disgust given him by an ebullition of his foppery: for the Frenchman had a great admiration of him as a writer. "Congreve spoke of his works," says Voltaire, "as of trifles that were beneath him; and hinted to me, in our first conversation, that I should visit him upon no other foot than upon that of a gentleman, who led a life of plainness and simplicity. I answered, that had he been so unfortunate as to be a mere gentleman, I should never have come to see him; and I was very much disgusted at so unseasonable a piece of vanity." Our readers will admire the fineness of this rebuke.

But the most glaring instance of this propensity was his leaving the bulk of his fortune to a duchess, when he had poor relations in want of it. "Having lain in state," says Johnson, "in the Jerusalem Chamber, he was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a monument is erected to his memory by Henrietta, Duchess of Marlborough, to whom, for reasons either not known or not mentioned, he bequeathed a legacy of about ten thousand pounds, the accumulation of attentive parsimony, which, though to her superfluous and useless, might have given great assistance to the ancient family from which he descended; at that time, by the imprudence of his relation, reduced to difficulties and distress."

"Congreve," says Dr. Young, "was very intimate for years with Mrs. Bracegirdle, who lived in the same street, his house very near her's; until his acquaintance with the young Duchess of Marlborough. He then quitted that house. The duchess shewed me a diamond necklace (which Lady Di. used afterwards to wear), that cost seven thousand pounds, and was purchased with the money Congreve left her. How much better would it have been to have given it to poor Mrs. Bracegirdle!"

Yet this dramatist throughout his life had had the good word of every body. All parties praised him: all parties kept him in office, (he had some places that are said to have produced him twelve hundred a year): Pope dedicated his Iliad to him; called him, after his death, Ultimus Romanorum; and added that "Garth, Vanbrugh, and he were the three most honest-hearted, real good men of the Kit-Kat Club."

The secret of this is, that Congreve loved above all things to be at his ease, and spoke politely of every body. He had a bad opinion of mankind, as we may see by his comedies; and he made the best of it, by conversing with them as if he took heed of their claws. The only person, we believe, that he ever opposed, was Collier, who attacked the stage with more spirit than elegance, and who was at enmity with the whole world of wit and fashion. We are far from thinking with Collier, that the abuses of the stage outweigh the benefit it does to the world; nor do we think the world by any means so bad as Congreve supposed it, nor himself either: but it is useful to know the tendencies of those who have a habit of thinking otherwise.

Congreve's bequest created a good deal of gossip. Curll, the principal scandal-monger of those times, got up a catch-penny life of him, professing to be written by "Charles Wilson, Esq.," but supposed to be the work of Oldmixon. There is no relying upon Charles Wilson; but, from internal evidence, we may take his word occasionally: and we may believe him when he says that the Duchess and her friends were alarmed at the threatened book. The picture which he draws of her manner has also an air like a woman of quality. She had demanded a sight of the documents on which the book was founded; and being refused, asked what authority they had, and what pieces contained in it were genuine. "Upon being civilly told there would be found several essays, letters, and characters of that gentleman's writing," says Mr. Wilson, "she, with a most affected, extraordinary, dramatick drawl, cried out, 'Not one single sheet of paper, I dare to swear.'"[†] Mr. Wilson's own grand air in return is very amusing. He speaks of Arbuthnot's coming with "expresses," probably to Curll's; and adds, that if he be despatched with any more, "he may, if he please, come to me, who am as easily to be found in Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury, when in town, as he is in Burlington Gardens.—Chas. Wilson."

Mr. Wilson's book opens with a copy of the will, in which five hundred pounds are left among the Congreves; about five hundred pounds more to friends and domestics, &c., (not omitting two hundred to Mrs. Bracegirdle); and all the rest, (with power to annul or increase the complimentary part of the legacies) to the Duchess of Marlborough. We know not that any body could have brought forward grounds for objecting to this will, had the Duchess been poor herself; for his relations may or may not have had claims upon him,—relations, as such, not being of necessity friends, though it is generally fit that they should partake of the family prosperity. We except of course a man's immediate kindred, particularly those whom he has brought into the world. But here was a woman rolling in wealth, and relatives neither entirely forgotten, nor yet, it seems, properly assisted. The bequest must, therefore, either have been a mere piece of vanity, or the consequence of habitual subjection to a woman's humours. The Duchess was not ungrateful to his memory. She raised him, as we have seen, a monument; and it is related in Cibber's Lives of the Poets,[§] we know not on what authority, that she missed his company so much, as to cause "an image of him to be placed every day on her toilet-table, to which she would talk as to the living Mr. Congreve, with all the freedom of the most polite and unreserved conversation." There is something very ludicrous in this way of putting a case, which might otherwise be affecting. It is as if there had been a sort of polite mania on both sides.

Congreve's plays are exquisite of their kind, and the excessive heartlessness and duplicity of some of his characters are not to be taken without allowance for the ugly ideal. There is something not natural, both in his characters and wit; and we read him rather to see how entertaining he can make his super-fine ladies and gentlemen, and what a pack of sensual busy-bodies they are, like insects over a pool, than from any true sense of them as "men and women." As a companion he must have been exquisite to a woman of fashion. We can believe that the Duchess, in ignorance of any tragic emotion but what was mixed with his loss, would really talk with a waxen image of him in a peruke, and think the universe contained nothing better. It was carrying wit and politeness beyond the grave. Queen Constance, in Shakspeare, makes grief put on the pretty looks of her lost child: the Duchess of Marlborough made it put on a wig and jaunty air,—such she had given her friend in his monument in Westminster Abbey. No criticism on his plays could be more perfect. Congreve's serious poetry is a refreshment, from its extreme insipidity and common-place. Every body is innocent in some corner of the mind, and has faith in something. Congreve had no faith in his fellow-creatures, but he had a scholar's (not a poet's) belief in nymphs and weeping fauns; and he wrote elegies, full of them, upon queens and marquises. If it be true that he wrote the character of Aspasia (Lady Elizabeth Hastings), in the Tatler, (No. 42), he had indeed faith in something better; for in that paper is not only given an admiring account of a person of very exalted excellence, but the author has said of her one of the finest things that a sincere heart could utter; namely, that "to love her, was a liberal education." We cannot help thinking, however, that the generous and trusting hand of Steele is very visible throughout this portrait; and in the touch just mentioned, in particular.

The engaging manners of Mrs. Bracegirdle gave rise to a tragical circumstance in Howard Street—the death of Mountford, her fellow player. Mrs. Bracegirdle, one of the most popular actresses of that time, was a brunette, not remarkable for her beauty, but so much so for the attractiveness superior to beauty, that Cibber calls her the "darling of the stage," and says it was a kind of fashion for the young men about town to have a tenderness for her. This general regard she preserved by setting a value on herself, not so common with actresses at that time as it has been since. Accordingly, some made honourable proposals, which were then still more remarkable. In Rowe's poems, there is a bantering epistle to an Earl of S—, advising him not to care for what people might think, but pursue his inclinations to that effect. Among others, a Captain Hill made desperate love, professing the same intentions; but he was a man of bad character, and the lady would have nothing to say to him. The Captain, like a proper coxcomb, took it in his head that nothing could have prevented his success, but some other person; and he fixed upon Mountford as the happy man. Mountford was the best lover and finest gentleman then on the stage, as Mrs. Bracegirdle was the most charming heroine; but it does not appear that Hill had any greater ground for his suspicion, than their frequent performance in the same play; which, however, to a jealous man, must have been extremely provoking. They used to act Alexander and Statura together. In Mountford's Alexander, according to Cibber, there were seen, "the great, the tender, the penitent, the despairing, the transported, and the amiable, in the highest perfection;" and "if anything," he said, "could excuse that desperate extravagance of love, that almost frantic passion," it was when Mrs. Bracegirdle was the Statura. Imagine a dark-souled fellow in the pit, thinking himself in love with this Statura, and that the passion between her and the Alexander was real. This play was acted a few nights before the catastrophe which we are about to relate.

Hill was intimate with another man of bad character, Lord Mohun; who agreed to assist him in carrying off Mrs. Bracegirdle. The Captain had often said, that he would be "revenged" upon Mountford; and dining with Lord Mohun on the day when they attempted the execution of their plot, he said further, that he would "stab" him "if he resisted;" upon which Mohun said, that he would "stand by his friend."

Mohun and Hill met at the play-house at six o'clock; changed clothes there, and waited some time for Mrs. Bracegirdle; but not finding her come, they took a coach which they had ordered to be ready, drove towards her lodgings in Howard Street, and then back to Drury Lane, where they directed the coach to stop near Lord Clare's house (by the present Craven Buildings). Mrs. Bracegirdle had been supping at a Mr. Page's, in Princes Street, Drury Lane. She came out, accompanied by her mother, brother, and Mr. Page; and was seized by Hill, who, with the aid of a number of soldiers, endeavoured to place her in the coach. In the coach was Lord Mohun, with seven or eight pistols. Old Mrs. Bracegirdle threw her arms round her daughter's waist; her other friends, and at length the passengers, interfered; and our heroine succeeded in getting into her lodgings in Howard Street, Hill and Mohun following them on foot. When they all came to the door, Hill would have spoken with Page, but the latter refused; and the door was shut. A witness, at the trial of Lord Mohun, deposed, that they knocked several times at the door, and then the Captain entreated to beg pardon of Mrs. Bracegirdle for having affronted her, but in vain.

Hill and Mohun remained in the street. They sent to a tavern for a bottle of wine, and perambulated before the door with drawn swords. Mrs. Browne, the mistress of the house, came out to know what they did there; upon which Hill said that he would light upon Mountford some day or other, and that he would be revenged on him. The people in doors upon this, sent to Mountford's house in Norfolk Street, to inform his wife; and she despatched messengers to all the places where he was likely to be found, to warn him of his danger, but they could not meet with him. Meanwhile the constables and watchmen come up and ask the strangers what they mean. They say they are drinking a bottle of wine. Lord Mohun adds that he is ready to put up his sword: remarking withal, that he is a "peer of the realm." Upon asking why the other gentleman did not put up his, his lordship tells them, that his friend had lost the scabbard. The watchman, like "ancient and quiet watchmen," go away to the tavern to "examine who they are;" and in the meantime Mountford makes his appearance, coming up the street. Mountford lived in Norfolk Street, but he turned out of the path that led to his own house, and was coming towards Mrs. Bracegirdle's,—whether to her house, or to any other, does not appear. By this time two hours had elapsed. Mrs. Browne, who seems to have remained watching at the door, caught sight of Mountford and hastened to warn him how he advanced. She was either not quick enough, or Mountford (which appears most likely) pressed on in spite of what she said; and, according to her statement, the following dialogue took place between him and Lord Mohun.

"Your humble servant, my lord."

"Your servant, Mr. Mountford.—I have a great respect for you, Mr. Mountford, and would have no difference between us; but there is a thing fallen out between Mr. Hill and Mrs. Bracegirdle."

"My lord, has my wife disobliged your lordship if she has, she shall ask your pardon. But Mrs. Bracegirdle is no concern of mine: I know nothing of this matter; I come here by accident. But I hope your lordship will not vindicate Hill in such actions as these are."

Upon this, according to Mrs. Browne's statement, Hill bade Mountford draw; which the other said he would; but whether he received his wound before or after she could not tell, owing to its being nighttime.

Another female witness who lived next door, gives the dialogue as follows. Lord Mohun begins.

"Mr. Mountford, your humble servant. I am glad to see you," (embracing him).

"Who is this? my Lord Mohun?"

"Yes, it is."

"What bringeth your lordship here at this time of night?"

"I suppose you were sent for, Mr. Mountford?"

"No, indeed; I came by chance."

"You have heard of the business of Mrs. Bracegirdle."

Hill (interfering). "Pray, my lord, hold your tongue. This is not a convenient time to discuss this business." (On saying which the witness adds, that he would have drawn Mohun away).

Mountford. "I am very sorry, my lord, to see that your lordship should assist Captain Hill in so ill an action as this: pray let me desire your lordship to forbear."

As soon as he had uttered these words Hill, according to the witness, came up and struck Mountford a box on the ear; upon which the latter demanded with an oath, "what that was for," and then she gives a confused account of the result, which was the receipt of a mortal wound by the poor actor. It was agreed, that Mountford's sword was not drawn in the first instance, and that Hill's was; and the matter was settled by the dying deposition of Mountford, who stated several times over, that Lord Mohun offered him no violence, but that Hill struck him with his left hand, and then ran him through the body, before he had time to draw in defence.

Mountford died next day. Hill fled at the time, and we hear no more of him. Mohun was tried for his life, but acquitted for want of evidence of malice prepense.—The truth is, he was a great fool, and Hill appears to have been another. The Captain himself probably did not know what he intended, though his words would have hung him had he been caught. They were a couple of box-lobby swaggers, who had heated themselves with wine; and Hill, who told the constables "they might knock him down if they liked," and was for drawing Mohun away, on Mountford's appearance, was most likely overcome with rage and jealousy at hearing the latter speak of him with rebuke. Mohun was at that time very young. He never ceased, however, hankering after this sort of excitement to his dullness, till he got killed in a duel, about an estate, with the Duke of Hamilton, who was at the same time mortally wounded. Swift, in a letter about it, calls Mohun a "dog." Pennant says, that when his body was taken home bleeding (to his house in Gerrard Street) Lady Mohun was very angry at its being flung "upon the best bed."*

In front of the spot now occupied by St. Mary-le-Strand, commonly called the New Church, anciently stood a cross, at which, says Stow, "in the year 1394, and other times, the justices itinerant sat without London." In the place of this cross was set up a May-pole, by a blacksmith named John Clarges, whose daughter Ann became the wife of Monk, Duke of Albermarle. It was for a long time in a state of decay, and having been taken down in 1713, a new one was erected opposite Somerset House. This second May-pole had two gilt balls and a vane on the summit and was decorated on holidays with flags and garlands. The races in the 'Dunciad' take place

Where the tall May-pole overlooked the Strand.

It was removed in 1718, probably being thought in the way of the New Church, which was then being finished. Sir Isaac Newton begged it of the parish, and afterwards sent it to the rector of Wanstead, who set it up in Wanstead Park to support the then largest telescope in Europe. The gift of John Clarges came a day too late. In old times, May had been a great holiday in the streets of London. We shall speak further of it when we come to the parish of St. Andrew Undershaft, so called from a May-pole higher than the church. But though the holiday returned with the Restoration, it never properly recovered the disuse occasioned by the civil wars, and the contempt thrown on it by the spirit of puritanism. We gained too many advantages by the thoughtfulness generated in those times, to quarrel with their mistakes; and, have no doubt that the progress of knowledge to which they gave an impulse, will bring back the advantages they omitted by the way.*

The New Church, or more properly the Church of St. Mary-le-Strand, was built by Gibbs, the architect of St. Martin in the Fields. It was one of the "fifty," improperly so called, that are said to have been built in the reign of Queen Anne, for, though fifty were ordered, the number was not completed. The old church in this quarter which stood at a little distance to the south was removed by the Protector Somerset, to make way for Somerset House, and has never been restored. The parishioners went to the neighbouring churches. The New Church is in the pretty, over-ornamented style, very different from that of St. Martin's, with its noble front, and though far better than St. Clement's, and as superior to many places of worship built lately, as art is superior to ignorance, yet is surely not worthy of its advantageous situation. It is one of those toys of architecture, which have been said to require glass cases. For the superfluous height of the steeple Gibbs offered an excuse. A column was to have been erected near the church in honor of Queen Anne, but as the Queen died, she was no longer thought deserving the column, and the architect was ordered to make a steeple with the materials, whereas he had intended only a belfry. Now, to render the steeple fitting, the church should have had a wider base; but the structure was already begun, and there was no changing the plan of it. It might be still argued, that the steeple should not have been made so high; but then what was to be done with the stones? This, in the mouth of parish virtue, was a triumphant reply. After all, however, the artist need not have spoilt his church with ornament. He said, that being situated in a very public place, "the parishioners" spared no cost to beautify it; but to beautify a church is not to make it a piece of confectionery.†

Somerset House occupies the site of a princely mansion, built by Somerset the Protector, brother of Lady Jane Seymour, and uncle to King Edward VI. His character is not sufficiently marked to give any additional interest to the spot. He was great by accident; lost and gained his greatness, according as others acted upon it; and ultimately resigned it on the scaffold. The house he left became the property of the crown, and was successively in possession of Queen Elizabeth, and of the queens of James I. Charles I. and Charles II. A few pages onward is a print of it, as it appeared during the reign of the last of these princes.

The rooms in this house witnessed many joyous scenes, and many anxious ones. Somerset had not long inhabited it when he was taken to the scaffold. Elizabeth, in her wise economy, lent it to her cousin Lord Hunsdon, whom she frequently visited within its walls.

During its occupation by James's queen, Anne of Denmark (from whose family it was called Denmark House), Wilson says that a constant masquerade was going on, the queen and her ladies, "like so many sea-nymphs, or nereides," appearing in various dresses, "to the ravishment of the beholders."‡

Here began the struggle for mastery between Charles I. and Henrietta Maria, which terminated in favour of the latter, though the king behaved himself manfully at first. Henrietta had brought over

* "Captain Bally, said to have accompanied Raleigh in his last expedition to Guiana, employed four hackney coaches, with drivers in liveries, to ply at the May-pole in the Strand, fixing his own rates, about the year 1634. Bally's coaches seem to have been the first of what are now called hackney-coaches; a term at that time applied indiscriminately to all coaches let for hire."—The favourite Buckingham, about the year 1619, introduced the sedan. The post-chaise invented in France, was introduced by Mr. Tull, son of the well-known writer on husbandry. The stage first came in about the year 1775; and mail-coaches appeared in 1780.—See a note to the Tatler, as above, vol. iv. p. 415.

† The faults of the New church are, that it is too small for the steeple; that it is divided into two stories, which make it still smaller; that the entablature on the north and south parts is too frequently interrupted; that pediments are "affectedly put over each projection;" in a word, that a little object is cut up into too many little parts, and rendered fantastic with embellishment. See the opinions of Gwynn, Ralph, and Malton, quoted in Brayley's London and Middlesex, vol. iv. p. 199.

with her a meddling French household, which after repeated grievances, his Majesty was obliged to send "packing." He summoned them all together one evening in the house, and addressed them as follows:

"Gentlemen and Ladies,

"I am driven to that extremity, as I am personally come to acquaint you, that I very earnestly desire your return into France. True it is, the deportment of some amongst you hath been very inoffensive to me; but others again have so dallied with my patience, and so highly affronted me, as I cannot, and will not, longer endure it."

"The King's address implicating no one, was immediately followed by a volley of protestations of innocence. An hour after he had delivered his commands, Lord Conway announced to the foreigners, that early in the morning carriages and carts and horses would be ready for them and their baggage. Amidst a scene of confusion, the young bishop (he was scarcely of age) protested that this was impossible; that they owed debts in London, and that much was due to them. On the following day, the Procureur-General of the Queen flew to the Keeper of the great Seal at the Privy Council, requiring an admission to address his Majesty, then present at his Council, on matters important to himself and the Queen. This being denied, he exhorted them to maintain the Queen in all her royal prerogatives; and he was answered, 'So we do.'

"Their prayers and disputes served to postpone their departure. Their conduct during this time was not very decorous. It appears, by a contemporary letter-writer, that they flew to take possession of the Queen's wardrobe and jewels. They did not leave her a change of linen, since it was with difficulty her Majesty procured one. Every one now looked to lay his hand on what he might call his own. Everything he could touch was a perquisite. One extraordinary expedient was that of inventing bills to the amount of ten thousand pounds, for articles and other engagements in which they had entered for the service of the Queen, which her Majesty acknowledged but afterwards confessed that the debts were fictitious."

"In truth," continues the writer, "the breaking up of this French establishment was ruinous to the individuals who had purchased their places at the rate of life annuities." Charles now grew indignant and sent the following letter to Buckingham:

'Steenie,†

'I have received your letter by Dic Greame (Sir Richard Grahame). This is my answer: I command you to send all the French away to-morrow out of the town, if you can by fair means (but strike not long in disputing), otherways force them away, dryv-ing them away lyke so manie wilde beastes, until ye have shipped them, and so the devil goe with them. Let me heare no answer, but of the performance of my command. So I rest

'Your faithful, constant, loving friend,

'C. R.'‡

'Oaking,

The Seventh of August, 1626.'

"This order put an end to the delay, but the King paid the debts, the fictitious ones and all,—at the cost, as it appears, of fifty thousand pounds. Even the haughty beauty, Madame St. George, was presented by the king on her dismissal with several thousand pounds and jewels."

Still the French could not go quietly. "The French bishop," says D'Israeli, "and the whole party having contrived all sorts of delays, to avoid the expulsion, the yeomen of the guard was sent to turn them out of Somerset House, whence the juvenile prelate, at the same time making his protest and mounting the steps of the coach, took his departure 'head and shoulders.' In a long procession of near forty coaches, after four days tedious travelling, they reached Dover; but the spectacle of these impatient foreigners, so reluctantly quitting England, gesticulating their sorrows, or their quarrels, exposed them to the derision and stirred up the prejudices of the common people. As Madame St. George, whose vivacity is always described as extremely French, was stepping into the boat, one of the mob could not resist the satisfaction of flinging a stone at her French cap. An English courtier, who was conducting her, instantly quitted his charge, ran the fellow through the body, and quietly returned to the boat. The man died on the spot, but no further notice appears to have been taken of the inconsiderate gallantry of the English courtier."

Henrietta had a magnificent Catholic chapel in Somerset House, and a cloister of capuchins. The former has given occasion to some interesting descriptions of pupal shed and spectacle in the commentaries just quoted.*

Cromwell's body lay in state at Somerset House, as Monk's did afterwards, probably on that account.

Pepys, the prince of gossips, gives an edifying picture of the presence chamber in this palace, when the queens of the two Charleses were there together, a little after the Restoration: "Meeting Mr. Pierce the chyrurgeon," says he, "he took me into Somerset House; and there carried me into the queene-mother's presence chamber, where she was with our own queene sitting on her left hand, whom I did never see before, and though she be not very charming, yet she hath a good, modest, and innocent look, which is pleasing. Here I also saw Madame Castlemaine; and which pleased me most, Mr. Crofts, the king's bastard, a most pretty spark of about fifteen years old, who, I perceive, do hang much upon my Lady Castlemaine, and is always with her; and, I hear, the queenees both are mighty kind to him. By and by, in comes the king, and anon the duke and his duchesse; so that they being all together, was such a sight, as I never could almost have happened to see, with so much ease and leisure. They staid till it was dark and then went away; the king and his queene, and my Lady Castlemaine and young Crofts, in one coach, and the rest in other coaches. Here were great stores of great ladies, but very few handsome. The king and queene were very merry; and they would have made the queene-mother believe that his queene was with child, and said that she said so, and the young queene answered, 'you lye,' which was the first English word that I ever heard her say: which made the king good sport; and he would have made her say in English, 'Confess and be hanged.'"

After this we shall not wonder at the following:—

"30th (Dec. 1662). Visited Mrs. Ferrer and staid talking with her a good while, there being a little proud, ugly, talking little lady there, that was much crying up the queene-mother's court at Somerset House above our own queen's; there being before her no allowance of laughing and the mirth that is at others; and, indeed, it is observed that the greatest court now-a-days is there."§

There is a well-known engraving of Old Somerset House, as it appeared in the reign of Charles II., taken from a scarce one by Hollar. The towers in the back ground mark out the front in the Strand, and the tall may-pole to the right is the may-pole of John Clarges. The front, looking on the river, was added by Charles II. Inigo Jones was the architect. It gives us a taste of the banquetting room at Whitehall in its elevation, and in the harmonies of the windows and pilasters. Below is a portico; and there is another to the right. The chapel, with its inclosure to the left, was the Catholic one; the houses by it, the cloisters of the Capuchins. There is a figure walking in the chapel garden, whom by his gesticulating arm, we may imagine the queen's confessor, studying his to-morrow's sermon, or thinking how he shall get the start of the king's chaplain in saying grace. A curious scene of this kind is worth extracting. "Once," Mr. D'Israeli informs us, "when the king and queen were dining together in the presence, Hacket being to say grace, the queen's confessor would have anticipated him, and an indecorous race was ran between the Catholic priest and the Protestant chaplain, till the latter shoved him aside, and the king pulling the dishes to him, the carvers performed their office. Still the confessor standing by the queen was on the watch to be before Hacket for the after grace, but Hacket again got the start. The confessor, however, resounded the grace louder than the chaplain, and the king, in great passion, instantly rose, taking the queen by the hand." The bowling-green that we read of is probably between the two rows of trees to the right, in front of the right portico, (the left, if considered from the house). The garden is in the most formal style of the parterre, where —Each alley has his brother,

And half the platform just reflects the other;

a style, however, not without its merits, particularly in admitting so many walks among the flowers, and inviting a pace up and down between the trees. Milton, though he made a different garden for his Eden, spoke of 'trim gardens,' as enjoyed by 'retired leisure.' In this back front were the apartments of the court. The scene we have just been reading in Pepys, must have passed in one of them. Here Charles the First's widow lived with her supposed husband, the Earl of St. Albans; though she was not so constant to the place as Waller prophesied she would be. She had been used to too much power as a queen, and found she had too little as a dowager. Poor Katharine remained as long as she could. She lived here till she returned to Portugal, in the reign of William III. Speaking of Waller, we must not quit the premises without noticing a catastrophe that befel him at the water-gate, or Somerset-stairs, (also, by the way, the work of Inigo Jones). Waller, according to Aubrey, had but "a tender weak body, but was always very temperate."¶ — (we know not who this is) "made him damnable drunk at Somerset House, where at the water-stayres, he fell down, and had a cruel fall. 'Twas a pity to lose such a sweet swan so inhumanly." Waller, who, notwithstanding his weak body, lived to be old, was a water-drinker; but he had a poet's wine in his veins, and was excellent company. Saville said, "that nobody should keep him company without drinking, but Ned Waller."

Subsequently to Catharine's departure, Old Somerset House was chiefly used as a residence for princes from other countries, when on a visit. It was pulled down towards the end of the last century, and the present structure erected by Sir William Chambers, but left unfinished. The unfinished part, which is towards the east, is now in a state of completion, as the King's College. The only memorial remaining of the old palace and its outhouses, is in the wall of a house opposite the office of the Mirror, where the sign of a Lion (as that publication observes) still survives a number of other signs, noticed in a list made at the time, and common, at that period, to houses of all descriptions.

The area of New Somerset House occupies a large space of ground, the basement of the back-front being in the river. Three sides of it are appropriated to a variety of public offices, connected with trade, commerce, and civil economy; and the front is dignified by the occupancy of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and the Royal Academy of Painting. The structure was an ambitious one on the part of the architect, and upon the whole is elegant, but timid. There is a look of fragility in it. It has the extent, but not the majesty, of a national emporium. Rules are violated in some instances for the sake of trifles, as is the case of pillars "standing on nothing and supporting nothing;" and in others, it would seem, out of a dread of the result, as in the instance of the huge basement over the water, supporting a cupola which is petty in the comparison. Sir William did well in wishing to have an imposing front towards the river; but he might have had another towards the Strand, certainly nobler than the present one. The lower part is nothing better than a pillared coachway. However, the front of the story is, perhaps, the best part of the whole building. It presents a graceful harmony in the proportions, a fair lodging for the Arts and Philosophy, whose offices occupy the interior.

The Royal Society, which originated in the college rooms of Dr. Wilkins, afterwards Bishop of Chester, met, when it was incorporated, at Old Gresham College in Aldersgate Street; then at Arundel House (on account of the fire); then returned to Gresham College; and after a variety of other experiments upon lodging, was settled by the late king in New Somerset House. This society, on its foundation, was much ridiculed by the wits. Though its ends were great, it naturally busied itself with little things; pragmatism and pedantic persons, naturally enough, got mixed up with it; some of its members had foibles of enthusiasm and pedantry, which were easily confounded with their capacities; and the jokes were most likely encouraged by the king (Charles II.), who, though fond of scientific experiments, and wearing a grave face in presence of the learned body (of which he declared himself a member), was not a man to forego such an opportunity of jesting. Wilkins wrote a book to shew that a man might go to the moon; and the ethical common-places of Boyle (who was as great a natural philosopher, as he was a poor moralist) were the origia of Swift's essay on the Critical Faculties of the Mind. Then there was the good Evelyn with his hard words, wondering sentimentally at every thing; and jolly Pepys, marvelling like Sancho Panza. The readers of Pepys's Diary have been surprised at his not liking Hudibras. Perhaps one reason was, that Butler was the greatest of the jesters against the Society. It is impossible not to laugh at the jokes, in which he charges them with attempting to "Search the moon by her own light;

To take an inventory of all,
Her real estate and personal;—
To measure wind, and weigh the air,
And turn a circle to a square;
And in the braying of an ass,
Find out the treble and the bass;
If mares neigh alto, and a cow
In double diapason low."*

Evelyn got angry, and pretended to be calm. Cowley expressed his anger with a generous indignation. The following passage in his Ode to the Society concludes with a fine, appropriate simile. "Mischief and true dishonour," says he,

"fall on those
Who would to laughter and to scorn expose
So virtuous and so noble a design,
So human for its use, for knowledge so divine.
The things which these proud men despise and call Impertinent, and vain, and small,
Those smallest things of Nature let me know,
Rather than all their greatest actions do!
Whoever would deposed Truth advance
Into the throne usurped from it,"
Must feel at first the blows of Ignorance,
And the sharp points of envious Wit.
So when by various turns of the celestial dance,
In many thousand years
A star, so long unknown, appears,
Though Heaven itself more beautiful by it grow,
It troubles and alarms the world below,
Does to the wise a star, to fools a meteor, show."†

Perhaps a part of the jealousy against the Royal Society arose from a notion which has since become not uncommon; that bodies of this nature, incorporated by kings, are calculated, ultimately, rather to limit inquiry, than to enlarge it. Without stopping to discuss this point, we shall merely observe, that the real greatness of all such bodies, like those of nations themselves, must arise from the greatness of individuals; and that whether the bodies give any lustre to them or not, there is no denying that the individuals give lustre to the bodies. When Sir Isaac Newton became president, all jesting ceased.

It is pleasant to think, while passing Somerset House, in the midst of the noise of a great thoroughfare, that philosophical speculation is, perhaps, going on within those graceful walls; that in the midst of all sorts of new things, sight is not lost of the venerable beauties of old; and that art, as well as philosophy, is considering what it shall do for our use and entertainment. The Antiquarian Society originated as far back as the sixteenth century (about the year 1580), and held its first sittings in a room in the Herald's College; but it did not receive a charter till the year 1751. Neither Elizabeth nor James would give it one, fearful, perhaps, of bringing up discussions on matters connected with politics and religion. Elizabeth has now become one of the most interesting of its heroines. There is no society, we think, more likely to increase with age, and to outgrow half-witted objection. The growth of time adds daily to its stock; and as reflecting men become interested in behalf of ages to come, they naturally turn with double sympathy towards the periods that have gone by, and to the multitudes of beating hearts that have become dust. We should like to see the society in a venerable building of its own, raised in some quiet spot, with trees about it, and painted windows, reflecting light through old heraldry.

The Royal Academy of Painters first met in Saint Martin's Lane, under the title of the Society of Artists of Great Britain. They had a division among them, which gave rise to the establishment as it now stands; and are a flourishing body, we believe, in point of funds. Of the deceased members who have done them honour, we shall speak when we come to their abodes.

The Turk's Head Coffee-house, near Somerset House, was frequented by Dr. Johnson.

In a lodging opposite Somerset House, died the facetious Dr. King, whom we have mentioned in speaking of Doctor's Commons. He had been residing in the house of a friend in the garden-grounds between Lambeth and Vauxhall, where he stuck so close to his books and bottle, that he began to decline with the autumn, and shut himself up from his nearest friends. Lord Clarendon, who resided in Somerset House, and was his relation, sent his sister to fetch him to a lodging he had prepared for him over the way, where he died before the lapse of many hours, while all the world were busy with the meats and mince-pies he had so often celebrated; for it was Christmas-day. Dr. King was the author of an Art of Cookery, in which he pleasantly bantered a learned Kitchen-er of his time, though no man had a livelier relish of their subjects than he. But he wished the relish to be lively in others. At least, he wished them to be leviter in modo, if graviter in re. Though occasionally coarse, he had the right stile of banter, and was of use to the Tories. In return, they would have been of use to him, if his habits would have let them. Swift procured him the place of Gazetteer; but he soon got rid of it.

We shall notice Waterloo Bridge among the others in a general survey of the river. The precinct called the Savoy, of the old state of which nothing remains but the stout little church, (and this is to make way for the communication with the new bridge), was anciently the seat of Peter, Earl of Savoy, who came into England to visit his niece Eleanor, Queen to Henry III. It is not known whether the house was built or appointed for him, but on his death it became the property of the Queen, who gave it to her second son Edmund, afterwards Earl of Lancaster; and from his time the Savoy was reckoned part and parcel of the earldom and honour of Lancaster, afterwards the Duchy. Henry VII. converted the palace into an hospital for the poor; and it remained so till the time of Charles II.; though the master and other officers, by an abuse which grew into a custom, appear to have had no regular inmates, except themselves. The poor were to apply, as it might happen; and what they got, depended on the generosity of the master. In answer to a question put by government in the reign of Queen Anne, it was stated by the lawyer and four chaplains, that "the statutes relating to the reception of the poor had not been observed within the memory of man."‡ Charles II. put wounded soldiers and sailors into the hospital; and since his time, it appears to have been used for the reception of soldiers and prisoners. Latterly, it was a prison for deserters.

The Savoy was the scene of a conference in Charles II.'s reign, between the church and the Presbyterians, in which possession was proved to be nine points of the gospel, as well as law. The Presbyterians thought so when it was their turn to rule, and would have thought so again; and the progress of genuine Christianity has been a gainer by the mild sway of the Church of England.

In the chapel was buried old Gawen Douglas, the Chaucer of Scotland; and Anne Killegrew, celebrated by Dryden's Ode for her poetry and painting. She was the daughter of one of the masters, Dr. Henry Killegrew, brother of the famous jester, and himself a man of talent.

Mrs. Anne Killegrew,

A grace for beauty, and a muse for wit, had probably the honour, some day, of dining with her washerwoman's daughter, in the guise of Duchess of Albemarle; for John Clarges, the blacksmith, who lived in the Savoy, had a wife who was a washerwoman, and the washerwoman had a daughter, who took linen to Monk, when he was in the Tower, and married him. It is not commonly known that the validity of this marriage was contested. Upon the trial of an action at law between the representatives of Monk and Clarges, some curious particulars, says an article in the Gentleman's Magazine, came out respecting the family of the duchess. "It appeared, that she was daughter of John Clarges, a farrier, in the Savoy, and farrier to Colonel Monk, in 1632. She was married in the church of St. Lawrence Pountney, to Thomas Ratford, son of Thomas Ratford, late a farrier, servant to Prince Charles, and resident in the Mews. She had a daughter who was born in 1634, and died in 1638." Her husband and she "lived at the Three Spanish Gypsies, in the New Exchange, and sold wash-balls, powder, gloves, and such things, and she taught girls plain work. About 1647, she, being a sempstress to Colonel Monk, used to carry him linen." In 1648 her father and mother died. In 1649, she and her husband "fell out and parted." But no certificate from any parish register appears, reciting his burial. In 1652, she was married in the church of St. George, Southwark, to 'General George Monk;' and in the following year was delivered of a son, Christopher, (afterwards the second and last Duke of Albemarle), who was suckled by Honour Mills, who sold apples, herbs, oysters, &c. One of the plaintiff's witnesses swore, "that a little before the sickness, Thomas Ratford demanded and received of him the sum of twenty shillings; that his wife saw Ratford again after the sickness, and a second time after the Duke and Duchess of Albemarle were dead." A woman swore, "she saw him on the day his wife (then called Duchess of Albemarle) was put into her coffin, which was after the death of the duke her second husband, who died the 3d of January, 1669-70." And a third witness swore, that "he saw Ratford about July 1660." In opposition to this evidence, it was alleged, that "all along, during the lives of Duke George and Duke Christopher, this matter was never questioned," that the latter was universally received as only son of the former, and that "this matter had been thrice before tried at the bar of the King's Bench, and the defendant had three verdicts." A witness swore that he owed Ratford five or six pounds, which he had never demanded. And a man, who had married a cousin to the Duke of Albemarle, had been told by his wife, that Ratford died five or six years before the duke married. Lord Chief Justice Holt told the jury, "If you are certain that Duke Christopher was born while Thomas Ratford was living, you must find for the plaintiff.—If you believe he was born after Ratford was dead, or that nothing appears what became of him after Duke George married his wife, you must find for the defendant." A verdict was given for the defendant, who was only son to Sir Thomas Clarges, knight, brother to the illustrious duchess in question, who was created a baronet, October 30, 1674, and was ancestor to the baronets of his name."§

¶ It does not appear on which of these accounts the jury found a verdict for the defendant,—whether because Ratford was dead, or because nothing had been heard of him; so that the duchess, after all, might have been no duchess. However, she carried it with as high a hand as if she had never been anything else, and Monk had been a blacksmith. There are some amusing notices of her in Pepys.

"8th (March, 1661-2). At noon, Sir W. Batten, Col. Slingsby, and I, by coach to the Tower, to Sir John Robinson's, to dinner, where great good cheer. High company and among others the Duchess of Albemarle, who is ever a plain homely dowdy."†

"9th (Dec. 1665). My Lord Brouncker and I dined with the Duke of Albemarle. At table the duchess, a very ill-looking woman, complaining of her lord's going to sea next year, said these cursed words:—"If my lord had been a coward, he had gone to sea no more: it may be then he might have been excused, and made an ambassador," (meaning my Lord Sandwich). This made me mad, and I believe she perceived my countenance change, and blushed herself very much. I was in hopes others had not minded it, but my Lord Brouncker, after we came away, took notice of the words to me with displeasure."‡

Lord Sandwich, the famous admiral, who has such light repute with posterity, was a relation of Pepys, and much connected with him in affairs. There does not appear to have been the least foundation for the duchess's charge; except, perhaps, that Sandwich had brains enough to know the danger which he braved, while Monk knew nothing but how to fight and lie.

"4th (Nov. 1666). Pepys says, that Mr. Cooling tells him, the Duke of Albemarle is grown a drunken sot, and drinks with nobody but Troutbecke, whom nobody else will keep company with. Of whom he told me this story; that once the Duke of Albemarle in his drink taking notice, as of a wonder, that Nan Hide should ever come to be Duchess of York: 'Nay,' says Troutbecke, 'n'eer wonder at that, for if you will give me another bottle of wine, I will tell you a great, if not greater, miracle.' And what was that, but that our dirty Besse (meaning his duchesse) should come to be Duchesse of Albemarle."*

"4th (April, 1667). I find the Duke of Albemarle at dinner with sorry company, some of his officers of the army; dirty dishes and a nasty wife at table, and bad meat, of which I made but an ill dinner. Colonel Howard asking how the Prince (Rupert) did (in the last fight), the Duke of Albemarle answering, 'Pretty well,' the other replied, 'But not so well as to go to sea again.'—'How!' says the Duchess, 'what should he go for, if he were well, for there are no ships for him to command? And so you have brought your hogs to a fair market,' said she."†

"29th (March 1667-8). I do hear by several, that Sir W. Pen's going to sea do dislike the Parliament mightily, and that they have revived the Committee of Miscarriages, to find something to prevent it; and that he being the other day with the Duke of Albemarle, to ask his opinion touching his going to sea, the duchesse overheard and came into him; and asked W. Pen how he durst have the confidence to go to sea again to the endangering of the nation, when he knew himself such a coward as he was; which, if true, is very severe."‡

The habit of charging cowardice against the first officers of the time, which was not confined to the duchess, is characteristic of the grossness of that period, the refinements of which were entirely artificial and modish. No people talked or acted more grossly than the finest gentlemen of the day, or believed more ill of one another; and it was not to be expected that the uneducated should be behind-hand with them.

The Duchess of Albemarle is supposed to have had a considerable hand in the Restoration. She was a great loyalist, and Monk was afraid of her; so that it is likely enough she influenced his gross understanding, when it did not exactly know what to be at. Aubrey says, that her mother was one of the "five women barbers." How these awful personages came up, we know not,—but he has quoted a ballad upon them:—

'Did you ever hear the like,
Or ever hear the fame,
Of five women barbers,
That lived in Drury Lane?'

After all, the father, John Clarges, must have been a man of substance in his trade, to be enabled to set up the enormous May-pole which we see in the picture. But this did not prevent the daughter from growing up vulgar and foul-mouthed, and a very different person from the Belles Ferronières of old.

The Savoy, on the one side, with its Gothic gate and flint wall, and the splendid mansion called Exeter House on the other, appear in former times to have narrowed the highway hereabouts, as much as Exeter 'Change did lately.

At the corner of Beaufort Buildings, on the spot, we believe, now occupied by Mr. Ackermann, flourished Mr. Lillie, the perfumer so often mentioned in the Tatler. He was secretary to Mr. Bickerstaff's Court of Honour, in Shire Lane, where people had actions brought against them for pulling out their watches while their superiors were talking; and for brushing feathers off a gentleman's coat with a cane "value fivepence." Lillie published two volumes of Contributions, of which the Tatler had made no use. We believe they had no merit. In Beaufort Buildings lived Aaron Hill, and at one time Fielding; but as we recollect no other memorial of him, connected with the place, we shall speak of him elsewhere.

Southampton Street, a little to the west, on the other side of the way, has been much inhabited by wits and theatrical people. Congreve once lived there, Mrs. Bracegirdle, and Garrick. Of places connected with it, we shall speak when we come to Covent Garden. It was called Southampton Street from the noble family of that title, who are allied to the Bedford family, the proprietors.

On the ground of Cecil and Salisbury Streets, opposite Southampton Street, stood the mansion of Robert Cecil, first Earl of Salisbury, the cunning son of a wise father. It was he who, contriving to keep up to the last his interest with Queen Elizabeth, and to oust his rivals, Essex and others; was the first to make secret terms with her successor James, and to prepare the way for his reception in England: of which perhaps Elizabeth was aware, when she lay moaning on the ground for her favourite.

Where the Adelphi now stands, was Durham Place, originally a palace of the Bishops of Durham, who resigned it to Henry VIII. Henry made it the scene of magnificent tournaments, a species of entertainment which we shall describe in another place. The Lord High Admiral Seymour caused the Mint to be established in this house, with a view to coin money for his designs on the throne. It was afterwards inhabited by Dudley, Earl of Northumberland, who here married his son to Lady Jane Grey. But its most illustrious tenant was Raleigh, to whom it was lent by Queen Elizabeth, and who lived in it during the attempt made at Essex House. The four turrets of the mansion, under the roof of which lived and speculated that romantic but equivocal person, have been marked out in an engraving from Hollar. Durham Place, though it got into royal hands during the fluctuation of religious opinions, never seems to have been reckoned out of the pale of the bishopric of Durham; for Lord Pembroke bought it of that see in 1640, and pulled it down for the erection of houses on its site. "Be it known," says the lively Pennant, speaking of the word 'place,' as applied to great mansions, and interpreted by him to mean palace, "that the word is only applicable to the habitations of princes, or princely persons, and that is with all the impropriety of vanity bestowed on the houses of those who have luckily acquired money enough to pile on one another a greater quantity of stones or bricks than their neighbours. How many imaginary parks have been formed within precincts where deer were never seen! And how many houses misnamed halls, which never had attached to them the privilege of a manor."*

This is true; but unless the words palazzo, and piazza, are traceable to the same root, Palatium, (as perhaps they are), place does not of necessity mean palace; and palace certainly does not mean exclusively the habitation of princes or princely persons, (that is to say, supposing princeliness to exclude riches), for in Italy, whence it comes, any large mansion may be called a palace; and many old palaces there were built by merchants. Palatium, it is true, with the old Romans, though it may have originally meant any house on Mount Palatine, yet in consequence of that place becoming the court end of the city, and containing the imperial palace, may have come ultimately to mean only a princely residence. Ovid uses it in that sense in his Metamorphoses.† But custom is everything in these matters. Place is now used as a variety of term, either for a large house or street. Perhaps in both cases it ought to imply something of the look of a palace, or at least an openness of aspect analogous to that of a square, Square in England, corresponding with place, piazza, and plaza, on the continent. The Piazza in Covent Garden, properly means the place itself, and not the portico.

"To the north of Durham place, fronting the street," says Pennant, "stood the New Exchange, which was built under the auspices of our monarch, in 1608, out of the rubbish of the old stables of Durham House. The king, queen, and royal family, honoured the opening with their presence, and named it Britaine's Bourse. It was built somewhat on the model of the Royal Exchange, with cellars beneath, a walk above, and rows of shops over that, filled chiefly with milliners, sempstresses, and the like. This was a fashionable place of resort. In 1654, a fatal affair happened here. Mr. Gerard, a young gentleman, at that time engaged in a plot against Cromwell, was amusing himself in a walk beneath, when he was insulted by Don Pantaleon de Saa, brother to the Ambassador of Portugal, who, disliking the return he met with, determined on revenge. He came there the next day with a set of bravos, who, mistaking another gentleman for Mr. Gerard, instantly put him to death, as he was walking with his sister in one hand and his mistress in the other. Don Pantaleon was tried, and with impartial justice condemned to the axe. Mr. Gerard, who about the same time was detected in the conspiracy, was likewise condemned to die. By singular chance both the rivals suffered on the scaffold, within a few hours of each other: Mr. Gerard with intrepid dignity; the Portuguese with all the pusillanimity of an assassin.

"Above stairs," continues Pennant, "sat, in the character of a milliner, the reduced Duchess of Tyrconnel, wife to Richard Talbot, Lord Deputy of Ireland under James II.; a bigoted Papist, and fit instrument of the designs of the infatuated prince, who had created him Earl before his abdication, and after that, Duke of Tyrconnel. A female, suspected to have been his duchess, after his death, supported herself for a few days (till she was known and otherwise provided for) by the little trade of this place: but had delicacy enough to wish not to be detected. She sat in a white mask, and a white dress, and was known by the name of the White Widow. This Exchange has long since given way to a row of good houses, with an uniform front, engraved in Mr. Nichols's Progresses of Queen Elizabeth, which form a part of the street."*

The houses in the quarter behind these, built by the Earl of Pembroke, made way, sixty years back, for the present handsome set of buildings called the Adelphi, from the Mesars. Adam, brothers, who built it.† The principal front faces the Thames, and is almost the only public walk left for the inhabitants of London on the river side. The centre house was purchased, when new, by Garrick in 1771, and was his town house for the rest of his life. He died there about nine years after; but Mrs. Garrick possessed it till a late period. Mrs. Garrick had been a dancer in her youth, with a name as vernal as need be,—Mademoiselle Violette: she died a venerable old lady, at the age of ninety odd. Boswell has recorded a delightful day spent with Johnson and others at her house, the first time she re-opened it after Garrick's death. Sir Joshua Reynolds was there, Mrs. Carter, Mrs. Boscawen, and others. "She looked well," says Boswell, "talked of her husband with complacency; and while she cast her eyes at his portrait, which hung over the chimney-piece, said, 'that death was now the most agreeable object to her.'‡ It is no dishonour to her, that her constitution was too good for her melancholy. She spoke enthusiastically of her husband to the last, and used to decide on theatrical subjects, by right of being his representative.

On the same terrace had lived their common friend Beauclerc. On coming away after the party just mentioned, Boswell tells us, that Johnson and he stopped a little while by the rails of the Adelphi, looking on the Thames; "and I said to him," says Boswell, "with some emotion, that I was now thinking of two friends we had lost, who once lived in the buildings behind us, Beauclerc and Garrick." "Ay, sir, (said he tenderly,) and two such friends as cannot be supplied."§

When Beauclerc was labouring under the illness that carried him off, Johnson said to Boswell, in a faltering voice, that he "would walk to the extent of the diameter of the earth to save him." It does not appear what Beauclerc had in his nature to excite this tenderness; but it is observable, that Johnson had a kind of speculative regard for rakes and men of the town, if he thought them not essentially vicious. He seemed willing to regard them as evidences of the natural virtue of all men, bad as well as good, and of the excuse furnished for irregularity by animal spirits. It is not impossible even, that he might have thought them rather conventionally than abstractedly vicious. He had a similar regard for Hervey, a great rake, who was very kind to him. "Sir," said he, "if you call a dog 'Hervey,' I shall love him." At the same time it is not to be forgotten, that these rakes were fine gentlemen and men of birth; representatives, in some respect, of the license assumed by authority. Beauclerc, however, like Hervey, had a taste for better things than he practised, and could love scrupulous men. Boswell has given an interesting account of his first intimacy with Johnson. Langton and Beauclerc had become intimate at Oxford. "Their opinions and mode of life," we are told, "were so different, that it seemed utterly impossible they should at all agree;" but Beauclerc, "had so ardent a love of literature, so acute an understanding, such elegance of manners, and so well discerned the excellent qualities of Mr. Langton, a gentleman eminent not only for worth and learning, but for an inexhaustible fund of entertaining conversation, that they became intimate friends."

"JOHNSON, soon after this acquaintance began, passed a considerable time at Oxford. He at first thought it strange that Langton should associate so much with one who had the character of being loose, both in his principles and practice, but, by degrees, he himself was fascinated. Mr Beauclerc's being of the St Alban's family, and having, in some particulars, a resemblance to Charles the Second, contributed, in Johnson's imagination, to throw a lustre upon his other qualities; and, in a short time, the moral, pious Johnson, and the gay, dissipated Beauclerc were companions. 'What a coalition!' said Garrick, when he heard of this: 'I shall have my old friend to bail out of the round-house.' But I can bear testimony that it was a very agreeable association. Beauclerc was too polite, and valued learning and wit too much, to offend Johnson by sallies of infidelity or licentiousness; and Johnson delighted in the good qualities of Beauclerc, and hoped to correct the evil. Innumerable were the scenes in which Johnson was amused by these young men. Beauclerc could take more liberty with him than any body with whom I ever saw him; but, on the other hand, Beauclerc was not spared by his respectable companion, when reproof was proper. Beauclerc had such a propensity to satire, that at one time, Johnson said to him, 'You never open your mouth but with intention to give pain; and you have often given me pain, not from the power of what you said, but from seeing your intention.' At another time, applying to him, with a slight alteration, a line of Pope, he said—

'Thy love of folly, and thy scorn of fools'—

'Everything thou dost shews the one, and everything thou say'st the other.' At another time he said to him, 'Thy body is all vice, and thy mind all virtue.' Beauclerc not seeming to relish the compliment, Johnson said, 'Nay, sir, Alexander the Great, marching in triumph into Babylon, could not have desired to have had more said to him.'"

The streets in the Adelphi,—John, Robert, Adam, &c. are named from the builders. In this instance, the names are well bestowed; but the "fond attempt," on the part of bricklayers and builders in general to give a "deathless lot" to their names in the same way, is very idle. Wherever we go now-a-days, among the new buildings, especially in the suburbs, we meet with names that nobody knows anything about, nor ever will know. Probably, as knowledge increases, this custom will go out. With this exception, streets in the British metropolis have hitherto been named after royalty or nobility, or from local circumstances, or from saints. Saints went out with popery. The reader of the 'Spectator' will recollect the dilemma which Sir Roger de Coverley underwent in his youth, from not knowing whether to ask for Marylebone, or Saint Marylebone. In Paris they have streets named after men of letters; and the Quai de Voltaire. Jean Jacques Rousseau street is one of the most frequented in that metropolis, for it contains the post-office. It is not unlikely, that a similar custom will take place in England before long. A nobleman, eminent for his zeal in behalf of the advancement of society, has called a street in his neighbourhood, Addison street.†

In John street, Adelphi, are the rooms of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. This society originated in 1753, at the suggestion of Mr Shipley, an artist, and, as the title implies, is very miscellaneous in its object; perhaps too much so to make sufficient impression. It gives rewards for discoveries of all sorts, and for performances of youth in the fine arts. It is however, one of those combinations of zealous and intelligent men, which have marked the progress of latter times, and which will have an incalculable effect on posterity. Its great room is adorned with the celebrated pictures of Mr Barry, which he painted in order to refute the opinion that Englishmen had no genius for the higher department of art, no love of music, &c., nor a proper relish of any thing, "even life itself." The statement of these positions was not so discreet, as the paintings were clever. Mr Barry was one of those impatient, self-willed men, who, with a portion of genuine power, think it much greater than it is; and will not take the pains to make themselves masters of their own weapons. His pictures in the Adelphi, which are illustrations of the progress of society, are striking, ingenious, with great elegance here and there, and now and then an evidence of the highest feeling; as in the awful pity of the retributive angel, who presides over the downfall of the wicked and tyrannical. But the colouring is bad and "foxy;" his Elysium is deformed with the heterogeneous dresses of all ages, William Penn talking in a wig and hat with Lycurgus, &c. (which, however philosophically such things might be regarded in another world, are not fitly presented to the eye in this); and by way of disproving the bad taste of the English in music, he has put Dr Burney in a coat and toupee, riding among the water nymphs! The consequence is, that although these pictures are, perhaps, the best ever exhibited together in England by one artist, they fall short of what he intended to establish by them, as far as England is concerned. He had another position, however, which the persons introduced in them have helped to establish beyond question, and which particularly deserves repetition in this Journal:—"That the attainment of happiness, individual as well as public, depends on the development, proper cultivation, and perfection of the human faculties, physical and moral, which are so well calculated to lead human nature to its true rank, and the glorious destination assigned for it by Providence."

Between Adam street and George street, on the other side of the Strand, is Bedford street, the site of an old mansion of the Earls and Dukes of Bedford. Of the neighbourhood which rose on its demolition, we shall speak when we come to Covent garden.

With George street commence the precincts of an ancient "Inn," or palace, originally belonging to the Bishops of Norwich; then to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk; then to the Archbishops of York, from whom it was called York House; then to the crown, who let it to Lord Chancellor Egerton and to Bacon; then to the Duke of Buckingham, the favourite, who rebuilt it with great magnificence, and at whose death it was let to the Earl of Northumberland; and finally to the second Duke of Buckingham, who pulled it down and converted it into the present streets and allies, the names of which contain his designation at full length, even to the sign of the genitive case, for there is an "Of Alley;" so that we have George, Villiers, Duke, Of, Buckingham. The only vestige now remaining of the splendid mansion of the Buckinghams is the water-gate at the end of Buckingham street, called York stairs, and built by Inigo Jones. It has been much admired, and must have admitted, in its time, the entrance of many extraordinary persons.* Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, was the man, who on his marriage with Henry VIIIth's sister, appeared at a tourna-

* "York Stairs," says the author of the 'Critical Reviews of Public Buildings,' quoted in 'Brayley's London and Middlesex,' "form unquestionably the most perfect piece of building that does honour to Inigo Jones: it is planned in so exquisite a taste, formed of such equal and harmonious parts, and adorned with such proper and elegant decorations, that nothing can be censured or added. It is at once happy in its situation beyond comparison, and fancied in a style exactly suited to that situation. The rock-work, or rustic, can never be better introduced than in buildings by the side of water; and, indeed, it is a great question whether it ought to have been made use of anywhere else. On the side next the river appear the arms of the Villiers family; and on the north front is inscribed their motto: Fidei Custodia Cruz.—The Cross is the touch-stone of faith. On this side is a small terrace, planted with lime-trees; the whole supported by a rate raised upon the houses in the neighbouring streets; and being inclosed from the public, forms an agreeable promenade for the inhabitants."

ment on a horse that had a cloth half frieze and half gold, with that touching motto:

Cloth of gold, do not thou despise,
Though thou be matched with cloth of frieze:—
Cloth of frieze, be not thou too bold,
Though thou be matched with cloth of gold.

Bacon belongs to Gray's Inn and the second Duke of Buckingham to Wallingford House, where he chiefly resided (on the site of the present Admiralty); but the reader, who should go down Buckingham street, and contemplate the spot which Inigo Jones and trees have beautified, will not fail to be struck with the many different spirits that have passed through this spot,—the romantic Suffolk, the correct Egerton, the earth-moving Bacon, the first Buckingham with a spirit equal to his fortunes,—the second, witty but selfish, who lavished them away; and all the visitors, of so many different qualities, which these men must have had, crowding or calmly moving to the gate across the water, in quiet or in jollity, clients, philosophers, poets, courtiers, mistresses, gallant masques, the romance of Charles the First's reign, and the gaudy revelry of Charles II. A little spot remains with a few trees, and a graceful piece of art, and the river flowing as calmly as meditation.

York buildings affords us another name, not unworthy to be added to the most useful and delightful of these, Sir Richard Steele, who lived here, just before he retired into Wales. The place in his time was celebrated for a concert-room. We must not omit the termination of a curious dispute at the gate of York house, to which Pepys was a witness.

"30th (September 1661). This morning up by moonshine, at five o'clock," (here was one of the great secrets of the animal spirits of those times), "to Whitehall, to meet Mr More at the Privy Seal, and there I heard of a fray between the two ambassadors of Spain and France, and that this day being the day of the entrance of an ambassador from Sweden, they intended to fight for the precedence. Our king, I heard, ordered that no Englishman should meddle in the business, but let them do what they would. And to that end, all the soldiers in town were in arms all the day long, and some of the train bands in the city, and a great bustle through the city all the day. Then we took coach (which was the business I came for) to Chelsey, to my Lord Privy Seal, and there got him to seal the business. Here I saw by daylight two very fine pictures in the gallery, that a little while ago I saw by night; and did also go all over the house, and found it to be the prettiest contrived house that ever I saw in my life. So back again; and at Whitehall light, and saw the soldiers and people running up and down the streets. So I went to the Spanish ambassador's and the French, and there saw great preparations on both sides; but the French made the most noise and ranted most, but the other made no stir almost at all; so that I was afraid the other would have too great a conquest over them. Then to the wardrobe and dined there; and then abroad, and in Cheapside hear, that the Spanish hath got the best of it, and killed three of the French coach-horses and several men, and is gone through the city next to our king's coach; at which, it is strange to see how all the city did rejoice. And indeed, we do naturally all love the Spanish and hate the French. But I, as I am in all things curious, presently got to the water side and there took oars to Westminster Palace, and ran after them through all the dirt, and the streets full of people; till at last, in the Mewes, I saw the Spanish coach go with fifty drawn swords at least to guard it, and our soldiers shouting for joy. And so I followed the coach, and then met it at York house, where the ambassador lies; and there it went in with great state. So then I went to the French house, where I observe still, that there is no men in the world of a more insolent spirit where they do well, nor before they begin a matter, and more abject if they do miscarry, than these people are; for they all look like dead men, and not a word among them, but shake their heads. The truth is, the Spaniards were not only observed to fight more desperately, but also they did outwit them; first in lining their own harness with chains of iron that they could not be cut, then in setting their coach in the most advantageous place, and to appoint men to guard everyone of their horses, and others for to guard the coach, and others the coachmen. And, above all, in setting upon the French horses and killing them, for by that means the French were not able to stir. There were several men slain of the French, and one or two of the Spaniards, and one Englishman by a bullet. Which is very observable, the French were at least four to one in number, and had near one hundred cases of pistols among them, and the Spaniards had not one gun among them, which is for their honour for ever, and the others disgrace. So having been very much daubed with dirt, I got a coach and home; where I vexed my wife in telling her of this story, and pleading for the Spaniards against the French."

In James the Second's time, the French embassy had the house of their rival, and drew the town to see Popish devices in wax-work. "The fourth of April," says Evelyn (1672), "I went to see the sopperies of the Papists at Somerset House and York House, where now the French ambassador had caused to be represented our Blessed Saviour at the Paschal Supper with his disciples, in figures and puppets made as big as the life, of wax-work, curiously clad and sitting round a large table, the room nobly hung, and shining with innumerable lamps and candles; this was exposed to all the world; all the city came to see it: such liberty had the Roman Catholics at this time obtained."

They have obtained more liberty since, and can dispense with these "sopperies."

Hungerford Market takes its name from an old Wiltshire family, who had a mansion here in the time of Charles II, which they parted with, like others, to the encroachments of trade. It used to be an inconvenient and disagreeable place, little frequented: but has lately been converted into a handsome market, and put an end to the monopoly of Billingsgate.

No. 7, in Craven street, is celebrated as having been, at one time, the residence of Franklin. We shall speak of the extraordinary changes of his life in another place. What a change along the shore of the Thames in a few years (for two centuries are less than a few in the lapse of time), from the residence of a set of haughty nobles, who never dreamt that a tradesman could be anything but a tradesman, to that of a yeoman's son, and a printer, who was one of the founders of a great state!

Northumberland House is the only one remaining of all the great mansions which lorded it on the river's side. It was built by Henry Howard, Earl of Northampton, son of the famous Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, the poet; but a very unworthy son, except in point of capacity. He was one of those men, who, wanting a taste for moral beauty, are in every other respect wise in vain, and succeed only to become despised and unhappy. He was the grossest of flatterers; paid court to the most opposite rivals, in the worst manner; and seems to have stuck at nothing to obtain his ends. His perception of what was great, extrinsically, led him to build this princely abode; and his worship of success and court favour degraded him into an accomplice with Carr, Earl of Somerset. It is thought by the historians, that he died just in time to save him from the disgraceful consequences of the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. But we shall speak of that matter when we come to the Church of Covent garden, where Carr was buried.

Northumberland House was built upon the site of the old hospital of St Mary Roncesvaux,—Osborne says, with Spanish gold. "Part of the present mansion," says the 'Londinium Redivivum', "is from the designs of Bernard Jansen, and the frontispiece or gateway from those of Gerard Christman. This gateway cannot possibly be described correctly, as the ornaments are scattered in the utmost profusion, from the base to the attic, which supports a copy of Michael Angelo's celebrated lion. Double ranges of grotesque pilasters inclose eight niches on the sides, and there are a bow window and an open arch above the gate. The basement of the whole front contains fourteen niches, with ancient weapons crossed within them; and the upper stories have twenty-four windows, in two ranges, with pierce battlements. Each wing terminates in a cupola, and the angles have rustic quoins. The quadrangle within the gate is in a better style of building, but rather distinguished by simplicity than grandeur; and the garden next the Thames, with many trees, serves to screen the mansion from those disagreeable objects which generally bound the shores of the river in this vast trading city.

"Northumberland House was discovered to be on fire March 18, 1780, at five o'clock in the morning, which raged from that hour till eight, when the whole front next the Strand was completely destroyed. Dr Percy's apartments were consumed; but great part of his library escaped the general ruin."

We have been the more particular in laying this extract before our readers, because, though the house still exists, the public see little of it. All they behold, indeed, is the screen or advanced guard, which is no very fine sight, and only serves to narrow the way. The great spears in the niches look as if their only use was to batter down the gates with. Of the quadrangle inside the public know nothing; and thousands pass every day without suspecting that there is such a thing as a tree on the premises.

The Percys had this house in consequence of a marriage with the daughter of the Earl of Suffolk, who was Northampton's nephew. During the Earl's possession it was called Suffolk House, and furnished an escape to a person of the name of Emerson, from one of the mad pranks of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, who was for fighting everybody. His lordship had had sundry fits of ague, which brought him at last to be "so lean and yellow, that scarce any man," he says, "did know him. It happened," he continues, "during this sickness, that I walked abroad one day towards Whitehall, where, meeting with one Emerson, who spoke very disgraceful words of Sir Robert Harley, being then my dear friend, my weakness could not hinder me to be sensible of my friend's dishonour; shaking him, therefore, by a long beard he wore, I step't a little aside, and drew my sword in the street; Captain Thomas Scrivan, a friend of mine, not being far off on one side, and divers friends of his on the other side. All that saw me wondered how I could go, being so weak and consumed as I was, but much more that I would offer to fight; howsoever, Emerson, instead of drawing his sword, ran away into Suffolk House, and afterwards informed the Lords of the Counsel of what I had done; who, not long after sending for me, did not so much reprehend my taking part with my friend, as that I would adventure to fight, being in such a bad condition of health."

The disgraceful words spoken by Emerson were very likely nothing at all, except to his lordship's ultra-chivalrous fancy; but this is a curious scene to imagine at the entrance of the present quiet Northumberland House,—Emerson slipping into the gate with horror in his looks, and the lean and yellow ghost of the knight-errant behind him, sword in hand.

Mr Malcolm has spoken of the apartments of Dr Percy. This was Dr Percy, Bishop of Dromore, who gave an impulse to the spirit of the modern muse by his 'Reliques of Ancient English Poetry'. He was a kinsman of the Northumberland family. We believe it was in Northumberland House that his friend Goldsmith, stammering out a fine speech of thanks to a personage in a splendid dress whom he took for the Duke, was informed, when he had done, that it was the footman.

A little way up Catherine street is Exeter street, where Johnson first lodged when he came to town. His lodgings were at the house of Mr Morris, a stay-maker. He dined at the Pine-apple in New street, "for eightpence, with very good company." Several of them, he told Boswell, had travelled. "They expected to meet every day; but did not know one another's names." The rest of his information is a curious and interesting specimen of his disposition. "It used," said he, "to cost the rest a shilling, for they drank wine: but I had a cut of meat for sixpence, and bread for a penny, and gave the waiter a penny; so that I was quite as well served, nay, better than the rest, for they gave the waiter nothing." Johnson drank at this time no fermented liquors. Boswell supposes that he had gained a knowledge of the art of living in London from an Irish painter, whom he knew at Birmingham, and of whom he gave this account. "Thirty pounds a year," according to this economical philosopher, "was enough to enable a man to live there without being contemptible. He allowed ten pounds for clothes and linen. He said a man might live in a garret at eighteen pence a week; few people would inquire where he lodged: and if they did, it was easy to say, 'Sir, I am to be found at such a place.' By spending three-pence at a coffee-house, he might be for some hours every day in very good company; he might dine for sixpence, breakfast on bread and milk for a penny, and do without supper. On clean-shirt day he went abroad and paid visits."

The Strand end of Catherine street is mentioned in Gay's 'Trivia' for a notoriety which it now unfortunately shares with too many places to render it remarkable. His picture of one of the women he speaks of, possesses a literal truth, characteristic of the whole of this curious poem.

"'Tis she who nightly strolls with sauntering pace;
No stubborn stays her yielding shape embrace;
Beneath the lamp her tawdry ribands glare,
The new scower'd manteau, and the slattern air,
High draggled petticoats her travels show,
And hollow cheeks with artful blushes glow.

"In riding-hood, near Tavern door she plies,
Or muffled pinners hide her livid eyes.
With empty band-box she delights to range,
And feigns a distant errand from the 'Change.'

Gay contents himself with a picture, and a warning. In our times, we have learnt to pity the human beings, and to think what can be done to remedy the first causes of the evil.

The houses between Catherine street and Burleigh street, stand upon ground formerly occupied by Wimbledon House, a mansion built by Sir Edward Cecil, whom Charles I created Viscount Wimbledon. It was burnt down; and Stow says, that the day before, his lordship's country house at Wimbledon was blown up.

The late Lyceum was built about the year 1765, as an academy and exhibition-room, in anticipation of the royal one then contemplated. It did not succeed; and part of it was converted into a theatre for musical performances. It then became a place of exhibition for large, panoramic pictures, among which we remember with pleasure the battle pieces of Mr Robert Ker Porter (Seringapatam, Acre, &c.). A species of entertainment then took place in it, which has justly been called "useful and liberal," presenting, on a regular stage, pictures or scenes of famous places, while a person read accounts of them from a desk. We remember the 'Egyptiana', or description of Egypt, and, if we mistake not, an attempt, not quite so well founded, to illustrate the scenes of Milton's 'L'Allegro and Penseroso'. Neither of the attempts met with success; but the former, perhaps, might be tried again with advantage, now that information and the thirst for it have so wonderfully increased. The panorama, however, may have realised all that can be done in this way. Visitors to those admirable contrivances may be almost said to become travellers; and a reader at hand might disturb them, like an impertinence. We recollect being so early one morning at a panorama, that we had the place to ourselves. The room was without a sound, and the scene Florence; and when we came out, the noise and crowd of the streets had an effect on us, as if we had been suddenly transported out of an Italian solitude. The Lyceum has since been handsomely rebuilt as a new English Opera House, under the management of Mr Arnold, who has done much to cultivate a love of music in this country. Over the former theatre, we believe, was a room built by him for the members of the famous Beef-

‡ In 1803, Northampton writes thus to Lord Burghley (Essex's great enemy), upon presenting to him a devotional composition. "The weight of your Lordship's piercing judgment held me in so reverend an awe, as before I were encouraged by two or three of my friends, who had a taste, I durst not present this treatise to your view: but since their partiality hath made me thus bold, my own affection to sanctify this labour to yourself hath made me impudent."

Yet in the year succeeding, our authority observes, he has the following passage in a letter to Essex:—"Some friend of mine means this day, before night, to merit my devotion and uttermost gratitude by seeking to do good to you; the success whereof my prayers in the meantime shall recommend to that best gale of wind that may favour it. Your lordship, by your last purchase, hath almost enraged the dromedary that would have won the Queen of Sheba's favour by bringing pearls. If you could once be as fortunate in dragging old Leviathan (Burghley) and his cub, tortuosum colubrum (Sir Robert Cecil), as the prophet termeth them, out of this den of mischievous devices, the better part of the world would prefer your virtue to that of Hercules."—See 'Memoirs of the Peers of James I.' p. 246. Such "wise men" are the worst of fools. And here he was acting, as all such men are apt to do, more or less, like one of the commonest fools, in saying such contradicting things under his own hand.

Steak Club, equally celebrated for loving their steaks and roasting one another.*

The little crowded nest of shop-counters and wild beasts, called Exeter Change, which has lately been pulled down, took its name from a mansion belonging to the Bishops of Exeter, whether on the south or north side of the street, does not appear. It is not necessary that the spot should have been the same. Any connexion with a large mansion, or its neighbourhood, is sufficient to give name to a new house. Pennant thinks, we know not on what authority, that the great Lord Burleigh had a mansion on the spot; and he adds, that he died here. Exeter Change was supposed to have been built in the reign of William and Mary, as a speculation. The lower story, at the beginning of the last century, was appropriated to the shops of milliners; and upholsterers had the upper. In the year 1721, the town were invited to this place to look at a bed. "Mr Normond Cony," saith the historian, "exhibited a singular bed for two shillings and sixpence each person, the product of his own ingenuity; the curtains of which were woven in the most ingenious manner, with feathers of the greatest variety and beauty he could procure; the ground represented white damask, mixed with silver and ornaments of various descriptions, supporting vases of flowers and fruits. Each curtain had a purple border a foot in breadth, branched with flowers shaded with scarlet, the valence and bases the same. The bed was eighteen feet in height; and from the description must have been a superior effort of genius, equally original with the works of the South Sea Islanders, whose cloaks, mantles, and caps, grace the collection formed by Captain Cook, now preserved in the British Museum."†

This was a gentle exhibition enough. Sixty years ago, instead of the bed, was presented the right honourable body of Lord Baltimore, a personage who ran away with young ladies against their will. The body lay "in state," previously to its interment at Epsom. Lord Baltimore was succeeded by the wild beasts, who kept possession in their narrow unhealthy cages till the death of the poor elephant in 1826, which, conspiring with the new spirit of improvement to call final attention to this excrement in the Strand, it was adjudged to be rooted out. The death of this unfortunate animal, who seems to have had just reason enough to grow mad, is too recent to be dwelt upon. But we may observe that the catastrophe had its proper effect, in exciting the public to guard against similar evils; nor is it likely that these intelligent and noble creatures, nor indeed any others, will undergo such a monstrous state of existence again.

Passing one day by Exeter Change, we beheld a sight strange enough to witness in a great thoroughfare,—a fine horse startled, and pawing the ground, at the roar of lions and tigers. It was at the time, we suppose, when the beasts were being fed.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

LINCOLN'S INN, AND THE NEIGHBOURHOOD.

Contents:—Lincoln's Inn.—Ben Jonson's Bricklaying.—Enactments against Beards.—Oliver Cromwell, More, Hale, and other eminent Students of Lincoln's Inn.—Lincoln's Inn Fields, or Square.—Houses there built by Inigo Jones.—Pepys's admiration of the comforts of Mr Povey.—Surgeons' College.—Sir Richard and Lady Fanshawe, and Lord Sandwich.—Execution of the patriotic Lord Russell, with an Account of the circumstances that led to and accompanied it, and some Remarks on his Character.—Affecting Passages from the Letters of his Widow.

LINCOLN'S INN, upon the side of Chancery lane, presents a long, old front of brick, more simple than clean. It is saturated with the London smoke. Within is a handsome row of buildings, and a garden, in which Bickerstaff describes himself as walking, by favour of the benchers, who had grown old with him.* It will be recollected that Bickerstaff lived in Shire lane, which leads into this inn from Temple-bar. The garden-wall on the side next Chancery-lane is said by Aubrey to have been the scene of Ben Jonson's performance as a bricklayer. We have spoken of it in our remarks on that lane; but shall now add the particulars. "His mother, after his father's death," says Aubrey, "married a bricklayer; and 'tis generally said that he wrought for some time with his father-in-law, and particularly on the garden-wall of Lincoln's Inn, next to Chancery lane." Aubrey's report adds, that "a knight, or benchman, walking through, and hearing him repeat some Greeke names out of Homer, discoursing with him, and finding him to have a wit extraordinary, gave him some exhibition to maintain him at Trinity College in Cambridge.†" Fuller says, that he had been there before, at St John's, and that he was obliged by the family poverty to return to the brick-laying.‡ "And let them not blush," says this good-hearted writer, "that have, but those that have not a lawful calling. He helped in the building of the new structure of Lincoln's Inn, where, having a trowell in his hand, he had a book in his pocket." A late editor of Ben Jonson rejects these literary accounts of the poet's bricklaying as "figments."§ And he brings his author's own representations to prove, that he left the business, not for the University, but the continent. As this writer has nothing, however, to oppose to what Aubrey and Fuller believed respecting the rest, the reports, so far, are worth as much as they were before. Nobody was more likely than Ben Jonson to carry a Greek or Latin book with him on such occasions; nor, as far as that matter goes, to let others become aware of it.

Pennant's sketch of Lincoln's Inn continues to be the best, notwithstanding all that has been said of it since his time. He begins with observing, that "the gate is of brick, but of no small ornament to the street." This is the gate in Chancery lane. "It was built," he continues, "by Sir Thomas Lovell, once a member of this inn, and afterwards treasurer of the household to Henry VII. The other parts were rebuilt at different times, but much about the same period. None of the original building is left, for it was formed out of the house of the Black Friars, which fronted Holborn end of the palace of Ralph Nevil, Chancellor of England, and Bishop of Chichester, built by him in the reign of Henry III, on a piece of ground granted to him by the king. It continued to be inhabited by some of the successors in the see. This was the original site of the Dominicans or Black Friars, before they removed to the spot now known by that name. On part of the ground, now covered with buildings, Henry Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, built an Inn, as it was in those days called, for himself, in which he died in 1312. The ground did belong to the Black Friars; and was granted by Edward I to that great Earl. The whole has retained his name. One of the bishops of Chichester, in after times, did grant leases of the buildings to certain students of the law, reserving to themselves a rent, and lodgings for themselves whenever they came to town. This seems to have taken place about the time of Henry VII."

"The chapel," continues our author, "was designed by Inigo Jones; it is built upon massy pillars, and affords, under its shelter, an excellent walk. This work evinces that Inigo never was designed for a gothic architect. The Lord Chancellor holds his sittings in the great hall. This, like that of the Temple, had its revels, and great Christmases. Instead of the Lord of Misrule, it had its King of the Cocknies. They had also a Jack Straw; but in the time of Queen Elizabeth he, and all his adherents, were utterly banished. I must not omit, that in the same reign, sumptuary laws were made to regulate the dress of the members of the house; who were forbidden to wear long hair, or great ruffs, cloaks, boots, or spurs. In the reign of Henry VIII beards were prohibited at the great table, under pain of paying double commons. His daughter, Elizabeth, in the first year of her reign, confined them to a fortnight's growth, under penalty of 3s. 4d.; but the fashion prevailed so strongly, that the prohibition was repealed, and no manner of size limited to that venerable excrement.||"

'Tis merry in the hall,
When beards wag all,

says the proverb; but the lawyers in those days had already so many refreshments to their solemnity, in masks and revels, that it was thought necessary to provide for decency of mastication in ordinary. Attempts to regulate trifles of this sort, however, have always been found more difficult than any others, the impertinence of the interference being in proportion. Think of the officers watching the illegal growth of the beard; the vexation of the 'dandies,' who wanted their beards out of doors; and the resentment of the unserviceable part of the elders! He that parted with his beard, rather than his three and fourpence, would be looked upon as an alien.

In the hall of Lincoln's Inn is Hogarth's celebrated failure of 'Paul preaching before Felix.' It seems hard upon a great man to exhibit a specimen of what he could not do. However, the subject does not appear to have been of the society's choosing. A bequest had been made them which produced a commission to Hogarth, probably in expectation that he would illustrate some of the consequences of good laws in his usual manner.

Old Fortescue was of Lincoln's Inn; Spelman, the great antiquary; Sir Thomas More; Cromwell; Sir Mathew Hale; Lord Chancellor Egerton, otherwise known by his title of Lord Ellesmere; Shaftesbury, the statesman; and Lord Mansfield. Dr Donne also studied there for a short time, but left the inn to enjoy an inheritance, and became a clergyman. However, he returned to it in after life as preacher of the lecture; which office he held about two years, to the great satisfaction of his hearers. Tillotson was another preacher. It is difficult to present to one's imagination the venerable judges in their younger days; to think of Hale as a gay fellow (which he was till an accident made him otherwise); or fancy that Sir Thomas More had any other face but the profound and ponderous one in his pictures. His face, indeed, must have been full of meaning enough at all times; for at twenty-one he was a stirring youth in Parliament; and at twenty he took to wearing a hair-shirt, as an aid to his meditations. It is interesting to fancy him passing us in the Inn square, with a glance of his deep eye; we (of posterity) being in the secret of his hair-shirt, which the less informed passengers are not.

The account of Hale's change of character, on his entrance into Lincoln's Inn, merits to be repeated. "At Oxford," says his biographer, "he fell into many levities and extravagances, and was preparing to go along with his tutor, who went Chaplain to Lord Vere into the Low Countries, with a resolution of entering himself into the Prince of Orange's army, when he was diverted from his design by being engaged in a lawsuit with Sir William Whitmore, who laid claim to part of his estate. Afterwards, by the persuasions of Sergeant Glanville, who happened to be his counsel in this case, and had an opportunity, of observing his capacity, he resolved upon the study of the law, and was admitted of Lincoln's Inn, November 8, 1629. Sensible of the time he had lost in frivolous pursuits, he now studied at the rate of sixteen hours a day, and threw aside all appearance of vanity in his apparel. He is said, indeed, to have neglected his dress so much, that, being a strong and well-built man, he was once taken by a press-gang, as a person very fit for sea-service, which pleasant mistake made him regard more decency in his cloaths for the future, though never to any degree of extravagant finery. What confirmed him still more in a serious and regular way of life was an accident, which is related to have befallen one of his companions. Hale, with other young students of the Inn, being invited out of town, one of the company called for so much wine, that notwithstanding all Hale could do to prevent it, he went on in his excess till he fell down in a fit, seemingly dead, and was with some difficulty recovered. This particularly affected Hale, in whom the principles of religion had been early implanted; and, therefore, retiring into another room, and falling down upon his knees, he prayed earnestly to God, both for his friend, that he might be restored to life again, and for himself, that he might be forgiven for being present and countenancing so much excess: and he vowed to God, that he would never again keep company in that manner, nor drink a health while he lived. His friend recovered; and from this time Mr Hale forsook all his gay acquaintance, and divided his whole time between the duties of religion, and the studies of his profession."

Of Hale, in more advanced life, we shall speak when we notice what is interesting in Westminster Hall. Cromwell is supposed to have been about two years in Lincoln's Inn, and while he was there attended to anything but the law, the future devout Protector being, in fact, nothing more nor less than a gambler and debauchee. However, he is supposed to have run all his round of dissipation in that time. Mansfield's residence, in Lincoln's Inn, when Mr Murray, gave rise to a singular reference in Pope. It is in the translation of Horace's ode, 'Intermissa Venus diu,' where the poet says to the goddess—

* The author of a 'History of the Clubs of London' (vol. ii. p. 3.) says, that this is not the Beef-Steak Club of which Retcourt, the comedian, was steward, and Mrs Woffington president. He derives its origin from an accidental dinner taken by Lord Peterborough in the scenic room of Rich the Harlequin, over Covent Garden Theatre. The original gridiron, on which Rich broiled the Peer's beefsteak, is still preserved, as the palladium of the club; and the members have it engraved on their buttons. It has generally, we believe, admitted the leading men of the day, of whatever description, provided they can joke and bear joking. The author just mentioned says, that Lord Sandwich and Wilkes's days are generally quoted as the golden period of the society.

"I am not now, alas! the man
As in the gentle reign of my Queen Anne,
To number five direct your doves,
There spread round Murray all your blooming loves;
Noble and young, who strikes the heart
With every sprightly, every decent part;
Equal the injured to defend,
To charm the mistress, or to fix the friend."

This number five to which Venus is to go with her doves, points out Murray's apartments in Lincoln's Inn. Pope, as we have mentioned elsewhere, thought that nature intended his noble acquaintance for an Ovid; a notion partly suggested, perhaps, by Ovid's having been a lawyer. It was during his residence in Lincoln's Inn, that the future Lord Chief Justice is said to have drank the Pretender's health on his knees; which he very likely did. The charge was brought up twenty years afterwards, to ruin his prospects under the Hanover succession; but it came to nothing. One dynasty has no dislike to a strong prejudice in favour of a preceding dynasty, when the latter has ceased to be formidable. The propensity to adhere to royalty is looked upon as a good symptom; and the event generally answers the expectation. The favourite courtiers under the house of Brunswick have come of Jacobite families.

A century ago, according to a passage in Gay, Lincoln's Inn and the neighbourhood were dangerous places to walk through at night.

"Where Lincoln's Inn, wide space, is railed around,
Cross not with venturous step; there oft is found
The lurking thief, who while the daylight shone,
Made the wall echo with his begging tone:
That crutch, which late compassion moved, shall wound

Thy bleeding head, and fell thee to the ground.
Though thou art tempted by the linkman's call,
Yet trust him not along the lonely wall;
In the midway he'll quench the flaming brand,
And share the booty with the pilfering band.
Still keep the public streets, where oily rays,
Shot from the crystal lamp, o'erspread the ways."

The wall here mentioned is probably that of Lincoln's Inn Fields, which, like all other walls, is at present rendered as light as in day time.

Lincoln's Inn Fields, now a handsome square, set more agreeably than most others, with grass-plot and underwood, were first disposed into their present regular appearance by Inigo Jones, under the auspices of a committee of gentry and nobility, one of whom was Bacon. Inigo built some of the houses, and gave to the ground-plot of the square the exact dimensions of the base of one of the pyramids of Egypt. He could not have hit upon a better mode of conveying to the imagination a sense of those enormous structures. If the passenger stops and pictures to himself one of the huge slanting sides of the pyramid, as wide as the whole length of the square, leaning away up into the atmosphere, with an apex we know not how high, it will indeed seem to him a kind of stone mountain.

The houses in Lincoln's Inn Fields built by Inigo Jones are in Arch row (the western side), and may still be distinguished. Pennant speaks of one of them, as being, "Lindesay House, once the seat of the Earls of Lindesay, and of their descendants, the Dukes of Ancaster." They are probably still a great deal more handsome inside, and more convenient, than any of the flimsy modern houses preferred to them: but London has grown so large, that everybody who can afford it lives at the fashionable outskirts, for the fresh air. It is probable that Inigo's houses created an ambition of good building in this quarter. Pepys speaks of a Mr Povey's house in Lincoln's Inn Fields, as a miracle of elegance and comfort. His description of it is characteristic of the snug and wondrous Pepys.

"Thence (that is to say, from chapel and the ladies) with Mr Povey home to dinner; where extraordinary cheer. And after dinner up and down to see his house. And in a word, methinks, for his perspective in the little closet; his room floored above with woods of several colours, like, but above, the best cabinet-work I ever saw; his grotto and vault, with his bottles of wine, and a well therein to keep them cool; his furniture of all sorts; his bath at the top of the house, good pictures, and his manners of eating and drinking; do surpass all that ever I did see of one man in all my life."

The Country and City Mouse, in Pope's imitation of Horace, go

To a tall house near Lincoln's Inn, which had

Palladian walls, Venetian doors,
Grottesco roofs, and stucco floors.

The house of a living architect is observable in Holborn row (the north side of the square) and has a singular but pleasing effect, though not quite desirable perhaps in this northern climate, where light and sun are in request. It presents a case of stone, added to the original front, and comprising a balcony and arcade. Shrubs and plate-glass complete the taste of its appearance. On the opposite side of the way (called Portugal row, most likely from our connexion with Portugal in Charles the Second's time), the inhabitant of the above house has the pleasure, we believe of contemplating his own work, in the handsome front and portico of Surgeons' College. This mode of giving a new front to a house, and fetching it out into a portico, is an ingenious way of getting up an ornament to the metropolis at little expense. Surgeons' College, instead of being two or three old houses with a new face, looks like a separate building. In Portugal row sometime lived Sir Richard Fanshawe, in whose quaint translation of Camoens there is occasionally more genuine poetry, than in the less unequal version of Mickle. This accomplished person was recalled from an embassy in Spain, on the ground that he had signed a treaty without authority; which was fact; but the suspicious necessity of finding some honourable way of removing Lord Sandwich from his command in the navy, induced Lady Fanshawe and others to conclude that he was sacrificed to that convenience. He died on the intended day of his return, of a violent fever, aggravated, not improbably, perhaps caused, by this awkward close of his mission: for such things have been, with men of sensitive imaginations. His wife, a very frank and cordial woman, not reserved in speaking her mind, has left interesting memoirs of him, in which she countenances a clamour of that day, that Lord Sandwich was a coward. She adds, "He neither understood the custom of the (Spanish) court, nor the language, nor indeed anything but a vicious life; and thus (addressing her children) was he shuffled into your father's employment, to reap the benefit of his five years' negotiation." We quote this passage here, because Lord Sandwich was himself an inhabitant of Lincoln's Inn Fields. His want of courage (a charge shamefully bandied to and fro between officers at that time) is surely not to be taken for granted upon the word of his enemies, considering the testimonies borne in his favour by the Duke of York and others, and his numerous successes against the enemy. It is possible, however, that the pleasures of Charles's court might have done him no good. Sandwich had been one of Cromwell's council; appears afterwards to have been a gallant of Lady Castlemain's; was a great courtier; and probably had as little principle as most public men of that age. Pepys, who was his relation, describes him as being a lute-player.

On Lady Fanshawe's return to England, she took a house for twenty-one years in Holborn row, where her contemplation of the houses opposite must have been very melancholy. Her account of the circumstances under which she returned, is of a melancholy interest. "I had not," she says, "God is my witness, above twenty-five doubloons by me at my husband's death, to bring home a family of three score servants, but was forced to sell one thousand pounds' worth of our own plate, and to spend the Queen's present of two thousand doubloons in my journey to England, not owing nor leaving one shilling debt in Spain, I thank God; nor did my husband leave any debt at home, which every ambassador cannot say. Neither did these circumstances following prevail to mend my condition, much less found I that compassion I expected upon the view of myself, that had lost at once my husband, and fortune in him, with my son, but twelve months old in my arms, four daughters, the eldest but thirteen years of age, with the body of my dear husband daily in my sight for near six months together, and a distressed family, all to be by me in honour and honesty provided for; and, to add to my afflictions, neither persons sent to conduct me, nor pass, nor ship, nor money to carry me one thousand miles, but some few letters of compliment from the chief ministers, bidding 'God help me!' as they do to beggars, and they might have added, 'they had nothing for me,' with great truth. But God did hear, and see, and help me, and brought my soul out of trouble; and, by his blessed providence, I and you live, move, and have our being, and I humbly pray God that that blessed providence may ever relieve our wants. Amen."

Lady Fanshawe was no coward, whatever her foes may have been. During a former voyage with her husband to Spain, when she had been married about six years, the vessel was attacked by a Turkish galley, on which occasion she has left the following touching account of her behaviour:—

"When we had just passed the straits, we saw coming towards us, with full sails, a Turkish galley well manned, and we believed we should be all carried away slaves, for this man had so laden his ship with goods from Spain, that his guns were useless, though the ship carried sixty guns; he called for brandy, and after he had well drunken, and all his men, which were near two hundred, he called for arms, and cleared the deck as well as he could, resolving to fight rather than lose his ship, which was worth thirty thousand pounds; this was sad for us passengers, but my husband bid us be sure to keep in the cabin, and not appear,—the women,—which would make the Turks think we were a man of war, but if they saw women they would take us for merchants and board us. He went upon the deck and took a gun and bandoliers, and sword, and, with the rest of the ship's company, stood upon deck, expecting the arrival of the Turkish man-of-war. This beast, the captain, had locked me up in the cabin; I knocked and called long to no purpose, until at length the cabin-boy came and opened the door; I, all in tears, desired him to be so good as to give me his blue thrum cap he wore, and his tarred coat, which he did, and I gave him half-a-crown, and putting them on, and flinging away my night clothes, I crept up softly, and stood upon the deck by my husband's side, as free from sickness and fear, as, I confess, from discretion; but it was the effect of that passion which I could never master.

"By this time the two vessels were engaged in parley, and so well satisfied with speech and sight of each other's forces, that the Turks' man-of-war tacked about, and we continued our course. But when your father saw it convenient to retreat, looking upon me, he blessed himself, and snatched me up in his arms, saying, 'Good God, that love can make this change!' and though he seemingly chid me, he would laugh at it as often as he remembered that voyage."

We now come to an event, uniting the most touching circumstances of private life with the loftiest utility of public, and the benefits of which we are this day enjoying, perhaps in every one of our comforts. In this square, now possessed by inhabitants who can think and write as they please on all subjects, and the centre of which is adorned with roses and lilacs (another consequence of the advance of public security) was executed the celebrated patriot, Lord Russell. We should ill perform any part of the object of this work, if we did not dwell at some length upon a scene so interesting, and upon the circumstances that led to it.

Lord Russell (sometimes improperly called Lord William Russell, for he had succeeded to the courtesy-title by the decease of his elder brothers) was son of William, Earl of Bedford, by Lady Ann Carr, daughter of Carr, Earl of Somerset; and was beheaded in the year 1683, the last year but two of the reign of King Charles II, for an alleged conspiracy to seize the King's guards and put him to death. The conspiracy was called the Rye-house Plot, but incorrectly as far as Lord Russell was concerned; for it is not proved that he ever heard of the house which occasioned the name; and he was condemned upon allegations which would have destroyed him, had no such place existed. The Rye-house was a farm near Hoddesdon, in Hertfordshire, belonging to one of the alleged conspirators, and had a bye-road near it through which Charles was accustomed to pass in returning from the races at Newmarket. It was said that the King was to have been assassinated in this road, but that a fire at Newmarket, which put the town into confusion, hastened his return to London before the conspirators had time to assemble.

Charles II, and his brother, the Duke of York, afterwards James II, in the prosecution of those designs against the liberty and religion of the state, which are now acknowledged by all historians, had lately succeeded in producing a strong re-action against the party opposed to them. This party, the Whigs, in their dread of arbitrary power and popery, had attempted with great pertinacity to exclude the Duke of York, an avowed papist, from the succession. They had indicted him as a Popish recusant: they had listened, with too great credulity, to the story of a Popish Plot, for which several persons were executed; and while these strong measures were going forward, to which the general dread of Popery encouraged them, they were inquiring into the King's illegal connexions with France, and putting the last sting to his vexation, by refusing him money. Charles's gambling and debaucheries kept him in a perpetual state of poverty. He was always endeavouring to raise money upon every shift he could devise, and misappropriating all he obtained; which completed the ingloriousness of his reign by rendering him a pensioner of France. He had a stray party of corruptionists in the House of Commons, but the public feeling against the Duke gave the elections a balance the other way, and the poor King was compelled, from time to time, to purchase what money he wanted, by the surrender of a popular right.

Driven thus from loss to loss, and not knowing where the diminution of his resources would end, Charles at length expressed himself willing to limit the powers of a Popish successor, though he would not consent to exclude him. The Whigs, strong in their vantage-ground, and backed by the voice of the country, rejected what they would formerly have agreed to, and insisted on the exclusion. And here the re-action commenced in Charles's favour. The Whigs had allied themselves with the Dissenters, whose toleration they advocated in proportion as they opposed that of the Catholics. It was a contradiction natural enough at that time, when the remembrance of Protestant martyrdom was still lively, and the growth of philosophy had not neutralised the papal spirit, or, at least, was not yet understood to have done so; but, by means of this alliance between the Whigs and Presbyterians, Charles succeeded in awakening the fears of the orthodox. A secret treaty with the French King enabled him to reckon for a time on being able to dispense with the contributions of Parliament; and when the latter again pressed the exclusion bill, he dissolved them with high complaints of their inveteracy against government, and artful insinuations of the favour they showed the Dissenters. This declaration was read in all the churches and chapels, and produced the re-action he looked for. The Whig leaders, withdrawing into retirement, seemed to give up the contest for the present; but this was no signal to power to abstain from pursuing them. Charles, to secure himself a Parliament that should give him money without inquiry, and to indulge his brother in his love of revenge (not omitting a portion on his own account), set himself heartily about influencing the election for a new House of Commons. The Dissenters were persecuted all over the country; the Whig newspapers put down; one man, for his noisy zeal against Popery, put to death by means of the most infamous witnesses, who had sworn on the other side; and Shaftesbury's life was aimed at, but saved by the contrivances of the city authorities. The liberties of the city were then aimed at, with but too great success, by means of judges placed on the bench for that purpose. Other corrupt law officers were brought into action; a servile lord-mayor was induced to force two sheriffs upon the city, in open defiance of law and a majority; in short, every obstacle was removed which accompanied the existence of properly constituted authorities, and that late anti-popery spirit of the nation, which was now comparatively silent, for fear of being confounded with disaffection to the church.

For an account of what took place upon this corruption of church and bench, and neutralization of the popular spirit, we shall now have recourse to the pages of the latest writer on the subject; who, though a descendant of Lord Russell, has stated it with a truth and moderation worthy of the best spirit of his ancestor. The narrative of the execution we shall take from an eye-witness, and intersperse such remarks as a diligent inquiry into the conduct and character of Lord Russell has suggested to our own love of truth.

"The election of the sheriffs," says our author, "seemed to complete the victory of the throne over the people. It was evident, from the past conduct of the court, that they would now select whom they pleased for condemnation.

"Lord Russell received the news with the regret which, in a person of his temper, it was most likely to produce. Lord Shaftesbury, on the other hand, who was provoked at the apathy of his party, received with joy the news of the appointment of the sheriffs, thinking that his London friends, seeing their necks in danger, would join with him in raising an insurrection. He hoped at first to make use of the names of the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Russell, to catch the idle and unwary by the respect paid to their characters; but when he found them too cautious to compromise themselves, he endeavoured to ruin their credit with the citizens. He said that the Duke of Monmouth was a tool of the court; that Lord Essex had also made his bargain, and was to go to Ireland; and that, between them, Lord Russell was deceived. It is a strong testimony to the real worth of Lord Russell, that, when he made himself obnoxious, either to the court or to the more violent of his own party, the only charge they ever brought against him was, that of being deceived, either by a vain air of popularity or too great a confidence in his friends.

"Lord Shaftesbury, finding himself deserted, then attempted to raise an insurrection, by means of his own partisans in the city. The Duke of Monmouth, at various times, discouraged these attempts. On one of these occasions, he prevailed on Lord Russell, who had come to town on private affairs, to go with him to a meeting, at the house of Shepherd, a wine-merchant.

"Lord Shaftesbury, being concealed in the city at this time, did not dare to appear himself at this meeting, but sent two of his creatures, Rumsey and Ferguson. Lord Grey and Sir Thomas Armstrong were also there; but nothing was determined at this meeting.

"Soon after this, Lord Shaftesbury, finding he could not bring his friends to rise with the speed he wished, and being in fear of being discovered if he remained in London any longer, went over to Holland. He died in January, 1683."

"After Shaftesbury was gone, there were held meetings of his former creatures in the chambers of one West, an active, talking man, who had got the name of being an Atheist. Col. Rumsey, who had served under Cromwell, and afterwards in Portugal; Ferguson, who had a general propensity for plots; Goodenough, who had been under-sheriff; and one Holloway, of Bristol, were the chief persons at these meetings. Lord Howard was, at one time, among them. Their discourse seems to have extended itself to the worst species of treason and murder; but whether they had any concerted plan for assassinating the King, is still a mystery. Amongst those who were sounded in this business was one Keeling, a vintner, sinking in business, to whom Goodenough often spoke of their designs. This man went to Legge, then made Lord Dartmouth, and discovered all he knew. Lord Dartmouth took him to Secretary Jenkins, who told him he could not proceed without more witnesses. It would also seem that some promises were made to him, for he said in a tavern, in the hearing of many persons, that 'he had considerable proffers made him of money, and a place worth 100*l.* or 80*l.* per annum, to do something for them; and he afterwards obtained a place in the Victualling office, by means of Lord Halifax. The method he took of procuring another witness was, by taking his brother into the company of Goodenough, and afterwards persuading him to go and tell what he had heard at Whitehall.

"The substance of the information given by Josiah Keeling, in his first examination, was, that a plot had been formed for enlisting forty men, to intercept the King and Duke on their return from Newmarket, at a farm-house called Rye, belonging to one Rumbold, a maltster; that this plan being defeated by a fire at Newmarket, which caused the King's return sooner than was expected, the design of an insurrection was laid; and, as the means of carrying this project into effect, they said that Goodenough had spoken of 4,000 men and 20,000*l.* to be raised by the Duke of Monmouth and other great men. The following day, the two brothers made oath, that Goodenough had told them, that Lord Russell had promised to engage in the design, and to use all his interest to accomplish the killing of the King and the Duke. When the Council found that the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Russell were named, they wrote to the King to come to London, for they would not venture to go further without his presence and leave. In the meantime, warrants were issued for the apprehension of several of the conspirators. Hearing of this, and having had private information from the brother of Keeling, they had a meeting, on the 18th June, at Captain Walcot's lodging. At this meeting were present Walcot, Wade, Rumsey, Norton, the two Goodenoughs, Nelthrop, West, and Ferguson. Finding they had no means either of opposing the King or flying into Holland, they agreed to separate, and shift each man for himself.

"A proclamation was now issued for seizing on some who could not be found; and amongst these, Rumsey and West were named. The next day West delivered himself, and Rumsey came in a day after him. Their confessions, especially concerning the assassinations at the Rye-house, were very ample. Burnet says, they had concerted a story to be brought out on such an emergency.

"In this critical situation, Lord Russell, though perfectly sensible of his danger, acted with the greatest composure. He had long before told Mr Johnson, that 'he was very sensible he should fall a sacrifice: arbitrary government could not be set up in England without wading through his blood.' The day before the King arrived, a messenger of the council was sent to wait at his gate, to stop him if he had offered to go out; yet his back-gate was not watched, so that he might have gone away, if he had chosen it. He had heard that he was named by Rumsey; but forgetting the meeting at Sheppard's, he feared no danger from a man he had always disliked, and never trusted. Yet he thought proper to send his wife amongst his friends for advice. They were at first of different minds; but as he said he apprehended nothing from Rumsey, they agreed that his flight would look too like a confession of guilt. This advice coinciding with his own opinion, he determined to stay where he was. As soon as the King arrived, a messenger was sent to bring him before the council. When he appeared there, the King told him, that nobody suspected him of any design against his person; but that he had good evidence of his being in designs against his government. He was examined upon the information of Rumsey, concerning the meeting at Sheppard's, to which Rumsey pretended to have carried a message, requiring a speedy resolution, and to have received for answer that Mr Trenchard had failed them at Taunton. Lord Russell totally denied all knowledge of this message. When the examination was finished, Lord Russell was sent a close prisoner to the Tower. Upon his going in, he told his servant Taunton that he was sworn against, and they would have his life. Taunton said, he hoped it would not be in the power of his enemies to take it. Lord Russell answered, 'Yes; the devil is loose!'

"From this moment he looked upon himself as a dying man, and turned his thoughts wholly upon another world. He read much in the scriptures, particularly in the Psalms; but whilst he behaved with the serenity of a man prepared for death, his friends exhibited an honourable anxiety to preserve his life. Lord Essex would not leave his house, lest his absconding might incline a jury to give more credit to the evidence against Lord Russell. The Duke of Monmouth sent to let him know he would come in and run fortunes with him, if he thought it could do him any service. He answered, it would be of no advantage to him to have his friends die with him.

"A committee of the Privy Council came to examine him. Their inquiries related to the meeting at Sheppard's, the rising at Taunton, the seizing of the guards, and a design for a rising in Scotland. In answer to the questions put to him, he acknowledged he had been at Sheppard's house divers times, and that he went there with the Duke of Monmouth; but he denied all knowledge of any consultation tending to an insurrection, or to surprise the guards. He remembered no discourse concerning any rising at Taunton; and knew of no design for a rising in Scotland. He answered his examiners in a civil manner, but declined making any defence till his trial, when he had no doubt of being able to prove his innocence. The charge of treating with the Scots, as a thing the council were positively assured of, alarmed his friends; and Lady Russell desired Dr Burnet to examine who it could be that had charged him; but upon inquiry, it appeared to be only an artifice to draw confession from him; and notwithstanding the power which the court possessed to obtain the condemnation of their enemies, by the perversion of law, the servility of judges, and the submission of juries, Lord Russell might still have contested his life with some prospect of success, had not a new circumstance occurred to cloud his declining prospects. This was the apprehension and confession of Lord Howard. At first, he had talked of the whole matter with scorn and contempt; and solemnly professed that he knew nothing which could hurt Lord Russell. The King himself said, he found Lord Howard was not amongst them, and he supposed it was for the same reason which some of themselves had given for not admitting Oates into their secrets, namely, that he was such a rogue they could not trust him. But when the news was brought to Lord Howard that West had delivered himself, Lord Russell, who was with him, observed him change colour, and asked him if he apprehended anything from him? He replied that he had been as free with him as any man. Hampden saw him afterwards under great fears, and desired him to go out of the way, if he thought there was matter against him, and he had not strength of mind to meet the occasion. A warrant was now issued against him, on the evidence of West; and he was taken after a long search, concealed in a chimney of his own house. He immediately confessed all he knew, and more.

"Hampden and Lord Russell were imprisoned upon Lord Howard's information; and, four days afterwards, Lord Russell was brought to trial: but, in order to possess the public mind with a sense of the blackness of the plot, Walcot, Hone, and Rouse were first brought to trial, and condemned upon the evidence of Keeling, Lee, and West, of a design to assassinate the King."

It is not necessary to enter at large into the trial. We shall give the main points of it, on which sentence was founded; but when it is considered that the bench had lately had an accession of accommodating judges; that Jeffries was one of the counsel for the prosecution; that the jury, illegally returned, were not allowed to be challenged; that the witnesses were perjured, contradicted themselves, and swore to save their lives; that one of them (Lord Howard) was a man of such infamous character, that the King said, "he would not hang the worst dog he had, upon his evidence;" that nevertheless the testimonies of the most honourable men against him were not held to injure his evidence, and that a crowd of them in Lord Russell's favour were of as little avail in giving the prisoner the benefit of a totally different reputation, it will be allowed, that our pages need not be occupied with details, which, in fact, had nothing to do with his condemnation.

The ground on which Lord Russell was sentenced to death was, that he had violated the law in conspiring the death of the King. He argued, that granting the charge to be true (which he denied), it was not that of conspiring the death of the King, but "a conspiracy to levy war;" that this was not treason within the statute (which it was not); and that if it had been, a statute of Charles II made the accusation null and void, because the time had expired to which the operation of it was limited. The lawyers, who in fact had been compelled by their imperfect enactment to lay the charge on the ground of conspiring the King's death, had so worded the statute of Charles, that, like the oracles of old, it was capable of a double construction. But not to observe that the prisoner ought to have had the benefit of the doubt (and it has been generally thought that the statute was clearly the other way), they could never get rid of the necessity of assuming that the King's death was intended; whereas nothing can be more plain, not only from their own enactments, but from all history, that an insurrection, though against a king himself, may have no such object; so that here was a man to be sacrificed to the spirit of the law (which by its very nature should have saved him), while the court, in this and a thousand other instances, was violating the letter of it.

"Of the Rye-House Plot," says Mr Fox, "it may be said, much more truly than of the Popish, that there was in it some truth, mixed with much falsehood.—It seems probable, that there was among some of the accused, a notion of assassinating the King; but whether this notion was ever ripened into what may be called a design, and, much more, whether it were ever evinced by such an overt act as the law requires for conviction, is very doubtful. In regard to the conspirators of higher ranks, from whom all suspicion of participation in the intended assassination has been long since done away, there is unquestionable reason to believe that they had often met and consulted, as well for the purpose of ascertaining the means they actually possessed, as for that of devising others, for delivering their country from the dreadful servitude into which it had fallen; and thus far their conduct appears clearly to have been laudable. If they went further, and did anything which could be really construed into an actual conspiracy to levy war against the King, they acted, considering the disposition of the nation at that time, very indiscreetly. But whether their proceedings had ever gone this length, is far from certain. Monmouth's communications with the King, when we reflect on all the circumstances of those communications, deserve not the smallest attention; nor indeed, if they did, does the letter which he afterwards withdrew prove anything upon this point. And it is an outrage to common sense to call Lord Grey's narrative, written as he himself states in his letter to James II, while the question of his pardon was pending, an authentic account. That which is most certain in this affair is, that they had committed no overt act, indicating the imagining the King's death, even according to the most strained construction of the statute of Edward III; much less was any such act legally proved against them. And the conspiracy to levy war was not treason, except by a recent statute of Charles II, the prosecutions upon which were expressly limited to a certain time, which in these cases had elapsed; so that it is impossible not to assent to the opinion of those who have ever stigmatized the condemnation and execution of Russell, as a most flagrant violation of law and justice."

The truth respecting Lord Russell seems to be, that he was a man of the highest character and the best intentions, who suffered himself, not very discreetly, to listen to projects which he disapproved, in the hope of seeing better ones substituted. There can be no doubt that he wished to make changes in an illegal government, short of interfering with the King's possession of the throne. He had a right, by law, to endeavour it. He had openly shown himself anxious to do so; and the doubt can be as little, that the Duke of York, from that moment, marked him out for his revenge. Russell implies as much in the paper he gave the sheriff; showing, indeed, such a strong sense of it, as (considering the truly Christian style of the paper in general) is very affecting. It has been justly said of him, that he was a man rather eminent for his virtues than his talents. We cannot help thinking that the paucity of words, to which he repeatedly alludes himself, and which was very evident during his trial, did him serious injury, both then and before. We mean, that if he had had a greater confidence, he might have advocated his cause to very solid advantage, perhaps to his intire acquittal. It is touching to observe, in the account of his behaviour after sentence, how the excitement of the occasion loosened his tongue, and inspired him with some turns of thought, more lively, perhaps, than he had been accustomed to. His character has been respectfully treated by all parties since the Revolution, and his death lamented. A startling charge, however, was brought against him and Sidney, in consequence of the discovery of a set of papers belonging to Barillon, the French Ambassador of that time, in which Sidney's name appears set down for five hundred pounds of secret service money from the French government, and Russell is described as having interviews with Barillon's agent, Rouvigny, tending to prevent a war disagreeable both to Louis and to the English patriots. The vague allusions of some modern writers, together with an unsupported assertion of Ralph Montague, the intriguing English

* 'History of the Reign of James the Second.' Introductory Chapter.—It is worth while, as a puzzle for the reader, to give here the contested point in the statute, which Lord Russell's enemies thought so clear against him, and his friends so much in his favour. 13 Car. II. "Provided always, that no person be prosecuted for any of the offences in this act mentioned, other than such as are made and declared to be high treason, unless it be by order of the King's Majesty, his heirs or successors, under his or their sign manual, or by order of the Council Table of his Majesty, his heirs or successors, directed unto the attorney-general for the time being, or some other counsel learned to his Majesty, his heirs or successors for the time being: nor shall any person or persons, by virtue of this present act, incur any of the penalties herein before mentioned, unless he or they be prosecuted within six months next after the offence committed, and indicted thereupon within three months after such prosecution; anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

Ambassador in France, that money was to be distributed in Parliament "by means of William Russell, and other discontented people," have tended to lump together in the public mind the two charges occasioned by these documents. But they are quite distinct. Lord Russell had nothing to do with the money-list, in which the name of Sidney appears. The alleged bribery of Sidney we shall speak of in another place; our business, at present, is solely with the former. The amount of the matter is this. Charles II was always pretending to go to war with France, chiefly to get money for his debaucheries, and partly to raise an army which he might turn against the constitution. The nation, in their hatred of Louis's anti-protestant bigotry, and their old and less warrantable propensity to fight with those whom they publicly considered as their natural enemies, (a delusion, we trust, now going by) were always in a state to be deceived by Charles on this point; and the patriots were as regularly perplexed how to agree to the wishes of the King and people, knowing, as they did, the former's insincerity, loth to give him more money to squander, and yet anxious to show their dislike of an arbitrary neighbour, and afraid of his being in collision with their prince. Their greatest fear, however, was upon this last point: it was very strong at the juncture in question; and, therefore, when Louis gave them to understand, through his agent, that he himself was desirous of avoiding a war, Russell certainly does appear to have allowed the agent to talk with him on the subject, and to have expressed a willingness to influence the votes of Parliament accordingly. There was a further understanding that Louis was to complete the mutual favour, by assisting to obtain a dissolution of Parliament, in case the peace should continue; for the patriots expected very different things from a dissolution at that time (1678), than what it produced afterwards. Russell's noble biographer justly observes, that for the truth of these statements we are to trust Rouvigny's report, coming through the hands of Barillon: but granting them to be true, he thinks there was nothing criminal in the intercourse. He observes, that, in the first place, Russell was Rouvigny's kinsman by marriage, being first cousin to his wife, which accounts for the commencement of the intercourse; and, secondly, "the imminent danger," he says, "which threatened us from the conduct of France abetting the designs of Charles, cannot, at this day, be properly estimated. At the very time when Parliament was giving money for a war, Lord Danby was writing, by his master's order, to beg for money as the price of peace. We shall presently see, that five days after the House of Commons had passed the act for a supply, Lord Danby wrote to Paris, that Charles expected six millions yearly from France. Had Louis been sincere in the project of making Charles absolute, there can be no doubt that it might have been easily accomplished. Was not this sufficient to justify the popular party in attempting to turn the battery the other way? The question was not, whether to admit foreign interference, but whether to direct foreign interference, already admitted, to a good object. The conduct of Lord Russell, therefore, was not criminal; but it would be difficult to acquit him of the charge of imprudence. The object of Louis must have been, by giving hopes to each party in turn, to obtain the command of both. Charles, on the other hand, was ready to debase himself to the lowest point, to maintain his alliance with France; any suspicion, therefore, of a connexion between Louis and the popular party would have rendered him more and more dependent; till the liberties of England might at last have been set up to auction at Versailles."

This is impartial. But surely an imprudence so extremely dangerous, and an intercourse on any terms with an envoy's agent, the nature of which it must have been necessary to conceal, partook of a disingenuousness and a self-will that cannot be held innocent. That Lord Russell had the best intentions, is granted; but his principles were specially opposed by the doctrine of "doing evil, that good might come;" and if it be argued, that good men are sometimes defeated in their intentions, by not imitating the less scrupulous conduct of evil ones, it is to be answered, that there is no end of the reactions consequent on such imitation; nor any bounds, on the other hand, to be put to the good consequences of a perfect example, even should its very perfection retard them. Good causes are not lost for want of passion and energy, but for that defect of faith and openness, which is the worst destroyer of both, and the loss of which is the worst hazard produced by a defect of example. We should be surprised that the patriots, while they were about it, did not denounce Charles's anti-constitutional behaviour more than they did, and openly demand their rights as a matter of course; but it is easy to account for it upon the supposition that they were hampered with court connexions, and not sure of one another.

The worst thing to be said of Lord Russell (for as to the letters he wrote for pardon, they must be considered as obtained from him by his friends and a tender wife) is, that when Lord Stafford, the victim of a plot charged on the Papists, was sentenced to death, Russell opposed the King's privilege of dispensing with a barbarous part of the execution; so unworthy the rest of their character can men be rendered by party feeling, and so little do they foresee what they may themselves require in a day of adversity. When Charles II was applied to on the same point in behalf of Lord Russell, he is reported to have said, "Lord Russell shall find I am possessed of that prerogative, which in the case of Lord Stafford he thought fit to deny me." The sarcasm (if made—for there is no real authority for it) was cruel; but it is not to be denied, that Lord Stafford, a man old and feeble, whose protestations of innocence called forth tears from the spectators when he was on the scaffold, might have thought Russell's conduct equally so. Let us congratulate ourselves, that the fiery trials which men of all parties have gone through, have enabled us to benefit by their experience, to be grateful for what was noble in them, and to learn (with modesty) how to avoid what was infirm.

Lord Russell, besides the general regard of posterity, has left two glorious testimonies to his honour,—his behaviour in his last days, and the inextinguishable grief of one of the best of women. The latter, the celebrated Lady Rachael Russell, the daughter of Charles's best servant, Southampton, threw herself at the King's feet, "and pleaded," says Hume, "with many tears, the merit and loyalty of her father, as an atonement for those errors into which honest, however mistaken, principles had seduced her husband. These supplications were the last instance of female weakness (if they deserve the name) which she betrayed. Finding all applications vain, she collected courage, and not only fortified herself against the fatal blow, but endeavoured by her example to strengthen the resolution of her unfortunate lord." Echard says, that Charles refused her a reprieve of six weeks. If so, he probably feared some desperate attempt in Russell's favour; which in fact was proposed, as we shall see; and it is possible, that remembering what had happened to Charles I, and conscious of his own deserts, he might really have thought that Lord Russell would willingly have seen him put to death; for Rapin tells us that he said, in answer to Lady Rachael, "How can I grant that man six weeks, who, if it had been in his power, would not have granted me six hours?" And Lord Dartmouth, in his notes upon Burnet tells us, that when his (Dartmouth's) father represented to the King the obligations which a pardon would lay upon a great family, and the regard that was due to Southampton's daughter and her children, the King answered, "All that is true; but it is as true, that if I do not take his life, he will soon have mine;" "which," says Dartmouth, "would admit of no reply."† Some, however, have said, that the King would have granted Russell his life, if he had not been afraid of his brother, the Duke of York; and as an instance of what was thought of the characters of these two princes, whether the story is true or not, it was added, that Charles did not like to hear any discourses about the pardon, because he could not grant it; whereas James would hear anything, though he resolved to grant nothing.

Every other effort was made to save the life of Russell. "Money," says Burnet, "was offered to the Lady Portsmouth, and to all that had credit, and that without measure. He was pressed to send petitions and submissions to the King, and to the Duke: but he left it to his friends to consider how far these might go, and how they were to be worded. All that he was brought to was, to offer to live beyond sea, in any place that the King should name; and never to meddle any more in English affairs. But all was in vain. Both King and Duke were fixed in their resolutions; but with this difference, as Lord Rochester afterwards told me, that the Duke suffered some, among whom he was one, to argue the point with him, but the King could not bear the discourse. Some said, that the Duke moved that he might be executed in Southampton square before his own house, but that the King rejected that as indecent. So Lincoln's Inn Fields was appointed for the place of his execution."

As a last resource, Lord Cavendish offered to attack the coach on either side with a troop of horse, and take his friend out of it; but Russell would not consent to bring any one into jeopardy in his behalf.

It has been said that Lincoln's Inn Fields was chosen, in order that the people might witness the triumph of the court, in seeing him led through the city; but others have reasonably observed upon this, that as he was to be taken from Newgate, the desire of making him a spectacle to the citizens would have been better gratified by his being carried to the old place of execution, the Tower. It is most probable, that Lincoln's Inn Fields was selected, as being the nearest feasible spot to the great town-property of the Bedford family; Bloomsbury lying opposite, and Covent garden on one side.

The following is the letter addressed to the King by Russell's father, followed by that of Russell himself, which Burnet has mentioned as being drawn from him by his friends.

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.
The humble petition of William, Earl of Bedford:
"Humbly sheweth;

"That could your petitioner have been admitted into your presence, he would have laid himself at your royal feet, in behalf of his unfortunate son, himself, and his distressed and disconsolate family, to implore your royal mercy, which he never had the presumption to think could be obtained by any indirect means. But shall think himself, wife, and children, much happier to be left but with bread and water, than to lose his dear son for so foul a crime as treason against the best of princes; for whose life he ever did, and ever shall pray, more than for his own.

"May God incline your Majesty's heart to the prayers of an afflicted old father, and not bring grey hairs with sorrow to my grave.

"BEDFORD."

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.
The humble petition of William Russell:

"Most humbly sheweth;
"That your petitioner does once more cast himself at your Majesty's feet, and implores, with all humility, your mercy and pardon, still avowing that he never had the least thought against your Majesty's life, nor any design to change the government; but humbly and sorrowfully confesses his having been present at those meetings, which he is convinced were unlawful, and justly provoking to your Majesty; but being betrayed by ignorance and inadvertence, he did not decline them as he ought to have done, for which he is truly and heartily sorry; and therefore humbly offers himself to your Majesty, to be determined to live in any part of the world which you shall appoint, and never to meddle any more in the affairs of England, but as your Majesty shall be pleased to command me.

"May it therefore please your Majesty to extend your royal favour and mercy to your petitioner, by which he will be for ever engaged to pray for your Majesty, and to devote his life to your service.

"WILLIAM RUSSELL."

The third is to the Duke of York. It is certainly to be regretted, that these letters were drawn from a patriot, willing, there is no doubt, to have endured all extremities without compromising the dignity of conscious right: but the reader will bear in mind what has been said of them; and we shall see presently what the writer said of the present one.

"May it please your Highness;

"The opposition I have appeared in to your Highness's interest, has been such, as I have scarce the confidence to be a petitioner to you, though in order to the saving of my life. Sir, God knows what I did, did not proceed from any personal ill will, or animosity to your Royal Highness, but merely because I was of opinion, that it was the best way for observing the religion established by law, in which, if I was mistaken, yet I acted sincerely, without any ill end in it. And as for any base design against your person, I hope your Royal Highness will be so just to me as not to think me capable of so vile a thought. But I am now resolved, and do faithfully engage myself, that if it shall please the King to pardon me, and if your Royal Highness will interpose in it, I will in no sort meddle any more, but will be readily determined to live in any part of the world which his Majesty shall prescribe, and will never fail in my daily prayers, both for his Majesty's preservation and honour, and your Royal Highness's happiness, and will wholly withdraw myself from the affairs of England, unless called by his Majesty's orders to serve him, which I shall never be wanting to do, to the uttermost of my power. And if your Royal Highness will be so gracious to me, as to move on my account, as it will be an engagement upon me, beyond what I can in reason expect, so it will make the deepest impressions on me possible; for no fear of death can work so much with me, as so great an obligation will for ever do upon me. May it please your Royal Highness, your Royal Highness's most humble and most obedient servant,

"W. RUSSELL."

"Newgate, July 16th, 1683."

Burnet says of this last letter, which he tells us was written at the "earnest solicitations" of Lady Rachael, that as Russell was folding it up, he said to him, "This will be printed, and will be selling about the streets as my submission, when I am led out to be hanged."

All efforts failed, and the patriot and husband composed himself to die. The touching particulars of his last days we shall extract from the account of his friend, Bishop Burnet. It is one that, as it contains no disputed points, may be safely relied on; and indeed, if we had not wished to show how interested we are in the case of this advancer of public right, and how anxious to spare no proper trouble for our readers, we might safely have copied the whole case from the lively pages of that historian, whose writings, whatever may have been his faults of partizanship and complexion, have risen in value, in proportion as documents come to light. A great modern statesman, equally qualified to judge of it, both as a politician and a man, alludes with interesting emotion to Burnet's account of his last hours. Speaking of the dying behaviour of Russell and Sidney, he says, "In courage they are equal, but the fortitude of Russell, who was connected with the world by private and domestic ties, which Sidney was not, was put to the severer trial; and the story of the last days of this excellent man's life fills the mind with such a mixture of tenderness and admiration, that I know not any scene in history that more powerfully excites our sympathy, or goes more directly to the heart."

"The last week of his life," says Burnet, "he was shut up all the morning, as he himself desired. And about noon I came to him, and staid with him till night. All the while he expressed a very Christian temper, without sharpness or resentment, vanity or affectation. His whole behaviour looked like a triumph over death. Upon some occasions, as at table, or when his friends came to see him, he was decently cheerful. I was by him when the sheriffs came to show him the warrant for his execution. He read it with indifference: and when they were gone he told me it was not decent to be merry with such a matter, otherwise he was near telling Rich (who, though he was now on the other side, yet had been a member of the House of Commons, and had voted for the exclusion), that they should never sit together in that house any more to vote for the bill of exclusion. The day before his death he fell a bleeding at the nose: upon that he said to me pleasantly, I shall not now let blood to divert this: that will be done to-morrow. At night it rained hard, and he said, such a rain to-morrow will spoil a great show, which was a dull thing in a rainy day. He said, the sins of his youth lay heavy upon his mind: but he hoped God had forgiven them, for he was sure he had forsaken them, and for many years he had walked before God with a sincere heart. If in his public actions he had committed errors, they were only the errors of his understanding; for he had no private ends, nor ill designs of his own in them: he was still of opinion that the King was limited by law, and that when he broke through those limits, his subjects might defend themselves and restrain him. He thought a violent death was a very desirable way of ending one's life: it was only the being exposed to be a little gazed at, and to suffer the pain of one minute, which, he was confident, was not equal to the pain of drawing a tooth. He said he felt none of those transports that some good people felt; but he had a full calm in his mind, no palpitation at heart, nor trembling at the thoughts of death. He was much concerned at the cloud that seemed to be now over his country: but he hoped his death would do more service than his life could have done.

"This was the substance of the discourse between him and me. Tillotson was off with him that last week. We thought the party had gone too quick in their consultations, and too far; and that resistance in the condition we were then in was not lawful. He said he had leisure to enter into discourses of politics; but he thought a government limited by law was only a name, if the subjects might not maintain these limitations by force; otherwise all was at the discretion of the Prince: that was contrary to all the notions he had lived in of our government.* But, he said, there was nothing among them but the embryos of things that were never like to have any effect, and they were now quite dissolved. He thought it was necessary for him to leave a paper behind him at his death: and, because he had not been accustomed to draw such papers, he desired me to give him a scheme of the heads fit to be spoken to, and of the order in which they should be laid: which I did. And he was three days employed for some time in the morning to write out his speech. He ordered four copies to be made of it, all which he signed; and gave the original with three of the copies to his lady, and kept the other to give to the sheriffs on the scaffold. He writ it with great ease, and the passages that were tender he writ in papers apart, and showed them to his lady and to myself, before he writ them out fair. He was very easy when this was ended. He also wrote a letter to the King, in which he asked pardon for everything he had said or done contrary to his duty, protesting he was innocent as to all designs against his person or government, and that his heart was ever devoted to that which he thought was his Majesty's true interest. He added that, though he thought he had met with hard measure, yet he forgave all concerned in it, from the highest to the lowest; and ended, hoping that his Majesty's displeasure at him would cease with his own life, and that no part of it should fall on his wife and children. The day before his death, he received the sacrament from Tillotson with much devotion. And I preached two short sermons to him, which he heard with great affection. And we were shut up till towards the evening. Then he suffered his children that were very young, and some few of his friends, to take leave of him; in which he maintained his constancy of temper, though he was a very fond father. He also parted from his lady with a composed silence; and as soon as she was gone, he said, to me, the bitterness of death is passed; for he loved and esteemed her beyond expression, as she well deserved it in all respects. She had the command of herself so much, that at parting she gave him no disturbance. He went into his chamber about midnight, and I staid all night in the outward room. He went not to bed till about two in the morning; and was fast asleep at four, when, according to his order, we called him. He was quickly dressed, but would lose no time in shaving; for he said, he was not concerned in his good looks that day."

"Lord Russell," continues Burnet, "seemed to have some satisfaction to find that there was no truth in the whole contrivance of the Rye Plot; so that he hoped that infamy, which now blasted their party, would soon go off. He went into his chamber six or seven times in the morning, and prayed by himself, and then came out to Tillotson and me: he drank a little tea and some sherry. He wound up his watch, and said, now he had done with time, and was going to eternity. He asked what he should give the executioner: I told him ten guineas: he said, with a smile, it was a pretty thing to give a fee to have his head cut off. When the sheriffs called him about ten o'clock, Lord Cavendish was waiting below to take leave of him. They embraced very tenderly. Lord Russell, after he had left him, upon a sudden thought came back to him, and pressed him earnestly to apply himself more to religion, and told him what great comfort and support he felt from it now in his extremity. Lord Cavendish had very generously offered to manage his escape, and to stay in prison for him while he should go away in his clothes; but he would not hearken to the motion. The Duke of Monmouth had also sent me word to let him know, that if he thought it could do him any service, he would come in and run fortunes with him. He answered, it would be of no advantage to him to have his friends die with him. Tillotson and I went in the coach with him to the place of execution. Some of the crowd that filled the streets wept, while others insulted; he was touched by the tenderness that the one gave him, but did not seem at all provoked by the other. He was singing psalms a great part of the way; and said, he hoped to sing better very soon.* As he observed the great crowds of people all the way, he said to us, I hope I shall quickly see a much better assembly. When he came to the scaffold, he walked about it four or five times. Then he turned to the sheriffs, and delivered his paper. He protested that he had always been far from any designs against the King's life or government. He prayed God would preserve both, and the Protestant religion. He wished all Protestants might love one another, and not make way for Popery by their animosities."

Of the paper given by Russell to the sheriffs, Burnet has given the following honest abridgment. This testament of patriotism made a great sensation. To posterity, who have so benefited by its spirit, it is surely still of great interest.

"The substance of the paper he gave them," says Burnet, "was, first a profession of his religion, and of his sincerity in it: that he was of the Church of England: but wished all would unite together against the common enemy; that churchmen would be less severe, and dissenters less scrupulous. He owned, he had a great zeal against Popery, which he looked on as an idolatrous and bloody religion: but that, though he was at all times ready to venture his life for his religion or his country, yet that would never have carried him to a black or wicked design. No man ever had the impudence to move to him anything with relation to the King's life: he prayed heartily for him, that in his person and government he might be happy, both in this world and the next. He protested that in the prosecution of the Popish Plot he had gone on in the sincerity of his heart; and that he never knew of any practice with the witnesses. He owned he had been earnest in the matter of the exclusion, as the best way, in his opinion, to secure both the King's life and the Protestant religion: and to that he imputed his present sufferings: but he forgave all concerned in them; and charged his friends to think of no revenges. He thought his sentence was hard: upon which he gave an account of all that had passed at Shepherd's. From the heats that were in choosing the sheriffs, he concluded that matter would end as it now did, and he was not much surprised to find it fall upon himself: he wished it might end in him: killing by forms of law was the worst sort of murder. He concluded with some very devout ejaculations.

"After he had delivered this paper, he prayed by himself, then Tillotson prayed with him. After that he prayed again by himself: and then undressed himself and laid his head on the block, without the least change of countenance: and it was cut off at two strokes."

The following additional particulars are from Burnet's 'Journal':—

"When my lady went, he said he wished she would give over beating every bush, and running so about for his preservation. But, when he considered that it would be some mitigation of her sorrow afterwards, that she left nothing undone that could have given any probable hopes, he acquiesced: and, indeed, I never saw his heart so near failing him, as when he spoke of her. Sometimes I saw a tear in his eye, and he would turn about and presently change the discourse.

"At ten o'clock my lady left him. He kissed her four or five times; and she kept her sorrow so within herself, that she gave him no disturbance by their parting. After she was gone, he said, 'Now the bitterness of death is passed,' and ran out a long discourse concerning her—how great a blessing she had been to him; and said what a misery it would have been to him, if she had not had that magnanimity of spirit, joined to her tenderness, as never to have desired him to do a base thing for the saving of his life: whereas, otherwise, what a week should I have passed, if she had been crying on me to turn informer, and be a Lord Howard. Though he then repeated what he often before said, that he knew of nothing whereby the peace of the nation was in danger; and that all that ever was, was either loose discourse, or at most embryos, that never came to anything, so that there was nothing on foot, to his knowledge.

"As we came to turn into Little Queen street, he said, I have often turned to the other hand with great comfort, but now I turn to this with greater, and looked towards his own house; and then, as the Dean of Canterbury, who sat over against him, told me, he saw a tear or two fall from him.

"When he had lain down, I looked once at him and saw no change in his looks; and though he was still lifting up his hands, there was no trembling;

* In his Journal, Burnet says that he often sung "within himself," but that the words were not audible. When his companion asked him what he was singing, he said the beginning of the 119th Psalm. It is stated in the life by his descendant (who has added some original passages from papers at Woburn), that "just as they were entering Lincoln's Inn Fields, he said, 'This has been to me a place of sinning, and God now makes it the place of my punishment.' He had lived freely in his youth, though he is not the Russell spoken of in the Memoirs of Grammont, as many are led to believe by the engravings of him inserted in that work. The person there mentioned was a cousin.

though, in the moment in which I looked the executioner happened to be laying the axe to his neck, to direct him to take aim. I thought it touched him; but I am sure he seemed not to mind it."

The widow of Lord Russell, daughter of the Lord Southampton above-mentioned, the most honest man ever known to have been in the service of Charles the Second, was grand-daughter of Shakespeare's Southampton, and appears to have united in her person the qualities of both. She was at once a pattern of good sense, and of romantic affection. Nor are the two things incompatible, when either of them exist in the highest degree; as she proved during the remainder of her life; for though she continued a widow all the rest of it, and it was a very long one, and though she never ceased regretting her lord's death, and had great troubles besides, yet the high sense she had of the duties of a human being, enabled her to enjoy consolations that ordinary pleasure might have envied; first, in the education of her children, and secondly, in the tranquillity which health and temperance forced upon her. Her letters, with which the public are well acquainted, are not more remarkable for the fidelity they evince to her husband's memory, than for the fine sense they display in all matters upon which the prejudices of education had left her a free judgment, and especially for their delightful candour. It has been thought, that the blindness into which she fell in her old age, was owing to weeping; but Mr Howell, the judicious editor of the 'State Trials,' informs us, upon the authority of "a very learned, skilful, and experienced physiologist," "that a cataract, which seems," he says, "to have been the malady of Lady Russell's eyes, is by no means likely to be produced by weeping."

We will here insert a few of the most touching passages from the 'Letters of Lady Russell' (seventh edition, 1819). On the 30th of September, she writes thus to her friend, Dr Fitzwilliam:—

"I endeavour to make the best use I can of both (a letter and prayer which the Doctor sent her); but I am so evil and unworthy a creature, that though I have desires, yet I have no disposition, or worthiness, towards receiving comfort." And again:—"I know I have deserved my punishment, and will be silent under it; but yet secretly my heart mourns, and cannot be comforted, because I have not the dear companion and sharer of all my joys and sorrows. I want him to talk with, to walk with, to eat and sleep with; all these things are irksome to me now; all company and meals I could avoid, if it might be; yet all this, that I enjoy not the world in my own way, and this same hinders my comfort; when I see my children before me, I remember the pleasure he took in them; this makes my heart shrink."

On the 21st July, 1685, the anniversary of her husband's death, two years after it, she writes thus:—"My languishing weary spirit rises up slowly to all good; yet I hope by God's abundant grace, in time, your labours will work the same effect in my spirits: they will, indeed, in less time on others better disposed and prepared than I am, who in the day of affliction seem to have no remembrance with due thankfulness of prosperity."

In a letter written the 4th October, 1686, she says, speaking of a recovery of one of her children from sickness: "I hope this has been a sorrow I shall profit by; I shall, if God will strengthen my faith, resolve to return him a constant praise, and make this the season to chase all secret murmurs from grieving my soul for what is past, letting it rejoice in what it should rejoice, his favour to me, in the blessings I have left, which many of my betters want, and yet have lost their chiefest friend also. But oh, Doctor! the manner of my deprivation is yet astonishing."

The following is dated five years after her loss. She is speaking of a letter she wrote once a week to Dr Fitzwilliam. Her grief had now begun to taste the sweets of patience and temperance; but we see still how real it is:—"I can't but own there is a sort of secret delight in the privacy of one of those mournful days; I think, besides a better reason, one is, that I do not tie myself up as I do on other days; for, God knows, my eyes are ever ready to pour out marks of a sorrowful heart, which I shall carry to the grave, that quiet bed of rest."

In 1692, Lady Russell writes less patiently; but shortly afterwards appears to have regained her composure; and in Letter 134, there is a remark on the blessings of health, and on the comfort of being able to do one's duty, if we aim at it. In 1711, she lost her only son the Duke of Bedford, in his 31st year; and six months afterwards was deprived of one of her daughters, who died in child-bed. It was on this occasion that an affecting anecdote is told. She had another daughter, who happened to be in child-bed also; and as it was necessary to conceal from her the death of her sister, this admirable woman assumed a cheerful air, and in answer to her daughter's anxious inquiries, said, with an extraordinary colouring of the fact, for which a martyr to truth could have loved her, "I have seen your sister out of bed to-day."

We intended not to omit the following charming passage from her letters, and therefore add it here. It is in the letter last quoted:—"My friendships have made all the joys and troubles of my life; and yet who would live and not love? Those who have tried the insipidness of it would, I believe, never choose it. Mr Waller says, 'tis (with singing) all we know they do above! And 'tis enough; for if there is so charming a delight in the love, and suitableness in humours, to creatures! what must it be to the clarified spirits to love in the presence of God!"

—The passage from Waller is,

"What know we of the blest above,

But that they sing and that they love?"

Certainly, if ever there was an angel upon earth, this woman was one. Compare the above extracts with a letter from her to her husband, written in the year 1681, and published in the work of Lord John Russell, vol. ii. p. 2. It is a true loving happy wife's letter, and renders the contrast inexpressibly affecting.

The present ducal family of Bedford have the honour to be lineally descended from these two excellent persons, and to derive their very dukedom from public virtue—a rare patent. And they have shown that they estimate the honour. What must not Lady Russell have felt, when James II, within six years after the destruction of her husband, was forced to give up his throne? And what, above all, must she not have felt, when she heard of the answer given by her aged father-in-law to the same prince, who had the meanness, or want of imagination, to apply to him in his distress? "My Lord," said James to the Earl of Bedford, "you are an honest man, have great credit, and can do me signal service."—"Ah, sir," replied the Earl, "I am old and feeble, but I once had a son." The King is said to have been so struck with this reply, that he was silent for some minutes. With this anecdote we may well terminate our account of the patriot Russell.*

* We quote the Earl of Bedford's reply from 'Granger's Biographical History,' not being able to refer to Ortery, who, we believe is the authority for it. 'Burnet's Journal' is to be found at the end of 'Lord Russell's Life,' by his descendant.

One [remark, however, we must make. It has been asserted, that the great reason why the Whigs of those days wished to keep the Catholics out of power, was the dread of losing their estates as well as political influence, and of being obliged to give up the Abbey lands. There may have been a good deal of truth in this, and yet the rest of their feelings have been very sincere nevertheless. Men may be educated in undue notions of the value of wealth and property, and yet prove their possession of nobler thoughts, when brought to heroic issues of life and death.

The house in this square (Lincoln's Inn,) at the corner of Great Queen street, with a passage under its side, was once called Newcastle House, and was occupied by the well-known duke of that name, minister of George II. Pennant says it was built about the year 1686, "by the Marquis of Powis, and called Powis House, and afterwards sold to the late noble owner. The architect was Captain William Winde." It is said, he adds, "that government had it once in contemplation to have bought and settled it officially on the great seal. At that time it was inhabited by the lord keeper, Sir Nathan Wright." It is at present occupied by the Society for the diffusion of the Bible.

The Marquis of Powis, here mentioned, had scarcely built his house in the square where Lord Russell was beheaded, when he saw his lordship's destroyer forced to leave his throne. The Marquis followed his fortunes, and was created by him Duke of Powis.

A laughable, and, we believe, true story, connected with the Duke of Newcastle's residence in this house, is told in a curious miscellany intitled 'The Lounger's Common-Place Book.' "This nobleman," says the writer, "with many good points, and described by a popular contemporary poet as almost eaten up by his zeal for the house of Hanover, was remarkable for being profuse of his promises on all occasions, and valued himself particularly on being able to anticipate the words or the wants of the various persons who attended his levees, before they uttered a word; this sometimes led him into ridiculous embarrassments; but it was his tendency to lavish promises which gave occasion for the anecdote I am going to relate.

"At the election of a certain borough of Cornwall, where the opposite interests were almost equally poised, a single vote was of the highest importance; this object, the Duke, by well-applied arguments, and personal application, at length attained, and the gentleman he recommended gained his election.

"In the warmth of gratitude, his Grace poured forth acknowledgments and promises without ceasing, on the fortunate possessor of the casting vote; called him his best and dearest friend, protested that he should consider himself as for ever indebted; that he would serve him by night or by day.

"The Cornish voter, an honest fellow, as things go, and who would have thought himself sufficiently paid, but for such a torrent of acknowledgments, thanked the duke for his kindness, and told him, 'The supervisor of excise was old and infirm, and if he would have the goodness to recommend his son-in-law to the commissioners, in case of the old man's death, he should think himself and his family bound to render government every assistance in his power, on any future occasion.'

"My dear friend, why do you ask for such a trifling employment?" exclaimed his Grace, "your relation shall have it at a word speaking the moment it is vacant."—"But how shall I get admitted to you, my Lord; for, in London, I understand, it is a very difficult business to get a sight of you great folks, though you are so kind and complaisant to us in the country."—"The instant the man dies," replied the premier, used to and prepared for the freedom of a contested election,—"the moment he dies, set out post-haste for London; drive directly to my house, by night or by day, sleeping or waking, dead or alive, thunder at the door; I will leave word with my porter to show you up stairs directly, and the employment shall be disposed of according to your wishes.'

"The parties separated; the Duke drove to a friend's house in the neighbourhood, where he was visiting, without a wish or a design of seeing his new acquaintance, till that day seven years; but the memory of a Cornish elector not being loaded with such a variety of subjects, was more retentive; the supervisor died a few months after, and the ministerial partisan, relying on the word of a peer, was conveyed to London post-haste, and ascended with alacrity the steps of a large house, now divided into three, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, at the corner of Great Queen street.

"The reader should be informed that precisely at the moment when the expectations of a considerable party of a borough in Cornwall were roused by the death of a supervisor, no less a person than the King of Spain was expected hourly to depart; an event in which the minister of Great Britain was particularly concerned.

"The Duke of Newcastle, on the very night that the proprietor of the decisive vote was at his door, had sat up, anxiously expecting despatches from Madrid: wearied by official business and agitated spirits, he retired to rest, having previously given particular instructions to his porter not to go to bed, as he expected every minute a messenger with advices of the greatest importance, and desired he might be shown up stairs the moment of his arrival.

"His Grace was sound asleep; for, with a thousand singularities, of which the rascals about him did not forget to take advantage, his worst enemies could not deny him the merit of good design, that best solace in a solitary hour; the porter, settled for the night in his chair, had already commenced a sonorous nap, when the vigorous arm of the Cornish voter roused him from his slumbers.

"To his first question, 'Is the duke at home?' the porter replied, 'Yes, and in bed, but has left particular orders that, come when you will, you are to go up to him directly.'—"God for ever bless him, a worthy and honest gentleman," cried our applier for the vacant post, smiling and nodding with approbation at a prime minister's so accurately keeping his promise; 'how punctual his Grace is; I knew he would not deceive me; let me hear no more of lords and dukes not keeping their words; I believe, verily, they are as honest and mean as well as other folks, but I can't always say the same of those who are about them;' repeating these words as he ascended the stairs, the Burgess of ——— was ushered into the Duke's bed-chamber.

"Is he dead?" exclaimed his Grace, rubbing his eyes, and scarcely awaked from dreaming of the King of Spain, 'Is he dead?' 'Yes, my Lord,' replied the eager expectant, delighted to find that the election promise, with all its circumstances, was so fresh in the minister's memory. 'When did he die?'—"They day before yesterday, exactly at half-past one o'clock, after being confined three weeks to his bed, and taking a power of doctor's stuff; and I hope your Grace will be as good as your word, and let my son-in-law succeed him.'

"The Duke, by this time perfectly awake, was staggered at the impossibility of receiving intelligence from Madrid in so short a space of time, and perplexed at the absurdity of a king's messenger applying for his son-in-law to succeed the King of Spain: 'Is the man drunk or mad; where are your despatches?' exclaimed his Grace, hastily drawing back his curtain; when, instead of a royal courier, his eager eye recognised at the bed-side the well-known countenance of his friend in Cornwall, making low bows, with hat in hand, and 'hoping my Lord would not forget the gracious promise he was so good as to make in favour of his son-in-law at the last election at ———.'

"Vexed at so untimely a disturbance, and disappointed of news from Spain, he frowned for a few seconds, but chagrin soon gave way to mirth at so singular and ridiculous a combination of opposite circumstances; yielding to the irritation, he sunk on the bed in a violent fit of laughter, which, like the electrical fluid, was communicated in a moment to his attendants.*

Great Queen street, in the time of the Stuarts, was one of the grandest and most fashionable parts of the town. The famous Lord Herbert of Cheshire died there. Lord Bristol had a house in it, Lord Chancellor Finch, and the Conway and Parnell families. Some of the houses towards the west retain pilasters and other ornaments, probably indicating, as Pennant observes, the shades in question. Little thought the noble lords, that a time would come, when a player should occupy their rooms, and be able to entertain their descendants in them; but in a house of this description now (or lately) occupied by Messrs Allman the booksellers, died Lewis, the comedian, one of the most delightful performers of his class, and famous to the last for his invincible airiness and juvenility. Mr Lewis displayed a combination rarely to be found in acting, that of the top and the real gentleman. With a voice, a manner, and a person, all equally graceful and light, and features at once whimsical and genteel, he played on the top of his profession like a plume. He was the Mercutio of the age, in every sense of the word unmerciful. His airy, breathless voice, thrown to the audience before he appeared, was the signal of his winged animal spirits, and when he gave a glance of his eye, or touched his finger at another's ribs, it was the very punctum saliens of playfulness and innuendo. We saw him take leave of the public, a man of sixty-five, looking not more than half the age, in the character of the Copper Captain, and heard him say in a voice broken by emotion, that "for the space of thirty years he had not once incurred their displeasure."

Next door but one to the Freemason's Tavern, for many years lived another celebrated comic performer, Miss Pope, one of a very different sort, and looking as heavy and insipid as her taste was otherwise. She was an actress of the highest order for dry humour; one of those who convey the most laughable things with a grave face. Churchill, in the Roscius, when she must have been very young, mentions her as an actress of great vivacity, advancing in a "jig," and performing the parts of Cherry and Polly Honeycomb. There was certainly nothing of the Cherry and Honeycomb about her when older; but she was an admirable Mrs Malaprop.

Queen street continued to be a place of fashionable resort for a considerable period after the Revolution. As we have been speaking of the advancement of actors in social rank, we will take occasion of the birth of Martin Folkes in this street, the celebrated scholar and antiquary, to mention that he was one of the earliest persons among the gentry to marry an actress. His wife was Lucretia Bradshaw. It may be thought worth observing by the romantic, that the ladies who were first selected to give this rise to the profession, had all something peculiar in their Christian names. Lord Peterborough married Anastasia Robinson, and the Duke of Bolton, Lavinia Fenton.

Sir Godfrey Kneller, and Radcliffe the physician, lived in this street. We mention them together because they were neighbours, and there is a pleasant anecdote of them in conjunction. The author of a book lately published describes their neighbourhood as being in Bow street; but Horace Walpole, the authority for the story, places it in the street before us; adding, in a note, that Kneller "first lived in Durham yard (in the Strand), then twenty-one years in Covent Garden (we suppose in Bow street), and lastly in Great Queen street, Lincoln's Inn Fields." "Kneller," says Walpole, "was fond of flowers, and had a fine collection. As there was great intimacy between him and the physician, he permitted the latter to have a door into his garden; but Radcliffe's servants gathering and destroying the flowers, Kneller sent him word he must shut up the door. Radcliffe replied peevishly,—"Tell him he may do anything with it but paint it." "And I," answered Sir Godfrey, "can take anything from him but physic."*

Kneller, besides being an admired painter (and it is supposed from one of his performances, the portrait of a Chinese, that he could have been admired by posterity, if he chose), was a man of wit; but so vain, that he is described as being the butt of all the wits his acquaintances. They played upon him, undoubtedly, and at a great rate; but it has been suggested by a shrewd observer, that while he consented to have his vanity tickled at any price, he humoured the joke himself, and was quite aware of what they were at. Nor is this inconsistent with the vanity; which would always make large allowances for the matter of fact. The extravagance it would limit where it pleased; the truth remained; and Sir Godfrey, as Pope said, had a large appetite. With this probability, a new interest is thrown upon the anecdotes related of his vanity; with the best of which the reader is accordingly presented. Kneller was a German, born at Lubec; so that his English is to be read with a foreign accent.

The younger Richardson tells us, that Gay read Sir Godfrey a copy of verses, in which he had pushed his flattery so far, that he was all the while in dread lest the knight should detect him. When Kneller had heard this through, he said, in his foreign style and accent, "Ay, Mr Gay, all what you have said is very fine, and very true; but you have forgot one thing, my good friend; by G—, I should have been a general of an army; for when I was at Venice, there was a grandolo, and all the Place St Mark was in a smoke of gunpowder, and I did like the smell, Mr Gay; should have been a great general, Mr Gay!"

Perhaps it was this real or apparent obtuseness which induced Gay to add "engineering" to his other talents, in the verses describing Pope's welcome from Greece:

"Kneller amid the triumph bears his part,
"Who could (were mankind lost) a new create:
What can the extent of his vast soul confine?
A painter, critic, engineer, divine?"

The following is related on the authority of Pope:—"Old Jacob Tonsen got a great many fine pictures, and two of himself, from him, by this means. Sir Godfrey was very covetous, but then he was very vain, and a great glutton; so he played these passions against the others; besides telling him that he was the greatest master that ever was, sending him, every now and then, a haunch of venison, and dozens of excellent claret. 'O, my G—, man (said he once to Vander Guebt), this old Jacob loves me; he is a very good man; you see he loves me, he sends me good things; the venison was fat.' Old Geakie, the surgeon, got several fine pictures of him too, and an excellent one of himself; but then he had them cheaper, for he gave nothing but praises; but then his praises were as fat as Jacob's venison; neither could he too fat for Sir Godfrey."

Pope related the following to Spence:—"As I was sitting by Sir Godfrey Kneller one day, whilst he was drawing a picture, he stopt, and said, 'I can't do as well as I should do, unless you flatter me a little, Mr Pope! You know I love to be flattered.' I was for once willing," continues Pope, "to try how far this vanity would carry him: and after considering a picture which he had just finished, for a good while very attentively, I said to him in French (for he had been talking for some time before in that language), 'On lit dans les Ecritures Saintes, que le bon Dieu faisoit l'homme après son image: mais, je crois, que s'il voudroit faire un autre à présent, qu'il le feroit après l'image que voilà.' Sir Godfrey turned round, and said very gravely, 'Vous avez raison, Monsieur Pope; par Dieu, je le crois aussi.'"

It must not be omitted that Kneller was a kind-hearted man. At Whitton, where he had a seat, he was justice of the peace, and "was so much more swayed," says Walpole, "by equity than law, that his judgments, accompanied with humour, are said to have occasioned those lines by Pope:

'I think Sir Godfrey should decide the suit,
Who sent the thief (that stole the cash) away,
And punished him that put it in his way.'

"This alluded to his dismissing a soldier who had stolen a joint of meat, and accused the butcher of having tempted him by it. Whenever Sir Godfrey was applied to, to determine what parish a poor man belonged to, he always inquired which parish was the richer, and settled the poor man there; nor would he ever sign a warrant to distrain the goods of a poor man who could not pay a tax."

Poor Radcliffe, after resigning as a physician so despotically, that Arbuthnot, in his projected map of diseases, was for putting him up at the corner of it, disposing the empire of the world, became a less happy butt than Sir Godfrey, by reason of his falling in love in his old age. He set up a coach, adorned with mythological paintings,—at least, Steele says so; but soon had to put it in mourning for the death of his flame, who was a Miss Tempest, one of the maids of honour. Radcliffe was the Tory physician, and Steele, in the 'Tatler,' with a party spirit that was much oftener aggrieved than provoked in that good-natured writer, was induced, by some circumstance or other, perhaps Radcliffe's insolence, to make a ludicrous description of him, as "the mourning Esculapius, the languishing, hopeless lover of the divine Hebe." Steele accuses him of avarice. Others have said he was generous. He was the founder of the Radcliffe Library at Oxford, and made other magnificent bequests; which prove nothing either way. But it is not favourable to a reputation for generosity, to own (as he did), that he was fond of spunging, and to avoid the paying of bills. However, when he lost 5,000*l.* in a speculation, he said, "he had nothing to do but to go up so many pair of stairs to make himself whole again." He was undoubtedly a very clever physician, though he made little use of books. Like many men who go upon their own grounds in this way, he had an abrupt and clownish manner, which he probably thought of use. According to Richardson, he one day said to Dr Mead, "Mead, I love you; now I will tell you a sure secret to make your fortune. Use all mankind ill." It is worth observing, that Mead acted on the reverse principle, and made double the fortune of his adviser. Radcliffe is said to have attended the lady of Judge Holt, in a bad illness, with unusual assiduity, "out of pique to her husband;" a very new kind of satire. He used to send bustling messages to Queen Anne, telling her that he would not come, and that she only had the vapours; and when King William consulted him on his swollen ankles and thin body, Radcliffe said he "would not have his Majesty's two legs for his three kingdoms;" a speech, which it was not in the nature of royalty to forgive. His death is said to have been hastened by his refusal to attend on Queen Anne in her last illness; which so exasperated the populace that he was afraid to leave his country house at Canabham, where he died. He lived in Bow street when he first came to London; and afterwards in Bloomsbury square.

But the most remarkable inhabitant of Queen street was Lord Herbert of Cheshire, one of those extraordinary individuals who, with a touch of madness on the irascible side, and subject to the greatest blindness of self-love, possess a profound judgment on every other point. Such persons are supposed to be victims of imagination, but they are rather mechanical enthusiasts (though of a high order), and, for want of an acquaintance with the imaginative become at the mercy of the first notion which takes their will by surprise. Lord Herbert, who in the intellectual part was intended for a statist and a man of science, was unfortunately one of the hottest of Welshmen in the physical. Becoming a Knight of the Bath, he took himself for a knight-errant, and fancied he was bound to fight everybody he met with, and to lie under trees in the fields of Hol-land. He thought Revelation a doubtful matter, and so he had recourse to the Deity for a revelation in his particular favour to disprove it. We have related an anecdote of him at Northumberland house, and shall have more to tell; but the account of his having recourse to heaven for the satisfaction of his doubts of its interference, must not be omitted here. Perhaps it took place in the very street. His Lordship was the first Deist in England that has left an account of his opinions. Speaking of the work he wrote on this subject, he says, "My book 'De Veritate prout distinguitur à Revelatione verisimili, possibili, et à falso,' having been begun by me in England, and formed there in all its principal parts, was about this time finished; all the spare hours which I could get from my visits and negotiations being employed to perfect this work; which was no sooner done, but that I communicated it to Hugo Grotius, that great scholar, who, having escaped his prison in the Low Countries, came into France, and was much welcomed by me and Monsieur Tisotness, also one of the greatest scholars of his time; who, after they had perused it, and given it more commendations than is fit for me to repeat, exhorted me earnestly to print and publish it; howbeit, as the frame of my whole work was so different from anything which had been written heretofore, I found I must either renounce the authority of all that had written formerly, concerning the method of finding out truth, and consequently insist upon my own way, or hazard myself to a general censure concerning the whole argument of my book; I must confess it did not a little animate me, that the two great persons above-mentioned did so highly value it; yet, as I knew it would meet with much opposition, I did consider whether it was not better for me for a while to suppress it.

"Being thus doubtful in my chamber one fair day in the summer, my easement being open towards the south, the sun shining clear and no wind stirring, I took my book 'De Veritate,' in my hand, and kneeling on my knees devoutly said these words,—

"Oh, thou eternal God, author of the light which now shines upon me, and giver of all inward illuminations, I do beseech thee of thy infinite goodness to pardon a greater request than a sinner ought to make; I am not satisfied enough whether I shall publish this book 'De Veritate;' if it be for thy glory, I beseech thee give me some sign from heaven; if not, I shall suppress it."

"I had no sooner spoken these words, but a loud though gentle noise came from the heavens (for it was like nothing on earth) which did so comfort and cheer me, that I took my petition as granted, and that I had the sign I demanded; whereupon also I resolved to print my book. This (how strange soever it may seem) I protest, before the eternal God, is true; neither am I any way superstitiously deceived herein; since I did not only hear the noise, but, in the serenest sky that ever I saw, being without all cloud, did to my thinking see the place from whence it came."

"How could a man," justly observes Walpole on this passage, "who doubted of partial, believe individual revelation! What vanity to think his book of such importance to the cause of truth, that it could extort a declaration of the divine will, when the interest of half mankind could not!" Yet the same writer is full of admiration of him in other respects. It is well observed by the editor of his 'Autobiography,' in reply to the doubts thrown on his Lordship's veracity respecting his chivalrous propensities, the consequences of which always fell short of duels, that much of the secret might be owing "to his commanding aspect, and acknowledged reputation; and a little more to a certain perception of the Quixote in his character, with which it might be deemed futile to contend. His surprising defence of himself against the attack of Sir John Ayres forcibly exhibits his personal strength and mastery; and his spirited treatment of the French minister, Laynes, and the general esteem of his contemporaries, sufficiently attest his quick feeling of national and personal dignity, and general gallantry of bearing." There is no doubt, in short, that Lord Herbert of Chesham was a brave, an honest, and an able man, though with some weaknesses, both of heat and vanity, sufficient to console the most common-place.

It is an honour to Grotius, who wrote a book 'De Veritate' on the other side of the question, that he encouraged so renowned an antagonist to publish: though, perhaps, he saw less danger in it, than singularity. At all events, he could anticipate no harm from the chase.

With all this elegance of neighbourhood, Lincoln's Inn Fields, in the time of Charles II, had one eye-sore of an enormous description, in a place behind Holborn row, intitled Whetstone Park. It is now a decent passage between Great and Little Turnstiles. "It is scarcely necessary," says Mr Malcolm, "to remind the reader of a well-known fact, that all sublimity things are subject to change:—he who passes through the Little Turnstile, Holborn, at present, will observe on the left hand, near Lincoln's Inn Fields, a narrow street, composed of small buildings, on the corner of which is inscribed Whetstone Park. The repose and quiet of the place seem to proclaim strong pretensions to regular and moral life in the inhabitants; and well would it have been for the happiness of many a family, had the site always exhibited the same appearance. On the contrary, Whetstone Park contributed to increase the dissoluteness of manners which distinguished the period between 1660 and 1700. Being a place of low entertainment, numerous disturbances occurred there, and rendered it subject to the satire and reprehension even of 'Poor Robin's Intelligencer,' a paper almost infamous enough for the production of a keeper of this theatre of vice. The publication alluded to says, in 1676, "Notwithstanding the discourses that have been to the contrary, the boarding-school is still continued here, where a set of women may be readily taught all the studies of modesty or chastity; to which purpose they are provided with a two-handed volume of impudence, loosely bound up in greasy vellum, which is tied by the leg to a wicker chair, (as you find authors chained in a library,) and is always ready to give you plain instructions and directions in all matters relating to immorality or irreligion."

"Incomprehensible as it certainly is," continues our author, "the brutal acts of a mob are sometimes the result of a just sense of the ill-consequences attending vice; and, although almost every individual composing it is capable of performing deeds which deserve punishment from the police, they cannot collectively view long and deliberate offences against the laws of propriety, without assuming the right of reforming them." The Loyal and Impartial Mercury of Sept. 1, 1682, has this paragraph: "On Saturday last, about 500 apprentices, and such like, being got together in Smithfield, went into Lincoln's Inn Fields, where they drew up, and, marching into Whetstone Park, fell upon the lewd houses there, where, having broken open the doors, they entered, and made great spoil of the goods; of which the constables and watchmen having notice, and not finding themselves strong enough to quell the tumult, procured a party of the king's guards, who dispersed them, and took eleven who were committed to New Prison; yet on Sunday night they came again, and made worse havoc than before, breaking down all the doors and windows, and cutting the featherbeds and goods in pieces." Another newspaper explains the origin of the riot by saying, "that a countryman who had been decoyed into one of the houses alluded to, and robbed, lodged a formal and public complaint against them to those he found willing to listen to him in Smithfield, and thus raised the ferment."

In the 'State Poems' is a doggerel set of verses on a tragical circumstance occasioned by a frolic of three of Charles's natural sons in this place. It is intitled 'On the three Dukes killing the Beadle on Sunday morning, Feb. the 26th, 1671.' A great sensation was made by this circumstance, which was naturally enough regarded as a signal instance of the consequences of Charles's mode of life. Our Grub street writer selected his title well,—the 'Dukes,' the 'Beadle,' and the 'Sunday.' His first four lines might have been put into Martinus Scriblerus, as a specimen of the Newgate style.

"Near Holborn lies a park of great renown,
The place, I do suppose, is not unknown:
For brevity's sake the name I shall not tell,
Because most genteel readers know it well."

The three Dukes picked a quarrel with one poor darsel, and "murder" was cried.

"In came the watch, disturbed with sleep and ale,
By noises shrill, but they could not prevail;
To appease their Graces. Strait rose mortal jars,
Betwixt the night black-guard and silver stars:
Then fell the beadle by a ducal hand,
For daring to pronounce the saucy stand."

See what mishaps dare e'en invade Whitehall,
This silly fellow's death puts off the bail,
And disappoints the Queen, poor little chuck;
I warrant 't would have danced it like a duck.
The fiddlers, voices, entries, all the sport,
And the gay show put off, where the briek court
Anticipates in rich subsidy coats,
All that is got by necessary votes.
Yet shall Whitehall, the innocent, the good,
See these mendacies, all dandied with lace and blood."

The "subsidy-coats" allude to Charles's raising money for his profligate expenditure under pretence of the public service. The last couplet would have done credit to a better satire.

As we are upon the subject of a neighbourhood to which they apply, we shall proceed to give a few more extracts from Mr Malcolm, highly characteristic of the lower orders of desperadoes in Charles's reign. "The various deceivers," he tells us, "who preyed upon the publick at this time were exposed in a little filthy work called the 'Canting Academy,' which went through more than one edition (the 2nd is dated 1674). I shall select from it enough to show the variety of villany practiced under their various names. The Ruffler was a wretch who assumed the character of a maimed soldier, and begged from the chains of Naseby, Edgehill, Newbury, and Marston Moor. Those who were stationed in the city of London were generally found in Lincoln's Inn Fields and Covent Garden; and their prey was people of fashion, whose coaches were attacked boldly; and if denied, their owners were told, 'Tis a sad thing that an old crippled cavalier should be suffered to beg for a maintenance, and a young cavalier that never heard the whistle of a bullet should ride in his coach.'

"There were people called Anglers, from the nature of their method of depredating, which was thus:—They had a rod or stick, with an iron hook affixed: this they introduced through a window, or any other aperture, where plunder might be procured, and helped themselves at pleasure: the day was occupied by them in the character of beggars, when they made their observations for the angling of the night.

"Wild Rogues were the offspring of thieves and beggars, who received the rudiments of the art even before they left their mothers' backs: "To go into churches and great crowds, and to aim golden buttons off men's cloaks; and being very little, are shown how to creep into cellar windows, or other small entrances, and in the night to convey out thereat whatever they can find to the thievish receivers, who wait without for that purpose; and sometimes do open the door to let in such who have designed to rob the house; if taken, the tenderness of their age makes an apology or an excuse for their fault, and so are let alone to be hanged at riper years.

"Pulchards, or Clapperdegones, were those women who sat and reclined in the streets, with their own borrowed or stolen children, hanging about them, crying through cold, pinching, or real disease, who begged relief as widows, and, in the name of their fatherless children, gaining by this artifice, "a great deal of money, whilst her comrogue lies begging in the fields, with climes or artificial sores." The way they commonly take to make them is by sperewort or arsenic, which will draw blisters: or they take unslacked lime and soap, mingled with the rust of old iron: these being well tempered together, and spread thick upon two pieces of leather, they apply to the leg, binding it thereunto very hard, which in a very little time would fret the skin so that the flesh will appear all raw, &c. &c.

* Poems on Affairs of State from the time of Oliver Cromwell, to the Abdication of King James the Second, vol. i. p. 147.

"Fraters were imposters who went through the country with forged patents for briefs, and thus diverted charity from its proper direction.

"Abram men were fellows whose occupations seem to have been forgotten. They are described in the 'Canting Academy' in these words: "Abram-men are otherwise called Tom of Bedlems; they are very strangely and antickly garbed, with several coloured ripands or tape in their hats, it may be instead of a feather, a fox tail hanging down, a long stick with ribands streaming, and the like; yet for all their seeming madness, they have wit enough to steal as they go."

"The Whip Jacks have left us a specimen of their fraternity. They were counterfeit mariners, whose conversations were plentifully embellished with sea-terms, and falsehoods of their danger in the exercise of their profession. Instead of securing their arms and legs close to their bodies, and wrapping them in bandages (as the modern whip-jack is in the habit of doing, to excite compassion for the loss of limbs and severe wounds), the ancients merely pretended they had lost their all by shipwreck, and were reduced to beg their way to a sea-port, if in the country; or to some remote one, if in London.

"Mumpers.—The persons thus termed are described as being of both sexes: they were not solicitors for food, but money and cloaths. "The male mumper, in the times of the late usurpation, was clothed in an old torn cassock, begirt with a girdle, with a black cap, and a white one peeping out underneath." With a formal and studied countenance he stole up to a gentleman, and whispered him softly in the ear, that he was a poor sequestered parson, with a wife and many children. At other times, they would assume the habit of a decayed gentleman, and beg as if they had been ruined by their attachment to the royal cause. Sometimes the mumper appeared with an apron before him, and a cap on his head, and begs in the nature of a broken tradesman, who, having been a long time sick, hath spent all his remaining stock, and so weak he cannot work! The females of this class of miscreants generally attacked the ladies, and in a manner suited to make an impression on their finer feelings.

"Domerars are such as counterfeit themselves dumb, and have a notable art to roll their tongues up into the roof of their mouth, that you would verily believe their tongues were cut out; and, to make you have a stronger belief thereof, they will gape and shew you where it was done, clapping in a sharp stick, and, touching the tongue, make it bleed—and then the ignorant dispute it no further."

"Patricos are the strolling priests: every hedge is their parish, and every wandering rogue their parishioner. The service he saith is the marrying of couples, without the Gospel, or Book of Common Prayer, the solemnity whereof is thus: the parties to be married find out a dead horse, or any other beast, and, standing the one on the one side and the other on the other, the patricos bids them live together till death them part; and, so shaking hands, the wedding is ended."

On the southern side of the square, at the back of Portugal row, is Portugal street, formerly containing a theatre, as celebrated as Covent garden or

Drury lane is now. This was the Duke's Theatre, so called from the Duke of York, afterwards James II, who at the Restoration patronized one of the two principal companies of players, as his brother Charles did the other. The latter was the Drury lane company. Readers of theatrical history are generally led to conclude that there was only one theatre in the Lincoln's Inn quarter; but this is a mistake. There were at least two successive houses in two different places, though usually confounded under the title of "the Theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields." The first was in Gibbon's tennis-court, in Vere street, Clare market, where the actors who had played at the Red Bull opened their performances, in the year of the Restoration, under the direction of Killegrew, and with the title of King's Company. These in 1663 removed to Drury lane. The Duke's, or Sir William Davenant's company, removed in 1662 from Salisbury court (see Fleet street) to a new theatre "in Portugal Row," says Malone, "near Lincoln's Inn Fields." Malone is a correct inquirer: so that he makes us doubt whether the name of Portugal row did not formerly belong to Portugal street. The latter is certainly meant, or he would describe it as in and not near the Fields. Davenant's company performed here till 1671, when they quitted it to return to the renovated theatre in Salisbury court, under the management of his son, Charles Davenant (the father being dead), and the famous Betterton, who had been Sir William's first actor. The two companies afterwards came together at Drury lane; but again fell apart, and in 1695, the Duke's company (if its altered composition could still warrant the name), with Betterton remaining at its head, and Congreve for a partner, again opened "the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields," which was rebuilt for the purpose, and is described as being in "the Tennis-court." Was this the tennis-court theatre in Vere street? or were there two tennis courts, one in Vere street, and one in Lincoln's Inn Fields? We confess ourselves, after a diligent examination, unable to determine. At all events, the latest theatre of which we hear in Lincoln's Inn Fields, was not in Vere street. It stood in Portugal street, on the east end of the present burial ground, and on the scite of the china warehouse of Messrs. Spode and Copeland, just at the back of Surgeons' College. This theatre, which was built of red brick, and had a front facing the market, is the one generally meant by the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. It finally became celebrated for the harlequinades of Rich, but, on his removal to Covent garden, was deserted, and, after a short re-opening by Gifford from Goodman's Fields, finally ceased to be a theatre about the year 1757. Since that period Covent garden and Drury lane playhouses have had this part of the town to themselves.

It is conjectured, that the first appearance of an actress on the English stage, to the scandal of the puritans, and with many apologies for the "indecorum" of giving up the performances of female characters by boys, took place in the theatre in Vere street, on Saturday, December 8, 1660. The part first performed was certainly that of Desdemona; a very fit one to introduce the claims of the sex. †

Mr Malone has given us the prologue written for this occasion by Thomas Jordan; which, as it shows the "sensation" that was made, sets us in a lively manner in the situation of the spectators, and gives a curious account of some of the male actors of gentle womanhood, we shall here repeat. It is entitled—"A Prologue, to introduce the first Woman that came to act on the Stage, in the tragedy called the Moor of Venice:—"

"I came unknown to any of the rest,
To tell the news; I saw the lady drest:
The woman plays to-day; mistake me not,
No man in gown, or page in petticoat:
A woman to my knowledge, yet I can't,
If I should die, make affidavit on't."

Do you not twitter, gentlemen? I know
You will be censuring: do it fairly, though;
'Tis possible a virtuous woman may
Abhor all sorts of looseness, and yet play;
Play on the stage,—where all eyes are upon her:
Shall we count that a crime France counts an honour?

In other kingdoms husbands safely trust 'em;
The difference lies only in the custom.
And let it be our custom, I advise;
I'm sure this custom's better than th' excise,
And may procure us custom: hearts of flint
Will melt in passion, when a woman's in't.
But, gentlemen, you that as judges sit
In the star-chamber of the house—the pit,
Have modest thoughts of her; pray, do not run
To give her visits when the play is done,
With 'damn me, your most humble servant, lady';
She knows these things as well as you, it may be:
Not a bit there, dear gallants, she doth know
Her own deserts,—and your temptations too.
But to the point:—in this reforming age
We have intents to civilize the stage.
Our women are defective, and so sized,
You'd think they were some of the guard disguised;
For, to speak truth, men act, that are between Forty and fifty, wench of fifteen;
With bone so large, and nerve so incontinent,
When you call Desdemona, enter giant.
We shall purge every thing that is unclean,
Lascivious, scurrilous, impious or obscene;
And when we've put all things in this fair way,
Barebones himself may come to see a play."

The epilogue, "which consists of but twelve lines, is in the same strain of apology."

"And how do you like her? Come what is't ye drive at?

She's the same thing in public as in private
As far from being what you call a whore,
As Desdemona injured by the Moor:
Then he that censures her in such a case,
Hath a soul blacker than Othello's face.
But, ladies, what think you? for if you tax
Her freedom with dishonour to your sex,
She means to act no more, and this shall be
No other play, but her own tragedy.
She will submit to none but your commands,
And take commission only from your hands."

From the nature of this epilogue, and the permission accorded by the ladies, the women actors appear to have met with all the success they could wish; yet a prologue to the second part of Davenant's 'Siege of Rhodes' acted in April, 1662, shows us that the matter was still considered a delicate one upwards of a year afterwards.

"Hope little from our poet's withered wit,
From infant players scarce grown puppets yet;
Hope from our women less, whose bashful fear
Wondered to see me dare to enter here:
Each took her leave, and wished my danger past,
And though I come back safe and undisgraced,
Yet when they spy the wits here, then I doubt
No amazon can make them venture out,
Though I advised them not to fear you much,
For I presume not half of you are such."

It was in the theatre at Vere street that Pepys first saw a woman on the stage. § one of the earliest female performers mentioned by him, was an actress, whose name is not ascertained but who attained an unfortunate celebrity in the part of Roxana in the 'Siege of Rhodes.' She was seduced by Aubery de Vere, the last Earl of Oxford of that name, under the guise of a private marriage,—a species of villany which made a great figure in works of fiction up to a late period. The story is "got up" in detail by Madame Dunois, in her 'History of the Court of Charles II,' || but it is told with more brevity in Grammont; and as the latter, though apocryphal enough, pretends to say nothing on the subject, in which he is not borne out by other writers, his lively account may be laid before the reader:—

"The Earl of Oxford" says one of his heroines, "fell in love with a handsome, graceful actress, belonging to the Duke's theatre, who performed to perfection, particularly the part of Roxana in a very fashionable new play; inasmuch that she ever after retained that name. This creature being both very virtuous, and very modest, or, if you please, wonderfully obstinate, proudly rejected the presents and addresses of the Earl of Oxford. The resistance inflamed his passion; he had recourse to invectives and even spells; but all in vain. This disappointment had such an effect upon him, that he could neither eat nor drink; this did not signify to him; but his passion at length became so violent, that he could neither play nor smoke. In this extremity, love had recourse to Hymen: the Earl of Oxford, one of the first peers of the realm, is, you know, a very handsome man: he is of the order of the Garter, which greatly adds to an air naturally noble. In short from his outward appearance, you would suppose he was really possessed of some sense; but as soon as ever you hear him speak, you are perfectly convinced of the contrary. This passionate lover presented her with a promise of marriage, in due form, signed with his own hand; she would not, however, rely upon this, but the next day she thought there could be no danger, when the Earl himself came to her lodgings attended by a clergyman, and another man for a witness; the marriage was accordingly solemnized with all due ceremonies, in the presence of one of her fellow-players, who attended as a witness on her part. You will suppose, perhaps, that the new countess had nothing to do but to appear at court according to her rank, and to display the earl's arms upon her carriage. This was far from being the case. When examination was made concerning the marriage, it was found to be a mere deception: it appeared that the pretended priest was one of my lord's trumpeters, and the witness his kettle-drummer. The parson and his companion never appeared after the ceremony was over; and as for the other witness, he endeavoured to persuade her, that the Sultana Roxana might have supposed, in some part or other of a play, that she was really married. It was all to no purpose that the poor creature claimed the protection of the laws of God and man; both which were violated and abused, as well as herself, by this infamous imposition: in vain did she throw herself at the king's feet to demand justice; she had only to rise up again without redress; and happy might she think herself to receive an annuity of one thousand crowns, and to resume the name of Roxana, instead of Countess of Oxford."*

This scoundrel Earl (whose alleged want of sense is extremely probable, and was his best excuse, as well as the worst thing to say for the lady) died full of years and honours, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

In 1664, Mr Pepys witnessed a scene in the theatre in Portugal street, which shows the extremity to which the speculation of managers and the curiosity of the British public can go. This was no other than the appearance of an impostor, called the German Princess, in the part of her own character, after having been tried for it at the Old Bailey. She was tried for bigamy and acquitted; but she had inveigled a young citizen into marriage under pretence of being a German Princess, the citizen pretending at the same time to be a nobleman. The impudence of the thing was completed by the badness of her performance. Granger, however, who appears to have read a vindication of her, which she published, thinks she had great natural abilities. The reader will find an account of her in another part of this work, in our Tyburn selection.

The following is curious:—4th (Feb. 1666-7). "Soon as dined," says Pepys, "my wife and I out to the Duke's playhouse, and there saw Heraclius; an excellent play, to my extraordinary content; and the more from the house being very full, and great company; among others Mrs Stuart, very fine, with her locks done up in puffs, as my wife calls them: and several other great ladies had their hair so, though I do not like it, but my wife do mightily; but it is only because she sees it is the fashion. Here I saw my Lord Rochester and his lady, Mrs Mallet, who hath after all this ado married him; and, as I hear some say in the pit, it is a great act of charity, for he hath no estate. But it was pleasant to see how everybody rose up when my Lord John Butler, the Duke of Ormond's son, came into the pit, towards the end of the play, who was a servant to Mrs Mallet, and now smiled upon her, and she on him."*

One little thinks, now-a-days, in turning into Portugal street, that all the fashionable world, with the wits and poets, once thronged into that poor-looking thoroughfare, with its bailiffs at one end, and its butchers at the other. The difference, however, between beaux and butchers, was not so great at that time as it became afterwards; though none arrogated the praise of high breeding more than the fine gentlemen of Charles II. Next year Pepys speaks of a fray at this house, between Harry Killigrew and the Duke of Buckingham, in which the latter beat him, and took away his sword. Another time, according to his account, Rochester beat Tom Killigrew, at the Dutch Ambassador's, and in the King's presence. Blows from people of rank do not appear to have been resented then as they would be now.

In the following passage we have an author's first night before us, and that author the gallant Etheridge, with dukes and wits about him in the pit. He makes, however, a very different figure in our eyes from what we commonly conceive of him, for he is unsuccessful and complaining. "My wife," says Pepys, "being gone before (6th Feb. 1667-8), I to the Duke of York's play-house, where a new play of Etheridge's, called 'She would if she could'; and, though I was there by two o'clock, there was one thousand people put back that could not have room in the pit; and I at last, because my wife was there, made shift to get into the 18d. box, and there saw. — But Lord! how full was the house, and how silly the play, there being nothing in the world good in it, and few people pleased in it. The King was there; but I sat mightily behind, and could see but little, and hear not at all. The play being done, I into the pit to look for my wife, it being dark and raining; but could not find her, and so staid, going between the two doors and through the pit, an hour and a half, I think, after the play was done, the people staying there till the rain was over, and to talk one with another. And among the rest here was the Duke of Buckingham to-day openly sat in the pit; and there I found him with my Lord Buckhurst, and Sedley, and Etheridge the poet; the last of whom I did hear mightily find fault with the actors, that they were out of humour and had not their parts perfect, and that Harris did do nothing, nor could so much as sing a catch in it; and so was mightily concerned; while all the rest did through the whole pit blame the play as a silly, dull thing, though there was something very roguish and witty; but the design of the play and end mighty insipid. At last I did find my wife."

The ensuing is a specimen of the manners of one of the fine ladies:—"5th (May, 1668). Creed and I to the Duke of York's play-house; and there, coming late, up to the balcony-box, where we find my Lady Castlemaine (the King's mistress) and several great ladies; and there we sat with them, and I saw the 'Impertinents' once more than yesterday! and I for that reason like it, I find, the better too. By Sir Positive At-all I understand is meant Sir Robert Howard. My lady pretty well pleased with it; but here I sat close to her fine woman, Wilson, who indeed is very handsome, but they say with child by the King. I asked, and she told me this was the first time her lady had seen it, I having a mind to say something to her. One thing of familiarity I observed in my Lady Castlemaine; she called to one of her women, another that sat by this, for a little patch off of her face, and put it into her mouth and wetted it, and so clapped it upon her own by the side of her mouth, I suppose she feeling a pimple rising there."*

More manners of this gallant reign. Pepys says he went to see a woman with a great bushy beard, "which pleased him mightily." "Thence to the Duke's play-house, and saw 'Macbeth.' The King and Court there; and we sat just under them and my Lady Castlemaine, and close to a woman that comes into the pit, a kind of a loose gossip, that pretends to be like her, and is so something. And my wife, by my troth, appeared, I think, as pretty as any of them; I never thought so much before; and so did Talbot and W. Hewer, as they said, I heard, to one another. The King and Duke of York minded me, and smiled upon me, at the handsome woman near me; but it vexed me to see Moll Davies, in the box over the King and my Lady Castlemaine, look down upon the King and he up to her; and so did my Lady Castlemaine once to see who it was; but when she saw Moll Davies, she looked like fire; which troubled me."†

Modes of thinking. Mr Pepys is of opinion that the 'Tempest,' which he saw at this house, is an "innocent" play; "no great wit, but yet good above ordinary plays." This appears to have been his general opinion of Shakspeare. That year, he says, "After dinner to the Duke of York's play-house, and there saw 'Sir Martin Mar-all,' which I have seen so often, and yet am mightily pleased with it, and think it mighty witty, and the fullest of proper matter for mirth that was ever writ; and I do clearly see that they do improve in their acting of it. Here a mighty company of citizens, 'prentices, and others; and it makes me observe, that when I began first to be able to bestow a play on myself, I do not remember that I saw so many by half of the ordinary 'prentices and mean people in the pit, at 2s. 6d. a piece, as now; I going for several years no higher than the 12d. and then the 18d. places, though I strained hard to go in then when I did: so much the vanity and prodigality of the age is to be observed in this particular."*

What he calls the vanity of the age, was one of the best signs of its advancement. Plays, at the time above mentioned, began as early as they did before the civil wars; and when they were over, people rode out in their coaches to take the air. Our author one day, when the King visited the theatre, speaks of being there by one, to get a seat. Kynaston, a favourite actor at this house, used to be taken out airing by the ladies, in the dress which he wore as a female. Cibber mentions this particular among others in an entertaining account of Kynaston, whom the ladies do not appear to have spoiled:—

"Though women," he says, "were not admitted to the stage, till the return of King Charles, yet it could not be so suddenly supplied with them, but that there was still a necessity, for some time, to put the handsomest young men into petticoats, which Kynaston was then said to have worn with success; particularly in the part of Evadne, in the 'Maid's Tragedy,' which I have heard him speak of; and which calls to my mind a ridiculous distress that arose from these sort of shifts, which the stage was then put to. The King, coming a little before his usual time to a tragedy, found the actors not ready to begin, when his Majesty, not choosing to have as much patience as his good subjects, sent to them to know the meaning of it; upon which the master of the company came to the box, and rightly judging that the best excuse for their default would be the true one, fairly told his Majesty that the queen was not shaved yet: the King, whose good humour loved to laugh at a jest, as well as to make one, accepted the excuse, which served to divert him till the male queen could be effeminated. In a word, Kynaston, at that time, was so beautiful a youth, that the ladies of quality prided themselves in taking him with them in their coaches to Hyde Park in his theatrical habit, after the play; which in those days they might have sufficient time to do, because plays then were used to begin at four o'clock: the hour that people of the same rank are now going to dinner. Of this truth I had the curiosity to inquire, and had it confirmed from his own mouth, in his advanced age: and, indeed, to the last of him, his handsomeness was very little abated; even at past sixty his teeth were sound, white and even, as one would wish to see in a reigning toast of twenty. He had something of a formal gravity in his mien, which was attributed to the stately step he had been so early confined to, in a female decency. But even that, in characters of superiority, had its proper grace; it misbecame him not in the part of Leon, in Fletcher's 'Rule a Wife,' &c., which he executed with a determined manliness, and honest authority, well worth the best actor's imitation. He had a piercing eye, and, in characters of heroic life, a quick imperious vivacity in his tone of voice, that painted the tyrant truly terrible. There were two plays of Dryden in which he shone with uncommon lustre; in 'Aurengzebe' he played Morat, and in 'Don Sebastian,' Muley-Moloch; in both these parts he had a stately, lion-like majesty in his port and utterance, that gave the spectator a kind of trembling admiration."

Pepys does not speak much of Betterton, the chief performer at the Portugal street play-house. The reason must be, either that Betterton played chiefly in tragedy, or that his comic talent (which is probable) was not equal to his tragic. He was the great actor of his time, as Garrick was of the last century, and Mr Kean lately. His most admired character appears to have been that of Hamlet; though Steele, in a paper to his memory in the 'Tatler,' seems to have been most impressed by his performance of Othello. If an actor's Othello is really fine, perhaps it must be his best part, as in Mr Kean's instance, owing to the nature of the character. Hamlet speaks to the reflecting part of us; Othello to the sensitive. We will not present the reader with extracts from Cibber, which contain little respecting this actor that might not be said of others; only it may be observed, that in the better parts of the performances of the old players we have something perhaps handed down to us of the manner of these ancient ornaments of the stage. The liveliest idea remaining of the genius of Betterton is furnished by an anecdote of Booth, who, when he first performed the Ghost to Betterton's Hamlet, is said to have been so astonished at the other's look of surprise, that for some moments he was unable to speak. Betterton died old and poor, rather, it should seem, from misfortune than imprudence. The actors in those times, though much admired, were not rewarded as they have been since; nor received anything like the modern salaries. His death is said to have been hastened by tampering with the gout, in order to perform on his benefit night. His person was rather manly than graceful. He was a good-natured man; and, like Molière, would perform when he was ill, rather than hinder the profits of his brother actors.† At Caen Wood, Hampstead, the seat of Lord Mansfield, there is a portrait of him by Pope, who was an amateur in painting. They became acquainted when the latter was young, and the actor old; and took such a liking to one another, that Pope is supposed to have had a hand in a volume of pieces from 'Chaucer,' purporting to have been modernized by Betterton.

Another celebrated actor in Portugal street during the reign of Charles II was Nokes, who appears, from Cibber's account of him to have been something between Liston and Munden. By a line in one of Dryden's Epistles, the town seem to have thought a comedy deficient in which he did not make his appearance. The poet says to Southern, on his play of the 'Wives Excuse,'—

"The hearers may for want of Nokes repine,
But rest secure, the readers will be thine."

* Cibber's 'Apology,' chap. v., &c.
† See Tatler, No. 107.

Nokes was one of those actors who create a roar the moment they are seen, and make people ache with laughter.

These were among the older performers in Portugal street. When Congreve took a share in the theatre, some others had joined it, and become celebrated, two of whom, Mr Mountford and Mrs Bracegirdle, we have already described. Another two, whose names remain familiar with posterity, are Mrs Mountford and Mrs Barry. Mrs Mountford was a 'capital stage coquette; besides being able to act male cosesoms and country dowdies. Mrs Barry was a fine tragedian, both of the heroic and tender cast. Dryden pronounced her the best actress he had seen. It is said she was a mistress of Lord Rochester's when young; that it was to her his love-letters were addressed; and that she owed her celebrity to his instructions. She was not handsome, and her mouth was a little awry, but her countenance was very expressive. This is the actress, who, in the delirium of her last moments, is said to have alluded in an extempore blank verse to a manoeuvre played by Queen Anne's ministry some time before:—

"Ha! ha! and so they make us lords by dozens!"

Cibber's sketch of Mrs Mountford, in the character of Melantha, is the masterpiece of his book, and presents a portrait sufficiently distinct to be extracted. "Melantha," says our lively critic (himself a coxcomb of the first water), "is as finished an impertinent as ever fluttered in a drawing-room, and seems to contain the most complete system of female foppery that could possibly be crowded into the tortured form of a fine lady. Her language, dress, motion, manners, soul and body, are in a continual hurry to do something more than is necessary or commendable. And though I doubt it will be a vain labour to offer you a just likeness of Mrs Mountford's action, yet the fantastic impression is still so strong in my memory, that I cannot help saying something, though fantastically, about it. The first ridiculous airs that break from her are upon a gallant, never seen before, who delivers her a letter from her father, recommending him to her good graces, as an honourable lover. Here now, one would think she might naturally show a little of the sex's decent reserve, though never so slightly covered. No, sir, not a tittle of it; modesty is the virtue of a poor-souled country gentlewoman; she is too much a court lady to be under so vulgar a confusion; she reads the letter, therefore, with a careless dropping lip, and an erected brow, humming it hastily over, as if she were impatient to out-go her father's commands, by making a complete conquest of him at once; and that the letter might not embarrass her attack, crack! she scrambles it at once into her palm, and pours upon him her whole artillery of airs, eyes, and motion; down goes her dainty diving body to the ground, as if she were sinking under the conscious load of her own attractions; then launches into a flood of fine language and compliment, still playing her chest forward in fifty falls and risings, like a swan upon waving water; and, to complete her impertinence, she is so rapidly fond of her own wit, that she will not give her lover leave to praise it: silent assenting bows, and vain endeavours to speak, are all the share of the conversation he is admitted to, which, at last, he is relieved from, by her engagements to half-a-score visits, which she swims from him to make, with a promise to return in a twinkling."

Three of Congreve's plays, 'Love for Love,' the 'Mourning Bride,' and the 'Way of the World,' came out at the theatre in Portugal street. In the first paper of the 'Tatler,' Steele gives a criticism on the performance of 'Love for Love,' which contains one or two curious points of information respecting the customs of play-goers in the reign of Anne. The "article" begins like that of a modern newspaper.

"On Thursday last was acted, for the benefit of Mr Betterton, the celebrated comedy called 'Love for Love.' These excellent players, Mrs Barry, Mrs Bracegirdle, and Mr Dogget, though not at present concerned in the house, acted on that occasion. There has not been known so great a concourse of persons of distinction as at that time: the stage itself was covered with gentlemen and ladies; and when the curtain was drawn, it discovered even there a very splendid audience. This unusual encouragement, which was given to a play for the advantage of so great an actor, gives an undeniable instance that the true relief for many entertainments and rational pleasures is not wholly lost. All the parts were acted to perfection: the actors were careful of their carriage, and no one was guilty of the affectation to insert witticism of his own; but a due respect was had to the audience for encouraging this accomplished player. It is not now doubted but plays will revive, and take their usual course in the opinion of persons of wit and merit, notwithstanding their late apostasy in favour of dress and sound. The place is very much altered since Mr Dryden frequented it: where you used to see songs, epigrams, and satires, in the hands of every man you met, you have now only a pack of cards; and instead of the evils about the turn of the expression, the elegance of the style, and the like, the learned now dispute only about the truth of the game."

The last proprietor of this theatre was Rich, the famous harlequin, who, having a poor company, unable to compete with Drury Lane, introduced that love of shew and spectacle, which has ever since been willing to forego the regular drama, however reproached by the critics. Pope has hit off his into the 'Dunciad,' (book iii.), as one of the 'ministers of Dulness.'

"Immortal Rich! how calm he sits at ease,
'Midst snows of paper, and fierce hail of pease; ||
And proud his mistress' order to perform,
Rides in the whirlwind, and directs the storm."

He had the merit, however, of producing the 'Beggars' Opera,' which was acted scores of nights together all over England, and finally rendered its heroine a duchess, and is said to have made "Gay Rich, and Rich Gay." Rich had no education. He was in the habit, when conversing, of saying mister, instead of sir.

One of Rich's actors was Quin, of whom more by and by. Garrick was never at this theatre. It closed a little before his time, and was never reopened. The vulgar attributed its desertion to a supernumerary devil, who made his appearance in the pantomime of 'Harlequin and Dr Faustus,' and took his exit through the roof instead of the door; which so frightened the manager that he had not the courage to open the theatre again. The only memorial now remaining in Portugal street of theatres and play-goers, and all their lively generation, is a tablet set up in the burial-ground to the memory of the famous Joe Miller, author of so many posthumous good things. He was an actor in Congreve's time, and has the reputation of having been an honest, as well as a pleasant fellow. The jest-book, which passes for his publication, was collected by a companion of his, who is thought to have owed to him nothing but his name. It is but reasonable to conclude, however, that many of the jests were of the comedian's relating.

In Carey street, when she was first married, lived Mrs Chapone. She afterwards resided in Arundel street. When we have no greater names to mention, we think it our duty to avail ourselves of those of any intelligent and amiable persons who are really worth mention, though they may not be of the first order. They will be welcome to the inhabitants of the street, and perhaps serve to throw a grace over neighbourhoods that want it. It is better to think of Mrs Chapone in going along Carey street, than of bailiffs and lock-up houses,—unless, indeed, the latter should make us zealous to reform the debtor and creditor laws, and then we might still be glad of the refreshment. Mrs Chapone was one of the disciples of Richardson, and is well known for her 'Letters on the Improvement of the Mind.' Ten months after her marriage, she lost her husband, to whom she was greatly attached, and then she left Carey street; so that the pleasantest part of her life was probably spent there.

Clare market stands on a spot formerly called Clement's Inn Fields, the property of the Earls of Clare, one of whom built the market about the year 1657. He is said to have lived close by, in a style of magnificence. The names of the family, Densel, Holles, &c., are retained in some of the neighbouring streets.

Clare market became notorious in the time of Pope, for the extravagance of Orator Henley, a clever, but irregular-minded man, who overrated himself, and became, it may be said, mad with impudence. Some describe his oratory as being in the market, others in Duke street, which is the street going out of the western side of Lincoln's Inn square through the archway. Another writer says it was the old theatre of Sir William Davenant, in Gibbon's Tennis-court, of which we have just spoken, and which is said to have been in Vere street. Most likely all these accounts are to be reconciled. A tenement is often described as existing in a certain street, when the street presents nothing but a passage to it; and we take Henley's Oratory to have been the old theatre, with a passage to it from the market, from Vere street, and from Duke street. Having settled this magnificent point, we proceed with the no less magnificent orator.

He was a native of Melton Mowbray, in the county of Leicester, the son of a clergyman, and after going to St John's College, Cambridge, returned to his native place, and became master of the school there.

"Feeling, or [f]amoying," says the author of the 'Lounger's Common-Place Book,' "that a genius like his ought not to be buried in 'so obscure a situation, having been long convinced that many gross errors and impostures prevailed in the various institutions and establishments of mankind; being also ambitious of restoring ancient eloquence, but as his enemies asserted, to avoid the scandalous embarrasments of illicit love, he repaired to the metropolis, and for a short time performed clerical functions at St John's Chapel, near Bedford row, with the prospect of succeeding to the lectureship of an adjoining parish (Bloomsbury), which soon became vacant."

"Several candidates offering for this situation, a warm contest ensued; probation sermons were preached; and Henley's predominating vanity made him expect an easy victory.

"We may guess at his disappointment, when this disciple of Demosthenes and Cicero was informed that the congregation had no objection to his language or his doctrine, but that he threw himself about too much in the pulpit, and that another person was chosen.

"Losing his temper as well as his election, he rushed into a room where the principal parishioners were assembled, and thus addressed them, in all the vehemence of outrageous passion:—

"Blackheads! are you qualified to judge of the degree of action necessary for a preacher of God's word? Were you able to read, or had you sufficient sense, you sorry knaves, to understand the renowned orator of antiquity, he would tell you, almost the only requisite of a public speaker was action, action, action.

"But I despise and defy you; provoco ad populum; the public shall decide between us." He then hastily retired, and to vindicate his injured fame, published the probationary discourse he had delivered.

"Thus disappointed in the regular routine of his profession, he became a quack divine; for this character he was eminently qualified, possessing a strong voice, fluent language, an imposing magisterial air, and a countenance, which no violation of propriety, reproach, or self-correction, was ever known to embarrass or discompose.

"He immediately advertised that he should hold forth publicly, two days in the week, and hired for this purpose a large room in or near Newport market, which he called the Oratory; but previous to the commencement of his 'academical discourses,' he chose to consult Mr Whiston, a learned clergyman of considerable mathematical and astronomical research, but who had rendered himself remarkable by eccentric simplicity of heart, and the whimsical heterodoxy of his creed.

"In a letter to this gentleman he desired to be informed, whether he should incur any legal penalties by officiating as a separatist from the church of England. Mr Whiston did not encourage Henley's project, and a correspondence took place, which ending in virulence and ill-language, produced, a few years after, the following letter:—

"To Mr William Whiston,
Take notice, that I give you warning not to enter my room in Newport market, at your peril.
JOHN HENLEY."

Henley succeeded in his speculation, by lecturing, in the most important manner, on all sorts of subjects, from the origin of evil down to a shoe. He also published a variety of pamphlets, and a periodical farrago called the 'Hyp Doctor,' for which he is said to have had pay from Sir Robert Walpole; and as his popularity rapidly increased in consequence of his addressing himself to uneducated understandings, he removed from his Oratory in Newport market to the more spacious room in Clare market; for he seems to have had a natural propensity to the society of butchers, and they were fond of his tranchant style. He sometimes threatened his enemies with them. Pope, in answering the assertions of those who charged him with depriving people of their bread, asks whether Colley Cibber had not "still his lord," and Henley his butchers.

"And has not Colley still his lord—
His butchers Henley, his free-masons Moore."

Pope had been attacked by him. The poet speaks of him again, several times, in the 'Dunciad':

"Imbrown'd with native bronze, lo! Henley stands,
Tuning his voice, and balancing his hands.
How fluent nonsense trickles from his tongue!
How sweet the periods, neither said nor sung!
Still break the benches, Henley! with thy strain.
While Sherlock, Hare, and Gibson, preach in vain.
O great restorer of the good old stage,
Preacher at once and any of the age!
O worthy thou of Egypt's wise abodes,
A decent priest where monkeys were the gods."

Book iii. v. 199.

Pope says he had a "gilt tub," and insinuates that he sometimes got drunk. Among the sleeping worthies in the 'Dunciad,'

"— Henley lay inspired beside a sink,
And to mere mortals seemed a priest in drink."

"A contemporary journalist, who says that the fame of Henley induced him to be present at one of the lectures in Newport market, describes him as entering like a harlequin by a door behind the pulpit, and "at one large leap jumping into it, and falling to work." "His notions," he says, the orator "beat into the audience with hands, arms, legs, and head, as if people's understandings were to be courted and knocked down with blows." The price of admission was a shilling. The following are samples of Henley's extraordinary advertisements:

"At the Oratory in Newport market, to-morrow, at half-an-hour after ten, the sermon will be on the Witch of Endor. At half-an-hour after five, the theological lecture will be on the conversion and original of the Scottish nation, and of the Picts and Caledonians; St Andrew's relics and panegyric, and the character and mission of the Apostles.

"On Wednesday, at six, or near the matter, take your chance, will be a medley oration on the history, merits, and praise of confusion, and of confounders in the road and out of the way.

"On Friday, will be that on Dr Faustus and Fortunatus and conjuration; after each, the Chimes of the Wimes, No. 22 and 24. N.B. Whenever the prices of the seats are occasionally raised in the week days, notice will be given of it in the prints. An account of the performances of the Oratory from the first of August is published, with the Discourse on Nonsense; and if any bishop, clergyman, or other subject of his Majesty, or the subject of any foreign prince or state, can at any years, and in any circumstances and opportunities, without the least assistance or any patron in the world, parallel the study, choice, variety, and discharge, of the said performances of the Oratory by his own or any others, I will engage forthwith to quit the said Oratory.

"J. HENLEY."

In the bill of fare issued for Sunday, September 28, 1729, the most extraordinary theological speculations are followed by a list of the fashions in dress.

"At the Oratory, the corner of Lincoln's Inn fields, near Clare market, to-morrow, at half-an-hour after ten: 1, The postil will be on the turning of Lot's wife into a pillar of salt; 2, The sermon will be on the necessary power and attractive force which religion gives the spirit of a man with God and good Spirits.

"II. At five: 1, The postil will be on this point, In what language our Saviour will speak the last sentence on mankind; 2, The lecture will be on Jesus Christ's sitting at the right hand of God; where that is; the honours and lustre of his inauguration; the learning, criticism, and piety of that glorious article.

"The Monday's orations will shortly be resumed. On Wednesday, the oration will be on the skirts of the fashions, or a live gallery of family pictures in all ages; ruffs, muffs, puffs manifold; shoes, wedding-shoes, two-shoes, slip-shoes, heels, clocks, pantofles, buskins, pantaloons, garters, shoulder-knots, periwigs, head-dresses, modesties, tuckers, farthingales, corkins, minikins, alammakins, ruffles, round-robins, tollets, fans, patches; dame, forsooth, madam, my lady, the wit and beauty of my grannum; Winifred, Joan, Bridget, compared with our Winny, Jenny, and Biddy; fine ladies, and pretty gentlewomen; being a general view of the beau monde, from before Noah's flood to the year 29. On Friday will be something better than last Tuesday. After each, a bob at the times."†

Henley must have lectured a long while; for one of his "hobs at the times" was occasioned by the dismissal of Dr Cobden, a chaplain to George II, in the year 1746, for preaching from the following text: "Take away the wicked from before the king and his throne shall be established in righteousness." The wicked, we believe, meant the king's mistresses. Next Saturday, Henley's advertisement appeared with an epigram on this text for a motto:—

"Away with the wicked before the king,
And away with the wicked behind him;
His throne it will bless
With righteousness,
And we shall know where to find him."

This must be what the reviewers call a "favourable specimen."

"Sometimes," says the 'Lounger's Common Place Book,' "one of his old Bloomsbury friends caught the speaker's eye; on these occasions, he could not resist the temptation to gratify his vanity and resentment; after a short pause he would address the unfortunate interloper in words to the following effect: 'You see, sir, all mankind are not exactly of your opinion; there are, you perceive, a few sensible people in the world, who consider me as not wholly unqualified for the office I have undertaken.

"His abashed and confounded adversaries, thus attacked, in a public company, a most awkward species of distress, were glad to retire precipitately, and sometimes were pushed out of the room by Henley's partizans.‡

It is probable that Henley's partizans were sometimes necessary to secure him from the results of his imprudence, though his boldness appears to have been on a par with it. He once attracted an audience of shoe-makers by announcing that he could teach them a method of making shoes with wonderful celerity. The secret consisted in cutting off the tops of old boots. His motto to the advertisement (omne majus continet in se minus, the greater includes the less) had a pleasantry in it, which makes the disappointment of the poor shoe-makers doubly ludicrous.

Henley, on one occasion, was for several days in the custody of the King's messenger, having incurred the displeasure of the House of Lords. "Lord Chesterfield, at that time secretary of state," says the 'Lounger,' "amused himself and his associates in office by sporting with the hopes and fears of our restorer of ancient eloquence; during his examination before the privy council, he requested permission to sit, on account of a real, or, as it was supposed, a pretended rheumatism. Occasioning considerable merriment by his eccentric answers, and sometimes by the oddity of his questions, he was observed to join heartily and loudly in the laugh he had himself created.

"The Earl having expostulated with him on the impropriety of ridiculing the exertions of his native country, at the moment rebellion raged in the heart of the kingdom, Henley replied, 'I thought there was no harm, my Lord, in cracking a joke on a red-herring;' alluding to the worthy primate of that name, who proposed, and, I believe, had actually commenced, arming and arraying the clergy.

"Many disrespectful and unwarrantable expressions he had applied to persons high in office, being mentioned to him, he answered, without embarrassment, 'My Lords, I must live.'

"I see no kind of reason for that,' said Lord Chesterfield, 'but many against it.' The council were pleased, and laughed at the retort; the prisoner, somewhat irritated, observed, 'that is a good thing, but it has been said before.'

"A few days after, being reprimanded for his improper conduct, and cautioned against repeating it, he was dismissed, as an impudent, but entertaining fellow."

To complete the history of this man, he struck medals for his tickets, with a star rising to the meridian; over it the motto, Ad summa (to the height), and below, Inveniam viam aut faciam (I will find a way, or make one). As might be expected, he found no way at last, but that of falling into contempt. He appears to have been too imprudent to make money by his vagaries; and his manners, probably in consequence, became gross and ferocious. He died in 1756. His person makes a principal figure in two humorous plates, attributed to Hogarth.

Duke street and Little Wild street have had an inhabitant, as illustrious afterwards as he was then obscure, in the person of Benjamin Franklin, who, when he was first in England, worked in the printing-office of Mr Watts, in the latter street, and lodged in the former. When he came to England afterwards, as the agent of Massachusetts, he went into this office, "and going up," says his biography, "to a particular press (now in the possession of Messrs Cox and Baylis), thus addressed the two workmen: 'Come, my friends, we will drink together: it is now forty years since I worked like you, at this press, as a journeyman printer.' " The same publication gives an account of him during this period, which, besides containing more than one curious local particular, is highly worth the attention of those who confound stimulus with vigour.

• 'Lounger's Common Place Book,' vol. ii. p. 141.

"After the completion," says the writer, "of twelvemonths at Palmer's," (in Bartholomew close) "Franklin removed to the printing-office of Mr Watts, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, where he continued during the whole of his subsequent stay in the British metropolis. He found a contiguous lodging with a widow lady in Duke street, opposite the Catholic chapel, for which he paid at his old rate of three and sixpence weekly, and received no new impressions in favour of Christians from his occasional notices of the Romish superstitions in this family and neighbourhood. His landlady was a clergyman's daughter, who, marrying a Catholic, had adjoined Protestantism, and became acquainted with several distinguished families of that persuasion. She and Franklin found mutual pleasure in each other's society. He kept good hours; and she was too lame generally to leave her room; frugality was the habit of both; half an anchovy, a small slice of bread and butter each, with half a pint of ale between them, furnished commonly their supper. So well pleased was the widow with her inmate, that, when Franklin talked of removing to another house, where he could obtain the same accommodation as with her for two shillings per week, she became generous in his favour, and abated her charge for his room to that sum. He never paid her more during the rest of his stay with her, which was the whole time he continued in London. In the attic was a maiden Catholic lady, by choice and habit a nun. She had been sent early in life to the Continent to take the veil; but the climate disagreeing with her health, she returned home; devoted her small estate to charitable purposes, with the exception of about 12*l.* a-year; practised confession daily; and lived intirely on water-gruel. Her presence was thought a blessing to the house, and several of its tenants in succession had charged her no rent. Her room contained a mattress, table, crucifix, and stool, as its only furniture. She admitted the occasional visits of Franklin and her landlady; was cheerful, he says, and healthful: and while her superstition moved his compassion, he felt confirmed in his frugality by her example, and exhibits it in his journal as another proof of the possibility of supporting life, health, and cheerfulness on very small means.

"During the first weeks of his engagement with Mr Watts, he worked as a pressman, drinking only water, while his companions had their five pints of porter each per day; and his strength was superior to theirs. He ridiculed the verbal logic of strong beer being necessary for strong work; contending that the strength yielded by malt liquor could only be in proportion to the quantity of flour or actual grain dissolved in the liquor, and that a pennyworth of bread must have more of this than a pot of porter. The water-American, as he was called, had some converts to his system; his example, in this case, being clearly better than his philosophy."

"Franklin was born to be a revolutionist, in many

• "For," says the note, "while the mucilaginous qualities of porter may form one criterion of the nourishment it yields, it does not follow that mere nourishment is or ought to be the only consideration in a labouring man's use of malt liquor, or any other aliment. It is well known that flesh-meats yield chyle in greater abundance than any production of the vegetable kingdom; but Franklin would not have considered this any argument for living wholly upon meat. The fact is, that the stimulating quality of all fermented liquors (when moderately taken) is an essential part of the refreshment, and therefore of the strength they yield.

'We curse not wine—the vile excess we blame.'

To this Franklin might have answered, that the want of stimulus is generally produced by a previous abuse of it, and that the having recourse to fermented liquors is likely to continue the abuse, whatever may be said about moderation. The moderation is so difficult, that it is better to abstain than to hazard it. It is true (not to quote the words irreverently) "man does not live by bread alone," but by sociality and good humour; and that even a little excess occasionally is not to be narrowly considered; but for the purposes of labour, we may surely gather from the recorded experience of those who have laboured most, whether physically or mentally, first, that the more temperate our habits, the more we can perform; and, secondly, that an habitual abstinence from some kinds of refreshment is the only way to secure them."

good senses of the word. He now proposed and carried several alterations in the so-called chapel-laws of the printing-office; resisted what he thought the impositions, while he conciliated the respect of his fellow-workmen; and always had cash and credit in the neighbourhood at command, to which the sottish part of his brethren were occasionally, and sometimes largely, indebted. He thus depicts this part of his prosperous life:—"On my entrance, I worked at first as a pressman, conceiving that I had need of bodily exercise, to which I had been accustomed in America, where the printers work alternately as compositors and at the press. I drank nothing but water. The other workmen, to the number of about fifty, were great drinkers of beer. I carried occasionally a large form of letters in each hand, up and down stairs, while the rest employed both hands to carry one. They were surprised to see by this and many other examples, that the American aquatic, as they used to call me, was stronger than those that drank porter. The beer-boy had sufficient employment during the whole day in serving that house alone. My fellow-pressman drank every day a pint of beer before breakfast, a pint with bread and cheese for breakfast, one between breakfast and dinner, one at dinner, one again about six o'clock in the afternoon, and another after he had finished his day's work. This custom appeared to me abominable; but he had need, he said, of all this beer, in order to acquire strength to work.

"I endeavoured to convince him, that the bodily strength furnished by the beer could only be in proportion to the solid part of the barley dissolved in the water of which the beer was composed; that there was a larger portion of flour in a penny-loaf, and that, consequently, if he ate this loaf, and drank a pint of water, he would derive more strength from it than from a pint of beer. This reasoning, however, did not prevent him from drinking his accustomed quantity of beer, and paying every Saturday night a score of four or five shillings a-week for this cursed beverage; an expense from which I was wholly exempt. Thus do these poor devils continue all their lives in a state of voluntary wretchedness and poverty.

"My example prevailed with several of them to renounce their abominable practice of bread and cheese with beer; and they procured, like me, from a neighbouring house, a good basin of warm gruel, in which was a small slice of butter, with toasted bread and nutmeg. This was a much better breakfast, which did not cost more than a pint of beer, namely, three halfpence, and at the same time preserved the head clearer. Those who continued to gorge themselves with beer, often lost their credit with the publican, from neglecting to pay their score. They had then recourse to me to become security for them, their light, as they used to call it, being out. I attended at the table every Saturday evening to take up the little sums which I had made myself answerable for, and which sometimes amounted to near thirty shillings a-week.

"This circumstance, added to the reputation of my being a tolerable good gabber, or, in other words, skilful in the art of burlesque, kept up my importance in the chapel. I had, besides, recommended myself to the esteem of my master by my assiduous application to business, never observing Saint Monday. My extraordinary quickness in composing always procured me such work as was most urgent, and which is commonly best paid; and thus my time passed away in a very pleasant manner."

DRURY LANE takes its name from "the habitation of the great family of the Druries," built, "I believe," says Pennant, "by Sir William Drury, knight of the garter, a most able commander in the Irish wars, who unfortunately fell in a duel with Sir John Boroughs, in a foolish quarrel about precedence. Sir Robert, his son, was a great patron of Dr Donne, and assigned to him apartments in his house. I cannot learn into whose hands it passed afterwards. During the time of the fatal discontents of the favourite, Essex, it was the place where his imprudent advisers resolved on such counsels as terminated in the destruction of him and his adherents."*

Drury House stood at the corner of Drury lane and Wych street, upon the ground now included in Craven buildings in the one thoroughfare, and the Olympic Pavilion in the other.

Pennant proceeds to say, that it was occupied in the next century by "the heroic William Lord Craven, afterwards Earl Craven," who rebuilt it in the form standing in his time. He describes it as "a large brick pile,"—a public house with the sign of the Queen of Bohemia,—a head which still mystifies people in some parts of the country. The remains were taken down in 1809, and the Olympic Pavilion built on part of the site. But the public house was only a portion of it.

Who would suppose, in going by the place now, that it was once the habitation of wit and elegance, of a lord and a queen, and of more than one "romance of real life?" Yet the passenger acquainted with the facts can never fail to be impressed by them, especially by the romantic history of Donne. This master of profound fancies (whom Dryden pronounced "the greatest wit, though not the best poet," of our nation), had in his youth led a gay imprudent life, which left him poor. He became secretary to Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, and fell in love with his lordship's niece, then residing in the house, daughter to a Sir George Moor or More, who, though Donne was of an ancient family, was very angry, and took the young lady away into the country. The step however was too late; for, the passion being mutual, a private marriage had taken place. The upshot was, that Sir George would have nothing to say to the young couple, and that they fell into great distress. After a time, Sir Robert Drury, a man of large fortune, who possessed the mansion above described, invited Donne and his wife to live with him, and this too in a spirit that enabled all parties to be the better for it. But for this, and the curious story connected with it, we shall have recourse to the pages of our angling friend, Walton, who was a good fellow enough when he was not "handling a worm as if he loved him."

"Sir Robert Drury," says Walton, "a gentleman of a very noble estate, and a more liberal mind, assigned him and his wife an useful apartment in his own large house in Drury lane, and not only rent free, but was also a cherisher of his studies, and such a friend as sympathised with him and his, in all their joy and sorrows.

"At this time of Mr Donne's and his wife's living in Sir Robert's house, the Lord Hay was, by King James, sent upon a glorious embassy to the then French King, Henry IV, and Sir Robert put on a sudden resolution to accompany him to the French court, and to be present at his audience there. And Sir Robert put on a sudden resolution to solicit Mr Donne to be his companion in that journey. And this desire was suddenly made known to his wife, who was then with child, and otherwise under so dangerous a habit of body, as to her health, that she professed an unwillingness to allow him any absence from her; saying, 'her divining soul boded her some ill in his absence'; and therefore desired him not to leave her. This made Mr Donne lay aside all thoughts of his journey, and really to resolve against it. But Sir Robert became restless in his persuasions for it, and Mr Donne was so generous as to think he had sold his liberty when he received so many charitable kindnesses from him, and told his wife so; who did, therefore, with an unwilling-willingness, give a faint consent to the journey, which was proposed to be but for two months; for about that time they determined their return. Within a few days after this resolve, the Ambassador, Sir Robert, and Mr Donne, left London; and were the twelfth day got all safe to Paris. Two days after their arrival there, Mr Donne was left alone in that room, in which Sir Robert, and he, and some other friends, had dined together. To this place Sir Robert returned within half an hour; and as he left, so he found Mr Donne alone; but in such an ecstasy and so altered in his looks, as amazed Sir Robert to behold him; inasmuch that he earnestly desired Mr Donne to declare what had befallen him in the short time of his absence. To which Mr Donne was not able to make a present answer; but, after a long and perplexed pause, did at last say, 'I have seen a dreadful vision since I saw you: I have seen my dear wife pass twice by me in this room, with her hair hanging about her shoulders, and a dead child in her arms: this I have seen since I saw you.' To which Sir Robert replied, 'Sure, sir, you have slept since I saw you; and this is the result of some melancholy dream, which I desire you to forget, for you are now awake.' To which Mr Donne's reply was, 'I cannot be surer that I now live, than that I have not slept since I saw you; and am as sure, that at her second appearing she stopped and looked me in the face, and vanished.' Rest and sleep had not altered Mr Donne's opinion the next day; for he then affirmed this vision with a more deliberate, and so confirmed a confidence, that he inclined Sir Robert to a faint belief that the vision was true. It is truly said, that desire and doubt have no rest; and it proved so with Sir Robert; for he immediately sent a servant to Drewry House, with a charge to hasten back, and bring him word, whether Mrs Donne were alive; and, if alive, in what condition she was in as to her health. The twelfth day the messenger returned with this account,—That he found and left Mrs Donne very sad, and sick in her bed; and that after a long and dangerous labour, she had been delivered of a dead child. And, upon examination, the abortion proved to be the same day, and about the very hour, that Mr Donne affirmed he saw her pass by him in his chamber.

"This is a relation," continues Walton, "that will beget some wonder, and it well may; for most of our world are at present possessed with an opinion, that visions and miracles are ceased. And, though it is most certain, that two lutes being both strung and tuned to an equal pitch, and then one played upon, the other that is not touched, being laid upon a table at a fit distance, will—like an echo to a trumpet—warble a faint audible harmony in answer to the same tune; yet many will not believe that there is any such thing as the sympathy of souls; and I am well pleased that every reader do enjoy his own opinion. But if the unbelieving will not allow the believing reader of this story a liberty to believe that it may be true, then I wish him to consider, that many wise men have believed that the ghost of Julius Cæsar did appear to Brutus, and that both St Austin, and Monica his mother, had visions in order to his conversion. And though these, and many others—too many to name—have but the authority of human story, yet the incredible reader may find in the sacred story, that Samuel, &c."

We may here break off with the observation of Mr Chalmers, that "the whole may be safely left to the judgment of the reader."† Walton says he had not this story from Donne himself, but from a "Person of Honour," who "knew more of the secrets of his heart than any person then living," and who related it "with such circumstance and asseveration," that not to say anything of his hearer's belief, Walton did "verily believe," that the gentleman "himself believed it."

The biographer then presents us with some verses which "were given by Mr Donne to his wife at the time he then parted from her," and which he "begs leave to tell us" that he has heard some critics, learned both in languages and poetry, say, that "none of the Greek or Latin poets did ever equal."

These lines are full of the wit that Dryden speaks of, horribly misused to obscure the most beautiful feelings. Some of them are among the passages quoted in Dr Johnson to illustrate the faults of the metaphysical school. Mr Chalmers and others have thought it probable, that it was upon this occasion Donne wrote a set of verses, which he addressed to his wife, on her proposing to accompany him abroad as a page; but as the writer speaks of going to Italy, which appears to have been out of the question in this two months' visit to Paris, they most probably belong to some other journey, or intended journey, the period of which is unknown. The numbers of these verses are sometimes rugged, but they are full of as much nature and real feeling, as sincerity ever put into a true passion. There is an awfulness in the commencing adjuration,—

"By our first strange and fatal interview,
By all desires which thereof did ensue;
By our long-striving hopes; by that remorse
Which my words' masculine persuasive force
Begot in thee, and by the memory
Of hurts which spies and rivals threaten me,
I calmly beg: but by thy father's wrath,
By all pains which want and divorcement hath,
I conjure thee, and all the oaths which I
And thou have sworn to seal joint constancy,
I here unswear, and over swear them thus:
Thou shalt not love by means so dangerous.
Temper, O fair Love! love's impetuous rage;
Be my true mistress, not my feigned page.
I'll go; and by thy kind leave, leave behind
Thee, only worthy to nurse in my mind
Thirst to come back. O! if thou die before,
My soul from other lands to thee shall soar:
Thy (else almighty) beauty cannot move
Rage from the seas, nor thy love teach them love,
Nor tame wild Boreas' harshness: thou hast read
How roughly he in pieces shivered
Fair Orithea, whom he swore he loved.
Fall ill or good, 'tis madness to have proved

Dangers unurged: feed on this flattery,
That absent lovers one in th' other be;
Dissemble nothing, not a boy, nor change
Thy body's habit, nor mind; be not strange
To thyself only: all will spy in thy face
A bustling womanly discovering grace.

When I am gone dream me some happiness;
Nor let thy looks our long-hid love confess;
Nor praise nor dispraise me, nor bless nor curse
Openly love's foes; nor in bed fright thy nurse
With midnight's startings, crying out, Oh! oh!
Nurse! oh, my love is slain! I saw him go
O'er the white Alps alone; I saw him, I,
Assailed, taken, fight, stabbed, bleed, fall and die.
Augur me better chance; except dread Jove
Think it enough for me to have had thy love."

Drury House, when rebuilt by Lord Craven, took the name of Craven House. To this abode, at the instigation of Charles II, his lordship brought his royal mistress the Queen of Bohemia, to whose interests he had devoted his fortunes, and to whom he is supposed to have been secretly wedded. She was daughter to James I, and with the reluctant consent of her parents (particularly of her mother, who used to twit her with the title of Goody Palegrave), was married to Frederick, the Elector Palatine, for whom the Protestant interest in Germany erected Bohemia into a kingdom, in the vain hope, with the assistance of his father-in-law, of competing with the Catholic Emperor. Frederick lost everything, and his widow became a dependent on the bounty of this Lord Craven, a nobleman of wealthy commercial stock, who had fought in her husband's cause, and helped to bring up her children. It is through her that the family of Brunswick succeeded to the throne of this kingdom, as the next Protestant heirs of James I. James's daughter, being a woman of lively manners, a queen, and a Protestant leader, excited great interest in her time, and received more than the usual portion of flattery from the romantic. Donne wrote an epithalamium on her marriage, in which are those preposterous lines beginning—

"Here lies a she sun, and a he moon there."

Sir Henry Wotton had permission to call her his "royal mistress," which he was as proud of as if he had been a knight of old. And when she lost her Bohemian kingdom, it was said that she retained a better one, for that she was still the "Queen of Hearts." Sir Henry wrote upon her his elegant verses beginning,—

"You meaner beauties of the night," in which he gives a new turn to the common places of stars and roses, and calls her—

"Th' eclipse and glory of her kind."

It is doubtful, nevertheless, whether she was ever handsome. None of the Stuarts appear to have been so, with the exception of Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, who resembled, perhaps, her mother. Pepys, who saw the Queen of Bohemia at the Restoration, "thought her a very debonaire but plain lady." This, it is true, was near her death; but Pepys was given to admire, and royalty did not diminish the inclination. Had her charms ever been as great as reported, he would have discovered the remains of them. It has been beautifully said by Drayton,—

"Even in the aged'st face, where beauty once did dwell,
And nature, in the least, but seemed to excel,

Thine cannot make much waste, but something will appear
To show some little tract of delicacy these."

Pepys saw the queen afterwards two or three times at the play, and does not record any alteration of his opinion. Her Majesty did not survive the Restoration many months. She quitted Craven House for Leicester House (afterwards Norfolk House, in the Strand), seemingly for no other purpose than to die there; which she did in February 1681-2. Whether Lord Craven attended her at this period does not appear; but she left him her books, pictures, and papers. Sometimes he accompanied her to the plays. She and her husband, King Frederick, appear to have been lively, good-humoured persons, a little vain of the royalty which proved such a misfortune to them. The queen had the better sense, though it seems to have been almost as much over-rated as her beauty. But all the Stuarts were more or less clever, with the exception of James II.

The author of a 'History and Antiquities of the Deanery of Craven, in Yorkshire,' gives it as a tradition, that Lord Craven's father, a lord-mayor, was born of such poor parents that they sent him when a boy by a common carrier to London, where he became a mercer or draper. His son was a distinguished officer under Gustavus Adolphus, was ennobled, attached himself to the King and Queen of Bohemia, and is supposed, as we have seen, to have married the king's widow. He was her junior by twelve years. He long resided in Craven House, became colonel of the Coldstream regiment of foot-guards, and was famed for his bustling activity. He so constantly made his appearance at a fire, that his horse "is said to have smelt one as soon as it happened." Pepys, during a riot against houses of ill-fame (probably the houses in Whetstone's Park, as well as in Moor-fields, for he talks of going to Lincoln's Inn Fields to see the 'prentices), describes his lordship as riding up and down the fields, "like a madman," giving orders to the soldiery. It was probably in allusion to this military vivacity, that Lord Dorset says, in his ballad on a mistress,

"The people's hearts leap, wherever she comes,
And beat day and night, like my Lord Craven's drums."

When there was a talk in his old age of giving his regiment to somebody else, Craven said, that "if they took away his regiment, they had as good take away his life, since he had nothing else to divert himself with." The next king, however, William III, gave it to General Talmash; yet the old lord is said to have gone on, busy to the last. He died in 1697, aged nearly 80 years. He was intimate with Evelyn, Ray, and other naturalists, and delighted in gardening. The garden of Craven House ran in the direction of the present Drury lane; so that where there is now a bustle of a very different sort, we may fancy the old soldier busying himself with his flower beds, and Mr Evelyn discoursing upon the blessings of peace and privacy.*

The only other personage of celebrity whom we know of as living in Drury Lane, is one of another sort; to wit, Nell Gwynn. The ubiquitous Miss Benger is as romantic as if she had lived in the queen's time, but she is diligent and accurate. The facts can easily be separated from her colouring.

Pepys speaks of his seeing her there on a May-morning.

"May 1st, 1667. To Westminster, in the way meeting many milkmaids with garlands upon their palls, dancing with a fiddler before them; and saw pretty Nelly standing at her lodgings door in Drury lane in her smock sleeves and bodice, looking upon one. She seemed a mighty pretty creature."

Lodgings in this quarter, though Nell lived there, must have been of more decent reputation than they became afterwards. It is curious that the old English word Drury, or Druerie, should be applicable to the fame we allude to. It has more or less deserved it for a long period; though we believe the purlious rather warrant it now, than the lane itself. Pope and Gay speak of it. Pope describes the lane also as a place of residence for poor authors—

"Keep your piece nine years."

"Nine years?" cries he, who high in Drury lane,
Lulled by soft myphra through the broken pane,
Rhymes ere he wakes, and prints before termends,
Obliged by hunger and request of friends."

The existence of a theatre in Drury lane is as old as the time of Shakspeare. It was then called the Phoenix; was "a private," or more select house, like that of Blackfriars; and had been a cock-pit, by which name it was also designated. Phoenix generally implies that a place has been destroyed by fire, a common fate with theatres; but the first occasion on which we hear of the present one, is the destruction of it by a Puritan mob. This took place in the year 1617, in the time of James; and was doubtless caused by the same motives that led to the demolition of certain other houses, which it was thought to resemble in fame. In Howe's continuation of Stowe, it was called a "new play-house;" so that it had lately been either built or rebuilt. This theatre stood opposite the Castle tavern. There is still in existence a passage, called Cockpit alley, into Great Wild street; and there is a Phoenix alley, leading from Long Acre into Hart street.

[The Phoenix was soon rebuilt; and the performances continued till 1648, when they were again stopped by the Puritans who then swayed England, and who put an end to play-houses for some time. In the interval, some of the most admired of our old dramas were produced there, such as Marlowe's 'Jew of Malta,' Heywood's 'Women killed with Kindness,' 'The Witch of Edmonton,' by Rowley, Decker, and Ford; Webster's 'White Devil, or Victoria Corombona,' Massinger's 'New Way to Pay Old Debts,' and indeed many others.* It does not appear that Shakspeare or his immediate friends had any pieces performed there. He was a performer in other theatres, and the pressure of court, as well as city, lay almost exclusively in their discretion, till the growth of the western part of the metropolis divided it. The Phoenix known in his time was probably nearly as select a house as the Blackfriars. The company had the title of Queen's Servants (James's Queen), and the servants of the Lady Elizabeth (Queen of Bohemia).

A few years before the restoration, Davenant, supported by some of the less scrupulous authorities, ventured to struggle back something like the old entertainments, under pretence of accompanying them with music; a trick understood in our times where a licence is to be encroached upon. In 1656, he removed with them from Aldersgate street to this house; and after the fluctuation of different companies hither and thither, the Cockpit finally resumed its rank as a royal theatre, under the direction of the famous Killigrew, whose set of players were called the King's company, as those under Sir William Davenant had the title of the Duke's. Killigrew, dissatisfied with the old theatre at the Cockpit, built a new one nearly on the site of the present, and opened it in 1603. This may be called the parent of Drury lane Theatre as it now stands. It was burnt in 1671-2, rebuilt by Sir Christopher Wren, and opened in 1674 with a prologue from the pen of Dryden, from which time it stood till the year 1741. There had been some alterations in the structure of this theatre, which are said to have hurt the effect contemplated by Sir Christopher Wren, and perhaps assisted its destruction; for seventy years is no great age for a public building. Yet old Drury, as it was called, was said to have died of a "gradual decline." It was rebuilt and became old Drury the second; underwent the usual fate of theatres, in the year 1809; and was succeeded by the one now standing.

It is customary to divide the eras of theatres according to their management; but as managers become of little consequence to posterity, we shall confine ourselves, in this as in other respects, to names with which posterity is familiar. In Shakespeare's time, Drury lane appears to have been celebrated for the best productions of the second-rate order of dramatists, a set of men who would have been first in any other age. We have little to say of the particulars of Drury lane at this period, no memorandums having come down to us, as they did afterwards. All we can imagine is, that the Phoenix being much out of the way, with fields and country roads in the interval between court and city, and the performances taking place in the day time, the company probably consisted of the richer orders, the poorer being occupied in their labours. The court and the rich citizens went on horseback; the Duke of Buckingham in his newly-invented sedan. In the time of the Puritans we may fancy the visitors stealing in, as they would into a gambling house.

The era of the Restoration, or second era of the Stuarts, is that of the popularity of Ben Jonson's and Beaumont and Fletcher's plays, compared with Shakespeare's, though Davenant tried hard to revive him; of the plays of Dryden, Lee, and Otway; and finally of the rise of comedy, strictly so called, in those of Wycherly, Congreve, Farquhar, and Vanbrugh. All these writers had to do with Drury lane theatre, some of them almost exclusively. Nineteen out of Dryden's twenty-seven plays were produced there; seven out of Lee's eleven; all the good ones of Wycherly (that is to say, all except the 'Gentleman Dancing-Master'); two of Congreve's (the 'Old Bachelor' and 'Double Dealer'), and all Farquhar's, except the 'Beaux's Stratagem.' Otway's best pieces came out at the Duke's theatre; and Vanbrugh's in the Haymarket.* This may be called the second era of Drury lane, or rather the second and third; the former, which is Dryden's and Lee's, having for its principal performers, Hart, Mohun, Lacy, Goodman, Nell Gwynn, and others; the latter, which was that of Congreve and Farquhar, presenting us with Cibber, Wilks, Booth, Mrs Barry, and Mrs Bracegirdle. The two, taken together, began with the Restoration, and ended with George II.

* See Baker, passim.

Sir Richard Steele and the sentimental comedy came in at the close of the third era, and may be said to constitute the fourth; which in his person did not last long. Steele, admirable as an essayist, and occasionally as humorous as any dramatist in a scene or two, was hampered in his plays by the new moral ambition now coming up, which induced him to show, not so much what people are, as his notions of what they ought to be. This has never been held a legitimate business of the stage, which, in fact, is nothing else than what its favourite metaphor declares it, a glass of men and manners, in which they are to see themselves as they actually exist. It is the essence of the wit and dialogue of society brought into a focus. Steele was manager of Drury lane theatre, and made as bad a one as improvidence and animal spirits could produce.

The sentimental comedy continued into the next or fifth Drury lane era, which was that of Garrick, famous for his great reputation as an actor, and for his triumphant revival of Shakespeare's plays, which have increased in popularity ever since. Not that he revived them in the strictest sense of the word; for the attempt was making when he came to town, but he hastened and exalted the success of it.

The last era before the present one was that of Sheridan, who, though he began with Covent garden, produced four out of his seven pieces at this theatre; where he showed himself a far better dramatist, and a still worse manager than Steele.

We shall now endeavour to possess our readers with such a sense of these different periods, as may enable them to "live o'er each scene" not indeed of the plays, but of the general epochs of old Drury; to go into the green-room with Hart and Nell Gwynn; to see Mrs Oldfield swim on the stage as Lady Betty Modish; to revive the electrical shock of Garrick's leap upon it, as the lively Lothario;—in short, to be his grandfather and great-grandfather before him, and make one of the successive generations of play-goers, now in his peruke à la Charles II, and now in his Ramillie wig, or the bobs of Hogarth. Did we introduce him to all this ourselves, we should speak with less confidence; but we have a succession of play-goers for his acquaintance, who shall make him doubt whether he really is or is not his own ancestor, so surely shall they place him beside them in the pit.

And first for the immortal and most play-going Pepys. To the society of this jolliest of government officers, we shall consign our reader and ourselves during the reign of Charles II, and if we are not all three equally intimate with old Drury at that time, there is no faith in good company. By old Drury, we understand both the theatres; the Cockpit or Phoenix, and the new one built by Killigrew, which took the title of "King's Theatre." There was a cockpit at Whitehall, or court theatre, to which Pepys occasionally alludes; but after trying in vain to draw a line between such of his memorandums as might be retained and omitted, we here give up the task as undecidable, the whole harmonizing in one mass of theatrical gossip, and making us acquainted collaterally, even with what he is not speaking of. We have met, indeed, retained everything, but we have almost.

We saw, therefore, pass Drury House, proceed up the lane by my Lord Cavendish's garden, and turn into Russell street amongst a throng of cavaliers in flowing dolks, and ladies with curls à la Folliage. Some of them are in masks, but others have not put theirs on. We shall see them masquing as the house grows full. It is early in the afternoon. There press a crowd of gallants, who have already got enough wine. Here, as fast as the lumbering coaches of that period can do it, dashes up to the door my lord Duke of Buckingham, bringing with him Buckhurst and Sedley. There comes a greater, though at that time a humbler man, to wit, John Dryden, in a coat of plain druggat, which by and by his fame converted into black velvet. He is a somewhat short and stout man, with a roundish dimpled face and a sparkling eye; and, if scandal says true, by his side is "Madam" Reeves, a beautiful actress; for the ladies of the stage were so intitled at that time. Horses and coaches throng the place, with here and there a sedan; and by the pulling off of hats, we find that the king and his brother James are arrived. The former nods to his people as if he anticipated their mutual enjoyment of the play; the latter affects a graciousness to match, but does not do it very well. As soon as the king passes in, there is a squeeze and a scuffle; and some blood is drawn, and more oaths uttered, from which we hasten to escape. Another scuffle is silenced on the king's entrance, which also makes the gods quiet, otherwise at no period were they so loud. The house is not very large, nor very well appointed. Most of the ladies masque themselves in the pit and boxes, and all parties prepare for a play that shall render it proper for the remainder to do so. The king applauds a new French tune played by the musicians. Gallants, not very sober, are bowing on all sides of us to ladies not very nice; or talking to the orange girls, who are ranged in front of the pit with their backs to the stage. We hear criticisms on the last new piece, on the latest panegyric, libel, or new mode. Our friend Pepys listens and looks everywhere, tells all who is who, or asks it; and his neighbours think him a most agreeable fat little gentleman. The curtain rises: enter Mistress Marshall, a pretty woman, and speaks a prologue which makes all the ladies hurry on their masks, and convulses the house with laughter. Mr Pepys "do own" that he cannot help laughing too, and calls the actress "a merry jade;" "but, lord!" he says, "to see the difference of the times, and but two years gone." And then he utters something between a sigh and a chuckle, at the recollection of his Presbyterian breeding, compared with the jollity of his expectations.

But let us hear our friend's memorandums:—

"20th (September 1662). To the King's Theatre, where we saw 'Midsummer's Night's Dream,' which I had never seen before, nor shall ever again, for it is the most insipid, ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life. [The gods certainly had not made Pepys poetical, except on the substantial side of things.]

"5th (January 1662-3). To the Cockpit, where we saw 'Cassiopeia,' a poor play, done by the King's house; but neither the king nor queen were there, but only the duke and duchesse.

"23rd (February, 1662-3). We took coach and to court, and there we saw 'The Wild Gallant,' performed by the King's house, but it was ill acted. The king did not seem pleased at all, the whole play, nor any body else. My Lady Castlemaine was all worth seeing to-night, and little Steward. [This is Miss, or as the designation then was, Mrs Stewart, afterwards Duchess of Richmond. 'The Wild Gallant' was Dryden's first play, and was performed by Lady Castlemaine, afterwards not less notorious as Duchess of Cleveland. Miss Stewart and she were rivals.]

"1st (February 1663-4). To the King's Theatre, and there saw the 'Indian Queen' acted (by Sir Robert Howard and Dryden); which indeed is a most pleasant show, and beyond my expectation the play good, but spoiled with the rhyme, which breaks the sense. But above my expectation most, the eldest Marshall did do her part most excellently well as I have heard a woman in my life; but her voice is not so sweet as Ianthé's: but, however, we come home mightily contented.

"1st (January 1664). To the King's house, and saw 'The Silent Woman' (Ben Jonson's); but methought not so well done or so good a play as I formerly thought it to be. Before the play was done, it fell such a storm of hayle, that we in the middle of the pit were fain to rise, and all the house in a disorder.

"2nd (August 1664). To the King's play house, and there saw 'Bartholomew Fayre' (Ben Jonson's), which do still please me; and is, as it is acted, the best comedy in the world, I believe. I chanced to sit by Tom Killigrew, who tells me that he is setting up a nursery; that is, is going to build a house in Moorfields, wherein we will have common plays acted. But four operas it shall have in the year, to act six weeks at a time: where we shall have the best scenes and machines, the best musique, and every thing as magnificent as in Christendome, and to that end hath sent for voices and painters, and other persons from Italy.

"4th (August, 1664). To play at the King's house, 'The Rivall Ladies' (Dryden's), a very innocent and most pretty witty play. I was much pleased with it, and it being given me, I look upon it as no breach of my oath. [Pepys means that he had made a vow not to spend money on theatres, but that he was now treated to a play.] Here we hear that Clun, one of their best actors, was, the last night, going out of town after he had acted the Alchymist (wherein was one of his best parts that he acts), to his country house, set upon and murdered; one of the rogues taken, an Irish fellow. It seems most cruelly butchered and bound. The house will have a great miss of him. [Clun's body was found at Kentish Town in a ditch. Pepys went to see the place].

"11th (October, 1664). Luellin tells me what an obscene loose play this 'Parson's Wedding' is, (by Tom Killigrew), that is acted by nothing but women at the King's house.

"14th (January, 1664-5). To the King's house, there to see Vulpone, a most excellent play (Ben Jonson's); the best I think, I ever saw, and well acted.

"19th (March, 1666). After dinner we walked to the King's play-house, all in dirt, they being altering of the stage to make it wider. But God knows when they will begin to act again; but my business here was to see the inside of the stage, and all the tiring-rooms and machines; and, indeed, it was a sight worthy seeing. But to see their clothes, and the various sorts, and what a mixture of things there was; here a wooden leg, there a ruff, here a hobby horse, there a crown, would make a man split himself to see with laughing; and particularly Lacy's wardrobe and Shottrell's. But then again to think how fine they show on the stage by candle-light, and how poor things they are to look at too near hand, is not pleasant at all. The machines are fine, and the paintings very pretty."

"7th (December 1666). To the King's play-house, where two acts were almost done when I come in; and there I sat with my cloak about my face, and saw the remainder of 'The Mayd's Tragedy'; a good play, and well acted, especially by the younger Marshall, who is become a pretty good actor; and is the first play I have seen in either of the houses, since before the great plague, they having noted now about fourteen days publicly. But I was in mighty pain, lest I should be seen by anybody to be at play. [The plague seems to have made it an indecorum to resume visits to the theatre very speedily. Pepys had been educated among the Commonwealth-men, for whom he never seems to have got rid of a respect. The contrast aggravated his festivity.]

"8th (December 1666). To the King's play-house, and there did see a good part of 'The English Monsieur' (by James Howard), which is a mighty pretty play, very witty and pleasant. And the women do very well; but above all, little Nelly. [Nell Gwynn, not long entered upon the stage].

"27th (December 1666). By coach to the King's play-house, and there saw 'The Scornful Lady' (Beaumont and Fletcher), well acted; Doll Common doing Abigail most excellently, and Knipp the widow very well (and will be an excellent actor, I think). In other parts the play not so well done as need be by the old actors.

"3rd (January 1666-7). Alone to the King's house, and there saw 'The Custome of the Country' (Beaumont and Fletcher's), the second time of its being acted, wherein Knipp does the widow well; but of all the plays that ever I did see, the worst, having neither plot, language, nor anything on the earth that is acceptable; only Knipp sings a song admirably. [Mistress Knipp was a particular acquaintance of our friend's.]

"23rd (January 1666-7). To the King's house, and there saw the 'Humourous Lieutenant' (Beaumont and Fletcher's), a silly play, I think; only the spirit in it that grows very tall, and then sinks again to nothing, having two heads breeding upon one, and then Knipp's singing did please us. Here in a box above we spied Mrs Pierce; and going out they called us, and so we staid for them; and Knipp took us all in and brought us to Nelly (Nell Gwynn), a most pretty woman, who acted the great part of Celia to-day very fine, and did it pretty well: I kissed her, and so did my wife; and a mighty pretty soul she is. We also saw Mrs Ball, which is my little Roman-nose black girl, that is mighty pretty; she is usually called Betty. Knipp made us stay in the box, and see the dancing preparatory to to-morrow for the 'Goblins,' a play of Suckling's, not acted these twenty years; which was pretty.

"5th (February 1666-7). To the King's house to see 'The Chances' (Beaumont and Fletcher's). A good play I find it, and the actors most good in it. And pretty to hear Knipp sing in the play very properly, 'All night I weep;' and sung it admirably. The whole play pleases me well: and most of all, the sight of many fine ladies; among others, my Lady Castlemaine and Mrs Middleton: the latter of the two hath also a very excellent face and body, I think. And so home in the dark over the ruins with a link. [The ruins are those of the city, occasioned by the fire. Mr Pepys lived in Creed lane, where the Navy Office then was, in which he had an appointment].

"18th (February 1666-7). To the King's house, to 'The Mayd's Tragedy' (Beaumont and Fletcher's); but vexed all the while with two talking ladies and Sir Charles Sedley; yet pleased to hear their discourse, he being a stranger. And one of the ladies would and did sit with her mask on all the play, and being exceeding witty as ever I heard a woman, did talk most pleasantly with him; but was, I believe, a virtuous woman, and of quality. He would fain know who she was, but she would not tell; yet did give him many pleasant hints of her knowledge of him, by that means setting his brains at work to find out who she was, and did give him leave to use all means to find out who she was, but pulling off her mask. He was mighty witty, and she also making sport with him mighty inoffensively, that more pleasant rencontre I never heard. But by that means lost the pleasure of the play wholly, to which now and then Sir Charles Sedley's exceptions against both words and pronouncing were very pretty. [This is the famous wit and man of pleasure. We have him before us, as if we were present, together with a curious specimen of the manners of these times. The pit, though subject to violent scuffles, greatly occasioned by the wearing of swords, seems to have contained as good company as the opera pit does now].

"2nd (March 1666-7). After dinner with my wife to the King's house to see 'The Mayden Queene,' a new play of Dryden's, mighty commended for the regularity of it, and the strain and wit: and the truth is, there is a comical part, played by Nell, which is Florimell, that I never can hope to see the like done again by man or woman. The King and Duke of York were at the play. But so great performance of a comical part was never, I believe, in the world before as Nell do this, both as a mad girl, then most and best of all when she comes in like a young gallante; and hath the motions and carriage of a spark the most that ever I saw any man have. It makes me, I confess, admire her.

"25th (March 1666-7). To the King's play-house, and by and by comes Mr Lowther and his wife and mine, and into a box, forsooth, neither of them being dressed, which I was almost ashamed of. Sir W. Pen and I in the pit, and here saw the 'Mayden Queene' again; which, indeed, the more I see the more I like, and is an excellent play, and so done by Nell her merry part, as cannot be better done in nature.

"9th (April 1667). To the King's house, and there saw the 'Taming of the Shrew,' which hath some very good pieces in it, but generally is but a mean play; and the best part, 'Sawny,' done by Lacy; and hath not half its life, by reason of the words, I suppose, not being understood, at least by me. [This was one of the rifacimentos of Shakspeare, by which he was to be rendered palatable.]

"15th (April 1667). To the King's house by chance, where a new play: so full as I never saw it; I forced to stand all the while close to the very door till I took cold, and many people went away for want of room. The King and Queene and Duke of York and Duchesse there, and all the court, and Sir W. Coventry. The play called 'The Change of Crownes;' a play of Ned Howard's, the best that I ever saw at that house, being a great play and serious; only Lacy did act the country gentlemen come up to court with all the imaginable wit and plainness about the selling of places, and doing everything for money. The play took very much.

"16th (April 1667). Knipp tells me the King was so angry at the liberty taken by Lacy's part to abuse him to his face, that he commanded they should act no more, till Moone (Mohun) went and got leave for them to act again, but not in this play. The King mighty angry; and it was bitter indeed, but very fine and witty. I never was more taken with a play than I am with this 'Silent Woman' (Ben Jonson's) as old as it is, and as often as I have seen it. [Ned Howard, the author of 'The Change of Crownes,' was one of the sons of the Earl of Berkshire, and though of a family who helped to bring in the king, was probably connected with the Presbyterians, and disgusted, like many of the royalists on that side, by the disappointments they had experienced in church and state. Dryden, who married one of his sisters, was of a Presbyterian stock. Ned, however, who afterwards became the butt of the wits, was not very nice, and might have 'committed himself,' as the modern phrase is, in his mode of conducting his satire].

"20th (April 1667). Met Mr Rolt, who tells me the reason of no play to-day at the King's house, —that Lacy had been committed to the porter's lodge, for his acting his part in the late new play; and being thence released to come to the King's house, he there met with Ned Howard, the poet of the play, who congratulated his release; upon which Lacy cursed him, as that it was the fault of his nonsensical play that was the cause of his ill usage. Mr Howard did give him some reply, to which Lacy answered him that he was more a fool than a poet; upon which Howard did give him a blow on the face with his glove; on which Lacy, having a cane in his hand, did give him a blow over the pate. Here Rolt and others, that discoursed of it in the pit, did wonder that Howard did not run him through, he being too mean a fellow to fight with. But Howard did not do anything but complain to the King; so the whole house is silenced: and the gentry seem to rejoice much at it, the house being become too insolent.

"1st (May 1667). Thence away to the King's playhouse, and saw 'Love in a Maze:' but a sorry play; only Lacy's clown's part, which he did most admirably indeed; and I am glad to find the rogue at liberty again. Here was but little, and that ordinary company. We sat at the upper bench, next the boxes; and I find it do pretty well, and have the advantage of seeing and hearing the great people, which may be pleasant when there is good store.

"15th (August 1667). And so we went to the King's house, and there saw 'The Merry Wives of Windsor;' which did not please me at all, in no part of it.

"17th (August 1667). To the King's playhouse, where the house extraordinary full; and there the King and Duke of York to see the new play, 'Queene Elizabeth's Troubles, and the History of Eighty-eight.' I confess I have sucked in so much of the sad story of Queene Elizabeth from my cradle, that I was ready to weep for her sometimes; but the play is the most ridiculous that sure ever came upon stage, and, indeed, is merely a show, only shows the true garb of the Queene in those days, just as we see Queene Mary and Queene Elizabeth painted; but the play is merely a puppet play, acted by living puppets. Neither the design nor language better; and one stands by and tells us the meaning of things: only I was pleased to see Knipp dance among the milkmaids, and to hear her sing a song to Queene Elizabeth, and to see her come out in her nightgown with no lockes on, but her bare face, and hair only tied up in a knot behind; which is the comeliest dress that ever I saw her in to her advantage.

"22nd (August 1667). With my Lord Brouncker and his mistress to the King's playhouse, and there saw 'The Indian Emperour;' where I find Nell come again, which I am glad of; but was most infinitely displeased with her being put to act the Emperour's daughter, which is a great and serious part, which she does most basely.

"14th (September 1667). To the King's playhouse, to see 'The Northerne Castle,' (quære Lasse, by Richard Brome?) which I think I never did see before. Knipp acted in it, and did her part very extraordinary well; but the play is but a mean, sorry play.

"—, my wife, and Mercer, and I, away to the King's playhouse, to see 'The Scornful Lady' (Beaumont and Fletcher's), but it being now three o'clock, there was not one soul in the pit; whereupon, for shame, we could not go in; but against our wills, went all to see 'Tu Quoque' again (by John Cooke), where there was pretty store of company. Here we saw Madame Morland, who is grown mighty fat, but is very comely. Thence to the King's house, upon a wager of mine with my wife, that there would be no acting there to-day, there being no company: so I went in and found a pretty good company there, and saw their dance at the end of the play. [There is a confusion in the memorandum under this date.]

"20th (September 1667). By coach to the King's playhouse, and there saw 'The Mad Couple' (by Richard Brome), my wife having been at the same play with Jane in the 18d. seat.

"25th (September 1667). I to the King's playhouse, my eyes being so bad since last night's straining of them, that I am hardly able to see, besides the pain that I have in them. The play was a new play; and infinitely full; the King and all the court almost there. It is 'The Storme,' a play of Fletcher's; which is but so-so, methinks; only there is a most admirable dance at the end, of the ladies, in a military manner, which indeed did please me mightily.

"5th (October 1667). To the King's house; and there going in met with Knipp, and she took us up into the tireing-rooms; and to the women's shift, where Nell was dressing herself, and was all unready, and is very pretty, prettier than I thought. And into the scene-room, and there sat down, and she gave us fruit; and here I read the questions to Knipp, while she answered me, through all her part of 'Flora's Figarys,' which was acted to-day. But, lord! to see how they were both painted, would make a man mad, and did make me loath them, and what base company of men comes among them, and how lewdly they talk. And how poor the men are in clothes, and yet what a show they make on the stage by candle-light, is very observable. But to see how Nell cursed, for having so few people in the pit, was strange; the other house carrying away all the people at the new play, and is said now-a-days to have generally most company, as having better players. By and by into the pit, and there saw the play, which is pretty good.

"19th (October 1667). Full of my desire of seeing my Lord Orrery's new play this afternoon at the King's house, 'The Black Prince,' the first time it is acted; where, though we came by two o'clock, yet there was no room in the pit, but were forced to go into one of the upper boxes at 4s. a-piece, which is the first time I ever sat in a box in my life. And in the same box came by and by, behind me, my Lord Berkeley and his lady; but I did not turn my face to them to be known, so that I was excused from giving them my seat. And this pleasure I had, that from this place the scenes do appear very fine indeed, and much better than in the pit. The house infinite full, and the King and Duke of York there. The whole house was mightily pleased all along till the reading of a letter, which was so long and so unnecessary, that they frequently began to laugh, and to hiss twenty times, that had it not been for the King's being there, they had certainly hissed it off the stage.

"23rd (October 1667). To the King's playhouse, and saw 'The Black Prince;' which is now mightily bettered by that long letter being printed, and so delivered to everybody at their going in, and some short reference made to it in the play. [This is in the style of what Buckingham called "insinuating the plot into the boxes."]

"1st (November 1667). To the King's playhouse, and there saw a silly play and an old one, 'The Taming of the Shrew.'

"2nd (November 1667). To the King's playhouse, and there saw 'Henry the Fourth;' and, contrary to expectation, was pleased in nothing more than in Cartwright's speaking of Falstaff's speech about 'What is honour?' The house full of parliament-men, it being holyday with them: and it was observable how a gentleman of good habit sitting just before us, eating of some fruit in the midst of the play, did drop down as dead, being choked; but with much ado Orange Moll did thrust her finger down his throat, and brought him to life again.

"26th (December 1667). With my wife to the King's playhouse, and there saw 'The Surprizall' (by Sir Robert Howard, brother of Ned); which did not please me to-day, the actors not pleasing me; and especially Nell's acting of a serious part, which she spoils.

"28th (December 1667). To the King's house, and there saw 'The Mad Couple,' which is but an ordinary play; but only Nell's and Hart's mad parts are most excellent done, but especially her's, which makes it a miracle to me to think how ill she do any serious part, as, the other day, just like a fool or changeling; and, in a mad part, do beyond all imitation almost. It pleased us mightily to see the natural affection of a poor woman, the mother of one of the children brought on the stage; the child crying, she by force got upon the stage, and took up her child, and carried it away off of the stage from Hart. Many fine faces here to-day.

"7th (January 1667-8). To the Nursery [qy. in Barbican, for children performers?] but the house did not act to-day; and so I to the other two playhouses, into the pit to gaze up and down, and there did, by this means, for nothing, see an act in 'The Schoole of Compliments' at the Duke of York's house, and 'Henry the Fourth' at the King's house; but not liking either of the plays, I took my coach again, and home. [It would here seem, that a man who did not choose to pay for a seat, might witness a play for nothing.]

"11th (January 1667-8). To the King's house, to see 'The Wilde-Goose Chase' (Beaumont and Fletcher's). In this play I met with nothing extraordinary at all, but very dull inventions and designs. Knipp came and sat by us, and her talk pleased me a little, she telling me how Miss Davies is for certain going away from the Duke's house, the King being in love with her; and a house is taken for her, and furnishing; and she hath a ring given her already worth 600*l*: that the King did send several times for Nelly, and she was with him; and I am sorry for it, and can hope for no good to the state from having a prince so devoted to his pleasure. She told me also of a play shortly coming upon the stage, of Sir Charles Sedley's, which, she thinks, will be called 'The Wandering Ladys,' a comedy that she thinks will be most pleasant; and also another play called 'The Duke of Lorane;' besides 'Cataline,' which she thinks, for want of the clothes which the King promised them, will not be acted for a good while.

"20th (February 1667-8). Dined, and by one o'clock to the King's house: a new play, 'The Duke of Lerma,' of Sir Robert Howard's: where the King and court was; and Knipp and Nell spoke the prologue most excellently, especially Knipp, who spoke beyond any creature I ever heard. The play designed to reproach our King with his mistresses, that I was troubled for it, and expected it should be interrupted; but it ended all well; which salved me.

"27th (February 1667-8). With my wife to the King's house, to see 'The Virgin Martyr' (by Massinger) the first time it hath been acted a great while: and it is mighty pleasant; not that the play is worth much, but it is finely acted by Beck Marshall. But that which did please me beyond anything in the world, was the wind-musique when the angel comes down; which is so sweet that it ravished me, and, indeed, in a word, did wrap up my soul so that it made me really sick, just as I have formerly been when in love with my wife; that neither then, nor all the evening going home, and at home, I was able to think of anything, but remained all night transported, so as I could not believe that ever any musique hath that real command over the soul of a man, as this did upon me; and makes me resolve to practice wind-musique, and to make my wife do the like. [Pepys's use of the word "sick," and his resolution to make his wife practise the hautboy, are very ludicrous. His love of music, however, is genuine. He was an amateur composer. On the 23rd Feb. 1666, he has the following memorandum: "Comes Mrs Knipp to see my wife, and I spent all the night talking with this baggage, and teaching her my song of 'Beauty retire,' which she sings and makes go most rarely, and a very fine song it seems to be."]

"6th (March 1667-8). After dinner to the King's house, and there saw part of the 'Discontented Colonel' (Sir John Suckling's 'Brennora!').

"7th (April 1668). To the King's house, and there saw 'The English Monsieur,' (sitting for privacy sake in an upper box): the play hath much mirth in it, as to that particular humour. After the play done, I down to Knipp, and did stay her undressing herself: and there saw the several players men and women, go by; and pretty to see how strange they are all, one to another, after the play is done. Here I hear Sir W. Davenant is just now dead; and so, who will succeed him in the mastership of the house is not yet known. The eldest Davenport, is, it seems, gone from this house to be kept by somebody; which I am glad of, she being a very bad actor. Mrs Knipp tells me that my Lady Castlemaine is mighty in love with Hart of their house, and he is much with her in private, and she goes to him and do give him many presents; and that the thing is most certain, and Beck Marshall only privy to it, and the means of bringing them together: which is a very odd thing; and by this means she is even with the King's love to Mrs Davies.

"28th (April 1668). To the King's house, and there did see 'Love in a Maze,' (the author is not mentioned in Baker); wherein very good mirth of Lacy the clown, and Wintershell, the country-knight, his master.

"May 1st (1668). To the King's playhouse, and there saw the 'Surprizall;' and a disorder in the pit by its raining in from the cupola at top.

"7th (May 1668). To the King's house; where going in for Knipp, the play being done, I did see Beck Marshall come dressed off of the stage, and look mighty fine, and pretty and noble; and also Nell in her boy's clothes mighty pretty. But, lord! their confidence, and how many men do hover about them as soon as they come off the stage, and how confident they are in their talk. Here was also Haynes, the incomparable dancer of the King's house.

"16th (May 1668). To the King's playhouse, and there saw the best part of 'The Sea Voyage' (Beaumont and Fletcher), where Knipp did her part of sorrow very well.

"18th (May 1668). It being almost twelve o'clock, or little more, to the King's playhouse, where the doors were not then open; but presently they did open, and we in, and find many people already come in by private ways into the pit, it being the first day of Sir Charles Sedley's new play so long expected, 'The Mulberry Garden,' of whom, being so reputed a wit, all the world do expect great matters. I having sat here a while and eat nothing to-day, did slip out, getting a boy to keep my place; and to the Rose Tavern (Will's, in Russell street), and there got half a breast of mutton off the spit, and dined all alone. And so to the playhouse again, where the King and Queen by and by come, and all the court, and the house infinitely full. But the play, when it come, though there was here and there a pretty saying, and that not very many neither, yet the whole of the play had nothing extraordinary in it at all, neither of language nor design; insomuch that the King I did not see laugh nor pleased from the beginning to the end, nor the company; insomuch that I have not been less pleased at a new play in my life, I think.

"30th (May 1668). To the King's playhouse, and there saw 'Philaster;' where it is pretty to see how I could remember almost all along, ever since I was a boy, Arathusa, the part which I was to have acted at Sir Robert Cooke's; and it was very pleasant to me, but more to think what a ridiculous thing it would have been for me to have acted a beautiful woman.

"22nd (June 1668). To the King's playhouse, and saw an act or two of the new play, 'Evening Love' again, (Dryden's) but like it not.

"11th (July 1668). To the King's playhouse, to see an old play of Shirley's, called 'Hyde Parke,' the first day acted; where horses are brought upon the stage: but it is but a very moderate play, only an excellent epilogue spoken by Beck Marshall.

"31st (July 1668). To the King's house, to see the first day of Lacy's 'Monsieur Bagou,' now new acted. The King and court all there, and mighty merry, a farce.

"15th (September 1668). To the King's playhouse to see a new play, acted but yesterday, a translation out of French by Dryden, called 'The Ladies à la Mode,' [probably the 'Precieuses,' but not translated by Dryden]: so mean a thing as when they came to say it would be acted again tomorrow, both he that said it (Beeson) and the pit fell a-laughing.

"10th (September 1668). To the King's playhouse, and there saw the 'Silent Woman;' the best comedy, I think, that ever was wrote: and sitting by Shadwell the poet, he was big with admiration of it. Here was my Lord Brouncker and W. Pen and their ladies in the box, being grown mighty kind of a sudden; but, God knows, it will last but a little while, I dare swear. Knipp did her part mighty well.

"28th (September 1668). To the King's playhouse, and there saw 'The City Match,' (by Jasper Maine) not acted these thirty years, and but a silly play: the King and court there; the house, for the women's sake, mighty full.

"14th (October 1668). To the King's playhouse and there saw 'The Faithful Shepherdess,' (Fletcher's) that I might hear the French eunuch sing; which I did to my great content; though I do admire his actions as much as his acting, being both beyond all I ever saw or heard.

"December 2nd (1668). So she (Mrs Pepys) and I to the King's playhouse, and there saw 'The Usurper;' a pretty good play in all but what is designed to resemble Cromwell and Hugh Peters, which is mighty silly. [The Usurper was by Ned Howard, who seems to have wished to show how impartial he could be.]

19th (December 1678). My wife and I by hackney to the King's playhouse, and there, the pit being full, sat in the box above, and saw 'Cataline's Conspiracy' (Ben Jonson's), yesterday being the first day: a play of much good sense and words to read, but that do appear the worst upon the stage, I mean the least diverting, that ever I saw any, though most fine in clothes; and a fine scene of the senate and of a fight as ever I saw in my life. We sat next to Betty Hall, that did belong to this house, and was Sir Philip Howard's mistress; a mighty pretty wench.

"7th (January 1668-9). My wife and I to the King's playhouse, and there saw 'The Island Princess' (Beaumont and Fletcher's), the first time I ever saw it; and it is a pretty good play, many good things being in it, and a good scene of a town on fire. We sat in an upper box, and the merry jade Nell came in and sat in the next box; a bold slut, who lay laughing there upon people, and with a comrade of her's, of the Duke's house, that came to see the play.

"11th (January 1668-9). Abroad with my wife to the King's playhouse, and there saw 'The Jovial Crew' (by Richard Brome), ill acted to what it was in Clun's time, and when Lacy could dance.

"19th (January 1668-9). To the King's house to see 'Horace' (translated from Corneille by Charles Cotton); this is the third day of its acting; a silly tragedy; but Lacy hath made a farce of several dances—between each act one: but his words are but silly, and invention not extraordinary as to the dances. [Pepys adds, with seeming approbation, an instance of satire on the Dutch, too gross to extract, and highly disgraceful to that age of "fine ladies and gentlemen."]

"2nd (February 1668-9). To dinner at noon, where I find Mr Sheres; and there made a short dinner, and carried him with me to the King's playhouse, where 'The Maypole,' notwithstanding Kynaston's being beaten, is acted: and they say the King is very angry with Sir Charles Sedley for his being beaten, but he do deny it. But his part is done by Beeson, who is fain to read it out of a book all the while, and thereby spoils the part, and almost the play, it being one of the best parts in it: and though the design is, in the first conception of it pretty good, yet it is but an indifferent play; wrote they say, by my Lord Newcastle. But it was pleasant to see Beeson come in with others, supposing it to be dark, and yet forced to send his part by the light of the candles; and this I observing to a gentleman, that sat by me, he was mightily pleased therewith and spread it up and down. But that that pleased me most in the play, is the first song that Knipp sings (she sings three or four); and indeed it was very finely sung, so as to make the whole house clap her.

6th (February 1668-9). To the King's playhouse, and there in an upper box (where come in Colonel Paynton and Doll Stacey, who is very fine, and by her wedding-ring I suppose he hath married her at last), did see the 'Moor of Venice:' but ill acted in most parts, Moon (which did a little surprise me) not acting Iago's part by much so well as Clun used to do; nor another Hart's, which was Cassio's; nor indeed Burt doing the Moor's so well as I once thought he did.

9th (February, 1668-9). To the King's playhouse, and there saw the 'Island Princess,' which I like mighty well as an excellent play; and here we find Kynaston to be well enough to act again; which he do very well, after his beating by Sir Charles Sedley's appointment. [Kynaston is generally supposed to have been taken for Sedley, and beaten for some offence of the baronet's. He affected to be Sedley's double.]

20th (February 1668-9). To the King's playhouse, and saw the 'Faithful Shepherdess.' But, lord! what an empty house, these not being, as I could see the people, so many as to make up above 100, in the whole house! But I plainly discern the music is the better, by how much the house the emptier." [The same thing was said by the great Handel, to console himself once, when he found a sparse audience.]

Of the performers mentioned in this curious theatrical gossip, one of them, Hart, had been a captain in the civil wars; another, Mohun, a major; and there was a third a quarter-master; all on the royal side. Hart and Mohun were old actors, when Betterton was young; and they lived to see him reckoned superior to either. The two were accustomed to act together, Hart generally in the superior character, as Brutus to the other's Cassius; and both, like Betterton, acted in comedy as well as tragedy. They performed, for instance, Manly and Horner in 'The Country Wife,' and there appears to have been less distinction in their styles of acting than is customary. If Hart shone in the Dominant of Sir Bopling Flutter, Mohun was highly applauded in Beaumont's 'Valentine,' in 'Wit without Money.' Mohun, however, appears to have excelled in the more heroic parts of tragedy, as Catiline, and Hart in the mixture of gaiety with boldness, as in Hotspur and Alexander. His Alexander was particularly famous. Upon the whole, we shall conclude Mohun's to have the more artificial acting of the two, more like "the actor," in Partridge's sense of the word; but very fine nevertheless, otherwise Rochester would hardly have admired him, as he is said to have done; unless, indeed, it was out of spite to some other actor; for he was much influenced by feelings of that kind. Perhaps, however, it was out of some chance predilection. The Duke of Buckingham is said to have preferred Ben Jonson to Shakespeare, for no other reason than his having been introduced to him when a boy. The best compliment ever known to have been paid to Hart is an anecdote recorded of Betterton. Betterton acted Alexander after Hart's time; and "being at a loss," says Davies, "to recover a particular emphasis of that performance, which gave a force to some interesting situation of the part, he applied for information to the players who stood near him. At last, one of the lowest of the company repeated the line exactly in Hart's key. Betterton thanked him heartily, and put a piece of money into his hand, as a reward for so acceptable an services." Hart had the reputation of being the first lover of Nell Gwynn, and one of the hundreds of the Dukes of Cleveland.

Goodman was another of the favoured many. He was one of the Alexanders of his time, but does not appear to have been a great actor. He was a dashing impudent fellow, who boasted of his having taken "an airing" on the road to recruit his purse. He was expelled from Cambridge for cutting and defacing the portrait of the Duke of Monmouth, chancellor of the University, but not loyal enough to his father to please Goodman. James II pardoned the loyal Highwayman, which Goodman (in Gibber's hearing) said "was doing him so particular an honour, that no man could wonder if his acknowledgment had carried him a little farther than ordinary into the interest of that prince. But as he had lately been out of luck in backing his old master, he had now no way to get home the life he was out, upon his account, but by being under the same obligations to King William."† The meaning of this is understood to be, that Goodman offered to assassinate William, in consequence of his having had a pardon from James; but the plot not succeeding, he turned king's evidence against James, in order to secure a pardon from William. This "pretty fellow" was latterly so easy in his circumstances, owing, it is supposed, to the delicate Cleveland, that he used to say he would never act Alexander the Great, but when he was certain that "his duchess" would be in the boxes to see him.

The stage in that day was certainly not behind-hand with the court; and as it had less conventional respectability in the eyes of the world, its private character was never so low. But we must do justice, and not confound even the disreputable. Poor Nell Gwynn, in a quarrel with one of the Marshalls, who reproached her with being the mistress of Lord Buckhurst, said she was mistress but of one man at a time, though she had been brought up in a bad house "to fill strong waters to the gentlemen;" whereas her rebuker, though a clergyman's daughter, was the mistress of three. This celebrated actress, who was as excellent in certain giddy parts of comedy as she was inferior in tragedy, was small of person, but very pretty, with a good-humoured face, and eyes that winked when she laughed. She is the ancestress of the ducal family of St Alban's, who are thought to have retained more of the look and complexion of Charles II, than any other of his descendants. Beauclerc, Johnson's friend, was like him; and the black complexion is still in vigour. The King recommended her to his brother with his last breath, begging him "not to let poor Nelly starve." Burnet says she was introduced to the King by Buckingham, to supplant the Duchess of Cleveland; but others tell us, he first noticed her in consequence of a hat of the circumference of a coach-wheel, in which Dryden made her deliver a prologue, as a set-off to an enormous hat of Pistol's at the other house, and which convulsed the spectators with laughter. If Nelly retained a habit of swearing, which was probably taught her when a child (and it is clear enough from Pepys that she did), the poets did not discourage her. One of her epilogues by Dryden began in the following startling masses. It is intitled 'an Epitaph spoken by Mrs Ellen, when she was to be carried off dead by the bearers.'

"Hold, are you mad, you damn'd confounded dog?"

I am to rise and speak the epilogue."

The poet makes her say of herself, in the course of the lines, that she was "a harmless little devil," and that she was slatternly in her dress. Lely, painted her with a lamb under her arm. Mr Pegge discovered that Charles made her a lady of the chamber to his queen. Pennant seems to think this was only a title; but it is plain from Evelyn's Memoirs that she had apartments in Whitehall.* She died a few years after the King, at her house in Pall Mall. Nell was much libelled in her time, and among others by Sir George Etherege;† very likely out of some personal pique or rejection, for such revenges were quite compatible with the "loves" of that age.‡ But she was a general favourite, nevertheless, owing to a natural good-heartedness which no course of life could overcome. Burnet's character of her is well known. "Guin," says he, "the indiscreetest and wildest creature that ever was in a court, continued, to the end of that king's life, in great favour, and was maintained at a vast expense. The Duke of Buckingham told me that when she was first brought to the King, she asked only five hundred pounds a-year; and the King refused it. But when he told me this, about four years after, he said, she had got of the King above sixty thousand pounds. She acted all persons in so lively a manner, and was such a constant diversion to the King, that even a new mistress could not drive her away. But after all he never treated her with the decencies of a mistress."§ Nell Gwynn is said to have suggested to her royal lover the building of Chelsea Hospital, and to have made him a present of the ground for it.

Upon the whole the dramatic taste during the greater part of Charles's reign was false and artificial, particularly in tragedy. Etherege produced one good comedy, the precursor of Wycherly and Congreve; but Dryden, the reigning favourite, was not as great in dramatic as he was in other writing; his heroic plays, and Lee's 'Alexander,' were admired, not so much for the beauties mixed with their absurdity, as for the improbable air they gave to a serious passion; and the favourite plays of deceased authors were those of the most equivocal writers of the time of James, not the pure and profound nature of Shakspeare and his fellows. Otway flourished, but was not thought so great as he is now; and even in Otway there is a hot bullying smack of the tavern, very different from the voluptuousness in Shakspeare. Towards the close of this reign comedy came to its height with Wycherly, who, almost as profligate in point of dialogue as any of

I was heartily sorry at this scene. Thence the King walked to the Duchess of Cleveland, another lady of pleasure, and curse of our nation." — Evelyn's 'Memoirs,' ut supra, vol. II, p. 226. his contemporaries, nevertheless, hit the right vein of satire. Wycherly lived at the other end of Russell street, in Bow street, where we shall see him shortly.

We are now come to the time of Congreve, Mrs. Bracegirdle, and others; Betterton remaining. Of these, individually, we have spoken before; and therefore shall only observe that by the more serious examples of James II. and King William, the manners of the day were reforming, and those of the stage with them. We now find ourselves among audiences more composed, and witness plays less coarse, though with an abundance of double meaning and exuberantly witty. Coquetry and fashion are now the reigning stage goddesses, as mere wantonness was that of the age preceding.

Farquhar and Vanbrugh succeeded, together with Cibber, Wilkes, Booth, and latterly Steele and Mrs Oldfield. Vanbrugh does not belong to Drury lane, but Farquhar does, with the rest; and a lively place he made of it. He is Captain Farquhar, has a plume in his hat, and prodigious animal spirits, with invention at will, and great good nature. Captains abounded among the wits and adventurers of those days, down to Captains Macheath and Gibbet. Vanbrugh was a captain, Steele at one time was Captain Steele; and Mrs Oldfield's father, though the son of a vintner, became Captain Oldfield, and genteelly ran out an estate. This is still the age of genuine comedy, and the stage is worthy of it. The tragedy was proportionably bad. Booth, indeed, was a good tragic actor, but he suited the age in being declamatory. He was the hero of Addison's Cato, once the favourite tragedy of the critics, now of nobody.

Rowe was another artificial writer of tragedy, but not without a vein of feeling. It seems to have been thought in those times, as we may see by these authors, and by the tragedies of Banks and Lillo, that to be natural, an author was to be prosaic; while, if he had any pretensions to be poetical, it was his business to—

"—wake the soul by tender strokes of art."

The gradual approach, also, of this period to our own times, more critical in costume, and the pictures left to us of favourite performers in Hamlet and Hermione, dressed in wigs and hoop petticoats, render those outrages upon propriety still stranger to one's imagination. They set tragedy in a mock heroic light. Cato wore a long peruke; Alexander the Great a wig and jack-boots; and it was customary, down to Garrick's time, to dress Macbeth, and other tragic general-officers in a suit of brick-dust. "Booth enters," says Pope:—

"—Hark, the universal peal!

But has he spoken? Not a syllable.

What shook the stage and made the people stare?

Cato's long wig, flowered gown, and lackered chair."

The stare was not that of ridicule, but of admiration. All this makes the comedy of that period shine out the more, as the only truth extant. Cherry, and Archer, and Sir Harry Wildair, and Sir John Brute, and my Lady Betty Medish, were like the age, and like the performers.

To return to these. Wilkes was the fine gentleman of that period. He was a friend of Farquhar's, who came to London with him from Dublin. Cibber, though he wrote a good comedy, would appear, by some accounts of him, to have been little more on the stage than a mimic of past actors. Steele, however, has a criticism on him and Wilks, in which he speaks of them both as perfect actors in their kinds. "Wilks" he proceeds to say, "has a singular talent in representing the graces of nature; Cibber the deformity in the affectation of them. Were I a writer of plays, I should never employ either of them in parts which had not their bents this way. This is seen in the inimitable strain and run of good humour which is kept up in the character of Willdair, and in the nice and delicate abuse of understanding in that of Sir Novelty. Cibber in another light, hits exquisitely the flat civility of an affected gentleman usher, and Wilks the easy frankness of a gentleman. . . . To beseech gracefully, to approach respectfully, to pity, to mourn, to love, are the places wherein Wilks may be made to shine with the utmost beauty. To rally pleasantly, to scorn artfully, to flatter, to ridicule, and to neglect, are what Cibber would perform with no less excellence."*

This criticism produced a letter to Steele from two inferior actors of that time, Bullock and Penkethman, who rather than not be noticed at all, were willing to be bantered. They knew it would be done good-naturedly. Accordingly the 'Tatler' says, "For the information of posterity I shall comply with this letter, and set these two great men in such a light as Sallust has his placed Cato and Cesar. Mr William Bullock and Mr William Penkethman are of the same age, profession, and sex. They both distinguish themselves in a very particular manner under the discipline of the crab-tree, with this only difference, that Mr Bullock has the more agreeable squall, and Mr Penkethman the more graceful shrug. Penkethman devours cold chick with great applause; Bullock's talent lies chiefly in asparagus. Penkethman is very dexterous at conveying himself under a table; Bullock is no less active at jumping over a stick. Mr Penkethman has a great deal of money; but Mr Bullock is the taller man."†

Off the stage, and behind the scenes, Cibber performed the part of a coxcomb of the first order. We shall not be properly acquainted with Drury lane at this period if we do not repeat his story of the wig.

This was a peruke of his, famous in the part of Sir Fopling Flutter. It was so much admired, that Cibber used to have it brought upon the stage in a sedan, and put it on publicly, to the great content of the beholders. A set of curls so applauded was the next thing to a toast; and accordingly Colonel, then Mr Brett, whom the toasts admired, could not rest till he had taken possession of it. "The first view," says Colley, "that fires the head of a young gentleman of this modish ambition, just broke loose from business, is to cut a figure (as they call it) in a side box at the play, from whence their next step is to the green-room behind the scenes, sometimes their non ultra. Hither, at last then, in this hopeful quest of his fortune, came this gentleman-errant, not doubting but the fickle dame, while he was thus qualified to receive her, might be tempted to fall into his lap. And though, possibly, the charms of our theatrical nymphs might have their share in drawing him thither; yet, in my observation, the most visible cause of his first coming was a more sincere passion he had conceived for a fair full-bottomed perriwig, which I then wore in my first play of the 'Fool in Fashion,' in the year 1695. For it is to be noted that the beaux of those days were of a quite different cast to the modern stamp, and had more of the stateliness of the peacock in their mien, than (which now seems to be their highest emulation) the pert of a lapwing. Now, whatever contempt philosophers may have for a fine perriwig, my friend, who was not to despise the world, but to live in it, knew very well, that so material an article of dress, upon the head of a man of sense, if it became him, could never fail of drawing to him a more partial regard and benevolence, than could possibly be hoped for in an ill-made one. This, perhaps, may soften the grave censure which so youthful a purchase might otherwise have laid upon him. In a word, he made his attack upon this perriwig, as your young fellows generally do for a lady of pleasure; first, by a few familiar praises of her person, and then a civil inquiry into the price of it. But on his observing me a little surprised at the levity of his question about a fop's perriwig, he began to rally himself with so much wit and humour upon the folly of his fondness for it, that he struck me with an equal desire of granting anything, in my power, to oblige so facetious a customer. This singular beginning of our conversation, and the mutual laughs that ensued upon it, ended in an agreement to finish our bargain, that night, over a bottle."* Colonel Brett, being a man of "bonnes fortunes," married Savage's mother!

Mrs Oldfield made such an impression in her day, and has been noticed by so many writers, that she must have a passage to herself. She was the daughter of Captain Oldfield above-mentioned, and went to live with her aunt, who kept the Mitre tavern in St James's market. Here, we are told, Captain Farquhar, overhearing Miss Nancy read a play behind the bar, was so struck "with the proper emphasis and agreeable turn she gave to each character, that he swore the girl was cut out for the stage. As she had always expressed an inclination for that way of life, and a desire of trying her fortune in it, her mother, on this encouragement, the next time she saw Captain Vanbrugh (afterwards Sir John), who had a great respect for the family, acquainted him with Captain Farquhar's opinion, on which he desired to know whether her bent was most tragedy or comedy. Miss being called in, informed him, that her principal inclination was to the latter, having at that time gone through all Beaumont and Fletcher's comedies; and the play she was reading when Captain Farquhar dined there having been 'The Scornful Lady.' Captain Vanbrugh, shortly after, recommended her to Mr Christopher Rich, who took her into the house at the allowance of fifteen shillings per week. However, her agreeable figure and sweetness of voice soon gave her the preference, in the opinion of the whole town, to all the young actresses of that time, and the Duke of Bedford, in particular, being pleased to speak to Mr Rich in her favour, he instantly raised her to twenty shillings per week. After which her fame and salary gradually increased, till at length they both attained that height which her merit entitled her to."†

The new actress had a silver voice, a beautiful face and person, great good nature, sprightliness, and grace, and became the fine lady of the stage, in the most respectable sense of the word. She also acted heroines of the sentimental order, and had an original part in every play of Steele. But she was particularly famous in the part of Lady Betty Modish, in 'The Careless Husband.' The name explains the character. Cibber tells us, that he drew many of the strokes in it from her lively manner. "Had her birth," he says, "placed her in a higher rank of life, she had certainly appeared, in reality, what in this play she only excellently acted, an agreeable gay woman of quality, a little too conscious of her natural attractions. I have often seen her in private societies, where women of the best rank might have borrowed some part of their behaviour, without the least diminution of their sense or dignity. And this very morning, where I am now writing, at the Bath November 11th, 1738, the same words were said of her by a lady of condition, whose better judgment of her personal merit, in that light, has emboldened me to repeat them. After her success in this character of higher life, all that nature had given her of the actress seemed to have risen to its full perfection: but the variety of her power could not be known till she was seen in a variety of characters; which, as fast as they fell to her, she equally excelled in. Authors had much more from her performance than they had reason to hope for, from what they had written for her; and none had less than another, but as their genius, in the parts they allotted her, was more or less elevated.

"In the wearing of her person she was particularly fortunate; her figure was always improving to her thirty-sixth year; but her excellence in acting was never at a stand; and the last new character she shone in (Lady Townly) was a proof that she was still able to do more, if more could have been done for her. She had one mark of good sense, rarely known in any actor of either sex but her herself. I have observed several, with promising dispositions, very desirous of instruction at their first setting out; but no sooner had they found their best account in it, than they were as desirous of being left to their own capacity, which they then thought would be disgraced by their seeming to want any farther assistance. But this was not Mrs Oldfield's way of thinking; for to the last year of her life she never undertook any part she liked, without being importunately desirous of having all the helps in it that another could possibly give her. By knowing so much herself, she found how much more there was of nature yet needful to be known.

"Yet it was a hard matter to give her any hint, that she was not able to take or improve. With all this merit, she was tractable, and less presuming in her station than several that had not half her pretensions to be troublesome. But she lost nothing by her easy conduct; she had everything she asked, which she took care should be always reasonable; because she hated as much to be grudging as deny'd a civility. Upon her extraordinary action in the 'Provoked Husband,' the managers made her a present of fifty guineas more than her agreement, which never was more than a verbal one: for they knew she was above deserting them, to engage upon any other stage; and she was conscious they would never think it their interest to give her cause of complaint. In the last two months of her illness, when she was no longer able to assist them, she declined receiving her salary, though by her agreement she was entitled to it. Upon the whole, she was, to the last scene she acted, the delight of her spectators."*

THIS charming actress (Mrs Oldfield) is said to have been the Flavia of 'The Tatler' (No. 212). The catch-penny writer of her memoirs equivocally speaks of it as her "vera effigies," and on his authority the assertion has been repeated. But as a Flavia mentioned in the same work (No. 239) turns out to be Miss Osborne, afterwards the wife of Bishop Atterbury (upon whom he wrote the lines on a fan, there inserted, beginning

"Flavia the least and slightest toy Can with resistless art employ") and as the first Flavia is praised for her quality and the extreme simplicity of her manners (which, according to Cibber, was not exactly one of the charms of Mrs Oldfield), the supposition, we think, falls to the ground. We need have less hesitation in admitting, that Steele, who knew her well, alludes to her in another paper, under her favourite title of Lady Betty Modish. Speaking of the effects of love upon a generous temper, in refining the manners, he says, "There is Colonel Ranter, who never spoke without an oath until he saw the Lady Betty Modish; now, never gives his man an order, but it is, 'Pray, Tom, do it.' The drawers where he drinks live in perfect happiness. He asked Will at the George the other day, how he did? Where he used to say, 'Damn it, it is so;' he now 'believes there is some mistake; he must confess, he is of another opinion; but, however, he will not insist.'"* This Colonel Ranter is supposed by the commentators to have been Brigadier-General Churchill, one of the Marlborough family, who lived with Mrs Oldfield after the death of Mr Maynwaring. Steele elsewhere speaks of a 'General' (supposed to be the same) 'weeping' for her, in the character of Indiana in his 'Conscious Lovers;' upon which he said Mr Wilks observed (for he had made all the fine gentlemen tender) that the General "would fight ne'er the worse for that."

Mrs Oldfield's position in life was singular. With all her beauty and attraction, and the license of stage manners, she is understood to have attached herself but to two persons, successively, and on the footing of a wife. The first was Mr Maynwaring, a celebrated Whig writer, to whom one of the volumes of 'The Spectator' is dedicated, and by whom she had a son; and, after his death, she lived with General Churchill, by whom she had a son also. "She left," says 'The General Biography,' "the bulk of her substance to her son Maynwaring, from whose father she had received it; without neglecting, however, her other son Churchill, and her own relations."

* 'Tatler,' No. 10.

During the period of these two connexions, Mrs Oldfield appears to have been received into the first circles, where she is described as being a pattern of good behaviour; and yet the feeling of Mr Maynwaring's friends against the connexion was so strong, that she herself, though she is understood to have had a sincere affection for him, is said to have often remonstrated with him against it, as injurious to his interest. Marriage with an actress, though the example had been set by a Duke, appears in neither case to have been thought of. The feeling of society seems to have been this: "Here is a woman bred up to the stage, and passing her life upon it. It is therefore impossible she should marry a gentleman of family; and yet, as her behaviour would otherwise deserve it, and the examples of actresses are of no authority for anyone but themselves, some license may be allowed to a woman who diverts us so agreeably, who attracts the society of the wits, and is so capital a dresser. We will treat her profession with contempt, but herself with consideration." Upon these curious grounds Mrs Oldfield lived in every respect like a woman of fashion, and as she became rich (which was, perhaps, not the least of her recommendations), she was admitted into the best society, and went to court. The pretence among her visitors during both her connexions, probably was, that she was privately married; but she was too sincere to warrant the deception. The Princess of Wales (afterwards Queen of George II) asked her one day at a levee, if her marriage with General Churchill was true. "So it is said, may it please your highness, but we have not owned it yet."—"It may appear singular," says Mr Chalmers, who tells us this story, "to quote the late pious Sir James Stonhouse for anecdotes of Mrs Oldfield; yet in one of his letters we are informed, that she always went to the house in the same dress she had worn at dinner, in her visits to the houses of great people; for she was much caressed on account of her professional merit, and her connexion with Mr Churchill, the Duke of Marlborough's brother,—that she used to go to the playhouse in a chair, attended by two footmen; that she seldom spoke to any one of the actors; and was allowed a sum of money to buy her own clothes."* Mrs Oldfield's generosity was much admired in giving a pension to Savage, which he received regularly as long as she lived. This is what has given posterity a liking for her. When she died, she lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber, and her funeral in Westminster Abbey was attended by several noblemen, among others, as pallbearers. Mr Chalmers has repeated, with other biographers, that "at her own desire," she was elegantly dressed in her coffin; on which account, it is added, Pope introduced her in the character of Narcissa:

"Odious! in woollen! 'twould a saint provoke,
(Were the last words that poor Narcissa spoke);
No, let a charming chintz and Brussels lace
Wrap my cold limbs and shade my lifeless face:
One would not sure be frightful when one's dead—
And, Betty, give this cheek a little red."

But it does not appear that there is any authority for this speech, except the poet's. A letter written to her first biographer by an attendant during her last illness, says, that "although she had no priest," she "prayed without ceasing," which does not look like an attention to dress; but the biographer adds, that "as the nicety of dress was her delight when living, she was as nicely dressed after her decease; being, by Mrs Saunders' direction, thus laid in her coffin." The nicely here mentioned was, to be sure, "mortal fine."—"She had on," says the writer, "a very fine Brussels lace-head, a 'Holland' shift with tucker, and double ruffles of the same lace; a pair of new kid gloves, and her body wrapt up in a winding sheet."* Yet we are of Montaigne's opinion, and know not why death should be rendered more melancholy than it is. When a tomb was opened in Greece, supposed to be that of Aspasia, there was found in it a sprig of myrtle, in gold.

The next batch of players, with Garrick at their head, are Quin, Macklin, Barry, King, Woodward, Gentleman Smith, and others; with Mrs Clive, Pritchard, Cibber, and Woffington. Garrick's later contemporaries are Parsons, Dodd, Quick, the Palmers, Miss Pope, Mrs Abingdon, and others, who bring us down to Mrs Siddons, Miss Farren, &c. the commencers of our own time. Of Steele and the sentimental comedy we need say no more: Goldsmith belongs to Covent Garden; Foote to the Haymarket; and Cumberland, though an elegant writer, does not call for any particular mention in an abstract like this.

When Garrick first appeared, a declamatory grandeur prevailed in tragedy, which we conceive to have arisen in the time of Charles II. It was probably handed down by Booth; and imitated, with the usual deterioration, from Betterton, who, though a true genius and a universal one, may not have been uncorrupted by the taste of the times; not to mention that it is doubtful, till Garrick appeared, whether the art of acting was not identified with something too much of an art, and the delicacy of verses expected to partake more of recitation and musical accompaniment than we now look for. Our suspicion to this effect arises from the traditional habits of the stage, one generation handing down the manner of another, and Betterton himself having been educated in the school of those who were bred up in the recollection of Burbage and Condell. Shakespeare himself, from custom, or even from some subtlety of reason, might have approved of something of this kind; though, on the other hand, in the celebrated directions of Hamlet to the players, there appears to us a secret dissatisfaction with the most applauded actors of that time, as not being exactly what was desirable. If this notion is just, and the great poet of nature was as much advanced beyond his time in this as in other respects, he might indeed have hailed such an actor as Garrick, however hyperbolically they have been sometimes put together. The best performers whom Garrick found in possession of public applause, though some of them are described as excelling in all the varieties of passion, (as Mrs Cibber, for instance) appear to have been more or less of the old declamatory school. Quin in particular, then at the head of the profession, was an avowed declaimer, having the same notions of tragedy in the delivery, which his friend Thomson had in the composition. Posterity respects Quin, as the friend of Thomson, and laughs with him as an epicure and a sayer of bon-mots. Garrick and he ultimately became excellent friends. Of the first reception of the new style of acting introduced by Garrick, its electrical effect upon some, and the natural hesitation of others to give up their old favourites, a lively picture has been left us by Mr Cumberland.

Speaking of himself, who was then at Westminster school, he says, "I was once or twice allowed to go, under proper convoy, to the play, where, for the first time in my life, I was treated with the sight of Garrick in the character of Lothario. Quin played Horatio; Ryan, Altamont; Mrs Cibber, Calista; and Mrs Pritchard condescended to the humble part of Lavinia. I enjoyed a good view of the stage from the front row of the gallery, and my attention was rivetted to the scene. I have the spectacle even now, as it were, before my eyes. Quin presented himself, upon the rising of the curtain, in a green velvet coat, embroidered down the seams, an enormous full-bottomed perriwig, rolled stockings, and high-heeled, square-toed shoes; with very little variation of cadence, and in a deep, full tone, accompanied by a sawing kind of action, which had more of the senate than of the stage in it, he rolled out his heroics with an air of dignified indifference, that seemed to disdain the plaudits that were bestowed upon him. Mrs Cibber, in a key high-pitched, but sweet withal, sung, or rather recitatively, Rowe's harmonious strain, something in the manner of the improvisadores; it was so extremely wanting in contrast, that, though it did not wound the ear, it wearied it; when she had once recited two or three speeches, I could anticipate the manner of every succeeding one; it was like a long, old, legendary ballad of innumerable stanzas, everyone of which is sung to the same tune, eternally chiming in the ear without variation or relief. Mrs Pritchard was an actress of a different cast, had more nature, and, of course, more change of tone, and variety both of action and expression: in my opinion the comparison was decidedly in her favour; but when, after long and eager expectation, I first beheld little Garrick, then young and light and alive in every muscle and in every feature, come bounding on the stage, and pointing at the wittol Altamont and heavy-paced Horatio—heavens, what a transition!—it seemed as if a whole century had been swept over in the transition of a single scene; old things were done away and a new order at once brought forward, bright and luminous, and clearly destined to dispel the barbarisms and bigotry of a tasteless age, too long attached to the prejudices of custom, and superstitiously devoted to the illusions of imposing declamation. This heaven-born actor was then struggling to emancipate his audience from the slavery they were resigned to; and though, at times, he succeeded in throwing in some gleams of new-born light upon them, yet, in general, they seemed to love darkness better than light, and, in the dialogue of altercation between Horatio and Lothario, bestowed far the greater show of hands upon the master of the old school than upon the founder of the new. I thank my stars, my feelings in those moments led me right; they were those of nature, and therefore could not err."

It is needless to add that Garrick excelled in comedy as well as tragedy, and in the lowest comedy too—in Abel Drugger as well as Hamlet. He was first at Goodman's fields; then appeared both at Covent garden and Drury lane; but in a short time settled for life at Drury lane, as actor, manager, and

* Memoirs of Richard Cumberland, written by himself. 4to. p. 50. Davies, in his Life of Garrick, vol. i. p. 136, gives us a different idea of the preference awarded by the audience. To be sure, upon his knowledge, he says only that Quin was defeated "in the opinion of the best judges;" but he adds, from report, an anecdote that looks as if the general feeling also was against him. "When Lothario," he says, "gave Horatio the challenge, Quin, instead of accepting it instantaneously, with the determined and unembarrassed brow of superior bravery, made a long pause, and dragged out the words in such a manner as to make it appear absolutely ludicrous. He paused so long before he spoke, that somebody, it was said, called out from the gallery, 'Why don't you tell the gentleman whether you will meet him or not?'" author. He was a sprightly dramatist, a man of wit and no doubt a generous man, though the endless matters of business in which he was concerned, and the refusals of all kinds which he must have been often forced into, got him, with many, a character for the reverse. Johnson, who did not spare him, pronounced him generous. Fine as his tragedy must have been, we suspect his comedy must have been finer; because his own nature was one of greater sprightliness than sentiment. We hear nothing serious of him throughout his life; and his face, with a great deal of acuteness, has nothing in it profound or romantic.

"I'll meet thee there!"

Garrick has the reputation of improving the stage costume: but it was Macklin that did it. The late Mr West, who was the first (in his picture of the 'Death of Wolfe') to omit the old absurdity of putting a piece of armour instead of a waistcoat upon a general officer, told us, that he himself once asked Garrick why he did not reform the stage in that particular. Garrick said the spectators would not allow it; "they would throw a bottle at his head." Macklin, however, persevered, and the thing was done. The other, with all his nature, seems to have had a hankering after the old dresses. He had first triumphed in them, and they suited his propensity to the airy and popular. Garrick had a particular dislike to appearing in the Roman costume. Probably in this there was a consciousness of his small person. There are many engravings of him extant, in which his tragic characters are seen in coats and toupes. His appearance as Hotspur, in a laced frock and Ramillie wig, was objected to, not as being unsuitable to the time, but as "too insignificant for the character."

Of Barry, the most celebrated antagonist of Garrick, we shall speak at Covent garden. King, according to Churchill, by the force of natural impudence as well as genius, excelled in "Brass;" and Churchill's opinions are worth attending to, though he expresses them with vehemence and by wholesale. Gentleman Smith explains his character by his title. We should entertain a very high opinion of Mrs Pritchard, even had she left us nothing but the face in her portraits. She seems to have been a really great genius, equally capable of the highest and lowest parts. The fault objected to her was, that her figure was not genteel; and we can imagine this well enough in an actress who could pass from Lady Macbeth to Doll Common. She seems to have thrown herself into the arms of sincerity and passion, not, perhaps, the most refined, but as tragic and comic as need be. As Churchill says,

"Before such merits all objections fly, Pritchard's genteel, and Garrick six feet high."

Clive was an admirable comic actress, of the wilful and fantastic order, and a wit and virago in private life. She became the neighbour and intimate of Horace Walpole, and always seems to us to have been the man of the two. Mrs Woffington was an actress of all work, but of greater talents than the phrase generally implies. Davies says she was the handsomest woman that ever appeared on the stage, and that Garrick was at one time in doubt whether he should not marry her. She was famous for performing in male attire, and openly preferred the conversation of men to women,—the latter, she said, talking of "nothing but silks and scandal." She was the only woman admitted into one of the beef-steak clubs, and is said to have been president of it. These humours, perhaps, though Davies praises her for feminine manners, as contrasted with her antagonist Mrs Clive, frightened Garrick out of his matrimony.

We now pass at once to Covent garden Theatre, which lies close by. Many old play-goers who are in the habit of associating the two theatres in their fancy, like twins, will be surprised to hear that the Covent garden establishment is very young, compared with her sister, being little more than a hundred years old. The old theatre was built by Rich, the harlequin, and opened in 1733, under the patent granted to the Duke's company. The Covent garden company may therefore be considered as the representatives of the old companies of Davenant and Betterton; while those at Drury lane are the successors of Killigrew, and more emphatically the King's actors. Indeed, they exclusively designate themselves as "his Majesty's servants;" and, we believe, claim some privileges on that account. Covent garden theatre was partly rebuilt in 1772, and wholly so in 1809, having undergone the usual death by conflagration. The new edifice is a structure in classical taste, by Mr Smirke, the portico being a copy from the Parthenon of Athens.

Actors have seldom been confined to any one house; and those whom we are about to mention performed at Drury lane as well as Covent garden; but as they were rivals or opponents of Garrick, and may be supposed to have made the greatest efforts when they acted on a different stage, we shall speak of them apart under the present head. The first of these is Barry, who, at one time, almost divided the favour of the town with Garrick, and in some characters is said to have excelled him, especially in love parts. How far this was owing to superiority of figure, and to a reputation for gallantry, it is impossible to say; and never were judgments more discordant than those which have been left us on the subject of Barry's merits. For instance, his character is thus summed up by Davies:

"Of all the tragic actors who have trod the English stage for these last fifty years, Mr Barry was unquestionably the most pleasing. Since Booth and Wilks, no actor had shown the public a just idea of the hero or the lover; Barry gave dignity to the one and passion to the other: in his person he was tall without awkwardness; in his countenance, handsome without effeminacy; in his uttering of passion, the language of nature alone was communicated to the feelings of an audience."

Davies proceeds to tell us, that Barry could not perform such characters as Richard and Macbeth, though he made a capital Alexander. "He charmed the ladies by the soft melody of his love-complaints, and the noble ardour of his courtship. There was no passion of the tender kind so truly pathetic and forcible in any actor as in Barry, except in Mrs Cibber, who, indeed, excelled in the expression of love, grief, tenderness, and jealous rage. All I ever knew. Happy it was for the frequenters of the theatre, when these two genuine children of nature united their efforts to charm an attentive audience. Mrs Cibber, indeed, might be styled the daughter or sister of Mr Garrick, but could be only the mistress or wife of Barry." Our author afterwards calls him the "Mark Antony of the stage," whether his amorous disposition was considered, or his love of expense. He delighted in giving magnificent entertainments, and treated Mr Pelham, who once invited himself to sup with him, in a style so princely, that the minister rebuked him for it; which was not very civil. An actor has surely as much right to do absurd things as a politician.

Now, as a contrast to this romantic portrait by Davies, take the following from the severer but masterly hand of Churchill:

"In person taller than the common size,
Behold where Barry draws admiring eyes:
When lab'ring passions, in his bosom pent,
Convulsive rage, and struggling heave for vent,
Spectators, with imagined terrors warm,
Anxious expect the bursting of the storm:
But, all unfit in such a pile to dwell,
His voice comes forth like Echo from her cell;
To swell the tempest needful aid denies,
And all a-down the stage in feeble murmur dies.
What man, like Barry, with such pains, can err
In elocution, action, character?
What man could give, if Barry was not here,
Such well-applauded tenderness to Lear?
Who else can speak so very, very fine,
That sense may kindly end with every line?
Some dozen lines, before the ghost is there,
Behold him for the solemn scene prepare.
See how he frames his eyes, poises each limb,
Puts the whole body into proper trim,—
From whence we learn, with no great stretch of art,
Five lines hence comes a ghost, and lo! a start.
When he appears comes most perfect, still we find Something which jars upon and hurts the mind.
Whatever lights upon a part are thrown,
We see too plainly they are not his own:
No flame from nature ever yet he caught,
Nor knew a feeling which he was not taught;
He raised his trophies on the base of art,
And connd his passions, as he connd his part."*

The probability, we fear, is, that Barry was one of the old artificial school, who made his way more by person than by genius. Davies, who was a better gossip than critic, though he affected literature, was an actor himself of the 'mouthing order, if we are to believe Churchill; and his criticisms show him enough inclined to lean favourably to that side.

We have spoken of Quin, who acted much at this house, in opposition to Garrick. It was here that he delivered the prologue to the memory of his friend Thomson; and affected the audience by shedding real tears.†

Macklin was celebrated in Shylock; and in some other sarcastic parts, particularly that of Sir Archy, in his comedy of 'Love à la Mode.' We take him to have been one of those actors whose performances are confined to the reflection of their own personal peculiarities. The merits of Shuter, Edwin, Quick, and others who succeeded one another as buffoons, were perhaps a good deal of this sort; but pleasant humours are rare and acceptable. Macklin was a clever satirist in his writing, and embroiled himself, not so cleverly, with a variety of his acquaintances. He foolishly attempted to run down Garrick; and once, in a sudden quarrel, poked out a man's eye with his stick, and killed him; for which he narrowly escaped hanging. However, he was sorry for it; and he is spoken of, by the stage historians, as kind in his private relations, and liberal of his purse. A curious specimen of his latter moments we reserve for our mention of the house where he died.

† "He left behind him (Thomson) the tragedy of 'Cædianus,' which was, by the seal of his patron, Sir George Lyttleton, brought upon the stage for the benefit of his family, and recommended by a prologue, which Quin, who had long lived with Thomson in fond intimacy, spoke in such a manner as showed him 'to be,' on that occasion, 'no actor.' The commencement of this benevolence is very honourable to Quin; who is reported to have delivered Thomson, then known to him only for his genius, from an arrest, by a very considerable present; and its continuance is honourable to both; for friendship is not always the equal of obligation." Life, by Dr Johnson, in Chalmers's Fests, p. 406.

Woodward seems to have been a kind of caricature Lewis, and was a capital harlequin. But nobody in harlequins beat Rich, the manager of this theatre. His pantomimes and spectacles produced a re-action against Garrick, when nothing else could; and Covent garden ever since has been reckoned the superior house in that kind of merit—"the wit," as Mr Ludlow Holt called it, "of goods and chattels." However, a considerable degree of fancy and observation may be developed in pantomime: it is the triumph of animal spirits at Christmas, for the little children; and for the men there is occasionally some excellent satire on the times, reminding one, in its spirit, of what we read of the comic buffoonery of the ancients. Grimaldi, in his broad and fugitive sketches, often showed himself a shrewder observer than many a comic actor who can repeat only what is set down for him. Covent garden has, perhaps, been superior also in music, at least since the existence of the two houses together: for Purcell was before its time. Many of Arne's pieces came out here; and the famous Beard, a singer, as manly as his name, the delight both of public and private life, was one of the managers.

Among the Covent garden actors must not be forgotten Cooke, who came out there in Richard III. For some time he was the greatest performer of this and a few other characters. He was a new kind of Macklin, and, like him, excelled in Shylock and Sir Archy M'Saracum; a confined actor, and a wayward man, but highly impressive in what he could do. His artful villains have been found fault with for looking too artful and villainous; but men of that stamp are apt to look so. The art of hiding is a considerable one; but habit will betray it after all, and stand foremost in the countenance. They who think otherwise, are only too dull to see it. Besides, Cooke had generally to represent bald-faced, aspiring art; and to hug himself in its triumph. This he did with such a gloating countenance, as if villainy was pure luxury to him, and with such a soft inward retreating of his voice,—a wrapping up of himself, as it were, in velvet,—so different from his ordinary rough way, that sometimes one could almost have wished to abuse him.

Joha Kemble, who, like the whole respectable family of that name, contributed much to maintain the rising character of the profession, may be considered the last popular actor of the declamatory school. His sister was a far greater performer, a true theatrical genius, especially for the stately and dominant; and had a great effect in raising the character of the profession. The growth of liberal opinion is nowhere more visible than in the different estimation in which actors and actresses are now held, compared with what is was. Individuals, it is true, always made their way into society by dint of the interest they excited; but still they were upon sufferance. Anybody could insult an actor, could even beat him, without its being dreamt that he had a right to retaliate; and the most amiable and lady-like actresses were thought unfit for wives, as we have seen in the case of Mrs Oldfield. Things are now upon a different footing. Talent is allowed its just pretensions, whether coming from author or performer; and actresses have taken such a step, in ascension, that nobility almost seems to look out for a wife among them, as in a school that will inevitably furnish it with some kind of grace and intellect. The famous Lord Peterborough, who seems to have been the first that married an actress, kept the union concealed as long as he could, and only owned it just before his death. The Duke of Bolton, who married Miss Fenton, the Polly of Gay's opera, had first had several children by her as his mistress; so that this is hardly a case in point; and the marriage of Beard, the singer, with a lady of the Waldegrave family, though he was one of the most excellent of men, was looked upon as such a degradation, that they have contrived to omit the circumstance in the peerage-books to this day! Martin Folkes's marriage with Mrs Bradshaw probably made the world consider the case a little more rationally, as he was a clever man; but Lord Derby's marriage with Miss Farren, who was eminently the gentlewoman, as well as of spotless character, seems to have been the first that rendered such unions compatible with public opinion. Lord Craven's with Miss Brunton followed, though at a considerable interval; and since that time, the town are so far from being surprised at the marriages of actresses with people of rank or fashion, that they seem to look for them. Lord Thurlow, not long afterwards, married Miss Bolton; another noble lord was lately the husband of an eminent singer; and several other favourites of the town, Miss Tree, Miss O'Neill, &c. have become the wives of men of fortune. We remember even a dancer, Miss Searle, (but she was of great elegance, and had an air of delicate self-possession) who married into a family of some rank.*

The whole entertainment of a theatre has been rising in point of accommodation and propriety for these last fifty years. The scenery is better, the music better,—we mean the orchestra,—and, last, not least, the audiences are better. They are better behaved. Garrick put an end to one great nuisance,—the occupation, by the audience, of part of the stage. Till his time, people often sat about a stage as at the sides of a room, and the actor had to make his way among them, sometimes with the chance of being insulted; and scuffles took place among themselves. Dr Johnson, at Lichfield, is said to have pushed a man into the orchestra who had taken possession of his chair. The pit, also, from about Garrick's time, seems to have left to the galleries the vulgarity attributed to it by Pope. There still remains, says he,—

—"to mortify a wit,

The many-headed monster of the pit,
A senseless, worthless, and unhonoured crowd,
Who, to disturb their better mighty proud,
Clattering their sticks before ten lines are spoke,
Call for the fave, the bear, or the black-joke."

This would now be hardly a fair description of the galleries; and yet modern audiences are not reckoned to be of quite so high a cast as they used, in point of rank and wealth; so that this is another evidence of the general improvement of manners. Boswell, in an ebullition of vivacity, while sitting one night in the pit by his friend Dr Blair, gave an extempore imitation of a cow! The house applauded, and he ventured upon some attempts of the same kind which did not succeed. Blair advised him in future "to stick to the cow." No gentleman now-a-days would think of a freak like this. There is one thing, however, in which the pit have much to amend. Their destitution of gallantry is extraordinary, especially for a body so ready to accept the "clap-traps" of the stage, in praise of their "manly hearts," and their guardianship of the fair. Nothing is more common than to see women standing at the sides of the pit benches, while no one thinks of offering them a seat. Room even is not made, though it often might be. Nay, we have heard women rebuked for coming without securing a seat, while the reprover complimented himself on his better wisdom, and the hearers laughed. On the other hand, a considerate gentleman one night, who went out to stretch his legs, told a lady in our hearing that she might occupy his seat "till he returned."

*The names of actresses may be named with observing that the names of all the stage ladies of quality terminate with an N;—Fenton, Farren, Brunton, and Nelson.

A friend of ours knew a lady who remembered Dr Johnson in the pit, taking snuff out of his waistcoat pocket. He used to go into the green-room to his friend Garrick, till he honestly confessed that the actresses excited too much of his admiration. Garrick did not much like to be seen by him, when playing any buffoonery. It is said that the actor once complained to his friend that he talked too loud in the stage box, and interrupted his feelings: upon which "the Doctor said, "Feelings! Punch has no feelings." It was Johnson's opinion (speaking of a common cant of critics), that an actor who really "took himself" for Richard III, deserved to be hanged; and it is easy enough to agree with him; except that an actor who did so would be out of his senses. Too great a sensibility seems almost as hurtful to acting as too little. It would soon wear out the performer. There must be a quickness of conception, sufficient to seize the truth of the character, with a coolness of judgment to take all advantages; but as the actor is to represent as well as conceive, and to be the character in his own person, he could not with impunity give way to his emotions in any degree equal to what the spectators suppose. At least, if he did, he would fall into fits, or run his head against the wall. As to the amount of talent requisite to make a great actor, we must not enter upon a discussion which would lead us too far from our main object; but we shall merely express our opinion, that there is a great deal more of it among the community than they are aware.

Goldsmith was a frequenter of the theatre; Fielding and Smollett, Sterne, but particularly Churchill. "His observatory," says Davies, "was generally the first row of the pit, next the orchestra." His 'Rosciad,' a criticism on the most known performers of the day, made a great sensation among a body of persons who, as they are in the habit of receiving applause to their faces, and in the most victorious manner, may be allowed a greater stock of self-love than most people;—a circumstance which renders an unexacting member of their profession doubly delightful. "The writer," says Davies, "very warmly, as well as justly, celebrated the various and peculiar excellences of, Mrs Pritchard, Mrs Cibber, and Clive; but no one has, except Garrick, escaped his satirical lash." Poor Davies is glad to say this, because of the well-known passage in which he himself is mentioned:—

"With him came mighty Davies! On my life
That Davies hath a very pretty wife."

We will make one more quotation from this poem, because it describes a class of actors, who are now extinct, and who carried the artificial school to its height:—

"Mossop, attached to military plan,
Still kept his eye fixed on his right-hand man.
Whilst the mouth measures words with seeming skill,
The right hand labours and the left lies still;
For he resolved on scripture grounds to go,
What the right hand doth, the left hand shall not know.
With studied impropriety of speech,
He soars beyond the hackney critic's reach;
To epithets allots emphatic state,
Whilst principals, ungraced, like lackeys, wait;
In ways first trodden by himself excels,
And stands alone in indeclinables;
Conjunction, preposition, adverb join,
To stamp new vigour on the nervous line:
In monosyllables his thunders roll;
Hx, shx, it, and wx, yz, they, fright the soul."

Mr Barrymore (of whom we have no unpleasing recollection) had something of this manner with him, but the extreme style is now quite gone out.

The only capital performers we remember, that are now dead and gone, with the exception of two or three already mentioned, were Mrs Jordan, a charming cordial actress on the homely side of the agreeable, with a delightful voice; and Suett, who was the very personification of weak whimsicality, with a laugh like a peal of giggles. Mathews gives him to the life.

We shall conclude this chapter with some delightful play-going recollections of the best theatrical critic now living*—the best, indeed, as far as we know, that this country ever saw. He is one who does not respect criticism a jot too much, nor any of the feelings connected with humanity, or the imitation of it, too little. We here have him giving us an account of the impression made upon him by the first sight of a play, and concluding with a good hint to those older children, who, because they have cut their drums open, think nothing remains in life to be pleased with. A child may like a theatre, because he is not thoroughly acquainted with it; but if he become a wise man, he will find reason to like it, because he is.

Life always flows with a certain freshness in these quarters; nor, with all their drawbacks, have we more agreeable impressions from any neighbourhood in London, than what we receive from the district containing the great theatres. It is one of the most social and the least sordid.

"At the north end of Cross court," says Mr Lamb, "there yet stands a portal, of some architectural pretensions, though reduced to humble use, serving at present for an entrance to a printing office. This old door-way, if you are young, reader, you may not know was the identical pit entrance to old Drury—Garrick's Drury—all of it that is left. I never pass it without shaking some forty years from off my shoulders, recurring to the evening when I passed through it to see my first play. The afternoon had been wet, and the condition of our going (the elder folks and myself) was, that the rain should cease. With what a beating heart did I watch from the window the puddles, from the stillness of which I was taught to prognosticate the desired cessation. I seem to remember the last spurt, and the glee with which I ran to announce it."

"In those days were pit orders. Beshrew the uncomfortable manager who abolished them!—with one of these we went. I remember the waiting at the door—not that which is left—but between that and an inner door, in shelter—O, when shall I be such an expectant again!—with the cry of nonpareils, an indispensable playhouse accompaniment in those days. As near as I can recollect, the fashionable pronunciation of the Theatrical fruiterer was, 'chase some oranges, chase some nonpareils, chase a bill of the play: chase pro chase. But when we got in and I beheld the green curtain that veiled a heaven to my imagination, which was soon to be disclosed—the breathless anticipations I endured! I had seen something like it in the plate prefixed to 'Troilus and Cressida,' in Rowe's 'Shakspeare,'—the tent scene with Diomedes; and a sight of that plate can always bring back, in a measure, the feeling of that evening. The boxes at that time full of well-dressed women of quality, projected over the pit; and the pilasters, reaching down, were adorned with a glistening substance (I know not what) under glass (as it seemed), resembling—a homely fancy—but I judged it to be sugar-candy—yet, to my raised imagination, divested of its homelier qualities, it appeared a glorified candy! The orchestra lights at length arose, those 'fair Auroras!' Once the bell sounded. It was to ring out yet once again—and, incapable of the anticipation, I reposed my shut eyes in a sort of resignation upon the maternal lap. It rang the second time. The curtain drew up—I was not past six years old—and the play was 'Artaxerxes'!

"I had dabbled a little in the 'Universal History'—the ancient part of it—and here was the court of Persia. It was being admitted to a sight of the past. I took no proper interest in the action going on, for I understood not its import—but I heard the word Darius, and I was in the midst of Daniel. All feeling was absorbed in vision. Gorgeous vests, gardens, palaces, princes, passed before me—I knew not players. I was in Persepolis for the time, and the burning idol of their devotion almost converted me into a worshipper. I was awe-struck, and believed those significations to be something more than elemental fires. It was all enchantment and a dream. No such pleasure has ever since visited me but in dreams. Harlequin's invasion followed; where, I remember, the transformation of the magistrates into reverend beldames seemed to me a piece of grave historic justice, and the tailor carrying his own head to be as sober a verity as the legend of St Denys.

"The next play to which I was taken, was the 'Lady of the Manor,' of which, with the exception of some scenery, very faint traces are left in my memory. It was followed by a pantomime called 'Lun's Ghost'—a satiric touch, I apprehend, upon Rich, not long since dead—but to my apprehension (too sincere for satire) Lun was as remote a piece of antiquity as Lud—the father of a line of harlequins—transmitting his dagger of lath (the wooden sceptre) through countless ages. I saw the primeval Motley come from his silent tomb in a ghastly vest of white patch-work, like the apparition of a dead rainbow. So harlequins (thought I) look when they are dead.

"My third play followed in quick succession. It was 'The Way of the World.' I think I must have sat at it as grave as a judge; for, I remember, the hysteric affections of good Lady Wishfoot affected me like some solemn tragic passion. 'Robinson Crusoe' followed, in which Crusoe, Man Friday, and the Parrot were as good and authentic as in the story. The clownery and pantaloony of these pantomimes have clean passed out of my head. I believe I no more laughed at them, than at the same age, I should have been disposed to laugh at the grotesque gothic heads (seeming to me then replete with devout meaning) that gape, and grin, in stone, around the inside of the old round church (my church) of the Templars.

"I saw these plays in the season of 1781-2, when I was from six to seven years old. After the intervention of six or seven years (for at school all play-going was inhibited) I again entered the doors of a theatre. That old Artaxerxes evening had never done ringing in my fancy. I expected the same feelings to come again with the same occasion. But we differ from ourselves less at sixty and sixteen, than the latter does from six. In that interval what had I not lost! At the first period I knew nothing, understood nothing, discriminated nothing. I felt all, loved all, wondered all—

‘Was nourished, I could not tell how.’

I had left the temple a devotee, and was returned a rationalist. The same things were there materially; but the emblem, the reverence was gone! The green curtain was no longer a veil drawn between two worlds, the unfolding of which was to bring back past ages, to present a ‘royal ghost,’—but a certain quantity of green baize, which was to separate the audience for a given time from certain of their fellow men who were to come forward and pretend those parts. The lights—the orchestra lights—came up, a clumsy machinery. The first ring, and the second ring, was now but a trick of the prompter's bell, which had been like the note of the cuckoo, a phantom of a voice, no hand seen or guessed at, which ministered to its warning. The actors were men and women painted. I thought the fault was in them; but it was in myself, and the alteration which those many centuries—of six short twelve-months—had wrought in me. Perhaps it was fortunate for me that the play of the evening was but an indifferent comedy, as it gave me time to crop some unreasonable expectations, which might have interfered with the genuine emotions with which I was soon after enabled to enter upon the first appearance, to me, of Mrs Siddons in Isabella. Comparison and retrospection soon yielded to the present attraction of the scene; and the theatre became to me, upon a new stock, the most delightful of recreations.” *

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

COVENT GARDEN CONTINUED AND LEICESTER SQUARE.

Contents:—Bow street once the Bond street of London.—Fashions at that time.—Infamous frolic of Sir Charles Sedley and others.—Wycherly and the Countess of Drogheda.—Tonson the bookseller.—Fielding.—Russell street.—Dryden beaten by hired ruffians in Rose street.—His presidency at Will's coffee-house.—Character of that place.—Addison and Button's coffee-house.—Pope, Phillips, and Garth.—Armstrong.—Boswell's introduction to Johnson.

Bow street was once the Bond street of London. Mrs Bracegirdle began an epilogue of Dryden's with saying—

“I've had to-day a dozen billet-doux

From fops, and wits, and cits, and Bow-street beaux;

Some from Whitehall, but from the Temple more: A Covent-garden porter brought me four.”

Sir Walter Scott says, in a note on the passage, “With a slight alteration in spelling, a modern poet would have written Bond street beaux. A billet-doux from Bow street would now be more alarming than flattering.” †

Mrs Bracegirdle spoke this epilogue at Drury lane. There was no Covent garden theatre then. People of fashion occupied the houses in Bow street, and mantuas floated up and down the pavement. This was towards the end of the Stuarts' reign, and the beginning of the next century,—the times of Dryden, Wycherly, and the Spectator. The beau of Charles's time is well known. He wore, when in full flower, a peruke to imitate the flowing locks of youth, a Spanish hat, clothes of slashed silk or velvet, the slashes tied with ribands,—a coat resembling a vest rather than the modern coat, and silk stockings, with roses in his shoes. The Spanish was afterwards changed for the cocked hat, the flowing peruke for one more compact; the coat began to stiffen into the modern shape, and when in full dress, the beau wore his hat under his arm. His grimaces have been described by Dryden:—

“His various modes from various fathers follow;
One taught the toss, and one the new French wallow;

His sword-knot this, his cravat that designed;
And this the yard-long snake that twirls behind.
From one the sacred periwig he gained,
Which wind ne'er blew, nor touch of hat profaned.
Another's diving bow he did adore,
Which with a shog casts all the hair before,
Till he, with full decorum, brings it back,
And rises with a water-spaniel shake.” *

One of these perukes would sometimes cost forty or fifty pounds. The fair sex at this time waxed and waned through all the varieties of dishabilles, hoop-petticoats, and stomachers. We must not enter upon this boundless sphere, especially as we have to treat upon it from time to time. We shall content ourselves with describing a set of lady's clothes, advertised as stolen in the year 1709, and which would appear to have belonged to a belle resolved to strike even Bow street with astonishment. They consisted of “a black silk petticoat, with a red-and-white calico border; cherry-coloured stays, trimmed with blue and silver; a red and dove-coloured damask gown, flowered with large trees; a yellow satin apron, trimmed with white Persian; muslin head-cloths, with crowfoot edging; double ruffles with fine edging; a black silk furbelowed scarf, and a spotted hood.” † It is probable, however, the lady did not wear all these colours at once.

—A tavern in Bow street, the Cock, became notorious for a frolic of Sir Charles Sedley, Lord Buckhurst, and others, frequently mentioned in the biographies, but too disgusting to be told. There was an account of it in Pepys's manuscript, but it was obliged to be omitted in the printing. Anthony à Wood found it out, and first gave it to the public. It was not commonly dissolute, there was a filthiness in it which would have been incredible if told of any other period than that of the fine gentlemen of the court of Charles. What can be repeated, has been told by Johnson in his life of Sackville, Lord Dorset.

“Sackville who was then Lord Buckhurst, with Sir Charles Sedley, and Sir Thomas Ogle, got drunk at the Cock, in Bow street, by Covent garden, and going into the balcony, exposed themselves to the company in very indecent postures. At last, as they grew warmer, Sedley stood forth naked, and harangued the populace in such profane language, that the public indignation was awakened; the crowd attempted to force the door, and being repulsed, drove in the performers with stones, and broke the windows of the house. For this misdemeanour they were indicted, and Sedley was fined five hundred pounds; what was the sentence of the others is not known. Sedley employed Killegrew and another to procure a remission of the King, but (mark the friendship of the dissolute!) they begged the fine for themselves, and exacted it to the last groat.”

Opposite this tavern lived Wycherly, with his wife, the Countess of Drogheda. Charles paid him a visit there, before Wycherly knew the lady; and showed him a kindness which his marriage is said to have interrupted. The story begins and ends with Bow street, and, as far as concerns the lady, is curious.

“Mr Wycherly,” says the biographer, “happened to, be ill of a fever at his lodgings in Bow street, Covent garden: during his sickness, the King did him the honour of a visit; when, finding his fever indeed abated, but his body extremely weakened, and his spirits miserably shattered, he commanded him to take a journey to the south of France, believing that nothing could contribute more to the restoring his former state of health than the gentle air of Montpellier during the winter season: at the same time, the King assured him, that as soon as he was able to undertake that journey, he would order five hundred pounds to be paid him to defray the expenses of it.

“Mr Wycherly accordingly went to France, and returned to England the latter end of the spring following, with his health intirely restored. The King received him with the utmost marks of esteem, and shortly after told him, he had a son, who he resolved should be educated like the son of a king, and that he could make choice of no man so proper to be his governor as Mr Wycherly; and that, for this service, he should have fifteen hundred pounds a-year allotted to him; the King also added, that when the time came that his office should cease, he would take care to make such a provision for him as should set him above the malice of the world and fortune. These were golden prospects for Mr Wycherly, but they were soon by a cross accident dashed to pieces.

“Soon after this promise of his Majesty's, Mr Dennis tells us that Mr Wycherly went down to Tunbridge, to take either the benefit of the waters or the diversions of the place, when, walking one day upon the wells-walk with his friend, Mr Fairbread, of Gray's Inn, just as he came up to the bookseller's, the Countess of Drogheda, a young widow, rich, noble, and beautiful, came up to the bookseller and inquired for the ‘Plain Dealer.’ ‘Madam,’ says Mr Fairbread, ‘since you are for the ‘Plain Dealer,’ there he is for you,’ pushing Mr Wycherly towards her. ‘Yes,’ says Mr Wycherly, ‘this lady can bear plain-dealing, for she appears to be so accomplished, that what would be a compliment to others, when said to her would be plain dealing.’ ‘No, truly, sir,’ said the lady, ‘I am not without my faults more than the rest of my sex; and yet, notwithstanding all my faults, I love plain-dealing, and am never more fond of it than when it tells me of a fault.’ ‘Then, Madam,’ says Mr Fairbread, ‘you and the plain dealer seem designed by heaven for each other.’ In short, Mr Wycherly accompanied her upon the walks, waited upon her home, visited her daily at her lodgings whilst she stayed at Tunbridge; and after she went to London, at her lodgings in Hatton garden: where, in a little time, he obtained her consent to marry her. This he did, by his father's command, without acquainting the King; for it was reasonably supposed, that the lady's having a great independent estate, and noble and powerful relations, the acquainting the King with the intended match would be the likeliest way to prevent it. As soon as the news was known at court, it was looked upon as an affront to the King, and a contempt of his Majesty's orders; and Mr Wycherly's conduct after marrying made the resentment fall heavier upon him: for being conscious he had given offence, and seldom going near the court, his absence was construed into ingratitude.

“The Countess, though a splendid wife, was not formed to make a husband happy; she was in her nature extremely jealous; and indulged in it to such a degree, that she could not endure her husband should be one moment out of her sight. Their lodgings were in Bow street, Covent garden, over against the Cock tavern, whither, if Mr Wycherly at any time went, he was obliged to leave the windows open, that his lady might see there was no woman in the company.” *

The Countess, says another writer, “made him some amends, by dying in a reasonable time.” His title to her fortune, however, was disputed, and his circumstances, though he had property, were always constrained. It is well known that he married a young woman a few days before he died, to disappaint a troublesome heir; and that in his old age he became acquainted with Pope, then a youth, who vexed him by taking him at his word, when asked to correct his poetry. Wycherly showed a candid horror at growing old, natural enough to a man who had been one of the gayest of the gay, very handsome, and a "Captain." He was captain in the regiment of which Buckingham was colonel. We have mentioned the Duchess of Cleveland's visits to him when a student in the Temple. Wycherly is the greatest of all our comic dramatists for truth of detection in what is ill, as Congreve is the greatest painter of artificial life, and Farquhar and Hoadley the best discoverers of what is pleasant and good-humoured. When the profligacy of writers like Wycherly is spoken of, we should not forget that much of it is not only confined to certain characters, but that the detection of these characters leaves an impression on the mind highly favourable to genuine morals. A modern critic, as excellent in his remarks on the drama, as the one quoted at the conclusion of our last chapter, is upon the stage, says on this point, speaking of the comedy of the 'Plain Dealer,'—"The character of Manly is violent, repulsive, and uncouth, which is a fault, though one that seems to have been intended for the sake of contrast; for the portrait of consummate artful hypocrisy in Olivia, is, perhaps, rendered more striking by it." The indignation excited against this odious and pernicious quality by the masterly exposure to which it is here subjected, is 'a discipline of humanity.' No one can read this play attentively without being the better for it as long as he lives. It penetrates to the core; it shows the immorality and hateful effects of duplicity, by shewing it fixing its harpy fangs in the heart of an honest and worthy man. It is worth ten volumes of sermons. The scenes between Manly, after his return, Olivia, Plausible, and Norel, are instructive examples of unblushing impudence, of shallow pretensions to principle, and of the most mortifying reflections on his own situation, and bitter sense of female injustice and ingratitude, on the part of Manly. The devil of hypocrisy and hardened assurance seems worked up to the highest pitch of conceivable effrontery in Olivia, when, after confiding to her cousin the story of her infamy, she, in a moment, turns round upon her for some sudden purpose, and, affecting not to know the meaning of the other's allusions to what she has just told her, reproaches her with forging insinuations to the prejudice of her character, and in violation of their friendship. 'Go! you're a censorious woman.' This is more trying to the patience than anything in the Tartuffe."

Tonson, the great bookseller of his time, had a private house in Bow street. Rowe, in an amusing parody of Horace's dialogue with Lydia, has left an account of old Jacob's visitors here, and of his style of language.

Tonson got rich, but he was penurious; and his want of generosity towards Dryden (to say the least of it) has done him no honour with posterity. It may be said that he cared little for posterity or for anything else, provided he got his money; but a man who cares for money (unless he is a pure miser) only cares for power and consideration in another shape; and no man chooses to be disliked by his fellow creatures, living, or to come. In the correspondence between Tonson and Dryden, we see the usual painful picture (when the bookseller is of this description) of the tradesman taking all the advantages, and the author made to suffer for being a gentleman and a man of delicacy. This is the common, and, perhaps, the natural order of things, till society see better throughout; though there have been, and still are, some handsome exceptions, as in the instances of Dodsley, the late Mr Johnson, and others. The bookseller generally behaves well, in proportion to his intelligence; nothing being so eager to catch all petty advantages, as the consciousness of having no other ground to go upon. It may be answered that Dryden's patience with Tonson sometimes got exhausted, and he became "capacious and irritable;" and it is always to be remembered that the bookseller need not pretend to be anything more than a tradesman seeking his allowed profits; but he should not on every occasion retreat into the strong-holds of trade, and yet claim the merit of acting otherwise; and Tonson, who undertook to be the familiar friend of Rowe and Congreve, ought not to have been able to insult the man whom they both respected, because he was not so well off as they. The following passage of mingled amusement and painfulness is out of Sir Walter Scott:—

"Dryden," says Sir Walter, in his life of the poet, "seems to have been particularly affronted at a presumptuous plan of that publisher (a keen Whig, and secretary to the Kit-cat club) to drive him into inscribing the translation of 'Virgil' to King William. With this view Tonson had an especial care to make the engraver aggravate the nose of Enneas in the plates into a sufficient resemblance of the hooked promontory of the Deliverer's countenance, and foreseeing Dryden's repugnance to his favourite plan, he had recourse, it would seem, to more unjustifiable means to further it; for the poet expresses himself as convinced that, through Tonson's means, his correspondence with his sons, then at Rome, was intercepted. I suppose Jacob, having fairly laid siege to his author's conscience, had no scruple to intercept all foreign supplies, which might have confirmed him in his pertinacity. But Dryden, although thus closely beleaguered, held fast his integrity; and no prospect of personal advantage, or importunity on the part of Tonson, could induce him to take a step inconsistent with his religious and political sentiments. It was probably during the course of these bickerings with his publisher, that Dryden, incensed at some refusal of accommodation on the part of Tonson, sent him three well-known coarse and forcible satirical lines, descriptive of his personal appearance:—

'With leering looks, bull-faced, and freckled fair,
With two left legs, and Judas-coloured hair,
And frousy pores, that taint the ambient air.'

"'Tall the dog' said the poet to the messenger, 'that he who wrote these can write more.' But Tonson, perfectly satisfied with this single triplet, hesitated to comply with the author's request, without acquiring any further specimen of his poetical powers. It would seem, on the other hand, that when Dryden neglected his stipulated labour, Tonson possessed powers of animadversion, which, though exercised in plain prose, were not a little dreaded by the poet. Lord Bolingbroke, already a votary of the muses, and admitted to visit their high priest, was wont to relate, that one day he heard another person enter the house. 'This' said Dryden, 'is Tonson, you will take care not to depart before he goes away, for I have not completed the sheet which I promised him; and if you leave me unprotected, I shall suffer all the rudeness to which his resentment can prompt his tongue.'"

* Works of Dryden, vol. i, p. 387. Sir Walter thus notices a letter of Tonson's on the subject of Dryden's com-

Fielding lived some time in Bow street, probably during his magistracy.

We turn out of Bow street into Russell street, so called from the noble family of that name, who possess great property in this quarter. It is pleasant to think that the name is not hostile to the reputation of the place, for we are more than ever in the thick of wits and men of letters, especially of a race which was long peculiar to this country, literary politicians. At the north-east corner of the two streets was the famous Will's coffee-house, formerly the Rose, where Dryden presided over the literature of the town; and on the other side of the way, on a part of the site of the present Hummums, stood Button's coffee-house, no less celebrated as the resort of the wits and poets of the time of Queen Anne.

Dryden is identified with the neighbourhood of Covent Garden. He presided in the chair at Russell street; his plays came out in the theatre at the other end of it; he lived in Gerrard street, which is not far off; and, alas for the anti-climax! he was beaten by hired beavos in Rose street, now called Rose alley. Great men come down to posterity with their proper aspects of calmness and dignity; and we do not easily fancy that they received anything from their contemporaries but the grateful homage which is paid them by themselves. "But the life of a wit," says Steele, "is a warfare upon earth." Sir Walter Scott, speaking of the beautiful description given by Dryden of the attic nights he enjoyed with Sir Charles Sedley and others, observes, "He had not yet experienced the disadvantages attendant on such society, or learned how soon literary eminence becomes the object of detraction, of envy, of injury, even from those who can best feel its merit, if they are discouraged by dissipated habits from emulating its flight, or hardened by perverted feeling against loving its possessors."

The outrage perpetrated upon the sacred shoulders of the poet was the work of Lord Rochester, and originated in a mistake not creditable to that would-be great man and dastardly debauchee. The following is Sir Walter's account of the matter. "The 'Essay on Satire,' (by Lord Mulgrave, afterwards Duke of Buckinghamshire), though written, as appears from the title page of the last edition, in 1675, was not made public until 1679, with this observation:—"I have sent you herewith a libel, in which my own share is not the least. The King, having perused it, is no way dissatisfied with his. The author is apparently Mr Dr [yden], his patron Lord M [ulgrave], having a panegyric in the midst." From hence it is evident that Dryden obtained the reputation of being the author; in consequence of which, Rochester meditated the base and cowardly revenge which he afterwards executed; and he thus coolly expressed his intention in another of his tributions to one of the volumes known under the title of his Miscellanies:—"The contribution, although ample, was not satisfactory to old Jacob Tonson, who wrote on the subject a most momentous expostulatory letter to Dryden, which is fortunately still preserved, as a curious specimen of the minutiae of a literary bargain in the seventeenth century. Tonson, with reference to Dryden having offered a strange bookseller six hundred lines for twenty guineas, enters into a question in the rate of three, by which he discovers and proves, that for fifty guineas he has only 1400 lines, which he seems to take more unkindly, as he had not counted the lines until he had paid the money; from all which Jacob infers, that Dryden ought, out of generosity, at least to throw him in something to the bargain, especially as he had used him more kindly in Juvenal, which, saith old Jacob, is not reckoned so easy to translate as Ovid."

letters:—"You write me word that I am out of favour with a certain poet, whom I have admired for the disproportion of him and his attributes. He is a rarity which I cannot but be fond of, as one would be of a hog that could fiddle, or a singing owl. If he falls on me at the blunt, which is his very good weapon in wit, I will forgive him if you please, and leave the repartee to black Will with a cudgel."

"In pursuance of this infamous resolution, upon the night of the 18th December 1870, Dryden was waylaid by hired ruffians, and severely beaten, as he passed through Rose street, Covent garden, returning from Will's coffee-house to his own house in Gerrard street. A reward of fifty pounds was in vain offered in the 'London Gazette' and other newspapers, for the discoverers of the perpetrators of this outrage. The town was, however, at no loss to pitch upon Rochester as the employer of the braves, with whom the public suspicion joined the Duchess of Portsmouth, equally concerned in the supposed affront thus avenged. In our time, were a nobleman to have recourse to hired braves to avenge his personal quarrels against anyone, more especially a person holding the rank of a gentleman, he might lay his account with being hunted out of society. But in the age of Charles, the ancient high and chivalrous sense of honour was esteemed Quixotic, and the civil war had left traces of ferocity in the manners and sentiments of the people. Encounters, where the assailants took all advantages of number and weapons, were as frequent, and held as honourable, as regular duels. Some of these approached closely to assassination; as in the famous case of Sir John Coventry, who was waylaid and had his nose slit by some young men of rank, for a reflection upon the King's theatrical amours. This occasioned the famous statute against maiming and wounding, called the Coventry Act, an act highly necessary, for so far did our ancestors' ideas of manly forbearance differ from ours, that Killegrew introduces the hero of one of his comedies, a cavalier, and the fine gentleman of the piece, lying in wait for, and slashing the face of a poor courtesan, who had cheated him.

"It will certainly be admitted, that a man, surprised in the dark, and beaten by ruffians, loses no honour by such a misfortune. But if Dryden had received the same discipline from Rochester's own hand, without resenting it, his drubbing could not have been more frequently made a matter of reproach to him: a sign, surely, of the penury of subjects for satire in his life and character, since an accident, which might have happened to the greatest hero that ever lived, was resorted to as an imputation on his honour. The Rose-alley ambuscade became almost proverbial; and even Mulgrave, the real author of the satire, and upon whose shoulders the blows ought in justice to have descended, mentions the circumstance in his 'Art of Poetry,' with a cold and self-sufficient sneer:—

'Though praised and punished for another's rhymes,
His own deserve as great applause sometimes.'

To which is added in a note, 'A libel for which he was both applauded and wounded, though intirely ignorant of the whole matter.' This flat and conceited couplet, and note, the noble author judged it proper to omit in the corrected edition of his poem. Otway alone, no longer the friend of Rochester, and, perhaps, no longer the enemy of Dryden, has spoken of the author of this dastardly outrage with the contempt it deserved:—

'Poets in honour of the truth should write,
With the same spirit brave men for it fight;
And though against him causeless hatreds rise,
And daily where he goes of late, he spies
The scowls of sullen and revengeful eyes;
'Tis what he knows with much contempt to bear,
And serves a cause too good to let him fear:
He fears no poison from incensed drab,
No ruffian's five-foot sword, nor rascal's stab;
Nor any other snares of mischief laid,
Not a Rose-alley cudgel ambuscade;
From any private cause where malice reigns,
Or general pique all blockheads have to brains.'"

We dismiss this specimen of the times, that we may enjoy the look of Dryden as posterity sees it,—that is to say, as that of the first poet of his class, presiding over the tastes and aspirations of the town. Milton sat in his suburban bower, equally removed from outrage and compliment, and contemplating a still greater futurity. In the following passage from the 'Country and City Mouse,' by Prior and Montagu, Dryden, it is true, is spoken of with hostility, but his acknowledged predominance shines through it. Prior's instinct misgave him in writing against his natural master.

"Then on they jogg'd; and since an hour of talk
Might cut a banter on the tedious walk,
As I remember, said the sober mouse,
I've heard much talk of the Wit's Coffee-house;
Thither, says Brindle, thou shalt go and see Priests supping coffee, sparks and poets tea;
Here rugged frieze, there quality well drest,
These baffling the Grand Senior, those the Test,
And there shrewd guesses made, and reasons given,
That human laws were never made in heaven.
But, above all, what shall oblige thy sight,
And fill thy eye-balls with a vast delight,
Is the poetic judge of sacred wit,
Who does i' th' darkness of his glory sit;
And as the moon who first receives the light,
With which she makes these nether regions bright,
So does he shine, reflecting from afar
The rays he borrowed from a better star:
For rules, which from Corneille and Rapin flow,
Admired by all the scribbling herd below,
From French tradition while he does dispense
Unerring truths, 'tis schism, a damned offence,
To question his, or trust your private sense.'"

Will's Coffee-house was at the western corner of Bow street, and is now a brazier's. It first had the title of the Red Cow, then of the Rose; and we believe is the same house alluded to in the pleasant story in the second number of the 'Tatler':—

"Supper and friends expect we at the Rose."

The Rose, however, was a common sign for houses of public entertainment. The company, of which our poet was the arbiter, sat up stairs in what was then called the dining, but now the drawing-room; and there was a balcony, to which his chair was removed in summer from its prescriptive corner by the fire-side in winter. "The appeal," says Malcolm, "was made to him upon every literary dispute. The company did not sit in boxes, as at present, but at various tables which were dispersed through the room. Smoking was permitted in the public room: it was then so much in vogue that it does not seem to have been considered a nuisance. Here, as in other similar places of meeting, the visitors divided themselves into parties; and we are told by Ward, that the young beaux and wits, who seldom approached the principal table, thought it a great honour to have a pinch out of Dryden's snuff-box."

A lively specimen of a scene with Dryden in this coffee-house has been afforded us by Dean Lockier. "I was about seventeen when I first came up to town," says the Dean, "an odd-looking boy, with short rough hair, and that sort of awkwardness which one always brings up at first out of the country with one. However, in spite of my bashfulness and appearance I used, now and then, to thrust myself in to Will's, to have the pleasure of seeing the most celebrated wits of that time, who then resorted thither. The second time that ever I was there, Mr Dryden was speaking of his own things, as he frequently did, especially of such as had been lately published. 'If any thing of mine is good,' says he, 'tis "Mac-Flecko;" and I value myself the more upon it, because it is the first piece of ridicule written in heroics.' On hearing this I plucked up my spirit so far as to say, in a voice but just loud enough to be heard, 'that "Mac-Flecko" was a very fine poem, but that I had not imagined it to be the first that was ever writ that way.' On this, Dryden turned short upon me, as surprised at my interposing; asked me how long I had been a dealer in poetry; and added, with a smile, 'Pray, sir, what is it that you did imagine to have been writ so before?—I named Boileau's 'Lutrin' and Tassoni's 'Secchia Rapita,' which I had read, and knew Dryden had borrowed some strokes from each. 'Tis true,' said Dryden, 'I had forgot them.' A little after, Dryden went out, and in going, spoke to me again, and desired me to come and see him the next day. I was highly delighted with the invitation; went to see him accordingly; and was well acquainted with him after, as long he lived."

Dryden's mixture of simplicity, good-nature, and good opinion of himself, is here seen in a very agreeable manner. It must not be omitted, that it was to this house Pope was taken, when a boy, by his own desire, on purpose to get a sight of the great man; which he did. According to Pope, he was plump, with a fresh colour and a down look, and not very conversible. It appears, however, that what he did say, was much to the purpose; and a contemporary mentions his conversation on that account, as one of the few things for which the town was desirable. He was a temperate man; though, for the last ten years of his life, Davies informs us that he drank with Addison a great deal more than he used to do, "probably so far as to hasten his end."

It is curious, considering his peculiar sort of reputation with posterity, that Addison's name should be found so connected in his own time with this species of irregularity. The same cause is supposed to have hastened his own end; and it is related by Pope, that he was obliged to avoid the Russell street Coffee-house, and the bad hours of Addison, otherwise they might have hastened his.

Will's coffee-house was the great emporium of libels and scandal. The channels that have since abounded for the dregs of literature had scarcely then begun to exist; and instead of purveying for periodical publications, the retailers of obloquy attended among the minor wits of this place, and distributed the last new lampoon in manuscript. There was a drunken fellow of that time, named Julian, who acquired an infamous celebrity in this way. Sir Walter Scott, in his edition of Dryden, has given the following account of him and his vocation.

"The extremity of license in manners necessarily leads to equal license in personal satire, and there never was an age in which both were carried to such excess as in that of Charles II. These personal and scandalous libels acquired the name of lampoons, from the established burden formerly sung to them:—

'Lampone lampone, camarada lampone.'

"Dryden suffered under these violent and invisible assaults, as much as any of his age; to which his own words in several places of his writing, and also the existence of many of the pasquils themselves in the Luttrell Collection, bear ample witness. In many of his prologues and epilogues, he alludes to this rage for personal satire, and to the employment which it found for the half and three-quarter wits and courtiers of the time!

'Yet these are pearls to your lampooning rhymes;
Ye abuse yourselves more dully than the times;
Scandal, the glory of the English nation,
Is worn to rags, and scribbled out of fashion:
Such harmless thrusts, as if, like fencers wise,
They had agreed their play before their prize.
Faith they may hang their harp upon the willows;
'Tis just like children when they box their pillows.'

"Upon the general practice of writing lampoons, and the necessity of finding some mode of dispersing them, which should diffuse the scandal widely while the authors remained concealed, was founded the self-erected office of Julian, secretary, as he calls himself, to the Muses. This person attended Will's, the Wit's Coffee-house, as it was called; and dispersed among the crowds who frequented that place of gay resort, copies of the lampoons which had been privately communicated to him by their authors. 'He is described,' says Mr Malone, 'as a very drunken fellow, and at one time was confined for a libel.' Several satires were written, in the form of addresses to him, as well as the following. There is one among the 'State Poems,' beginning—

'Julian, in verse, to ease thy wants I write,
Not moved by envy, malice, or by spite,
Or pleased with the empty names of wit and sense,
But merely to supply thy want of pence:
This did inspire my muse, when out at heel,
She saw her needy secretary reel;
Grieved that a man, so useful to the age,
Should foot it in so mean an equipage;
A crying scandal that the fees of sense
Should not be able to support the expense
Of a poor scribe, who never thought of wants,
When able to procure a cup of Nantz.'

"Another, called a 'Consoling Epistle to Julian,' is said to have been written by the Duke of Buckingham.

"From a passage in one of the letters from the 'Dead to the Living,' we learn, that after Julian's death, and the madness of his successor, called Summerton, lampoon felt a sensible decay; and there was no more that 'brisk spirit of verse, that used to watch the follies and vices of the men and women of figure, that they could not start new ones faster than lampoons exposed them.'"

These "brisk spirits" have still their descendants, and always will have till their betters cease to set the example of railing, or to encourage it. There is a difference, indeed, between the lampoons of such men and those of Dryden, or the literary personalities to which some ingenious minds will give way, before they well know what they are about, out of mere emulation, perhaps, of the names of Pope and Boileau. But it is not to be expected that the others will stop where they do, or refine with the progress of their years and knowledge. The most generous sometimes find it difficult to leave off saying ill-natured things of one another, out of shame of yielding, or the habit of indulging their irritability. They endeavour to reconcile themselves to it by trying to think that the abuse has a utility; but when they come to this point, the doubt is a proof that they ought to forego it, and help to teach the world better. Honest contention, however, is one thing, and scandal is another. The dealer in the latter has always a petty mind and inferior understanding, most likely accompanied with conscious unworthiness; the great secret of the love of scandal lying in the wish to level others with the calumniators.

"Will's continued to be the resort of the wits at least till 1710," says Mr Malcolm. "Probably Addison established his servant [Button] in a new house about 1712, and his fame, after the production of 'Cato,' drew many of the Whigs thither."*

"Addison," says Pope, "passed each day alike; and much in the manner that Dryden did. Dryden employed his mornings in writing, dined en famille, and then went to Will's: only he came home earlier at nights."—And again: "Addison usually studied all the morning; then met his party at Button's; dined there, and staid there five or six hours; and sometimes far into the night. I was of the company for about a year, but found it too much for me: it hurt my health, and so I quitted it."†

Button had been a servant of the Countess of Warwick, whom Addison married. It is said that when the latter was dissatisfied with the Countess (we believe during the period of his courtship), he used to withdraw the company from her servant's coffee-house. Unfortunately it is as easy to believe a petty story of Addison as a careless one of Steele. Addison, intellectually a great man, was complexionally a little one. He was timid, bashful, and reserved, and instinctively sought success by individual channels and disingenuous measures.

Under the influence of these eminent persons, Button's became the head-quarters of the Whig literature, as Will's had been that of the Tory. Steele, however, dated his poetical papers in the 'Tatler' from Will's, as the old haunt of the town muse. Perhaps the Whiggery of Button's was one of the reasons why Pope left off going there, as he did not wish to identify himself with either party. Ambrose Philips is said to have hung up a rod at that coffee-house, as an intimation of what Pope should receive at his hands, in case the satirist chose to hazard it. A similar threat is related of Cibber. The behaviour of both has been cried out against as unhandsome, considering the little person and bodily infirmities of the illustrious offender: but as the threateners were so much his inferiors in wit, and he exercised his great powers at their expense, it might not be difficult to show that their conduct was as good as his. Why attack a man, if he is to be allowed no equality of retaliation? The truth is, that personal satire is itself an unhandsome thing, and a childish one, and there will be no end to childish retorts, till the more grown understandings reform. Pope accused Philips of pilfering his pastorals, and of "turning a Persian tale for half-a-crown;" the one an offence not very likely, unless, indeed, all common-places may be said to be stolen; the other no offence at all, though it might have been a misfortune. These littlenesses in great men are a part of the childhood of society. They show us how young it still is, and what a parcel of wrangling schoolboys (in that respect) a future period may consider us.

One of the most agreeable memories connected with Button's is that of Garth, a man whom, for the sprightliness and generosity of his nature, it is a pleasure to name. He was one of the most amiable and intelligent of a most amiable and intelligent class of men,—the physicians.

Armstrong, another poet and physician, and not unworthy of either class, for genius and goodness of heart, though he had the weakness of affecting a bluntness of manners, and of swearing, drew his last breath in this street. He is well known as the author of the most elegant didactic poem in the language,—the 'Art of Preserving Health.' The affections of men of genius are sometimes in direct contradiction to their best qualities, and assumed to avoid a show of pretending what they feel. Armstrong, who had bad health, and was afraid perhaps of being thought effeminate, affected the bully in his prose writings; and he was such a swearer, that the late Mr Fuseli's indulgence in that infirmity has been attributed to his keeping company with the Doctor when in youth. We never met with an habitual swearer in whom the habit could not be traced to some feeling of conscious weakness. Fuseli swore as he painted, in the hope of making up for the defects of his genius by the violence of his style.

At No. 8 Russell street, Boswell was introduced to his formidable friend of whom he became the biographer. The house then belonged to Davies the bookseller. The account given us of his first interview is highly characteristic of both parties. Boswell had a thorough specimen of his future acquaintance at once, and Johnson evidently saw completely through Boswell.

"Mr Thomas Davies, the actor," saith the particular Boswell, "who then kept a bookseller's shop in Russell street, Covent garden, told me that Johnson was very much his friend, and came frequently to his house, where he more than once invited me to meet him; but by some unlucky accident or other he was prevented from coming to us.

"Mr Thomas Davies was a man of good understanding and talents, with the advantage of a liberal education. Though somewhat pompous, he was an entertaining companion: and his literary performances have no inconsiderable share of merit. He was a friendly and very hospitable man. Both he and his wife (who had been celebrated for her beauty), though upon the stage for many years, maintained an uniform decency of character, and Johnson esteemed them, and lived in as easy an intimacy with them as any family which he used to visit. Mr Davies recollected several of Johnson's remarkable sayings, and was one of the best of the many imitators of his voice and manner, while relating them. He increased my impatience more and more to see the extraordinary man whose works I highly valued, and whose conversation was reported to be so peculiarly excellent.

COVENT GARDEN CONCLUDED, LONG ACRE, AND LEICESTER SQUARE.

Boswell's first introduction to Johnson.—The Hummums.—Ghost-story there.—Covent garden.—The Church.—Car, Earl of Somerset.—Butler, Southern, Eastcourt Sir Robert Strange.—Macklin.—Curious dialogue with him when past a century.—Dr Walcot.—Covent garden market.—Story of Lord Sandwich, Hackman, and Miss Ray.—Henrietta street.—Mrs Clive.—James street.—Partridge, the almanack maker.—Mysterious lady.—King street.—Arne and his Father.—The four Indian Kings.—Southampton Row.—Maiden lane.—Voltaire.—Long Acre and its mug-houses.—Prior's resort there.—Newport street, St Martin's lane, and Leicester square.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.—Hogarth.—Sir Isaac Newton.

"At last," continues Mr Boswell, "on the 16th of May, when I was sitting in Mr Davies' back parlour, after having drank tea with him and Mrs Davies, Johnson unexpectedly came into the shop, and Mr Davies having perceived him through the glass-door in the room in which we were sitting, advancing towards us,—he announced his awful approach somewhat as an actor in the part of Horatio, when he addresses Hamlet on the appearance of his father's ghost, 'Look, my lord, it comes.' I found that I had a very perfect idea of Johnson's figure, from the portrait of him painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds soon after he had published his 'Dictionary,' in the attitude of sitting in his easy chair in deep meditation; which was the first picture his friend did for him, which Sir Joshua very kindly presented to me, and from which an engraving has been made for this work. Mr Davies mentioned my name, and respectfully introduced me to him; I was much agitated, and recollecting his prejudices against the Scotch, of which I had heard much, I said to Davies, 'Don't tell where I come from,'—'From Scotland,' cried Davies, roguishly. 'Mr Johnson, said I, 'I do indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it.' I am willing to flatter myself that I meant this as light pleasantry to soothe and conciliate him, and not as a humiliating abasement at the expense of my country. But however that might be, this speech was somewhat unlucky; for with that quickness of wit for which he was so remarkable, he seized the expression 'come from Scotland!' which I used in the sense of being of that country; and, as if I had come away from it, or left it, retorted, 'That, sir, I find, is what a great many of your countrymen cannot help.' This stroke stunned me a good deal; and when we had set down, I felt myself not a little embarrassed, and apprehensive of what might come next. He then addressed himself to Davies: 'What do you think of Garrick? he has refused me an order for the play for Miss Williams, because he knows the house will be full, and that an order will be worth three shillings.' Eager to take any opening to get into conversation with him, I ventured to say, 'O, sir, I cannot think Mr Garrick would grudge such a trifle to you.' Sir (said he, with a stern look,) I have known David Garrick longer than you have done; and I know no right you have talk to me on the subject.' Perhaps I deserved this check; for it was rather presumptuous in me, an intire stranger, to express any doubt of the justice of his animadversion upon his old acquaintance and pupil. I now felt myself much mortified, and began to think that the hope I had long indulged of obtaining his acquaintance was blasted. And, in truth, had not my ardour been uncommonly strong, and my resolution uncommonly persevering, so rough a reception might have deterred me for ever from making any further attempts. Fortunately, however, I remained upon the field, not wholly discomfited." * * * "I was highly pleased with the extraordinary vigour of his conversation, and regretted that I was drawn away from it by an engagement at another place. I had, for a part of the evening, been left alone with him, and had ventured to make an observation now and then, which he received very civilly; so that I was satisfied that, though there was a roughness in his manner, there was no ill-nature in his disposition. Davies followed me to the door, and when I complained to him a little of the hard blows which the great man had given me, he kindly took upon him to console me by saying, 'Don't be uneasy. I can see he likes you very well.'"

The Hummums Hotel and Coffee-house which occupies the south-west corner of this street, and stretches round into Covent garden market, is so called from an eastern word signifying baths. It was one of the earliest houses set up in England of that kind, and thence called bagnio; and one of the few that retained their respectability. The generality were so much the reverse, that the word bagnio came to mean a brothel. It appears from a story we are about to relate, that people went to the Hummums not only to bathe, but to get themselves cupped. Bathing is too much neglected in this country; but the consequences of our sedentary habits have forced upon us a greater degree of attention to it, and the imitation of the Turkish system of cleanliness has been carried further in vapour baths and the startling luxury of shampooing, which makes people discover that they have in general two or three skins too many. Englishmen, in the pride of their greater freedom, often wonder how Eastern nations can endure their servitude. This is one of the secrets by which they endure it. A free man in a dirty skin is not in so fit a state to endure existence, as a slave with a clean one; because nature insists, that a due attention to the clay which our souls inhabit, should be the first requisite to the comfort of the inhabitant. Let us not get rid of our freedom; let us teach it rather to those that want it; but let such of us as have them, by all means get rid of our dirty skins. There is now a moral and intellectual commerce among mankind, as well as an interchange of inferior goods; we should send freedom to Turkey as well as clocks and watches, and import not only figs, but a fine state of the pores.

Of the Hummums there is a ghost-story in Boswell, a thing we should as little dream of in this centre of the metropolis, as look for a ghost at noon-day. The Reader will see how much credit is to be given it, by the style of the narrator, who, with all his good will towards superstition (and it is no less a person that speaks than Dr Johnson), had an inveterate love of truth, which led him to defeat his own object.

"Amongst the numerous prints," says Boswell, "pasted on the walls of the dining-room at Strat-ham, was 'Hogarth's Modern Midnight Conversation.' I asked him what he knew of Parson Ford, who makes a conspicuous figure in the riotous groupe. Johnson. 'Sir, he was my acquaintance and relation,—my mother's nephew. He had purchased a living in the country, but not simoniacally. I never saw him but in the country. I have been told that he was a man of great parts; very profligate, but I never heard he was impious.' Boswell. 'Was there not a story of his ghost having appeared?' Johnson. 'Sir, it was believed. A waiter at the Hummums, in which house Ford died, had been absent for some time, and returned, not knowing that Ford was dead. Going down to the cellar, according to the story, he met him; going down again he met him a second time. When he came up, he asked some people of the house what Ford could be doing there. They told him Ford was dead. The waiter took a fever, in which he lay for some time. When he recovered he said he had a message to deliver to some women from Ford; but he was not to tell what, or to whom. He walked out; he was followed; but somewhere about St Paul's they lost him. He came back, and said he had delivered the message, and the women exclaimed, Then we are all undone! Dr Pellet, who was not a credulous man, inquired into the truth of this story, and he said, The evidence was irresistible. My wife went to the Hummums; (it is a place where people get themselves cupped). I believe she went with intention to hear about this story of Ford. At first they were unwilling to tell her; but after they had talked to her, she came away satisfied that it was true. To be sure the man had a fever; and this vision may have been the beginning of it. But if the message to the women, and their behaviour upon it, were true as related, there was something supernatural. That rests upon his word; and there it remains." *

At the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth, Covent garden (or, as it would be more properly spelt, Convent garden †) extended from Drury lane to St Martin's lane, and was surrounded by a brick wall. It had lately belonged to the Abbots of Westminster, whom it supplied, doubtless, with fruit and vegetables, as it has since done the metropolis, and hence its appellation. The Reader will see it in the old print of London by Aggas. There was a break into it on the southwest, made by the garden of Bedford house, which stood facing the Strand between the present Bedford and Southampton streets. On the dissolution of the monasteries, Covent garden was given to the Duke of Somerset, and on his fall, to John, Earl of Bedford, whose family converted it into a pasture ground, including Long Acre, then part of the fields leading to St Giles's. His descendant Francis, "about seventy years afterwards, let the whole pasture on a building lease, and built the old church for the intended inhabitants. The architect was Inigo Jones. To the same hand we are indebted for the portico of the north-eastern quarter, which still remains. There was a continuation of it on the South-east, which was burnt down. It was to have been carried all round the square, and the absence of it might be regretted on the score of beauty; but porticos are not fit for this climate, unless where the object is to furnish a walk during the rain. Covered walks devoted to that purpose, and conveniently distributed, might be temptations to out-of-door exercise in bad weather. If they succeeded, they would effect a very desirable end. But covered walks, however beautiful, which are not used in that way, are rather to be deprecated in this cold and humid climate. In Italy, where the summer sun at noon day burns like a cauldron, nothing can be better; but the more sun we can get in England the better. Luckily, there is a convenience in this portico, as far as the theatre is concerned; otherwise the circuit there would be more agreeable without it, and the coffee-houses would be more light and cheerful.

Of the style of building observed in the church there is a well-known story. "The Earl is said to have told Inigo Jones he wished to have as plain and convenient a structure as possible, and but little better than a barn; to which the architect replied, he would build a barn, but that it should be the handsomest in England." ‡

Inigo Jones's church was burnt down in the year 1795, owing to the carelessness of some plumbers who were mending the roof. "When the flames were at their height," says Malcolm, "the portico and massy pillars made a grand scene, projected before a back-ground of liquid fire, which raged with as much uncontrolled fury, that not a fragment of wood, in or near the walls, escaped destruction." * The barn-like taste, or in other words the Grecian (for usefulness and simplicity are the secrets of it, and the Temple of Theseus and a common barn have the same principles of structure), was copied in the new edifice. By a passage quoted in the 'Londinium Redivivum' from the 'Weekly Journal' of April 22, 1727, it appears that the portico of the old church had been altered by the inhabitants, and restored by the Earl of Burlington, "out of regard to the memory of the celebrated Inigo Jones, and to prevent our countrymen being exposed for their ignorance." The spirit of this portico has been retained, and the church of St Paul's, Covent garden, is one of the most pleasing structures in the metropolis.

A great many actors have been buried in this spot; among them, Estcourt, the famous mimic, Edwin, Macklin, and King. We shall speak of one or two of them presently, but it is desirable, especially in a work of this kind, to observe a chronological order. The mere observance itself conveys information. Among the variety of persons buried here may be mentioned, first:

Car, Earl of Somerset, in the old church. We shall speak of his infancy when we come to Whitehall and the court of James I. His burial in Covent garden was, doubtless, owing to his connexion with the family of Russell, his daughter having married William, afterwards Earl and Duke of Bedford, father of the famous patriot. It is said that his lady was bred up in such ignorance of the dishonour of her parents, that, having met by accident with a book giving an account of it, she fainted away, and was found in that condition by her domestics. Her lover's family were very averse to the match, but wisely allowed it upon due trial, and had no reason to repent their generosity. To read the history of the foolish and unprincipled Countess of Somerset, who would suppose that her daughter was to give birth to the conscientious martyr for liberty? But the blood which folly makes wicked, a good education can render noble.

Butler in the church-yard. The popular notion that he was starved is unfounded; but he was very ill-treated by a court whom his wit materially served. It is said that Charles, once and away, gave him a hundred pounds. This is possible; but it is at least as possible that he gave him nothing, though he would willingly have done it, perhaps, had his debaucheries left him the means. Charles, in his way, was as poor as Butler, though not as honourably so, for it does not appear that the poet was unwilling to labour for his subsistence. There is a mystery, however, in Butler's private affairs. He once appears to have had some office in the family of the Countess of Kent. Perhaps he was not a very good man of business, though the burning exhibited in 'Hudibras' showed how he could work on a favourite subject. When men succeed to this extent in what nature evidently designed them for, great allowance is to be made for their disinclination to other tasks; and Butler had no children to render the neglect of his fortune criminal. The Duke of Buckingham, who once undertook to "do something for him," and had a meeting for the purpose at a coffee-house, saw a pander of his go by the window with a "brace of ladies," and going after him, we hear no more of his grace. Luckily, to prevent him from starvation, Butler found a friend in the excellent Mr Longueville, of the Temple, a scholar and a real gentleman, who did not confine his generosity to an admiration of him in books. The poet is understood to have been indebted to him for support during the latter part of his life; and it was he who buried him in this church-yard. It is to Mr Longueville that we are indebted for the publication of Butler's 'Remains,' which are quite worthy of the wit of 'Hudibras,' and deserve to be more generally known. Butler was the greatest wit that ever wrote in verse; perhaps the greatest that ever wrote at all, meaning by wit the union of remote ideas. He was undoubtedly the most learned. His political poem is out of date; and much of the humour that delighted the cavaliers must, of necessity, be lost to us; but passages of it will always be repeated; and it is difficult to hear his name mentioned, without quoting some of his rhymes. He was the first man that gave rhyme itself an air of wit. His couplets are not only witty themselves, but seem to add a new idea to their imagery in the very sounds at the end of them. His startling turns of thought are accompanied by as surprising a turn in the cadence, as if the echo itself could not help laughing. Thus his doctor's shop is "— stored with deleterious medicines, Which whosoever took is dead since:"

his sour religionists

"Compound for sins they are inclined to,
By damning those they have no mind to:"

and again,

"Synods are mystical bear-gardens,
Where elders, deputies, church-wardens,
And other members of the court,
Manage the Babylonish sport;
For prolocutor, scribe, and bear-ward,
Do differ only in a mere word:
Both are but several synagogues
Of carnal men, and bears, and dogs
Beth antichristian assemblies
To mischief bent, as far's in them lies."

His most quoted rhyme, when

"— Pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with fist instead of a stick, is, singularly enough, no rhyme at all; but the surprise of the echo, and the truth conveyed in it, affect us as if it were perfect. Here are one or two more of the wilful order, very ludicrous:—

"— The captive knight
And pensive squire, both bruised in body,
And conjured into safe custody.

— In all the fabrick
You could not see one stone or a brick.

Who deals in destiny's dark counsels,
And sage opinions of the moon sells.

Those wholesale critics that in coffee-
Houses cry down all philosophy."

Mrs Pilkington tells us that Swift took down a 'Hudibras' one day, and ordered her to examine him in the book, when, to her great surprise, she found he remembered "every line, from beginning to end of it." * Mrs Pilkington is a lady whose word is to be taken cum capite gravis; nor is it very likely she should ever have heard the Dean repeat a whole

* 'Memoirs of Mrs Letitia Pilkington.' Dublin, 1748, vol. i, p. 136.

volume through; but if Swift knew any author in tire, Butler is likely to have been the man. Butler had the same politics, the same love of learning, the same wit, the same apparent contempt of mankind, the same charity underneath it, and the same impatient wish to see them wiser. His style of writing is evidently the origin of Swift's. If the Reader is not yet acquainted with his 'Remains,' the following sample or two will give him a desire to be so:—

"The truest characters of ignorance,
Are vanity, and pride, and arrogance;
As blind men use to bear their nooses higher,
Than those who have their eyes and sight intire."

"There needs no other charm, nor conjuror,
To raise infernal spirits up, but fear;
That makes men pull their horns in like a snail,
That's both a prisoner to itself, and jail;
Draws more fantastic shapes than in the grains
Of knotted wood, in some men's crazy brains,
When all the cocks they think they see, and build,
Are only in the insides of their skulls."

Sir Peter Lely, the painter of the meretricious beauties of the court of Charles II. Pope's couplet on him is well known:—

"Lely on animated canvass stole
The sleepy eye that spoke the melting soul."

The canvass is more sleepy than animated, and the ladies more like what they were in inclination than in features. However, there is great likeness on that very account. They are all of a sisterhood;—qualem non decet esse sororum. A master of pictorial criticism has said of the collection of them at Windsor Castle, that "they look just like what they were, a set of kept-mistresses, painted, tawdry, showing off their theatrical or meretricious airs and graces, without one trace of real elegance or refinement, or one spark of sentiment to touch the heart. Lady Grammont is the handsomest of them; and, though the most voluptuous in her attire and attitude, the most decent. The Duchess of Portsmouth (Cleveland), in her helmet and plumes, looks quite like a heroine of romance, or modern Amazon; but, for an air of easy assurance, inviting admiration, and alarmed at nothing but being thought coy, commend us to my Lady — above, in the sky-blue drapery, thrown carelessly over her shoulders! As paintings, these celebrated portraits cannot rank very high. They have an affected ease, but a real hardness of manner and execution; and they have that contortion of attitude and setness of features, which we afterwards find carried to so disgusting and insipid an excess in Kneller's portraits. Sir Peter Lely was, however, a better painter than Sir Godfrey Kneller—that is the highest praise that can be accorded to him. He had more spirit, more originality, and was the livelier coxcomb of the two! Both these painters possessed considerable mechanical dexterity, but it is not of a refined kind. Neither of them could be ranked among great painters, yet they were thought by their contemporaries and themselves superior to every one. At the distance of an hundred years we see the thing plainly enough." * Sir Peter was a Westphalian, of a family named Vander Vam. His father was an officer in the army, who, having been born in a perfumer's house which had a lily for its sign, got the name of Captain Du Lys, or Lely, and the cognomen was retained by his son. He aimed at magnificence in his style of living, probably in imitation of his predecessor at the English court, Vandyke; but there was a certain coarseness about him which showed the inferiority of his taste in that particular, as well as in the rest.

Wycherly in the church. See Bow street.

Southern, one of those dramatic writers who, without much genius, succeed in obtaining a considerable name, and justly, by dint of genuine feeling for common nature. He began in Dryden's time, who knew and respected his talents, was known and respected by Pope, and lived to enjoy a similar regard from Gray. "I remember," says Oldys, "this venerable old gentleman, when he lived in Covent garden, and used to frequent the evening prayers in the church there. He was always neat and decently dressed, commonly in black, with his silver sword, and silver locks." Gray, in a letter to Walpole, dated Burnham, in Buckinghamshire, 1797, says, "We have old Mr Southern at a gentleman's house, a little way off, who often comes to see us; he is now seventy-seven years old, and has almost wholly lost his memory; but is as agreeable an old man as can be; at least I persuade myself so when I look at him, and think of Isabella and Oroonoko." Southern died about nine years after this period, aged about eighty-five. With all the respect he obtained, probably a great deal more by the decency and civility of his habits, Southern, it appears, was not above making application to the nobility and others to buy tickets for his plays; a conduct which was of a piece with his moderate talents.

Joe Haines, the comedian. See Drury lane.

Estcourt, the comedian,—or mimic rather,—for, like most players who devote themselves to mimicry, which is a kind of caricature portrait-painting, his comedy or general humour was inferior to it. He was, however, a man of wit as well as a mimic; and in spite of a talent which seldom renders men favourites in private, was so much regarded, that, when the Beef-steak Club was set up, (which a late author says must not be confounded with the Beef-steak Club held in Covent garden theatre and the Lyceum,) Estcourt was appointed providitore or caterer, and presented as a badge of distinction with a small gridiron of gold, which he wore about his neck, fastened to a green ribbon. He is said at one time to have been a tavern-keeper, in which quality (unless it was in the other) Parnell speaks of him in the beginning of one of his poems:—

Gay Bacchus liking Estcourt's wine
A noble meal bespoke us,
And for the guests that were to dine Brought Comus, Love, and Jocus.*

* The best account we are acquainted with of the various Beef-steak Clubs, has been given us by the good-humoured author of 'Wine and Walnuts.' His work is an antiquarian fiction, but not entirely such; and the present account, among others, may be taken as fact. George Lambert, Rich's scene-painter at Covent garden, says he, "being a man of wit, and of repute as an artist, he was frequently visited by persons of note while at his work in the scene-room. In those days it was customary for men of fashion to visit the scene-room, and to lodge in a morning lounge behind the curtain of the theatre. Lambert, when preparing his designs for a pantomime or new spectacle, (for which exhibitions the manager, Rich, was much renowned) would often take his chop or steak cooked on the German stove, rather than quit his occupation for the superior accommodation of a neighbouring tavern. One of his visitors, men of taste, struck with the novelty of the thing, perhaps, or tempted by the savoury dish, took a knife and fork with Lambert, and enjoyed the treat. Hence the origin of the Beef-steak Club, whose social feasts were long held in the painting-room of this theatre, which, from its commencement, has enrolled among its members persons of

But his greatest honour is the following remarkable testimony borne to his merits, by Sir Richard Steele, whose own fineness of nature was never more beautifully evinced in any part of his writings:—

"Poor Eastcourt! the last time I saw him we were plotting to shew the town his great capacity for acting in his full light, by introducing him as dictating to a set of young players, in what manner to speak this sentence and utter t'other passion. He had so exquisite a discerning of what was defective in any object before him, that in an instant he could shew you the ridiculous side of what would pass for beautiful and just, even to men of no ill judgment, before he had pointed at the failure. He was no less skilful in the knowledge of beauty; and, I dare say, there is no one who knew him well, but can repeat more well-turned compliments, as well as smart repartees of Mr Eastcourt's, than of any other man in England. This was easily to be observed in his inimitable faculty of telling a story, in which he would throw in natural and unexpected incidents to make his court to one part, and rally the other part of the company. Then he would vary the usage he gave them, according as he saw them bear kind or sharp language. He had the knack to raise up a pensive temper and mortify an impertinently gay one, as he saw them bear kind or sharp language.

"It is an insolence natural to the wealthy, to affix, as much as in them lies, the character of a man to his circumstances. Thus it is ordinary with them to praise faintly the good qualities of those below them, and say, it is very extraordinary in such a man as he is, or the like, when they are forced to acknowledge the value of him whose lowliness upbraids their exaltation. It is to this humour only that it is to be ascribed, that a quick wit in conversation, a nice judgment upon any emergency that could arise, and a most blameless inoffensive behaviour, could not raise this man above being received only upon the foot of contributing to mirth and diversion. But he was as easy under that condition as a man of so excellent talents was capable; and since they would have it that to divert was his business, he did it with all the seeming alacrity imaginable, though it stung him to the heart that it was his business. Men of sense, who could taste his excellencies, were well satisfied to let him lead the way in conversation, and play after his own manner; but fools, who provoked the highest rank and fortune, and many eminent professional men and distinguished wits. The Club subsequently met in an apartment of the late theatre, then it moved to the Shakespeare Tavern; thence again to the theatre; until, being burnt out in 1812, the meetings adjourned to the Bedford. At present the celebrated convives assemble at an apartment at the English Opera House in the Strand.

"At the same time this social club flourished in England, and about the year 1749, a Beef-steak Club was established at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, of which the celebrated Mrs Margaret Woffington was president. It was begun by Mr Sheridan, but on a very different plan to that in London, no theatrical performer, save one female, being admitted; and though called a Club, the manager alone bore all the expenses. The plan was, by making a list of about fifty or sixty persons, chiefly noblemen and members of Parliament, who were invited. Usually about half that number attended, and dined in the manager's apartment in the theatre. There was no female admitted but this Peg Woffington, so denominated by all her contemporaries, who was seated in a great chair at the head of the table, and elected president for the season.

"It will readily be believed," says Mr Victor, who was joint proprietor of the house, "that a club where there were good accommodations, such a lovely president, full of wit and spirit, and nothing to pay, must soon grow remarkably fashionable." It did so—but we find it subsequently caused the theatre to be pulled to pieces about the manager's head.

"Mr Victor says of Mrs Margaret, 'she possessed captivating charms as a jovial, witty bottle companion, but few remaining as a mere female.' We have Dr Johnson's testimony, however, who had often gossiped with Mrs Margaret in the Green-room at old Drury, more in the lady's favour.

"This author (Victor) says, speaking of the Beef-steak Club, 'It was a club of ancient institution in every theatre; when the principal performers dined one day in the week together, (generally Saturday,) and authors and other geniuses were admitted members.'

"The club in Ivy lane, celebrated by Dr Johnson, was originally a Beef-steak."

him to mimicry, found he had the indignation to let it be at their expense who called for it, and he would shew the form of conceited heavy fellows as jests to the company at their own request, in revenge for interrupting him from being a companion, to put on the character of a jester.

"What was peculiarly excellent in this memorable companion was, that in the accounts he gave of persons and sentiments, he did not only hit the figure of their faces, and manner of their gestures, but he would in his narration fall into their very way of thinking, and this when he recounted passages wherein men of the best wit were concerned, as well as such wherein were represented men of the lowest rank of understanding. It is certainly as great an instance of self-love to a weakness, to be impatient of being mimicked, as any can be imagined. There were none but the vain, the formal, the proud, or those who were incapable of amending their faults, that dreaded him; to others he was in the highest degree pleasing, and I do not know any satisfaction of any indifferent kind I ever tasted so much as having got over an impatience of seeing myself in the air he could put me when I have displeased him. It is indeed to his exquisite talent this way, more than my philosophy I could read on the subject, that my person is very little of my care; and it is indifferent to me what is said of my shape, my air, my manner, my speech, or my address. It is to poor Eastcourt I chiefly owe that I am arrived at the happiness of thinking nothing a diminution to me, but what ARGUES A DEPRIVITY OF MY WILL.

"I have been present with him among men of the most delicate taste a whole night, and have known him (for he saw it was desired) keep the discourse to himself the most part of it, and maintain his good humour with a countenance and in a language so delightful, without offence to any person or thing upon earth, still preserving the distance his circumstances obliged him to; I say, I have seen him do all this in such a charming manner, that I am sure none of those I hint at will read this without giving him some sorrow for their abundant mirth, and one gush of tears for so many bursts of laughter. I wish it were any honour to the pleasant creature's memory; that my eyes are too much suffused to let me go on."

Closterman, in the church-yard. He was an indifferent, but once popular artist, whom we mention on account of his painful domestic end. He had a mistress whom he thought devoted to him. She robbed him of everything she could lay her hands on, money, plate, jewels, and moveables, and fled out of the kingdom. He pined away with an impaired understanding, and was soon brought to the grave. Closterman was once set in competition with Sir Godfrey Kneller. He painted the family of the Duke of Marlborough, and had so many disputes about the picture with the Duchess, that Marlborough said to him, "It has given me more trouble to reconcile my wife and you, than to fight a battle."

Arne, the celebrated musician, in the church-yard. See King street.

Sir Robert Strange, the greatest engraver, perhaps, this country has seen; that is to say, supposing the merits of an engraver to be in proportion to his relish for and imitation of his originals. Other men may have drawn a finer mechanical line, but none have surpassed Strange in giving the proper diversity of surfaces, or equalled him in transferring to hard copper the roundness and delicacy of flesh. His engravings from Titian almost convey something of the colours of that great painter. Like all true masters, Strange took pains with whatever he did, and bestowed attention on every part of it; so much indeed, that his love for his art appears to have been an en-haunting one, and he was anxious to keep the burin out of the hands of his children. He had seen a great deal of the world, and was a very amiable as well as intelligent man. When young, he was a great Jacobite, and fought sword-in-hand for the Pretender; though it is said that a main cause of his ardour was the hope of attaining the hand of a fair friend, equally devoted to the cause. It is pleasant to add, that he did attain it, and that she made him a good wife. Sir Robert was a Scotchman of a good family; but his knighthood came from George the Third, a few years before the artist's death.

Macklin, the comedian, in the church-yard, at the age of one hundred and seven, and upwards. We have spoken of him before in his stage character. His long age in the midst of cities and theatres is very remarkable. It seems to have been owing to the inheritance of a robust constitution,—the great cause of longevity next to temperance, perhaps the greatest, unless contradicted by the reverse. Most persons who have been long-lived, have had long-lived progenitors; but somebody must begin. The foundation is always temperance. Macklin must have been very lucky in his physical advantages, for he did not keep any very strict rein over his temper; nor does he appear to have followed any regimen, till latterly, and then he consulted the immediate cause of his stomach, and not the quality of what he took. However, his habits, whatever they were, were most likely regular. "It had been his constant rule," says his biographer, "for a period of thirty years and upwards, to visit a public-house called the Antelope, in White Hart yard, Covent garden, where his usual beverage was a pint of beer called stout, which was made hot and sweetened with moist sugar, almost to a syrup. This, he said, balmied his stomach, and kept him from having any inward pains." The same writer, in a report of a conversation he had with Mr Macklin, has left us an affecting but not unpleasant picture of the decay of faculties, remarkable to the very last for their shrewdness and vivacity. It is the liveliest picture of old mortality we ever met with.

Question. "Well, Mr Macklin, how do you do to-day?"

Answer. "Why, I hardly know, sir; I think I am a little better than I was in the morning."

Q. "Why, sir, did you feel any pain in the morning?"

A. "Yes, sir, a good deal."

Q. "In what part?"

A. "Why, I feel a sort of a—a—a—" (shaking his head), "I forget everything; I forget the word: I felt a kind of pain here," (putting his hand upon his left breast)—"but it is gone away, and I am better now."

Q. "How do you sleep, sir?"

A. "Not so well as I could wish, I am becoming more wakeful than usual; I awoke last night two or three times: I got up twice, walked about my room here, and then went to bed again."

Q. "Do you always get up when you awake, sir?"

A. "No, sir, not always; but I get up and walk about as soon as I feel myself—there, now, it is all gone," (putting his hand upon his forehead).

Q. "You get up, sir, I suppose, as soon as you feel yourself uneasy in bed?"

A. "Yes, sir, when I begin to be troublesome to myself?"

Q. "Do not you, sir, find it unpleasant to walk about here alone, and to have nobody to converse with?"

* Memoirs of the Life of Charles Macklin, Esq., &c., by James Thomas Kirkman, vol. ii, p. 410.

A. "Not at all, sir; I get up when I am tired abed, and I walk about till I am tired, and then I go to bed again; and so forth."

Q. "But does it not afford you great pleasure when any person comes to see you?"

A. "Why, not so much as one would expect, sir."

Q. "Are you not pleased when your friends come and converse with you?"

A. "I am always very happy to see my friends, and I should be very happy to hold a—a—a, see there now"

Q. "A conversation, you mean, sir?"

A. "Ay, a conversation. Alas! sir, you see the wretched state of my memory—see there now, I could not recollect that common word—but I cannot converse. I used to go to a house very near this where my friends assemble it was a—a—a—[a company] no, that's not the word, a—a—club, I mean. I was the father of it, but I could not hear all; and what I did hear, I did not—a—a—under understand; they were all very attentive to me, but I could not be one of them. I always feel an uneasiness, when I don't know what the people are talking about. Indeed, I found, sir, that I was not fit to keep company—so I stay away."

Q. "Have you been reading this morning, sir?"

A. "Yes, sir."

Q. "What book?"

A. "I forgot:—here, look at it;"—handing the book.

Q. "I see, it is Milton's 'Paradise Lost.'"

[He then took the book out of my hand and said:—"I have only read this much," (about four pages) "these two days—but what I read yesterday, I have forgot to-day." He next read a few lines of the beginning inimitably well, and laying down the book, said] "I understand all that, but if I read any farther, I forget that passage which I understood before."

Q. "But I perceive with satisfaction, sir, that your sight is very good."

A. "Oh, sir, my sight, like everything else, begins to fail too; about two days ago I felt—a—a—there now I have lost it—a pain just above my left eye, and heard something give a crack, and ever since, this eye (pointing to the left) has been painful."

Q. "I think, sir, it would be advisable for you to refrain from reading a little time."

A. "I believe you are in the right, sir."

Q. "I think you appear at present free from pain?"

A. "Yes, sir, I am pretty comfortable now: but I find my—my—my strength is all gone. I feel myself going gradually."

Q. "But you are not afraid to die?"

A. "Not in the least, sir,—I never did any person any serious mischief in my life:—even when I gambled, I never cheated:—I know that a—a—a—see, now—death, I mean, must come, and I am ready to give it up," (meaning the ghost).

Q. "I understand you were at Drury lane theatre last night?"

A. "Yes, sir, I was there."

Q. "Yes, sir, the newspapers of this morning take notice of it."

A. "Do they!"

Q. "Yes, sir;—the paragraph runs thus:—"Among the numerous visitors at Drury lane theatre last night, we observed the Duke of Queensberry and the veteran Macklin, whose ages together amount to one hundred and ninety-six."

Mr Macklin—"The Duke of who?"

A. "The Duke of Queensberry, sir."

Mr Macklin—"I don't know that man. The Duke of Queensberry!—The Duke of Queensberry! Oh! ay, I remember him now very well:—The Duke of Queensberry old! Why, sir, I might be his father! ha! ha! ha!"

Q. "Well, sir, I understand that you went to the Haymarket theatre to see the 'Merchant of Venice'?"

A. "I did, sir."

Q. "What is your opinion of Mr Palmer's Shylock?"

[This question was answered by a shake of the head. Being desirous of hearing his opinion I asked him the second time.]

Mr Macklin—"Why, sir, my opinion is, that Mr Palmer played the character of Shylock in one style. In this scene there was a sameness, in that scene a sameness, and in every scene a sameness:—it was all same! same! same!—no variation. He did not look the character, nor laugh the character, nor speak the character of Shakspeare's Jew. In the trial scene, where he comes to cut the pound of flesh, he was no Jew. Indeed, sir, he did not hit the part, nor the part did not hit him."

This conversation took place in September 1796. In July 1797 he died.

Dr Walcot, better known by the name of Peter Pindar. He was a coarse and virulent satirist, and content to write so many common-places, that they will stifle his works with posterity, with the exception of a few pieces. His humour, however, was genuine of its kind. His caricatures are striking likenesses; and the innocent simplicity which he is fond of affecting, makes a ludicrous contrast with his impudence. Dr Walcot's largest poems are worth little, and his serious worth nothing: what we think are likely to last in the collections, are his 'Boozy and Plozi,' his 'Royal Visit to Whitbread's Brew-house,' one or two more of that stamp, some of his 'Odes to Academicians,' and the immortal 'Pilgrims and the Peas,' the hero of which is assuredly hobbling to this day, and will never arrive. Dr Walcot was a man of taste in the fine arts, and produced some landscapes, which we believe do credit to his pencil. We have never seen them. His critical good taste is not to be disputed; though the Academicians, at one time, would have given a great deal to find it wanting. He was latterly blind, but maintained his spirits to the last. He had a fine skull, which he was not displeased to be called upon to exhibit,—taking his wig off, and saying "There," with a lusty voice; which formed a singular contrast with the pathos attached to the look of blind eyes.

Covent Garden market has always been the most agreeable in the metropolis, because it is devoted exclusively to fruit, flowers, and vegetables. A few crockery-ware shops make no exceptions to this "bloodless" character. The seasons here regularly present themselves in their most gifted looks,—with evergreens in winter, the fresh verdure of spring, all the hues of summer, and whole loads of deserts in autumn. The country girls who bring the things to market at early dawn, are a sight themselves worthy of the apples and the roses; the good-natured Irish women who attend to carry baskets for purchasers are not to be despised, with the half-humorous, half-pathetic tone of their petitions to be employed; and the ladies who come to purchase, crown all. No walk in London, on a fine summer's day, is more agreeable than the passage through the flowers here at noon, when the roses and green leaves are newly watered, and blooming faces come to look at them in those cool and shady avenues, while the hot sun is basking in the streets. On these occasions we were very well satisfied with the market in its old state. The old sheds, and irregular avenues, when dry, assorted well with the presence of leaves and fruits. They had a careless picturesque look, as if a bit of an old suburban garden had survived from ancient times.

Nothing, however, but approbation can be bestowed on the convenient and elegant state into which the market has been got by the magnificence of the noble proprietor, whose arms we are glad to see on the side next James street. They are a real grace to the building and to the owner, for they are a stamp of liberality. In time we hope to see the roofs of the new market covered with shrubs and flowers, nodding over the balustrades, and fruits and red berries sparkling in the sun.* As an ornament, nothing is more beautiful in combination than the fluctuating grace of foliage and the stability of architecture. And, as an utility, the more air and sun the better. There is never too much sun in this country, and every occasion should be seized to take advantage of it.

The space between the church and the market is the scene of Hogarth's picture of the 'Frosty Morning.' Here in general take place the elections for Westminster. Sheridan has poured forth his good things in this spot, and Charles Fox won the hearts of multitudes. It would be an endless task to trace the recollections connected with the coffee-houses under the portico. Perhaps there is not a name of celebrity in the annals of wit or the stage, between the reigns of Charles II and the present King, which might not be found concerned in the clubs or other meetings which they have witnessed, particularly those of Garrick, Hogarth, and their contemporaries. Sir Roger de Coverley has been there, a person more real to us than nine-tenths of them. When in town, he lodged in Bowstreet.

Opposite the Bedford Coffee-house a tragical scene took place fifty years back, the particulars of which are interesting. The Earl of Sandwich, grandson of Charles the Second's Earl of Sandwich, and first lord of the Admiralty during the North administration, had for his mistress a Miss Ray, whom he had rendered as accomplished as she was handsome. Some say that she was the daughter of a labourer at Elstree, others of a staymaker in Covent garden. Her father is said to have had a shop in that way of business in Holywell street in the Strand. Miss Ray was apprenticed at an early age to a mantua-maker in Clerkenwell close, with whom she served her time out and obtained a character that did her honour. A year or two after the expiration of this period she was taken notice of by Lord Sandwich, who gave her a liberal education; rendered her a proficient in his favourite arts of music and singing; and made her his mistress. He was old enough to be her father.

Lord Sandwich was in the habit of having plays and music at his house, particularly the latter. At Christmas the musical performance was an oratorio, for, "to speak seriously," says Mr Cradock "no man was more careful than Lord Sandwich not to trespass on public decorum." This gentleman, in his Memoirs, lately published, has furnished us with accounts which will give a livelier idea of the situation of Miss Ray in his Lordship's house, than any formal abstract of them.

"Plays at Hinchinbrook had ceased before I had ever been in company with Lord Sandwich, and oratorios for a week at Christmas had been substituted. Miss Ray, who was the first attraction, was instructed in music both by Mr Bates and Signor Giardini. Norris and Champness regularly attended the meetings, and there were many excellent amateur performers; the Duke of Manchester's military band assisted, and his Lordship himself took the kettle-drums to animate the whole. 'Non nobis Domine' was sung after dinner, and then catches and glees succeeded; all was well conducted, for whatever his Lordship undertook, he generally accomplished, and seemed to have adopted the emphatic advice of Longinus, 'always to excel.' Miss Ray, in her situation, was a pattern of discretion; for when a lady of rank, between one of the acts of the oratorio, advanced to converse with her, she expressed her embarrassment; and Lord Sandwich, turning privately to a friend, said, 'As you are well acquainted with that lady, I wish you would give her a hint, that there is a boundary line in my family. I do not wish to see exceeded; such a trespass might occasion the overthrow of all our music meetings.'

"From what I have collected, Miss Ray was born in Hertfordshire, in 1742, and that his lordship first saw her in a shop in Tavistock street, where he was purchasing some neckcloths. This was all that Mr Bates seemed to have ascertained, for both his lordship and the lady were equally cautious of communicating anything on the subject. From that time her education was particularly attended to, and she proved worthy of all the pains that were taken with her. Her voice was powerful and pleasing, and she has never been excelled in that fine air of Jephtha, 'Brighter scenes I seek above;' nor was she less admired when she executed an Italian bravura of the most difficult description."

Again.—"I did not know his lordship in early life, but this I can attest, and call any contemporary to ratify who might have been present, that we never heard an oath, or the least profligate conversation at his lordship's table in our lives. Miss Ray's behaviour was particularly circumspect. Dr Green, Bishop of Lincoln, always said, 'I never knew so cautious a man as Lord Sandwich.' The Bishop came too soon once to an oratorio; we went to receive him in the dining-room, but he said, 'No; the drawing-room is full of company, and I will go up and take tea there.' Lord Sandwich was embarrassed, as he had previously objected to Lady Blake speaking to Miss Ray between the acts; and as the Bishop would go up, a consequence ensued just as I expected. Some severe verses were sent, which Mr Bates intercepted."

"The elegant Mrs Hinchcliffe, Lady of the Bishop, attended one night with a party. She had never seen Miss Ray before, and she feelingly remarked afterwards, 'I was really hurt to sit directly opposite to her, and mark her discreet conduct, and yet to find it improper to notice her. She was so assiduous to please, was so very excellent, yet so unassuming, I was quite charmed with her; yet a seeming cruelty to her took off the pleasure of my evening.'"

While Miss Ray was thus situated, his lordship, through the medium of a neighbour, Major Reynolds, became acquainted with a brother officer of the Major's, a Captain Hackman, and invited him to his house. The Captain fell in love with Miss Ray, and Miss Ray is understood not to have been insensible to his passion. He was her junior by several years, though the disparity was nothing like the reverse one on the part of Lord Sandwich. Sir Herbert Croft, who wrote a history of their intimacy and correspondence, under the title of 'Love and Madness,' represents the attachment as mutual. According to his statement, Hackman urged her to marry him, and Miss Ray was desirous of doing so, but fearful of hurting the feelings of the man who had educated her, and who is represented as a sort of Old Robin Gray. In this sentiment, Hackman, with all his passion, is represented as partaking. Sir Herbert's book, though founded on fact, and probably containing more truth than can now be ascertain, is considered apocryphal; and Mr Cradock, who is as cautious in his way as his noble acquaintance, doubts whether any man was really acquainted with the particulars. All that he could call to mind relative to either party was, that for three weeks after the Captain's introduction, till his military pursuits led him to Ireland, he was observed to bow to Miss Ray, whenever she went out; and that Miss Ray, during the latter part of her time at the Admiralty, did not continue to speak of her situation as before. "She complained," he says, "of being greatly alarmed by ballads that had been sung, or cries that had been made directly under the windows that looked into the park; and that such was the fury of the mob, that she did not think either herself or Lord Sandwich was safe, whenever they went out; and I must own that I heard some strange insults offered; and that I with some of the servants once suddenly rushed out, but the offenders instantly ran away and escaped. One evening afterwards, when sitting with Miss Ray in the great room above stairs, she appeared to be much agitated, and at last said, 'she had a particular favour to ask of me; that as her situation was very precarious, and no settlement had been made upon her, she wished I would hint something of the kind to Lord Sandwich.' I need not express my surprise, but I instantly assured her, 'that no one but herself could make such a proposal, as I knew Lord Sandwich never gave anyone an opportunity of interfering with him on so delicate a subject.' She urged that her wish was merely to relieve Lord Sandwich as to great expense about her; for as her voice was then at the best, and Italian music was particularly her forte, she was given to understand she might succeed at the Opera-house, and as Mr Giardini then led, and I was intimate with Mrs Brooke and Mrs Yates, she was certain of a most advantageous engagement. I then instantly conjectured who one of the advisers must have been; and afterwards found that three thousand pounds and a free benefit had been absolutely held out to her, though not by the two ladies who managed the stage department. Whether any proposals of marriage at that time or afterwards were made by Mr Hackman, I know not."* Be this as it may, Hackman's passion was undoubted. He was originally an apprentice to a merchant at Gosport; was impatient of serving at the counter, entered the army at nineteen, but during his acquaintance with Miss Ray, exchanged the army for the church, "as a readier road to independence," and was presented to the living of Wyverton in Norfolk.

Whatever was the nature of the intimacy between these unfortunate persons, a sudden stop appears to have been put to Hackman's final expectations, and he became desperate. By what we can gather from the accounts, Lord Sandwich, either to preserve her from her lover or herself, thought proper to put Miss Ray under the charge of a sort of duenna. Hackman grew jealous either of him or some other person; he was induced to believe that Miss Ray had no longer a regard for him, and he resolved to put himself to death. In this resolution, a sudden impulse of frenzy included the unfortunate object of his passion.

On the evening of the fatal day, Miss Ray went with her female attendant to Covent garden theatre to see 'Love in a Village.' Mr Cradock thinks

* A few days after writing this passage, we saw the shrubs making their appearance.

He had declined to inform Hackman how she was engaged that evening. Hackman, who appears to have suspected her intentions, watched her, and saw the carriage pass by the Cannon-coffee-house (Cockspur street, Charing Cross), in which he had posted himself. Singularly enough, Mr Cradock happened to be in the same coffee-house, and says that he wondered to see the carriage go by without Lord Sandwich. This looks as if there was more in Hackman's suspicion than can now be shown. Hackman followed them.

"The ladies sat in a front box," says Mr Cradock; "and three gentlemen, all connected with the Admiralty, occasionally paid their compliments to them; Mr Hackman was sometimes in the lobby, sometimes in an upper side box, and more than once at the Bedford coffee-house to take brandy and water, but still seemed unable to gain any information; and I can add, as a slight circumstance, that in the afternoon I had myself been at the coffee-house (Cockspur street, Charing Cross), and, observing the carriage pass by, had remarked to my friend that I wondered at seeing the ladies on their way to the theatre without Lord Sandwich; that I meant to have dined at the Admiralty, but had been prevented; so that it appears now that most of the circumstances must have been accidental. The dreadful consummation, however, was, that at the door of the theatre, directly opposite the Bedford coffee-house, Mr Hackman suddenly rushed out, and as a gentleman was handing Miss Ray into the carriage, with a pistol he first destroyed this most unfortunate victim, and, though not at the time, fell a most dreadful sacrifice himself."*

"Miss Ray," says the Introduction to 'Love and Madness,' "was coming out of Covent garden theatre in order to take her coach, accompanied by two friends, a gentleman and a lady, between whom she walked in the piazza. Mr Hackman stepped up to her without the smallest previous menace or address, put a pistol to her head, and shot her instantly dead. He then fired another at himself, which, however, did not prove equally effectual. The ball grazed upon the upper part of the head, but did not penetrate sufficiently to produce any fatal effect; he fell, however, and so firmly was he bent on the intire completion of the destruction he had meditated, that he was found beating his head with the utmost violence with the butt-end of the pistol, by Mr Mahon, apothecary, of Covent garden, who wrenched the pistol from his hand. He was carried to the Shakspeare, where his wound was dressed. In his pocket were found two letters; the one a copy of a letter which he had written to Miss Ray, and the other to Frederic Booth, Esq. Craven street, Strand. When he had so far recovered his faculties as to be capable of speech, he inquired with great anxiety concerning Miss Ray; and being told she was dead, he desired her poor remains might not be exposed to the observation of the curious multitude. About five o'clock in the morning, Sir John Fielding came to the Shakspeare, and not finding his wounds of a dangerous nature, ordered him to Tothill Fields Bridewell.

"The body of the unhappy lady was carried into the Shakspeare tavern for the inspection of the Coroner."*

The whole of the circumstances connected with this catastrophe are painfully dramatic. "The next morning," says Mr Cradock, "I made several efforts before I had resolution enough to see anyone of the Admiralty; at last old James, the black, overwhelmed with grief, came down to me, and endeavoured to inform me, that when he had mentioned what had occurred, Lord Sandwich hastily replied, 'You know that I forbid you to plague me any more about those ballads: let them sing or say whatever they please about me!' 'Indeed, my lord,' I said, 'I am not speaking of any ballads; it is all too true.' Others then came in, and all was a scene of the utmost horror and distress. His Lordship for a while stood, as it were, petrified; till suddenly seizing a candle he ran up stairs and threw himself in the bed; and in an agony exclaimed, 'Leave me for a while to myself—I could have borne anything but this!' The attendants remained for a considerable time at the top of the staircase, till his Lordship rang the bell and ordered that they should all go to bed. They assured me that at that time they believed fewer particulars were known at the Admiralty than over half the town besides; indeed all was confusion and astonishment; and even now I am doubtful whether Lord Sandwich was ever aware that there was any connexion between Mr Hackman and Miss Ray. His Lordship continued for a day or two at the Admiralty, till, at the earnest request of those about him, he at last retired for a short time to a friend's house in the neighbourhood of Richmond."*

Hackman was executed at Tyburn. He confessed at the bar that he had intended to kill himself, but protested that but for a momentary frenzy he should not have destroyed her, "who was more dear to him than life." It appears, however, that he was furnished with two pistols, which told against him on that point. "On Friday," says Boswell, "I had been present at the trial of the unfortunate Mr Hackman, who, in a fit of frantic jealous love, had shot Miss Ray, the favourite of a nobleman. Johnson, in whose company I dined to-day, with some other friends, was much interested by my account of what passed, and particularly with his prayer for mercy of heaven. He said in a solemn, fervid tone, 'I hope he shall find mercy.' In talking of Hackman, Johnson argued as Judge Blackstone had done, that his being furnished with two pistols was a proof that he meant to shoot two persons. Mr Beauclerk said, 'No; for that every wise man who intended to shoot himself, took two pistols, that he might be sure of doing it at once. Lord——'s cook shot himself with one pistol, and lived ten days in great agony. Mr——, who loved buttered muffins, but durst not eat them because they disagreed with his stomach, resolved to shoot himself, and then he ate three buttered muffins for breakfast before shooting himself, knowing that he should not be troubled with indigestion; he had two charged pistols; one was found lying charged upon the table by him, after he had shot himself with the other.' 'Well (said Johnson with an air of triumph), you see here one pistol was sufficient.' Beauclerk replied smartly, 'Because it happened to kill him.'†

It is impossible to settle this point. The general impression will be against Hackman; but, perhaps, the second pistol, though not designed for himself, might have been for Miss Ray. His victim was buried at Elstree, where she had been a lowly and happy child, running about with her blooming face, and little thinking what trouble it was to cost her.

In Mr Cradock's book we hear again of Lord Sandwich, on whom this story has thrown an interest. On his return from Richmond, Mr Cradock went to see him, and was admitted into the study where the portrait of Miss Ray, an exact resemblance, still hung over the chimney-piece. "I fear," says Mr Cradock, "I rather started on seeing it, which Lord Sandwich perceiving, he instantly endeavoured to speak of some unconnected subject; but he looked so ill, and I felt so much embarrassed, that as soon as I possibly could, I most respectfully took my leave.

"His lordship rarely dined out anywhere; but after a great length of time he was persuaded by our open-hearted friend, Lord Walsingham, to meet a select party at his house. All passed off exceedingly well for a while, and his lordship appeared more cheerful than could have been expected; but after coffee, as Mr and Mrs Bates were present, something was mentioned about music, and one of the company requested that Mrs Bates would favour them with, 'Shepherds, I have lost my love.' This was unfortunately the very air that had been introduced by Miss Ray at Hinchinbrook, and had been always called for by Lord Sandwich. Mr Bates immediately endeavoured to prevent its being sung, and by his anxiety increased the distress, but it was too late to pause. Lord Sandwich for a while struggled to overcome his feelings, but they were so apparent that at last he went up to Mrs Walsingham, and in a very confused manner said, he hoped she would excuse his not staying longer at that time; but that he had just recollected some pressing business, which required his return to the Admiralty, and bowing to all the company, rather hastily left the room. Some other endeavours to amuse him afterwards, did not prove much more successful.* His lordship afterwards lived in retirement, and died in 1792.

It does not appear that Lord Sandwich's disinclination to be amused arose from excessive sensibility. Mr Cradock represents him in his political character as bearing "daily insults and misrepresentations as a stoic rather than an injured and feeling man," and he describes his calmness of mind in retirement, and his enjoyment of solitude. The same writer who calls him "a steady friend," speaks highly of his classical attainments, and his accomplishments as a modern linguist and an amateur, to which he added great caution (as the Bishop said), a love of "badgering," and an incompetency for the personal graces. When he played his part in the oratorios, it was on the kettle-drum. He related the following anecdote of himself. "When I was in Paris, I had a dancing-master; the man was very civil, and on taking leave of him, I offered him any service in London. 'Then,' said the man, bowing, 'I should take it as a particular favour, if your lordship would never tell any one of whom you learned to dance.'"

"Hurd once said to me," adds Mr Cradock, "there is a line in the Heroic Epistle that I do not at all comprehend the meaning of; but you can, perhaps, acquaint me. It alludes to Lord Sandwich, I suppose; but one word, shambles, I cannot guess at,—

'See Jimmy Twitcher shambles—stop, stop, thief.'

'That, sir,' said I, 'alludes to his lordship's shambling gait.' Upon the whole we have no doubt that he was a cold and superficial person, and that Miss Ray would not have been sorry had Hackman succeeded in retaining her heart; for, as to Hackman, the great cause of his mischance, according to the passage in Boswell, appears to have been the violence of his temper,—the common secret of most of these outrageous love stories. He was not a bad-hearted man, merely selfish and passionate, as he would have meditated no mischief against himself.

says the poet. But he was weak, selfish, and, by his readiness to become a clergyman from a captain, perhaps not very principled. The truest love is the strongest benevolence; it acquires an insatiable out-let of the very excess of its suffering, and is constant to merge its egotism in the idea of the beloved object. He that does not know this, does not know what love is, whatever he may know of passion.

In Henrietta street Mrs Clive once resided. She was the favourite Nell of the stage in the 'Devil to Pay,' and similar characters; and, according to Garrick, there was something of the Devil to Pay in all her stage life. She might have been Macklin's sister for humour, judgment, and a sturdiness of purpose amounting to violence, not unmixed with generosity. The latter part of her life she spent in retirement at Strawberry hill, where she was a neighbour and friend to Horace Walpole, whose effeminacy she helped to keep on the alert. It always seems to us, as if she had been the man of the two, and he the woman.

Henrietta street was most probably named after the queen of Charles I., and James street after her father-in-law. In both these streets lived the egregious almanack-maker and quack doctor, the butt of the wits of his time. He died in Salisbury street, Strand, which is the scene of his posthumous behaviour,—his pretending to be alive, when Bickerstaff had declared him dead. Partridge had foretold the death of the French king. Swift, under the name of Bickerstaff, foretold Partridge's, and, when the time came, insisted he was dead. Partridge gravely insisted that he was alive. The wits, the friends of Swift, maintained the contrary, wondering at the dead man's impudence; and the whole affair was hawked about the streets, to the ludicrous distress of poor Partridge, who not only highly resented it, and repeatedly advertised his existence, but was fairly obliged to give up almanack making. "He persisted, indeed, sturdily in his refusal to be buried till 1715; but he actually died as an almanack-maker in 1709, his almanack for that year being the last, and the only one he wrote after this odd misfortune befell him."

The following are specimens of the way in which Partridge resisted his death and burial. In the almanack for 1709, he says, "You may remember there was a paper published predicting my death on the 29th of March, at night, 1708, and after that day was passed the same villain told the world I was dead, and how I died, and that he was with me at the time of my death. I thank God, by whose mercy I have my being, that I am still alive, and, excepting my age, as well as ever I was in my life, as I was on that 29th of March. And that paper was said to be done by one Bickerstaff, Esq., but that was a sham name, it was done by an impudent lying fellow. But his prediction did not prove true. What will he say to excuse that? for the fool had considered the star of my nativity, as he said. Why, the truth is, he will be hard put to it to find a salvo for his honour. It was a bold touch, and he did not know but it might prove true.

"Feb. 1709. Much lying news dispersed about this time, and also scandalous pamphlets; perhaps we may have some knowledge of Bickerstaff, a second Bickerstaff, or a rascal under that name for that villain, &c. It is a cheat, and he a knave that did it, &c.

"Whereas, it has been industriously given out by Bickerstaff, Esq., and others, to prevent the sale of this year's almanack: that John Partridge is dead; this may inform all his loving countrymen, that, blessed be God, he is still living in health, and they are knaves who reported otherwise." Merlinus Liberatus, with an almanack [printed by allowance for 1710]. In James street, towards the beginning of the last century, lived a mysterious lady, who will remind the Reader of the Catholic lady in the 'Fortunes of Nigel.' "In the month of March 1720," says Mr Malcolm, "an unknown lady died at her lodgings in James street, Covent Garden. She is represented to have been a middle sized person, with dark-brown hair, and very beautiful features, and mistress of every accomplishment peculiar to ladies of the first fashion and respectability. Her age appeared to be between thirty and forty. Her circumstances were affluent, and she possessed the richest trinkets of her sex, generally set with diamonds. A John Ward, Esq., of Hackney, published many particulars relating to her in the papers; and amongst others, that a servant had been directed by her to deliver him a letter after her death; but as no servant appeared, he felt himself required to notice those circumstances, in order to acquaint her relations of her decease, which occurred suddenly after a masquerade, where she declared she had conversed with the King, and it was remembered that she had been seen in the private apartments of Queen Anne; though after the Queen's demise she had lived in obscurity. This unknown arrived in London from Mansfield, in 1714, drawn by six horses. She frequently said that her father was a nobleman, but that, her elder brother dying unmarried, the title was extinct; adding, that she had an uncle then living, whose title was his least recommendation.

"It was conjectured that she might be the daughter of a Roman Catholic, who had consigned her to a convent, whence a brother had released her and supported her in privacy. She was buried at St Paul's, Covent garden." * Perhaps she had some connexion with Queen Anne's brother, the Pretender.

In King street lived the father of Arne and Mrs Cibber. He was an upholsterer, and is said to have been the original of the Quid-nunc in the 'Tatler,' and the hero of Murphy's farce of the 'Upholsterer, or What News?' His name is connected also with that of the four 'Indian Kings,' as they were called, who came into this country in Queen Anne's time, to ask her assistance against the French in Canada. "They were clothed and entertained," says a note in the 'Tatler,' "at the public expense, being lodged, while they continued in London, in an handsome apartment," perhaps in the house of Mr Arne, as may be inferred from 'Tatler,' 155, and note. Certainly their landlord was an upholsterer in Covent garden, in a new street, which seems at that time to have received the name of King street, which it retains to this day, in common with many other streets so called, in honour of Charles II. The figures of these four Indian kings or chiefs are still preserved in the British Museum. The names and titles of their majesties are recorded here and in the 'Annals of Queen Anne,' but with the following differences from the account of them in this paper: The Five

Neen Ee Ge From, and Sa Ga Yoon Qua Prak King, of the Maqua's;—Elew Oh Koon, and Oh Nee: Fook Jon No Prote, of the river Sachin, and the Ganajoh-hore Sachem. On the 18th of April 1710, according to Salmon, on the 19th according to Boyer, these four illustrious personages were conveyed in two of the Queen's coaches to St James's, by Sir Charles Cotterel, master of the ceremonies, and introduced to their public audience by the Duke of Shrewsbury, then Lord-Chamberlain. They made a speech by an interpreter, which Major Pidgeon, an officer who came over with them from America, read in English to her Majesty. "They had (they said) with one consent hung up the kettle and taken up the hatchet, in token of their friendship to their great queen and her children, and had been, on the other side of the great water, a strong wall of security to their great queen's children, even to the loss of their best men. For the truth of what they affirmed, and their written proposals, they referred to Colonel Scuyder and Colonel Nicholson, whom they called, in their language, Brother Queder, and Anadgargaux, and, speaking of Colonel Vetch, they named him Anadiasia. They said they always considered the French as men of falsehood, and rejoiced in the prospect of the reduction of Canada; after which they should have free hunting, and a great trade with their great queen's children; and as a token of the sincerity of the six nations, in the name of all, they presented their great queen with the belts of wampum. They concluded their speech with recommending their very hard case to their great queen's gracious consideration, expressing their hopes of her favour, and requesting the mission of more of her children to reinforce and to instruct, for they had got, as they said, since their alliance with her children, some knowledge of the Saviour of the world. The curious may see this speech at full length, in the 'Annals of Queen Anne,' year 9th, p. 191, et seq. 8vo. On the same day, according to Boyer, a royal messenger of the Emperor of Morocco, Elhadje Guzman, was likewise introduced by the Duke of Shrewsbury to a private audience, and delivered letters to the Queen from Mula Ishmael, his master; the same emperor, probably, who sent an ambassador to our court in 1706, mentioned in the 'Tatler,' No. 130, and note, vol. iii, p. 44. The Indian Kings continued about a fortnight longer in London, during which time they were hospitably entertained by some of the lords commissioners of the Admiralty, by the Duke of Ormond, and several persons of distinction. They were carried to see Dr Flamstead's house and the mathematical instruments in Greenwich Park, and entertained with the sight of the principal curiosities in and about the metropolis; then conveyed to Portsmouth through Hampton Court and Windsor, and embarked with Colonel Francis Nicholson, commander-in-chief of the forces appointed to the American service, on board the Dragon, Captain Martin, Commodore, who, with about eighteen sail under his convoy, sailed from Spithead on the 18th of May, and landed their Majesties safe at Boston, in New England, July 18, 1710." * Their names are like a set of yaws and steezes.

Young Arne, who was born in King street, was a musician against his father's will, and practised in the garret, on a muffled spinnet, when the family had gone to bed. He was sent to Eton, which was probably of use to him in confirming his natural refinement, but nothing could hinder his devoting himself to the art. It is said the old man had no suspicion of his advancement in it, till, going to a concert one evening, he was astonished to see his son exalted, bow in hand, as the leader. Seeing the praises bestowed on him, he suffered him to become what nature designed him for. Arne was the most flowing, Italian-like musician of any we have had in England; not capable of the grandeur and profound style of Purcell, but more sustained, continuous, and seductive. His 'Water parted' is a stream of sweetness; his song, 'When daisies pied,' truly Shakspearian, full of archness and originality. Like many of his profession, who feel much more than they reflect, he became, in some measure, the victim of his sense of beauty, being excessively addicted to women. His sister, Mrs Cibber, whose charming performances on the stage we have before noticed, did not escape without the reputation of a like tendency; but she had a bad husband (the notorious Theophilus Cibber); and on the occasion that gave rise to it, is understood to have been the victim of his mercenary designs.

* 'Tatler,' et supra, vol. iii, p. 397.

Southampton street we have noticed in speaking of the Strand. Godfrey's, the chemist's, in this street, is an establishment of old standing, as may be seen by the inscription over the door. A hundred years ago, Mr Ambrose Godfrey, who lived here, proposed to extinguish fires by a new method of "explosion and suffocation;" that is to say a mixture of water and gunpowder. Tavistock street (where Lord Sandwich first saw Miss Ray) was once the great emporium of millinery and mantua-making. Macklin died there. He lived many years in Wyld street. In Maiden lane, Voltaire lodged, when in England, at the sign of the White Peruke, probably the house of a fashionable French peruquier. In 'Swift's Works' (vol. xx, of the duodecimo edition, p. 294,) there is a letter to him, in English, by Voltaire, and dated from this house. The English seems a little too perfect. There is another following it which looks more authentic. But there is no doubt that Voltaire, while in England, made himself such a master of the language, as to be able to write in it with singular correctness for a foreigner. He was then young. He had been imprisoned in the Bastille for a libel; came over here, on his release procured many subscriptions for the 'Henriade'; published, in English 'An Essay on Epic Poetry,' and remained some years, during which he became acquainted with the principal men of letters, Pope, Congreve, and Young. He is said to have talked so indecently at Pope's table (probably no more than was thought decent by the belles in France), that the good old lady, the poet's mother, was obliged to retire. Objecting, at Lord Chesterfield's table, to the allegories of Milton, Young is said to have accosted him in the well known couplet:—

Thou art so witty, profligate, and thin,
Though seem'st a Milton, with his Death and Sin."

But this story has been doubted. Young, though not so thin, was as witty and profligate in his way as Voltaire; for, even when affecting a hermit-like sense of religion, he was a servile flatterer and preferment-hunter. The secret of the gloomy tone in his 'Night-Thoughts' was his not having too much, and his missing a bishoprick. This is the reason why the 'Night-Thoughts' are over-done, and have not stood their ground. Voltaire left England with such a mass of subscriptions for his 'Henriade,' as laid the foundation of his fortunes, and with great admiration of English talent and genius, particularly that of Newton and Locke, which, with all his insinuations about our poetry, he took warm pains to extend, and never gave up. He was fond to the last of showing he had not forgotten his English. Somebody telling him that Johnson had spoken well of his talents, he said, in English "He is a clever fellow;" but the gentleman observing that the doctor did not think well of his religion, he added, "a superstitious dog."

During his residence in Maiden lane, there is a story of Voltaire's having been beset, in one of his walks, by the people, who ridiculed him as a Frenchman. He got upon the steps of a door-way and harangued them in their own language in praise of English liberty and the nation; upon which, the story adds, they hailed him as a fine fellow, and carried him to his lodgings on their shoulders. The treatment of foreigners at this time in the streets of London (and every foreigner was a Frenchman), was very much the reverse of what the inhabitants took it for. Thanks to the progress of knowledge, nations have learnt to understand one another's common cause better, and to suspect that the most ridiculous thing they could do is to forget it.

Long Acre is a portion of the seven acres before mentioned. The great plague of London began there in some goods brought over from Holland; but as that calamity made its principal ravages in the city, we shall speak of it under another head. During the battles of the Whigs and Tories, Long Acre was famous for its Mug-houses, where beer-drinking clubs were held, and politics "sung or said." Cheapside was another place of celebrity for these meetings. There is a description of them in a Journey through England in 1724, quoted by Mr Malcolm in his 'Manners and Customs of London during the Eighteenth Century.' "Gentlemen, lawyers, and tradesmen," says the account, "used to meet in a great room, seldom under a hundred.

"They had a president, who sat in an arm chair some steps higher than the rest of the company, to keep the whole room in order. A harp played all the time at the lower end of the room, and every now and then one or other of the company rose and entertained the rest with a song, and (by the by) some were good masters. Here was nothing drank but ale, and every gentleman had his separate mug, which he chalked on the table where he sat as it was brought in; and every one retired when he pleased, as from a coffee-house.

"The rooms were always so diverted with songs, and drinking from one table to another one another's healths, that there was no room for anything that could sour conversation.

"One was obliged to be there by seven to get room, and after ten the company were for the most part gone.

"This was a winter's amusement agreeable enough to a stranger for once or twice, and he was well diverted with the different humours when the mugs overflow.

"On King George's accession to the throne, the Tories had so much the better of the friends to the Protestant succession, that they gained the mobs on all public days to their side. This induced this set of gentlemen to establish mug-houses in all the corners of this great city, for well affected tradesmen to meet and keep up the spirit of loyalty to the Protestant succession, and to be ready upon all tumults to join their forces for the suppression of the Tory mobs. Many an encounter they had, and many were the riots, till at last the parliament was obliged by law to put an end to this city strife, which had this good effect, that, on pulling down the mug-houses in Salisbury court, for which some boys were hanged on this act, the city has not been troubled with them since*."

One of the mistresses, whom Prior celebrates under the name of Chloe, and compares to Venus and Diana, lived in Long Acre, and was the wife, some say, of a common soldier, others of a cobbler, others of the keeper of an alehouse. Perhaps she was all these, or there were three mistresses whose alliances were confounded. Spence says that the ale-house keeper was the first husband, and the cobbler the second. "Everybody knows," says Pope, "what a wretch she was." And again:—"Prior was not a right good man. He used to bury himself, for whole days and nights together, with a poor mean creature, and often drank hard. He turned from a strong Whig (which he had been when most with Lord Halifax) to a violent Tory; and did not care to converse with any Whigs after, any more than Rowe did with Tories."† "I have been assured," says Pope's friend, Richardson, the painter, "that Prior, after having spent the evening with Oxford, Bolingbroke, Pope, and Swift, would go and smoke a pipe, and drink a bottle of ale, with a common soldier and his wife, in Long Acre, before he went to bed."‡ After the poet's death, Arbuthnot says something to the same effect; but forget what.

None of the wits of that time seem to have known much about love as a sentiment. There is no end of the misconceptions of what is called love. Prior would probably have retorted upon Pope, that his own taste was not very delicate; and upon Arbuthnot, that the doctor was a sensualist in his way, and of a lower order. § He would have quoted Propertius, Raphael, and others, for the impartiality of his taste; and the woman, though in low life, might have had wit and beauty. The secret of these inequalities has been explained by Fielding. ¶

Sir Joshua Reynolds lived successively in St Martin's lane, and on the north side of Great Newport street, before he settled finally in Leicester square. In Newport street was born the celebrated Horne Tooke, the son of a poulterer in the adjoining market; which made him say, that his father was a "Turkey merchant." He was, perhaps, the hardest headed man that ever figured in the union of literature and politics; meaning, by that epithet, the power to discuss, and impenetrability to objection. He died at his house at Wimbledon, and was buried at Ealing. His history trenches too closely on the politics of our own day, to allow us to expatiate upon it in a work expressly devoted to the past.

§ Arbuthnot was a lover of the table, and is understood to have embittered his end by it; a charge which has been brought against Pope. Perhaps there is not one that might be brought with more safety against almost any man out of a hundred.
